HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, February 22, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—CLASSIFICATION OF MATERIAL.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE, in the absence of the chairman, Mr. Geoffrion, presented the second report of the special committee on the Lumsden charges, as follows:

The Special Committee appointed to investigate charges and allegations made by Mr. Hugh D. Lumsden regarding a portion of the engineering staff of the Transcontinental railway beg leave to present the following as their second report: Your committee recommend that the proceedings and evidence taken by the committee be printed from day to day for the use of the committee, and that rule 72 be suspended in reference thereto.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. HENDERSON. I notice that the report recommends the printing of the evidence for the use of the committee. The members of the House are all deeply interested in this, and I think a sufficient number of copies should be printed to give every member a fair supply.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it understood that a larger number will be printed, because I think it would be very desirable? Every member should be given an opportunity of examining the evidence before the committee has made its report to the House, so that he will be in a better position to deal with it when it reaches the House. I would move that the motion be amended to that effect.

Mr. FIELDING. Although the motion reads that the report be printed for the use of the committee, it invariably happens that there is a somewhat larger number available, and I have no doubt that if any hon. member desires the report he will be able to obtain it. Of course, it does not come to the House until the committee has reported, but I think there will be no difficulty in any hon. gentleman obtaining a sufficient number of copies through the committee.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GERMAN. I have a notice on the order paper which is No. 15 among the notices of motion. It would necessarily have to come up on private member's day, but as there will be no more private members' days, I beg leave to withdraw the motion as I wish to bring it up in another form.

Motion withdrawn.

COMMANDER WAKEHAM'S REPORT ON LOBSTER INDUSTRY.

Mr. SINCLAIR moved that the fifth report of the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries be now concurred in.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the report?

Mr. SINCLAIR. During the recess Commander Wakeham, an officer of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, was appointed to take evidence with reference to the lobster industry. He completed his work and brought in his report recommending certain changes in the fishery law. These recommendations have been referred to the Committee on Marine and Fisheries. The committee recommend that a thousand copies of Commander Wakeham's report be printed.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES FOR PAPERS, &c.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. PUGSLEY. I wish to answer a question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German). He made an inquiry as to a return which was moved for at the last session of parliament with regard to the dredges which are owned by the government and their operation for the last four years. The return has been prepared and has left my department, in the ordinary course to go to the Department of the Secretary of State, and I presume that within a day or two it will be ready for submission to the House.

The hon. member for West Algoma (Mr. Boyce) asked a question regarding the Sault Ste. Marie dry dock, a question which I am bound to say was unusual, I would not like to say offensive, because if it is offensive, it probably was unconsciously so on my hon. friend's part. He asked if a statement I made with rgard to the action of the government in reference to the Sault Ste. Marie dry dock was true, and he referred to some statement contained in a newspaper that an order in council had been passed deciding to grant assistance to the dry dock. I may say to my hon. friend that I have nothing to add to or take from what I said previously. The formal application has not yet come before the government; it will not come before council until the report of the engineer is ready and no order has been passed and no action taken with regard to the subsidy to this dock.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would ask the Minister of Finance whether or not there are to be any supplementary estimates, and, if so, when it is likely they will be brought down.

Mr. FIELDING. The supplementary estimates for the current year are being prepared at this moment. As to the supplementaries for the coming year, I am not in a position at the present to answer my hon. friend's question. It would be some little time before they could be brought down if there are to be any. The supplementaries for the current year will be brought down at an early day.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95), respecting the Naval Service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. RALPH SMITH (Nanaimo). Mr. Speaker, I had the honour last evening of occupying the time of the House for a few minutes with the discussion of this question, and I think I can promise the House that I shall not occupy very much time this afternoon. But, coming from a maritime district, as I do, in fact, coming from the farthest western constituency in Canada, I think it is incumbent on me as a member for that particular district, to have a view on this question and to be prepared to put that view before this House. Last night I made some reference to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), who preceded me, and I wish to make further reference to one or two things to which that gentleman attached great importance in connection with the policy of the government, which is now before the House. I wish to make a very important and very necessary correction to one argument advanced by my hon. friend last evening. He stated that perhaps the most mischievous and most insidious feature of the government Bill was an attempt, a veiled and unpatriotic attempt, to change the relations of Canada to the motherland. By section 15 of the British North America Act the Commander in Chief of all the armed forces in Canada is declared to continue to be vested in the Crown, and my hon. friend went on to explain that in his opinion the constitution of this country, section 15 of the British North America Act, was very seriously interfered with, and that the policy of the government presented to the House and to the country made no provision for retaining the authority of the Crown with regard to the operation of the naval or land forces of the empire or of Canada. My hon. friend, by this argument, simply announced to the House that he had not read the Bill before the House, for section 4 of the Bill provides exactly according to the terms and the very words of section 15 of the British North America Act. I shall read the two sections, as I did last evening, in my hon. friend's absence, because he attached such supreme importance to the position that he was taking. As a matter of fact, it appeared to those of us who listened to my hon. friend as if he had made a very important discovery. This matter had not been mentioned by any of the leading members of the opposition, and it did really appear from the attitude of my hon. friend that he had a very important discovery, and that the government, in providing for this policy, was actually destroying the constitution of Canada, and forever interfering with the harmony that ought to exist between Canada and the motherland.

The section in the British North America Act to which he referrred, reads:

> The command in chief of the land and naval militia and of all naval and military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the King.

Or in the Crown, if you like. I shall now read the section in the Bill before the House:

> The command in chief of the naval forces is vested in the King, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty, or by the Governor General as His representative.

He concluded that this unconstitutional act was an evidence of the disposition of the government to bring about the breaking off of the alliance, that proper and reasonable, and staunch alliance between this country and the empire, and to lead this country out into the development of absolute independence and perhaps in the future absolute separation from the empire. That is the attitude assumed by my hon. friend, and the strongest evidence which he produced that the policy before the House showed such a disposition on the part of this government was the fact that in this Bill they had failed to provide for the carrying out of the British North America Act in regard to the authority of the Crown, in the control of the naval and military forces of Britain and of this country. Thus, it is of tremendous importance that this matter should be brought to the attention of this House, and that the correction should be made.

The next point, and about the only point of attack that my hon. friend made upon the policy of the government was in relation to the fact that in time of war it was necessary for the Governor in Council of this country to give instructions as to whether or not the naval or military forces should be sent to the protection of the British empire. My hon. friend thought that was a very serious omission. I do not know exactly where he meant to place the responsibility, you have to have responsibility somewhere. But my hon. friend's argument went to show the House and the country that the leading ministers of the Liberal party were not true to the traditions of the British empire, were trying to develop an absolutely independent nationality, and his reasoning led him to the necessity of objecting to that provision in the Act, whereby it is necessary for the Governor in Council to provide that the military or naval forces of this country should be sent to the aid of the empire in case of war. I submit that the conclusion of my hon. friend was purely a political conclusion.

Mr. COWAN. Does the hon. gentleman propose to read section 4, without reading section 18, or does he read section 18 into section 4, and if the Governor can act what is the necessity of an order in council under section 18?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I am following my hon. friend's own argument. He complained last night that there was very serious danger in this country having to submit to the authority of the Governor in Council in case of hostilities occurring between Great Britain and any other nation, and he led up to that position by the announcement that he had no confidence in the leaders of this government, as he believed they tended to independence and separation. According to the conclusions of my hon. friend, he was deciding this question entirely on political grounds; because he had no confidence in the leaders of this government, he was afraid to depend upon them in such possible contingencies. I suppose my hon. friend would have no alarms at all if a Conservative government were in power. That is the answer to the whole position taken by my hon. friend. If his friends were in power, the Governor in Council would be all right and the empire would be perfectly safe. The thought struck me at the moment that even in that case my hon. friend could not be very confident, in view of the attitude of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), a very important person in the political party of my hon. friend, whom every one might reasonably expect would be a prominent member of a Conservative ministry. Therefore it struck me that my hon. friend could not entirely depend on the security of the empire even if his own friends were in power. If there is any tendency to independence on the part of any minister of the Liberal government, it has been annulled by the denunciation of British diplomacy by the leader of the Conservative party from the province of Quebec; and under these circumstances it would be unreasonable for my hon. friend from Vancouver to expect to make the empire secure by having as one of the principal ministers in a Conservative government the hon. member for Jacques Cartier.

Mr. COWAN. May I ask the hon. member for Nanaimo, before he leaves the merits of the question, to answer the questions I put to him, and further to tell me what would be the result if no order in council were passed under section 18?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. My answer to my hon. friend is simple. As I said, he controverted two things in the policy of the government last night. He said that the government were destroying the constitution of this country—that the authority over the forces of this country was provided in the British North America Act to be vested in the King, whereas there was no provision in the Bill of the government for such a condition? I have demonstrated to the House that in that my hon. friend is mistaken. The other position taken by my hon. friend was that if hostilities broke out between Britain and another country, it would be a serious thing to depend on the authority of the Governor in Council in this country, especially as it is constituted at the present time. Now, I am not contending against any legal interpretation that my hon. friend may put upon the Bill, now that he is in cold blood and sober senses; but I am replying to statements made by my hon. friend when he was a little excited; and if his statements cannot bear cold criticism, that is not my fault. What I am doing is criticising what my hon. friend has said, and I am doing it without prejudice and without feeling, as I have nothing but the best feeling for my hon. friend; but on an important question like this, the decision of members of this House ought to be based on argument, not on excitement or emotion.

My hon. friend made a great deal of a statement of the premier in his address, which he repeated to the very great amusement of hon. gentlemen opposite. That was why I put myself out of order by making the remark I did. My hon. friend sought to contribute to the amusement of his friends in the House by trying to show how ridiculous was the simple statement of the premier that when Britain was at war, Canada was at war, and if Britain was at war Canada might not be at war. Now, Sir, the amusing thing to me was that a man would demonstrate the simplicity, and, if my hon. friend will excuse me, the vanity, of thinking that he could amuse or please his friends by a simple repetition of phrases. My hon. friend never attempted to analyse the statement of the premier. It never occurred to him that after all there might be something in that statement. When the premier made that statement, as a plain man, deducing plain facts from simple arguments, it was very easy for me at least to see that Britain might be at war without any necessity for Canada being at war. It does not follow that Britain may not in very many instances be engaged in hostilities at different parts of the empire, none of which would be sufficently important to necessitate calling in the aid of this country; and if I can understand the deductions of common sense, that is exactly what the premier meant by the statement he made.

Now, I want to ask the House to bear with me for a few minutes while I discuss the three principles which are before the House. We are called upon as members of this House to vote for one of three things; first, the policy of the government; second, the policy of the leader of the opposition; third the policy of the member for Jacues Cartier. What were the circumstances that gave rise to the consideration of this question? How is it that suddenly, within a year, we are called upon to consider and determine the question of providing in this country for naval protection involving millions of dollars of expenditure? The condition arose from the fact that a year ago some strange emotion and excitement took possession of certain gentlemen in the old country and spread to kindred political spirits in this country, and that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), becoming suddenly alarmed for the safety and security of the empire, brought up a motion in this House for the discussion of this question. As the result of that discussion, the right hon. the Prime Minister proposed to amend the motion of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). My hon. friend, the leader of the opposition made an arrangement, with the consent of his friends, whereby whatever resolution might be adopted at that particular time, should express the unanimous feeling of both sides of the House. That, in my opinion, was an ideal condition for the consideration of a question of this importance affecting this country and the empire at large. The proposal suggested by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Foster) was amended by the right hon. the leader of the government and again amended by a change suggested by the hon. the leader of the opposition, and the proposition in its final shape was unanimously agreed to. Where was the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) at that particular moment? In view of the position he has since taken, in the discussion on this Bill, what excuse has he to offer for his inertness and inaction on that occasion? He had nothing to say a year ago when this resolution was unanimously adopted, but no sooner did this government commit itself to a proposal to do something to strengthen the naval forces of the empire than the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) declares that he never believed there was anything in this excitement regarding the naval forces of Great Britain, that it was purely fictitious and had spread from the old country to Canada. But if that were his conviction, when was the proper time for him to have expressed it? I submit that it was when the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Foster) submitted his resolution when that resolution was being discussed in this House; but the hon. gentleman, instead of doing this, left his seat and went out of the House and abandoned his duty, and he did this, although he was at the time convinced that an exciting condition had arisen in this country which was not based on facts. Then was the proper time for the hon. gentleman to have made the criticism which he made a year later, and in neglecting to do so, I charge him with having failed in his duty. But a year later, when this tremendous excitement was cooling off, and things were coming to a normal condition, was the time he chose to show his temper and his teeth to his own friends and dispute the methods taken by his own political colleagues, and to show his anxiety to protect the empire by an amendment asking that the whole question be submitted to the votes and opinion of the people. I could not help being reminded of the old lines:

When the devil was sick, the devil a monk would be;
When the devil got well, the devil a monk was he.

The time for my hon. friend to have asserted his convictions and used his influence was at the beginning of the excitement but he shirked his duty. The occasion for him to have corrected the wrong impression was just the one when he failed to do his duty.

Just a word more about my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). It is amusing to consider the position of my hon. friend in contrast with the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan). That hon. gentleman spoke for two hours last night, and during nine-tenths of that time he was facing the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. One could not help feeling that really his arguments, his influence and his declamation, were directed almost solely for the benefit of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier. He kept steadily looking that hon. gentleman in the face, although using words that might, by a wave of the hand, be sent across to the government benches, still it seemed to me that the hon. gentleman was really saying: Those fellows are bad enough, but you are a long ways worse, and I consider you are really a more dangerous factor as opposed to the empire than even are hon. members opposite.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) expressed great dissatisfaction with British diplomacy. He went on to remind the House of a statement made by the right hon. the Prime Minister that if the supremacy of Britain on the sea should be weakened, the strength and integrity of Canada would be jeopardized, and expressed his dissent from that proposition. Then he proceeded to depreciate British diplomacy and the effects in Canada of that diplomacy. Well, I myself, am a little jealous in favour of Britain and British diplomacy. I am myself an Englishman, just a few years in this country, but while I do not question the loyalty of Canadians to Britain, what I do say is this, that no man is in a position to doubt the wisdom of British diplomacy who refuses to spend a dollar for the protection of his own country. Britain has undoubtedly, in her diplomatic negotiations, to make compromises, but it must be remembered that she has to protect every country within the empire, and all her diplomatic resources had to be exercised in favour of the empire; and in my opinion any hon. member who—as my hon. friend did in a very bitter speech—opposes the idea of Canada making any contribution or any effort in her own defence or that of the empire is hardly in a position to question the effectiveness of British diplomacy. Great Britain has had to make the best settlements she could. She has had to give as well as take. If her diplomatists insisted on taking every time, they would have had to fight every time. They had to consider grievances; they had to give as well as take. If they took every time, they would have to fight every time. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier demands of the British diplomats only consideration of the interests of the empire on every occasion, and yet he insists that not a man and not a dollar should be contributed by Canada in the defence of this country either by land or by sea. I submit that no argument has been presented by any member of this House so politically cowardly as that of the hon member (Mr. Monk). If he was right in remembering the faults of British diplomacy he should have considered also the difficulties under which British diplomacy operated. I do not say that every negotiation in the past has been carried on to the best interests of the empire, but I do say that the men who had the responsibility of carrying on these negotiations did the best they could in the interests of the empire. And, if there is to be a reflection on British diplomacy, it ought to come from men who are willing to back up their opinions with their own serength and their own money, and not from men such as a prominent leader of a great political party who reflects upon the diplomacy of the British authorities and yet refuses to spend a dollar to protect his own rights.

Now, I dispose of the amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier as being outside the practical politics of the empire. For my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) has placed himself outside the empire in his discussion of this question. I come now to the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). That amendment contains two principles: First, that we should make a voluntary gift of a sufficient sum to build two Dreadnoughts, and do it immediately on the assumption that there is an immediate emergency; second, that the question of naval defence in Canada should be submitted to the consideration of the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the strongest speech that could be made against the amendment of the leader of the opposition to-day would be an accumulation of the expressions of the leader of the opposition and his friends just a year ago. Within the last few days, I have spent several hours reading these speeches, reading them in the light of the amendment which the leader of the opposition has now placed before you, and I propose to give some passages that have not been recited from the speeches of such hon. members as the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and my good friend from the city of Victoria (Mr. Barnard)—interested as he is;—and I want to select a few very short passages (for I do not like to read extracts) to show that the arguments of these gentlemen a year ago are the strongest answers that could be offered to the present policy of the leader of the opposition in this House. If I want to find an argument in favour of a Canadian navy, I must go to the speeches of these hon. gentlemen a year ago; if I want to find an argument against making a contribution to Great Britain for Dreadnoughts or anything else, I must go to the arguments of these gentlemen a year ago. I take first the hon. member for North Toronto. As hon. members listened to his words, I ask them to keep in mind the policy of the leader of the opposition, and keep in mind also the somersault performed by the hon. member from North Toronto a few days ago in the debate on this Bill—a political somersault that, I admit, was cleverly executed; no member of the party could execute such a ''bout-face' as did my hon. friend. His contention eleven months ago was in favour of a contribution. Speaking of the thing to be considered, he said:

> The first is the policy of a fixed annual contribution in money to the British government or the British admiralty. Now, that divides itself, apparently, into two branches, but it is really the same thing. One man says: Send one million dollars or two million dollars a year; another man says: Send a Dreadnought or two Dreadnoughts, and so far as Canada is concerned, these two are absolutely one.

The present policy of the leader of the opposition is to send Dreadnoughts, but the member for North Toronto demonstrated that, so far as the principle of the thing is concerned, there is absolutely no difference to Canada.

> When we translate one contribution into Dreadnoughts it comes down in the end to money which would be sufficient to build and equip a Dreadnought. And, therefore, I say, they are both parts of the one proposition——

Now, I would like the hon. member, and especially the hon. gentleman who is to follow me in this debate to remember this:

> —an annual fixed contribution of money to the British government for the purpose of national and imperial defence.

If that statement be correct, then this House has to consider not only the proposition of the leader of the opposition for two Dreadnoughts at the present time, but the more serious contingency of a repeated contribution to the British empire which is involved in the principle necessarily and according to the hon. member for North Toronto himself. Let us get back to the foundation of this proposition. If we are not to have the establishment of a Canadian navy, if we are to remain in the empire, if we are to make the contribution this year because we have not the necessary ships within the country to help the British empire, and if, as hon. gentlemen say, we are not to have a Canadian navy, is it not logical to say that for all time to come, every time a little cry is raised, every time a possible contingency threatens in Great Britain, hon. members opposite will stand in favour of making direct contributions in cash from this country to the empire? They cannot escape the necessary conclusion. That, Sir, in my opinion, is the very weakness of their position. If the hon. gentleman had said: We will build a Canadian navy and we will make a contribution, that would have been a different proposition. But the hon. gentleman takes the position: We will not build a navy, but we will send a contribution. Sir, if you never begin to build a navy, you will never have one, and if you never have one, and remain within the empire, then you will for all time have to resort to a direct subscription of money by the people of this country.

The next proposal of the leader of the opposition is to submit the question of the establishment of a Canadian navy to the people. Well, I do not know what I would do under exactly similar circumstances as the hon. gentleman, but in contending for a principle I always try to put myself in the other fellow's place. But so far as I can see, if I had been the leader of the opposition, I would have reversed that proposition, I would have asked the people of Canada if they are willing to send a contribution of 20 or 25 millions to the empire, but I would assume that I had a mandate from the people to take proper measures to defend their trade and their coasts. As I say, my hon. friend reversed that proposition, and says: We will send away the money of this country, over which we will have no control, and we will not ask the people for permission to do so.

Mr. BURRELL. I would like to ask the hon. member if he considers there is an emergency, and if so, what does he propose to do?

Mr. R. SMITH. I intend to make my own speech in my own way, and I will answer my hon. friend on the question of an emergency before I get through. I propose to go from one point to another in logical sequence; I do not depend upon a manuscript nor read an essay like my hon. friend. I have to use the logical faculty with which I am possessed, just as necessity arises, but I try to use it in a proper way. I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the opposition assumes that he has a mandate from the people to make a money contribution, but he has no mandate to build ships, and shipyards, and dockyards, and develop a naval protection for Canada. I say that my hon. friend's proposition on the face of it is contrary to the principles of responsible government, and it cannot but confuse the public mind from its contradictory nature. Why, Sir, it is evident to every one that my hon. friend's resolution was conceived for the purpose of consolidating conflicting elements within his own party. One element of the opposition says we ought to send a contribution equal to the value of two Dreadnoughts to meet a crisis, and the leader of the opposition had to provide for that feeling. Another man thought it would be a foolish thing to build a navy in Canada under any circumstances, and my hon. friend had to make some provision in his policy for that feeling. A third contingent thought that before building a navy in Canada we ought to consult the electors of this country as to whether we should do it or not, and my hon. friend had to make provision for that feeling. So there are three positively divergent principles that had to be worked into one symmetrical whole, and he endeavours to combine into one party different men of all these different temperaments. And so we have the simple expedient of the hon. gentleman's resolution to combine the conflicting elements among his own followers.

Now, the proposition of giving two Dreadnoughts, or a contribution of money, to the British empire is based on the assumption that there is a crisis. My hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) wanted to know what I proposed to do in case of a crisis. I will ask him another question. How are we to determine whether there is a crisis or not in Britain? By what process of reasoning are the members of this House to arrive at an assurance that there is a crisis at the seat of empire? Because every member of this House will agree with me that we must not be carried away by every little wave of sentiment that comes along. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes), and the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), could get up an excitement of that kind in 24 hours. Now, Sir, if it should ever happen that hon. gentlemen opposite took the reins of government in this country, and if I myself became leader of the opposition, I can imagine that these hon. gentlemen would be wanting to send Dreadnoughts every 48 hours in order to meet an imagined emergency, and I would have to oppose them.

Now, I submit that the question of whether a crisis exists is to be determined by some reasonable process. The leader of the opposition said we must determine whether there is a crisis in Britain by the statements of responsible men in England. In that I agree with my hon. friend. But can my hon. friend, or any other man of this House, conclude that there is a crisis, or a serious danger, from the statements of responsible men in England? I may be told, how is it that the Liberal government in England, for the last two years, and especially the last year, have been increasing the power of the British navy; and according to the despatches received in this country yesterday, the speech from the Throne, at the meeting of the British parliament, asks for a further increase in the provision for strengthening the navy. Well, Sir, I look upon all that as an evidence, not of a crisis, not of danger, but of a determination to secure absolute security. It is not an evidence that Britain is going to be interfered with by Germany, it is an evidence that neither Germany nor any other country will dare to interfere with the integrity of that great empire. The question as to whether there is a crisis should be decided by members of this House, in view of the policy, the statements and the actions of responsible ministers in the old country. I want to read one or two short extracts from the columns of one of the most responsible newspapers in England. As an Englishman I take a great interest in the press of that country, in the news which it publishes, and in the intelligent expression of public opinion which we may seek in its columns. Here is an article commenting on the present policy of the government, and of the leader of the opposition on the question now before the House. I think the House will agree that this is one of the most responsible newspapers published in the city of London, and the article from which I propose to quote discusses the very conditions that we are now considering to-day. The statements that this paper makes have an important bearing upon this question. Let me read the article for the benefit of my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo, who is alarmed about this crisis. I know that my hon. friend will appreciate the sentiments that come from the source that I am about to mention. I refer to the London 'Spectator' for January 15, 1910, which says:

> The conviction of the indivisibility of the empire, which grows deeper and more earnest in the British dominions as time passes, and as one significant event gives place to another, was nobly expressed in the speeches of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Borden on Wednesday, when a Bill for creating a Canadian navy was introduced in the Canadian House of Commons. We have always maintained that the colonies ought not to be harassed into making contributions to the British navy; that an empire which is to have any reality cannot be maintained by pressure from the centre on the circumference, but must exist and flourish by the spontaneous desire of all the different parts to remain in a fixed relation to the mother country by accepting the implied obligations.

Let me read another passage from the same editorial:

> Last April it was reported that Victoria and New South Wales would combine to give a Dreadnought, but upon consideration they preferred not to divert any money from their policy—which has been under consideration for a good many years—of having an Australian navy. The decision of Canada was understood also to be in favour of a local navy, but nothing definite was known till Sir Wilfrid Laurier made his statement on Wednesday. The man would be ungraceful and unromantic, indeed, who could read without pride and intense appreciation the language in which the scheme was discussed, or without feeling convinced that, whatever vicissitudes may follow, a movement has been begun which is bound to go on from strength to strength. . . . It is quite impossible now that there should be any return on the part of Great Britain to the principle adopted by the Imperial Defence Committee in 1906. The Imperial Defence Committee then disapproved of the Australian proposal to maintain a local navy. It acted on the advice of the admiralty, which was to the effect that an efficient navy is one and indivisible, that small local navies with independent characteristics could not be readily absorbed into the Royal navy in an emergency, and that the best assistance which the dominions could give to the mother country would be regular contributions of money. Canada and Australia, in their different degrees, have rejected that advice; and though we quite see the logic of the admiralty point of view, we think on the whole that Canada and Australia have decided wisely. There are two chief objections to the policy of naval tributes. One is that the British tax-payer would be tempted to regard them as made in relief of his own pocket.

My hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo can appreciate that statement.

He would forget that the co-operation of the colonies in naval defence is intended to make assurance doubly sure. The other is that the colonists themselves would take infinitely less interest in imperial defence if they simply put down sums of money to be spent invisibly in Great Britain, instead of having navies of their own taking shape under their eyes, manned by their own people, and perhaps built in their own yards.

I submit that as the soundest, the most intelligent and the most independent advice that has been given by any newspaper in Great Britain during the consideration of this question. With regard to the condition of excitement that is sought to be created, and with regard to an emergency contribution for Dreadonughts I find this statement in another English paper:

What is the 'emergency'? It is nothing more than the superheated six pence a word rant of a Socialist agitator, backed by the prestige of the greatest living journalistic acrobat and mountebank—chief press agent of the Unionist party—Lord Northcliffe.

These two dangerous demagogues have played the strings of the war harp so clamorously and persistently, they have for political purposes so basely misrepresented the naval strength of England and exaggerated that of Germany, that half the nation believes Britain is in danger, and excitable Canadians have already begun to shout for a lifeline. This is to take the form of an 'emergency contribution.'

Here is a statement of Mr. McKenna, First Lord of the Admiralty, in answer to the ravings of Blatchford. Britain has now seven Dreadnoughts in commission, Germany has two; when Germany has four Britain will have ten, when Germany has five Britain will have twelve, when Germany in two years will have thirteen Britain will have twenty. He concludes by saying: 'I have not referred to ships of an earlier type than the Dreadnoughts. We have an overwhelming superiority in that class of ships. The navy scare has not the slightest foundation in fact.

I have also a statement from Mr. John Burns, a responsible minister, who ought to be taken by the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo as a greater authority than Robert Blatchford. Both the hon. members for Yale-Cariboo and Kootenay endeavoured to prove to this House the existence of a condition of alarm and emergency in the old country by the writings of Robert Blatchford—Robert Blatchford, the paid agitator of Tory politicians, the gentleman who for years was willing to write for pay on one side and to write for pay on the other. An hon. gentleman who mentions the name of Robert Blatchford as a British subject and as an evidence of the existence of a crisis in Great Britain cannot believe in the principle of self-government in a country like Canada. Is there any man willing to destroy the principle of responsible government, and to send a contribution of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 to Great Britain at the instigation of Robert Blatchford? Yet, Robert Blatchford was held up to us as the authority to whom we must look for a true statement of the condition of Great Britain to-day. The hon. gentlemen were willing to accept a reason of that kind believing, that as far as Blatchford was concerned, they could find a good reason; at any rate, once every forty-eight hours. Mr. John Burns says in effect exactly what I am saying now.

I shall not take time to read some extracts from speeches by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) a year ago. He has set himself against the policy of establishing a Canadian navy. When I was thinking this thing out, I said to myself: I wonder if I could not commit a few extracts from this hon. gentleman's speech to memory.

Mr. HUGHES. You could not get anything better.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) has stated the literal truth for once, in favour of a Canadian navy, we could not get anything better. What was the position taken by the leader of the opposition ten months ago? We know his position now, what was it ten months ago? Let me remind the Minister of Militia that the leader of the opposition less than twelve months ago conceived the importance of a Canadian navy to be so great that he undervalued the land defences of this country, and then said we should spend half the money we are now spending for militia to formulate a Canadian navy. He laid stress on the importance of Canada's oversea trade in comparison with its overland trade, and contended that the argument was preponderatingly in favour of a naval policy as against a land militia. Said the leader of the opposition: Ninety-two per cent of the trade of this country passes over the sea, whilst the remaining eight per cent passes over the land. For this land business we subscribe an average of $6,000,000 a year. What would be wrong in taking three or four million dollars from the land defence and subscribing for a strong, magnificent protection of this country? I supported that principle because just a few weeks before I had made some little complaint in this House against the extreme expenditure on the militia from the standpoint that the ministers were contracting the appropriations for public works in the country generally on account of the financial conditions, and that when we were reducing the expenditure for productive public works, we might have seen our way at that particular time for that particular reason to decrease the large expenditure made on the militia for that particular year. When the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) put up his argument I agreed with him entirely. I shall read one sentence from the hon. gentleman's speech. He said:

> I venture to submit to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House, that the expenditure in defence of our seaports, in defence of our coasts, in defence of the waters of the ocean which are immediately adjacent to our coasts is of immensely greater advantage and of immensely greater importance than the expenditure which, year after year, we are disbursing in connection with the military forces of this country. . . . I am entirely of opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own.

I submit that it is a marvellous exhibition to have these words from responsible leaders of great national parties. There can be no change in any conditions or circumstances which would correspond to the enormous changes in these opinions. What has happened in ten months that Canada should have a navy ten months ago and should not have a navy to-day? Perhaps the scare has been scattered. Perhaps hon. gentlemen think that there is no such thing as an emergency. If a Canadian navy to-day is not necessary because hon. gentlemen think there is not an emergency, by what line of reasoning can they suppose that there ought to be two Dreadnoughts? If it is not necessary to build up the protection of this country for the defence of Canada, for the trade of Canada, what particular reason is there that we should send $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 out of this country over which we would have no control? I submit that there is no reason or logic in the position hon. gentlemen have taken.

Another hon. gentleman, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) made a very magnificent speech last year and of course he switched around just as quickly as did all the rest of the hon. gentlemen. I wish to read a few words of my hon. friend's speech of a year ago. I read it just three hours before he delivered his speech this year, and as he addressed the House I was able to compare his speech of this year with his speech of last year, and to observe the wonderfully quick change that he had made. Let me read a few sentences:

> We are here to-day to protect the Dominion of Canada, a country that has a population of 7,000,000, a country that is thirty-three times as large as Italy, eighteen times as large as Germany, eighteen times as large as France, nearly as large as the whole of Europe, and slightly larger than the United States. We are here to protect the commerce and the productiveness of the Dominion of Canada. We are here to protect seven thousand miles of coast line on the Pacific coast.

Now I expect the support of my hon. friend in connection with the handsome Bristols that are to be built for Esquimalt in my district.

> We are here to protect 7,000 miles of coast line on the Pacific coast.

If that was his position ten months ago, what has happened? May I not confidently expect that he will vote to protect the 7,000 miles of sea coast on the Pacific, and support the government policy when he has an opportunity.

Mr. SPROULE. I would be very glad still to support it if the scheme which the government mapped out were in my judgment suitable to do that, but I do not think it is.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. The hon. gentleman who commits himself to a proposition of doing nothing ought not to be a competent judge of the qualities of what ought to be done. My hon. friend has committed himself to a proposition of doing absolutely nothing. If he had said: If you will build so many Dreadnoughts, if you will build a navy of a certain capacity, if the government will decide to do just what ought to be done in the construction of this navy, I will support them—he might speak, but my hon. friend is not in that position; my hon. friend is in a position of opposing every thing so far as a Canadian navy is concerned, and his explanation now to the House, that he would be glad to support a policy if it came up to his ideas of what ought to be done is not consistent with his expressed intention of voting for something that is absolutely nothing. I do not quite understand why my hon. friend objects.

Mr. SPROULE. I ask my hon. friend if he does not exercise the same right himself with regard to questions coming before this House. If they do not meet with his approval he does not support them?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. Of course I do, but I am trying to point out that an hon. gentleman who says that he does not want a thing is not quite the man to reason as to what the thing ought to be; he is committing himself to contradictory positions. The hon. gentleman has announced that he intends to support the amendment of the leader of the opposition. If he intends to support a policy with regard to what a navy ought to be, why does he tell the country that he does not want a navy at all?

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman is doing an injustice, because if he read or listened to my speech carefully, he would see that I said that provided a policy was evolved by the government and submitted to the people for their approval, and they approved of it, I would certainly fall in with it.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. The strange thing about my hon. friend's conclusion is that he wants to submit a Canadian proposition to the people for their approval, but he is willing to tax them and send away their money without asking their opinion; yet he says to the House: I am quite willing to support a navy if you are willing to submit the question to the people. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the policy of establishing a Canadian navy is part and parcel of the great work of development in this country. If it is a reasonable thing for Canada to build railways from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and to transport the products of this country to foreign lands, but principally to Great Britain, is it not equally reasonable that these products should be protected on the high seas? If it is reasonable to open mines, to build factories and railways, to bring population into the country, to develop the country to such an enormous extent as we are doing, does my hon. friend consider it unreasonable that we should commence, perhaps in a small way, but as soon as possible to provide ourselves with the means of protecting in some measure the trade of this country and of supplementing the navy of the empire at some future day when a more serious emergency arises than any that exists to-day?

I do not intend to read any more of the speech of my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro). But he spoke of the magnificent productions of British Columbia, and Alberta, and Saskatchewan, and Ontario, and Quebec, and New Brunswick, and that important province down by the sea, the province of Nova Scotia, and asked if hon. gentlemen did not consider that these were the things we ought to protect, and if this was not a reason why we ought to commence as soon as possible to provide for a Canadian navy.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I beg to differ with the hon. gentleman in his interpretation of my speech. I have the speech before me, I have read it over and I entirely agree with everything in that speech. I will just read an extract from it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. With the permission of the hon. gentleman. If he does not want it, of course, I will not do it. I am making a personal explanation. The hon. gentleman has said that my speech of last year indicated that I was in favour of a Canadian navy. I will read an extract from my speech to show my position.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I do not think my hon. friend is entitled to get up and read from his speech; I can read it for myself.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I ask the hon. gentleman this question: Does he now say that my speech of last year indicated that I was in favour of a Canadian navy; and if he does, will he allow me to quote my own speech to show that that is not true?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. If I made the statement that my hon. friend said so then, I ought to be allowed, as having the floor, to prove my statement. I do not see why my hon. friend should be so extremely anxious to read his own speech. I wanted to save the House trouble and save myself annoyance. What I do say is that my reading of the speech led to the conclusion that the protection of the great resources of this country, which were being developed from the Pacific to the Atlantic, was the great question to be considered.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Now, will the hon. gentleman just allow me to read? I think that is only fair.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, the hon. member for Nanaimo has the floor, and cannot be interrupted.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take up so much time, but now I am driven to read my hon. friend's remarks. I made the statement that my hon. friend said that the great business of this country was to protect the industries of this country from the Pacific to the Atlantic.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. By means of the British navy.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I will read my hon. friend's remarks:

We are here to protect the great industries of British Columbia with her total yearly production of $88,000,000 worth, her fisheries worth between six and seven millions, her mineral production amounting to twenty-three million dollars, her 13,000 men engaged in the fishing industry, and her 9,000 men engaged on the shore fisheries of that province. Then I pass over the Rocky mountains and come to the province of Alberta. We are here to protect the nineteen million bushels of grain that are raised in that province, valued at ten and a half million dollars, and her $3,000,000 worth of cattle exported from that province last year. Then I pass on into the province of Saskatchewan. We are here to protect the 105 million bushels of grain raised in that province during the last year, and valued at sixty million dollars I pass onward into the province of Manitoba, and we are here to protect the 113 million bushels of grain raised there, of a value of something like $50,000,000. I come down into the old province of Ontario with its many agricultural products. We are here to protect the 185 million bushels of field crops grown in that province, to protect its butter, its cheese, its fruit, its cattle that are being exported to Great Britain. Then I come on to the province of Quebec, and we are here to protect its eighty-five million bushels of field crops, to protect its large exports of butter and cheese, to protect its 260 million dollars worth of foreign trade. I pass on to the maritime provinces, and we are here to protect the products of their farms, of their mines and of their fisheries. I pass on to the coast of Nova Scotia, with her unprotected sea coast of 5,600 miles, extending from the Bay of Fundy to the straits of Belle Isle. It is said that the farmers of this country will not sanction any contribution towards the maintenance of a naval force.

What kind of naval force did my hon. friend mean?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Will my hon. friend allow me to explain what kind of naval force? Let me read this:

Every Dreadnought of the British navy is a movable fortification. Every Dreadnought can transfer its power from one portion of the British empire to another. Every war vessel is nothing more or less than a species of fortification that can be transferred to any part of the empire in which it is required. That is the strongest kind of portable fortification that any country can have It therefore behooves us to strengthen the hands of the British government and to give our contribution towards upholding the British navy.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. Mr. Speaker, experience last night proved that hon. gentlemen opposite are very easily excited. Experience this afternoon proves that hon. gentlemen always act before they think. I was not contending—

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, oh.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. Hon. gentlemen opposite always pass judgment before the truth is told, because they do not like it, especially my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton. I was not contending, I could not consistently contend, that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule)) was opposed to a contribution to the empire. What I contended was that last year he was in favour of developing a Canadian navy. I was not denying the position that my hon. friend was willing to make a subscription to the British navy. I have asked my hon. friend a question which he has not answered. I could not say that he had an objection to building up the British navy when he is supporting the policy of the leader of the opposition in favour of a contribution of 20 or 25 million dollars. What the hon. gentleman said was this:

It is said that the farmers of Canada might not sanction any contribution towards the maintenance of a naval force.

What naval force?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The naval force I referred to is the naval force, a part of the British navy, as recommended by the admiralty.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. My hon. friend has made a very satisfactory explanation, and I am quite right in contending that he was advocating a Canadian naval force, but he says it is the kind of force which the British admiralty recommended. I was not questioning whether he wanted a little or a big one. I was simply declaring that a year ago the hon. gentleman advocated the establishment of a Canadian navy. In a little temper, my hon. friend protested against that statement and his friends around him applauded, but he finally admitted that he did want the establishment of a Canadian navy on the condition that that navy represented the recommendation of the British admiralty. Well, even that is a Canadian navy, and that is what I am talking about.

Now, I wish to say a word about my hon. friend the member for Victoria.

Mr. HUGHES. What Victoria?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. My hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) wants me to attach too much importance to him. I was speaking of the hon. member from Victoria, British Columbia, (Mr. Cowan).

Mr. HUGHES. I was going to remark that in case the hon. gentleman was making reference to me, I would listen, but not otherwise.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. That is just about as unfair as I consider my hon. friend to be. I was speaking of my hon. friend from the city of Victoria (Mr. Cowan). He made a speech last night, in which he deplored the fact that the imperial navy had been withdrawn from Esquimalt and the rest of Canada. But what did he say in that connection? He said it would be a fortunate thing if, out of a regrettable incident of that kind, there should arise a better result and that it should lead to the establishment of a Canadian navy. That is what he said, and what I contend is that the tenor of his speech was in favour of a Canadian navy, although I suspect that he will cast his vote for a subscription to Great Britain and against a Canadian navy. The thumb screw has evidently been operating on the other side as well as this. That is a kind of thing which works both Liberal government have a patent on ways. The hon. member thinks that the thumb screws, but the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and his followers, could not twist the hon. gentleman around as they do, unless there was a thumb screw on the other side.

An hon. MEMBER. You mean the colony here.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I mean the prominent men on the opposition benches. I appeal to my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) as one of the old members of this House, one of its most respected, intelligent and experienced members, what can the people of this country expect from a party which could initiate a policy in this House on one of the most important questions that ever came before the country and support that policy, and then within ten months set themselves on record as positively hostile to that same policy. Why, hon. gentlemen opposite have not begun to reflect on the weight of their opinion in the national life of this country. It is an easy thing to turn around, it is easy to say one thing to-day and the opposite to-morrow, but the intelligent electorate of this country want at their head a combination of men to do the business of this country, especially in questions of national defence, on stable foundations—men, who know their own minds to-day and to-morrow—and hon. gentlemen opposite can make up their minds that so long as they exhibit their present weathercock tendencies, they will continue for very many years in the happy seats they now occupy. I must apologize to the House for detaining it so long.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. But I should like to discuss for a moment what is the disposition of Great Britain herself regarding the question as to whether or not her self-governing Dominions should subscribe in times of emergency to the establishment of naval forces of their own. Is it not important to know just how the British government itself, just how the British admiralty, looks on the question as to the responsibility of each self-governing country in the empire in this matter. Is it in favour of each portion of the empire handing in a servile subscription and waiting for a crisis to arise before doing it? Sir, for fifty years the policy of Britain has been to encourage her self-governing Dominions to establish their own self defence. That the mother country has always regarded as the greatest guarantee of the integrity of the empire. And I appeal to sensible men, what would be the position taken by ordinary business men in their own domestic affairs. My hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) and my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) referred to the statements of the Prime Minister that the colonies would drop from the mother country as ripe fruit from the parent tree.

Can there be any objection to that principle? Let me remind the hon. gentleman that the analogy that is commonly used between the responsibilities of a family in domestic life and the relations and responsibilities of an empire, is a very striking one. The member for Yale-Cariboo says, I prefer the analogy of the family, the mother and her child. Sir, Canada is not in the position of a child towards its mother; Canada is in the position of a child that has set up housekeeping for himself, of a son who has taken on the obligations of an independent life. Will my hon. friend from Vancouver say that the son who leaves the old homestead and goes away 20 or 100 miles, and makes a home for himself, looks after his wife and family, maintains the integrity of that home, is he any less the guardian of the old homestead because he is maintaining himself and is no longer receiving pauper assistance from the old man? The analogy of hon. gentlemen only proves that they have never studied the question. The young man who stands up bravely, at a reasonable age, and says to his father, I am going to start life for myself—is there any objection to that? But in national affairs we are told that would mean disloyalty and separation. Is there any objection to the members of a family all leaving the old homestead in due time? What pleases the old man's heart better than to get the glad news that every member of his family, perhaps a hundred miles away, is building a home for himself, is prosperous and happy? What is it that contributes to the happiness and security of the old homestead under those circumstances? It is the prosperity and security of the sons that have gone away from home. That, Sir, is the prosperity and security of the British empire to-day. I know how the imperialists would maintain it; I understand something of the tactics of the ultra-imperialists in England, and I believe they have very close relations in this country. The attitude and the doctrine of the imperialist is to interest himself in the affairs of people far away from home; he takes credit to himself for looking after the interests of other people. But the policy of the great democratic party in England, and the policy of democracy in any country, is first to set your own house in order. The empire is being maintained to-day under the policy of giving self-government to every colony in the empire, and encouraging it to depend upon its own resources. My hon. friends cannot have read the correspondence of the imperial conferences that have been held since 1897, they cannot have traced the political evolution in the relation of the independent colonies to the empire, as seen in the proceedings of those imperial conferences. The hon. Minister of Militia and Defence will bear me out in saying that at that time Canada was the only colony represented in that conference to suggest that the proper thing to do was to look after Canada, and by so doing they would be looking after the empire. Every other colony represented in those conferences right down to the last one, was in favour of giving Dreadnoughts, of making contributions. But a change has come over their minds, and to-day what is the declaration? I have the record, and one of the most respectable reviews in Australia, one of the strongest men in Australia, says that public sentiment in Australia to-day is entirely opposed to the policy of a contribution, and that they have started out to defend themselves. They believe that the creation of an Australian naval defence within a few years will be a handsome contribution to the integrity of the British empire. That is all in keeping with the policy of Great Britain herself. Now, I will read a resolution which was passed in the imperial parliament in 1862, and that policy has been maintained up to the present time:

> That this House (while fully recognizing the claims of all portions of the British empire to imperial aid in their protection against perils arising from the consequences of imperial policy)——

The British House of Commons had no idea of the colonies subscribing money for the support of the British empire, but they were making provision in that resolution for the imperial government subscribing to assist the colonies under the disadvantages that accrued to them from the operation of the imperial policy:

> ——is of opinion that the colonies exercising the rights of self-government ought to undertake the main responsibility of providing for their own internal order and security, and ought to assist in their own external defence.

That resolution was passed unanimously in 1862, by the British parliament. In 1865, the Colonial Naval Defence Act was passed. Its object was to enable the colonies to provide for naval defence, and the Act empowers colonial governments to provide men and vessels of war, and also to raise volunteer forces to form part of the royal navy reserve established under the Act of parliament of 1859. This is what the Act says:

> The members of such reserves will be available for general service in the Royal navy in time of emergency, when an offer is made by the government of a colony to place them at the disposal of the imperial government.

Sir, when hon. gentlemen come to this House and propose that this country make a subscription to the empire in opposition to the policy of the establishment of a Canadian navy, I say they place themselves in direct contradiction to the policy of Great Britain for the last fifty years. Great Britain has always recognized that the security of the empire depended upon the strength and force of every part of that empire. Canada is the most difficult country within the empire to govern, Canada with its mixed nationality—and this is no reflection upon any people in this House or out of it. The very basis of this country is a constitution for mixed nationalities. In the nature of things, in the peculiar position of this country—enormous country as it is—every nationality in the world is being brought to Canada. The great problem for this country to consider is how these aliens and divergent peoples are to be blended into one. That is the commanding business of the statesman of the future. How is he to accomplish it? By raising sectional cries? By questioning the loyalty of a French Canadian Prime Minister? By telling every Greek, every Galician, every Doukhobor, every alien who may have made his home in this country that he is in a foreign land? Is that the policy which is to shape into unity the development of Canada? That is the policy of more than one hon. gentleman in this debate who has uttered insinuations or made direct assaults against important sections and influences in Canada.

Sir, what is the great characteristic of British institutions? Does the true Briton upbraid the foreigner? Does he chide the alien? Does he slaughter the captured? The strength of the British empire and its institutions is that the Briton makes the foreigner feel that, under the British flag, he is better off than he was at home. Britain has always welcomed men from every country on the face of the earth. And how are British institutions to be maintained? They can never be maintained by fictitious resolutions. The sympathy of Canada with the spirit of the British empire can never be maintained by statute, by resolution, by edict, by force of any kind. What is it that attracts foreigners to this country? What makes them feel that in a British land they have the sympathy, support, the opportunity that it is not possible for them to have at home? The secret is that British institutions involve no tyranny upon any class. The one thing to be kept in mind in the development of Canada is to make every man feel, who was once an alien in this country and is evolving into a British subject, that we are not in a hurry to force him to declare that he is a loyal subject, or that he shares completely our enthusiasm for the grandeur of the British empire. If hon. gentlemen opposite had their way, if they could send money contributions from this country without the voice of the people, and if they could continue to tax the people to send money to be controlled and spent in Great Britain, it would not be long before we should have another such lesson as was taught when a large part of this continent was torn from the British empire. Mr. Speaker, the great secret of the development of British life in Canada lies in giving to every citizen of Canada the chance to work out his own salvation. Therefore, I maintain that no policy has ever come before this House that will do more for the development of our national spirit than the policy now under discussion.

What does this policy mean practically? We are not building navies for the purpose of having shipyards and docks, but we are building docks and shipyards because we are going to build a navy. Hon. members opposite have said that the strongest argument in support of our policy is the argument of the loaves and fishes. These are not the objects of this policy, but they are the results of this policy if carried out in a reasonable and businesslike way. Am I to assume that these hon. gentlemen opposite do not want to build our own shipyards, to dig our own docks, to develop our own mines, to construct our own ships to employ our own sailors and fishermen? Am I to understand, as declared by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), that what we want is to go back to the Crown colony stage, and, every time we are in trouble, crawl to the feet of the parent country and importune her to intervene and help us? I say, Sir, the policy of this government adds to the great name of this country, and gives an opportunity to the increasing intelligence of our citizens to go forward in national development, national manhood, national character, national strength, national defence, which, fifty years hence, will cause every man in Canada to wonder that any party in this country should have the want of foresight or audacity to question the necessity for the establishment of a naval force for our country.

Mr. F. L. SCHAFFNER (Souris). Mr. Speaker, in rising to place myself on record on this important question, I wish to say, very modestly, that I cannot hope to add very much that is new to the debate. It has been the custom in this House, since I have been a member of it at least, for members on rising to address the House on almost any subject to make the claim that the subject to be dealt with is the most important question since confederation. Well, I have to confess and make that same assertion to-day. When I consider the far-reaching results which may come from the proposals which we are debating in this House and this country to-day, I think I can safely say that this is at least one of the most important questions since confederation. My hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) is certainly a very forceful speaker, but if we take from his address that part which he was forced to devote to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), and other members of this House, there will not be very much left. The speech given by the hon. member for Vancouver last night caused a great deal of anxiety in the mind of the hon. member (Mr. Ralph Smith), who has just taken his seat, for he devoted to that speech a great part of the time he occupied in addressing the House. After getting through with the hon. member for Vancouver, he spent quite a time in talking about our friend the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).

Now, I am not going to take up much time—not because I do not regard it as important—in dealing with the address which we have just listened to. But I do wish to refer to a few matters in the hon. member's address. The feature of this debate has been as to what the individual or collective members of this House put upon this question, whether this Bill which the government has brought down tends to the consolidation of the empire, or whether it leads to disintegration. I believe, and I hope I shall be able to prove that it does lead to disintegration. Surely we have the right to determine what stand the right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has taken all along during the years in which he has been a prominent member of this House, and what that stand, if carried to its logical conclusion, would lead to. The hon. member for Nanaimo, referring to the right hon. leader of the House last night, said that there is no man strong enough to alienate the Canadian people from England. Thank God, Mr. Speaker there is not, notwithstanding the fact that if the words and deeds of the hon. gentleman who leads this House had been carried out they would have lead to separation; but we have to be thankful to-day that, great as the influence of the hon. gentleman has been in this country it has not been sufficient, and never will be, to carry this country into separation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to address the House at any great length with regard to the remarks made by my hon. friend the member for Nanaimo. The naval policy of this government has been brought down. One thing is certain that everybody, or nearly everybody, feels that the present position of Canada is intolerable. Believing that the present position of Canada is intolerable, we are here as the representatives of the people to try and inaugurate a policy that will be to the practical benefit of this country and of Great Britain. This unanimity of opinion which I have expressed is the inevitable result of the growth of this country and of the agitation which has been going on for the past year or two. So much has been said on this question from the pulpit, from the platform, in the press, in private conversation, and in this House, that it is almost impossible for one to say anything new. All the sentiments and views to which anybody might give expression, or which I might state here to-day, have been more forcibly, logically and cogently expressed by others. Yet my own personal feeling in this matter is so great that it prevents me from remaining silent. I believe that my constituents would feel that I had not done my duty to them if I had not said something on this important subject. I feel confident that in speaking upon this question I am but the mouthpiece of a large majority of the people whom I have the honour to represent. Why are we discussing this question to-day? Is it because of anything the government has done? The opening up of this great problem, the awakening of the people to the duty which they owe to the empire, the arousing of the people to the task of doing something to relieve the taxpayer of Great Britain from the burden which has been upon him for years, did not originate in the mind of the right hon. the First Minister, or in the mind of any hon. gentleman in his cabinet. The right hon. First Minister has said of late that something has been doing since 1902, something was doing in 1907, and something in 1909. I will take occasion to refer to that part of the hon. gentleman's speech further on. We are discussing this question to-day because of the motion and address spread upon 'Hansard' by my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster). There is absolutely no doubt about that. My hon. friend had his motion on the order paper long before this agitation commenced in this country. My hon. friend set the people thinking, and asking themselves the question whether it was not about time that we should begin to be ashamed of ourselves, because we were absolutely dependent on Great Britain for the protection of our trade routes, and for the protection of our trade, yet we were enjoying and receiving that protection without it costing us one cent. Having great faith in the independence of the people of this country I do not believe that they would be longer willing that such a condition should exist when they became familiar with the facts. Before we became of age, when we perhaps had a revenue of $25,000,000, or $30,000,000,000, or $35,000,000 when we were in our swaddling clothes, we were very glad to receive the protection of Great Britain, but when we came of age we realized that the time had come when we should begin to do something for ourselves. The fact that we are the last of the great overseas dominions to come to our senses in this respect is not very much to our credit. What do we find? If I gathered anything from the words of the hon. member for Nanaimo just before he took his seat, it was that Great Britain was opposed to this contribution system. I do not know whether that is exactly correct or not. What I do know is that Australia, for years, has been giving £100,000 for the protection of the empire. I know that Cape Colony has been giving £50,000, I know that little New Zealand has been giving £40,000, Natal £35,000, and that Newfoundland has been giving its quota. What has Canada been doing? Absolutely nothing. We find that it costs the labouring people and citizens of Great Britain about $4 per head per year for the maintenance of the navy, to say nothing of the militia. When we take the two into consideration, the people of Great Britain are paying for protection about $455,000,000, to which we are not contributing one cent notwithstanding the fact that we are receiving great benefit from it. It is high time that we were up and doing. I do not agree with those who cry peace and believe we can escape the burden of an army and navy. We cannot become separated from the rest of the world in that respect. The United States tried it and absolutely failed. Canada, which we are proud of, and which we are trying to claim is fast becoming a nation, must in this, as in other things, assume the white man's burden.

Any nation that seeks to retain its foreign trade must be willing to assume the responsibility of protecting its trade routes as well as its coast line and its fisheries. I do not for one moment underrate the great importance of the time in our history at which we have arrived. It would seem, as has been claimed, that we have reached the parting of the ways. We have been depending on Great Britain, the taxpayer of Great Britain has been assuming all the responsibility for the defence of the empire, and now we come to the crisis, the parting of the ways. As has been said, there are certain courses which we may take. I believe we have come to the finger post, and to me the finger points absolutely without doubt what course we should take. I do not say that to every citizen of Canada that finger points so absolutely. We may, Mr. Speaker, remain one of co-partnership, of a free self-governing state, acting together for a common purpose and mutual defence. We may cut ourselves adrift, become a separate nation, have our own policy. We may sink our individuality and become incorporated in the great country to the south of us, or we may remain a part of the empire, while refusing co-operation. I say that the last course is beneath the dignity of any self-respecting citizen, and that is why I am taking the stand I propose to take on this great question. As to sinking our individuality and becoming a part of the great country to the south, no man in this House has greater respect for our friends to the south than I, and why should we not have respect for them? To use an expression of the Prime Minister's, very much the same blood courses through their veins as courses through ours. They are a great people whom we must admire commercially and politically. They have done great things. They are good neighbours, and there is nothing that gives us greater peace of mind and greater happiness than having good neighbours. We always want to be friendly with our neighbours and I hope we will always be good friends. But I judge and believe, from a sound knowledge of the people of this country, that very few people want to become annexed to this country.

Then comes the third possible course, the independence of this country. I know there are some who look towards independence as the great goal of our ambition, and I shall refer to these later on. The Prime Minister, in view of what he has said in this country and in other countries of our position and what we look forward to, cannot say that we have not some reason to ascribe to him some of the independent views which have been ascribed to him from this side of the House. But I say that apart from the right hon. gentleman and a few men throughout this country, there are very few who look forward to or want to look forward to the independence of Canada. Rather we look forward to the consolidation of this great empire, the empire on which the sun never sets, an empire with one-third of the world's population, one-third of its land. Her flag and her ships and her enterprising sons carry the ideas of justice and fair play across every sea and into all the world's ports, and we are proud, every one of us, that we belong to that great nation, There are so many reasons why we should be proud to belong to that nation that it would detain the House too long to state them.

Then there remains but this one thing, to remain a part of this empire. I am not with those who say remain with the empire, let them protect you and do all that they can for you, but refuse to do anything in return. There is a class of people in Canada, including many of the clergy, and I regret to say that there are some of that class in this city of Ottawa, who are fond of saying that we want to remain part of the empire but that we refuse co-operation. They say that Canada should not give anything in support of the naval defence of Great Britain. True it is that these gentlemen and other gentlemen often end their pious declarations with the words: But if the time should ever come when Canada is in need, then we will spend our last dollar for its defence, we will give our last man. Even Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in his address, said: If the time ever comes when the supremacy of Great Britain on the high seas is challenged, I will take the stump, I will go through this country, especially will I talk to my compatriots in Quebec, and say that the salvation of Canada depends on the salvation of England. That sounds good, but it is mostly sound. Does this House realize, do the people outside of this House throughout the country realize that over one billion dollars of British capital is invested in this great country of ours? Do they realize that over $200,000,000 of British money is being invested in this country in one way and another every year? Do our people realize that we are the greatest borrowers of all the countries in the world from the motherland? If we do realize that, is it not some reason why we should be willing at least to do something towards the maintenance of this great country and its salvation, because we have to admit that the salvation of Great Britain and all its colonies absolutely depends upon the supremacy of Great Britain upon the high seas.

Let me read the borrowings of different countries from Great Britain. Of eight countries, the annual borrowings from the British Isles are as follows:

Chili	$ 20,696,000
Japan	33,361,000
Russia	47,703,000
Mexico	64,371,000
United States	68,000,000
Brazil	73,000,000
The Argentine	117,000,000
Canada (nearly)	200,000,000

Receiving that tremendous amount of money every year from Great Britain surely we should be willing to do something in support of her navy. They say that in the hour of need they would be willing to spend their last dollar, but where would they get their last dollar, all these dollars I have been talking about? Further than that, what would our farmers do? We export to Great Britain about $135,000,000 worth of our products every year. What will we do in the hour of danger if we cannot get the money? I cannot understand the argument of our friends opposite that if the hour of need comes then they will do something. What can we do in the hour of need? If there is any one thing that any one country cannot buy, no matter how rich it is, it is naval strength.

It takes three years in Germany and five years in Great Britain to train soldiers; and if we should have a war with Germany, would it last three years or three months? How long do naval wars last in these days? And, unfortunately, we cannot buy Dreadnoughts at the corner store. It takes considerable time to construct these ships, which experts say are the only kind that are of any service to-day in naval wars. These patriots talk about duty and about what they will do when the hour of need comes; but they actually refuse to allow us to make preparations so as to be in a position to do our duty when the hour of need does come. They cry peace, peace, when there is no peace. There is no assurance for peace equal to a strong navy. What has done more for universal peace throughout this world than the supremacy of the British navy? No man will dispute the fact that in the past the paramount influence of the British navy has been the great factor in maintaining the peace of the world. But that influence must remain efficient and sufficient, so that England and Canada and all the other colonies together will be able to hold their own against all-comers. I picked up to-day the sayings of some men whose opinions are very much respected—not ancient men, but modern men. Mr. Roosevelt says that 'a first-class fighting navy is the most effective guarantee for peace the United States can have'; and what is true of the United States is true of every other country in the world. President Taft has just expressed the same opinion. Lord Roberts says that 'an effective army is an essential condition of peace and security'. The present German chancellor says that 'the moment Germany decides to reduce her equipment peace would be seriously threatened'. Mr. Deakin, the ex-premier of Australia says that 'they who prepare for war in point of fact do so only to preserve peace'. It is Alfred Austin, the poet laureate, who sings to us from across the seas:

> Nor you nor we would others wrong,
> We only claim to hold our own;
> For this we arm, for this keep strong,
> Safeguard justice on her throne.

No logical mind can deny the truth of the argument that strength discourages war and helplessness invites attack. The question of the safety of the empire in my opinion must be put beyond any possible doubt. As an empire we do not aim at any aggressive action or any increase of territory. We do not threaten any other country. We want to keep clear of all international disputes. But nevertheless we do wish to consolidate this great empire for the purpose of mutual defence. Hitherto the British navy has solely maintained that supremacy. In my opinion it is high time we were doing something to share that burden. We should be standing shoulder to shoulder as Britains. Union is strength, and closer union means greater strength. No other nation is so dependent upon waterborne food and raw material for its existence. We must keep our trade routes free from attack from other nations. Is there any doubt in the mind of any hon. gentleman that an attack on our trade routes would paralyse the trade of Canada as well as Great Britain? To give this House and this country some idea of the enormous trade of the empire, let me give the relative proportions of the shipping interests, taking the latest figures of tonnage that I can get here:

	Sailing vessels. Tons.	Steam vessels. Tons.
United Kingdom	1,461,376	10,023,726
Australia	126,579	249,832
Natal	856	811
New Zealand	43,967	88,629
Canada (including inland navigation)	411,885	287,867
Newfoundland	129,876	12,352

All this tonnage has been hitherto protected by the British navy alone. Now, let us look at the figures of the trade of the British empire. The imports and exports, 1907 and 1908, were as follows:

	Imports.	Exports.
United Kingdom	£649,612,926	£520,138,135
Australia	51,896,809	72,888,003
South Africa	57,979,502	98,984,848
New Zealand	17,302,861	20,068,957
Canada	$309,756,608	$361,572,159
Newfoundland	2,143,130	2,487,461

All this tonnage has been hitherto protected. Something like $700,000,000 of our trade travels the high seas absolutely protected by the Royal navy, towards which Canada contributes nothing. Moreover, Canada does not contribute to the common defence of the empire. When the day comes when through international difficulties the existence of Canada is menaced, can the other parts of the empire be blamed if they decline to help us? What then becomes of Canadian hopes of a Canada one and indivisable? Mr. Speaker, when this government has been driven to act—and I use that word advisedly—I do not know of any one thing they have done in the way of expressions of loyalty or help to the empire that has not been forced upon them by the great Conservative party. When the government are driven to act, what do they propose to do? Just what any little South American republic would do. But the navy of any of these little republics is not reckoned in the safety or governance of the civilized world. Why should they do it? Because, sir, the right hon. gentleman who leads this House and the gentlemen who surround him to fail to recognize the position of Canada as an integral portion of the great empire of which we form so important a part. They are following the policy of Venezuela. It does not for the reason I have stated. Sir, in my opinion, it is an endeavour to differentiate between Britishism and Canadianism. I do not stand for a Canadian navy but for an imperial navy which will carry into the worlds' domains that conception of unity and co-ordination which, I believe, notwithstanding what may be said by hon. gentlemen opposite, is fast forming in the minds of our people.

My hon. friends opposite say that if we are to have a navy, we ought to build it at home. There is undoubtedly in that contention something which at first sight sounds very attractive. But even so, it is so contrary to anything these hon. gentlemen have ever advocated, that I cannot understand their bringing it forward as their policy now. Did you ever hear of these people advocating the building up of our home industries or the buying of goods at home if they could get them cheaper abroad? Has it not been the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite always to buy where you can buy the cheapest? In my own county, when talking about agricultural implements, my Liberal friends have time and time again put up to me the argument: Suppose you do make your own agricultural implements and increase your own home industries, see how much better implements you can get on the other side of the line. I now turn against them their own argument and I say that we are not in a position to-day to build Dreadnoughts that we are absolutely unable to do so. I even go further and say that if this government had any idea that they would ever have to depend on the ships they would build to protect our country, they would never dream of going to such a wholesale experiment. But they know well with whom they are dealing. They know that they are dealing with that old mother who has taken care of us all along the line, and they know that they can always depend on her to give us the protection of her ships, built out of the taxes of the English people and which have stood the test. It is about time that this government called off the bluff that they are trying to strengthen the empire and help the British navy. If we are going to sing God Save the King, and Rule Britannia, let us do something worth while and not embark on this miserably inadequate naval policy. When I consider the proposal of the right hon. the Prime Minister and his glowing statements about the duty of Canada towards the empire, I begin to have a new conception of the use of eloquence.

The declaration that if Canada should build a navy, that navy shall not be utilized for the empire unless Canada is satisfied that the cause is a just one, is to me offensive. What is the only inference which you can draw from such an assertion? It is this, we are willing to go to war with Great Britain so long as the war in which she is engaged is a just one. But is there any man in Canada to-day who believes that England will ever get into any other kind of a war. Does any one believe that that country, which has been the cradle of liberty for ages, which has ever stood for the rights of man, for the liberty of conscience, liberty of speech, justice and fair play—does any one in Canada believe that that country will ever engage in a war of tyranny and oppression? If we do not, then I say that when England turns to new ideas and engages in wars of this description, it will be time enough for Canada to turn to new gods.

I do not think that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) answered very well the question put to him by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan). In the British North America Act there is a clause, section 15, which provides:

> The command in chief of the land and naval militia and of all naval and military forces of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

That section is embodied in the Bill in section 4, but there is in the Bill another clause, clause 18 which provides:

> In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

The point to which I wish to call attention is this. How can you reconcile these two sections? In the one, the command in chief of Canada's naval forces is vested in the King; and in the other, the Governor in Council may place that force at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in case of an emergency.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is an attempt to take away a power that belongs exclusively to the imperial government.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I think it is. But in connection with the British North America Act, I would like to quote a passage from the speech of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, in which it seems to me there is more pregnancy than in anything I have heard for some time. This is what my hon. friend said about the British North America Act:

When the British empire is dissolved, the British North America Act goes also, and with it there departs every constitutional guarantee it contains. All beyond is chaos and darkness. What may be evolved out of that chaos and darkness, what constitutional status, what final relations, what ultimate balance of conflicting forces, no one of us today is bold enough to prophesy or wise enough to foresee.

Could there be more wisdom put into a dozen lines than our hon. leader has put into these words. I have stated my views in opening my address. I have stated why I believe we should have one united navy, an imperial navy, under one head. I believe that is the only way, I believe it is the cheapest way—if you want to bring the question down to a commercial plane—I believe it is the safest way to protect our trade routes and consolidate our great country. But these gentlemen opposite seem to dwell upon this aspect of the question. We on this side have done our best to convince them. I have no hope of doing more, than has been done, or even as much as has been done, by many on this side to convince our friends opposite that there is an emergency. Of course, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that England is arming, France is arming, Austria is arming—all the countries are arming to the limit. Why? For fear they will be attacked—not that they are going to attack anybody else, but for fear somebody else will attack them. Carry that argument to its logical conclusion and what can that conclusion be, but that we should strengthen the imperial navy, because we fear, and have good reason to fear, that Germany in the near future is going to attack us? I intend to quote—what has been quoted before—from some of the men who believe that there is an emergency. For, we do not need to look very deeply into the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite to see that their strongest point against procuring Dreadnoughts is that there is no emergency. I find that men like Lord Rosebery, Sir Edward Grey, the right hon. Reginald McKenna, the right hon. Alfred Lyttleton, right hon. Mr. Balfour, right hon. Mr. Asquith—men of all shades of politics on the other side of the ocean—have told us that there is an emergency. I shall not quote here to-day anything that was said by these men during the election campaign in Britain which has recently been concluded. I admit that some of them have made statements during that campaign not wholly in accord with statements of theirs which I shall read. But these later statements, it must be remembered, were made during the heat of one of the strongest political campaigns ever carried on in Great Britain. I shall not quote at length, but shall give only paragraphs that are directly to the point. Lord Rosebery, speaking at the Imperial Press Conference in June last, three months before the House of Commons closed, said:

Now gentlemen, you will forgive me if I come next and at once to what is by far the most vital topic that you will have to discuss at this conference, or which concerns our empire as a whole—I mean that of imperial defence. . . . All, then, forbodes peace——

He says there is peace.

—and yet, at the same time, combined with this total absence of all question of friction, there never was, in the history of the world, so threatening and overpowering a preparation for war. That is the sign which I regard as most ominous. . . . I admit there are features of this general preparation for war which must cause special anxiety to the friends of Great Britain and of the British empire.

Certainly, Lord Rosebery remains under a feeling of anxiety. It is true the leader of this House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith), the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) and others of hon. gentlemen opposite do not feel anxious. But I have no right to regard these gentlemen as of the same authority in this matter as Lord Rosebery and others whom I have named. These hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that there is no danger, but the great men in England tell us that there is danger.

When I see one country alone asking for 25 millions of extra taxation for warlike preparations; when I see the unprecedented sacrifices which are asked from us on the same grounds, I do begin to feel uneasy as to the outcome of it all, and to wonder where it will stop. . . . Gentlemen, we can and we will build 'Dreadnoughts' or whatever the newest type of ship may be as long as we have a shilling to spend on them or a man to put into them. All that we can and will do, but I am not sure that even that will be enough, and I think it may be your duty to take back to your young dominions across the seas this message and this impression: that some personal duty and responsibility for national defence rests on every man and citizen of the empire.

Is this the doctrine that our friends are trying to impress upon the people of this country? I think not. I say, and without the slightest desire to give offence, that the gentlemen on the other side, from the Prime Minister down, are trying to misrepresent the facts to the people of this country; and I believe that before I get through with my address I can prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that the Liberal press or at least some part of it, as well as many members of this House, are trying to misrepresent the facts in this matter.

Yes, gentlemen, take that message back with you. Tell your peoples—if they can believe it—the deplorable way in which Europe is relapsing into militarism and the pressure that is put upon this little England, to defend itself, its liberties—and yours! But take this message also back with you—that the old country is right at heart; that there is no failing or weakness in her; and that she rejoices in renewing her youth in her giant dominions beyond the seas. For her own salvation, she must look to herself, and that failing her she must look to you.

And Sir Edward Grey, the Foreign Secretary, speaking after Lord Rosebery at this conference, said:

I endorse every word he said. We are in comparatively calm weather, not in stormy weather, in foreign politics at the present moment, but the excessive expenditure on armaments makes the weather sultry. And the seriousness of that expenditure cannot be over-rated; but you should know to-day how conscious we are at home that we have far too much at stake to allow our naval expenditure to fall behind, however great the burden, and you from beyond the seas have made it clear to us how great the resources of the empire are. In upholding the empire surely we are going more and more towards the ideal to which Mr. Kirwan referred in his speech yesterday—of a union of allies—of self-governing dominions.

The right hon. Mr. McKenna said:

We look to the future and we see growing difficulties surrounding our empire. We foresee possibilities in which we should be called upon to unite our whole strength in a common defence.

I believe in a common defence. Yet, in the face of this utterance of Mr. McKenna, hon. gentlemen opposite try to convince the country that there is no danger, no emergency. Hence, they ask what is the use of giving Dreadnoughts? Why not be content with a tin pot navy? 'It is true,' they say, 'the Conservative party have forced us to do something, but we will do as little as we can. Then we shall be able to go to Quebec and other parts of this country and tell the people that we were forced to do something, but that we did as little as possible, and we can assure you that when it comes to real war our little tin pot navy will not be in sight.'

The right hon. Alfred Lyttelton said:

Well, my belief is, the actual position the actual situation of affairs at this moment is different from that which it has been since the battle of Trafalgar. We are in the presence for the first time of powers equal to ourselves in wealth, . . . and I was delighted to hear Sir Edward Grey on this occasion endorse what he said—that this country may always be relied upon to spend her last shilling if it is necessary for her own defence and for the defence of the empire, but that a time might come when it would be necessary for her own safety and for their own safety that the dominions over the seas should assist her in a tremendous struggle. I firmly believe myself that the ultimate destiny and fate of this empire will depend—must depend—upon the achievement of a really closer and more consolidated unity and a more perfect organization of defence.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, as a fair-minded man which of the two policies before this House leads to closer consolidation—the little home navy without one of the warships of any great importance, or the policy of this side of the House, declaring that there is an emergency, and that in that emergency we should send two Dreadnoughts at least, the only ships that will be able to line up at the front in time of war? Certainly the latter, without any doubt. What does Mr. Balfour say:

The fate of Australia, the fate of New Zealand, of Canada, South Africa, India—that is not going to be decided in the Pacific; it is not going to be decided in the Indian ocean; it is going to be decided here, and everybody who attempts to read the signs of the times will, I think, agree with the weighty words which fell from Lord Rosebery.

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt about it, the great battle that is going to decide the fate of the British empire will be fought in the North sea. Germany to-day, from her geographical position, needs and possesses the strongest army in the world; she is able, if necessary, to put 4,000,000 armed men in the field. Great Britain, from her geographical position, must have the strongest navy in the world, and that navy alone will be the only thing to protect us whenever that crucial moment arrives.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

DOMINION MILLERS' ASSOCIATION.

On the order for private Bills:

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, before going into committee, I notice from the reports of yesterday's proceedings of the House, that some discussion took place with reference to Bill (No. 111), An Act respecting the Dominion Millers' Association. As I introduced this Bill to the House, and as several members want more information as to the particular features of it, I would suggest that the Bill be referred back to the Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills for further consideration, so that the questions raised by hon. members yesterday may be further considered in committee. I, therefore, move:

That Order No. 71, further consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill (No. 111) an Act respecting the Dominion Millers' Association, be discharged and that the said Bill be referred back for further consideration to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Motion agreed to.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Mr. Speaker, when you left the chair at six o'clock, I was dealing with the question as to whether there existed an emergency, and as to whether this country, if it believed that there was an emergency, should do something practical to meet it. In support of that proposition I was quoting authorities from both sides of politics in the old country, words that were spoken, not at a time of political contest, but at a time when the country could give a fair and just expression of opinion. I gave all the authorities to which I wished to refer except Lord Roberts. He said:

Recent events, however, prove conclusively that a new era has commenced, and that our whole empire may again have to fight for its own, as the people of these islands have many times had to do in the past. The question is: Are we prepared to do this? Fleets and effective armies cannot be improvised to meet the rapid movements of modern times. Nothing but forethought and preparation, extending over years, can give us a naval or military strength which may be relied on in any great emergency, and which is in itself the greatest guarantee of that peace which we desire and need more than any other nation. I think I know what your main difficulty will be. It is not easy to convince the mass of the people in this country of the existence of real danger.

That is what Lord Roberts said, and I commend these words to my hon. friends on the other side of the House:

It may be even less easy to convince the populace of colonies that have enjoyed for a century protection, which has given them security from attack, that real dangers threaten them also. . . The growth of the colonies in wealth makes them more and more objects of envy to nations which do not possess such valuable areas of the world. So, if we are to be secure, we must stand side by side in common effort and common sacrifice.

Mr. Asquith said:

After very anxious careful examination of the conditions of ship-building in foreign countries, the government have come to the conclusion that it is desirable to take all necessary steps to ensure that the second four ships referred to in the programme shall be completed by March, 1912.

I will not refer to any more of these authorities. I think this House and the country will agree with me that the authorities to which I have referred should go farther and mean more than the authority of the Postmaster General, the First Minister or any of the friends who support them.

Now, a word or two about loyalty. That is one of the subjects which our friends on the other side of the House would rather we should not refer to. It seems to be a tender spot in their make-up, but whose fault is it? It is not our fault. It is not pleasant to see that we are led by an hon. gentleman who has placed himself, by his own words, in a position with which I think, we have just reason to find fault, and in a position which we believe is not in the best interests of this country, which we believe leads to disintegration rather than to what we should all desire—consolidation. Now, I wish to refer to these remarks, because I, personally, am impressed with the sentiment that the Bill which is before the House leads directly to the separation of this country from the great empire. The right hon. the First Minister, speaking in Boston, said:

Canada would never consent to imperial federation even on commercial lines alone, because the consequence would be the participation of Canada in British wars,——

I shall have something to say about that later on.

—and Canada would never consent to participate in British wars.

I hold out to my fellow countrymen the idea of independence, but, whenever the day comes, it must come by the consent of both countries, and we shall continue to keep the good feeling and the good-will of the mother land. If we are true to our record, we will again exhibit to the world the unique, the unprecedented example of a nation achieving its independence by slow degrees, and as naturally as the severing of the ripe fruit from the parent tree.

This Bill is another act in the drama. He also said of late:

Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy the day when we would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy.

Again:

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) no doubt would prefer an English shilling to a Yankee dollar; but for my part I am differently constituted. I am ready any day, whether I am charged with annexation or not, to take a Yankee dollar in preference to an English shilling. . . . I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspiration is the independence of Canada, to see Canada an independent nation in due course of time.

I do not think there could be anything stronger than that. The aspiration and goal are distinctly set out there, and notwithstanding all the eloquence we have heard from the other side, those words mean something or they mean nothing. If he meant what he said, those words were tending towards separation. The right hon. gentleman said further:

The conduct of England and Canada during the civil war of 1861-66 was a disgrace to the civilization of England and Canada. . . It is a great, a fatal mistake to make allegiance, British allegiance, the basis of trade. . . The present position of Canada cannot last, even at this day England and Canada have interests totally apart, and that the time will come when in the very nature of things separation must take place. I am a subject of the British Crown, but whenever I have to choose between the interests of England and of Canada, it is manifest to me that the interests of my country are identical with the interests of the United States of America.

Did anybody ever hear sentiments like that from Sir John Macdonald? Never. Those who sit on this side of the House, and the great Conservative party, have never had to devote their time to defending the loyalty of their great leader, Sir John Macdonald, and no one regrets in this House more than I do that our good friends on the other side have to spend so much time in trying to defend the loyalty of the First Minister in this country.

Sir Wilfrid says when England is at war, Canada is at war, but explains his meaning by saying that not always when England is at war Canada is at war. He says for myself I do not hesitate to say that if that war, the Crimean war, were to be undertaken by England under similar circumstances, I would hesitate very much before I would give my consent that we should take part in any such war. What was the position of loyal Sir John? What were his words, speaking in Toronto in 1888? Sir John said: Who can look back to the time when the Crimean war broke out and not remember with pride how Canada rose as one man to stand by the mother country. There was a rush of Canadians to go to the battlefield, and I had the pleasure to be instrumental in carrying a vote for $100,000 from the public treasury in order to show that Canada made common cause with England in time of war.

The right hon. gentleman is fond of quoting Scripture. His words are very eloquent, and when he finds himself in what we might vulgarly call a tight place he resorts to Scripture. He said the other day:

I am bound to say at the same time that I have been censured and criticised—severely censured and severely criticised—by those who within the party boast of their imperialism.

In his address he said: I am not an imperialist, and I am not an anti-imperialist —whatever that may mean, but it is just like the phrase Sir Wilfrid used when he was trying to be at once a protectionist and a free trader. After coming into power, in writing to his friend, Mr. Bertram, in Toronto, he said:

There are those in the Liberal party who are protectionist doctrinaires, and there are those who are free trade doctrinaires. For my part I incline neither to one nor the other.

The two phrases are very similar, and are indicative of an opportunism that has characterized the right hon. gentleman from the beginning. To continue the quotation of the Prime Minister:

—severely censured and severely criticised— by those who within the party opposite boast of their imperialism, who carry abroad upon their foreheads the imperial phylacteries, who boldly walk into the temple and there loudly thank the Lord that they are not like other British subjects, that they give tithes of everything they possess, and that in them alone is to be found the true incense of loyalty.

Those of us over here who claim to be imperialists, may possibly in the eyes of the hon. gentleman bear some sort of a badge like the one to which it has referred, but it cannot be said of us that we ever said in Boston that we would not participate in the wars of Great Britain, nor could it be ascribed to any member of the Conservative party that at the time of the rebellion in the Northwest, he said that if he had been there he would have shouldered his musket on behalf of the rebels. It can never be said of this party that at the time of the South African war we refused to send soldiers, that it was unconstitutional. That was another case of the hon. gentleman's opportunism, nothing but the expressed opinion of the people of this country forced the hon. gentleman to take the move which he did. In my opinion an attempt has been made to misrepresent to the people the position that we on this side of the House take on this matter. Hon. gentlemen have tried to impress the people that in giving two Dreadnoughts or any number of Dreadnoughts in this time of emergency to assist Great Britain in the protection of the empire, we would be paying tribute. I wonder if they would say we were paying tribute when we gave $50,000 the other day to assist France. I wonder if they would say we were paying tribute when we gave $100,000 to Chicago at the time of the fire, and later $100,000 to San Francisco in the time of their emergency? I think not.

One misrepresentation is that this government, in bringing this Bill to the House, are doing what the admiralty of Great Britain asked them to do. That statement has been made over and over again, and I give it a flat denial from my place in this House to-night. They are absolutely not carrying out what the admiralty asked them to do. That little play was carried on considerably during the last by-election in this city. The hon. member for Ottawa said that in regard to a Canadian navy he prefers to take the opinion of British experts, and so do all sensible Canadians. That is what the Dominion government has not done. I say they did not do what the experts asked them to do. A newspaper in referring to this episode, said:

> Evidently the word has been passed around to the Liberal speakers in the present by-election to claim that in proposing to build a tin-pot navy the Dominion government is giving Great Britain what she asked. This is absolutely untrue. Great Britain asked for a fleet unit consisting of one Dreadnought and its auxiliaries, or if this could not be done, to build the Dreadnought.

Then, too, the press of this country seems to be full of that idea which to my mind is an exceedingly important one. I have met that myself. I have had letters from my constituents saying: Well, but the government is doing what these experts asked it to do. Is it doing that? I claim that if it was I and other members of this side of the House would be deprived of a good deal of the argument which we put up against the Bill in favour of the Dreadnoughts. I have here something which has been circulated by the Winnipeg 'Free Press.' I and other members are careful what we say about this fourth estate. There are two kinds of people who can sass us whom we have no opportunity to sass back, that is, the man behind the pulpit and the man behind the pen, the editor of a newspaper. I shall read three short quotations from the Winnipeg 'Free Press.' The first is:

> It will be seen that the composition of the Australian fleet unit is to be on the lines laid down by the British admiralty and does not include a Dreadnought.

I do not think any hon. member opposite would pretend to say that that statement was right or true.

> As all the world knows the Dreadnought tendered by Australia to the admiralty was declined in favour of the policy of the creation of an Australian navy on the same lines as those laid down in the Canadian naval policy.

That does not call for any remark. Again:

> There remains this fact that the vessels which Australia is to provide herself with are to be the same as those with which Canada is to provide herself.

I do not think anybody would claim that these statements are true. Now, what did the admiralty ask, in a few words? The memorandum is signed by Mr. McKenna, as First Lord of the Admiralty:

> In the opinion of the admiralty, a Dominion government desirous of creating a navy should aim at forming a distinct fleet unit; and the smallest unit is one which, while manageable in time of peace, is capable of being used in its component parts in time of war.
> The fleet to be aimed at should, therefore, in the opinion of the admiralty, consist at least of the following:—
> 1 armoured cruiser (new Indomitable class), which is of the Dreadnought type,
> 3 unarmoured cruisers (Bristol class),
> 6 destroyers,
> 3 submarines.

The admiralty and the English government had a great deal of difficulty in getting any representatives of this government over to the last conference at all, a very different state of affairs from what existed in New Zealand and Australia. New Zealand was anxious, subject to the best interests of the empire, that there should be a great imperial conference. Australia took the same view; but Canada did not see any particular reason why a conference should be held. However, after considerable correspondence and a number of cablegrams, the Canadian government agreed to send over two representatives. Their conference with the admiralty amounted about to this. Canada said: We are not willing to do what you want us to do. The admiralty said: Well, if you won't do that, what will you do? Canada said: You are the experts, and we would like to be advised by you what to do. The First Lord of the Admiralty said: It is impossible to advise you unless you will tell us how much money you wish to expend. Then our representatives mentioned two separate sums which this country was willing to spend. Then the experts advised our representatives what they thought were the best ships that could be got for that amount of money. In a few words, that is about what occurred, and I do not think our friends opposite can possibly make the people of this country believe that in this Bill they are carrying out what the admiralty asked for.

Now, I am going to take a little time to prove some of the things I have said in reference to Australia, New Zealand and Canada. Here is a communication from the Governor of New Zealand to the Secretary of State on March 22, 1909, very near the time when this House debated the resolution of last year:

Government of New Zealand offer to bear cost of immediate building and arming by the British government of one first-class battleship of the latest type. If subsequent events show it to be necessary, will also bear cost of second warship of the same type.

That is what New Zealand offered, a country with one-fifth the population of Canada, and with less than one-fifth the natural resources of Canada. This is the reply received by New Zealand:

Please hasten to assure your Prime Minister that his message has been received by me with the highest appreciation of the generous and spontaneous offer made on behalf of New Zealand. It will be at once laid before His Majesty's government.

The following is also from the Secretary of State to the Governor of New Zealand:

I am commanded by the King to inform you that His Majesty is deeply gratified by the patriotic feeling displayed by New Zealand towards mother country in their splendid offer, and to convey at once his gratitude and high appreciation for fine patriotism and generosity shown in the magnificent offer made so promptly and spontaneously.

Again from the Governor General to the Secretary of State:

Am desired by Prime Minister to convey to His Majesty the King government of New Zealand's deep sense of gratitude for gracious message and for His Majesty's generous recognition of New Zealand offer of battleship to the mother country. People of New Zealand pleased to evince in a tangible way to His Majesty the King and to help to maintain strength of empire.

There was some doubt as to whether the federal government of Australia would offer Dreadnoughts or whether it would be done by the different provinces. The Governor of New South Wales made the following offer to the Secretary of State:

If Commonwealth parliament does not adopt this course, governments of New South Wales and Victoria have agreed immediately to take the necessary steps to obtain the authority of their respective parliaments to share costs of a Dreadnought on a per capita basis.

Mr. SCHAFFNER.

The Secretary of State to the Governor of New South Wales:

His Majesty's government warmly appreciate desire of New South Wales and Victoria to contribute their share of the cost of a Dreadnought, and would gratefully welcome such an addition to the naval strength of the empire.

We were told by the Minister of Militia the other day that in time of war the fleet which Australia proposes to build is not to go automatically under the control of the British admiralty. Now, the paragraph which I propose to read, from a communication addressed by the Governor General of Australia to the Secretary of State, would set that at rest:

In time of war or emergency, or upon a declaration by the senior naval officer representing the British government, that a condition of emergency exists, all vessels of the naval force of the Commonwealth shall be placed by the Commonwealth government under the orders of Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. The method by which the vessels shall come under the orders of the senior naval officer would be by furnishing each commander of an Australian vessel with sealed orders and instructions (to) the effect that upon the declaration to him by the senior naval officer representing British government that a state of war or emergency exists, such sealed orders shall thereupon be opened and, in pursuance of their provisions, he shall thereupon immediately place himself under the orders of the senior naval officer representing British government.

So far as I can see, the fleet will certainly come automatically under the direction of the admiralty in time of war.

Now, a few words in reference to the manner in which Canada received the invitation to come over and consult with the admiralty as to the best means of defence. The following is from the Secretary of State to the Governor General:

His Majesty's government have noted with much satisfaction the resolution passed by the House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada on March 29 on subject of national defence, recording its approval of the organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with, and in close relation to, the imperial navy, and I understand that the Dominion government proposes that its Defence Ministers should come here at an early date to confer with the imperial navy and military authorities upon technical matters arising upon that resolution.

I desire therefore to commend to you the following important suggestion, namely, that a conference of representatives of the self-governing Dominions, convened under the terms of resolution (1) of the conference of 1907, which provides for such subsidiary conference, should be held in London early in July next. The object of the conference would be to discuss the question of naval and military defence of the empire with special reference to the Canadian resolution.

That was on April 30, 1909. What was the answer of Canada to that plain and respectful invitation? The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) answered on February 8:

The ministers wish to point out that the views of the Canadian House of Commons on the question of naval defence have already been expressed, and, in pursuance of the resolution of that body two ministers, as already announced, will shortly go to London to discuss with the admiralty the best methods of carrying out that resolution. My ministers have not sufficient information to warrant them advising the necessity of such a formal conference as that suggested, but there will be no objection to postpone visit till July so as to suit convenience of imperial government.

One sees there in a moment the difference in the manner in which this invitation was received and accepted by New Zealand and Australia, and the manner in which it was received by Canada. The New Zealand government declared that, in the opinion of the ministers, a representation of all parts of the empire at the conference was essential, and that the course which the home government was taking was the right one and in the best interests of the empire. The Transvaal gave a similar answer, but every one in this House knows the position in which the Transvaal was at that time. Every one knows that the Transvaal was not in a position to give the same answer as New Zealand or Australia.

According to the admiralty memorandum this is their opinion:

In the opinion of the admiralty the Dominion government desirous of creating a navy should aim at forming a distinct fleet unit; and the smallest unit is one which, while manageable in time of peace, is capable of being used in its component parts in time of war. The operation of destroyers and torpedo boats are necessarily limited to waters near the coast or to a radius of action not far distant from the base, while there are great difficulties in manning such a force and keeping it always thoroughly efficient.

Will any hon. gentleman pretend that the navy contemplated will, in time of war, be of any material benefit? I do not think they would be able to line up to the war line. In any case, they would be of no benefit in protecting our trade routes. Outside of our sentiment in favour of protecting our empire, and looking at the matter only from the commercial side, I think that what we want is something that will assist in protecting our great trade routes.

I believe that the time has come when we should say what we think in these matters. While I have not the slightest desire to give any offence, I must say that I believe, from the bottom of my heart, that this Bill is framed, in the manner in which it is, in order to please our friends from the province of Quebec. For that province and its people I have the greatest respect. It is one of the oldest provinces in this Dominion, and one of which we have a great many reasons to be proud, but I must say that ever since I have been in this House, it seems to me that in all questions of importance everything has had to be subsidiary to the interests of Quebec. That is hardly fair. I do not care whether you take the Autonomy Bill or any Bill that has ever come before this House, you will find the facts to bear out what I say. But I am delighted to see a glimmer of light in that province in that one respect. There is lots of light there in many other respects, but I find there to-day what I never saw before, and what I do not think any citizen of Canada ever saw before, I find one of the leading papers in that province asking, in connection with this question, is it fair or right that one province out of nine should stand up against the other eight. These are the words of one of the leading French papers in the province of Quebec. I say that this is as it should be. We ought not to legislate in this country for any province, but for the Dominion in the very broadest possible way.

Mr. RIVET. Give us the name of that newspaper to which you refer?

Mr. SCHAFFNER. It is 'La Patrie.'

Mr. RIVET. Which number?

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I really cannot tell. I had the quotation here, but it was very lately—within the last three or four days.

Mr. RIVET. We do not object.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I do not think you do. I believe that every right thinking man, when we sit down and talk these things over, will say that is the right sort of sentiment, and that it is one which every Canadian should be willing to express.

Mr. ERNEST ROY. That is alright.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I want to say in closing that I am absolutely honest and sincere in supporting the amendment of my leader. If I believed that this Bill brought down by the government were of any practical value in the protection of this great empire I would be bound to support it, but I do not see how it can be. I have tried to prove by the very best authorities that to-day there is an emergency. My good friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) said that if we had started twenty years ago we might have had a fleet of some service to-day. There is something in that statement. But twenty years ago Germany had a very small fleet and this great arming of the different nations was not going on, whereas to-day we are right up against an emergency.

The leader of this House says that it will be at least five years. Well, I do not think any one doubts that it will be at least ten years before the navy which it is proposed by this Bill to provide, will be in practical service. And I do not think there is a man in this House but believes that that will be too late. Suppose that war should come within the next two or three years, what would be the condition of all these colonies? New Zealand would be able to march up to the firing line with her Dreadnought; Australia the same; and I believe, as soon as affairs are settled in South Africa, that part of the empire also will be ready. But where will Canada be? She will not march up to the firing line; she will be standing away off shouting through a megaphone, as I think the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) said: 'Don't come near us; we are good runners, but we are no good for fighting.' That will be absolutely the position of Canada, and the Dreadnoughts of New Zealand and Australia will have to defend our little navy, and what will such an inadequate navy cost. Built in England, $11,000,000. Built in Canada, $15,000,000. By time ships are finished at least $20,000,000. Maintenance at least $5,000,000 per year. Who is to pay for this? Not contractors; not makers of uniform, ammunition and supplies. All these will make rich out of the undertaking. The bulk of the expense will fall upon the farmer and the wage-earner.

There is a most interesting article in last night's Montreal 'Star'. I indicated a little while ago how careful we have to be in what we say about the fourth estate. But the Montreal 'Star', a newspaper of great influence all over this Dominion, probably the paper that goes into the homes of more people in Canada—and I am not advertising the 'Star' now—than any other paper. But I do not think that the 'Star' last night was fair. After thumping everybody on both sides of the House, the 'Star' gave us the assurance that it would announce its policy to-night. I am sure that every man on either side of the House is waiting in great anxiety to learn what this great paper is going to tell us. It will propound a great naval policy; it will tell Canada what to say and do. I sometimes think—cannot help but think—what a great blessing to this country it would be if some of the preachers and some of the editors were only in this House. We should not then have such difficulty in formulating and carrying out great policies. The press is a great institution. We have a tremendous lot to thank them for; they are the disseminators of all that is good. But somehow they sometimes get into the habit of saying pretty hard things. But we have only to wait until to-night, when the Montreal 'Star' comes in, we shall have a proper naval policy for this great country.

Mr. Speaker, I had no idea of taking up so much time. I have only now to sum up and present my conclusions:

1. I believe that the present position of Canada, that of absolute dependence upon Great Britain for our naval protection, is intolerable.

2. I believe that if the people of this country realized that such a condition existed they would vote almost unanimously to terminate that state of affairs.

3. As ninety-five per cent of our exports are water-borne, it is of the utmost importance that our trade routes be protected. Hitherto, Great Britain has policed the trade routes, but the time has come when Canada should relieve the British taxpayer of some of his burden in this respect.

4. We believe that the government's naval policy is miserably inadequate. We believe it to be a foolish, useless, expensive tin pot navy, one that will be of little service in protecting our trade routes or our empire in time of war.

5. I believe, not in a Canadian navy, but in a great imperial navy, the expense of which is borne by the whole British empire, and not by the taxpayers of Great Britain only. I believe that that navy should be under one directing head. I do not see how it could be effective otherwise. If the navy were made which this government proposes, and if it formed a component part of the great imperial navy, then, in time of war, as I have already said, it might be of some use. It may be my fault, but, for my part, I fail to recognize in this Bill anything that will do what I have asked should be done.

6. Experts tell us to-day that the effective vessels are Dreadnoughts. Then, we should demand the immediate construction of one or two Dreadnoughts to be built for Canada, and at the expense of Canada. That will help to stand off the German menace, or the menace of any other country, thereby giving our assistance in maintaining—what I believe to be of world wide importance—the supremacy of Great Britain on the high seas.

7. Sir, I believe that the great majority of the citizens of Canada realize that the future hope of the country, commercially, politically and sentimentally lies in continuing our close relation to the British empire.

I repeat that I stand for one throne, one flag, one navy.

Mr. L. A. A. RIVET (Hochelaga). Mr. Speaker, I believe that it is a circumstance of good augury for the measure now before this House that the further we proceed in the discussion of it the more we notice the marked contrast between the abundance of arguments used in its support and the obvious scarcity of reasons to be adduced against it. After having listened with a good deal of attention to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) I hold this opinion more strongly than ever. For, after having seen the hon. gentleman evidently labouring under pains of difficulty, travelling far afield in search of new arguments and finding none, drawing upon the resources of what I believe to be one of the most fertile imaginations combined with a good deal of the spirit of imperialism, the hon. gentleman at last came to discover—or thought he could discover—a new argument, and one which, I am sure, has been to every member of this House quite a surprise, quite a revelation. Mr. Speaker, when the hon. gentleman stood in his place and stated that this measure had been introduced in this House for the single purpose of pleasing the province of Quebec, I was staggered, as I believe that to-morrow, when he reads it, my friend Mr. Henri Bourassa, the good ally of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), will be staggered.

I do not propose to follow the line of argument which has been adopted by the hon. member. However, allow me to tell him that in regard to this legislation, which I consider, as every member of this House considers, to be of the greatest national importance, the province of Quebec from which I have the honour to hail has not the slightest intention to take a different position from the other provinces. The motives which influence every Canadian irrespective of race and creed are as powerful in Quebec as elsewhere, and we intend to give an undivided support to this legislation, notwithstanding the attitude of some of the leading members of our race and our province, who to-morrow I hope will return to better councils and will admit that the majority was well inspired and took the proper course. The province of Quebec does not wish to assume in this House or in this country a position of isolation. That has never been the policy of the leaders of the province of Quebec. If at one time, and possibly under different circumstances, there happened to be some members of my race or of my province advocating a different course, thank God, those days are gone by, and they are to be found to-day in a hopeless minority.

Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, in the course of my remarks on the budget, I had the honour to inform this House that I purposed supporting the Bill that is now under discussion, and I did so without advancing any other reason for my intended action than the need of self-protection that should characterize both nations and individuals. I stated that later on I would explain in a fuller and more explicit manner the motives that actuate me in my attitude concerning a matter of such national importance. I am happy to be able to take advantage of the occasion which now presents itself to fulfil that engagement, and, under the sway of a deep-set conviction, a conviction based upon a serious study of all the circumstances that surround the misisterial measure, I rise to reiterate my confidence in the policy of the government.

At the outset let me say that I understand and appreciate to its fullest, the part that falls to my lot, and the responsibilities I assume at this moment. I do not forget the fact that, if the ministry shoulder all the merit or demerit, as the case may be, attached to the measure that it has originated, it is only a parliamentary majority that can impart to it a legal existence and an executive power, and must especially answer before history for the true or false interpretation that it embodies of the popular will. But I must add that it is without any apprehension, without any fear of the popular verdict, as has been here and elsewhere often declared, that I place my humble support at the service of the government. I am confident that the public opinion of this country, once enlightened as to the motive and results of the ministerial course, will quickly silence the prejudices and passions awakened by party spirit and will cordially support the government. But should it be otherwise, the prospect of a defeat should not, it seems to me, lessen our attachment to a cause that we in conscience believe to be just and in harmony with the best interests of Canada.

It also behooves us, Mr. Speaker, on this occasion, to divest ourselves of all external influences and, in all conscience and full liberty, to exercise our mandate as representatives of the people. For, if, until the introduction of this Bill, we could have claimed the moral support of public opinion, ready to accept favourably the almost concordant expressions of the authorized leaders of the two great political parties, to-day, the unexpected somersault of the leader of the opposition, followed by the disavowal inflicted on him by his principal lieutenant from my native province, are ill-calculated to direct that public opinion in the direction of a solution of such a vast and yet delicate question. The parliamentary situation, as affected by the amendment and sub-amendment of the left, is more likely to set popular sentiment astray than to afford it a true solution of the question. What is that situation? By the Bill now introduced the government provides for the organization of a Canadian naval service. This Bill, with slight variations, is entirely based on our Militia Act, By clause 18 the government may, in case of emergency, place the naval service at the disposal of the British admiralty. On account of the circumstances that gave birth to the project of a Canadian navy, and on account of our particular position as a nation in the British empire, that clause 18 became inevitable and must appear quite a matter of course; but often, the most simple things in appearance, do not seem to be understood in the same way by every one, since our friends of the opposition have seen a world of differences in that clause, according as it has been viewed through the spectacles of Mr. Borden or those of Mr. Monk. And this difference of interpretation has served as basis of the two absolutely opposite systems that summarize the two classes of contradictory attacks made against the Bill.

In the opinion of the leader of the opposition, clause 18 upsets all the economy of a naval project, the principal aim of which should be to strengthen the British fleet. By that clause Canada withdraws with one hand what she gives with the other. In a word, according to Mr. Borden, the radical fault of the Bill is the too absolute control of Canada over the navy, the too rigorous application of the principles of autonomy that govern our national life. According to him, the same idea of autonomy is at the bottom of the policy of constructing vessels of a class only useful to Canada and of no use to the mother country in the hour of danger. The hon. member sees only one way to remedy the evil he seems to dread, and that is the gift of $25,000,000 to England with the subsequent approbation of the people—after the money would be safely landed in the British treasury. This is embodied in his amendment, which is the expression of the policy of the bulk of the opposition. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier thinks, on the other hand, that the same clause 18 is destructive of our autonomy, the upsetting of responsible government, the reducing of our parliament to simple municipal institutions, the total loss of all the fruits derived from the sacrifices and struggles of our fathers in the cause of liberty. For the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, a Canadian navy, created under clause 18, would only be a squadron of the British fleet, intended principally for the defence of the mother country, and this interpretation leads him to claim, in his amendment, that the government's policy modifies, in a wholesale manner, our relations with the empire—and he, therefore, demands an appeal to the popular vote.

Thus the two Conservative leaders reach the same goal, but by different roads. For both of them, clause 18 contains nothing worthy of the occasion. For the one, under its mask are all the traits of evil, where the other considers them the traits of good—and vice versa. In other terms, the leader of the opposition sees in that clause the incarnation of nationalism, while the hon. member for Jacques Cartier sees in it the incarnation of imperialism. Could a more flagrant contradiction be imagined? The best way to reconcile their views would be for both these gentlemen to change spectacles. But they will do no such a thing, for none are so blind as those who do not want to see. What is the truth, Mr. Speaker? If our friends on the left desire to sanely intercept clause 18, they will see in it none of the dangers that they apprehend from both sides, but they will find in it the guarantee that all desire —that is to say, our country's autonomy and our effective aid in the maintenance of the supremacy of the British navy. But, as I said a moment ago, this contradictory assault on the ministerial policy, and which, in case of an appeal to the people, is repeated outside, is scarcely likely to enlighten the public mind, nor to inspire a verdict in accord with facts. Hence, the duty of the majority arises from the very circumstances of the case. Invested with popular confidence to solve in this parliament all problems of national interest, we should fulfil our task without undergoing the jostling of divided opinions, nor the onset of passions excited by the prejudiced and unscrupulous. In this question, as in all others, our mandate authorizes us to safe-guard the true interests of the country, and, were we to be unfaithful to our duty, the people of Canada would be justified, later on, in visiting us with punishment for our lack of initiative and of patriotism. This much being said, Mr. Speaker, I assert that a Canadian navy, in conformity with the dispositions of the present Bill, constitutes one of the essential obligations of our position as a colony, and is one of the consequences of our national evolution.

Before discussing that proposition, I desire, Sir, to lay down some fundamental principles, which, in my humble opinion, underlie the spirit of this Bill.

1. The organization of a naval defence is not a blessing, but a necessity imposed on us by the present conditions of civilization. This principle has been admitted in all times, even by those whose convictions were opposed to war in every form. John Bright, an English statesman, well known for his pacific leanings, has admitted the necessity of national defence as long as, between nations, war should remain as the final tribunal of arbitration.

2. Militarism consists in a preponderance of an exaggerated sort given, in a country, to the military element; our defence organization could only draw us into it in proportion to the degree in which we follow the example of the European nations that bend under the load of their armaments.

3. Canada is an autonomous colony of the British empire, enjoying practically a quasi-independence, but theoretically and absolutely under the domination of the British Crown. The colonial tie may be almost imperceptible; yet it exists in all its strength, and only a successful revolution, or the consent of Great Britain, could dissolve it. We will see later how the close of England's naval supremacy could effect our actual position.

4. The breaking of the bond with Great Britain would leave two alternatives for Canada: Independence or annexation with the United States.

5. The safest foundation of the British empire lies in the liberty of action and the free autonomous development of its component parts.

All those who have written or spoken against this Bill seem to have forgotten one or two, and, in some cases, all of these principles. It is not wonderful that such forgetfulness should have led them into contradictory conclusions, contrary to facts and to the best interests, both of the Canadian people and the British empire. I, therefore, say that it is not possible to discuss in an intelligent manner this problem of naval defence without having present to the mind the fundamental ideas that I have just indicated, because they must necessarily be found at the root of any policy respecting means of mutual protection, as between Great Britain and her self-governing colonies.

As I have already pointed out, the government, in its naval policy, has been from the beginning, confronted by two different and contradictory lines of attack. On the one hand, it has been claimed that the only policy that suggests itself under the circumstances is one of immediate assistance, by way of a cash contribution to the mother country; this is the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). I am satisfied that such a solution of the question has already been proved unacceptable by some of the supporters of the government. It has been conclusively shown, to my mind, that a system of cash and periodical contributions is a temporary and costly expedient, that brings no definite solution of our relations with the mother country, in respect to naval defence, and is a violation of all principles of self-government, could only be excused on the ground of an imminent crisis in the naval history of Great Britain. As this alleged crisis has been found to be a night-mare, got up for political purposes, the position of the ultra-loyalists of the opposition becomes untenable. I propose then to leave aside that aspect of the political situation created by the Borden amendment, to deal exclusively with the opposition offered to the Bill, in other parts of Canada, namely, in Quebec, on the ground that the only policy to be followed by the government in matters of naval defence should be one of complete inaction. We now know the arguments of the opponents of a Canadian navy in the province of Quebec. Nationalists and Conservatives, the latter having taken the programme of the former, have agreed to try and convince the people of Quebec that military imperialism, according to their view, has brought us this Bill, and that, by the sacrifice of our autonomy, it has rendered the tie with Great Britain an intolerable yoke. Yet, the greater number of them, and the member for Jacques Cartier is one, have carefully avoided drawing the people's attention to the consequences for our country of a separation from England. While their premises drive them fatally into separation they have not had the honesty to go to the logical end, and to either cry out for independence or for annexation.

I am mistaken; the real exponent of nationalism, Mr. Oliver Asselin, in a pamphlet published under the title, 'Naval Defence and the British Empire', after having criticised in advance the naval policy of the government as being an attack on our autonomy, and the imposition of an undeserved and unbearable burden, faces the following alternative. Having declared that the government's policy would force us to take part in all wars wherein England's interests would be at stake, and having enumerated all the services we render to England, Mr. Asselin concludes thus:

> These services, these sacrifices, England cannot ask if, henceforth, we are to take part in all wars in which the honour or integrity of the empire are at stake. Independenec would then be doubly as valuable, and so it seems to me.

Thus the few of our opponents who have the courage and frankness to tell us whither they tend, raise the standard of independence. In the presence of such a declaration, it behooves us to calmly study the obligations that flow from such a new situation in our country. Would independence, from the standpoint of naval defence, impose greater sacrifices on us? It seems incontestible, and I doubt strongly if the partisans of independence are not imbued with the same idea—namely, that independence would entail a much heavier naval outlay than would the policy of the government. I cannot believe in the sincerity of men who place our national security under the wing of the Monroe doctrine, or under some species of American equillibrium fashioned after that of Europe. A few days ago the hon. Postmaster General settled fairly that question of the Monroe doctrine. I will add only a few words to his eloquent remarks. In fact the Monroe doctrine is not one that enters into the international code, and, as such, is accepted by all nations. It has no obligatory force, it has no sanction outside that of the authority whence it emanates. Now, that authority is not the United States Congress or Senate, that have exclusive jurisdiction in matters of international treaties, but is the good will of the president of the United States, whose individuality changes every four or eight years. The so-called Monroe doctrine was only an expression of opinion by a president of the United States, given to harmonize with the circumstances of the time, not applying even to Canada, which it expressly excludes, which had been laid aside when the interests or the caprices of the American people required it, as has since been seen, on memorable occasions and which will be laid aside every time that such action is deemed necessary by our powerful neighbours. But even supposing that the Monroe doctrine would respect or protect our independence, is there a serious man in Canada or the United States who would pretend that such protection would exempt us from participating in the defence of our coasts and our ports? Is it at the moment when the American people aspire more and more to play a world-wide part, caress visions of imperialism, and accordingly impose fresh sacrifices on themselves and increase their naval budget, that they would consent to assume, without any compensation, the defence of such an extensive territory, as exposed as their own to attack? For all well-thinking people of Canada, as in the United States, the conditions of such a protection would be as humiliating for our national dignity as they would be dangerous to our liberty of action, and even of our independence. We would, in that way, become the vassal of the United States. Is there a Canadian, jealous of his national dignity and conscious of the great future of Canada, who would freely submit to the ignominy of such dependence? The argument of an American equilibrium compared to that of Europe is not serious. It is to insult Canada to believe that her protection may be the result of geographical conditions such as regulate the existence of small countries like Switzerland, Belgium, Denmark, or Montenegro. It is clear that the geographical conditions are not the same, and, moreover, there can be no comparison between those smaller countries, that have reached the zenith of their power, and Canada, whose growth has scarcely commenced. Moreover, history shows that the independence of those small countries is precarious, and is ever at the mercy of new combinations likely to arise, and that, besides, each of them is provided with a war fleet. Charles Dupuis, professor in the school of political science in France, in his book, 'The Principle of Equilibrium and the European Concert', writes as follows:

> The principle of equilibrium cannot be one of international law, unlike the law, it could never create a judicial principle, furnish clear, precise and identical solutions: it interdicts but few solutions and dictates none. It could only guarantee the rights of all if it could secure the maintenance of the statu quo or else counterbalance any increase of power amongst the stronger states, by means of a co-relative increase of the power of the feebler states. The maintenance of the statu quo is impossible and the counterbalances have rarely been established save to the benefit of the strong and the injury of the weak.

Thus our independence would not guarantee us against the cost of naval defence nor against equivalent sacrifices. Mr. Asselin, himself, in the pamphlet I have just mentioned, is obliged to agree, at page 40, he says:

> If we were independent, nothing would prevent us from creating for ourselves, for ourselves alone, that navy which we are bound to create for others and to make friends at the same time amongst the larger states, England included, with the trade benefits which we now give free to the metropolis.

The opponents of the measure in Quebec are not deceived on this point, and despite their cry about the Munroe doctrine there are but few amongst them who have any belief in any independence in the near future. If there be any who secretly nurse the thought of independence, its realization seems to them very far off, not of our generation, something to be secured only when Canada shall have attained a degree of development and power which would afford the ambition and means of holding that privileged position. I do not pretend that those Canadians who entertain the idea of independence at some future date, should be amenable to the tribunal of jingoism presided over by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). It is not treasonable and it is not quite permissible to think and to say that Canada, having reached her full development, like the ripe apple falling from the tree, may eventually, by the force of circumstances, become a sovereign nation. I am not referring to those who may have that idea in mind. But I speak of the men who proclaim themselves partisans of a Canadian republic at an early date, and in view of escaping the obligations of naval defence, and I say that there is none of them who would not bitterly repent of his declarations and separatist speeches, if, in the near future, some fine morning, England were to abandon her finest colony to itself, leaving it all the risks and responsibilities of an independent state.

The hypothesis of an annexation to the United States scarcely need to be mentioned. If such annexation were the political doctrine of a given number of Canadians belonging to either or both of our great political parties, (for in this regard, in looking over their past, neither of these parties can cast a stone at each other), I submit that in our day, amongst the framers of public thought, save and except Goldwin Smith, we can find no one who openly professes that theory in regard to our national future. The same may be said of the mass of the people. In the province of Quebec, especially, despite the large number of its citizens who have emigrated to the United States, and who have kept up cordial and unbroken relations with Canada, annexation is looked upon as a danger for the institutions and for the language of the French-Canadian minority. This is why our fellow-citizens of the province of Quebec, more so than those of any other province, would prefer either the status quo or independence, to the risks of a situation so menacing to their race.

But it is quite possible that, between the peril of American assimilation and the terrors of military imperialism, some of our French-Canadian fellow-citizens may incline to the first of these evils as the lesser. In that case, it becomes our duty to undeceive them and to remind them that the dream of American imperialism, expressed in ever-increasing maritime armaments, would load them with a tax in money and men far heavier than could ever their free co-operation with the British admiralty in the defence of Canadian soil; and, on this subject, I may be permitted to point out, and without any thought of reproach, that the Spanish-American war claimed more victims amongst the soldiers and sailors of Canadian extraction, than did the Boer war, in which, indeed, many of our people fell fighting for the British flag. But I am convinced that few Canadians harbour any illusion in this regard, or imagine that annexation would bring them some kind of national sovereignty freed from the corresponding obligations—more burdensome than those of our present state.

The status quo, our position of self-governing colony within the British empire,—such is undoubtedly the desire of the great mass of the Canadian people. Their adhesion thereto is not baseless; it is reasoned and reasonable, it is founded on special advantages and benefits belonging thereto. These advantages and benefits have been enumerated. The Postmaster General, in his masterly speech the other day, told us of the liberties and extensive privileges that we enjoy under the British flag. If we have not the title of nation, we exercise all the leading prerogatives and responsibilities of one. The extreme independence in our economic and social life, the safeguards of our trade and industries, the prestige and advantages derived from the capacity of British subjects, and, especially for us French-Canadians, the guarantees that surround our institutions, our religion and our language; these are the principal actuating influences in our fidelity to our British allegiance. And this brings us to the one and only question: Can this status quo be maintained indefinitely without our fulfilling our obligations in regard to naval defence? If the reply be affirmative, the organization of a Canadian naval service, in conformity to the provisions of this Bill, would be no longer a free question of principle, but only a question of application and terms. I therefore submit, Sir, that in view of the principles that I have just laid down, the organization of our naval defence, in co-operation with the British admiralty, is only a natural result of our national evolution and of our situation as a self-governing colony. I say, further, that the government, in the application of its naval policy, has selected the time, the form and the means best suited to the interests both of the Canadian people and of the British empire. As I am disposed to repeat arguments used by some of those who have already spoken in support of the Bill, I will be as brief as possible in the demonstration of that proposition.

They who, like the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, claim that the government in its naval policy, bring in a dangerous innovation and lay aside the principles that have always governed our national life, have evidently not taken the trouble to carefully examine the declarations and the attitudes of the founders of our Canadian nationhood. All the negotiations that ended in confederation, the memorials and speeches of the statesmen concerned therein, come to show that their intention, apart from doing away with the parliamentary deadlock that had marked the closing years of the union, was mainly, to lay the foundations of a new and great nation, sufficiently strong to look after its own defence and to take part in the maintenance of British power. I may be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to make a few citations; they may cast some light on the present debate. In a letter sent to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, in October, 1858, by the delegates of the Canadian government, in London, Messrs. Cartier, Ross and Galt, in regard to the project of confederation, I find the following:

But, independent of reasons affecting Canada alone, it is respectfully represented that the interests of the several colonies and of the empire will be greatly promoted by a more intimate and united government of the entire British North American possessions. The population, trade, and resources of all these colonies have so rapidly increased of late years, and the removal of trade restrictions has made them, in so great a degree, self-sustaining, that it appears to the government of Canada exceedingly important to bind still more closely the ties of their common allegiance to the British Crown, and to obtain for general purposes such an identity in legislation as may serve to consolidate their growing power, thus raising under the protection of the empire an important confederation on the North American continent. . . . With a population of three and a half millions, with a foreign commerce exceeding twenty-five millions sterling, and a commercial marine inferior in extent only to those of Great Britain and the United States, it is in the power of the imperial government, by sanctioning a confederation of these provinces, to constitute a dependency of the empire, valuable in time of peace and powerful in the event of war, forever removing the fear that these colonies may ultimately serve to swell the power of another nation.

We all know that these first negotiations were not successful, and that it was only after the Quebec conference of 1864, and the ratification of its proceedings by parliament in 1865, that the adhesion of the imperial government to the scheme of confederation was again solicited by the Canadian delegates to London, Cartier, Macdonald, Brown and Galt. In a speech delivered in London, at a banquet given in their honour, on the 26th of April, 1865, Sir George Cartier, one of the delegates spoke as follows. I beg the indulgence of the House on account of the length of my citations, but they throw a vivid light on the present situation:

In consequence we seek a system that will permit us to make still greater progress, we wish to knot more closely the relations with the maritime provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. We frankly told them that we possess in Canada the necessary elements for the establishment of a strong nationhood, the population and the soil, but that we lack that other element which makes for England's greatness—the naval element. We told our friends that they are too restricted in their territory, while we need seaports and that, by uniting together we could become powerful and prosperous. Our government sent a deputation to England to show to the imperial government the absolute necessity of the realization of this confederation scheme. We desire its adoption not only to increase our prosperity and strength but also to be in a better position to participate in the defence of the British empire.

We fully conceive that in case of invasion we could not resist the enemy without the aid of England's armies, but with a union of all the provinces, we propose to take part in the defence of our country with all our might.

When we spoke of a confederation of all the colonies of North America, we did not mean a system of weakening the bonds that unite those colonies to the mother country, but a system calculated to develop, for the benefit of all, British American trade. Our confederation scheme has in it nothing to awaken a fear of events such as have been witnessed in the United States. There is no danger of a conflict between the rights of the different states and the privileges of the federal government. We purpose declaring to the imperial government that we are ready to do our duty even alone for the defence of our country, but we represented at the same time that, if this confederation became an accomplished fact, we would be in a better position to help Great Britain in case, which I hope will never come, of a war between Great Britain and the United States. I take occasion now to remark that, in binding ourselves to furnish our share in defence, we assume a considerable expenditure, but I add that you need not fear the results predicted—an increase of duty on English merchandise imported into Canada. As these predictions might lead to unpleasant impressions, I here declare that they are baseless. It was stated in both Houses of parliament, in certain newspapers of the country, that since Canada was separated, it would be better for England's safety to leave her free to become independent, or to be annexed to the United States. We in Canada know that we cannot be the cause of war, war can never come save by the will of the imperial authorities. We also know that our country is vulnerable, but we would suffer it to become a battlefield, if required, whereon to avenge the honour of England.

We in no way desire to become independent and still less to be annexed to the United States. We reject with horror the very idea.

Is this clear and explicit enough? It is the express and formal affirmation of Canada's obligation to organize her own defence and to give the mother country the benefit of that organization.

The same affirmations are to be found in the words of Sir John Macdonald, George Brown, Taché, and of all the fathers of confederation who spoke on the question. There is nothing surprising therein. To settle their work on solid foundations, the Canadian statesmen of 1867, understood the necessity of laying those principles common to all nations at its base. In order to give her the right to live, they sought to give their country the right of self-defence in defending, at the same time, the British flag, under the folds of which she should expand. The same aim gave rise to the policy of military organization in 1868.

Thus, as has been remarked, at the beginning of confederation Sir George Cartier took the portfolio of Militia. In that position it was he who had charge of the Bill that is still the fundamental basis of our military system. I have already quoted some of his remarks on the subject. I will ask leave to add thereto the following:

I do not fear, in introducing this measure, the same check as the Militia Bill of 1862 caused my colleagues and myself to fall. I believe it necessary to complete the great work of confederation. I have already remarked, on other occasions, that three indispensable elements constitute a nation; the population, the territory and the navy. But the indispensable crowning of the edifice is the militia. No people can ever pretend to the title of nation, unless they have with them a military element, a means of self-defence.

Cartier thus recognized that the time had come to endow Canada with an effective military organization and that the country should have the means of providing therefor. The success that crowned his efforts proves that public opinion was with him and acknowledged the responsibility of a nation in what concerns its own protection.

And to those that might pretend that Cartier's idea, and that of his government, did not go as far as the establishment of a naval service, I would point to the provisions of the Militia Act, which provide formally for the formation of a war fleet. Section 1 of that Act reads thus:

1. As provided by the fifteenth section of the British North America Act, 1867, the commander in chief of the land and naval militia, and of all naval and military forces of and in Canada, is vested in the Queen and shall be exercised and administered by Her Majesty personally, or by the government as Her representative.

Clause 6 of the Militia Act of 1868 reads, in part, thus:

6. The Militia shall be divided into active and reserve militia. The active militia shall consist of the volunteer militia, the regular militia and the marine militia.

* * * * * * * *

The marine militia shall be composed of seamen, sailors and persons whose usual occupation is upon any steam or sailing craft. . . . the waters of the Dominion.

By clause 61, the Queen had the discretionary powers to mobolize the militia in or out of Canada, in case of war, invasion or insurrection, without the assent of the government or parliament of Canada.

61. Her Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof for actual service, either within or without the Dominion, at any time, whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war invasion or insurrection or danger of any of them; and the militiamen, when so called out for actual service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required so to do for any longer period which Her Majesty may appoint.

Thus even at that time, the government's policy was not only to create a Canadian navy, but even to place the control of it in the discretionary power of the sovereign, acting on her own authority without the assent of the Canadian authorities.

It may be supposed that the causes for the postponement of Cartier's naval programme were both the absence of an immediate necessity and the meagreness of the public revenue. I might here multiply authorities and examples to maintain that Cartier's conception of 1868 was the true one: that is to say, that the navy is but the necessary complement of the military organization of any people, and that if, at that period, it was indispensable to provide for the country's defence by establishing a strong militia, the naval service was also to be included.

There is one page in the book of Mr. A. D. Decelles, 'Les Etats Unis,' which illustrates vividly the influence of sea power, over the destinies of nations. Although it may stir up painful recollections in the minds of my French Canadian colleagues, I cannot resist the temptation of quoting it. The writer refers to the last episode in that great drama played in America for the conquest of Canada by England. At the time referred to the army of Wolfe was within the walls of Quebec:

The chronicles of the time picture the anxiety of the English and the French in the springtime of 1760, after the second battle of the Plains of Abraham. The two enemies worn out by a long series of troubles, still saw the final issue undecided. They awaited the arrival of the fleet that was to either confirm the success of Wolfe's army, or to repair Montcalm's disaster and revive the hopes of de Lévis. As the first white sail appeared on the sky rim around the point of the island of Orleans, feverishly did their hearts beat and for a few moments there existed one of those agonizingly decisive moments in the history of a people. Finally the Union Jack spread its bright colours to the sky. A cheer of joy went up from Quebec, and deep bursts of grief from de Lévis' camp saluted that banner. England's maritime power had gained her the day, as, forty years later, she was to destroy the prospects of Bonaparte in the east, and to carry her might into every port in the world, while remaining herself, undislodgable behind her wooden walls.

In this connection, I wish also to mention that the United States, soon after the final recognition of their independence, adopted an aggressive policy of naval defence, and started to form the nucleus of a war fleet. In 1851, that war fleet was not very formidable, but it was the outcome of a systematic and well-planned policy in the direction of naval organization. In his speech delivered in Washington, on the 4th of July, 1851, on the occasion of the inauguration of an addition to the Capitol, Daniel Webster used the following language with respect to the navy:

The navy is the active and aggressive element of national defence, and let loose from our own sea coasts, must display its own powers on the seas and channels of the enemy. To do this, it need not be large and it can never be large enough to defend at home by its presence all our ports and harbours.

But in the absence of the navy, what can the regular army, the volunteer militia, do against the enemy's line of battleships and steamers falling without notice on our coast? What will guard our cities from tribute, our merchant vessels and our navy yards from conflagration? Here again we see a wise forecast in the system of defensive measures which, especially since the close of the war with Great Britain, has been steadily followed by the government.

It is also to be remembered, that after the war of independence, the population of the United States did not exceed three millions. It is exactly this wise forethought expressed by Daniel Webster in the case of the United States that inspired Cartier and his colleagues with a policy of military armament, which, in their minds, equally implied the organization of a naval service. In their eyes, the future of Canada appeared as brilliant as that of the American republic, and it was this clear view of the high destinies of our country that inspired them to give to her economic life and her general development those guarantees of independence and security which had been adopted by the great country to the south of us. It did not flash in their minds, that the protection offered by England could absolve them from participating in the defence of a territory so vast and so exposed to the enemy as in Canada, and, in accord with the public opinion of the day, they considered that the best and most effective way to secure the protection of the mother country was to contribute thereto within the limits of Canada's resources. Under like conditions, and thanks to them since that day, Canada has been able to move along the different stages of development and to reach the degree of progress and power that she now enjoys. If the happy results of Cartier's policy are now felt by us, it is, however, proper for us to inquire if the time has not come for the final execution of that policy. If so, such can be done only by the adoption of a naval programme in accord with the present conditions of the country. Thus I come to that part of my theme wherein I purpose briefly indicating how and why the government's naval programme is but the logical and opportune development of the traditional policy of our early statesmen in regard to matters of national defence.

The partisans of the status quo or of abstention from any naval programme, forget, or seem to forget, that on both sides, in the mother country and in Canada, affairs have spun along at a lively rate since 1868, and that in each country, changes have taken place that necessitate modifications in our defence policy. In Canada we are far removed from the point we occupied at confederation and at the original organization of our militia system. The great growth in population, the development of our national resources, the wonderful expansion of our trade and industries, the establishment of a comprehensive system of transportation, as well as the importance of our sea-ports, threaten to make Canada a serious rival in the economic field. After a long period of folding herself up, in order to take a grander bound forward, Canada is now spreading out and seeking other outlets for her trade and productions. The systematic attention of other nations, at the birth of this new competitor has gradually turned into a mistrust that she may soon become a rival.

In this new situation, growing rapidly more pronounced, Canada owes it to herself and to the mother country, which has watched over her progress and development as effectively as situations would permit, to protect not only the vital parts of her economic organization but also her trade and industries. Despite the ridiculous pretention that Canada has no foreign trade to protect, on the pretext that her merchantmen are registered at the British admiralty, those vessels are truly Canadian ships, carrying Canadian merchandise and having a right to our country's protection. Were Canada to become a sovereign nation, those ships would none the less remain attached to our ports and would continue to carry on every sea the products and wealth of this country. Under these conditions, is it not evident that the exigencies of national defence have considerably augmented, and if we do not, ourselves, subscribe to them, England must be asked or else the United States to do so for us. We have seen that it is impossible to count on American protection for it would be too costly and too inimical to our liberty of action, to the preservation of our territory and even to our independence.

Can the mother country effectively protect our interests?

Have we the right to ask it of her?

In this regard, I may be permitted to recall the fact that while the work of our national expansion has been going on in England, an evolution in the conditions surrounding naval defence has taken place. That evolution was not so much the result of the British will as it was the outcome of the conditions of European equilibrium. Since 1867, an entirely new situation has arisen in Europe. The Franco-Prussian war, the birth of the German empire, the formation of the triple alliance, the aggressive expansion of Germany have obliged the other European nations to modify their alliances and increase their armaments in an abnormal manner. To maintain her naval supremacy, and to be true to her alliances, England had, herself, to increase her outlay for naval defence. This state of things is certainly deplorable, contrary to the tendency of civilization and none regret and condemn it more than I do. But say or do what we may that situation is unavoidable, and we must submit to it with all the inconveniences it carries. There may be reason in the assertion that the defence of Canada has nothing to do with England's projects of armament. I believe, myself, that in her naval policy the mother country only obeys the influences that the present situation in Europe suggests. But we cannot say, in face of history, that the increased burden of defence is the effect of a wrong diplomacy. On the contrary, it is well known that England, spurred by the expansion of Germany's imperialism, has cleverly assured herself of such alliances and friendships as guarantee the peace of Europe. And for my part, as a French-Canadian, I rejoice in witnessing the realization between the land of my forefathers and England of that 'entente cordiale' which has produced and will produce again most excellent results for both countries and for the peace of the world.

Then, Sir, it so happens that as Canada feels the need of augmenting her means of self-protection, England, through the circumstances I have just related, is unable to offer us any additional guarantees of defence. In these circumstances is there aught more natural than that between the mother country and her first daughter an amicable understanding should take place, whereby the means most effective to secure a satisfactory solution for both countries may be obtained. If this need of understanding means imperialism, I have no hesitation in proclaiming myself an imperialist.

Imperialism, as it exists in this country, proceeds from two different sources. There is one kind of imperialism, which I may call sentimental, which is derived from that deep attachment which binds, heart and soul, all those Canadians who were born and brought up in England to their mother country. This love of their native land occupies in their sentiments a privileged place paramount to that devoted to Canada, their new country. They are Britishers first, Canadians afterwards. This sentiments leads them at times in all good faith and sincerity to sacrifice the interests of Canada to those of Great Britain. This is the imperialism of some of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have already spoken on this question. I respect their sentiments, but I must say that I cannot share them.

But there is another kind of imperialism based upon a reciprocity of interest as between England and Canada. This is the imperialism of those of our fellow-citizens who having been born and brought up in this country, are attached to their native land through one or more generations of their ancestors, and naturally give to Canada the first place in their hearts, without in any way forgetting their obligations to Great Britain, which has granted them their liberty, their self-government, and protects their interests and their national life. Such an imperialism is based upon a true conception of our position as a people and the future of our country, as well as upon the idea that the prosperity and greatness of the British empire chiefly depends upon the free development of its colonies and their voluntary co-operation in the work of mutual consolidation of commercial relations and means of defence. This imperialism is the one professed by the majority of the citizens of this country who think it is possible to conciliate their duties as Canadian citizens with their obligations as British subjects without any sacrifice of either. This imperialism is mine, and I ask my opponents to respect my convictions as well as I do their own. Need I say, Mr. Speaker, that the imperial conference of 1909 has been the outcome of this latter kind of imperialism.

The Conservative-Nationalist party in the province of Quebec imagined that in that conference they could see the fuse of a conspiracy hidden, threatening our political liberties. There are people who, craving the title of saviours of their race and their country, try to find ambushes and dangers everywhere—and in their mad desire, hesitate not to misrepresent facts, falsify language and impute to others the worst and most perfidious intentions. With the best motives in the world, no doubt, my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier poses as the leader of the adversaries of a Canadian navy, and assisted by some newspapers in the province of Quebec, he is trying to divert public attention from the real issues involved in this Bill.

Mr. MONK. What papers does my hon. friend allude to?

Mr. RIVET. I am alluding to that paper published in Montreal called the 'Devoir,' but which to my mind has not the least notion of the meaning of that word.

Mr. MONK. If it is to that paper my hon. friend alludes, I may tell him that I cordially subscribe to everything it has said upon this question.

Mr. RIVET. Well, if the views of that paper suit him, he is welcome to them. Now a careful and impartial perusal of the deliberations of that memorable conference of 1909 will suffice to convince us of the futility of the nationalist theory.

A careful and impartial perusal of the deliberations of that memorable conference, should suffice to convince us of the futility of the nationalist theory. For all men of good faith, the report of the conference attests the spirit of conciliation that presided at its deliberations and above all, the solicitude of England to respect the liberty of action of her self-governing colonies. Thus, while the British admiralty insists on the importance, from a strategical point of view, of a single fleet maintained by the different parts of the empire, she does not scruple to admit that such considerations must give way to the political and geographical conditions that obtain in each colony. This is admitting the priority of colonial defence over imperial defence. It is this principle recognized and in practice, at all times, in Canada, that our plenipotentiaries upheld. The principle being once established, the only thing remaining was to come to an understanding as to the modus operandi. This was no easy task. If our representatives in London could, without difficulty, have their policy accepted by the English admiralty, they had but slight illusions as to the reception they would meet with from certain elements in Canada. They had good reason to fear that programme of the 'just midway' would not easily obtain the support of the extreme groups that represent here the olden bureaucracy traditions, on the one hand, and the olden spirit of distrust in and hostility towards England, on the other. However, they could reasonably expect that the two great political parties swayed by a just conception of the interests and duties of the moment, would unite in common action without any consideration other than the accomplishment of a national enterprise. The occasion was most favourable for proof that the ancient prejudice had no voice in the national assembly, and that a moderate view, that of the vast majority of our citizens would prevail in the House. The Liberal party had to assume the duty of justifying in all respects the forecasts of its leader, and the unanimous support given from this side of the House is ample evidence of its success. Does this mean, Sir, that the Liberal party had not to undergo the influence of extreme ideas, at an equal distance from both of which the government had set up its naval programme? Not at all, but our party's merit lies in its triumph over such influence, in its courageous undertaking to have the electorate accept its views. After the patriotic declarations of the leader of the opposition at Halifax, on his return from London, the hope was then entertained throughout Canada that the same course might be adopted by the Conservative party. Unfortunately such a hope has been of short duration.

Notwithstanding the open and repeated declarations of its leader, that party soon began to resort to its favourite tactics. After having oscillated between the two poles of nationalism and imperialism, which alternately attracted it, impotent as it was, to overcome either the one or the other of these influences, it has ended by dividing itself in two irreconcilable groups which each in its own way strives to defeat the ministerial policy. And that, Sir, instead of adopting a course of moderate and loyal criticism of the details of the Bill, such as might have been expected of an opposition, worthy of its part, hon. gentlemen opposite have started a campaign of denunciation and vituperation, against the most eminent personalities of our party in the House. Even the right hon. Prime Minister, in spite of long and meritorious services in the cause of Canada and the British empire, could not be spared from invective and abuse, from that quarter. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) started the ball rolling, and the man who lives in a glass house, began to throw stones at others, aiming particularly at the right hon. leader of the government, whose unblemished record and political integrity is an unpardonable crime not to be condoned, or overlooked, on any occasion. The rank and file was not slow in following in his foot-steps, and since the unparalleled pronouncement, in point of personal abuse, delivered by the hon. member for North Toronto, we have had other utterances of the same character, the most remarkable of which, have been probably, the philippics of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan). What a contrast, Mr. Speaker, between those reckless deliverances and the dignified and public attitude followed on this side of the House? While we seek to maintain this debate, within the high sphere of reason and facts, most of the hon. gentlemen on your left, endeavour to obscure issues, by appealing to prejudice, to passion.

As a party man, I would feel rather inclined to rejoice over those tactics, for they prove too clearly the bad faith and administrative incapacity of the Conservative party, not to strengthen the confidence of the people of Canada in the Liberal administration

As a Canadian, anxious for the future of my country, I regret them sincerely. As a French Canadian, priding myself upon belonging to the nationality which clams the leader of the government as one of its own. I wish to enter my protest against the undeserved abuse to which he has been subjected since the opening of this debate. I wish also to state how keenly I resent the words uttered againet the men of my race, who fought and shed their blood in the cause of political liberty, and to whose sacrifices we owe in a large measure, the blessing of responsible government. I desire also to place on record, that notwithstanding anything which has been said, or hinted at, by some hon. gentlemen opposite, and notwithstanding the ill-advised attitude of some of my compatriots of Quebec, on the naval question, the Canadians of French origin are above those infamous suspicions of disloyalty thrown at them, and I say they are to-day just as loyal as they have been in the past, perhaps more loyal than those same hon. members who are asserting so loudly their attachment to England, but who might be found wanting should the test of loyalty involve any personal sacrifice of their own.

I do not purpose replying to those attacks of the leader of the opposition and the apostles of extreme imperialism. I will merely point them out to my fellow citizens of the province of Quebec as the best answer to the arguments of the Nationalists.

In fact, should the pretensions of the leader of the opposition and of his followers on this question prove to be well founded, the position taken by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and his allies, is quite untenable.

The Prime Minister cannot be found guilty of the crime of treason to British interests, and be convicted at the same time on the charge of disloyalty to his country. As a matter of fact, the right hon. Prime Minister is guilty of neither of these two accusations, both of which have been inspired by extreme party feeling, or personal jealousy, and which every one by whom they have been proffered knows to be false and unmerited. This cannot be otherwise, when to-day, all over the empire, there is only one voice to proclaim that the noble personality, as well as the whole career of the leader of the House, offer the most striking and conspicuous example of what loyalty, devotion and patriotism, combined with eloquence, statesmanship and integrity, have ever done for the building up of Canada and the maintenance of British institutions. Well can we recall, in this connection, the words of the French fable writer, Lafontaine:

> Le dieu poursuivant sa carrière,
> Répand ses torrents de lumière
> Sur ses obscurs blasphémateurs.

However, the indictment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier is too formal, to be ignored, and while his attack has been eloquently refuted, I feel that I must return to it again.

I desire, in the first place, to register here the hon. member's significant admission that the naval defence of Canadian soil is not, in itself, a new policy. I will quote his own words:

> The Bill in itself, outside of section 18, does not present to my mind any very striking feature; it is the extension of legislation, if I may use such an expression of legislation, which we had in a diminished form upon our statutes ever since the mother country called us to assume our proper share of the burden of defence. Therefore I think that one may say, with the exception I have just pointed out, this legislation is not in any way extraordinary.

While putting on record this statement of the hon. gentleman, I cannot help contrasting it with the statements which are made to-day in Quebec by the Nationalist allies of the hon. member who says that this naval defence policy, even applied to Canadian territory, is altogether a new one and should never have been originated without consulting the electorate upon this point. I shall not dwell on this difference of opinion between them, because after all it is of no importance in the settlement of this question.

Mr. MONK. Does my hon. friend approve of the decisions of the Colonial Defence Conference of 1909 to which our delegates adhered? Does he approve of these conclusions?

Mr. RIVET. I approve entirely the position taken by our Canadian delegates in London.

The hon. member, then, does not find it strange that one should be busy organizing, from a naval standpoint, the protection of Canadian territory. But he is opposed to our lifting a finger for the defence of the mother country—that step-mother, to whom we owe nothing whom we can do without, who, moreover, sacrificed our interests on all occasions and who persists, despite all that to drag us into the vortex of militarism. Our consent to help Great Britain, despite her unworthiness, seems to be the new policy which that honourable gentleman finds in clause 18, which reads as follows:

> In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal Navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

It is loudly asserted that this clause is not permissive, but imperative. I presume, that, when the Bill reaches the committee stage, we shall have ample opportunity to debate that point. Then, I suppose, we shall have the interesting spectacle of learned jurists, on the other side of the House, arguing one way or the other, some claiming that, unfortunately for England, that clause is too permissive, and some complaining that, unfortunately for Canada, it is too imperative. But I shall say to the honourable member for Jacques Cartier, were Great Britain as unworthy as he seems to think her, we should not bargain with her, when called upon to use the discretionary power embodied in clause 18, especially when it is considered that Canadian as well as British interests are at stake.

Mr. MONK. Does my hon. friend think the clause imperative or permissive?

Mr. GRAHAM. Which wing do you belong to?

Mr. RIVET. I belong to no wing, I belong to the Liberal party which is united in thinking and stating that the clause is permissive. It is not now a time for recrimination, nor to dig up our history to find causes of complaint against the mother country. 'Let the dead past bury its dead', as Longfellow puts it, and let us draw inspiration from the needs of the present and the requirements of the future. It is for us to know if, as long as Canada remains, is satisfied to remain part of the British empire, we should not feel interest in the maintenance of her power and prestige in the world.

As I said before, Great Britain's foreign policy is entirely pacific. Not only does she not seek quarrel for herself with any other nation, not even Germany, but all her diplomacy tends to preserve the peace of Europe, and it has been for this purpose that she has formed new alliances and friendships. And if I am asked for my reasons in believing in England's peaceful policy, I would say that apart from the anti-militarist ideas of the labouring classes to-day well represented in parliament, England has every interest in maintaining the statu quo, the disturbance of which must be of necessity detrimental to her. It is generally said that in Europe to-day there is only one power interested in a change, and that is Germany, which nation would not be adverse to an increase of her colonial possession and of her means of access to the sea. Hence it is that her ambitious and disturbing diplomacy meddles on all occasions with European affairs as was the case in Morocco and is a veritable menace to the peace of Europe. Great Britain, by her position, is the best qualified of all the powers to play the part of peacemaker, and her intervention in this way constantly expose her to attacks from countries less desirous than she is for peace. For my part, I have no belief in the German scare, at least for a time to come, for Germany, despite her projects for expansion, will never start a struggle until sure of success, as was the case of the Franco-Prussian war. But we may rely that the day of that struggle will be all the further away, according as England takes a more determined stand and organizes more completely her defence. But Great Britain is not only a country for peace, but she is essentially, as she has always been, the land of liberty and the refuge for the oppressed of all nations. In this regard, I feel indignant that, in Canada, there may be found at present, men who are heartless enough to disparage the flag that protects that justice and that security which were denied them in their own country. I have, therefore, confidence that in the interests of humanity and of civilization, Great Britain will retain her power and prestige. But if it were otherwise, and war were to come hurridly, just imagine the consequences to Canada of England's loss of maritime power. If the dream of certain nations of locking up John Bull in his island and breaking his colonial empire, were realized, the end of our statu quo in Canada would come, and with it the premature option of selecting between independence and annexation, with all the inconveniences and obligations that either case would impose. Therefore Canada's interest demands that we assist in maintaining British supremacy on the seas, as long as that help would not menace our own liberty of action, or the autonomy of our country.

Our opponents are mistaken if they think this a new policy. I have shown that in 1868 the Canadian government, according to the declarations reiterated by her ministers in England and in Canada, by her Militia Bill, had placed our land and sea militia entirely at the disposal of the Sovereign, independent of the Canadian parliament, to be mobilized in Canada or elsewhere without any restriction as to the extent or duration of the service. We can see that there is a distance between this absolute abandonment of our system of defence and a conditional co-operation, subject to the sanction of parliament, as is provided for in clause 19 that reads thus:

> Whenever the Governor in Council places the naval service or any part thereof on active service, as provided in the preceding section, if parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall issue for a meeting of parliament within fifteen days, and parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

But it is claimed that this guarantee of parliamentary sanction is purely illusory, because in the first place when the representatives of the nation are called together, the vessels will be gone and possibly destroyed in some battle.

Firstly, I submit, that in a like case the Governor in Council should only act with a knowledge of the need and under the pressure of public opinion, as was the case in the instance of the Boer war. We cannot conceive any government being sufficiently careless of public interest and of its own existence, to order the sending out of the Canadian fleet in defence of a manifestly unjust cause or one repugnant to the people. Thus the sanction of parliament would be quite natural and none could complain about it. But were the order in council to be rejected by the legislators, it would be too late to prevent the irreparable, only in the case of a naval engagement taking place near our shores, to defend our coasts or seaports. Then it would be unfair to reproach the ministry with having had more foresight than parliament itself, and with having in time placed the safest shield between the enemy and our territory.

It is urged that no dependence can be naval fleet the government is actuated by parliament ruled by an ignorant and servile majority. This pretention is a miserable calumny that hits not only the members of parliament referred to, but also the electorate of Canada. To judge so harshly of our national representatives one must have a poor idea of the political sense and intelligence of a people incompetent to make better selections; and I am confident that public opinion will reject such a vile accusation. On the other hand, if parliamentary sanction be really effective, if Canada is free to dispose of her fleet as she deems proper, how can our country be fatally bound up in the foreign policy of the empire or engulfed in the vortex of militarism? Logical minds could scarcely conceive it.

Had I the time, or were it worth the time, I would take up the criticisms of the Nationalist faction regarding the type of vessels to be constructed. In reply to the statement that the sole purpose of the navy is to be used in the wars of empire, I would refer to the opinion of the leader of the opposition. He said 'That the ministerial programme extricates itself from the exigencies of the British admiralty, and that the Canadian vessels will have no utility other than for the protection of our coasts and our fisheries.'

I do not purpose to add any contribution to the controversy which has arisen over the class of vessels which will be constructed under the government policy. It is admitted, on all sides, that the only difference between the programme adopted by the government and the one at first suggested by the admiralty, and insisted upon by some of the hon. gentlemen opposite, is the building of a Dreadnought which would, according to their contention, complete the fleet unit, which they consider so desirable. In this connection, I wish simply to remind this House that the Dreadnought type is one of a transitory nature, which may be obsolete in a few years from now, when the construction of the other vessels provided for in the ministerial programme will be completed, while the class of ships adopted by the government is one of a permanent character calculated to make our fleet capable to be utilized at any time in the future, both for the defence of our coasts or our seaports, and as a part of the British fleet. The mere fact that our programme of construction has been adhered to by the British admiralty ought to silence the opposition of those of our friends opposite who seem to be anxious to be more loyal than the King himself. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the more I look at the naval policy of the government as a matter of principle, or in its application, I am forced to the conclusion that it is wise in every respect, and ought to commend itself to the Canadian people.

I will, therefore, vote for the Bill for the following reasons:

1st. Because it is based on Canada's traditional policy of providing for her own defence.

2nd. Because the establishment of a Canadian naval service is but the opportune crowning, foreseen by the fathers of confederation, of our system of national defence.

3rd. Because in the establishment of that naval fleet the government is actuated by those principles of autonomy that have ever guided our national life.

4th. Because the autonomy of our country is sufficiently guaranteed by clauses 18 and 19 of the Bill.

5th. Because the mobilizing, under sanction of parliament and for the benefit of the empire, of our Canadian navy is not incompatible with Canada's autonomy, but is merely the execution of a duty of assistance always recognized and fulfilled by our country.

6th. Because the maintaining of Great Britain's maritime power is one of the best safe-guards of our development and security.

7th. Because Canada's independence, or annexation to the United States, advocated as a possible alternative, to maintain the status quo as regards naval defence, instead of lessening, would considerably increase the obligations and sacrifices, thereby sought to be avoided.

I will vote against the Borden amendment—

1st. Because that amendment is the negation of all the principles of responsible government, especially that which is most dear to the English people, 'No taxation without representation.'

2nd. Because the gift of 25 millions, or the sending of the Dreadnoughts to England, is only a temporary expedient and a costly one that in no way solves definitely our relations with the mother country on the question of naval defence.

3rd. Because that amendment conducts straight to military imperialism and the loss of our autonomy.

I will vote against the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).

1st. Because the establishment of a Canadian navy is not a new policy, but simply the carrying out of a tacit and general mandate conferred, in all time by the people upon their representatives in parliament, to provide for the defence of the territory.

2nd. Because since the imperial conference of 1902 the Canadian people have been enabled to give their opinion as to the opportunity to adopt a programme of naval defence.

3rd. Because both constitutionally and legally this parliament has the right and the duty to discuss and settle that important question without consulting the electorate.

Before closing, I desire to state how deeply I deplore the course taken by a certain section of the press and certain individuals in the province of Quebec against this Bill. Daily we find that to all means they have recourse to falsify facts and misrepresent the situation in the eyes of their fellow citizens and to poison public opinion. We learn that influential citizens in all classes, who should be inspired otherwise by their education, their character and their mission labour to turn the people against Great Britain, against the government and to instil disloyalty and forgetfulness of our duties as Canadian and British subjects.

It has been recalled to our minds, that there has been a time in our history, when the voice of the French Canadian clergy, and that of our leading classes, united to maintain British domination on this continent, and to safeguard at the same time the future of the French nationality and that of our country. Is it to be said, that times have changed, and that history cannot repeat itself, when the same principles then fought for, are still at stake in the present measure? Will not to-day the same united effort contribute to enlighten public opinion as to the duties and responsibilities not distinct or separate from those of other sections of the Canadian people, which are incumbent upon the province from which I have the honour to hail, and which in loyalty and devotion to the mother country has never stood behind the other provinces of the Dominion? This is my hope and sincere belief when I consider the marked reaction which is manifesting itself in every part of my province in favour of the present legislation. For my part, I can only repeat in this House what I have already stated elsewhere in regard to the position which my fellow compatriots of Quebec are in duty bound to take upon this question. As a French Canadian, as a son of the men who on two memorable occasions contributed effectively in upholding the British flag in Canada, and being thoroughly convinced that the course then followed was the right and proper one, I claim that the same motives which actuated my fore-father in 1876 and 1812, ought to dictate to their descendants their full and hearty concurrence with the present policy, and that any policy of isolation on their part would eventually lead to race suicide. May the voices of the great departed leaders of French nationality, on this continent, speak as clearly to-day to my compatriots as they spoke in their own time, and teach them counsels of wisdom and patriotism.

It has been hinted, if not openly declared, that the Conservative party in its present hopeless state of division and discord, would go so far as to frame its policies and programmes upon a basis excluding from all participation in the government of Canada my native province, the province of Quebec. If such is the design of the Tory party it is not the policy of the Liberal party, which on every question of national importance has always stood one and indivisible, and which upon this question is ready to stand or fall. But, as the hon. Prime Minister has said: 'Fall, we shall not'.

We shall stand, in order to complete the grand task of governing this country according to its best traditions, and to establish the fabric of its nationhood upon the permanent foundation of unity, harmony and progress.

We shall stand, in order to show the mother country, and the whole world, that Canada is still quite capable of solving the problems of self-government, however intricate they may be, which present themselves in the course of her national life.

We shall stand, to give evidence that in this great country of ours, prejudice and passion are bound to be overcome by the combined efforts of moderate counsels and patriotic wisdom, and that once for all the Canadian people want to be governed not from a standpoint of sectionalism or sectarianism, but from the higher and nobler standpoint of national interest.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). Before I take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, might I ask a favour of the hon. Finance Minister who, I presume, is leading the House to-night? During this debate the House has extended to several hon. members the courtesy of adjourning at an early hour, about half past ten, and invariably to members on the Liberal side. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to grant that courtesy to-night on this side?

Mr. FIELDING. I think several instances have occurred in which the House adjourned at the request of hon. members at an earlier hour than it otherwise would have. There ought not to be any discrimination in that respect in favour of either side, but if we are to get to the end of this debate, within reasonable delay, we should hardly adjourn at so early an hour. I should prefer that the House should sit a little later, but I quite agree that there ought to be no discrimination.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) adjourned the debate last night at about twenty minutes to eleven, and some nights previous the Minister of Militia adjourned it at quite an early hour. Once or twice in addition, I think, the request to adjourn came from that side of the House and was acceded to.

Mr. FIELDING. I have no objection that the hon. gentleman should speak for a while and then adjourn the debate.

Mr. EDWARDS. I have listened with a great deal of attention and interest to the speech of the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Rivet), and I cannot say that it differed very materially from many we have heard on that side, except possibly that it was a little more academic than some of them. His argument, however, was on pretty much the same lines and inspired with very much the same laudation of the right hon. gentleman the Prime Minister. I do not propose to take up the different points which the hon. gentleman made in his address ad seriatim, but I shall, in the course of my remarks, refer to them from time to time.

I feel that I am under a threefold obligation to take part in this debate, however imperfectly I may discharge that duty. I am under an obligation to the county of Frontenac, which I have the honour to represent, I am under an obligation to the Dominion of Canada, whose destiny is in the hands of this parliament; and also to His Gracious Majesty Edward VII, my King, and the right hon. gentleman's suzerain. This question is, in my opinion, too great a question to be viewed from a party or partisan standpoint alone. It is imperial and international in its scope and bearing, and any attempt to settle it as a purely Canadian business proposition must end in more or less failure. We are dealing with a matter pregnant with responsibility for every member of this House, a matter of the greatest importance to the future of Canada, England, and the British empire. I regret, and I believe that my regret is shared by every member of this House and by the majority of the people of Canada, that the Prime Minister should have seen fit to start this debate along partisan lines. And not only that, but it is, in my opinion, more regrettable still that he should have seen fit to entirely ignore the spirit and intention of the resolution which was unanimously passed by this House last March. Sir, I feel that it is my duty to protest, and protest strongly, against the adoption of the policy proposed by the right hon. gentleman to this House, because I feel that if that policy is carried into effect, it will not only retard the development of this young country, but it will shackle the people of Canada like bond-slaves for generations to come. Now, let us start at the beginning of this matter—and I agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) last night that the beginning of this matter was really the resolution introduced by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) last March, a resolution which referred solely to Canada's assuming a proper share of the responsibilities and financial burdens incident to the protection of her coast line and seaports. On that occasion, the Prime Minister expressed his surprise that any person in this House should think for a moment that Canada had been remiss in her duty in that regard. And what reasons did the right hon. gentleman give? He said: Canada has no quarrel with any one; Canada does not desire extension of her territory; Canada occupies an isolated position and has only one neighbour, with whom she has been at peace for nearly a hundred years. These were the reasons advanced by the right hon. Prime Minister last session. I would ask: If these reasons applied then, if Canada had done and was still doing all that she ought to do in regard to the protection of her coast line and seaports, what has happened since to make it necessary to introduce this policy, involving an expenditure of from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 during the next four or five years and untold millions in years to come, without giving the people of Canada an opportunity to express their opinion on the matter? Has Canada any quarrel at the present time, real or apprehended? Has Canada's position changed? Does Canada now desire territorial expension? Are Canada's relations with the United States less cordial than they were? Last March, the hon. member for North Toronto, near the conclusion of his address, told the Prime Minister that, if the government saw fit to meet the emergency by contributing Dreadnoughts, or money, they would receive the support of the opposition. There was no attempt on the part of the hon. member for North Toronto on that occasion, by that suggestion, to create a political issue; but there was a very evident desire on his part to avoid anything like a political issue, and to lift this matter above the plane of party politics, and have it considered on broad and statesmanlike lines. However, that did not seem to appeal to the Prime Minister at that time, and he himself introduced a resolution which was very different from the resolution finally adopted unanimously by this House. Let me call your attention to one or two points in that resolution introduced by the Prime Minister. Take the second clause: It declared against the payment of any stated contribution. The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) criticised it and said:

> It tells Great Britain and the world what we are not prepared to do when it seems to me that this is an occasion when we should declare to all men what we are prepared to do.

He said further:

> It seems to me that this is a little inconsistent with the last paragraph of the resolution. The day might come.....when the only thing that we could do in the absence of preparation in this country would be to make some kind of contribution.

Well, Sir, the clause introduced by the Prime Minister was changed to read 'regular and periodical contributions'. Now, I submit to the judgment of this House and to any hon. member who is disposed to look at this matter fairly, that the Prime Minister, when he agreed to that change in that clause, thereby distinctly and explicitly agreed to the principle of making a contribution. And yet, his supporters at the present time denounce the principle of making a contribution as endangering our autonomy. Another paragraph of the resolution introduced by the right hon. gentleman paraded the fact that Canada had relieved the British tax-payer by taking over Halifax and Esquimalt. That clause was struck out also on the suggestion of the leader of the opposition as being trifling and undignified, especially trifling and undignified in view of the magnanimity displayed by the first Lord of the Admiralty, who declared that whether Canada contributed or did not contribute anything to the support of the British navy, England would deem it her duty to spend her last dollar and put forward her last man in defending every portion of the empire including Canada. Well, Sir, that portion of the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister was struck out, as I have said, on the suggestion of the leader of the opposition. In paragraph 4 of the resolution introduced by the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition asked for the insertion of some word which would indicate our intention to act promptly. He pointed out to the House that the Prime Minister at the imperial conference in 1902, had stated that Canada intended to do something along naval lines at an early day, and he called attention to the fact that seven years had passed without any move being made to implement that promise. On the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, the word 'speedy' was introduced into that clause, ahead of the word 'organization'. The premier thereby again, I contend, tacitly admitted an emergency by agreeing to the necessity for haste. Well, Sir, the resolution as finally adopted by this House did not contain very much in common with the resolution proposed by the Prime Miniseter so far as vital principles were concerned. But that did not prevent, and has not prevented, the right hon. gentleman from assuming the full credit for having introduced the resolution which was more the resolution of the leader of the opposition than it was that of the leader of the government.

Now, I propose for a few minutes to consider the resolution of last March. The first clause of that resolution reads as follows:

> This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that clause is not controversial, and I think it may be taken as representing the opinion of the vast majority of the people of Canada. The second clause of the resolution reads:

> The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

Now, Sir, on this side of the House we are just as strongly against regular and periodical contributions as we were last March, and for the same reason, I presume, that hon. gentlemen opposite are against regular and periodical contributions. We regard regular and periodical contributions as partaking more of the nature of tribute or taxation than of voluntary gifts, and that is the reason, I believe, that inspired the introduction of those words by the premier and the leader of the opposition. But that clause is not merely a negative clause. That clause states two things: In the first place, that this House was against the principle of regular and periodical contributions, and moreover, and just as positively, that this House was not prepared last March to say that it would not under any circumstances make any contribution to the mother country. I contend that the use of these words 'regular and periodical' imply clearly that this House was prepared to make a contribution to the imperial navy in case of necessity. Next, the third clause says:

This House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.

Does that clause say anything about a Canadian navy built in Canadian shipyards? Does it suggest anything about a naval college? I contend that I have just as much right to take the view that a naval service means training ships on which we could train Canadians who would subsequently take their place on battleships, if you like, built in Great Britain, as another hon. gentleman has to take the view that naval service must mean, and can only mean, the building of Canadian war vessels in Canadian shipyards. There is nothing definite about the nature of the naval service. But while that clause is not definite, as to what our naval service shall be, it is very definite in other respects. That clause does call definitely for a speedy organization. Is that condition met by this Bill? According to the admission of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Militia and Defence, this Bill will put the date of this service at least five years in the future. It also calls for co-operation. Is that possible under this Bill? I contend it is not possible. It also calls for close relation to the imperial navy. Is that possible under the Bill proposed by the government, or is it intended by the Bill? The government policy, Mr. Speaker, is nothing more nor less than a gross violation of the principles laid down in the resolution of last March. Is it not the rankest hypocrisy to call for a speedy organization of a naval service and while expressing our full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce and safety of the empire, and peace of the world, and yet permit the commerce of the empire and the world's peace to rest on the unaided sea-power of Great Britain, while we waste millions of money and years of time in building that which will be of no use whatever to protect our commerce or to ensure the peace of the world? Now there is one other clause in that resolution to which I call attention, the fourth clause:

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the empire.

What was the purpose and meaning of that clause, if not a plain and unequivocal intimation to the world that Canada was ready to back up the motherland in her hour of need? No mention of the consent of parliament there; no talk of the Governor in Council in that; no appeal to visionary ghosts of autonomy or of taxation without representation; no treacherous use of the word 'may.' Sir, that clause, if re-written in accordance with the policy of this government, should read:

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises, the government of Canada will be found still looking to Great Britain for protection, and working overtime to provide a new and promising field of graft for the party heelers by building a useless tin pot fleet, and while the men of England, Ireland and Scotland and Wales and the other over-seas dominions are fighting to retain Britain's naval supremacy, this government will be found ready and willing to give to the imperial authorities tangible evidence of its separatist tendencies, to dismember the empire and besmirch its honour by calling parliament together to decide whether its borrowed admiral will take our fleet of tubs to Great Britain to be protected by a New Zealand Dreadnought, or engage it in codfishing off the banks of Newfoundland.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that the suggestion of the Minister of Finance was a very proper one, and as I have gone a little beyond the hour he mentioned, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the debate go on to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. We will continue the debate.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY—CLASSIFICATION OF MATERIAL.

Mr. GEOFFRION moved that the third report of the special committee appointed to investigate the Lumsden charges be concurred in.

Mr. H. LENNOX (South Simcoe). This report asks that leave be granted the committee to employ counsel for the purpose of assisting them in the investigation of matters referred to them. The question of employing counsel is a very important one, and I propose to offer a few remarks regarding the advisability of adopting this report. We have had in discussion in the committee the question of counsel. Yesterday, Mr. Smith, of Montreal, appeared before the committee as counsel for the commission. The matter to be investigated arises out of statements made by Mr. Lumsden in his letter of resignation. Mr. Lumsden in that letter said that the classifications on the road had not been in accordance with his instructions, and that in effect they were so erroneous that it was quite clear his instructions had been entirely ignored by a certain section of the engineering staff. That statement necessarily reflects upon the manner in which the road is being constructed. The commission appointed by the government is responsible to see that not only competent but thoroughly honest engineers are employed; and prima facie if the engineers have not satisfactorily carried out the work, the commission is to blame. The commission would be in a very deplorable position if it should turn out that, with its connivance, the engineering staff had deliberately conspired to defraud the public, but it would still be in an unfortunate position if the fault was due simply to incompetency or carelessness on the part of the staff. The charge, therefore, of Mr. Lumsden, is necessarily a charge against the commission, and it is important to it that it should clear its skirts by showing that there has been nothing wrong at all. On the other hand, it is in the public interest that this matter should be thoroughly probed; and if any wrong-doing has taken place, that it should be exposed and put a stop to, and that those responsible should be made known. The commission has appointed as counsel, Mr. Smith, to represent it. The commission is appointed by the government and is responsible for its engineers just as the government is responsible for the commission.

So the government are responsible for the acts of these engineers who are now charged with wrong-doing in the letter of resignation of Mr. Lumsden. Therefore we have this effect that we have counsel representing the one side and the one side only. It has been suggested that as Mr. Lumsden does not desire counsel, that is therefore an end of the matter. After discussion upon that matter the committee has come to the conclusion that it will be necessary to have counsel. That counsel is to be a counsel, as I understand it, representing the public and the public alone. Therefore I want to have an understanding before this matter goes any further whether this is, bona fide, a movement on behalf of the people to have a counsel appointed to represent them or whether it is not merely a colourable movement for the purpose of adding another counsel who will fortify the ranks of the commission and in that way the ranks of the government. What is the position now? We have a committee of judges, seven of them, of whom four are the appointees of the government, men in sympathy with the government and with the government alone, interested, as far as politics are concerned, to try and come to the conclusion that this matter has been all moonshine, that there is nothing in it. Now we have the majority of the judges who are to try the government supporters of the government, we have the commission in close alliance with the government employing a counsel at the public expense of course, and without consulting the minority of the committee, and we have a well organized staff, as far as political warfare is concerned in the personnel of the commission and we have all the staff of engineers, who are interested in showing that there is nothing wrong and as against that we have only three members of the opposition to watch that whole matter and try in the interests of the public to elicit the real facts of the case. I therefore, feel that this is only another gold brick added to what we had when this matter was inaugurated a little while ago. If we are not to have a clear and definite understanding that, as has been done on former occasions, the minority of the committee, the persons who are interested in bringing home these charges, the Conservative members of the committee if you like, shall have the selection of the counsel who shall represent the public on this occasion. I have no use for it and no faith in it. I want to make no bones about the matter at all, I want to say that when I make this statement I am not assuming, as I might be quite justified in assuming, that the majority of the committee will force upon the minority. A counsel in in whom the minority have not confidence, but I claim as a distinct right and by reason of precedents which have occurred before as well as upon principle, that the minority necessarily in this case represents the public and the public interests and that the selection should be left absolutely in their hands. Although I might have confidence in this committee, that the majority when we meet would accord to the minority what is manifestly their right and what is manifestly only consistent with fair play, yet as having a public duty to discharge, I do not feel that I would be right in taking any risks in this matter because we know that risks can be taken in a matter of this kind. Therefore, to put the matter beyond any question, I shall take the responsibility of asking that the responsibility for this shall be placed where it ought to be placed, on the government; I shall ask that the government will intimate at this stage, in order that I shall not have to press this matter to extremities, that the preference of the minority of the committee shall be acceded to and in order that the government may have an opportunity of taking a definite position in this matter, and without referring to cases which have been before parliament on previous occasions and which have been dealt with in the committees, I shall move to amend the motion by adding thereto the following words:

It is further ordered that the members of the opposition upon the said committee shall have the right to select the counsel so to be appointed, and that such counsel shall be instructed to protect the interests of the people of Canada in the said investigation.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. As a member of the committee that was appointed to investigate the charges in question I am very much surprised indeed at the amendment which has been proposed by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). The report which has been presented to the House is one which was adopted to-day by the committee unanimously. It was not suggested then by my hon. friend that there should be any amendment to the report. The motion was made, the committee was not even divided upon it and by the unanimous voice of that committee the report was made which was presented to the House to-day and which the House has been asked to concur in by the motion of the chairman of the committee. It seems to me that it is a reflection on the committee, a suggestion that they are not competent to appoint counsel who are entitled to the confidence of the public in dealing with this matter. It is a rather singular reversal of the usual order of things that a minority should govern instead of a majority. If the majority of that committee is not entitled to the confidence of the community, to the confidence of this House, I would submit to my hon. friend that his motion ought to be to substitute others for the majority of the committee instead of reversing the established order of things, that the majority shall rule.

Mr. BARKER. The motion made in the committee that an application should be made to the House for authority to appoint counsel to represent the public was declared to be, so far as it went, satisfactory, and so it was. It was in that sense that we accepted it. It would not have been proper to begin the discussion of who the counsel should be, or exactly how he should be appointed by the committee, until we had got permission from this House to make an appointment. I am surprised at the hon. gentleman making an objection of this kind. One would imagine he thought that the minority of that committee would be quite safe in allowing this appointment to go to the vote of the committee as a whole, trusting that the majority would accept our suggestion. Anybody who has been present at the committee so far knows that the hon. gentleman who has made this motion (Mr. Lennox), is strictly within his rights, and is only acting with common prudence. If the hon. gentleman who has just spoken felt that the suggestion made was a reasonable one, all he would have to do was to say: We concede that much to the minority, we regret that they did not ask for it before. The hon. gentleman has not yet given the slightest intimation of his own opinion as to whether or not we ought to nominate that counsel. What are the facts? The committee met and they notified the commission to appear befor them, as well as Mr. Lumsden. The commission appeared there at once by counsel, a very eminent counsel of Montreal, paid out of the public purse. He is the counsel of the commissioners, and if anybody is charged, or if there is anybody to whom misconduct has been imputed, it is the commission. They, through engineers appointed by themselves, are charged with misconduct of so grave a character that the Prime Minister was compelled to move for a committee upon it. What does this gentleman tell us. He rises and says: I represent the public, we are going to investigate these grave charges reflecting upon the commission, and I, their counsel, am going to act for the public in the investigation. Could anything be more ridiculous, more monstrous as a matter of public interest. The gentleman said to the committee that the instructions of the Commission were to probe this matter to the bottom, and he would do his duty! We have, in days gone by, heard counsel employed, apparently on behalf of the public, make such assertions and we know what was the result, we know that the inquiry, instead of being probed to the bottom, was stifled, and while I do not for a moment impute any thing against the character or probity of Mr. Smith, I do say it is a ridiculous thing to think that in an investigation of this character involving the reputation of the government who appointed this commission, and of the commission who appointed the engineers charged with misconduct, involving all their positions, that the Commission should appoint counsel to act for the public, and that the majority of a committee named by the government should appoint ing counsel on the other side. I am talking to men of knowledge, business men and politicians who sit on both sides of this House. I ask them if they seriously think that a counsel appointed by the majority of that political committee, politicians on both sides, four on one side and three on the other, will be a counsel who will probe to the bottom questions involving the reputation of the government?

I am surprised that the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. A. H. Clarke) would stand up in his place and for a moment give colour to such a pretense as that the majority on the committee have any right to make such an appointment. The hon. gentleman knows that we have questions of this kind again and again in committees, and that there is as straight a party vote as there would be in this House. We have on this committee—three on one side and three on the other, the chairman's casting vote deciding the question. It is a foregone conclusion when we go to a vote how it will result, and we must either agree to the proposition made or there will be a vote and the vote is sure to go against us. Why do these gentlemen object? Is it a matter of courtesy or ceremony, that we have not been sufficiently ceremonious to these gentlemen in asking them to let us appoint counsel? We ask here in the House that we, as the minority who are concerned in probing this thing, and are determined to probe it to the bottom, shall name the counsel who shall prosecute the investigation, and that we shall not have appointed another counsel, like Mr. Smith, who acts only for the commission. We do not doubt that an able man would be appointed by the majority, but we would like to know that the man had his heart in the work as well as his head. We want this thing probed no matter what the consequences may be, no matter who may suffer. We have made no charge. This committee was moved not by this side of the House, but by the Prime Minister. Surely he did not mean to go through a farce in moving for this investigation to be not content with a majority of the committee, but must also appoint all the counsel. Through the commission they have appointed Mr. Smith, K.C., and the majority of the committee wish to appoint Mr. Brown or some one else, and we will be told: Oh, you agreed that counsel should be appointed, you have counsel, this is a thorough investigation and the public is represented. I would have expected the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. A. H. Clarke) to be the first man to stand up and say: We will hear counsel, we will let you nominate them because you are the attacking parties in this committee. Does any one doubt that the majority of that committee are on the defensive? Are they not anxious, by every means in their power, to find a verdict of 'not guilty' as against the commission and against the engineers? Every man on both sides of the House knows that is the fact.

I do not wish to occupy another moment of the time of the House on this question. I say that hon. gentlemen on the other side who refuse this reasonable proposition, that we who are the investigators in fact should have the nomination of the counsel who is to conduct the investigation, are supporting the government in an evasion of the inquiry.

House divided on amendment, Mr. Lennox.

WOOD FOR FUEL IN TOWNSHIP 50, RANGE 27.

Mr. LAKE:

1. Has the Minister of the Interior received a petition from the residents of township 50, range 27, W. 2nd M., relative to the difficulty of getting dry wood for fuel, etc., and asking for permission to obtain it from timber berth No. 876? If so, what assistance is he able to give them?

2. Are permits to cut wood being granted to these settlers on any government land? If so, where and to what extent?

3. Is the minister aware that on several sections comprised in timber berth No. 876 there is said to be not sufficient timber to make them commercially valuable? If so, will he take steps to withdraw them from the berth and throw them open for settlement? If not, will he cause inquiries to be made?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER:

1. Yes. Berth 876 was acquired at public competition, and the department is not in a position to issue settlers' permits thereon.

2. Permits to cut wood for fuel are issued by the local Crown timber agents, without reference to the department, and the department, therefore, cannot state, without communicating with the agent, whether or not permits are being granted to these settlers on vacant Dominion lands.

3. This statement was made in a communication recently received at the department. An inspection has been ordered, and if it is found that any of the lands do not contain merchantable timber to such an extent as to make them commercially valuable, they will be withdrawn from the berth.

4. Has any rule or regulation for the admission of rifles for competition in the various national or other contests at Bisley been recently adopted by the National Rifle Association?

5. If so, what was the nature of the resolution and when was it adopted?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. This is a matter which pertains exclusively to the Dominion Rifle Association, and will, I have no doubt, be dealt with satisfactorily by the executive council of that association.

BOUNTIES ON IRON AND STEEL.

Mr. BOYCE. Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to ask the government if it is the intention this session to introduce any legislation with a view to a renewal of the bounties on iron and steel?

Mr. FIELDING. At the present moment, we have no such intention. I am not prepared to make any statement more than that.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95), respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). When the House adjourned yesterday, I was considering the resolution unanimously passed by this House last March. If you examine carefully each clause of that resolution, you will find that the position taken to-day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) is absolutely consistent with every one of those clauses. The amendment moved by the leader of the opposition does call for speedy organization, for co-operation, for close relations with the British navy and for active participation. I also contend that the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has gone back on every principle embodied in that resolution. Sir, the Bill before us is not a policy of speedy organization, but one of delay; it is not a policy of co-operation, but one which makes co-operation absolutely impossible; it is not a policy of naval service in close relation with the British navy, but a policy designed to keep our fleet of vessels separate from the British navy; it is not a policy of active participation, but one of useless inactivity; it is not a policy to render our commerce and the empire more secure, but a policy of graft and ingratitude, a policy to breed another flock of political vultures to add to those that have followed in the wake of this government since 1896 and have grown fat on what they have stolen from the people of Canada. This is not an imperial policy; it is not a Canadian policy, but it is, in my estimation, a policy of rank and brazen hypocrisy which waves the British flag before the eyes of the Canadian people as the talisman of liberty and plots the disintegration of the empire behind its protecting folds. Never in the history of the British empire has any statesman occupied so pitiable a position of weakness and vaccillation as that now occupied by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads this House. It is difficult to follow the right hon. gentleman in his political gymnastics on any great question, but, on this question, I contend he has well earned the title of champion political lightning change artist of the continent of America.

What has been his course? Speaking in this House last March, the right hon. gentleman gave pledges of sympathy and loyal support. Last November, he said that not a ship should go without the consent of parliament. Last December he modified that somewhat by saying that we might help if England were severely pressed. Early this month, he said that if England is at war, Canada is at war. And later in the present month he modified that again by saying that he meant that when England was at war Canada was at war, inasmuch as Canada formed part of the empire and was liable to attack when England was at war, but he did not mean that Canada was necessarily involved in taking part in all England's wars. I was somewhat amused, the other evening, at the effort of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) to reconcile the positive and negative statements of his leader. Any such evolutions and contortions as the hon. member went through in order to reconcile the two positions of his leader would give a snake lumbago. On this great question, involving the future destiny of Canada and the empire, we see the premier of this country suspended in mid air, like Mahomet's spirit between heaven and hell and fit for neither place, wobbling about like a Chinese kite answering to the sentiments of whatever popular audience he happens to be addressing—one day uttering sentiments for the ears of British Canadians, and furnishing headlines for such papers as the Toronto 'Globe,' the next day uttering sentiments for those French Canadians whom he has carefully schooled to look in the direction of his highest aspirations. Sir, the right hon. gentleman has become an expert in the manipulation of the English language. The people of Canada have become somewhat accustomed to the right hon. gentleman's lingual inconsistencies; but on this great question I think the people of Canada would like from the premier of this country, definite, clear-cut and unequivocal statements. The right hon. gentleman, speaking a few days ago, and referring to the conquest of Canada by Wolfe in 1759, made use of these words:

> My ancestors lost on that occasion, but it simply transferred their allegiance from one sovereign to another. They lost the battle, but they did not lose their independence, their liberty, their rights and privileges; and to-day the sun in his daily career does not shed his light upon any people on the face of the earth enjoying more liberty than my fellow countrymen of French extraction. And my last words to the doubters is that freedom is worth fighting for and worth dying for.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that these words are true. And yet, Sir, time and again it has been impressed upon us in this House that there is an anti-imperial sentiment in the province of Quebec which has to be reckoned with when any great political question comes before this House and country. There is no getting around this, and there is no use in mincing words in dealing with it. We have heard it stated in this House within the last few days that if one should undertake to criticise an estimate for a wharf or a post office in the province of Quebec he is liable to be misrepresented in that province as being antagonistic to the French Canadian people. We know that, time and again, we have been cautioned to be very careful how we considered any question on which the people of Lower Canada have an opinion which differs from ours. In the consideration of the French treaty it was almost as much as a man's position was worth to express an adverse criticism, no matter how honestly he might hold that view, for fear of being misrepresented as an Anglo-Saxon bigot. In the case of the hanging of Louis Riel, who was judged to be a traitor, it was represented as due to his French origin. In the matter of dealing with the Manitoba school question, the people of this country were given to understand by one leader that Manitoba must submit to the will of Quebec, while the other leader took advantage of the position to gain power in order that he might use that power to coerce the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and, subsequently as has been made apparent to everybody in this country, has given Manitoba to understand that she must remain the 'postage stamp province' until she is willing to bend the knee to the will of Quebec. While we recognize the fact that there are people in this Dominion of French origin, I wish to remind hon. gentlemen opposite, and I do it in all kindness, that there are also people of English, Irish, Scotch and Welsh origin, and that the interests of the English-speaking people must receive more consideration in the future than they have in the past. I maintain that the English-speaking portion of this country has been held up before the eyes of the world by the premier and his delegates at different imperial conferences as being indifferent and callous to the calls of their kindred across the sea. That is the only conclusion we can come to from the position taken by the right hon. First Minister and other delegates at different imperial conferences. It seems that the uppermost thought in the mind of the government is: What will Quebec say or think? Ontario and the other provinces, they seem to conclude, can be relied upon to be fooled as usual with a few sentences having an imperial ring, but really as empty as sounding brass. I have not one word to say against the French Canadians of this country. I believe they are an energetic and intelligent people. I, myself, think that they are an exceptionally intelligent people, because, Sir, if what the hon. member for Hochelaga said yesterday, that there is no feeling of disloyalty among the French Canadians of Quebec is correct, I say it speaks very highly for the intelligence of the people of that province, for if there is no feeling of disloyalty in the province of Quebec it is not for lack of teaching by hon. gentlemen opposite. Battleships and cannon are very necessary implements of war, but a country's strength does not depend on these alone. It does not depend on these so much as on the men behind the guns. We cannot measure the military and naval strength of Canada by the calibre of our cannon or by the number of Bristols. But, if we are honest with ourselves and honest with the people of the country, we have to take into consideration, in viewing this question, the sentiments not only of Canada as a whole, but of each part of Canada.

The hon. member for Hochelaga challenged any one in this House to say that there is a feeling of disloyalty in Quebec. I do not like to use the word disloyalty, but I do believe we have ample evidences in this House in the expressions which have fallen from the lips of different speakers that there is in the province of Quebec an anti-British, or, if you like it better, an anti-imperial sentiment. I propose to deal with that matter squarely and to place the blame for that sentiment, which I do not consider in the interests of Canada, where it justly belongs. Is there an hon. member in this House who will deny my assertion that separation from the empire is preached in the province of Quebec? Is there an hon. member in this House who will deny my assertion that public money of the province of Quebec has been used to buy books to disseminate such doctrines in that province? I will challenge any man in this House. I will challenge any man in the province of Quebec to deny that assertion. I say that that separation from the empire has been preached in the province of Quebec not only on the platform but through subsidized books.

An hon. MEMBER. What book?

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman asks me what book, and I will tell him. The following statement was made by the Winnipeg 'Telegram' some time ago:

> The Quebec element opposed to aiding the navy of Great Britain, is also the element which talks seriously of the disintegration of confederation.

The late Mr. Tardivel's book, 'Pour la Patrie,' advocating the organization of a French republic on the northeast corner of the American continent, which book was designed to imbue the rising generation in Quebec with the idea of separation from the English-speaking portion of Canada, is still the subject of very general comment east and west. Three hundred dollars was spent by the Quebec government to distribute this book as prizes among the children of the schools of Quebec.

Mr. E. ROY. Where is the wrong-doing?

Mr. EDWARDS. There may not appear to be any wrong from the hon. gentleman's standpoint and in that respect he and I will have to differ, but from the way I look upon it, it is decidedly wrong not only for any man in this House but for any person in this country to preach the separation of Canada from the empire. In my estimation the wrong is accentuated when the legislature of the province of Quebec votes, as it did vote, $300 of public money to buy these books to scatter that treason throughout the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman may not see any wrong in that but I do.

Mr. E. ROY. I asked what was the wrong, because I have read that book. The true meaning of that book is not that which is given to it by the 'Telegram'.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the hon. gentleman rise in his place in this House and tell us that that book does not advocate the establishment of a French republic in Quebec?

Mr. E. ROY. Not at all. That is only the workings of the hon. gentleman's imagination.

Mr. EDWARDS. I assert that $300 of the public money of the province of Quebec was voted for that purpose, and the proof of my assertion will be found in the Votes and Proceedings of the legislature of Quebec for December 3, 1896. Nor is that the only instance. Mr. Tardival's idea has been elaborated by Rev. Father Hamon who advocates the formation of a federation of the French Canadian societies of Canada and the United States. Father Hamon's work received the approval of Archbishop Taschereau. At chapter 18 of the book you will find these words:

> See what will happen when the French Canadian race shall have completely occupied the space relatively restricted and found between the north shore of the St. Lawrence and the American boundary, that which we call the eastern townships. It will not probably take more than another generation to accomplish this work. Then the grand invasion (of the republic), will commence. When the French Canadians shall have arrived in mass at the American boundary line they will find more than half a million of their compatriots awaiting them who have the Canadian parish organized as absolutely as in Quebec, and are very decided, while discharging their duties loyally as citizens, to remain everywhere French. The French Canadians in the United States will soon be too numerous and influential for any political party, whatever it might wish to do, to dare to dispute their privileges. The American union is too big to be managed successfully. It is within the range of the possible that there will be a break-up when Quebec, New Brunswick, Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and, possibly, eastern Ontario, will constitute a distinct republic, French and Roman Catholic, Quebec giving a spirit and character to the new republic. Thus it may be, in the order of Providence, that there will be regained, by the observance of nature's laws of increase, and religious fidelity and love of country that which, in September, 1759, the sword wrested from the French Canadians on the Heights of Abraham.

I have not one word to say against the aspirations of Father Hamon to extend his religion as far as he possibly can. That is a worthy aspiration from his standpoint. But I do object to the preaching of any doctrine in any part of Canada which means the disintegration of this country and the separation of it from the British empire.

Mr. BELAND. Will my hon. friend allow me one question. Will he tell me in what year the book he refers to was published by the Quebec government?

Mr. EDWARDS. I have already stated it was in 1896.

Mr. BELAND. I may say that in the year 1896, in the province of Quebec, the party in power was the Conservative party; the party which is to-day led in the province of Quebec by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier.

Mr. EDWARDS. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is just about what I expected. I stand here to say that I do not care whether it was done by the Conservative party in Quebec, or by the Liberal party in Quebec, I object to this as un-Canadian.

Mr. BELAND. My hon. friend will not find that in the Liberal ranks.

Mr. EDWARDS. I was just as well aware as the hon. member was, what party was in power in Quebec when that book was prepared. This seems so interesting to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House that I want to give them a little more of it. Let us see what some of their great politicians and statesmen have done; let us see the stand that the Hon. Mr. Mercier took in that province. I might remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Beland) that Mr. Mercier was one of the lights of the Liberal party. He was premier of Quebec from 1887 to 1891, and he was an advocate of cutting the tie with Britain and of declaring Quebec a great French Canadian nation, to which the Canadians who had gone to the New England states would return. Let me give you a quotation or two from his great Sohmer Park speech. On that occasion Mr. Mercier said:

Taking everything into account French Canadians owe nothing to England. If they had prospered, it was in spite of England, not because of her, and if England had done them any good, it had also done them still greater harm. On the whole we owe nothing to England, and we may separate ourselves from her when the majority constitutionally decides to do so without any pangs of conscience and without any shedding of tears. I advise my compatriots to ask for independence for four leading reasons. From necessity, from patriotism, from the natural advantages of independence, because we are capable of existing as an independent people. As a free man, on this free soil of Canada, I defend the sacred cause of my compatriots, whatever may be their race or their religious belief, and I demand for all, men, women, and children, colonial emanciption and liberty. You have colonial dependence; I offer you independence. You have ruin and misery; I offer you fortune and prosperity. You are now only a colony, ignored by the entire world; I offer you the opportunity of becoming a great people, respected and known by all free nations. Men, women and children, it is for you to choose. You may remain slaves in the colonial state, or become independent and free, in the midst of other peoples, who, by their all-powerful voices, are inviting you to the banquet of the nations.

Mr. PAQUET. Mr. Mercier was not Prime Minister of Quebec in that year.

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not say he was.

Mr. PAQUET. He was turned down by his province for that language.

Mr. EDWARDS. I said that Mr. Mercier was a very prominent Canadian.

Mr. PAQUET. Not at that time.

Mr. EDWARDS. Oh, yes, he was prominent even at that time. I say he was sufficiently prominent that he in the course of time occupied the position of premier of the province of Quebec from which position he was turned out by the people of Quebec in 1891. Later on, when addressing a meeting of the French Canadians of New England, at Fall River, he said:

You who were driven out of the province of Quebec by the constitution and non-progressive policy of that country, as she is ruled by the English, have been more than able to hold your own in another country which is a free republic. I appeal to you to always be ready 'to assist your compatriots in Canada who are struggling for liberty; and the only thing wanted to release them from their present bondage is independence.'

Now, it has been objected that Mr. Mercier was not at that time a very prominent man. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is the same gentleman of whom the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada said:

Mr. Mercier is the greatest Canadian since the time of Papineau. I believe with Mr. Mercier, and I am here to make him prevail.

And Mr. Speaker this is the same man, Hon. Mr. Mercier, to whose memory the legislature of Quebec voted $10,000 to erect a statue.

Mr. BELAND. Will my hon. friend allow me to say that he should add to that statement this: Mr. Mercier is the same man who obtained from the legislature of the province of Quebec——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The hon. member for Frontenac, having the floor, cannot be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. BELAND. I have asked his permission.

Mr. EDWARDS. Did the hon. gentleman wish to ask a question?

Mr. BELAND. Yes. Does the hon. member know that it is the same Mr. Mercier who obtained from the legislature of Quebec a sum of $10,000 to help the Toronto university, an English institution, after it was destroyed by fire?

Mr. EDWARDS. I was not aware of that fact, and I wish to very cordially thank the hon. gentleman for his information. It is most interesting but I really cannot see what bearing it has upon my argument. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that to vote money for the purpose of erecting a statue to the memory of Mr. Mercier is to publicly endorse the cause which Mr. Mercier advocated, and if he asked the legislature to give the university of Toronto or any other university a million dollars it does not alter that circumstance at all. It is nothing more nor less than public endorsation and approval of one who taught sedition and scattered the seeds of treason. That is my position and I object to that sort of thing. And I say, Sir, that it would be equally consistent for this House to erect a statue to Louis Riel on Parliament Hill as it was for the legislature of Quebec to erect a statue to a man like Mercier who advocated these views.

Mr. E. ROY. You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. EDWARDS. I say to my hon. friends that it would be as consistent for them to erect a statue to Louis Riel, because although he did incite two rebellions he had at least the courage to undergo himself the risk that he induced other people to take. Now, Mr. Speaker, did the right hon. gentleman who leads this House exert his powerful influence at that time to try and stop that sort of thing. In Toronto, a short time ago, the right hon. gentleman said: That if he had any success in this country he owed it to the fact that he had told his compatriots in Quebec to lay their prejudices and preferences on the altar of their country. But let us follow the course of the right hon. gentleman and see about that. On the 22nd of November, 1885, there was an immense gathering assembled on the Champ de Mars, Montreal, for the purpose of protesting against the execution of Louis Riel. At that meeting a telegram was read from the open and undisguised foes of Great Britain in New York city. That telegram read:

> We tender you our warmest sympathy and assure you of our earnest support against Orange brutality and English tyranny.
> (Signed) J. B. MURPHY,
> A. E. FORD.

Did the right hon. gentleman, the leader of this government, arise to protest against that? Did he rise and protest, and appeal to the people there assembled to lay their prejudices and preferences on the altar of their country? No, Mr. Speaker, but as soon as the cheers that had greeted this telegram had subsided, the right hon. gentleman got up and said. If I had been on the banks of the Saskatchewan when the revolt broke out, I would have taken up arms against the government. Is this an isolated instance of such expressions on the part of the premier of this country? No. The very next year after that when he had full time to consider and deliberate, the very next year at Chambly he repeated that assertion and added:

> We are now on the classic ground of Canadian liberty. In the graveyards of this country are to be found the bones of those who were not afraid to face British bullets.

Mr. Speaker, I have no faith in the Prime Minister of this country when he gets up in Toronto and tells the people there, and tells the country through the press, that he has told the people of his province as patriots to lay their prejudices and preferences on the altar of their country. I say that his whole career shows an entirely different course. If you follow the right hon. gentleman's career a little further what do you find him doing? Four or five years later you find him trying to persuade the people of Canada to adopt a policy which Edward Blake said meant nothing more or less than annexation. And, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman at that time did not seem to be at all concerned about Canadian autonomy either. In 1892, page 1142 'Hansard', he said:

> I hold out to my fellow-countrymen the idea of independence.

Again, 'Hansard', page 1144, he said:

> I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspiration is the independence of Canada.

In Boston about the same time he was declaring that it was a fatal mistake to make allegiance—that is British allegiance—the basis of trade; that the present position of Canada to Great Britain could not last, and that separation must take place; that the conduct of Canada and of Great Britain had been unworthy of the civilization of Canada and Great Britain during the American civil war. And, mind you, Mr. Speaker, that in face of the fact that thousands of Canadians assisted the North in that war and that our records contain the published thanks of the American government to the government of Canada for the wise and neutral course they pursued on that occasion. And, as to the position of Great Britain in connection with that historical period, let me give you the words of the right hon. W. E. Gladstone, who in writing to an American friend said:

> I can state that the British government never at any time dealt with the subject of recognizing the southern states in your great civil war, excepting when it learned the proposition of the Emperor Napoleon III., and declined to entertain that proposition without qualification, hesitation, delay or assent.

The whole political career of the Prime Minister is marked by utterances designed to weaken Canadian respect for and loyalty to the motherland.

Mr. PAQUET. Will you allow me a question? Do you think that all French-Canadians to-day are not loyal to the British Crown?

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I stated some time ago, very clearly and distinctly—

Mr. PAQUET. Please answer.

Mr. EDWARDS. Just sit down now; I stated very clearly and distinctly that I accepted the position taken last night by the member for Hochelaga (Mr. Rivet) when he said that the people of the province of Quebec were not disloyal. I am not charging, and I have not said one word to charge the mass of the people of the province of Quebec with disloyalty; I have not said anything that could be construed into such a charge. On the contrary, I have said that the people of the province of Quebec have shown a more than ordinary intelligence in resisting the political leaders who for political purposes essayed to lead them from their allegiance, and I do not propose to allow any hon. gentleman from the province of Quebec or from any other province sitting on that side of the House or this to pervert my language. I repeat, Sir, that, by the leader of this government history has been perverted; I say that British diplomacy has been misrepresented by him on more than one occasion. I am not going to enter into details with regard to British diplomacy. But, Sir, I believe the time will come when British statesmen will receive more of credit and less of adverse criticism for their diplomacy in connection with Canadian affairs than they have received in times past. I want to say this more: That it comes with very bad grace from any member from the province of Quebec to attack British diplomacy, because the people of the province of Quebec have more reason to be grateful to British diplomacy than any other people in the Dominion. I say, Sir, it comes with exceeding bad grace from the right hon. gentleman who leads this House. for. Sir, if Canadian diplomacy as represented by the right hon. gentleman himself and his party had succeeded in 1891 we would not have any Canada to-day—we would be an annex of the United States. When trouble broke out in South Africa, Australia and New Zealand responded with alacrity; Canada held back. Now, supposing in the case of the item that came up in the House the other day for a vote of $50,000 for the sufferers in Paris, any hon. gentleman in this House had got up and opposed it, saying: I do not believe that there is any distress there; I believe that all this talk is the talk of a lot of scare-mongers; I think you should wait a while and if, after careful investigation, you find there is real distress, then instead of sending the money to France to help these people you should buy Canadian wheat and have it ground in Canadian mills and send the flour over to France. Now, Sir, if we had taken that position, we would have taken an absolutely ridiculous position, and any French Canadians in this House who would have supported any such proposition would be justly branded by their people as having not much regard for their own flesh and blood over in France. And yet, Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the position that the right hon. gentleman has taken in this House and that his delegates took at the imperial conference; that is the position they placed the British Canadian people in, branding them before the people of the world as being callous and indifferent to their own flesh and blood. I have good reason for my lack of confidence in the professions of the Prime Minister. I want to make the application more general; I want to call the attention of this House, and especially the attention of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to the kind of literature his party circulated in the province of Quebec just prior to the elections of 1896. In the Liberal campaign literature of that year you will find strictures respecting the expenditures by the Conservative government for the better equipment of our soldiers, and notwithstanding that under the Conservative regime the expenditure on militia was about $1 for every $7 that this government is spending now. This is the kind of stuff that was published in the pamphlet:

> Why all the armaments if we are not to have war, and why fight for England.

That is the very question that some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are asking to-day.

> Why all the armaments if we are not to have war? And why fight for England? The electors will recall that these big and little chiefs who are always most anxious to demonstrate that they are more patriotic than anybody else, more loyal, and ready to throw us into war for the benefit of others are not those who carry the burden.
> These carbines, these guns will be used by the electors. They are considered good enough to be chained to the cannon. Tupper, Angers, Taillon, will be in their ministerial offices, not surrounded by death but with joy in their hearts and a glass of champagne in their hands. Once more why all these rifles, these bayonets, if the good Tupper and company do not meditate some coup?
> They would send our children to Africa, to Asia, from where they would never return.
> If you vote for the blue candidate you will approve of these warlike preparations. . . . . Vote for Laurier and his candidates, if you would have your country enjoy peace, and not expose yourself to be sent away some fine morning to some other country, leaving your wives, your children and all that is dear to you.

When the hon. member for Pictou gets up in this House and charges the hon. member from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) or the representative of any other constituency with raising the race cry, he is exhibiting an unmitigated gall and a cheek which cannot be compared to anything on the American continent except the Rocky mountains or the prairies, for it is as collossal as the one and as boundless as the other. If you want further evidence, let me give you one or two. The hon. A. G. Jones, who was Minister of Militia in the Mackenzie government, used this language in the speech he made at Halifax: 'When the British flag is hauled down from Citadel Hill, I will take off my hat and cheer.'

Mr. FIELDING. I was present at the meeting and I know that Mr. Jones did not use any such words.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the hon. gentleman tell me what words he did use?

Mr. FIELDING. No, and it is not necessary that I should. Mr. A. G. Jones was the son and grandson of United Empire loyalists, and never in his life uttered any sentiment at variance with loyalty to the British Crown.

Mr. EDWARDS. I hope that the hon. gentleman's statement is correct. This is not the first time this charge has been made, and, if I am not much mistaken, it has hitherto been unchallenged.

Mr. FIELDING. It has always been denied.

Mr. EDWARDS. Take the case of Mr. Ellis. Mr. Ellis was a Liberal candidate in New Brunswick in 1896. In 1884, he said:

> Nothing could be more unfortunate for Canada than the British connection.

Mr. Ellis has since been made a senator by this government, and is, I believe, spoken of universally as a very decent fellow indeed. Probably his views have since changed. Another instance is that of the Hon. Louis H. Davies, now Sir Louis Davies. Speaking of the Canadian Pacific railway, that gentleman said:

> It is a contract from which there is no escape, politically or commercially, except one, and that is annexation to the United States.

Sir Louis Davies occupied a seat in the Liberal cabinet formed in 1896. Another instance I might give is that of Senator Choquette, who was the member for Montmagny, and one of the Grit whips in the parliament of 1896. In the Montreal 'Witness' of July 28, 1897, Senator Choquette is reported to have said: 'I would vote for annexation to-morrow if it were to come before the House.'

Hon. gentlemen opposite pretend to believe that there is no reason to apprehend any danger from Germany. They ask what motive has Germany to go to war with England? Well, it is the old story of lust of power and domination.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN. Might I ask a question? The hon. gentleman spoke a great deal about a pamphlet circulated in the province of Quebec, I would like to have his opinion of a pamphlet circulated in Ontario and the western provinces, called the 'Duty of the Hour.' To my mind it is one of the worst publications ever circulated.

Mr. EDWARDS. I never had an opportunity of reading that pamphlet, and so am not in a position to speak concerning it; but inasmuch as I believe it was circulated by the Liberal party and paid for by them, that party may have a few in stock yet, and I would ask my hon. friend to be good enough to send me one. Germany is not without ambition. She has the same spirit that actuated Babylon, Persia, Greece, Rome and Carthage in the olden times; and which later impelled Spain, France, Russia and Japan to do and dare. Her population is increasing at the rate of nearly a million a year, and she requires colonies for that rapidly increasing population. Her army is the largest, the best equipped and the most thoroughly disciplined in the world. There is only one thing that stands between her and the domination of all Europe, and that is the British navy. There is only one thing which prevents her being the greatest power in the world, and that is the British navy. You will find therein sufficient motive to excite the ambition of such an ambitious country. But if you are looking for motives, I would ask you what motive Germany had in 1864 in attacking Denmark. What was her motive for attacking Austria in 1866, and France in 1870? From France she took the provinces of Alsace and Lorraine and exacted an indemnity of $1,000,000,000. Yet in 1868 and as late as November, 1869, Napoleon III assured General Lebrun that the relations between France and Prussia were as good as could be desired, and as late as June 30, 1879, Emile Olivier said that never was peace so cordially assured. And within two weeks Germany and France were at war.

I think there is ample evidence of an emergency impending. I am not going to give many quotations. That has been done very well indeed by those who preceded me, but I want to read one or two very short ones. Lord Charles Beresford said quite recently:

> We have arrived at a great crisis in our history when, if we do not ourselves put things right we shall be too late.

Sir Edward Grey said:

> When the German programme is completed, Germany will have a fleet of thirty-three Dreadnoughts. The fleet will be the most powerful the world has ever yet seen. . . . That imposes upon us the necessity of rebuilding the whole of our fleet. That is the situation. . . . If we fall into a position of inferiority we should cease to count for anything among the nations of Europe, and we should be fortunate if our liberty were left, and we did not become the conscript appendage of some stronger power. That is a brutal way of stating the case, but it is the truth.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Asquith) echoed these sentiments, and described the situation as 'most grave, and to us not only unforeseen but unexpected. . .the falsification of one of the hypotheses on which we had hitherto proceeded.' He gave the following figures for the respective strength of Great Britain and Germany in the 'critical month' of April, 1912:

British—
16, certainly,
20 (with extra four ships).
German—
11, certainly,
17, if the acceleration of the programme continues.

Mr. McKenna gave the following estimate:

	British.	German.
December, 1910..	10	9
July, 1911..	14	13
April, 1912..	16	17

That is without counting the extra four ships to which I referred a moment ago. Now, as regards this question of emergency, let us see for a moment the position of the British government in that regard. The British government, in March, 1909, had in their programme four Dreadnoughts and possibly four more if, on considering the state of affairs, these latter four were found necessary. They looked carefully into the matter, considered what other nations were doing, and, on the 26th of July, 1909, Mr. McKenna said that the other four, which had been spoken of in March of that year, would certainly have to be built. Now, Sir, add to that, some words taken from the speech from the Throne delivered no later than last Monday:

The requirements of the naval defence of the empire have made it necessary to propose a substantial increase in the cost of the navy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I contend that when we on this side of the House claim that there is an emergency impending, we do not deserve to be styled 'scaremongers.' But, if you would have even further proof, allow me to give you still another authority, and one who, I have no doubt, will appeal to every hon. member on the other side of the House—no less an authority than the right hon. premier of this country. Speaking in this House last March, the right hon. gentleman uttered these words:

This brings us to something which is in the air at present and which no British subject can ignore. For a hundred years and more the naval supremacy of Great Britain has been unquestioned—nay more, British supremacy on the seas has been so absolute that no one supposed it could ever be disputed. But this is an age when events happen very fast. We have learned lately that the foremost military power of the world at present is contemplating perhaps to cope with Great Britain on the high seas. We have, perhaps, reason to believe, as we have just been told that Germany is building more ships than Great Britain and building them more rapidly. Possibly there is a conclusion to be drawn from this, and the only conclusion is that Germany intends some time to do with Great Britain on the high seas what she has done with France on land. Everybody knows, it is a matter of history that Prussia had for years been silently preparing to cope with France, which, up to that time, had been the greatest military nation in the world, that Prussia waited its opportunity, and when that opportunity came, delivered a mortal blow. If it be true then that Germany is organizing on the seas, no British subject can afford to be indifferent to the prospect.

Well, Sir, we on this side are not indifferent to that prospect, but I contend that hon. gentlemen opposite, in the present policy, are indifferent to the prospect referred to by their leader. And, if you take these words of the premier and place them before any audience in the Dominion of Canada and ask the members of that audience what these words mean, I believe that every man will say that these words were meant to indicate that the situation was grave, and that the premier apprehended danger to Britain and to the empire from Germany. And, if any man in that audience should need anything further to confirm him in that view, he could take these further words of the premier, spoken a little later on the occasion already referred to:

Vigilance and eternal vigilance must be the watchword to-day, not only in England, but in Canada and every other part of the British empire.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, including their leader, now tell us that there is no emergency, and that we are 'scaremongers,' who believe that there is an emergency impending. Sir, not even Robert Blatchford himself has used language more significant or more pregnant with alarm than that used by the leader of this government last March. If there is no cause for apprehension on our part, what is the necessity for the plunge into this new policy? If no danger is to be apprehended from Germany, why not submit this policy—involving, as it does, the expenditure during the next four or five years of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 and, in the near future, an expenditure running into hundreds of millions—to the mature consideration and decision of the people of Canada?

Well, Sir, will this proposed flotilla of unarmoured cruisers add anything to the strength of the British navy or be an effective and complete defence for Canada itself? Is it not true that we shall have still to depend on England to protect us from the vital thrust of war, while we toot our tin horns and provide a toy fleet against possible and improbable pin pricks. We pretend to assume insignificant minor risks from stray raiding cruisers which we very well know would not dare to take the risk of going three thousand miles from their base of supplies, but we leave it to England to provide our real protection. If England provides such protection, no large vessels can get at us. This government is assuming that Great Britain will still retain her general command of the seas. If the right hon. Prime Minister had any intention of strengthening the empire on the seas, he would have supplemented the British navy where the British navy needed supplementing. Where is the British navy weakest, according to the expression of opinion of her best statesmen? It is relatively weakest in Dreadnoughts. And where is it strongest? Figures show to us that it is relatively strongest in cruisers. And I contend that if there were any real desire on the part of this government to strengthen the British navy, they would give assistance where the British navy was relatively weakest, and not where it was relatively strongest. On the 3rd of the present month, the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) proposed this question to the leader of the government:

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. May I ask the right hon. gentleman a question? The interpretation clause of the Bill says that 'emergency means war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended.' If it requires one year to construct the plant and four years to construct the navy, what would he do if such an emergency arose in the meantime?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think, Mr. Speaker, we are getting pretty far from the question we have in hand just now.

Surely, that was a very proper question to ask. And surely I am right in saying that from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from one end of Canada to the other, there are thousands of Canadians who are asking that question to-day, and who want an answer. That was the answer given by the Prime Minister, who introduced this policy to the House. Then, take the position of the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden). He was asked some questions by the hon. member for West Algoma:

Mr. BOYCE. Has the minister any proposal to make in regard to providing for an emergency in the meantime?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Our friends of the opposition are doing that?

A statesmanlike answer, was it not? A nice way of crawling out of a hole.

Mr. BOYCE. Then I have to ask my hon. friend if the proposals of the opposition are satisfactory to him?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I am not aware that the members of this side of the House have treated any of the opposition speakers, particularly leading members of the opposition, in this way. I can stand any amount of heckling or nonsense, but I did not come here for that purpose to-day, and I think perhaps I might be allowed to get through with my statement and allow somebody else to follow.

Mr. BOYCE. I must beg the minister's pardon; I had no desire whatever to embarrass him in his speech. I asked him a question, and had it not been for his answer, nothing further would have been said.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I think the question he put as to an emergency is not a proper question to interject.

Mr. BOYCE. I can understand that, if the minister did not want to answer it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a pretty position for any cabinet minister to put himself in. A question as to what this country is going to do if England and Germany, or England and any other country, come to blows in the next few years, is, in the estimation of the Minister of Militia of Canada, utter nonsense, and should never have been asked at all; and when the question is put to him he almost sheds tears, and pleads to this side of the House not to ask such questions, that he is a leading member of the House, and therefore, should be respected because of his high and mighty position, and because of the gold braid he wears on his clothes once in a while. Now, Sir, I am sorry the Minister of Militia is not in his place at present, but we have two or three other ministers here. I want to ask the hon. the Postmaster General, who may be regarded, I think, as one of the leading men on that side, certainly one of the leading men, if the Minister of Militia counts himself as one—I want to ask the Postmaster General if he is prepared to say to-day what this government will do in the event of an emergency occurring in the next few years, before their fleet is completed. Will the Postmaster General answer that question?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Speaker, I am not an expert, but I can tell my hon. friend what I believe would be the duty of any self respecting government in case of emergency overtaking the mother country. I think that Canada should certainly lend her navy to the mother country, and assist in the defence of the mother country.

Mr. EDWARDS. The Postmaster General did not understand my question. I am asking him what the government would propose to do in the event of this emergency occurring before their navy is constructed, that is within the next four or five years. The Prime Minister says it will be five years before their fleet is ready; now I am asking the hon. gentleman what the government would do if an emergency occurred before that time.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have no hesitation in saying that in case of an emergency occurring before we had a navy, Canada as a whole would support the mother country.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman has given us no intimation how they would support the mother country; they will have nothing to support her with.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We would support her with our assistance.

Mr. EDWARDS. In what way?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Substantially.

Mr. EDWARDS. In what way substantially? Would it be done by a contribution, or would it be done by stumping Quebec and Ontario and the other parts of Canada?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by his question. I may tell him this, that Canada did her duty at the time of the South African war. I may go a little further, since my hon. friend has addressed this question particularly to me, and say that, as he spoke a moment ago of the attitude of the province of Quebec on this occasion——

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to let even so great a man as the Postmaster General interject a speech here. If he is prepared to answer my question, I will let him do so with pleasure, but I do not propose to let him take up my time by making a speech.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I was going to say to my hon. friend that the mother country would naturally expect that help would come to her as it did at the time of the South African war; and I may add for his own information, since he seems to take me as a target in the present instance, that a brother of mine served in the South African war for his King.

Mr. EDWARDS. I am not impugning the loyalty of the Postmaster General, I am asking him a very simple question.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And I gave a simple answer, I think.

Mr. EDWARDS. Yes, exceedingly simple in one sense of the word, much too simple for a gentleman occupying the position of the Postmaster General. I would expect from him an answer that was not quite so simple, one that contained more information. Well, it seems impossible to get a definite statement from the Postmaster General. I am not picking on the Postmaster General particularly. I might have asked the Finance Minister the question, but I asked the Postmaster General because he has spoken in this debate, and has given a long and eloquent address, and I asked him in the absence of the Prime Minister and in the absence of the Minister of Militia and Defence. I hope he will not think that a humble member like myself would think of picking on the Postmaster General. Now, sir, we are in this position. The Postmaster General says that in the event of an emergency Canada would do its duty as it did when the South African war broke out. Well, when the South African war broke out it was the people of Canada that sent the soldiers and not the government. Now I think every man in this House, no matter on which side of it he sits, will agree with me that the emergency, if it does occur, the battle, when it does come, will be on the sea, and we will not have an opportunity to send soldiers if the fight is on the sea. Now, Sir, we want to be in the position of being able to render assistance to the motherland in case of an emergency. That is the way I feel about this matter, that is the way I feel as a Canadian, as a descendant of the United Empire Loyalists, since other hon. members on both sides have declared themselves to be of that stock. I may also mention that I am of United Empire Loyalist stock, and I take pride in it. Now, as a Canadian I feel, that if a war should break out between England and Germany, and if New Zealand and Australia were represented on the firing line by their Dreadnoughts, and Canada was the only daughter nation which was not so represented, I would feel, as a Canadian, very sorry indeed, and I believe that sentiment is shared by the vast majority of the people of Canada. They would geatly regret the occasion. And I feel it is too great a risk to take. As Canadians we do not wish to run the risk of being unable to render assistance if the need should occur.

There has been something said here about imperialism. The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Rivet) seemed to think there were two kinds of imperialism. There is only one kind of imperialism so far as I know. I have no hesitation in subscribing to the words: When England is at war, Canada is at war'. I do not want half a dozen interpretations put on those words either, I want them literally. I believe there are no statesmen to-day in the world who better appreciate the horrors of war than English statesmen. I believe that, I have full confidence in the humanity and the judgment of the statesmen of England. I firmly believe that Great Britain would not go to war with any country except it were to maintain the honour and integrity of the British empire. So I say there is only one kind of imperialism for me. Believing that Great Britain will only go to war to maintain the honour and the integrity of the British empire, I say that when England is at war, Canada is at war. That is my sentiment, and I do not attach any rider to it at all. The matter of cost has been referred to by some hon. members. On this side of the House the leader of the opposition proposes two Dreadnoughts at a cost of $20,000,000. The right hon. the First Minister proposes an expenditure during the next four or five years of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 and an untold expenditure in the future. If hon. gentlemen object to the principle of sending Canadian money out of Canada over to England to buy Dreadnoughts why do they proceed at once to violate that principle by sending $2,000,000 over the seas to buy a Rainbow and a Niobe? They violate their principle although they talk for hours about it. Now, one word with regard to the protection of trade routes. It has been said that this navy is necessary for the protection of our trade routes. Our principal trade is with Great Britain. I think that no member of this House will contest my statement when I sav that at the present time there is only one European nation whose activity along ship-bulding lines could be taken as a menace to the trade route between Canada and Great Britain. That country is Germany. I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take a glance at the map of Europe and see what the position of Germany is. Is it not true that Germany, in order to get her war vessels to the Atlantic to attack our trade routes, would have to defeat either the British Channel squadron or else defeat the British squadron in the North sea? There are only two ways in which any German war vessel could attack our trade route.

Mr. D. A. GORDON. Would not the boats of the German-Hamburg-American line blockade the whole of the Atlantic coast of Canada?

Mr. EDWARDS. How are the boats of the Hamburg or any other line going to get into the Atlantic ocean to attack our trade routes?

Mr. D. A. GORDON. Out of New York.

Mr. EDWARDS. Are they all going to be in New York?

Mr. D. A. GORDON. They ply between Hamburg and New York.

Mr. EDWARDS. And your claim is that this fleet you are going to build will be able to handle anything of the kind?

Mr. D. A. GORDON. Beyond any question of doubt, so the best authorities say.

Mr. EDWARDS. I differ from you on that. In my judgment common sense and prudence would dictate that the proper thing for Canada to do would be to strengthen the British navy in the North sea where the test of strength is most likely to occur.

Now, let us consider our position with regard to another country. Let us consider the position of Canada with regard to the United States and see what this government has done. The Rush-Bagot agreement of 1817 has been openly violated by the United States ever since this government came into power. There is not a fort along the American frontier which existed previous to 1817. All the forts have been replaced with modern up to date structures, and behind these forts are 6,000 American soldiers. The Lake Champlain and Niagara districts are fully equipped with cavalry, infantry, and batteries of artillery. Cleveland has a training school for naval purposes. There are naval corps at Buffalo, Cleveland, Rochester, Chicago and Duluth, and a post has been established in Dakota—this, I contend, is in violation of the compact or agreement entered into in 1817, and without one word of protest from this government. On the lakes the United States have a large force of cutters armed with quickfiring guns, and lately this government permitted the United States to place war vessels on all the Great Lakes, thereby deliberately placing central Canada absolutely at the mercy of the United States. Yet, they talk of defending the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Not one move has been made to prevent the United States from violating that treaty, no protest on the part of this government. The United States have gone on, and I claim that they would absolutely control all central Canada in case of a difficulty arising between Canada and the United States. Our forts do not amount to anything. Take the fort at Barriefield, for instance—what is it? If you took a modern cannon and fired it off there, the whole thing would fall to pieces. A good lusty crowd of boys might attack that fort with every confidence, with nothing better than snowballs and pop-guns. They have a rickety old bridge across from Barriefield to Kingston, and they dare not take a cannon across that bridge at a trot, notwithstanding the fact that they pay $1,400 a year rent for it for military purposes. While the fort at Kingston is crumbling into decay, they have something else there which, of course, would be a great protection to Canada in the event of trouble—$6,000 cottages for men drawing $20 a month salary. Fancy the position of Canada with British naval supremacy gone. We would simply be at the mercy of any country that saw fit to attack us. The right hon. gentleman who leads this House says that independence is Canada's ultimate destiny. I entirely dissent from that view. Situated as we are, in my judgment, it would simply mean ruin for Canada. A country with 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 people would be a small affair in this day of giant nations and great armaments, and independence would make us practically helpless. Not only that, but if the imperial tie was broken, Canada would have no weight or influence whatever in the world. The government and railways of Canada now owe over $800,000,000 to Great Britain. That represents nearly the whole of their bonded debt. In addition to that, vast sums are owed there on account of municipal and other bonds. As regards our indebtedness to England, I wish to place on 'Hansard' a statement of the well know writer, Mr. J. Castell Hopkins:

What Great Britain has done for Canada.

When Canada was in its birth-pains of United States revolution, invasion, and attempted conquest, Great Britain was unstinted in her supply of blood and men and money; when our youthful nation, that was to be, needed soldiers to support its growth and maintain its interests and hold its territory, British troops and fortifications were maintained here at an expenditure of $300,000,000 during the nineteenth century; when our growing commerce became a matter of international concern, as our vast, unbroken territories had so long been an object of international cupidity, they rested securely within the scope of Britain's naval supremacy; when British dignity and Canadian feeling were shamed by the Trent affair, 10,000 British soldiers came to Canada as fast as ships could bring them here; when the Fenian invasion illustrated the helplessness of a country like ours, lying alongside the territory of a great power, Britain paid the damages rather than risk war with a country stirred to fever heat by passions of the moment, which have now, happily, disappeared.

If Canadian settlers needed roads and canals and bridges in early days British money supplied them; if the Indians for half a century required expensive coddling and yearly gifts and payments, the money was provided by Great Britain; if our churches wanted vast sums for pioneer work and continued development, British voluntary societies contributed some $100,000,000 during the nineteenth century; if railways, such as the Intercolonial, had to be constructed, at a period when provincial credit was poor and interprovincial unity a dream, Great Britain guaranteed the loans to a total amount of $25,000,000; if in recent years countless enterprises, private and national, required money, it has been freely accorded in London up to a present total of $1,500,000,000 which is invested in the Dominion; if we wanted to build canals, or construct a Canadian Pacific, or a Grand Trunk railway, or a Canadian Northern, or a Grand Trunk Pacific, we have readily obtained the money in London at a rate of interest and with a facility which no small nation not under the British flag, and not having British power and stability to guarantee its position, could possibly have commanded; if, since confederation, our trade upon the seas of the world, totalling over $6,300,000,000, has never been disturbed by even a threat, or a shadow of a fear, it was due to the protection of the imperial navy; if the French Canadian people to-day have the full and free exercise of their religion, their laws, and perfect racial equality, it is due to British guarantees of liberty in the beginning, with British constitutional instincts in the rest of the Canadian people since that time; if all Canadians can now most fully recognize that the greatest privilege in the world—that of being a British citizen—and the most vital world-force in promoting and ensuring peace and advancing the progress of our common civilization, are alike bound up in British power, they cannot but also recognize that these things depend upon a colossal expenditure which is drawing upon the life blood of the British nation, and which must be maintained on behalf of the empire at large, as well as of the British people.

Some practical considerations and temporary embarrassments may advise limitation in our help at this juncture; every consideration of manliness and national instinct and Canadian honour seems to demand action.

J. CASTELL HOPKINS.

Toronto, March 24.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that the only position for Canada to take is one of continued unity with the empire. I contend that the policy proposed by the premier in regard to this navy is a policy making for separation, and I want to express my own opinion flatly, that in view of the right hon. gentleman's record in this country I am not prepared to trust him with the power of saying whether or not that navy shall go or shall not go to the assistance of Britain. That is my own opinion and I want to express it freely. I dissent from the view that Canada's destiny is independence. I am proud of my British citizenship; I am proud to belong to an empire which comprises one-third of the earth's surface and which contains probably one-fourth of the people on this planet. Eminent philologists tell us that during the last 100 years the people speaking the French language have increased sixty per cent, that the people speaking the German language have increased 110 per cent, and that the people speaking the English language have increased 600 per cent. The same eminent authorities also estimate that at the end of 100 years there will be in this world some 96,000,000 people speaking French, 124,000,000 speaking German, and over 800,000,000 speaking the English tongue, of whom some 80,000,000 will be in the Dominion of Canada. That estimate of 80,000,000 for the Dominion of Canada is not so very different from the estimate of the great Canadian, Lord Strathcona. And, Sir, whether these figures are correct or not, they express the idea of eminent authorities, and they certainly go to show that the Anglo-Saxon race is to continue to be the dominant race in this world. Sir, in the course of time the Dominion of Canada must have a population larger than the population of the British isles. I do not look forward to independence as Canada's destiny. I believe in a higher and nobler destiny for Canada. I look forward (though of course I will never live to see the day) to the time when Canada will have a larger population than Great Britain, and still be a portion of the British empire. I look forward to that day when Canada will be the dominating and controlling factor in the affairs of our empire. I say, Sir, that for Canadians that is a grander and nobler destiny to look forward to than independence or annexation either. The late Principal Grant whom everybody recognized as one of Canada's brightest and brainiest sons, said that he believed the day would come when the Dominion of Canada would be the link that would bind the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race together; meaning the Anglo-Saxon race within the confines of the British empire, and that other great branch of the race which inhabits the United States, Well, Sir, I think we can look forward with pride and hope to the time when Canada, because of her population, because of her vast resources, and her great wealth, may occupy a dominant position in the British empire, and be the link which will join that empire to the United States—not politically, but in an alliance which will be able to say to the world: Henceforth there shall be no more war, no more Dreadnoughts; no more forging of cannon; henceforth devote your energies to the amelioration of the condition of your peoples and advance the arts of peace I believe that is the noblest destiny for us to look forward to. I believe that the time is reasonably near when Canada will occupy that position, Are we of the Anglo-Saxon race in Canada so poor in national spirit that we shall quietly submit to be led like vassels by any political party, or any political leader to our own humiliation and shame? This policy enunciated by the Prime Minister, and by his government, is, I firmly believe part of a plan to bring about separation. Canada's destiny is in our hands; the issue for us to decide upon is not one as between giving Dreadnoughts and building Bristols; the issue we have to decide now is as to whether we shall turn in the direction of separation and independence, or rejecting that, turn ourselves to a closer unity between Canada and the empire at large. Our fellow citizens appeal to us from across the sea to stand by them and co-operate with them in the upholding of the British empire; in the language of the great poet of the empire they say to us:

"Sharers of our glorious past,
Brothers, must we part at last?
Shall we not through good and ill
Cleave to one another still?
Sons be welded each and all
Into one imperial whole,
One with Britain, heart and soul!
One life, one flag, one fleet, one throne!
Britons, hold your own."

Now, Mr. Speaker, to my mind the question is simply this: Shall we stand for the one flag, one fleet, one empire, or, shall we forget our race and blindly follow the right hon. the Prime Minister in his policy of separation? If, we should pursue the latter course then in time to come it may be truly said that Canadians:

Living shall forfeit their fair renown
And doubly dying shall go down
To the vile dust from whence it sprung,
Unwept, unhonoured and unsung.

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Frontenac takes his seat I would like to ask him if he would be kind enough to allow me to put him a question. He has raised quite a doubt as to the loyalty of the French Canadian Liberal leaders in the province of Quebec; would he be good enough to tell me the nationality, the political allegiance, and the object of those who burned down the parliament buildings in Montreal in 1848.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker. There is no member of this House to whom I would be more glad to impart information than to the hon. member (Mr. Talbot) because I recognizes the fact, as I am sure every hon. gentleman recognizes it, that there is no gentleman in this House who stands more in need of information. But inasmuch as I cannot hope to fill up the void which exists in the cranium of the hon. gentleman in the short space at my disposal, I will leave that question which he has asked me for further consideration.

Mr. H. S. BELAND (Beauce) (Translation)—Mr. Speaker, I am taking up this important question of the naval defence as a citizen of the greatest, most populous and most prosperous self-governing colony of Great Britain. True, I belong to the French Canadian minority, but, following on the footsteps of those eminent countrymen of mine who for a period of sixty years have been the leaders of the race, Lafontaine, Cartier, Laurier, I should in dealing with a question which interests Canada as a whole view it from a Canadian standpoint, and not lose sight of the fact that, being a Canadian, I am a subject of the King of England.

The quality of British subjects carries with it inestimable advantages and privileges, but also on the other hand implies duties and obligations which it is not permissible to ignore. Under every clime the British subject commands respect and finds his interests protected. And while I do not wish just now to go more deeply into a consideration of that subject, I think I am justified in stating that there exists no country under the sun where the word 'liberty' is better understood and put to more constant use than England, whether it be in religious, civil or political matters. All of these British dominions have henceforth enjoyed the greatest security against outsiders, under the protection of that navy the most powerful which has navigated the seas in the course of centuries. It is indeed a matter of pride for every Canadian to proclaim himself at all times and in all countries a British subject.

On the other hand, there is no precious boon but has as its counterpart certain duties and obligations. In the present emergency, the creation of a marine presents this especially happy feature that it evidences our loyalty to England while at the same time promoting the best interests of the Dominion.

When Sir George Etienne Cartier, in 1862, introduced his militia Bill, and in 1868 his fortification Bill, he was working in the true interests of Canada. An experience of fifty years has shown it. In supplementing our means of defence on land by providing means of defence on sea—a still greater necessity in view of our growing sea-going trade—the government is carrying out the idea of the man who may be termed the father of confederation. Loyalty to Canada, loyalty to England, such are the facts evidenced by the measure submitted to the House.

The discussion of that important Bill, which for the past few weeks has monopolized the attention of this parliament, has been the occasion of excesses of speech which cannot be ignored or left unanswered. And despite my anxiety, following on such a prolonged debate, to take up your time and that of the House for a few moments only, I should not forego the task of referring to and refuting certain charges brought against the French Canadian members of this House.

One cannot help wondering how charges so utterly contradictory can be proferred by two hon. members both occupying side by side prominent positions within the ranks of the Conservative party, and who for nearly twenty years have had a hand in its management, who were political mates yesterday, and who although apparently divided are still allies for electoral purposes, and will to-morrow be even closer allies, you may be sure. I refer to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). In the eyes of these two hon. gentlemen we are disloyal; disloyal to the province of Quebec, according to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, because we are doing too much for England; disloyal to England, according to the hon. member for North Toronto, because our Bill is too Canadian, too much in the interest of the province of Quebec, and not enough in the interest of England.

It is hardly necessary to attempt a refutation of such a childish charge. We acknowledge that this measure for naval defence is of a nature to greatly promote the prestige of England; but I may say to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier that it is in providing for the defence of Canada primarily that we are helping to enhance the prestige of England, and that in so doing, we are contributing to the upbuilding of the nation, inasmuch as we are promoting our interests as Canadians. We are living within an empire, we recognize that it is an estimable advantage for Canada to be part of the greatest empire of the world, and I have no hesitation in stating that the province of Quebec has a greater interest in remaining under the protection of the British Crown than any of the eight English-speaking provinces which together with ours make up confederation.

England safeguards the religious and national interests of French Canadians. In helping to uphold its prestige, we are not such improvident trustees or such disloyal representatives as others would fain picture us to be, but we are working indirectly towards the maintenance of these special privileges or rights, if you prefer, which the province of Quebec enjoys from the national and religious standpoint.

Accordingly, associated as we are with eight English-speaking provinces which apparently are unanimous in favouring the idea of a contribution of some sort, I maintain that far from showing disloyalty, we are taking the only stand of a nature to promote the development of the province of Quebec, in peace and harmony with the remainder of Canada. Any other position would be likely to isolate it, and prepare for it a very dark future in the Dominion.

As regards the hon. member for North Toronto, his attitude is very different from that of his friend from Jacques Cartier. In his eyes we are disloyal to England. Why? Because we refuse to abide by the policy of the Conservative leader, which provides for the establishment of a Canadian navy entirely at the disposal of the British Admiralty, besides giving away 25 millions to Great Britain. On that account, we are taxed with disloyalty to Great Britain. Here again it is indirectly against the province of Quebec that the hon. member for North Toronto directs his blows when charging Sir Wilfrid with disloyalty. There is nothing to surprise us here; he has repeatedly done so.

Is he not aware of what happened in 1776, when our forefathers indignantly rejected the insidious proposals of emissaries from the United States in arms against England, their mother country. At the time we had not yet obtained from England those privileges conferred by the Quebec Act.

Does he not know with what patriotism, what courage and what success a further generation of our forefathers repulsed the American invaders of 1812 and thereby retained Canada to the British Crown.

Is he not aware that from the time of Bishop Plessis in 1794 down to the present archbishop of Quebec, all the leading dignitaries of the Catholic clergy have on all occasions advised the French Canadian people to show the greatest loyalty and remain unswerving in their atachment to Great Britain.

Does he not know that it was Sir George Etienne Cartier, a French Canadian who introduced and carried through the House the Militia Bill and that relating to fortifications, measures like the present one having for their object to relieve the mother country of part of the burden of Canada's defence? Does he not know that his old-time leader, Sir John Macdonald, in London, on a memorable occasion stated that Queen Victoria had no more loyal subjects in Canada than those speaking the French language and professing the Catholic religion.

Is he not aware that the first preferential tariff clauses in favour of British products coming into our market were introduced by a French Canadian, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that same man whom he has attempted to injure in the eyes of the English-speaking people of this country by imputing to him disloyal motives on account of the so-called inadequacy of the naval service Bill. Surely, he is aware of all those facts. But the object which the hon. member for North Toronto has evidently in mind, is to develop an ill-feeling towards Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by making him pass for a disloyal subject of the King. The Conservative leaders have divided the task between themselves. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, unable to find any solid ground for attacking the provisions of the Bill, tries to frighten the French Canadians with the scarecrow of militarism, and purposely exaggerates its tenor; the hon. member for North Toronto, on the contrary endeavours to minimize its purport with a view to working on the feelings of English-speaking Canadians; the same old dishonest and disloyal tactics which will be exposed to light before long, on the part of two political leaders who seemingly divided for the present will be seen to-morrow hugging one another after the the elections are over.

Mr. Speaker, before discussing on its merits the Naval Defence Bill now submitted to parliament, it is in order that we should consider the proposal emanating from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and set forth in some newspapers, of submitting the measure to the people for their approval, under that fallacious pretense that the question is a novel one.

Numerous reasons and facts, which cannot be controverted, stand in the way of such a proposal. In the first place, there is the stand taken more than seven years ago, that is in 1902, by the delegates of the Canadian government at the Colonial Conference in London. At that conference, our ministers stated that our government had decided on establishing a Canadian naval service. They spoke in unequivocal terms. They stated in the first place that the time had come for Canada to relieve the mother country of part of the burden laid on the shoulders of the British taxpayer, through our assuming the cost of defending our coasts and sea ports; and in second place, they asserted the principle of self-government in the matter of naval defence as well as in matters of militia, and the unswerving attachment of Canada to that country.

I shall now read to the House an extract from the report of the conference of 1902 on this subject; it forms part of the memorandum submitted by the Canadian ministers:

> At present Canadian expenditures for defence services are confined to the military side. The Canadian government are prepared to consider the naval side of defence as well. On the sea coasts of Canada there is a large number of men admirably qualified to form a naval reserve, ant it is hoped that at an early day a system may be devised which will lead to the training of these men and to the making of their services available for defence in time of need.
> In conclusion, the ministers repeat that, while the Canadian government are obliged to dissent from the measures proposed, they fully appreciate the obligation of the Dominion to make expenditures for the purpose of defence in proportion to the inscreasing population and wealth of the country. They are willing that these expenditures shall be so directed as to relieve the taxpayer of the mother country from some of the burdens which he now bears; and they have the strongest desire to carry out their defence schemes in co-operation with the imperial authorities, and under the advice of experienced imperial officers, so far as this is consistent with the principle of local self-government, which has proved so great a factor in the promotion of imperial unity.

It will be seen by the above extract that the question which it is proposed to submit to a plebiscite is not a novel one. It was discussed in London before the two delegates of Canada, and it is in the presence of representatives from all parts of the British Empire that the opinions just quoted was expresed.

Mr. MONK (Translation). Will the hon. member allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BELAND. Certainly.

Mr. MONK (Translation). The question brought up before the conference of 1902 related solely to the defence of the country, and in the same way at the conference of 1907 the question of the defence of the empire was not to any degree discussed. It was in 1909 only that the question of the defence of the empire as a whole was brought up, and that was, of course, after the general elections of 1908.

Mr. BELAND (Translation). The question which the hon. member wishes to put turns out to be a speech on a small scale. I for one cannot perceive much difference between the questions discussed at the conference of 1902 and subsequently at those of 1907 and 1909.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the facts which I am bringing forward just now occurred in August, 1902. At the opening of the ensuing session of parliament, that is on March 13, 1903, the speech from the throne referred to the Colonial Conference in London, and to the part taken therein by the Canadian delegates in connection with naval defence. The discussion which then took place in connection with the moving of the address in answer to the speech from the Throne clearly set forth the feeling of the House. 'Hansard' shows that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the government, Mr. R. L. Borden, leader of the opposition, and Mr. Bourassa, spoke on that occasion, and these three gentlemen, in my humble opinion were supposed to voice the opinions of all parties and sections in parliament as well as outside of it.

Nevertheless, favourable comments only were forthcoming as to the outcome of the Colonial Conference. Therefore I say it would be childish and hardly fair to contend to-day that the principle embodied in the policy submitted to the House was adversely commented upon. No, Mr. Speaker, not a single voice was raised in this House to apprise the government that their representatives in London 'adopted a nefarious policy,' no parliament was unanimous in approving of the stand they had taken. Henceforth, the question was before the country.

Then the elections of 1904 came on. Will any one state for my information in what locality of Canada, in what electoral division, the opponents of this policy advocated their views? I, for one, remember very well having contended before my constituents that it was a matter of common prudence to provide for the safety of our coasts, of our sea-going trade, by protecting the British market. I remember having emphatically stated that the upholding of the British empire as a whole was indispensable towards ensuring the material progress of Canada, as also towards safeguarding the national and religious interests of the province of Quebec; and among the men of all shades of political opinion who opposed me at the time, there was not a single one to raise his voice in denunciation of that so-called naval policy, of imperialism, of that backdown or sacrifice of all that honour holds most sacred.

Five years elapsed, five years of unprecedented prosperity. Meanwhile population increased, the West made further leaps in the way of development, the volume of trade doubled, new railways were built in all directions; Canada, in short, after being for a long time a mere colony evolved into a nation in the eyes of the world, enjoying new privileges and bearing new responsibilities.

It was then that one of the leaders of the Conservative party in this House, the hon. member for North Toronto inserted in the order paper the following proposal:

> That in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self help and self respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

When that resolution was discussed, that is on March 9th, 1909, its lack of precise meaning prevented the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition from agreeing to it, especially for fear it might put our country under the necessity of a direct contribution to the British exchequer, a contingency which did not appear acceptable to either party. So, it was thrown aside by mutual agreement, and another, of which I need quote a part only to the House, substituted therefor. For the purpose of this debate, it will suffice to quote the following paragraph which is essential:

> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.'

That resolution was discussed, but when I say discussed, I wish to be well understood. Not a single voice was raised against it, comments from both sides of the House were invariably favourable. Where were the men who are to-day opposing the government, and why did they not raise their voices in condemnation of the proposal? And if they did not wish to speak out, why did they not vote against the measure, which in principle and in its essential features is the same as that submitted to parliament to-day. It is of primary importance that the people of this country, and particularly of the province of Quebec, should be made aware that it was then unanimously adopted, without even the hon. member for Jacques Cartier dissenting.

Now, I ask again, what is it that carried unanimously at that time? In the first place, the asserting of the unswerving fidelity of Canada towards the mother country; in the second place the disproval of the principle of a direct money contribution to the British exchequer; in the third place, our hearty approval of the establishment of a national navy. So then, the colonial conference held in London in 1902, the stand taken by the Canadian parliament in 1903; the general elections in 1904 and 1908; the resolution unanimously adopted by parliament in 1909, these circumstances, it would seem, are more than sufficient to set aside the contention of those who allege that the question has never been brought up in the past and should take the form of a plebiscite.

Besides, what would be the outcome of a plebiscite on a question of that kind? Have those of my hon. friends from the province of Quebec who advocate a plebiscite pondered over the probable results of a consultation of the people? Is it not self-evident that the Anglo-Saxon blood would be stirred up by those who have accepted the tenets of the policy of imperialism as advocated by Mr. Chamberlain, and that through the kindling of prejudices by expert hands through the intense political feeling aroused, and appeals to racial and religious passions, a majority of electors might pronounce in favour of the nefarious principle of a money contribution to the British admiralty. I, for one, would fear having recourse to a plebiscite, as it would result in dangerous appeals to prejudice, and thereby be a menace to the maintenance of our institutions.

A plebiscite, I readily conceive, would afford extremists a fine opportunity for abetting popular passions, awakening old racial enmities, setting up one against the other the two great races living in harmony in this country from the national and religious standpoint. It is hoped that thereby the two sections of the Conservative party would affect a step in advance, by representing in Quebec the Prime Minister as sacrificing Canada to England, while in Ontario and the west, he would be held up as the sworn foe of England, because the Bill gives Canada control over its navy. As a matter of fact, it should not be forgotten that this is the very reason given by the leader of the opposition for demanding a plebiscite.

The stand taken by the leader of the opposition should not cause too much surprise. It is one among his many shiftings of which we have had the spectacle in the course of the last year. Indeed, we have seen a moment ago that on March 29th, 1909, that is less than a year ago, the House declared unanimously in favour of the establishment of a Canadian navy. At that date, the leader freely chosen by all sections of the party opposite, not even excepting the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, proclaimed the principle of self-government in the matter of the navy as well as in matters of militia, urged the government to build forthwith, and to carry to rapid completion, a national naval service, and repudiated the idea of a direct money contribution to the British exchequer. On January 12, 1910, about a month ago, from his seat in this House, he spoke as follows:

> It has been suggested that instead of the organization of a Canadian naval force, there should be a system of annual contributions from this country to the mother country; and I am free to admit that, from the strategical point of view, that I would be inclined to agree with the view of the admiralty that that would be the best way for the great self-governing dominions of the empire to make their contributions. But, Sir, from a constitutional and political standpoint, I am opposed to it, for many reasons.

As all may see, he had not yet performed that famous somersault, that most laughable bout-face ever recorded in the parliamentary annals of this country. But after a stormy caucas during which, if rumour is to be credited, the Quebec Conservatives and those from the English-speaking provinces, came to hands, he emerged with a new policy. Then, Sir, he discards all his great principles hardly twelve months old; what he now advocates is not the building of a national navy with wisdom and prudence, kept under the control of the Dominion government and parliament. Not by any means. To-day, he comes before parliament, and in the name of the great Conservative party, he says: Let us give $25,000,000 to England, as a gift pure and simple; let us let the country be invited to pay an amount equivalent to three dollars for each man, woman and child; let us make that gift to England, without reserving the right of ever requiring that these ships built with our cash will be used primarily for the protection of our coasts and our trade. That is on the part of the leader of the opposition an overt step in the direction of imperial federation and the complete abandonment of our autonomy. I, for one, shall oppose, with all my might that dangerous proposal of a money contribution.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier demands a plebiscite, and his leader demands the same thing, but is it with the same object in view? Let us see. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, if I understand him aright, is of opinion that the government measure effects a radical change in our relations with Great Britain; and in support of this contention, he points to clause 18 of the Bill which enables the Governor in Council, that is the Dominion government, to put in a case of emergency the Canadian navy at the disposal of His Majesty. To my mind, that reservation which is incorporated in the Bill on behalf of the Dominion government, is the mere conferring of a discretionary power, is nothing but a further assertion of our autonomy, especially if read in conjunction with clause 19 which states that no such decision will take effect unless it be ratified by the Dominion parliament, that is, by the representatives of the people. In the opinion of the hon. member (Mr. Monk), there is no necessity for protecting our coasts, our sea ports. To his mind, the situation in Canada has not changed for the last twenty years, or within the last decade. To his mind, our sea-going trade is too insignificant to require any protection on our part. His policy is one of expectation, but not one such as is termed in medical practice, 'armed expectation,' but an expectation without preparation or foresight. Should he have his way, and our trade is harassed at sea, and our vessels loaded with food products sunk by the enemy's warships, our only recourse would be to fold our arms and call on England to protect us. And if England was not in a position to relieve us, her ships being kept busy on the German ocean or in some other quarter, would the hon. member suggest that we invoke the Monroe doctrine, that is to say, the protection of the United States? Surely not, for my hon. friend as a Canadian would be too proud to remain inactive awaiting the protection of a foreign country.

On the other hand, the leader of the opposition, that is to say, the leader of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, would be in favour of a plebiscite, for this reason, that the Bill provides that the proposed navy will remain under the control of the Canadian paliament. He is in favour of a navy, even of a stronger navy than the one proposed, and if he demands a plebiscite, it is with a view of obtaining from the people authority to place it as soon as completed at the entire disposal of the British admiralty. If England and Canada were to be attacked simultaneously, the leader of the opposition is willing that our fleet should be against our will summoned to the mouth of the Thames, the coasts of England, or elsewhere, at the sweet will of the British admiralty. That is a second breach to the principle of autonomy, a second repudiation of his statements of a year ago, of a month ago.

And, Mr. Speaker, the Conservative party is actually identified with the leader of the opposition. It is all very well for the member for Jacques Cartier to seemingly break away from his leader on that question; it is all very well for him to rouse the province of Quebec and acquire cheap popularity; but whenever Sir Wilfrid Laurier relinguishes the reins of power and gives way before an expression of popular will throughout the Dominion, it is the leader of the opposition who will be summoned to take hold of the government, and the Conservatives of the province of Quebec, who to-day condemn the prime minister on account of his policy of a Canadian navy kept under our control, would be the first you may be sure, to acclaim Mr. Borden, though he is in favour of a larger fleet put entirely at the disposal of Great Britain, and besides of paying over a money contribution of $25,000,000.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier may be sure that this old trick will fail as did the others and that the people will understand the duplicity of the Conservative party who is attempting to attain office by the worn-out tactics of crying: 'too much' in Quebec and 'not enough' in Ontario. The excellent people of Quebec are told: Laurier, your fellow countryman is a traitor, he becoming too English, and in Ontario it is proclaimed that Laurier is disloyal and a traitor to England because he refuses to pay over $25,000,000 in money and to place the Canadian navy unrestrictedly under English control.

There exists in the country, both in Quebec and in the English speaking provinces, a party of moderate opinions, rejecting all extremist and dangerous views. This majority has on every important occasion, decided the issue in such manner as the true interests of Canada required. In the present case common issue will prevail against all wild statements, false accusations, insults and denounciations whether they be uttered by ultra loyalists or by demagogues.

The Bill now submitted to parliament is essentially a Canadian measure and the methods of those opposing it are decidedly dangerous from a Canadian point of view. I cannot understand that men of the parliamentary standing of the hon. member for North Toronto and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier should devote themselves to a task calculated to strain the harmonious and friendly relations existing between the two great races who inhabit this country.

The measure is neither extraordinary nor even absolutely new. I say this advisedly, and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who opposes it so strenuously and with so little justification, has admitted it himself. I say that this measure is nothing more than an adaptation to the navy of the Miliitia Act now in force since several years. Should the hon. member for Jacques Cartier question this, I will quote his own words from 'Hansard' of the 3rd February instant:

> The Bill itself, with the exception of section 18, does not appear to me to contain anything very striking; it is the re-enactment of those statutes which exist since the mother country requested us to assume the responsibility of our own defence. It may therefore be said that, with the exception I have pointed out, it is by no means extraordinary.

If section 18 were withdrawn, the hon. member would not object; the arguments he set forth before a great public meeting against the expenditure to be incurred for a navy, necessarily useless and premature, no longer hold any place in his mind.

Now what is the true meaning of this Bill? Canada having attained a stage of development which enables her to take her place among the nations, naval defence is nothing more than the rational and natural result of the evolution that has been going on since fifteen or twenty years. Those who oppose the measure and reject all idea of a navy ask us how it happens that Canada having continued so long without a navy should now require one. The explanation is easy. Twenty years ago Canada had not yet entered into the period of rapid development. Her population of 3,000,000 has now grown to 7,000,000. Her trade has increased from $200,000,000 to $600,000,000. Her ocean trade, insignificant twenty years ago, is now at least $300,000,000. Our trade with England, in farm produce alone, has grown from $21,000,000 to $105,000,000. Canadian farmers used to export $8,000,000 worth of butter and cheese, to-day those exports represent $23,000,000. Twenty years ago the west scarcely produced any wheat; but the last reports estimates the value of our western crop at $125,000,000, the greater part of which will cross the ocean. In short, Canada holds the second place to-day in the commercial progress of the world and the main purpose of the ships we intend to build will be to protect this trade in case of danger and to enable the Canadian farmer to dispose of his produce in all security.

Will it be contended that we shall not protect our export trade? Should we trust to the United States for the conveying of our exported produce in case of a serious conflict between Great Britain and a foreign naval power? Surely not.

Should England be engaged in war with any foreign naval power, the food stuffs she requires and which comprise four-fifths of the Canadian exports in wheat, cattle, meats, cheese and butter, would be considered as contraband of war and liable to seizure by the enemy.

Mr. BELAND.

Mr. MONK (Translation). The hon. member knows quite well that we have no merchant marine.

Mr. BELAND (Translation). It is not necessary that we should have a merchant marine of our own to export our produce.

I am appealing now to those hon. members representing agricultural constituencies where the dairy industry is flourishing and who proclaim everywhere that in opposing the present Bill they voice the opinion of the farmers. They owe it to their constituents to vote for the measure. I repeat it, the agricultural class has a paramount interest in the Bill, because agriculture should in the first place be protected; we must act with prudence and foresight so that in case of war the farming community may not suffer. That cannot be done, as the hon. leader of the Conservative party suggests, by giving over $25,000,000 to Great Britain to strengthen her fleet, but by expending a smaller but a sufficient sum for the building of a Canadian navy able to protect our own fishermen, our coasts, our sea ports and the produce of our farms shipped for export.

This is the weak point in the position of the few Conservative abstainers. My first reason for supporting the measure is that it is essentially Canadian; my second is that the navy so established will become an indispensable factor in the protection of our export trade; my third that it will powerfully help to maintain the integrity of the colonial bond with Great Britain.

Going a step further, I believe I will be able to show paramount reasons why French Canadians should support this measure. Canada is a part of the British empire and they have every interest that Britain should maintain her naval supremacy. If the British empire were to be dismembered it would be an evil day for the French population of this country, not only from a commercial point of view but also from that of their national and religious life.

The fact that all the British self-governing colonies are adopting a policy similar to ours, and protecting, be it even, for the time being, to a limited extent, coasts that have hitherto been unprotected, will produce a most important moral effect upon any nation that may have hoped to be able to annoy Great Britain or weaken her naval prestige, or who may have dreamed of her dismemberment. It is easy to understand that being confronted by the finest navy in the world—I mean the British navy—protecting the sea coast of the North Sea, the Channel and the Atlantic; and also by the colonial navies stationed at the entrance of the respective ports of Canada, Australia, New Zealand and other colonies, those bellicose enemies of the British empire will speedily assume an attitude of respect, instead of that of aggressiveness which has been theirs of late years, and that British peace which has been maintained on the high seas for over a century, will still prevail. Thus the best means of securing peace seems to be in those defensive measures which we are at present considering.

In my humble opinion no province is more interested than the province of Quebec in the maintenance of the integrity of the British empire. By the beneficial influence of Britain our rights and privileges granted by the British North America Act are protected against the attempts made by demagogues. In the province of Quebec the French Canadian population enjoy the greatest liberty in matters of education and also as to the official use of their language. I know, Mr. Speaker, that those rights are secured to us by the constitution and that our constitution is the result of a conference between Canadian statesmen of different races and religions. But should the prestige of the mother country vanish, should England, after an unsuccessful war, lose the dominion of the seas, that constitution would become a dead letter, and with it the right of using the French language in the parliament of Canada, the privilege of religious instruction in the separate schools of Quebec and Ontario. Have we sufficiently reflected upon the dreadful consequences which might follow the breaking of the bond between Canada and Britain? We would have to choose between independence and annexation to the United States. Independence, apparently the most acceptable alternative, would none the less entail great responsibilities and enormous risks. The risks would consist chiefly in the numerous difficulties to be encountered in inducing the English and Protestant majority, without the preponderant influence of England, to respect the institutions so dear to us. I am quite willing to admit the generous spirit and breadth of view of the English speaking population of Canada, but I would place even greater faith in the protection of England, for since fifty years and more we would seek in vain for any expression of hostility towards us from the lips of a British statesman, of either party, whereas, unfortunately, the same cannot be said of Canada.

I know full well that men there will be in the province of Quebec who will say to the people: 'Perish England and her prestige rather than have a Canadian navy; let us have independence rather than a fleet for the protection of our coasts and commerce.' They will say to us that if by the rupture of the British bond our rights as French Canadian and Catholics were threatened, we might fight as fought our ancestors on the fields of St. Denis, St. Charles and St. Eustache. Those who might be tempted to use such arguments would certainly prove the greatest enemies of the French race in Canada!

For my part, I declare once again that the political state of 'Independence of Canada' would endanger the exercise of our religious and national rights. Let us now turn for a moment to our obligations. If, financially, the establishment of a navy for purposes of protection, as suggested, is too much for our weak shoulders, if there is anything alarming in the expenditure of the twelve or fifteen millions requisite for the establishment of a rudimentary navy composed of four cruisers and a few smaller ships, can we forget that on becoming independent we will lose the protection of the powerful British navy, and that with the hundreds of miles of sea coast on both oceans, we would be obliged to establish a complete one. That would be much more serious. What is the situation of independent nations? Let us take, as examples, some South American republics. Brazil with a population of 17,000,000 has a navy of 15 battleships; Chili, with a population of 3½ millions, has seven battleships; Argentina, with a population of 7 millions, has nine battleships and cruisers. Take the small independent countries of Europe: Holland, with a population of 6 millions, has seventeen cruisers; Sweden, with 7½ millions, fifteen battleships; Denmark, with 2½ millions, 9 battleships.

We find that all those countries, with populations smaller than that of Canada, with the exception of Brazil, have much more powerful navies than that contemplated for Canada; the Bill before the House provides for the building of four cruisers and of some torpedo boats.

I remember having read quite recently a speech delivered at the Monument National, Montreal, in direct opposition to the idea of a national navy, by an eminent speaker well known in this House, Mr. Bourassa. In his speech, he developed this strange contention that Canada, in case of danger, might apply for protection to the United States and require the application of the Monroe doctrine to our case. I humbly submit that for a country like Canada to rely upon the protection of its neighbour would be a position of the deepest disgrace. It would mean something more than disgrace. Does anybody suppose that the United States would consent to a breach of neutrality towards any enemy of England without requiring compensation? Certainly not, and the compensation, in this case, would take the form of territorial and trade concessions; perhaps it might also affect our allegiance.

From a national and religious point of view the annexation of Canada to the United States would be almost as disastrous to the province of Quebec as independence. It will be immediately seen that the French population, instead of being in a proportion of two to five as in Canada, would stand in the proportion of one to thirty in the United States. We would be delivered up to the almost irresistible assimilating power of the American people. Americans would never permit the use of any language but English in Congress. It is quite reasonable to suppose that no exception would be made in favour of the province of Quebec as to education in the public schools. Annexation also would entail taxation for the support of the United States navy—one of the most powerful in the world—and such taxation would be much heavier than any that may be imposed for the creation and maintenance of a navy under the present Bill.

It is clear, therefore, that from a financial point of view as well as from commercial, national and religious considerations, we have every interest in firmly dismissing all idea of independence or annexation; nay more, that we should be ready to submit to heavy sacrifices for the maintenance of the British bond.

Mgr. Plessis understood this when, in 1807, he said to the Catholic population of Quebec: 'You have understood that your dearest interests are inseparable from those of Great Britain.' He also said that 'his flock would be unworthy of the name of Catholics and Canadians if they showed disloyalty or even indifference in the accomplishment of their duty as subjects devoted to their sovereign's interests and defenders of their country.'

The same advice was given at different times by Bishop Panet, by Bishops Signay and Lartigue, in 1837-8, by Bishops Baillargeon and Taché, and later by Archbishop Begin, of Quebec, who some years ago, declared in a sermon delivered in a cathedral of France: 'We are happy to live under the British flag and our country is essentially a land of freedom.'

As I do not wish to make my speech too lengthy, I will now close with the remark that in this matter the Liberal party has avoided extremes; the proposal submitted is moderate and consists in a Canadian naval establishment calculated to protect our coasts and cities, our fishermen and our foreign trade.

The Navy Bill now before the House is the result of eight years of study; it provides for an exclusively Canadian navy, inasmuch as it will be built in Canada, that all the necessary expenditures will be paid into the hands of the Canadian people and that the whole will be under the control of the Canadian parliament.

A plebiscite would become the occasion of unwise apeals, would inevitably result in rousing the English-speaking population, which holds the majority in the country, against the province of Quebec, thus forming an English party or a French party, a most serious and dangerous situation.

The Bill, moreover, as the hon. member for Jacques Cartier said the other day, consists in nothing but a greater scope given to legislation already existing in our statute-books in a less extended form; and this legislation, according to his statement, is by no means extraordinary.

It is the inevitable sequel of our marvellous industrial, agricultural, commercial and political development.

The effect of the establishment of this national navy will be to secure peace and harmony between the races; it will clearly demonstrate the loyalty of the Canadian people towards the motherland, who has granted to us and more especially to the people of the province of Quebec, national and religious privileges which neither independence, nor German allegiance, nor yet annexation to the United States could ever secure.

The measure entails no forced service on the part of the people of this country, nor the imposition of any new taxation, our ordinary public revenues being sufficient to meet the expenditure under this head.

All this is infinitely more akin to the Canadian ideal than would be the contribution of $25,000,000 proposed by the Conservative leader, inasmuch as it safeguards our autonomy and opposes the principle of imperial federation which appears at the root of that proposal.

Instead, therefore, of joining the standard of Mr. Borden, who proposes first of all a contribution of $25,000,000 and then the building of a navy at our own expense, but the control of which would remain with Great Britain, the people of Canada will prefer to continue in their support of the eminent statesman who has been guiding our policy since fourteen years, securing at all times the greatness and prosperity of our country and who, in the present instance, is following in the footsteps of Lafontaine and Cartier.

Mr. C. J. DOHERTY (Montreal, St. Anne). Mr. Speaker before entering upon anything in the nature of an answer to the very able and eloquent address to which we have just listened with very great pleasure, whether we may have agreed or disagreed with the conclusions reached, I crave your permission to make a very brief reference to an incident that occurred this afternoon, and to some observations of my hon. friend the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I need not say that I have no concern with anything that the hon. member from Frontenac has thought proper to say reflecting upon the confidence which should or should not be reposed either in the right hon. the leader of this House or any gentleman either on the other side or this side of the House, but I did listen, I have to say, with a great deal of pain, to some observations which that hon. gentleman found it proper to make. It was with very particular pleasure that I noted that at the conclusion of these observations the hon. gentleman very emphatically repudiated any desire whatever to reflect upon the loyalty of the French Canadian population of the province of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER. Rats!

Mr. DOHERTY. Some of the citations, however, which he thought proper to make, it seems to me should not be allowed to pass unanswered. I give him credit for not intending to reflect upon the loyalty of the population of Quebec.

Mr. GAUVREAU. You are too good.

Mr. DOHERTY—but I think that enough was said to make it quite proper that something should be said to do away with any false impression on that subject that might be created by the citations which the hon. gentleman thought proper to make. I take upon myself the duty of doing that with the greater pleasure because of the fact that I am not a French Canadian, and therefore am not directly concerned, and of the further fact, which is a fact, that from other points of view I may regret that I have not been able to reach precisely the same conclusions on the question which is formally before the House as have been reached by either my French Canadian friends who sit on the other side of the House or by the French Canadians, or some of them, who sit on this side of the House. Thus in what I am about to say I am not speaking on either one side of this question or on the other. I have said I am not a French Canadian. I have, however, had the honour and the advantage to be born in a province largely French Canadian.

Mr. C. A. WILSON. I do not know whether I quite understand the hon. member's remarks, but does he not think it in the public interest that the words that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) this afternoon, should be reproduced all over the country and in the 'Hansard,' at first?

Mr. DOHERTY. I am not in a position to take upon myself to answer a question of that kind. I do not think it is for me to decide to what extent those words ought to be reproduced. For my own part, I think it is vastly more important that any false impression that might have been based on them should be wiped away at once, and that then both the words and the false impression should be forgotten. However, it is for the hon. member for Laval (Mr. C. A. Wilson) to exercise his own judgment as to whether he thinks that good will between the different races in this country would be furthered by the reproduction of words that seem to have given offence notwithstanding the fact of the declaration of the hon. member for Frontenac that he intended none.

However, I do not wish to be led into a discussion upon that question. My desire is to say this much in correction of any false impression that might be derived from the citations made by the hon. member. I was about to say that although I am not a French Canadian, I have the honour and advantage of having been borne in a province largely populated by French Canadians. I have had the pleasure and the advantage of living with and among French Canadians all my life. I think I can claim to know the French Canadian population of the province of Quebec as well as any man who is not of their race, and I am here to say that everything that I have known of them has been of a nature to create the most absolute confidence in their most unrestricted loyalty to their country and to the Crown under which we all live. I have had the advantage not only of knowing them and living among them in civil life, but I have had the pleasure and the honour of serving with them in the rebellion of 1885 in a purely French Canadian regiment, the 65th Battalion, and I can certify that no braver, no more competent, no more devoted soldiers went out to maintain the cause of this country in that rebellion, than my French Canadian fellow countrymen.

The matter to which I wish especially to refer is a work and what purported to be a citation from that work. I had the pleasure and advantage of knowing Reverend Father Hamon whose work purported to be cited here this afternoon. I would point out in the first place that Father Hamon was not a French Canadian. I do not want to say that to his discredit, because he was a friend of mine, a gentleman for whom I entertained the highest respect; but Father Hamon was a Frenchman, and as a Frenchman would have been at liberty, without its reflecting in any way on the loyalty of the French Canadians, to express what aspirations he might choose with regard to the future of the French speaking race on the continent of America. But we need not stop at that, because I have been at pains to send for the work, I have turned to the chapter cited, chapter 18, and I have carefully gone through that and there is not one word in that chapter that is susceptible of being contorted into what was cited as having been written by Father Hamon. With the other work referred to I am not familiar.

Mr. EDWARDS. With the permission of the hon. gentleman I want to say that I quoted what purported to be a correct English translation of that work. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Doherty) says that that was not a correct translation of that work, I gladly accept his assurance to that effect. I do not want to misrepresent any one.

Mr. DOHERTY. I wish to say not only is it not a correct translation, but that there is nothing, absolutely nothing, in the language to warrant the interpretation given to it. I do not pretend to have read all the book, but I have read the chapter from which this purports to be taken, and I have found that it has been distorted in such a manner in the translation as to give a false idea of what it contains but of course we cannot hold my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) responsible, and he no doubt gave his citations in perfect good faith. So far from there being any suggestion in these chapters of the formation of a French republic, the writer showed the most careful reserve against expressing any opinion regarding the future from a political point of view of the French Canadian race, either in the New England States—and it was of these the reverend gentleman was writing—or in the province of Quebec. With regard to the other work mentioned, I have not read it, but I certainly have never seen any reflection or re-echo of its effects among the French Canadians of the province of Quebec, such as one might expect, if the work were as extreme as is suggested; but if my hon. friend is relying on a translation, my experience of a perusual of the other book which he quoted may possibly set him right with regard to the last one. I do not wish to push that matter further. We have had some reference to another question—the speech of a late leading political man in the province of Quebec. But, however, people may view the politics or life work of that man, it was after that work had been completed and after he had been, rightly or wrongly, swept from power by the almost unanimous vote of his fellow countrymen that he gave expression to the views my hon. friend from Frontenac has just cited, so that I do not think any possible inference can be drawn from the expression of those views whereby they might be supposed to represent the sentiments of the French Canadian population. I must apologize for having gone into this matter, which of course is not pertinent to the subject before us for discussion, but I felt it was incumbent upon me to do what little lay in my power to prevent any misconception which might give rise to any feeling of prejudice as between the different races occupying this country.

Having disposed of this little matter and knowing it would be quite impossible for me to do justice to the important subject before the House, on which we are called to express as fully as we can our views, I would respectfully beg, Mr. Speaker, to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

At six o'clock, the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, February 24, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 146) respecting the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company.—Mr. Harty.

QUESTIONS.

NEW YORK CANALS—USE BY CANADIANS.

Mr. PERLEY:

Have Canadian vessels carrying freight the right to use the canals of the state of New York? If so, what statute authorizes it? If not, what statute or regulation prevents it?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH. By the treaty of Washington the government of the United States engaged to urge upon the state governments to secure to British subjects, the use of the several state canals connected with the navigation of the lakes or rivers traversed by, or contiguous to, the boundary line on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States, but this government is not aware that such urgency has, up to the present time, been productive of any practical result.

The matter is, of course, not governed by Canadian legislation, and the government is not in a position to answer as to the legislation on the subject (if any) there may be in the state of New York.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY COAL SHED AT RIVIERE DU LOUP.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

To whom did the Department of Railways grant permission, if any, to erect a coal shed on the property near the Intercolonial railway at Rivière du Loup. Who gave the permission, and when?

Hon. G. P. GRAHAM. In August, 1908, Mr. Doucet met Mr. T. C. Burpee, engineer of maintenance, of the Intercolonial railway at Rivière du Loup, and suggested that he be allowed to shift his coal sluce from where it was originally (that is from the west side of the dump to the east side) stating, that he could unload and release cars much quicker if he were allowed to do this. Mr. Burpee consented to Mr. Doucet making the above change, as it would be in the interest of the railway, but no authority was given to erect a coal shed at the place mentioned.

PETAWAWA MILITARY REVIEW.

Mr. GERALD WHITE. I am sorry the hon. the Minister of Militia is not in his seat, as I wish to draw his attention to an article in last night's 'Journal' as follows:

The arrangements for the great review of Canadian troops at Petawawa military camp when General Sir John French, one of the idols of the British public, visits Canada, are becoming more definite.

The expectation is that Sir John French will be here next June, and that the occasion of his visit will be utilized to have a review of as many troops as it is possible to gather together at one time at Petawawa.

It is likely that all city and rural corps from Toronto on the west, and Quebec on the east at least, will be assembled, during June, and be reviewed by the famous commander. This will mean, if the arrangements are perfected, that there will be no camps at such places as Rockliffe or Brockville this year.

The question of transportation of the troops is one of the chief problems, but it is learned that the railways have been consulted, and that this portion of the arrangements will be negotiated with thoroughness.

It will be remembered that last year when the 'Journal' made this announcement first, its contemporaries rushed into fierce denials, based on interviews with unnamed 'high officials' of the Militia Department.

I would like to ask if this statement is correct, and if so, when this review will take place and how many troops will take part in it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry my colleague is not in his seat, but I will see that the question is put to him, and he will probably answer it to-morrow.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. C. J. DOHERTY (Montreal, St. Anne). May I be permitted, in opening, to express the gratification, which I am sure is felt by all the members of this House, on seeing the right hon. the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in his seat, thus indicating my right hon. friend's complete recovery from his recent indisposition, which we all regretted and in which we all sympathized with him. But, to my regret, I have to follow that expression by the admission that I felt somewhat pained that my right hon. friend should, so soon after his return, be called on to listen to my contribution to that dissonant cacophony, which emanating from this side, has had such a jarring effect on the right hon. gentleman's musical ear. That euphonious expression, by which he characterized our contribution to the discussion of this subject forms part of a scolding which the right hon. gentleman thought necessary to bestow on hon. members on this side with perfect impartiality when he introduced the Bill under discussion. He scolded us for talking and producing thereby a dissonant cacophony; he scolded us also when we were silent, because our silence gave rise to all sorts of apprehensions in his imagination with regard to the thoughts that were passing through our minds; but he scolded us most severely because, when we proceeded to deliberate upon this important question, so fraught with serious consequences to our common country and the empire of which we form a part, he found that we had gone quite beyond anything he could be expected to forgive. I am, therefore, at some difficulty to conceive precisely what line of conduct would, under the circumstances, have won for us my right hon. friend's approval. And it occurred to my mind that he might perhaps have expected us to follow the line of conduct, followed in his parliamentary career by a certain great naval hero, who once occupied the position and played the role of the First Lord of the Admiralty in the British cabinet, and which is aptly described in that great naval composition, familiar to most of us in the days of our youth, entitled, 'Her Majesty's Ship Pinafore.' That very distinguished gentleman, as he strode his deck in all the pride and pomp of power, was wont to tell admiring audiences of his previous parliamentary career, and how he specially prided himself that throughout that career—

He had always voted at his party's call
And never thought of thinking for himself at all.

But the right hon. gentleman should not have expected that line of conduct from us, even if he had expected us to live up to the record of that great naval hero; because he should have remembered that that distinguished man went on to add the reason and explanation of his conduct, and to tell his aforesaid admiring audiences that:

I thought so little they rewarded me
By making me the ruler of the King's navee.

On this side we could look forward to no such enticing consequence of our following the example of that very great man. I do not mean to insinuate, because I desire to refrain from any insinuation that might be in the slightest degree offensive, I do not mean to insinuate that, in consequence of that natural human feeling prevailing among all my distinguished and hon. friends who sit on that side of the House, they may hope, by following the example, to attain the reward that came to that distinguished man, and all find themselves rulers of the King's navee—or, perhaps, I ought to say, under this Bill, of the Governor in Council's navy.

After the right hon. gentleman had administered to us that powerful castigation in the course of which, with his rhetorical bludgeon, he came down heavily on the phylacterial foreheads of the Pharisees whom he saw sitting opposite him, as well as on the bare brows of the unrepentant publicans whom he also suspected of taking a view adverse to the measure he was introducing, he seemed to be in the humour which is sometimes attributed as peculiar to my own fellow countrymen, namely, whenever he sees a head to hit it. And so he hit all those bobbing up heads on this side of the House with perfect impartiality; and then, I have no doubt, he looked round on his own side of the House, to see if there was not an odd one that he could give a whack to, and as he did not find it, why, he evoked the ghost of our dear old friend, that holy man, Peter the Hermit. I have been wondering ever since whether that holy man has had time to get his halo on perfectly straight since the right hon. gentleman came down so heavily on him. But, Mr. Speaker, my reference to this scolding, which ended by a contrast which the right hon. gentleman drew between the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House and himself in particular, and those who entertain the same opinions with him, was merely to point out that so far as that scolding applied to myself, I have nothing to say but to plead guilty to the reproach that was levelled at me. Fortunately for me, I was not among those who had spoken, I had not as yet, at that time contributed to the dissonant cacophony he complained of. If I had had that misfortune, I do not know that I would have recovered as perfectly as I have from the effects of that scolding. I have wondered how the gentlemen to whom it was applied had managed to recover so completely. I do not know anything that could be more awful than to be so accused of creating this dissonance, unless indeed it were that one should find himself in the awful predicament of having been named by yourself, Mr. Speaker; and even then, I have the most absolute confidence that if you ever found yourself under the painful necessity of naming, say, myself, your kindness of heart would prevent you from calling me any such awful names. But, Mr. Speaker, I was among the men who ventured to think; there were many others, I think I may say all those on this side of the House, who were entitled to share the right hon. gentleman's scolding for having thought. We deliberated in the morning, and we deliberated in the evening, and I am not quite sure that some of us did not even lie awake at night thinking about this great question. For my part, I confess my share of guilt in that respect, and I say it with that legitimate pride that a man may take in the conscientious performance of as solemn a duty as any member was ever called upon to fulfil in his capacity of a representative of the people of this country, and as such to take part in the decision of probably the most momentous question that has presented itself for decision by this House since this House has existed.

Having said so much with regard to what was said in opening this debate, it is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to go into any other matter that might rise to a difference of opinion upon any question, either of party politics or personal conduct. We are in face of a question that is quite beyond any considerations based either on the past personal conduct of any individual in this House, or the past record of either of the parties who sit face to face before you. It seems to me that the question before us imposes on each and every one of us the duty of approaching it so far as possible free from the influence either of party feeling or of race feeling, or of those feelings that may be engendered in the human heart by difference of creed, or by differences resulting from points of view of the different sections in the community to which he belongs.

We are the parliament of Canada. It is as such that we are called upon to deal with the momentous questions that are involved in the project of the government and in the amendments to it that are proposed. What Canada has a right to expect from us is the calm, the most judicial exercise of the best judgment which Heaven has conferred upon each one of us. We are here as the parliament of Canada, charged, in the first place, so far as we are a legislative body, with the making of laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada. But we are here also as the parliament of Canada charged with something that is more important than that—charged with the protection, the preservation of the rights of this great country, whose destinies an all-wise and beneficent Providence has committed to our hands. We are charged with the defence of the interests of that great country; but charged —and this is even more important still— with seeing to it that the duties of that great country are so performed as to preserve before the eyes of the world intact and above suspicion, our country's honour.

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), after he had condemned others for standing in the temple and claiming, Pharisee-like, to be the only right exponents of the true doctrine of what our duties are toward the empire of which we are a part, and for having take to themselves credit for possessing alone the true incense of loyalty, proceeded, as it seemed to me, to almost out-Pharisee the Pharisee as he thanked God that he and others who thought with him were Canadians—and consigned all the rest of us to outer darkness, where, though there be not weeping and gnashing of teeth, yet, according to him, there is nothing but ultra-loyalty, ultra-imperialism, and, above all, the most fierce hostility to the autonomy of this country. Mr. Speaker, I desire to protest against the drawing of the line which the right hon. gentleman thought he could draw between those who support him and those who find it their duty to object to the measure that he has proposed. I claim no special quality or virtue for myself when I say that I, too, am a Canadian in as full, as complete, as wide a sense as the right hon. gentleman may seek to give to the expression. I think that we in this House are two hundred and twenty-one Canadians, each of us realizing with pride what it means to be a Canadian, and none of us forgetting what it means to be a Canadian. Because, Mr. Speaker, when I say that I am a Canadian, I say it with the memory clearly in my mind of the answer that was given, about a hundred and fifty years ago at the capitulation of that great city in which I had the honour to be born, and a portion of which I have the greater honour to represent in this House. When to the general representing the conquering army was put the question as to what was to be, in future the status of the inhabitants of the territories which then constituted the province of Quebec, his answer was: 'They become subjects of the King,' Sir, that means that from that day, to be a Canadian, while it implied the right to profess oneself a son and devoted citizen of this country, also carried with it the right to proclaim oneself a British subject. For my part, I know no dividing line between the two. That answer, when it was given, perhaps fell with a harsh sound on the ears of those who had put the question. But that answer contained in itself the charter of the liberties that we in this country enjoy to-day and that, for my part, I trust we and our children's children shall, through the ages that are to come, continue to enjoy under the same title. No doubt, there were at that time some disabilities that affected certain classes of persons who might be British subjects, but they have long since been brushed away until even their memory has been forgotten, and, to-day, as Canadian subjects of the King, we are entitled to the enjoyment of as wide a plentitude of liberty as is enjoyed by any people on the face of the earth. It is for that reason that I say that the right hon. gentleman was not acting the part of the publican— not confessing himself in all humanity a sinner—but playing rather the part of the Pharisee, when he claimed as his own, exclusive possession the title of Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, I approach the consideration of this question as a Canadian. At this stage of the debate, I do not think that it can possibly be questioned that the main feature of this measure is that it makes of it a measure for contribution on the part of Canada to imperial defence. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland), in his very eloquent speech of yesterday afternoon, was at pains to minimize what the government propose to do until he got it down to so small a thing that he felt justified in describing it as a maritime police. I do not know what conception the hon. gentleman had of what the functions of this maritime police were going to be. So far as I know, piracy on the high seas is not very prevalent. So far as I know, no great country, or little country, in this world finds itself to-day called upon to establish and maintain a maritime police for the protection of its trade and commerce. Why, Sir, the protection of the trade and commerce of Canada, in common with the protection of the trade and commerce of the world in general, is found in the fact of the existence of the great and powerful navies of the great civilized countries of the world, the very existence of which navies serves to protect the universal commerce against any danger from depredators and malefactors. As far as I know, the function of a police is to attend to people of that character. But in spite of all the efforts which are made for the purpose with a view of affecting—it is not for me to indicate or point out with what view it is done—of making this thing that is proposed appear something which it is not, I feel absolutely safe in saying that this measure comes before us as a measure intended, or professing to be introduced, for the purpose of fulfilling an obligation on Canada's part to contribute to the defence of the empire. Now, with the question of whether what is proposed is or is not effective to that end I do not propose to deal. It has been exhaustively, if not exhaustingly dealt with, I think, already, but I say as a basis of what I desire to present to the House, that to my mind it is an uncontrovertible proposition that this Bill is before this House because it purports to be the first step on the part of Canada in the direction of establishing a permanent policy of participation in and contribution to the maintenance of an imperial naval force and of sharing in the naval defence of the empire as a whole. I wish it to be well understood that I do not desire to object to this measure because of that fact, but because, to me, it is absolutely clear that that fact carries with it consequences—I desire to correct myself, because that fact implies—necessarily implies—compliance with conditions precedent to the carrying out of this proposed policy, to which conditions the right hon. gentleman and his government, who pride themselves on being in a very special and particular manner the guardians of the autonomy of this country, have never given a thought, at all events, so far as we can hope to trace the result of their thoughts in their actions. Mr. Speaker, a navy is essentially a force that finds its field of operations on the high seas. To talk of a purely defence navy, that is a navy that is always to stay at home, is to speak of a navy whose usefulness is to be reduced, if not abolutely, almost to the vanishing point. A navy, since it does not seem to me that in times of peace we need it for that police duty which looms up so large, and forms such an important part of the measure in the eyes of the hon. member for Beauce, is a something that is to be used in war, and a something that is to be used in war upon the high seas. I do not pretend to speak with any authority upon this subject, but I think I may invoke in support of the proposition which I have laid down the testimony of as competent an authority as is known by any hon. member, or members, of this House, and an authority which is invoked in support of their respective contentions by hon. gentlemen advocating the one or the other of the propositions which are before the House. I mean the British admiralty. We find a memorandum on sea power submitted by them to the colonial conference of 1907, in which they set forth the principles which are involved in sea power. After a long disquisition upon the different functions of the navy, we read the following:

> In the foregoing remarks the word 'defence' does not appear. It is omitted advisedly because the primary object of the British navy is not to defend anything——

We are evidently going to have a navy that is not going to be on the plan of the British navy, and still the British navy has to its credit some successes.

> But to attack the fleets of the enemy, and, by defeating them, to afford protection to British dominions, shipping and commerce. This is the ultimate aim.
> To use the word defence would be misleading, because the word carries with it the idea of a thing to be defended, which would divert attention to local defence instead of fixing it on the force from which attack is to be expected.
> The traditional role of the British navy is not to act on the defensive, but to prepare to attack the force which threatens—in other words, to assume the offensive. On one occasion England departed from her traditional policy, and acting on the defensive, kept her ships in harbour unrigged and unmanned, with the result that the Dutch fleet sailed up the Medway and burnt the ships of war at their moorings.

I think that justifies me in saying that the navy is not a weapon of defence, it is a weapon of offence. And I think there is something almost prophetic in the declaration of these distinguished gentlemen that to use the word 'defence' would be misleading. But, Mr. Speaker, the word 'defence' is used by hon. gentlemen on the other side with redundant reiteration and repetition, as an excuse for the creation of this navy. I need only say, in the words of the Lords of the Admiralty, that the use of the word 'defence' is misleading. I shall not take it upon myself to say for what purpose or with what intention hon. gentlement opposite say that this navy is for defence. I am not concerned in this or in any other discussion with mens' motives. If a measure a man proposes or the thing a man proposes doing commends itself to my mind as a desirable thing to be done, I shall support it no matter how bad his motives may be. On the other hand, if the measure proposed, or the thing suggested as a thing that ought to be done, does not commend itself to my judgment I shall not advocate it no matter how good may be the motives of him who proposes it. I am, therefore, not concerned in the slightest degree with what may be the motives that underlie either the terms of this measure itself or the terms in which it is supported and defended. But I do say, and in that sense I do not think my language can be taken as offensive, that the word 'defence,' as applied to this navy is misleading. One might properly apply to naval warfare, and indeed to any warfare, the theory which that very shrewd and very entertaining Yankee horse trader, David Harum, found of direct application in his own business. True, it is a very unscriptural rule, but after all war is a very unscriptural thing—and so is horse trading. David Harum said that the one rule to which you must always adhere when you went out to trade a horse was to do unto the other fellow as the other fellow would like to do unto you, and do it first. Mr. Speaker, the navy that is going to be exclusively for defence and to wait until the other fellow comes over to do it first won't do very much second. In the very nature of things, therefore, it is impossible to conceive of a navy that is purely for local defence. The field of a navy's operations, the very purpose of its existence and that which is necessary in order that its operations should be effective puts the idea of mere local defence out of the question. And, when we propose to establish a naval force—call it what we like and talk as much as we like about absolute and exclusive control of it, and about keeping it absolutely for ourselves and about letting nobody else get any good out of it unless this parliament says in each particular instance what it shall do—unless we are going to condemn it to absolute uselessness we shall find that we shall have to submit to its going from beyond the control of the governing authority of this country and taking its share in whatever operations may be necessary in war time upon the wide field of the ocean. If these operations are going to be carried out effectively at all they must in the very essence of things be carried out under one central control. I am not advocating that this ought to be so or that it ought not to be so, but we are face to face with the fact that if we are going to have a useful navy we cannot have a stay-at-home navy. And, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to have a useless navy, why, we might a little better keep our money. Therefore, Sir, the overshadowing feature of this measure by which we intend to create a naval force is that it of necessity leads us into the situation that we cannot avoid participation in the wars which may result from the foreign policy of the mother country, and, by that foreign policy we are absolutely bound because the mother country exclusively—and under our existing conditions absolutely rightly—has control of the foreign relations which pertain not only to herself, but to all her colonies. After all, a navy is a weapon that is used to enforce the respective rights of the different nations, to vindicate the rights of one nation may consider that there has been a violation of its rights. It seems, therefore, to follow as clearly as can be that the control of a navy force is a function of the power which controls the foreign policy—the policy that governs the conduct of the nation towards other nations — that a navy is called upon to enforce. From that it would seem to me fairly to follow that the condition precedent to our undertaking to participate in the naval defence of the empire is that we should be given an effective voice in the governing and determination of the foreign relations of the empire. When I lay down that proposition I am not saying something merely on my own authority. You will find repeated statements of very distinguished British statesmen recognizing the absolute correlation of participation in naval defence and participation in the control of the policy which the naval forces of the empire are called upon to defend. In the conference of 1907, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, a statesmen whose memory I am sure is revered on both sides of this House, expressly declared, in language which was perhaps not the most elegant in the world, although it was essentially forcible:

> It is, of course, possible to over estimate the importance of the requirements of the oversea dominions as a factor in our expenditure; but however this may be, the cost of naval defence and the responsibility for the conduct of foreign affairs hang together.

The language, though not very eloquent, could not well be more concise or forcible. Then we have the declaration of Lord Tweedmouth, in which, speaking on behalf of the United Kingdom, and quoting words which he attributed to the right hon. leader of this government: 'If you want our aid, call us to your councils', his lordship expressly recognized that that was a perfectly proper requirement, that the two things corresponded absolutely, and expressed the readiness of the United Kingdom, if the dominions asked for it, to call them to her councils. Now, I want to say that I do not share his lordship's views in pointing out how that calling to the councils could be done. I am not here to propound any theory or to lay down any plan by which what I consider the condition precedent to our undertaking the policy which is proposed may be carried out. What I desire to do is simply to make clear that the finding of a way by which we may have a voice, and a real voice, in the control of the foreign policy of the empire, is an essential condition precedent to our embarking upon any permanent policy of participating in the maintenance of naval forces, that that is an essential condition precedent, if our autonomy, to which the right hon. gentleman attaches such great importance, and to which I may say he does not attach one whit greater importance than I do, is to be maintained. Again, we find that the government of so small a colony as Cape Colony in presenting her resolution found it necessary at the conference of 1907, to point out that 'prior to accepting the burden and expenditure of such a responsibility (participating in the naval defence of the empire), the colonies would require to be represented on an imperial council at which questions concerning, inter alia, the peace of the whole empire be discussed'. And, finally, I may cite an authority which I may say, with me, carries very considerable weight. It is a work written by Professor Lawrence Lowell, professor of the science of government at Harvard University, and, if I am correctly informed, its present president. It is a work written in a spirit which certainly no one can suspect of being hostile, which on the contrary is manifestly most friendly to both the mother country and all of her colonies, and a work which evidences a careful study of the principles and operation of British institutions, which entitles the conclusions reached to the acceptance of any one who has carefully read the premises upon which they are based. Dealing with this question of the relations between the mother country and the colonies, Professor Lowell, says:

While, therefore, the tie with the self-governing colonies might conceivably be put to a severe strain by war, that is highly improbable so long as England maintains a sufficient navy. But, in spite of her wealth, the burden of holding the seas against all the world has grown so heavy as to make her want the colonies, for whose joint benefit she conceives that she carries it, to bear their share, and this cannot be done without giving them a real voice in the foreign policy which the navy may be used to enforce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not using this argument for the purpose of reaching the conclusion that we should never do anything to contribute to the maintenance of England's naval forces, or that we should never do anything to so contribute by means of a navy which we would provide ourselves. I am not seeking to invoke this principle as a ground upon which I would desire to see Canada, my country, shirk any duty or any obligation which the highest sense of honour might lead her to feel was incumbent upon her. What I desire to point out is that, under our constitution, there is no obligation on the part of Canada, legally or constitutionally speaking, to contribute to the naval forces of the empire, and that position will continue to exist so long as the United Kingdom alone has exclusive control of the foreign affairs of the empire. It does not follow, however, that there is an insuperable obstacle in the way of our ever doing anything to aid the naval forces of the empire; but what follows is that there is an obstacle to be removed before we do that, if we are both going to aid the imperial navy and continue at the same time to enjoy our own autonomy. It is most essential, right and proper, that the portion of the empire which charges itself exclusively with the burden of general imperial defence, and more particularly the naval defence, should have exclusive control of its foreign policy. To the hand that wields the sword of empire essentially belongs the right to wield the sceptre of empire. But it is represented that time has come when we should begin to take our part in the general defence of the empire, particularly the naval defence, and it is because this is recognized by the present government that we have before us the Bill that we are now considering. I have no desire to controvert that proposition. I am quite prepared to recognize that whereas Canada, up to the present, has been in the position of a protected colony, while she has been in the position of a child in the nursery or a youth just emerging from the nursery and therefore entitled to look to its parent for protection, or at most had reached that stage where it might properly be expected that she should take care of herself, she has now advanced to the position of a young man who has reached a certain maturity, who has gone out and established his own home, but is still under the advice, guidance and protection of his parents, and who has amassed for himself a certain competency and power. I am quite willing to concede that under those circumstances, it is perfectly proper that the parent should say to him: It is time that you should aid me in carrying the burdens which I have to bear; it is time that you, as a man, should aid me in the difficulties that may be created for me by troublesome and litigious neighbours; it is time that you should stand by me and aid me, even at the expense of some portion of your wealth, and that you should bear your share of the consequences of the enterprise in which I am engaged—enterprises which, as they redound to my benefit and advantage directly, must indirectly redound likewise to yours. This proposition I would be quite prepared to accept. But it seems to me that the youth who, on reaching maturity, is asked to share in the consequences of the operations of his parents, should also have the corresponding, inseparable right to have his say in the control of the operations for which he is to be held jointly responsible. Should he take that position, I do not think it can be urged that he would be going beyond his rights. But it may be argued that even although that be Canada's right, she is within her right if she should choose to renounce it. I question that proposition. I have said that that was Canada's right, but I think I would have described the position more correctly had I said that that was Canada's duty. I realize that Canada, in taking upon her shoulders her share of the responsibility for the control of foreign affairs would be assuming a burden possibly more onerous even than a contribution to the forces of the empire. I recognize that she would be taking an immense responsibility from which, I can well understand, men might shrink to the extent of saying that Canada had better take her share in the defence of the empire, had better contribute to that defence in one way or the other, had better contribute her share in aiding the mother country in the wars of the empire without asking for any voice in the control of foreign affairs, that it would be better for her to have nothing to do with assuming any such grave responsibility. That would be easier for Canada. I do not deny that proposition. It certainly would be easier for Canada, but we, in this parliament, are charged with something that is of vastly greater importance than the interests or even the rights of this country. We are charged with seeing to the performance by this country of its duties; and I say that for us to undertake to create a force to be used in war, and to declare at the same time that we divest ourselves of any responsibility, with regard to the wars in which this force might be used, is not simply to renounce a right, but it is to shirk a duty.

And, of all the things that we should not stand by and see our country do, still less so conduct the affairs of our country as to place her in the position of doing, I know of none that we should guard ourselves more absolutely against than that of either acquiescing in or aiding in her shirking of her duty. I have said that the autonomy of this country is as precious to me as it can be to any gentleman in this House. I include, however, in the autonomy of this country something more than the exclusive control of her material resources and the exclusive holding on to and retaining for ourselves of her money. There are things that, to a man as well as to a nation, are of value far surpassing worldly goods, far surpassing wealth, whether it consist of the ostensible wealth of money or of those other things which go to constitute the real wealth of the world. If we are to have our autonomy, it seems to me that not only the control of our own internal affairs must be our own, not only must we keep it in our hands, not only must we retain for ourselves the administration and direction of the affairs of this our country, our particular portion of the empire to which that country belongs, but we must retain for ourselves and for our nation the right to claim that her soul is her own, that her conscience is her own. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not wish to have it concluded that, because I say this, I am expressing any distrust in the authorities who now control the foreign affairs of this great empire. I do not wish to have it supposed that I desire to imply that there is reason to apprehend that they will try to call us into war that shall be absolutely unjust and inequitable. Nothing is further from my mind than that. The proposition I lay down is this: I may have the most implicit, the most unbounded, confidence in another man—I am glad to say that I count friends in whose honour and spirit of rectitude I have as unwavering confidence as in my own—but I have no right to hand over to the most trusted of these men the keeping of my conscience. And I say that this country has no right, however great, however implicit, however absolutely complete and perfect, her confidence may be in the imperial authorities, to hand over to their keeping her conscience. And there is no question which can present itself for solution to a nation that more closely and immediately touches its conscience than the question of when, and why, and against whom, her armed force is to be used. So, I say, I am not standing here merely claiming that we should not take our share in the burdens of defence because we are not given the right to a voice—because it is not recognized we have the right to a voice—in the control of the foreign policy; I am here to say that, when this duty is presented to us of our taking a share in the maintenance of the naval forces of this empire, there is necessarily presented to us at the same time another duty, the duty of our taking our share in the heavy burden of the control of the foreign affairs of this empire. And I say that we are not at liberty to choose to do the one duty and refuse to do the other, because these two duties are inseparably bound up together. I have said that I am not arguing this proposition as a reason against the passing of the Bill, which is submitted to us and which purports to commit us to a policy of permanent participation in the maintenance of the naval forces of this empire, because I seek to make use of it to evade any duty that is incumbent upon us in the way of aid to the empire from the point of view of what an honourable man or an honourable country ought to do; I had rather err—much rather err—on our country's behalf, as I had much rather err on my own behalf, in doing a little more than honour would require of men than run any risk of doing less than honour would require of me. Mr. Speaker, it is not an impossible thing that our relations should be so adjusted with the different nations that are comprised in this empire as that the doing of both these duties should be possible for us. As I have said, I am not here to propound a plan; I am not here to advocate a plan. I am here simply to point out what is a duty inseparably bound up with the duty which the government are asking us, by means of this Bill, to implement. And I say that it is for those who present this duty to us for our fulfilment to suggest and present, at the same time, a plan and a means by which we be enabled to fulfil the duty that goes with it.

I say that until that plan has been found, and presented, and adopted, we are failing in our most imperious duty from the point of view of the maintenance of the autonomy of this country, in undertaking to commit ourselves to the performance of that other duty involved in the project that is now submitted to us. It is proposed that this country should have no autonomy in its own soul. It is a poor man, Mr. Speaker, that cannot call his soul his own. It seems to me that with all her wealth, Canada will be a poor country indeed if she is not to be allowed to call her soul her own. I am not saying this by way of trying to raise an insuperable obstacle in the way of the performance of this other duty. I concede that there are immense difficulties in the way of constituting a system that will make it possible for us to have a voice in the councils of the empire, so far, alone as foreign relations are concerned, and at the same time leave to us our present autonomous position. This I concede, and I repeat again that I have no more desire to sacrifice one tittle of our autonomy than any other man in this House, or in this country. I concede that it is a difficult problem. But, Mr. Speaker, the statesmen of the mother country and the statesmen of this country have faced difficult problems before, and have overcome them. I concede that the problem is difficult, and I concede that it is immensely difficult precisely because I, for one, would insist that that problem must be so solved as to take from us no power of control over our own affairs that we have to-day. I have no more desire, I would no more consent to the intervention of any other power in the government of this country as we have a right to govern it to-day, than I would seek on her behalf a right to interfere in any way with the government of the United Kingdom, or any other of the nations of the empire. But it does not seem to me an impossible thing that the foreign relations of this empire should be guided and controlled by a body composed of representatives of all the different nations that constitute this empire; and it does not seem to me an impossible thing to find a means whereby to determine to what extent each one of those nations is properly entitled to a voice in the determinatin of the questions to which those foreign relations give rise. All these things are possible. If what I have said is true, that this participation in the control of foreign affairs goes hand in hand with the performance of this other duty that we are asked to fulfil to-day, then it is necessarily true that means can be found whereby that duty may be performed. There is no duty incumbent upon any man or any nation that providence has not made possible of fulfilment; and I believe myself thoroughly that without any sacrifice of our autonomy as we have it to-day, a means can be found of so adjusting our position and the position of other nations of this empire, as to create a situation where it would be quite right and proper that we should take over the burden of our share of the maintenance of the fighting forces of the empire, because then these fighting forces will be an instrument to enforce decisions which we have reached, and for which we shall have to share responsibility. So I say that we should not enter upon a course which means participation in the naval wars of the empire without first seeing to it that the means are provided for the performance of our part of this other duty from which, to my mind, it is absolutely inseparable.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I contrast for a moment this, as it seems to me, necessary method of the protection of our autonomy with what is offered to us by the government as the means of that protection. The method by which the government proposes to protect our autonomy consists simply, as it claims, in the fact that under the provisions of the Bill the government would be at liberty in time of emergency, that is when war is on, or there is immediate apprehension of war, to withdraw absolutely from any participation in the war. Now, Mr. Speaker, just let us look at this for a moment from the point of view of a man who is trying to guard Canada's autonomy. What does it imply, Mr. Speaker? We are proceeding to build a navy as the consequence of and following upon a conference to which our representatives were invited, which was a conference concerning imperial defence. We went to that conference by our representatives. They have returned to Canada, and they have brought us a plan prepared by the imperial authorities as being a means whereby we should contribute to a greater or less extent to imperial defence. The government proposes to go on and carry out that plan under the direction, with the guidance, with the advice, with the assistance, of the imperial authorities and their representatives.

The imperial authorities, or perhaps it is more correct to say the authorities of the United Kingdom, are entitled to expect that when that force is required for the purpose for which they have joined in helping to bring it into existence, namely, the imperial defence, it will be available. That force, whatever it may be, is to go on through all the piping times of peace with, as its commander in chief, His Majesty the King, floating the flag of the empire. This government takes credit to itself that by the creation of this navy it is making a contribution to imperial defence. It is only when the war is declared, it is only in face of the enemy, that this government proposes that Canada should decide whether its navy is going to fight or not. Mr.

Speaker, I said in opening that I wished to treat this question with as little feeling and with as calm and judicial a judgment as I possibly could, but I have to confess that when that is proposed to me as the method of protection of the autonomy of my country, I find it difficult to keep to a calm and judicial discussion of the question. Can it be pretended for a moment that when there is war actually on, or when there is a grave apprehension of war, that is the time that this country should take it upon itself to sit in judgment upon the action of those in whose hands this country, under the system of the government, proposes to consent to leave absolutely the control of all foreign affairs? When war is on, and when this navy, created and maintained in the name of imperial defence, is called upon to bear its share that is the moment this government choose for this country to sit down calmly and quietly and pass judgment upon the actions of the men in whose hands it has left the control of her interests as far as they are concerned with foreign affairs, determine whether those men have acted wrongly and then determine whether our fleet shall stay at home. I do not believe that the government mean to exercise that power. My feeling of partisanship does not go so far as to lead me to believe that the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues mean to exercise that power under the circumstances. If they do not, I ask them where is the protection of the autonomy of which they profess themselves the sole and exclusive protectors, defenders and maintainers against all the world? If, on the other hand, the right hon. gentleman and his government propose under those circumstances to exercise that power, then I ask where is the one thing in this world that is more precious to me and more precious to all Canadians even than Canada's autonomy—where is Canada's honour? The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland), told us yesterday that this measure was the result of seven years of study. Of course, I cannot doubt and I do not question the absolute truth of the hon. gentleman's statement. There have been seven long years of study given to this measure and the result is what I have indicated. I can only say that this is the most unfruitful seven years of study that it has ever been my misfortune to observe. The hon. gentleman, was very severe on the result of our deliberation in the morning and our deliberation in the evening. Those deliberations only lasted after all three weeks, and I think that they did result in the propounding of views, which, while they may have differed, bore upon their face the stamp of the consideration given by manly men to the problem, with honour, with courage and with calm judgment. That result will at least bear comparison with this policy of the government that is going to lead us to choose, which compels us practically to choose between our autonomy and our honour. We may have one, but under the right hon. gentleman's plan we cannot have both. I think that the right hon. gentleman will find that the people of Canada are determined to have both. But the right hon. gentleman has a remedy that avoids all that. There is not going to be the slightest trouble. When the difficulty comes there is going to be a wave, the right hon. gentleman is going to be carried off his feet by that wave, and these little cruisers which will show the flag in time of peace are going to be wafted over to Great Britain's assistance on the crest of that wave. The right hon. gentleman attributed to some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House a desire to sacrifice responsible government. I would ask: Since how long has responsible government been carried on by waves? Evidently the right hon. gentleman, or whoever succeeds him, will have no responsibility for what our navy may do, because it will have been done by the wave and the right hon. gentleman, or whoever succeeds him, will have no responsibility for what our navy may perhaps not do; well, because there was not any wave.

And then possibly the right hon. gentleman, or some successor of his not as skilful as he, in determining just precisely and exactly what the wild waves are saying, may make a mistake as to what they are saying, and our navy may, perhaps, go when it ought not to go or stay at home when it ought not to stay at home, and it all depends on what the wild waves may say, and this—this from a government that claims a monopoly of the protection of responsible government in Canada, But, Mr. Speaker, there is a more serious side to that. No doubt we all believe that if there were serious menace hanging over the mother country or for the matter of that hanging over any nation of the empire, the people of this country would in all normal conditions—I might almost say in all possibly conceivable conditions—be at readiness so far as was within their power to give their aid, including of course the aid of this navy. But while that is true, and while we may feel that confidence we must also realize that we cannot with satisfaction make the determination of the future conduct of this country absolutely dependent upon that particular thing happening whenever there might be a real cause for us to act. After all I do not think I am doing any injustice to the people who are to come after us or possibly to ourselves. when I say that looking at it calmly and reasonably, there might possibly coincide with the moment of urgent necessity some passing irritation in this country that might keep the wave down. And, the wave does not require to be kept down very long, for if you have a few days of disinclination at the critical moment, the usefulness of the navy may be gone when the disinclination has disappeared, and the wave has come to a head. I say, Sir, that for a project submitted to a serious and a thinking people, for a project presented as the result of seven years of thought and meditation and contemplation and study, as the work of men desirous of seeing that this country does its duty to the other nations of the empire and to itself, this project, I have to admit, passes my comprehension. To my mind the policy of this Bill, if it has a policy, can be described as nothing else than a policy of drift. It is a policy of men who, faced with serious problems, do not choose to decide in the one sense or the other. The right hon. gentleman in introducing the Bill, prided himself that it was a measure that would meet with the approval of all moderate men, and then he looked out over this country and he described to this House the people of Canada as being in large measure composed of immoderate men to whose views no attention could be given, of men who were so separated by race feelings, local feelings, feelings of all kinds, that they never could be expected to come together and pronounce a rational judgment on a question of this kind. I think, Sir, that the right hon. gentleman unduly depreciates the people of this country. There may be and there are differences of opinion amongst the people, and I sincerely trust there will always continue to be differences of opinion on public questions as complex and as important as this, because I would despair of the intelligence of the people of this country if it were possible that they, following the glorious example set by the hon. gentlemen who sit on the government side of the House, could be of one mind on this question, without time, without thought, without consideration or examination.

I said that this policy is a policy of drift. My hon. friend the Postmaster General—I think I may say my very good friend the Postmaster General—

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. DOHERTY. I hope I may be able to call him such even after this debate is over.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Hear, hear.

Mr. DOHERTY. My hon. friend the Postmaster General described the government as engaged in steering between the shoals. It is a most excellent accomplishment to be able to steer between the shoals, for it is a very unfortunate thing when the vessel of state runs upon the shoals on the one side or upon the other. And, I have nothing but commendation for the hon. gentleman for the carefulness with which he steers between the shoals, so long as he stays in such very shallow water as this government persists in navigating the ship of state in. But, I would like to point out to the hon. gentleman that when the pilot's attention is exclusively centred on steering between the shoals he may forget just where the ship is going. It is well to avoid the shoals on your way, but it is well also when you are on your way to know where you are going, and if I had advice to offer to this government it would be that they should gather their courage together and try to face like men the consequence of the course upon which they are entering, and which at its beginnings at all events they find so beset with shoals. I believe that the people of this country are looking for men and a party of men that will come out with courage and face this difficult problem with all the difficulties that surround it; face it like men and solve it like men. I believe that what this country is looking for is not successful navigators between the shoals, but men whom they can trust to take their barque out on the wide ocean of the world and guide it through in safety. While the chart which the government is following may perhaps keep it off the shoals, I for my part do not see where it is going to lead Canada to. At the beginning of these remarks I referred to some observations of Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman upon the relations existing between the different nations of the empire. Among other things, that right hon. gentleman said:

> We found ourselves, gentlemen, upon freedom and independence—that is the essence of the British imperial connection; freedom of action on the part of the individual state; freedom in their relations with each other and the mother country. Anything which militates against that principle would be wholly contrary to the genius of our race and our political ideals, and would sooner or later be disastrous. . . . Gentlemen, freedom does not necessarily mean letting things drift.

Mr. Speaker, statesmanship does not necessarily or conceivably mean letting things drift. The right hon. gentleman has said to us, in his most eloquent apology for this measure, that no government can settle questions of this nature according to the ideal view of just what ought to be done. Certainly this government is giving us a most apt particular instance in support of that proposition. But he went on to plume himself of having found a means that was going to satisfy what he calls moderate men. He looks out upon this country and he sees it divided into classes—violent men, who I suppose are seeking to destroy each other, and moderate men, who guide the ship of state in such a manner as to bring it sufficiently near one shoal to pacify one class of these violent men whose views the government disapprove, and who then take another tack and bring it sufficiently near the other shoal to pacify another class of violent men whose views the government also disapprove; with a result which I fancy the government will find, when the time comes for the people to speak, no party and no considerable body of men in this country will approve. In the course of that scolding to which I have referred, some of us on this side of the House were condemned for being too hot, while others of us were condemned, I think more seriously, for being too cold; and then the right hon. gentleman proceeded to pride himself on that moderate, that lukewarm, course which he described to us. I have been for a long time indebted to the right hon. gentleman for some very good advice which he once gave me, and which sent me to search the Scriptures for a rule of conduct. I took the advice and have tried to live up to it. Will the right hon. gentleman pardon me if I try at this moment to pay my debt by suggesting to him that the next time he goes to search the Scriptures to find therein weapons wherewith to confound the Pharisees and smite the Publicans that sit on this side of the House, he push his study as far as the Apocalypse, where he will find some verses—he cannot take offence from them, because they were written to the angel of the church of Laodicea which read something like this: 'I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot; I would thou wert cold or hot; but because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will begin to vomit thee forth'. I confess, Mr. Speaker, that the terminating words are somewhat cacophonous ; they may perhaps be hardly parliamentary. But I have only to say that they are not my words, they are the words of the inspired writer; and I may add that I do not wish at all to apply them to the right hon. gentleman, but rather to the lukewarm dish in the way of a policy that he has set before his followers and that they have succeeded in swallowing and so far as I know have not yet vomited forth, but which I am very much afraid will prove most nauseous to the people of this country.

From all this, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there can be no doubt as to what vote should be given on this Bill. It seems clear to me that the measure, if put into execution under existing circumstances and without proper provision for the performance of the duty it carries with it, is destructive of what is most sacred and holy in the autonomy of this country, and, moreover, it seems to me that the measure is clearly useless as a measure for the defence of the empire. From any point of view I fail to see how any Canadian subject of the King can realize that it is his duty to do otherwise than vote against that measure.

And, now, I propose to say a few words concerning the proposition contained in the amendment of the hon. leader of the opposition. As may possibly have been observed, I have not found it necessary, in dealing with the measure, proposed by the government, to deal with the reasons invoked in the amendment. It does not seem to me necessary to go so far as to inquire whether or not those reasons are well founded. To my mind there stands in the way of the measure of the government an insuperable obstacle, as I have tried to make clear. When I say insuperable, I do not mean insuperable at any time; I mean so long as there is no provision for a proper modification of our relations as regards foreign affairs with the mother country and with the other nations of the empire. Taking that position, one is naturally led to the consideration of the proposition made by the hon. leader of the opposition. With regard to the suggestion contained in that proposition, that there should be an appeal to the people, I have very little to say. So far as I am personally concerned, that the measure proposed by the government should be negatived, for the reason I have given, is so perfectly manifest that I would have no need to appeal to the people to ask them whether it ought to be negatived or not.

But as we are told that there are 140 gentlemen who are going to vote for the passing of this Bill, who are determined that we shall enter upon the course laid down in it no matter what may be said against it, then I would say to these gentlemen: If you are not willing to listen to those who have endeavoured to point out why this measure should not be adopted, will you not at least listen to the people who sent you here? But we are told that the people have all along known about it, and that the people sent these 140 gentlemen here expressly to vote for it. We are told that this policy has been under study since 1902; we are told that the representatives of this government gave expression to some most oracular observations in 1902 in the conference in London, and that the Canadian people have been thinking of this policy ever since. We have even been told that since then there have been two elections and that the people, in both those elections, sent hon. gentlemen opposite here with a special mission to build a navy. And that is the reason given us why the people should not be consulted now. Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall not waste time discussing such an absurd proposition. If there be anything of public notoriety it is that in neither of the two general elections since 1902, a single elector in this country was called upon to give or gave his vote, aye or no, on this question.

My hon. friend from Hochelaga (Mr. Rivet) told us yesterday that this was an ordinary every day question. Well, to describe a question which involves the most fundamental change in our relations with the mother country and the rest of the empire, as an ordinary every day question, is a flight of the imagination which I fail to follow. Why, if a measure involving such consequences from a constitutional point of view, as well as every other, should be propounded in any other country, no one would ever dream of enacting it into law without allowing the people of pass on it. In the neighbouring republic you could not pass such a law, you could not pass such an amendment to the constitution, without submitting it to the people. But in this parliament, we are asked to look upon it as an ordinary every day occurrence. We are asked to pass a measure that will make a most material change in the relations we have hitherto had with the mother country, which imperatively calls for some new adjustment of those relations, and we are told that the people do not need to know anything about it, but that we have a mandate to deal in this parliament with this as with any other question. And we are told that in face of the statement made yesterday by the hon. member from Beauce (Mr. Beland) that one province, at all events, would vote practically unanimously against it, but he thinks that province should not be allowed to express its opinion. He is one of its representatives, and he thinks that that province should not be allowed to talk, and the reason he gives is that he knows it would talk differently from the others. I do not know what are the sources of his knowledge, but the fact, which the hon. gentleman admitted, that there is a marked difference of opinion among our people on this question is a most conclusive reason why the people should be given an opportunity to discuss and pronounce upon it.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Does the hon. gentleman pretend to say that the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) said that the province of Quebec would almost unanimously vote against the measure now before the Chair?

Mr. DOHERTY. Against this Bill, yes.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that the hon. member for Beauce said that in the province of Quebec, the unanimous vote would be against this Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY. Almost the unanimous vote, I think I said.

Mr. GEOFFRION. I did not understand the hon. member for Beauce to say that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. I did not either.

Mr. DOHERTY. I have not the text before me, and if I be mistaken, I am prepared to stand corrected, but I do not think I am. I may not have cited the precise words, but the hon. member for Beauce certainly did proceed to draw a very dark-coloured picture of the sad consequences which would follow an appeal to the people, because such an appeal would have the result of isolating the French Canadian population of Quebec from the other provinces. If by that, the hon. gentleman meant that the French Canadians of Quebec were going to vote for the measure and that the other provinces would vote against it, then he has sources of information with regard to the other provinces which I have not got. For my part, I most heartily concur in the proposition that the people should be given an opportunity to be heard before we adopt a measure involving the most serious constitutional consequences and an expenditure of money of which no man can see the end.

Let me now say a few words with regard to the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in favour of a money contribution. The contribution he suggests has been denounced in the most scathing terms; it has been spoken of in almost tearful tones; I thought that the hon. the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden), when he bewailed the departure of our $25,000,000, would almost have broken down. The leader of the opposition has been represented as making a proposition for the establishment of a system of contributions and for the paying of tribute to the empire. It is hardly worth while to take up time to point out that it is not a proposal to pay contributions, to do anything more than make one special offer of our contribution under exceptional circumstances. The amendment itself is the flattest contradiction of that idea. But just a word on this terrible thing called 'tribute,' which, it is said, we are asked to pay to the empire. If we contribute ships and men and money, if we pay for the maintenance of those ships and their crews, and contribute these to the empire to be used in her wars, and do that voluntarily, hon. gentlemen opposite say we are paying no tribute. But if we take the money which we have to spend to build those ships and maintain them and send that money voluntarily to the mother country, we are forsooth paying tribute. I must confess that I cannot grasp the distinction. I have struggled to understand it but cannot. It is just an instance of grasping at an ugly sounding word and attaching it to another man's proposition, to which it is not at all applicable, and then condemning that proposition because of the epithet attached to it. It reminds me of the old saying about giving a dog a bad name and hanging him. I ask all reasonable people, who understand the English language, how it is possible to say that if the people of this country choose to give to the mother country, by their own free will, a specific sum of money, they are paying tribute? If any gentleman can say 'Yes' to that question, then I would ask him how he comes to the conclusion that, if the people of this country contribute to the mother country, for her use, ships and men and money, this country is not paying tribute? To me, it is absolutely clear that in neither case are we paying tribute. But it is a simple absurdity to say that whether we are or are not paying tribute depends simply upon whether we give in money or whether we give in ships and men. If either of these things is to be called tribute, both of them must be called tribute; and if they are both to be called tribute, then the proposition on one hand would be that we pay the tribute in money, and, on the other hand, that we pay the tribute in things that cost money, and then in the flesh and blood of the men of this country. Now, I know that, if the time came, the men of this country would go willingly. But what I want to make clear is that the difference, in so far as the question of tribute is concerned, between the two policies is the difference between tribute in money and a tribute in money's worth and in the flesh and blood of the citizens of Canada.

Now, in the second place, as to this question of amount—we have had 'twenty-five millions of our money' flaunted before the members of this House, and I have no doubt that 'twenty-five millions of our money' will be flaunted before the eyes of the people of this country ad infinitum, ad nauseam. So far as I have information—and I have the information common to members of this House—that is an exaggeration of just twenty-five per cent. As I understand it, a Dreadnought is bought for £2,000,000. And, according to my arithmetic, twice two are four. But, hon. members on the other side have a species of arithmetic under which twice two is more than four. Now, according to my arithmetic also, £1 is equal to something less than $5. Carrying out the calculation according to the lines to which I have been accustomed, I find that two Dreadnoughts at £2,000,000 each would represent a cost of something less than $20,000,000.

It seems to be conceded on both sides of the House, in the first place, that if there were an imminent necessity and urgency for this contribution it would be quite proper to make it. That statement, if I understand the position of the government, would not be disputed. It has been said, on both sides of the House that the question whether this is or is not a proper thing to do depends upon a question of fact. Well, a question of fact is a question of evidence. I have tried to look at the evidence on both sides as dispassionately as possible, to weigh that evidence fairly and to come to a conclusion, The evidence is of the nature of what may be called expert testimony—some people think that is the extreme of falsity—and also of the evidence which consists not in what people say, but in what they do. Now, in support of this proposition that there is an urgent need of this contribution, and also against the proposition that there is urgent need of this contribution, there are cited the same witnesses. I submit this as showing that the witnesses are regarded by hon. members on both sides of the House as worthy of implicit confidence; the only difference appears to be as to what these witnesses say. I think that the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), speaks with authority on behalf of the government, when he calls witnesses and relies on their testimony. He called certain witnesses; they were, if I remember well, Mr. Asquith, Dr. Macnamara and Sir Edward Grey. These the hon. gentleman put before the House as witnesses absolutely worthy of confidence and belief. I am glad to be able completely to agree with the hon. gentleman in that view of it—I also take these witnesses as entitled to confidence and belief, I take them, moreover, as I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) takes them, as being witnesses who are in a position to know what the facts are concerning this matter. Before we consider the testimony, let us understand clearly the point on which that testimony is taken.

The question at issue is, not whether there is going to be a war to-morrow or whether England is going to be smashed to-morrow, or next week, or the week after; but the question is whether in order that England may be safe, it is necessary to build ships. I think that is the question.

The Postmaster General called his witnesses, and he relied, I think, more especially—it was the strongest testimony—on the statement of Dr. Macnamara. He said, triumphantly: There is no need for money to build ships, because Dr. Macnamara said so, and then he read Dr. Macnamara's testimony. Now, Dr. Macnamara, no doubt, said—I am not giving his exact words—that England is quite safe and was not subject to a scare. And he proceeded to prove it—and how did he prove it? He gave a statement showing that England to-day has so many Dreadnoughts and Germany so many, in 1912 Germany would have so many more, and England should have so many more, and so on down a series of years. What, then, is the testimony of Dr. Macnamara? It is that England is perfectly safe, provided she build Dreadnoughts enough. Then, there is Mr. Asquith, and there are other gentlemen who say virtually the same thing.

Now, there is the further evidence of what people do. Both parties in Britain have been advocating the imposition of new taxes unheard of up to the present time. Both parties agree that there is call for an immense increase in the revenue; they disagree as to the means by which it is to be got. They agree that the reason why increase in the revenue is necessary is that increased armaments are necessary. Now, it is not habitual for governments, for mere amusement, to impose taxes on the people. Increasing taxation is, as a rule, an unpopular course, and I do not know of any popular government that has found any special amusement in it. I would infer that both parties agree that there is need of increased armaments—they confirm Dr. Macnamara's testimony. Then, there is the fact that Britain is going ahead with this construction as fast as she can, in fact, the declaration put in the King's mouth by the witnesses on whom this government rely, is that a substantial increase in expenditure is absolutely necessary. There, then, is the testimony as I have heard it.

And I have considered it. Now, I want to be perfectly frank; I do not say that it is possible, weighing one thing with another, to say that there is absolute certainty of the necessity of that contribution. What I say is that the situation, to put it in the plainest kind of language, seems to be purely and simply this: Here is Canada, we will say, a man in business in a comparatively small way. Here is the United Kingdom, which we liken to a man in the same line of business in an exceedingly large way. Our two men are friends. The man in business in a small way is so tied up in his business relations with the man in business in a large way that if failure comes to the man in business in a large way, our friend in business in a small way will almost inevitably go to the wall. In that situation, our friend whose business is in a small way and whose success depends largely on the success of his friend in the more extensive business, hears rumours going about that his friend is in straitened circumstances; he hears from one man and another man who are in a position to know, that this friend of his is straining every nerve to meet his obligations. People are talking on the sereet, people are saying, What is going to happen when he goes down? But he says to his creditors: Oh, I am all right; I will be able to meet my obligations, I will pull through. But, would you conclude, as the government asks us to conclude, that because that gentleman does not proclaim from the house tops to his creditors that he is in a position of stringency and emergency, that because he is trying to put the best face possible upon the situation, there is no cause at all for anxiety? Is that very reasonable? I put it to any business man. Now the gentleman who is in business in a small way has, we will say, $20,000 available, and his friend lacks that $20,000.

Now, Sir, Canada is as fond of money as any other nation; we on this side of the House are as fond for her of it as hon. gentlemen on the other side, we think sometimes that if we had her money at our disposal, there are certain classes of people who would not get at it as easily as they do when it is in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. Of course, we may be mistaken in that suspicion. But, as I was saying, our friend in the small business has $20,000 available. He feels that not only would he be sorry to see his friend go to the wall, but he would have to suffer himself from the crash, and he thinks the wisest thing he can do is to write to his friend and say: You know your own situation, you know my situation in regard to you; if there is imminent need you may draw on me to the extent of $20,000. That is all our resolution says. That is the purport of our resolution, which hon. gentlemen opposite declaim against as proposing to throw $25,000,000 across the ocean, forcing it upon the people of England, who don't want it, throwing it into the hands of Mr. McKenna and Mr. Asquith against their will. That is all our resolution says. Let hon. gentlemen read it. The proposal is that we should defer any action with regard to a permanent policy until the people have had a chance to make up their minds upon it. I myself would add until the important rights and duties I have referred to are settled and defined. So we say that inasmuch as action on a permanent policy is to be deferred, inasmuch as what we think ought to be done before adopting such permanent policy means delay, and because danger may come within the delay, because there may come an imminent necessity, we are prepared to say to the men who know whether there is imminent necessity or not, men in whom both this government and the opposition have explicit confidence as to their truthfulness and knowledge, we are prepared to say to them: Gentlemen, to meet the imminent needs of the empire, we put at your disposal this sum of money. Mr. Speaker, if that money is drawn under those circumstances, it will be done by men in whom this government has implicit confidence, and upon their testimony that there is imminent need. Will anybody here impute to the government of Great Britain the flagrant dishonesty of drawing money that is so put at their disposal when there is no imminent need for it, and that they will take it only to put it in Great Britain's pocket? When hon. gentlemen tell us that we are throwing $25,000,000 across the Atlantic to these people, giving it away as a pure gift, as the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) said—that is an imputation upon British statesmen whose testimony we are willing to accept as the testimony of men who know what the truth is with regard to the question of urgency. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this money is drawn, I say we have conclusive evidence on the most reliable testimony of the need of that money, if it is drawn we have given it when there was imminent necessity; and even the right hon. gentleman and his government say that in case of imminent necessity, of course, we ought to give immediate assistance. If, on the other hand, there be no imminent necessity, we may sit down and rest content with the implicit confidence that the money will not be drawn. So much for this bugaboo of a gift of $25,000,000 of our money thrown at England, money that will never come back again. It was pathetic, as I said, to hear the Minister of Militia and Defence dwell on those words —' that will never come back again.' Why, Mr. Speaker, the offer in this way of this money is a step of the most ordinary prudence on the part of a country whose prosperity, whose autonomy, depends, if not absolutely, at any rate to a very great extent, on the maintenance of Great Britain's naval power. It is the simplest measure of prudence in face of a situation such that no man will accuse me of exaggeration when I say it is at least exceedingly doubtful. If the doubt should turn out to be well founded, we shall have done our little part to avert the catastrophe; and at the same time, if the doubt should prove to be unfounded, why, our $25,000,000 will never come back again, because it has never gone away.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when you get this question down to a plain common sense basis, it must appear clear that before the proposition of the government can be carried into effect, many things will have to be done; many things will have to be done before we can adopt a permanent policy that will meet our duty to our country, to the mother country, and to the other nations of the empire. It is clear also that while we take the time to deal with these important measures, it is wise for us to make provision that the intervening delay shall not entail serious damage to the empire that we are proposing to help at this moment. I shall not only vote with absolute and complete conviction against the passing of this measure under existing circumstances, but I shall furthermore vote with the absolute confidence that I am acting, as far as the power in my hands enable me, as a prudent administrator on behalf of this country when I vote for the placing to the credit of Great Britain, for the purpose of meeting any imminent necessity, this sum of money. Despairing of this House refraining from taking the unwise and deplorable step of passing this measure, I shall, at least, as a supplication to them to stop in their path, involving most disastrous consequences, vote for an appeal to them to at least appeal to the people. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have done. To sum it all up, I am for Canada doing her duty. I am for her doing just a trifle more than her duty, if there is any doubt where the line of her duty is; but I am for Canada doing all her duty, not half. I recognize, as I have pointed out, that there is a half of her duty inseparable from the half we are called on by this measure to perform that does not concern this government in the slightest degree, to which they have not, in all their seven years, given one moment's thought, in so far as their thoughts are evidenced by their actions. Therefore, I shall vote against a proposition that involves the doing of half our duty, or rather, something which in its incompleteness is no part of our duty, but a sacrifice of the most precious right of this country—her autonomy. I do not vote to make the provisions which have been suggested because I can say that it is impossible that I may find myself guilty of voting for Canada's doing a shadow of a shade more than she ought to do, but because, in spite of that possibility I am, in the first place, anxious that it shall be made quite clear that Canada is not looking for the benefit of the doubt with reference to this question of her duty. In the future that lies before us, it may turn out that it is impossible for us to so arrange matters between ourselves and the mother country and the other nations of the empire that whilst absolutely preserving our autonomy we may obtain an adequate and effective voice in the foreign affairs. If it should be that our best endeavours in this direction, in co-operation with the statesmen of the other nations prove futile, then I have only to say that we will be face to face with a most serious situation, but I do not anticipate that possibility. I believe that it will turn out to be possible and when that possibility has been discovered, and made evident, when what is so found possible has been carried into effect, and when we have found a method whereby all the nations that go to comprise this great empire may have handed over to them the control of what is, properly speaking, the foreign policy of this empire—not the foreign policy of England alone—then shall be our time to fully perform our duty, not only of bearing the burden and responsibility of our share of the conduct and control of that immense foreign policy, but also our share and our fair share, in the contribution that may be necessary to give force, to stand at the back of, to maintain and make effective that foreign policy.

In the meantime, because it will take time to settle all these things, we will have made provision that it shall lie in no man's mouth to say that Canada has endeavoured to shirk her obligations, or has invoked those other things that seem to me bound up with those obligations, merely to put them off. We shall provide that in the interval, if need occurs, our full duty shall have been done. As questions of money are so paramount and so much in the eyes of hon. gentlemen who sit opposite, may I point out that all that will have cost us nothing because, assuming that there is imminent need, and our money be drawn, you have only to suppose that it will take you three years to settle all these weighty questions, and mere fact that we have delayed this policy for three years will have delayed for that period the time when we shall have to begin paying annually the money for the upkeep and maintenance of this navy. If you look at the figures of Admiral Kingsmill who assures us that $3,680,000 will represent that cost of upkeep and add to that sum the interest on the money that these ships are going to cost and a proper allowance for depreciation of these vessels, you will find that the sum of money involved amounts to between $6,000,000 and $7,000,000 a year. So, if you delay merely for three years the carrying out of this scheme while you are arranging these essential preliminaries, if I may call them so, and if there should arise imminent necessity and your money is drawn you have saved it for the three years you are not maintaining an existing navy. So that even if you get down to that, where is our sacrifice? I was particularly struck with the pathetic tone of the hon. Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) when he spoke about that money going. It seemed that in his mind the great thing was not the autonomy of Canada, but the automoney of Canada. Of all the things we must do we must keep that money at home! That was the substance of Canada's obligation. If that was gone responsible government and autonomy were gone. I thought that he had better sit down, figure it out and see that even if the money had to go we would save so much of that money as to make up. In conclusion I desire to say for myself that I have desired to treat this question as a Canadian, and desired to treat it without introducing any foreign consideration, or any consideration of the personal conduct of any man or the record of any party. I think I have succeeded in doing that. I have criticised such parts of the present Bill as seemed to me most seriously and gravely open to criticism.

I would like to be able to hope that hon. gentlemen on the other side would reconsider this measure, but I suppose that is too much to hope for. At all events, I can feel that I have endeavoured—however imperfect my endeavour—to perform what my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, at an early stage of the discussion of this question, declared to be the duty of every Canadian, namely, to speak fairly and freely and without fear, his real thought and his real opinion upon this most momentous question. That, I have endeavoured to do so far as my limited powers enable me. I would wish that the views I have suggested might prevail, because I believe that if they did, ultimately the duties of Canada would be more perfectly performed than they have any prospect or chance of being performed under the system that is outlined in this Bill. I believe that were the views I have humbly submitted given effect to, we Canadians could look forward to a glorious future for this our country. I believe, Sir, we could feel that in this momentous crisis, we had taken up a position that would ensure the full, unquestionable, absolutely perfect performance of every duty that any man could possibly suggest as being incumbent upon us, and that at the same time we had preserved for our country—the country that we all love, the country that is the land of the birth of most of us, the country that is to be the country of all our children who come after us—every right to which she is entitled, and above all that sacred right of her autonomous existence to which we attach so much importance. We could, then, I believe, look forward with pride to Canada continuing to hold her position as one of the most important in this gathering of nations that is going to make up the British empire of the future, holding her position with honour and with credit, and standing there without fear and without reproach like the knight of old, the pride of all the nations clustered around the United Kingdom, and bound together by the golden link of the Crown, that outward symbol of our common aspirations for justice, liberty, order, and the perfection of civilization. In that great aggregation of nations Canada should take her high rank, doing her every duty, speaking with that strong voice to which she is entitled in the councils of that aggregation of nations so far as the control of her relations with the outside world is concerned, and speaking with that voice, as I know it would be spoken, in the interests of peace the world over. I believe, Sir, that if we go about this matter thoughtfully and carefully, trying to foresee the future and not letting ourselves drift into the unknown, a result approaching to if not identical with that which I have tried to forecast will follow upon our efforts.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester). No member of this House, Mr. Speaker, has risen to speak on this important subject who has realized more deeply than I do the gravity of the question with which we are called upon to deal. If I do rise at this advanced stage of the discussion to address this House, I do not do it with the expectation of conveying to the parliament or the people of Canada any very valuable new information. But my electors have never known me to shirk a duty, and I consider that I would be failing in respect for their confidence if I neglected to express my views on a subject so grave as the one now before this House. Therefore, I desire, in the few utterances which I shall address to this parliament, more particularly in order that my vote on this question may not be a silent vote, to give my explicit assent to the Bill which the right hon. the First Minister presented to this House on the 12th of January last. I do not hesitate to say that that Bill meets my hearty approval; and I say so, 'in the keeping of my own conscience,' to use the noble expression of the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty), who has preceded me this evening. The hon. Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) is not in his seat, but I beg you, Mr. Speaker, to convey to him the expression of my deep appreciation of the intelligent patriotism which he manifested at the conference in London last summer, where, in obedience to the mandate of this parliament, he arranged for the construction of a Canadian navy for the protection of Canada and the support of the British empire, and was enabled to bring to this country a measure best suited to the future combined interests of Great Britain and Canada. I beg also that you will convey to him my appreciation of the noble speech he delivered in this House a few days ago. I should have imagined that the information he then gave might have been sufficient to satisfy this parliament, so that this country might have gone on immediately and prepare for the construction of a navy which would be the pride of Canada. Mr. Speaker, I regret that our hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Hon. L. P. Brodeur) has not been within our hearing during this debate. He shares our confidence and our admiration equally with the Minister of Militia and Defence. We regret that his illness detains him from this House at this time. He has endeared himself to every one who has come in contact with him. Endowed with the virtues and qualities that make a good citizen, he has brought to the public life of Canada a high culture as the guide of his activities, which we deeply regret are not at this juncture available to the country; but we hope that his speedy restoration to health may soon enable him to return to the station for which he is so well fitted.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot undertake to follow my hon. predecessor, the member for St. Anne, in his arraignment of the government on this question, although I shall probably deal with some of his arguments in the course of my remarks. I may take this opportunity, however, to express to my hon. friend from Ste. Anne my sincere thanks and appreciation for the noble manner in which last night, within the walls of this parliament, he nobly performed the noble duty of correcting a misconception of the sentiments of the French Canadian people on the part of the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), due perhaps to a lack of knowledge of the things of which that hon. gentleman was speaking.

Mr. Speaker, a few of the people of Canada are against any kind of assistance to the British empire, whether by naval contribution or otherwise, on the mere ground that the causes of war have been left behind this century, and they assert that this policy is barbarous and reactionary. It is precisely owing to my appreciation of the sincerity of these noble people in expressing such sentiments that I wish to pay them the respect of my attention. When they tell us that war on land and on sea is abominable and abhorent, and that all nations should pray Heaven that it may never occur again, I am proud to say, Mr. Speaker, that their feelings are my feelings, and I stand with them against all efforts to stampede public opinion in behalf of warlike behaviour. But again when they tell us that in the conditions in which we live and under the circumstances surrounding the great empire of which we are a sister nation, the strongest and wealthiest of the family of sister nations in its realm, we should remain indifferent to the fate of that empire and neglect to assume our responsibilities as a part of it, a responsibility created by protection and privileges received, a protection and privileges which will last as long as Britain lasts and will cease the day Britain falls, I must say that their judgment cannot meet my judgment. We are called upon, Mr.

Speaker, to deal, not with a theory, but with conditions. We must take the world as it is before us. We are living in a turbulent world, in which ambitions rise at every moment at one point or another. In days gone by many a great war has been declared to be the last which would take place, owing to its awful consequences. Yet other wars have been waged, and always in the name of justice. Entreaties for peace have taken different forms in different centuries, until to-day they have taken the form of a peace tribunal, a referendum to arbitration with a view to the limitation of armaments. Great Britain, in its wisdom and generosity was the first to propose a reference of the question of the limitation of armaments to international agreement.

Great Britain proposed a limitation of armament by international agreement, but Germany vetoed the proposition, and her veto was closely followed by the announcement of a programme of naval development coupled, of course, with the declaration that all those preparations for war were made necessary by the rapid expansion of her commerce throughout the world and the dignity and greatness of Germany demanded a navy proportionate to the great rise of that empire as a world power. England's language was the language of peace, coupled with an offer of peace, whereas Germany's was the language of peace, coupled with preparations for the future. Germany went on building ships and making guns and still crying out for peace. The old doctrine of the Roman, Si vis pacem para bellum, is still in existence.

Nineteen centuries of an advancing, progressive, christian civilization have failed to bring the human race within the reach of universal peace; and although at times I cherish the hope of our reaching that desired goal, I am afraid that this 20th century may yet close without giving us the realization of that ideal status. With the advancing centuries, civilized nations have increased in population, wealth and ambition. The national, commercial and industrial expansion has forced on them the necessity of providing means for the maintenance of their increasing populations; and when one continent no longer offers such necessities, nations looked across other seas for other lands for their evergrowing land and population. Under that impetus, five nations to-day have acquired the position of world powers. An American authority defines world powers as those which are directly interested in all parts of the world and whose voices must be listened to everywhere. Of these world powers, the British empire is the oldest and most deserving, and the youngest, and not in the least in merit, is the United States. Of these world powers some, either for war or for peace, either for aggressiveness or the protection of their commerce, keep increasing their armaments, and their subjects in all parts of the world, are crying out in unison for further protection of their commerce. Among those powers the British empire holds the supremacy which she swerves over the world in the best interests of humanity and civilization, and it behooves every British subject in every part of the world, according to his means, to work in the defence of the British empire, in defence of the British flag which so gloriously protects the true ideas of civil, political and religious liberty. It is to that power that Canada owes her autonomy, and it is that power which granted the province of New Brunswick the same privileges after many years of manly effort. Ever since the day when England proclaimed Catholic emancipation, she has opened her harbours, her hospitals, her domestic and national sanctuaries to the Catholic priests of France and Spain and the rest of the world; and in this 20th century we find these religious bodies, driven, under the plundering whip of the officials of the government at Paris, from their own homes and possessions in foreign countries, looking to the British empire for a safe retreat and a home where they are to-day giving that country, which they have adopted as their own, the benefit of their labours and their experience.

And, Mr. Speaker, as this great empire, so beneficial to the world at large, cannot get along without ships or guns, it is our duty to share in the expenditure on these things in return for the protection we have received and not depend entirely upon the mother country. We must relieve the empire of a part of the burden in a way satisfactoy to both the empire and Canada. So long as other nations are bending their energies in the direction of providing armaments for themselves, so long must we keep in line and help the motherland. We are looking for peace, and I say that there is no power whose stability today makes for peace more than the British empire. Every one knows that England's supremacy does not mean an expansion of territory. She has all the colonies she can attend to and all the subjects she can look after. Moreover, her strong sea power is not complemented by vast land armies as is the case in other countries, particularly Germany. Therefore, her position to-day is a declaration and a promise of peace and protection of commerce. The world is looking for peace, and British supremacy means universal peace. Permanent British supremacy means permanent peace the world over. The crippling of Britain would mean the destruction of the balance of power in Europe, and this would be a matter of momentous consideration for the United States as well as Canada and Europe.

Our neighbours to the south, to-day, are, no doubt, watching the course of events in Europe as intently as we are. The voice of the world-power of the western hemisphere must be listened to everywhere, and I have no doubt that, to-day, the United States, with deeply solicitous consideration of events, is earnestly watching the movements of Canada toward the future. Other pressure besides the menace of war may be brought to bear upon a nation. Trade restrictions, wise but firm counsel, diplomacy in many directions, exchange of views —all these appealing and potent factors are in the possession of the United States of America. It may be that the world-power of the western hemisphere will be called upon to speak, and, as I say, there is no doubt that the United States to-day is carefully considering the initial steps that Canada is about to take for the building of a navy of her own with a view to protecting her own trade and sea-coast, and for co-operation with the British empire in time of emergency. The sooner we protect our coasts, and the better protection we give the sooner will the voice of America, in the direction of peace, be heard with attention and authority, with force and magnetism by other powers. The Americans are a nation of great activity and enterprise. They have had regard for their own future. They built a navy, modest in its beginnings, but which has grown rapidly with the growth of the country. It may be said that we might remain without a navy and, for the future, depend upon the protection of the British empire in time of need, or we might look to receive from the United States some protection. It is true, the United States might give that protection as to a neighbour. But would our acceptance of such a position be in keeping with our growth and our increasing importance in the world? Besides, if this protection were given, some day we should have to pay for it, directly or indirectly. Why not, then, pay for it ourselves and protect ourselves, and not depend upon others? How can we do otherwise and entertain aspirations to be one of the great nations of the future?

I stated at the beginning of my remarks that I gave my hearty approval to the Bill. I should have given it just as hearty approval had it been brought in five or seven years ago, for, in my humble opinion, we should have begun years ago what we are beginning to-day. I am not a militarist—I could not shoot a gun even if called upon to do so, though I should be glad to do whatever lies in my power should an emergency arise—but I say that, with the advancement Canada has made, with her immense coasts on the Pacific and the Atlantic, and with a harmonious neighbour to the south, one with whom there is neither expectation or possibility of misunderstanding, I would sooner, for my part, have taken half the money we have spent on our miltia and devoted it to the making of a navy. Had this been done, I believe we should be in a better position to-day. We should have to sacrifice something. That is always necessary. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) spoke about the sacrifices that Britain had to make, at our expense, to conciliate the United States. Whatever we have lost by the diplomacy of England, we have taken our medicine like men and looked to other activities to make up our loss. Our action in building a navy, instead of being distasteful to the United States, will be helpful to them and will be appreciated. We should build a navy which will render further secure all possible interests on our vast sea-coasts. We will build a navy which will, therefore, help to combine the interests of Canada and the British empire, and will help, at the same time, the interest of the United States, for these two countries are bound in harmony for all time to come. American sympathy will always be extended to us as friendly neighbours, as Canadians, as Britishers. The United States would rather have Canada, as a neighbour, a part of the British empire than have it a part of the German or any other empire. The United States is a friendly nation with the British empire, a kindred nation, remindful, boastful of its ancestry. Consider the incident related in the despatches concerning Commander Peary a few nights ago. At a great meeting in New York, he was presented with a cheque for $10,000 in honour of his achievements as an Arctic explorer. In receiving the cheque, he expressed himself as follows:

> This cheque will be deposited to-morrow as a joint contribution of the members of this audience, by the officers and committee of the civic forum and myself towards an American Antartic expedition for the purpose of exploration and scientific investigation, and to enter the Stars and Stripes in a splendid, manly race for the south pole with our British cousins, than whom there are no finer foemen in the world.

'British cousins,' he calls them, and he says, 'there are no finer foemen in the world.' My hope for universal peace is chiefly grounded, in my estimation, on the future combined greatness of Canada and the United States. These countries have common aspirations for all that is good and true, in peaceful service of all human activities, agriculture, commerce, industry, which are bound to create comfort, prosperity and happiness, and have a tendency to the intellectual development towards literature, arts and sciences, the successful achievements of which can only be reached by an independent mind free from worry, moral or material, in the case of a nation as of an individual.

It had been hoped that the United States, in the nineteenth century, would have taken warning from the ruinous policy of European countries in piling up armaments, and would have followed a more peaceful policy. She has not done so, consequently we enter the twentieth century with more or less apprehension. The twentieth century is Canada's century, that is the utterance of our great premier himself, spoken before an American audience. Time has already proved utterances of our noble leader, as having been made under prophetic inspiration; just as was the utterance of Joseph Howe who, 75 years ago, described the Canada of his day and the country lying west of the great lakes, as constituting the foundation of another and greater British empire in North America. And so, Sir, we see it to-day. And I have no doubt that these words of Joseph Howe will also come true, and prove him likewise to have spoken through prophetic inspiration. Now, Sir, when we consider the combined possibilities of these two great North American nations, Canada and the United States, when we see that one country is the complement of the other in a great many of the raw materials and natural resources which are necessary to happy human existence, able to live side by side in harmony and prosperity for centuries to come, in perfect isolation from the rest of the world This, Sir, is a position which no other country in the world can boast of, and certainly not Germany. By the middle of this century Canada will have a population of 40 or 50 million people, inhabiting a country enormously wealthy in agricultural products, minerals, coal, iron, lumber, water-powers and everything else necessary to maintain a nation in perpetuity, with unbounded quantities of capital from Great Britain, from the United States, and from our own people, with a shipping extending to all parts of the world; and when we take such a country and such a people in agreement with 125 million people in the United States, who will say that these combined interests will not be sufficient to impose peace on the whole world, and will not be a stronger factor for civilization than any other possible device of human genius? We would then see fulfilled the aspirations of Joseph Howe, 75 years ago, a great Dominion of Canada in full possession of all the privileges, wealth and happiness she could desire, and forming an integral part of that great British empire which would make for universal peace. I say all the aspirations of Canadians lie in the direction of building up on this continent a great nation as part of the British empire; and if there is one element of our people more than another, if there is one province more than another deeply, personally, I might say, specially interested, in keeping up this British connection, in keeping the British flag floating over Canada, it is the French element and the province of Quebec. So long as the British flag floats over Canada, so long will the spirit of liberty protect the minority, the weaker against the stronger. Sir, we need not recount the ambitions of the forefathers of the French people in the province of Quebec. It is not necessary for me to describe the feelings of the French Canadian people towards the British empire. We have heard them expressed in our mother's prayers, we have heard our mothers' prayers rising to heaven for the security of the great British empire, and that the British flag might continue to float over Canada. Those prayers which have risen from Canadian altars towards heaven for the maintenance of British supremacy over Canada were not intended for to-day, or for to-morrow, but were intended for all future time. We hear it said sometimes that our noble leader is not faithful to the British flag. Sir, those who say that have never reflected perhaps on the fact that his own mother has uttered prayers for the maintenance of the British flag over this Canada of ours. When we remember what occurred on three or four occasions when our Prime Minister visited England, when we think of the cordial reception given him by all classes, from Queen Victoria, the greatest woman sovereign that ever lived, from members of the government, from corporations of cities, and from the leaders of the British people, when I remember that our great King Edward VII, on a recent occasion sent a message of felicitation to our Prime Minister on the occasion of his last birthday, I say that in his estimation the British flag still waves proud when it is inflated with the breath of the millions of French Canadian souls that are happy to live under its protection. I say furthat should it be necessary for my voice to be heard in some hamlet of Ontario or in any portion of the western country, I shall not delay, as a French Canadian to advocate the continued supremacy of Great Britain over Canada, and the perpetuity of the glory of the British flag.

Now, Sir, there is another point to which I wish to give some consideration. Some of our friends on the other side of the House and on the other side of politics in this country, separate themselves from the rest of us when they declare that we can do nothing on behalf of the great empire unless we at once contribute a large amount of money for her assistance. In this connection let me explain my own understanding of the situation between Germany and the British empire, or between Germany and the rest of the world. When I have made plain my position on that question, I shall be in a position to explain why I think the building of a navy is a better means than a direct contribution towards strengthening the British empire. Our friends opposite see a constant menace from the German empire. As they have stated she has been preparing armaments. If so, it was her right to do so. She was not bound to accede to the view of the Hague conference. She may have had different views from those held by other countries, but, for my part I see no danger of German supremacy over British supremacy. The utterances of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House would lead us to suppose that they anticipate a crisis in a year or two. In this connection I will quote the words of the hon. leader of the opposition who, speaking in this House on January 12, and referring to some expressions of my hon. friend the leader of the government, said:

> Yet the right hon. gentleman may say: Since then it has passed away and there is no need to take further care. These statements pointed to a crisis and an emergency and a peril which might face the British empire within two or three years at the outside. Has that peril passed? No, Sir, we are nearer to it by nearly a year.

Mr. Speaker, the peril that existed last year has not passed, perhaps, because, to my mind, it did not exist and it does not exist to-day any more than it existed at that time. We have heard on many occasions hon. members on the other side of the House asking for an immediate contribution, before they have had time to go to the people for their verdict upon the proposition, of $25,000,000 to England. England to-day can borrow money at a cheaper rate than we can, at a cheaper rate than Germany can, because she has not been under the necessity of bleeding her subjects for the maintenance of her army as Germany has been. Some hon. members on the other side of the House seem to hold in their hands an emergency which they are afraid they are going to let fall upon us at any moment. I believe that we should take a more sedate view of things and that we should be satisfied with the expressions that are given by these nations themselves. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) gave to the House in his speech some time ago valuable information from German sources. Will you permit me, Mr. Speaker, to quote the words of the German ambassador at Washington (Count Von Bernsteroff), who, speaking in November, 1909, at the very moment when we were leaving our homes to come within the precincts of this parliament, before the American Academy of Political and Social Science, then meeting in Philadelphia, said:

> The world policy of the German empire is purely commercial and without any territorial ambitions or deep-seated designs against other states and the existing balance of power in the world. We do not strive to acquire further colonies by a redistribution of the empire and are quite content to develop the resources of those colonies we have. It is therefore no part of my purpose to speak this evening of our colonial policy. What we however do seek for, is foreign trade and for this reason we are staunch supporters of the theory of the 'open door,' which is also firmly upheld by the United States.

The German ambassador goes on to explain the enormous increase in the industrial production of Germany, the rapid increase in the population and the necessity of procuring bread to feed such a great number of people. He goes on to explain the means to which Germany must resort to keep together the bodies and souls of her sixty million people, increasing at the annual rate of one million. He points out the necessity that the German people are under of looking abroad for raw materials and multiply their value to the people by manufacturing. Then he continues:

> We are now obliged to have a navy in proportion to our foreign trade and protecting these important departments of our national enterprise, but we do not desire to 'rule the waves,' and the development of our navy need, therefore, not be regarded with suspicion by anybody.

I imagine that these words are very plain. They are uttered by the German ambassador to one of the greatest world powers of to-day. The same ambassador also referred to the cause of these disquieting rumours coming from Germany. He alluded to the agitation of the Pan-Germanists which form the basis of the policy pursued by newspaper editors of the class of the jingo press of the United States, England and Canada, and he declared that these Pan-Germanists have no influence in Germany, that they have scarcely a representative in the Reichstag, and that they do not represent the sentiments of the great bulk of the people or of the German government. Yet, they give the jingo papers of Great Britain, the United States and Canada occasion to unduly foment suspicion against Germany. Then the German ambassador goes on: 'We are now obliged to have a navy in proportion to our foreign trade and protecting these important departments of our national enterprise, but we do not desire to 'rule the waves,' and the development of our navy need therefore not be regarded with suspicion by any body.' Why should we not believe in the sincerity of these expressions by the ambassador of the German empire? Are we justified in concluding that these men, representing the power of the German empire, would undertake to deceive the world at large by such expressions? If perchance Germany has the intention, which I deny, of deceiving the English people, can we believe that the ambassador would undertake to deceive the people of the United States to whom he was speaking? Therefore, we should restrain our desire to cry out to the world that there is danger to the British empire from Germany. There would be danger to the British empire if Great Britain remained inactive. But, she is not remaining inactive. She maintains her position of superiority. Her position to-day is as strong, comparatively, against any one power in the world, as it was ten or fifteen years ago.

It has not decreased. The only change there is in the world is that Germany has started the construction of great vessels of war, and England is meeting her efforts in that direction. And, inasmuch as the British empire will keep up the construction of warships pari passu with Germany, the British empire five years hence or ten years hence, will have the same supremacy over the German empire that she has at the present day. One would imagine that almost every available quotation had been cited to the House during the course of this debate, but, I would like to refer to the statement of Dr. Macnamara, parliamentary secertary, to the admiralty who said:

Dr. Macnamara, parliamentary secretary to the admiralty, dealt with the 'emergency' argument very recently in a speech at Hastings. The London 'Times'' report of a part of his remarks follows:

In Dreadnoughts we have at present seven, against Germany's two, and, in addition, three more were rapidly approaching completion. In April, 1912, the so-called point of danger, we should have twenty Dreadnoughts to Germany's thirteen.

At the same date we should have forty pre-Dreadnought battleships, under twenty years of age, with an aggregate displacement of 585,000 tons, mounting 656 guns from 6-inch. to 12-inch., including 152 12-inch. guns. At the same date Germany would have twenty pre-Dreadnoughts under twenty years of age, with an aggregate displacement of 241,000 tons, and mounting 384 guns from 5-inch. to 11-inch.

In the matter of cruisers, and leaving out the Invincibles, which I have counted with the Dreadnoughts, we should have in April, 1912, thirty-five cruisers of an aggregate displacement of 416,000 tons, and mounting 470 guns of from 6-inch. to 9·2-inch., while Germany would have eight cruisers, with an aggregate displacement of 78,542 tons, and 112 guns of 5·9-inch. to 9·4 inch.

Of docks big enough to take Dreadnoughts we have to-day twelve in home waters, against Germany's six.

To this should be added the statement made in the 'Navy League Annual (1909-10) giving the personnel of the navy at 128,000 of all ranks. This number does not include the reserves. The same publication gives the German navy's personnel as 53,769.

I call attention of hon. members to the fact that Dr. Macnamara here points out that England has to-day double the power of construction that Germany has. Hon. gentleman on the other side from whom we ought to expect better things, tell us that if we do not have Dreadnoughts built at once the German Dreadnoughts are going to take possession of our coasts. Let me point out to these hon. gentlemen that the German Dreadnoughts are all of small coal capacity, that they can only take enough coal on board to last them four or five days and that consequently they are not intended to travel on distant seas, their mission being to protect German interests in the North sea. Canada need never fear a German Dreadnought coming to her shores, and if such a thing should ever happen that German Dreadnoughts would be sent forward, they would never be able to get back again. Germany will be engaged for the next twenty years in building all the Dreadnoughts she can for the protection of her own commerce as against possible aggression from Russia, in the Baltic sea, or France, if Germany should provoke hostilities with France, or possibly with Italy, because we all know that Italy would side with England rather than with Germany, the triple alliance notwithstanding. The Germans know that they will not have too many Dreadnoughts for the protection of their own commerce in the waters surrounding their own territory. Does it remain for me, a modest member from a modest constituency in New Brunswick to tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that Germany is not prepared to-day to declare war against Great Britain, and will not be prepared for many years to come. My own authority would not have any effect on these hon. gentlemen, but I shall quote to them an article which appeared in October last, in the New York 'Journal of Commerce,' and which was written by one of the editors who had paid a visit to Germany for the special purpose of ascertaining the situation and giving his views. This is what the 'Journal of Commerce' says:

Suppose the German fleet is to be as powerful as the British by 1912, the possibility of a successful German descent on the coast of England would be as distant as ever. As against Germany, the strategical position of England is regarded by most naval experts as sufficiently strong to make it impossible for Germany to send any naval force, large or small, into the English channel by the Straits of Dover, or into the Atlantic by the north of Scotland. The task to which Germany appears to have set herself involves more than the building of Dreadnoughts. The Kiel canal has to be deepened at a cost of $55,000,000, and this is a work which will not be finished before 1915. So with the deepening of the approaches to the German naval harbours and the construction of new basins and new docks. All of these are rendered necessary by the new type of warship, and without them the offensive capacity of the German navy must remain negligible.

Such is the position of the German navy to-day, and we know that the German ambassador has stated that Germany has no other ambition than that of protecting her own commerce. Whether it may or may not be that Germany has designs on the British empire the fact remains that Germany is a negligible quantity in navy encounters for many years and must remain so. If hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied with the authority I have quoted, I shall cite to them the statement of the Berlin correspondent of the Montreal 'Star,' who, on the 9th of February last, confirmed the opinion of the New York 'Journal of Commerce,' in the following despatch:

Germany's Great Naval Base—When completed will be Finest on North Sea, with Special Harbours.

(Special to the Montreal 'Star').

Berlin, February 9.—Plans for the new great naval base of the German empire at the western end of the Kaiser Wilhelm canal at Bruensbuttel have been finished, and the work will be begun immediately. The total cost will be in the neighbourhood of $7,500,000.

When the work is finally completed, which will require many years, it will be the greatest naval base on the North Sea. It will rank with Kiel. The harbour will extend from Bruensbuttel, northeastward, to a small lake which connects with the canal. It will be divided into harbours for the largest warships and for merchant vessels. Great floating docks and boat harbours will also be constructed.

So, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand the reasons which actuate our friends on the other side in apprehending an immediate German peril, and, therefore, insisting upon an immediate contribution to England. But they say, should the peril come, what will you do? And then they quote the words of our noble leader, but not in the way of appreciation, when he said that when that time comes a wave of enthusiasm will traverse this country. Yes, Mr. Speaker, when that time comes. I pray that it may never come; but should it come unpectedly, in five years, in ten years or next year, that wave of enthusiasm will certainly spread over the whole country, appeal to the heart of every Canadian, and cause thousands of our young men to go to the assistance of Great Britain. It will rise, Mr. Speaker, to the door of the Canadian treasury, and our patriotic Finance Minister, who thirteen years ago unreservedly gave to the British empire the preferential tariff, will again unreservedly open the doors of the treasury to the British empire according to its need, even if he has in the course of time to convert his surpluses of many millions into as many deficits. But, Mr. Speaker, in time of emergency contributions will be given by whatever government may be in power, though by the expression of hon. gentlemen opposite we would imagine that the present government were to be in power in perpetuity; and it may be that if they are not in power in perpetuity, they may be for a long time. But should the time come when a Conservative government would be in power, I believe a wave of enthusiasm of the Canadian people would then also rise to the doors of the treasury. A contribution, Mr. Speaker, is a matter of a moment. If I understood correctly my hon. friend from St. Anne, he said that contribution does not mean tribute. A contribution for an emergency no doubt does not mean tribute; but if you undertake to-day to help England or the British empire by a contribution, you make it a contribution in the future. It is not a contribution given in a moment of generosity, under special conditions; but when you come to parliament year after year, whether there are good reports or bad reports financially from the country, to have the money voted it certainly becomes a tribute; and under certain conditions, in some particular year, the people of Canada or the members of this parliament might not see the necessity of that tribute, and a difficulty might arise which would not be to the advantage of Canada.

But we are told that a contribution from Canada to-day would give prestige to the British empire. Mr. Speaker, if prestige is required for the British empire, what would give it a greater prestige—a contribution of $25,000,000, of which she has no need, or a contribution of a navy for the protection of trade in this portion of the empire, thus relieving her of the obligation of protecting that trade. We are told that our navy would be of no consideration. It will be of this consideration, Mr. Speaker, that it will have as many ships as England will not require to build for our protection. If every sister nation of the empire can within a few years have a navy sufficient for the protection of its coasts and its trade, England would not be under the necessity of providing for the protection of the commercee of the different nations in her family, and, therefore, would be, like Germany, restricted to the necessity of simply protecting her harbours and commerce in the North Sea and around the British isles. The interests of Canada and those of the British empire are to-day so closely interwoven that we cannot separate them. Whatever we do for the development of Canadian resources is for the benefit of England as well as this country; and whatever we do to increase the prestige and the commerce of Great Britain and the maintenance of her supremacy is in the interest of Canada as well as of the other nations of the empire. We cannot separate our interests, and, therefore, we should take no step which might divert the exercise of our energies from the development of our own resourcese of land, forest and sea. We should do nothing that would tend to cause a lull in our activity or reduce the revenues of the country, not only in consideration of the material interests of the country, but in consideration of the fact that this development tends to attach more firmly to the country the people of the eastern provinces, and thereby enables us to send more people to develop the provinces of western Canada, where a large proportion of the food of the British empire will be produced in the future. We must never forget, Mr. Speaker, that in the course of a few years—and time travels fast in this twentieth century—Canada may be the only country from which the British isles may obtain foodstuffs, that in the course of perhaps another decade the United States will have no wheat, or a very small quantity, to export, that in a short time that country will have a population of a hundred million people, and may have to resort to new activities in industry and commerce, and find an outlet for its surplus population. It is already asserted that before the middle of this century, owing to the great activities in the iron industry, the iron deposits of Great Britain may be exhausted, and Canada will then be looked to, to provide the iron and steel for the construction of Dreadnoughts or whatever engines of war will then be required.

One of the greatest duties incumbent on this government is to do all that is possible to promote the development of the iron industry and the iron deposits in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Time we know travels faster now than it ever did. It has travelled faster in the last twenty years than in any previous era, and the day may come shortly when we may be called on to produce and furnish that precious metal for English ships, both in her merchant and naval marine.

I thought last year when this House unanimously passed the resolution regarding naval defence, and gave a mandate to our ministers who went to the British conference, that the Conservative party would have remained faithful to their vote, just as the party on this side has done. Last winter I listened with great pleasure to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the hon. the leader of the opposition, as they declared themselves in favour of a Canadian navy and opposed to a contribution. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) then said:

> Then, again, I think this method ignores the necessity and the aspirations and the prospects of a great people such as the Canadian people are destined to become.

Hon. gentlemen opposite talk of our projected navy. They say it will be too small. But I can quote against them perhaps the greatest parliamentarian on the other side, the member for Toronto again, who said:

> We must have beginnings, this must at first be small, but sometime or other our country will have its naval force for the defence of this country, if for nothing else.

These were the words of the hon. member for North Toronto in March last, when we adopted the resolution drawn by himself and somewhat modified by the right hon. the leader of this House and by the leader of the opposition. On that same day my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, said, see page 3517 of 'Hansard':

> In so far as my hon. friend, the Prime Minister, to-day outlines the lines of naval defence, I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of the opinion, in the first place, that the proper line on which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that. The other experiment has been tried as between Australia and the mother country, and it has not worked satisfactorily in any respect.

These were the words of the hon. leader of the opposition at that time. We were then all in perfect harmony. Our delegates to the British conference left this country under the authority of the mandate, so strongly and eloquently expressed by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) and the right hon. the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). It was equally the duty of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) to be faithful to that mandate as it was the duty of the Prime Minister. Our delegates came back with a plan of a navy for the protection of Canada and the protection of the British empire, which was approved by that conference. While they were at that conference in London, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was in London also, and on the 1st of July, at the Canadian banquet in that city, he spoke as follows:

> The resolution in the form in which it was passed, while its terms might not upon the surface seem as significant at this moment as the offer of one or two Dreadnoughts would have been, laid down a permanent policy for the Dominion of Canada upon which both parties united and which would serve a more practical purpose than any such offer of Dreadnoughts.

Here is the declaration of my esteemed friend, and in saying this I speak sincerely for there is none for whom I have a greater respect personally than the leader of the opposition. He then said we had laid the foundation for a permanent assistance to the British empire which would serve a more practical purpose than any offer of Dreadnoughts. He expressed those views on the 1st of July last, when the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden), and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur), were in London striving to reach a conclusion at the conference which would carry out the mandate given them. Later on, the leader of the opposition visited his constituency of Halifax. On the 14th of October he addressed his electorate there in these words:

One governing principle at least should control, namely, that out of our material, by our own labour and by the instructed skill of our own people, any necessary provision for our naval defence should be made so far as may be reasonably possible.

He also said on that same occasion:

The House of Commons last session laid down a policy touching naval defence in which both parties united. It may not have satisfied the aspirations of all Conservatives, but it seemed our bounden duty to place, if possible, above the limits of partisan strife a question so vital and so far-reaching.

These were as eloquent words as I could wish to hear from a Canadian. They were words to which perhaps no other occasion could give rise, and I believe that the sentiment expressed in them was felt by my hon. friend at that time. But if I understood well the argument of my hon. friend, who preceded me, (Mr. Doherty) and for whom I also have the greatest respect, he thinks we should do nothing until the people have given us a mandate. But, Sir, we have had that mandate ever since confederation. The Canadian government had a mandate to begin the construction of a Canadian navy when it organized our militia, and I do not consider that my hon. friend reached the height of his dignity when he endeavoured to turn into ridicule the navy which the Prime Minister is proposing now to construct. He said it would be a navy of the Governor General in Council. Well, the militia of Canada, is the militia of the Governor General in Council. The leader of the opposition, as I have said, has not followed the noble expressions he used in London and to his electors in Halifax. What power has caused the hon. leader to change his tone it is not for me to consider or to learn. I can only say that I deeply regret the change he has made. It seems to me there is no ground for his present amendment in so far as it differs from the resolution to which he gave his approval on the 29th of March last. In considering briefly this contrast let me take up his present amendment, dealing with the last paragraph first.

That in the meantime the immediate duty of Canada and the impending necessities of the empire can best be discharged and met by placing without delay at the disposal of the imperial authorities as a free and loyal contribution from the people of Canada, such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two battleships or armoured cruisers of the latest Dreadnought type, giving to the admiralty full discretion to expend the said sum at such time and for such purposes of naval defence as in their judgment may best serve to increase the united strength of the empire and thus assure its peace and security.

Contrast this with the utterances of the hon. gentleman in Halifax six months before or in London last July. He declared that the policy laid down was better than a contribution of Dreadnoughts, but to-day he wants to give $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 to contribute two Dreadnoughts to the British navy, and in the expenditure of that money we should have nothing to say.

Another paragraph of the resolution says:

That no permanent policy should be entered upon involving large future expenditures of this character until it has been submitted to the people and has received their approval.

Last March, the hon. leader of the opposition, as well as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) did not think of appealing to the people on the question of building the new navy. We could not commence it soon enough to suit them. The hon. leader of the opposition added the words 'speedy action' in order that no time be lost. He went to his own constituency in October last, a few days before the opening of parliament, and told the people there that we would build a Canadian navy, but this might not meet the aspirations of every Conservative, but we must raise this question above the level of party politics. And his electors applauded his words; evidently they did not feel that it was necessary to appeal to the people on this matter, but encouraged him to go on as speedily as the government and parliament of Canada could go. Another paragraph says:

The proposals of the government do not follow the suggestions and recommendations of the admiralty and in so far as they empower the government to withhold the naval forces of Canada from those of the empire in time of war are ill-advised and dangerous.

This proposal I cannot interpret as anything but an attack upon the autonomy of this nation in the disposal of its own money. Sir, the late Joseph Howe, in his day, persistently maintained our right of autonomy. He maintained that principle for his own province of Nova Scotia in all matters of importance. He wanted autonomy for the people of Nova Scotia in every thing possible. For my part, were I the leader of the opposition, a professed follower and disciple of Joseph Howe, I would hardly venture to express such sentiments as those expressed in this resolution, even if I entertained them; I should be afraid that the shade of Joseph Howe would rise in ire against me. I am sure that as time goes on and history takes a more just view of the course of events in Canada and in Nova Scotia, the figure and the work of Howe will occupy a larger place in our records; he will receive from posterity justice that was denied him by his contemporaries. I say that the language of this resolution I have quoted is most surprising when uttered by one who comes from Nova Scotia.

But we are told, we cannot build a navy. Certainly, we never can build a navy if we never commence to build it. What greater prestige can we give to England to-day than to show the world the spectacle of docks and shipyards—whether at Halifax or St. John or Quebec, it matters little to me—but the world will know that Canada has entered actively on a policy of providing for the future and of being able to render the greatest assistance to Britain should it be required. They tell us that we have not the skill to manage these ships. We will import the skill from England for a while, if necessary. That will not be detrimental to England. We will teach our men, who have the instinct of the sea, how to manage these craft that are new to us. We have a population on our sea-board who have inherited a knowledge of the sea, so that the boys at fourteen years of age are perfect sailors. We have them among the Englishmen and the Scotchmen of the maritime provinces, we have them among the Acadians also—fishermen, seamen, who are already appealing to me for positions in the fleet that is to be built. We have such men on the Bay des Chaleurs, on the shores of the St. Lawrence on both sides. I am sure that my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) and you also, Mr. Speaker (Mr. Marcil), the representative of one of the greatest maritime counties, know of many men who are but waiting the opportunity to board a Canadian ship to be trained under a British commander.

Mr. Speaker, our Acadian people have been as useful to Canada, and contributed as much to its greatness, as any other race or portion of a race in this country. We have contributed to the improvement of the maritime provinces. We have kept our children at home; and I may be permitted to say to you, Mr. Speaker, that we have rendered great service to the whole nation by contributing so largely to the increase of population in the maritime provinces, particularly in New Brunswick. Every Acadian mother, as she breathes on the face of her child sends up to Heaven a truly Canadian aspiration for Canada and the empire. As I say, there is no aspiration purely Canadian that is not also British, I say that the children of those mothers are to-day waiting for an opportunity to go to the defence of Canada and the British empire.

Now, Sir, we are told that this Naval Bill proposed by the government is not in conformity with the requirments of the British admiralty. Well, supposing I admitted the contention of our hon. friends opposite that this Navy Bill was not in accordance with the wishes or desires of the British authority, is it by offering an amendment to submit the question to the people that we will make it more conformable to the desires of the British authorities? Is it by asking seven or eight million people to express their opinion upon it that we will make it more in conformity with the aspirations, the requirements and the desires of the British authorities? If that is the view of our hon. friends opposite why did they not bring in an amendment proposing, in place of the thirteen ships that the government are to build the fleet unit that was at first suggested by the admiralty at the conference? Then we might say that our hon. friends opposite had some desire to meet the requirements of the admiralty. But instead of offering such an amendment to the Bill, they ask us to make a direct contribution. Now, Sir, I wish to say that in my estimation our representatives at the British conference acted wisely, not only according to the mandate given them by the resolution of the 29th of March last, but in harmony with the opinions of the admiralty themselves. It was first suggested that Canada should provide a fleet unit for the Pacific coast only, and Mr. McKenna admitted that the conditions of Canada were such, that our coast was so extensive, that it was not possible to provide a fleet unit for both the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts. Does not the leader of the opposition think that the coast of the maritime provinces needs protection, inasmuch as it is through the ports of that coast, St. John and Halifax, that the bread stuffs for the English people must pass on their way across the ocean? I believe that our representatives not only acted wisely, but I give them credit for having been able to bring about harmony in that conference in the interest both of Canada, and of the empire. I am sure there is scarcely a Canadian who will say, after looking at the question in all its phases, that this government has not adopted the wisest policy, not only for Canada, but for the empire, by providing for the protection of trade on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast. Canada being a maritime country cannot avoid the necessity of protecting her coasts. Whether we form part of the British empire or join the United States, Canada will always have to protect her coasts, both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. Those great harbours of St. John and Halifax, as Joseph Howe said, have not been placed there merely for the use of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; they have been placed there by Providence for the use of the northern half of this continent, as gateways through which the foodstuffs of Canada may pass on their way to Great Britain. They have been placed there by Providence for the advantage of the British empire, and as we are a part of the British empire for all time to come, it is our duty to refuse no sacrifice, to shirk no effort, in order to protect those coasts. Even if we were not a part of the empire, we would have to protect them for our own exclusive advantage. Hitherto we have not expended anything for their protection, because, forming a part of the empire, the empire has protected them for us. Therefore, our gratitude to the empire, as well as our own national pride, should now lead us to begin the work of self-protection. No nation can aspire to greatness that has not maritime interests.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to be proud of our position, proud and thankful to Providence for giving us such advantages as we have. It is our earnest prayer that we may be able to use them in the interest of Canada and of that great empire which maintains supremacy amongst the nations of the world, to the benefit of civilization, and whose flag protects us as no other flag could protect us. I say that the sooner this parliament passes this Bill, and the sooner we put Canada in a position to commence the building of her docks, her shipyards and her navy, the greater will be the service we will render to this country and the empire. For my part, I express again with all my heart my greatest admiration for the Bill which has been provided by the Prime Minister. It is not in my power to pass upon our esteemed leader the splendid eulogy that has been pronounced by other hon. members who have preceded me, from the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) to the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland), who spoke yesterday. Upon them has been bestowed the Providential gift of language adequate to their feelings, their sentiments and their love for their leader, as well as for the British flag. Upon me, however, has been bestowed the privilege and the right to nurture in all modesty the same feelings for my leader and for the British empire.

Mr. G. H. BARNARD (Victoria, B.C.). Mr. Speaker, I did not expect to find myself upon common ground with the last speaker (Mr. Turgeon) in this debate, but contrary to my expectations, I find that there is one point on which we can agree. He told us that he was unable to make any answer to the speech of the hon. member from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) who preceded him, and I confess that I am unable to follow the hon. gentleman himself (Mr. Turgeon) in the ramifications in which he has indulged. I may say, in passing, in reference to the speech of the hon. member for St. Anne, that I very much doubt whether any hon. gentleman on the other side of the House will undertake to analyse that speech and fairly and squarely meet the contentions which were made by the hon. member for St. Anne, for the simple reason that I believe that his arguments were so closely reasoned out and were so convincing that no hon. member on the other side of the House will accept the challenge thrown down by that hon. gentleman to endeavour to give a fair and square answer to them. In regard to the speech of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, there is one thing that he referred to which gives me some consolation to-night in case I should be tempted in any way to transgress the rules of the House to the extent of possibly going a little bit outside of the question before the House. When I observed that you allowed the hon. gentleman to discuss, without any rebuke on your part, the question of Commander Peary devoting the $10,000 that some society gave to him for discovering the North Pole, I came to the conclusion that pretty nearly anything that one might venture to say between the poles would be relevant to this discussion. I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any great length to-night, and I will promise you this consideration for your own feelings and for the feelings of everybody else that I will not quote the language of Dr. MacNamara where he promises that England shall have ten Dreadnoughts at the same time that Germany has five, and so forth and so on. I will try and keep a little more from repetition than that. I am sorry to see that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) is not in his seat to-night, because, unfortunately, I feel that, owing to the line he took in addressing this House on this question the other day, I really must call attention to some matters which were contained in his speech and which should be answered. The hon. gentleman was very free in his accusations against members on this side of the House of inconsistency. He waxed eloquent upon the subject of the instability of the line of action of members on this side of the House. Why, he grew so indignant at times that I almost felt that his vocabulary was hardly sufficient to find words in which he could express his disdain of anybody who had changed his opinion upon this subject. After rating hon. members on this side of the House for some time, the hon. gentleman stood forth as an apostle of consistency, and, clothed in the robes of his own righteousness, he proceeded to denounce hon. members on this side of the House for the stand they had taken on this subject. Well, let us examine records and see whether he practises what he preaches. My hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) put a very simple and a very courteous question to him, a question which has been put to many hon. members on the other side of the House during this debate. He was asked by that hon. gentleman if he considered that there was an emergency or a crisis at the present time, and whether he thought the policy of the government was one which would answer to that crisis. He said, somewhat grandiloquently, with a wave of his hand, that he did not like to have the logical sequence of his speech disturbed, and he went on to make a remark about the speech which my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo delivered, which, I think, was absolutely undeserved, for, I venture to say that any impartial listener would concede that my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo is quite as able to make a speech in this House as the hon. member for Nanaimo, or, for that matter, as any other hon. gentleman in this House. He was asked if he thought there was a crisis. What did he say? Crisis? Why, perish the thought. Here are the remarks he made:

> Now I submit that the question as to whether a crisis exists is to be determined by some reasonable process.

I would like, in passing, to say that I have noticed since I have been in this House that the hon. member for Nanaimo is very fond of using the words 'reasonable process,' 'logical sequence,' and words of that kind. He proceeded:

> The leader of the opposition said we must determine whether there is a crisis in Britain by the statements of responsible men in England. In that I agree with my hon. friend. But can my hon. friend, or any other man of this House, conclude that there is a crisis or a serious danger, from the statements of responsible men in England? I may be told, how is it that the Liberal government in England, for the last two years, and especially the last year, have been increasing the power of the British navy; and according to the despatches received in this country yesterday, the speech from the Throne, at the meeting of the British parliament, asks for a further increase in the provision for strengthening the navy. Well, Sir, I look upon all that as an evidence, not of a crisis, not of danger, but of a determination to secure absolute security.

Not satisfied with establishing, quite to his own satisfaction, like every hon. gentleman who has spoken on the other side of the House, that there is no crisis, he proceeds to tell why there is no crisis. To do that, he quotes certain language published in a certain English newspaper, the name of which he does not give, but which makes certain reference to Lord Northcliffe, and he says:

> What is the 'emergency'? It is nothnig more than the superheated sixpence a word rant of a Socialist agitator, backed by the prestige of the greatest living journalistic acrobatic and mountebank—chief press agent of the Unionist party—Lord Northcliffe.
> These two dangerous demagogues have played the strings of the war harp so clamorously and persistently, they have for political purposes so basely misrepresented the naval strength of England and exaggerated that of Germany, that half the nation believes Britain is in danger, and excitable Canadians have already begun to shout for a life line. This is to take the form of an 'emergency contribution.'

Well, Sir, judging from the language of the hon. gentleman and from the fact that he quoted that clipping from an English newspaper with reference to Lord Northcliffe, any reasonable person would come to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman had a very poor opinion of Lord Northcliffe, who is evidently not the kind of man upon whose view he would base a conclusion as to whether there was or was not a crisis. At the opening of this debate the Prime Minister remarked that a number of tongues had wagged during the recess. Possibly they did, but although the right hon. gentleman may not have known it, some Liberal tongues also wagged, and amongst those wagging tongues was the tongue of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith). In the city of Victoria, which I may say is very much interested both for patriotic and commercial reasons in this Bill, a telegram was received during the recess from London which gave rise to the apprehension that possibly the naval station and dry dock might be removed from Esquimalt to some other point in British Columbia. A meeting of the Board of Trade was held to consider the matter, and there were present at that meeting my hon. friend from Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) who was brought from Nanaimo especially for the purpose, and my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, and being present myself I happened to hear what the member for Nanaimo said, and I have before me quotations from the local papers giving his remarks. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith) said at that meeting:

Last session at Ottawa he had occasion to refer to military expenditures. He did not complain of their size, but he did complain that the people were not getting all they should from the expenditure. There was not a fair distribution. British Columbia was not getting as fair a distribution as many provinces. He had never been carried away with jingoism.

There again I think the members of this House will recognize the member from Nanaimo.

He had often wondered whether all the fuss that had been made had any foundation. He had met military men, statesmen and others, many experts, and had discussed the situation with them. As a 'democrat' in the old country he had always been against jingoism. His father had told him the Tory party was ever ready with a war scare while the Liberal party was working for the peaceful development of the country. He stated this in explanation. He had, however, listened to the speeches.

And to whose speeches do you think the hon. gentleman had listened?

He had, however, listened to the speeches of Lord Northcliffe, he had read the speeches of Sir Edward Grey, and others, moderate in tone the most of them, but convincing.

A Crisis at Hand.

After serious consideration he had arrived at the conclusion that there is a crisis in England, and it is necessary for the colonies to interest themeslves in the defence of the empire. It is necessary for them to make their position and interest in the empire felt. He believed that not only was there a crisis but that there was danger, and the time had undoubtedly come when the colonies of the empire should arise and make known their real position.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read that quotation from the 'Colonist,' which is a Conservative paper in Victoria, but I am glad to be able to say that a representative of the Liberal paper in that city was also present at that meeting. The Minister of Inland Revenue spoke at that meeting also, and as the Minister of Inland Revenue controls the destinies of the Liberal newspaper, the 'Victoria Times,' the hon. member for Nanaimo naturally could not expect to have the same amount of space devoted to his speech as the Minister of Inland Revenue had to his, and consequently the report of the member for Nanaimo's speech in the 'Times' is not given so fully. However, it was fairly well reported, and from the Victoria 'Times' of September 25, I quote:

Ralph Smith being called upon, said that he had been commanded by the president of the board of trade to appear. He felt that all the people of British Columbia were in favour of Esquimalt as a naval base. The imperial authorities had chosen it, and arguments in its favour were superfluous. Every condition of nature had seemed to have selected it as a suitable place, therefore there is nothing to discuss. The object in asking them to attend the meeting was doubtless that they might give an expression of opinion. Being the member for Esquimalt, from which district he drew so much of his support, it was natural that he would do so. Taking the natural advantages of the place into consideration, and as the member for the district, he would be glad to lend it any support. It was satisfactory to think that Canada had by unanimous resolution of the House of Commons committed themselves to the policy of aiding the defence of the empire. He was glad that they had taken the stand that it was not wise to make a direct contribution, but to build ships of their own.

At the last session of the House he had made a few adverse remarks on the administration of that department, but in discussing the question with men of all lines of thought from the old country he had come to the conclusion that there had arisen a crisis in England, and that it was necessary for the colonial interests to make themselves felt.

Here again you recognize the same old story:

His natural tendency was opposed to militarism, but now he believes there was a crisis. Men like Sir Edward Grey and others of the Liberal party who could not be easily led astray by a scare had expressed themselves on this subject, and he was now ready to support any plan for naval defence.

Now, the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) is the gentleman who came into this House two days ago and accused the members on this side of the House with having changed their views on this question of naval protection. I am sorry the hon. gentleman (Mr. Smith) is not present as I would like to have asked him what is responsible for the change in his views. No change in the meantime has taken place in the conditions to account for his sudden reversion of opinion. We know that, on the authority of the hon. gentleman himself because speaking of the leader of the opposition he said:

There can be no change in any conditions or any circumstances which would correspond to the enormous change in his opinions.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if there was nothing to change the opinion of the leader of the opposition which was expressed twelve months ago, what has happened in the last four months to so diametrically change the opinions of the member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith). Can it be possible that the hon. gentleman has one opinion on this question for the benefit of his constituents and the people on the Pacific coast, and that he holds another view for the benefit of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Liberal party? I hesitate to think that can be the reason. Is it that he did not fully consider the matter? It cannot be that, because he told us at the meeting to which I refer that he had come to the conclusion he did come to after serious consideration; and I give the hon. gentleman the credit of giving at least as serious consideration to his remarks in the House as he gave to his remarks made before the public outside of the House. Well, Mr. Speaker, is it the party lash, is it the thumb-screw, to which he has referred? The hon. gentleman, in spite of the fact of his English birth—I think he has enlarged on that once or twice in this House, and I am sure that he has done so once at least during this debate—in spite of the fact of his devotion for what he is pleased to call the motherland, and in spite of the pious affirmation,' an expression which I think has been used before in this debate, he stands in this position, that four months ago he was convinced after serious consideration that there was a crisis in the affairs of the empire, and he is now willing, in obedience to the party lash and the crack of the party whip, to vote for a policy which provides for no immediate aid in that crisis, which in fact negatives immediate aid and provides that there shall be no aid for something like six years. The hon. gentleman said that the party thumb-screw had been applied to me and that I had been compelled to change some of my opinions. Well, I am thankful to say that if I have experienced the party thumb-screw, although I do not know of it as yet, I certainly have never been placed in as pitiful and humiliating a position as the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) is in to-day.

I would like to refer to one or two little samples of the consistency and logic of the hon. member, as evidenced by this one speech. I do not propose to go outside of that, because I think it is enough. He scores the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) for what he said concerning British diplomacy. Why, Mr. Speaker, the feelings of the hon. member for Nanaimo were absolutely hurt. What does he say? He says: 'I myself am a little jealous of Britain and British diplomacy'; and on the strength of that he proceeds to read a lecture to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. He reads that lecture because that hon. gentleman made some reflections on British diplomacy; but the same hon. member for Nanaimo is prepared to fall in adoration at the feet of the Prime Minister, who said in this House that he hailed with delight the day when Canada would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy. He was quite right to say that he was only a 'little jealous' because under the circumstances he can't really be very jealous. Again the hon. gentleman has been one of the strongest advocates of the present policy of the government. In fact, he advocated it so strongly that he became almost belligerent. He looked and talked like a regular old warhorse. One would imagine he was almost dying to get this navy so that he could go to war with somebody. What a change has come over the hon. gentleman, if you compare his remarks the other day with those he made when speaking on the budget last session. These will be found at column 4732 of 'Hansard' of 1909. Speaking of the expenditures on the militia he said:

> I say there is no justification for spending $7,000,000 on the frills and fripperies of militarism. I am speaking frankly to the House. I will tell you what I would do with the $7,000,000 that is now expended on the militia. I do not know what it is for. I can quite understand the necessity of defence if you know that there is an existing enemy, but I am not aware of any. Where is the possible approaching enemy of Canada? Where does he live? Do you say in the United States? There never was a time in the history of this country when the feeling between this country and the United States was as friendly as it is at the present time. Where is the enemy to come from? What are you spending the money for? Is it fashionable to have a militia?

Compare that language with the language of the hon. gentleman in the House the other day, when he was advocating a naval militia. Is that the language of a man whose heart is sincere for the defence of the country? He went on further to say:

> I know it is proper to have a reasonable measure of protection and have it better distributed in Esquimalt as well as Halifax and other points.

What he meant by this is shown by the following remark which he made a little later:

> I believe that our coasts should be protected by fishery cruisers and that there should be efficient police supervision and protection along the boundary line. But what I did say and what I repeat is, that a time when you have to restrict the ordinary expenditures of this country in its present state of progress and development, is not the time to expend $7,000,000 of the people's money for military purposes, and that whatever is spent ought to be better distributed to the advantage of the Pacific coast.

This is the last example of the consistency of the hon. gentleman which I propose to quote. In dealing with his consistency, of which he is so proud, we have found, first, that his opinion of Lord Northcliffe has, for the purposes of this debate, undergone a most radical change; we have found that his careful and seriously considered opinion as to there being a crisis last September has changed. He was satisfied then that there was a crisis; he is satisfied to-day that there is no crisis. His condemnation of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier does not, as we say in the west, 'gee' very well with his adoration of the right hon. the Prime Minister. His attitude of militarism last session is very different from is attitude this session. Truly, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman spoke with very special knowledge and with great authority when he told this House 'that it was easy to turn around, that it was easy to say one thing to-day and the opposite thing to-morrow.' He made that remark, I think, in a burst of candour, and possibly may be sorry that he said it. He also proceeded to say that it was easy for him to understand the Prime Minister when he said that 'when Britain was at war Canada was at war, and if Britain were at war Canada need not be at war. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. gentleman would have the slightest difficulty in understanding that statement. No gentleman who could so radically change his opinions in so short a time would have the slightest difficulty in understanding anything his leader might say. If the right hon. gentleman should casually say to him that the moon was made of green cheese, we would have the hon. gentleman standing up in this House prepared to defend the statement at all costs. Now I want to say a word or two in reference to his remarks on a quotation from the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). He proceeded, by one of his peculiar processes of logic to try and prove out of the mouth of the hon. member from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) that it was quite wrong for Canada to make a contribution of Dreadnoughts at this time. He said:

If I want to find an argument against making a contribution to Great Britain for Dreadnoughts or anything else, I must go to the arguments of these gentlemen a year ago. I take first the argument of the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) as hon. members listened to his words, I ask them to keep in mind the policy of the leader of the opposition, and keep in mind also —

This coming from the hon. member for Nanaimo is rather good.

—and keep in mind also the somersault of the hon. member for North Toronto a few days ago in the debate of this Bill—a political somersault that I sumbit, was cleverly executed; no member of the party could execute such an 'about face' as did my hon. friend.

Well, Sir, I venture to say there is a gentleman who comes not very far from Nanaimo who can beat the hon. member for North Toronto as a political acrobat every day in the week. Then he proceeded to say, speaking of the hon. member for North Toronto:

Speaking of the thing to be considered, he said:

The first is the policy of a fixed annual contribution in money to the British government or the British admiralty. Now, that divides itself, apparently, into two branches, but it is really the same thing. One man says: Send one million dollars or two million dollars a year; another man says: Send a Dreadnought or two Dreadnoughts, and so far as Canada is concerned, these two are absolutely one.

Then he continued:

The present policy of the leader of the opposition is to send Dreadnoughts, but the members for North Toronto demonstrated that, so far as the principle of the thing is concerned, there is absolutely no difference to Canada.

Quoting again from Mr. Foster:

When we translate one contribution into Dreadnoughts it comes down in the end to money which would be sufficient to build and equip a Dreadnought. And, therefore, I say, they are both parts of the one proposition——

The comment of the hon. member for Naniamo on this was:

Now, I would like the hon. member, and especially the hon. gentleman who is to follow me in this debate to remember this.

Again citing from the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto:

—An annual fixed contribution of money to the British government for the purpose of national and imperial defence.

As to this my hon. friend (Mr. Ralph Smith) said:

If that statement be correct, then this House has to consider not only the proposition of the leader of the opposition for two Dreadnoughts at the present time, but the more serious contingency of a repeated contribution to the British empire which is involved in the principle necessarily and according to the hon. member for North Toronto himself.

Now, I wish merely to say this. I am not foolish enough to endeavour to make any defence of the hon. member for North Toronto, for he is quite able to take care of himself; but I do not think it right that he should be misquoted or that his language should go to the public in such a way as to have it misinterpreted. The remarks which my hon. friend from Nanaimo quoted were made, it is true, by the hon. member for North Toronto, but they were preceded and followed by other statements which gave them a wholly different construction. Before making these remarks quoted by the hon. member for Nanaimo, the hon. member for North Toronto said:

Recollect that my motion deals simply with a stated, regular uniform, normal lines of proceeding and policy. Let us argue that out first. It seems to me that when you boil down all the propositions that are made you get down to two propositions, one or the other of which must in the end be adopted, and I desire for a very few moments to canvass these two propositions, not as an advocate who has dogmatically made up his mind and who admits of no reason on the part of one who takes the opposition thought and might wish the opposition course. But let us, as far as we can, think around them and see what the two mean.

Then came the remarks quoted by my hon. friend. But at the end of his speech the hon. member for North Toronto went on to say:

Outside of any settled action, outside of the normal condition of things in society, in the world, in nationhood, occurences arise, special emergencies, that are unexpected, suddenly loom in view, a great crisis, a great danger. That is absolutely outside of the normal policy to be carried on year after year with settled purposes and upon a settled plan. Every one of the emergencies must be met as it comes and met according to the gravity and importance of the occurence.

Then, winding up his speech he said:

Let me say to my right hon. friend, that if, after careful consideration, he proposes to this parliament a means for meeting that emergency adequately by the gift of Dreadnoughts or the gift of money, this side of the House will stand beside him in thus vindicating Canada's honour and strengthening the empire's defence.

I do not think that the treatment by my hon. friend from Nanaimo of the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was fair, nor do I think it was worthy the parliamentary record of my hon. friend. He proceeded after that to run through the statements of a number of the other members of this House, and finally he got down to my humble self and seemed to come to the conclusion that I had said some things on the debate last session which I would now find it necessary to take back. Well, I have gone over my few remarks on that occasion, and I am happy to be able to tell the hon. gentleman that there is nothing I said on that occasion which I have the slightest desire to withdraw. I began by saying that this government had put the country in a humiliating position. That is a statement which I certainly have no desire to take back. To my mind the result, and the only result of the conference of 1909 was to put Canada still further in a position of humiliation. The only thing shown by that conference was the determination of the government to do just as little as they possibly could. The ministers who went over to that conference, showed their determination to shave the proposals of the imperial government just as closely as they could, and at the same time try and preserve some semblance of their own self respect. What has been the course of the government in this whole matter? At the 1907 conference, we had the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) taking the glorious position that Canada did not need to do anything for the defence of the empire, because she was protecting her fisheries and had taken over some dockyards. Was not that a glorious position? I am sure that Canada must be proud in having a Minister of Marine and Fisheries who found it necessary to proclaim that we had received from the British admiralty a couple of places in which to store his goods and that he was giving up, one or two cruisers which, so far as our Pacific coast is concerned, were absolutely incapable of doing their work and that he was going to keep up a couple of steamers which were barely sufficient to keep off a few marauding fish thieves. Then we had the Prime Minister's curt refusal to consider, much less discuss, the resolution of Dr. Smartt, of Cape Colony. When we come to the conference of 1909, what do we find? We find that the imperial authorities ask the Canadian representatives for a fleet unit. What was their reply? Well, I fancy that before they gave a reply they put a question, and that question no doubt was, how much will it cost, and I think the answer was not satisfactory. Then the conversation probably went on these lines. They said: 'Oh, that is going to cost too much; you have got us over here and now you must help us out; tell us what is the most we can do for the least amount of money, for we have got to go back and bluff these good people of Canada into thinking we are doing something.'

During the recent local by-election in the city of Ottawa, the Minister of Labour (Mr. King) made use of an expression which is possibly more forcible than elegant but which correctly, to my mind very correctly, expresses the situation. He said:

If we act as belly crawlers in the empire we will be treated as belly crawlers and rightly so. If we maintain our own defences we will be respected by England for it.

It has occurred to me that possibly the Minister of Labour might be in want of an illustration of this particular phrase which he used on that occasion. If he does, I can only point him to the conduct of the representatives of Canada at the imperial defence conference of 1909.

Now, the proposition of the admiralty was a fleet unit—which meant, of course, as has been pointed out so many times during this debate, a Dreadnought—which should be stationed on the Pacific coast. Well, of course, that would not suit the government. The Secretary of State (Mr. Murphy) at this same meeting at which the Minister of Labour distinguished himself, also made a few remarks.

All this talk about not following the admiralty advice is rubbish. When they talk about the admiralty suggesting a fleet unit they leave out 'on the Pacific.' When the fact that we have two sea-boards to protect—Atlantic as well as Pacific to protect, was pointed out, the suggestion of our ministers was concurred in.

Well, I am satisfied that the admiralty, in making that proposal, were quite well aware that Canada had an Atlantic sea-board as well as a Pacific sea-board. And I think that, in all probability, they were under the impression that the fleet they had on the other side of the Atlantic was quite sufficient for the protection of the Atlantic coast of Canada. At any rate, I am quite sure that they probably remembered—possibly more vividly than did the Secretary of State—that they had withdrawn forces both from the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts. I think that when it was pointed out to them that Canada's navy must be smaller than originally asked for and then be divided and part placed on the Atlantic and part on the Pacific, it is more likely that they assented to the division in disgust or in contemptuous indifference. I believe they would have assented equally readily if the representatives of Canada had proposed to put part of the fleet on the coast of Patagonia and part on the Newmarket canal. It certainly is a peculiar argument that because we have a double sea-board, we should reduce the force. We are told that when it was pointed out to the admiralty that we had two coasts to protect, then it was decided that we would not put the fleet unit on the Pacific coast. So by way of assisting the empire, our Canadian representatives decided that we would reduce the force and put a little on one coast and a little on the other. Those of us who feel at all keenly on this subject may congratulate ourselves that our representatives forgot that Canada also borders on the Arctic ocean, because, if they had called that to mind, the fleet would have been still further reduced. And if, by any chance, you could twist Hudson bay into a fourth coast, in all probability the Canadian navy would reach the vanishing point altogether. Taking all these matters into consideration. I do not think I want to take back the statement I made last year, that the government had placed Canada in a most humiliating position on this question.

Now it is easy to criticise, but what should these representatives have done? Well, I think that the proper course for them to have adopted was to have placed that fleet unit upon the Pacific coast. That was what the admiralty, who were the best judges of the situation, asked for. Then, if the government had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to defend the Atlantic coast with another fleet unit, I would have been very glad to support them. If, either because they had plenty of money to spend, or even if they had come to the conclusion that because there happened to be more votes along the Atlantic than along the Pacific coast, they thought the Atlantic coast was the one to be defended, and, if, in taking care of these votes and these voters, they had decided to put a fleet there, as long as they had first put a fleet upon the Pacific coast, I do not think I would have found fault with them, provided always they had made provision for present aid to the empire and for a navy of some efficiency. The Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) in speaking on this question took some pains—speaking mainly, I think, to his friends in the province of Quebec—to let them know about the different countries smaller in population than Canada that have navies (he called them 'colonies'; whether that was a slip or not I do not know). But, in making that reference, he mentioned such countries as Argentine, Brazil and Chili, countries which we have not been accustomed to think very much superior to our own, and he told his friends how these different countries had navies, but neglected to tell them that any one of these navies built or projected could knock his navy into a cocked hat in five minutes. He was, as I understood him, talking to his friends in the province of Quebec, to make them think that it was their duty, as loyal British subjects, to go in for this little tin-pot navy of his. I do not pretend to know the feeling of the people of the province of Quebec on this subject, but from what I do know of that people, I am satisfied that, if they are prepared to go in for a navy at all, they have enough national pride not to want to build a navy that will be afraid to show itself on a rainy day. The Postmaster General also made a few references to Esquimalt. Without taking up the time of the House too long, I would like to say a word or two on that subject. The hon. gentleman referred to the taking over of the dockyards at Esquimalt as one more reason why we should have a navy. I do not see the force of what he said about Esquimalt. The Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) also told us, in the course of his illuminating address, that the reason the cost of the militia had jumped from one and a half millions to seven millions per annum was that he had taken over Esquimalt and Halifax.

Well, Mr. Speaker, when the imperial troops left Esquimalt three years ago they were some 500 strong; to-day the Minister of Militia has the magnificent force at Esquimalt of 80 men. The imperial people when in charge of Esquimalt were erecting a new fort; they had spent on what was to be known as the Signal Hill battery, a very large sum of money. The value of that work, at ordinary rates of labour, would have been some $250,000. They had brought out from England two guns to manage this battery, which guns cost $40,000 apiece; I am told those guns are worth something like £20,000 where they lie in the city of Victoria. Directly the Canadian authorities took over Esquimalt, the Signal Hill work stopped. The carriages for those guns were actually in position, and the guns were at the foot of the hill in the dock yard. They are there to-day, and so far as one can see, they are going to stay there until the crack of doom. Well, it might not have been so bad if they had only left things alone, but they would not even do that. The Fifth Regiment of garrison artillery is a militia regiment in the city of Victoria, and it had great difficulty in getting any guns upon which to train. They were asked to go into competition with other garrison artillery regiments in the eastern provinces, and they were asked to do it without having afforded to them proper facilities for training. They protested, and protested for some years, to the Minister of Militia, without result. Finally, all the officers of the regiment, with one exception, handed in their resignation in a body. This, Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Milita has stated once or twice in the House, he knew nothing about. I may say that I have these facts on credible authority from three officers of the regiment who were there at the time this was done. As soon as that was done what did the Militia Department do? They actually dismantled one of the permanent batteries put in by the imperial authorities, and carried their gun over to the city of Victoria and put it in a drill shed. Not only that, but they dismantled another battery for the same purpose. So when the Minister of Militia, or the Postmaster General, tells this House that because they have taken over Esquimalt, therefore they need something in the shape of a navy. I say they are using a very poor argument. Why, the people on the coast who know anything about the Esquimalt fortifications and the administration by the present minister, look upon the whole thing as a huge joke; and if the Minister of Militia thinks he is going to get any support for his navy on the strength of his administration of the militia, I can assure him he is very much mistaken. Now, Mr. Speaker, is it any wonder that men like Sir Wm. White should make the remarks he did? He stated, writing to the 'London Times':

> During the past summer he had visited the naval yards at Esquimalt and obtained first knowledge of its condition. Considerable extensions had been made in comparatively recent times to its workshops, store houses and plants, fortification designed to protect the harbour had been modernized but the work was incomplete. He found the fort unarmed, the guns lying on the ground at the foot of the hill in the open. The navy yard was without a staff capable of maintaining in good condition the expensive machinery left in the work shops and in the buildings. The stores had been disposed of locally at ridiculously low prices and the naval base had been virtually abandoned and was rapidly deteriorating.

Yet these gentlemen tell us that because they have taken over the naval yards at Esquimalt and Halifax, therefore, they ought to build this little navy, because they are both on the same basis.

Now, with regard to the motion before the House, I wish briefly to explain my position. I am, I need hardly say, entirely in accord with the suggestion of an immediate contribution in the shape of Dreadnoughts, or the value thereof. I would be generous, and I would be inclined to strain somewhat the resources of the country in giving that contribution. We must remember that for years to come the British navy is going to be the only protection for Canada. As to a Canadian navy, personally I have not the slightest objection, always provided three things: First, that there is immediate aid given to the empire; secondly, that that navy must be adequate, must be capable at least of being a fighting unit; thirdly, that it is to be at the service of His Majesty whenever hostilities break out, without waiting for anybody to decide the question. We have had a lot of talk, pro and con, upon this subject. Well, my own opinion is that there should be absolutely no room for debate on that question. If there is room for debate, there is room for doubt at the time hostilities break out, and the time to settle that thing is now. If this navy is going to be a navy that is to be at the service of His Majesty at the very moment hostilities break out, now is the time to say so, and now is the time for us to know, and until we know that, I for one do not propose to vote for the government's Bill. When we see the press of a certain province in this country stating that in time of war the Governor in Council may place the force at the disposal of His Majesty, and printing the word 'may' in large black type, and when it goes on to say that the government may grant or refuse to allow this fleet to go into action, reserving the constitutional right and reaffirming its guarantee of autonomy; when we take that statement, coupled with the statements and quotations that have been made from various utterances of the Prime Minister in this House and in other places, and remembering, as we do, that when he was confronted by the hon. member for North Toronto the other night, and asked if he had changed his idea of the goal toward which he wished this country to tend, he refused to answer—when we take this combination of circumtsances together, I say that any man who is in favour of British connection, and the maintenance of British connection, is guilty of a breach of duty to himself and to the country if he votes for the second reading of this Bill. I am willing to vote for a Canadian navy that is started on right lines, that is to say, on lines that will tend towards the consolidation of the empire. But for a Canadian navy which is to be started on lines such as these, which I believe are lines designed, or at any rate tend, to the dismemberment of the empire, the severance of Canada from its allegiance to the British Crown, I for one will never vote.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member (Mr. Barnard) who has just taken his seat will pardon me if I do not follow him in the exact line which he has taken this evening, because his speech seems to be made up more of an attack upon the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Smith) than a discussion of the Bill which is now engaging the attention of this House. As I have no quarrel with the hon. member who has taken his seat, I do not require to take up the cudgels with him. I wish to approach the discussion of the subject before the House with one view and only one view, that which always has been taken by the Liberal party throughout the history of this country—the welfare of our own country and the cultivation of a truly national spirit. I hope, Sir, that no words of mine shall offend even the most sensitive, because I respect the opinions of every hon. member of this House no matter what his politics are, and upon the matter of the merit of the naval Bill I readily understand how different our views may be. It is deplorable to see how members of this House, in the discussion of an important measure such as the one we are now dealing with, should go out of their way to make attacks upon a class of members who may not share their views. I congratulate the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) upon his manly action in repudiating the words which were uttered in this House yesterday. I feel that I must join with him in repudiating the speech, or part of the speech, which was delivered yesterday by one of the hon. members. I have absolutely no mandate to speak for the French Canadians of the province of Quebec, I have not, Sir, a drop of French blood in my veins, but I have no hesitation in saying that if I had I would feel very proud of it, because I know of no class of men in this country who should command the respect of this House more than our French Canadian friends. They have been classed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards)—and I want to be perfectly fair with him—as a disloyal body.

Mr. EDWARDS. May I ask the hon. gentleman if he will quote any words which I have uttered from which he could draw that conclusion.

Mr. DEVLIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Well do so.

Mr. DEVLIN. I did not mean to quote the hon. gentleman's speech, but since he has invited me to do so I feel that I will be forced, in answer to his question, to go into th emerits as well as the speech which he has made. When I was a student at college, and it is now a good many years ago——

Mr. EDWARDS. I think I have the hon. gentleman's permission to ask him——

Mr. DEVLIN. Certainly.

Mr. EDWARDS. —if he can state any words I used charging the people of Quebec with being disloyal. I said that I did not use any such words nor any language which could be so construed. My reference was to the leaders of the Liberal party and not to the mass of the people of the province of Quebec, whom I never charged with being disloyal.

Mr. DEVLIN. I was proceeding, in answer to the question of the hon. gentleman, to say, that when, many years ago, I was a boy at college, I heard an expression used which runs like this: 'Timeo hominem unius libri' and I felt, as I listened to the hon. member representing the county of Frontenac, that he was one to whom that expression might be very aptly applied. It was not my intention to go into the merits of his speech, but he invites discussion of it, and I am quite prepared to take up his challenge and discuss it. Let me tell him that he has taken quotations from newspapers in this country that may be adverse to the French Canadian race, he has taken translations which it was proved by the hon. member for St. Anne were not exact, were distorted, he has taken words uttered by one of the greatest French Canadians who ever lived in the province of Quebec, by one whose memory is sacred to the people of that province, a man to whom the province is going to erect a monument, the late Hon. Honoré Mercier, he has taken page after page of the same book, and he has argued from these—what? Let me ask him, was he arguing that the French Canadians of the province of Quebec were a loyal people?

Mr. EDWARDS. I will answer the hon. gentleman since he asks me the question. I was arguing to prove the existence in Quebec, the extent of which I do not know, of an anti-imperial sentiment, due to the teachings of the leaders of the hon. gentleman's own party. As regards the quotations in the book I am willing to submit that book to which I referred to any gentleman he may name, and I will verify what I said.

Mr. DEVLIN. I am sorry the hon. gentleman should have invited discussion because I think for his own sake he would have done far better had he allowed his remarks of yesterday to go without having had them put anew upon 'Hansard'. But I will try—and I do it directly against my will in a way—to make it clear to the House that the whole tenor of his speech, or the greater portion of his speech, was designed to show that not only were the French Canadians disloyal, but that hon. members representing constituencies in the province of Quebec were teaching disloyalty to the people of that province. Will the hon. gentleman contradict that?

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman is charging me with saying that the people of the province of Quebec are disloyal. I ask him to either quote those words which he says I used or to withdraw that statement. I did not use any such words, and I ask him either to make good his statement or withdraw his accusation.

Mr. DEVLIN. I have asked the hon. gentleman a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw, withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER. I will read the rule which is as follows:

Whatever a member says in explanation—whether relating to the words or the meaning of his speech—is to be taken as true and not afterwards called into question. The words, which he states himeslf to have used, are to be considered as the words actually spoken; and the sense in which he says they were uttered, as the sense in which they are to be taken in the debate. If the member disavows the use of words attributed to him, and objected to, the matter must end.

Mr. DEVLIN. Mr. Speaker, I have the greatest respect for the Chair and I am most ready to obey your ruling. I am also willing to accept the construction which the hon. member has put upon his words, but which I am inclined to think the actual words do not bear out. Now, Sir, I shall proceed to quote from the speech of the hon. member and I only do so in view of the fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) has invited me.

Mr. PAQUET. Will you allow me a question? Do you think that all French Canadians to-day are not loyal to the British Crown.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I stated some time ago very clearly and distinctly—

Mr. PAQUET. Please answer.

Mr. EDWARDS. Just sit down.

Mr. EDWARDS. Continue to read.

Mr. EDWARDS. I shall do so. You shall get just as much of your speech to-night as you want if you continue interrupting me.

Mr. EDWARDS. All right.

Mr. DEVLIN. I continue to quote.

Mr. EDWARDS. Just sit down. I stated very clearly and distinctly that I accepted the position taken last night by the member for Hochelaga (Mr. Rivet) when he said that the people of the province of Quebec were not disloyal.

The hon. gentleman did not know it until Mr. Rivet told him so:

I have not said one word to charge the mass of the people of the province of Quebec with disloyalty.

Mr. EDWARDS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. Oh, that speech is not finished yet.

I have not said anything that could be construed into such a charge. On the contrary, I have said that the people of the province of Quebec have shown a more than ordinary intelligence in resisting the political leaders who for political purposes essayed to lead them from their allegiance, and I do not propose to allow any hon. gentleman from the province of Quebec or from any other province sitting on that side of the House or this to prevert my language.

Mr. EDWARDS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. What did the hon. gentleman mean? He meant that the leaders of political thought in the province of Quebec, irrespective of party, taught disloyalty to the people of the province of Quebec, and these are the words which I object to.

Mr. EDWARDS. I named the men.

Mr. DEVLIN. They are not all named.

Mr. EDWARDS. I may have left some of them out. I thought I named enough to satisfy you when I named your leader for one.

Mr. DEVLIN. Who?

Mr. EDWARDS. Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Mr. FIELDING. You did not name the Conservative premier of 1896 who circulated the book.

Mr. EDWARDS. I don't think the past record of the Finance Minister will bear close examination in that respect.

Mr. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) is going to get into deep water if he begins to name the men whom he charges with disloyalty in the province of Quebec. To-night he mentioned one; he mentioned the name of a statesman who commands the respect of all races and of all creeds throughout this continent when he mentioned the name of the Prime Minister. Sir, what is the attitude taken by the Conservatives in my native province? Some of the political friends of the hon. member for Frontenac charge the Prime Minister with disloyalty to his race because forsooth according to their statement he is too loyal, and to-night we have the Conservative member for Frontenac charging the venerable leader of this House with disloyalty to the British Crown. Has the hon. gentleman any other leader of the French Canadians to mention? The hon. gentleman does not reply. I am glad he is not willing to continue the discussion, because the less he says about the disloyalty of the people of the province of Quebec the better for himself. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall refer to an incident or two in the history of our country, and before doing so, I may state that while I have no mandate to speak for the people of Quebec, I have the honour to represent 30,000 of that race, and I want to protest in the name of my constituents, as well as in the name of French Canadians of Quebec generally, against any charge of disloyalty whether against their leaders—as the hon. member for Frontenac says, irrespective of party—or against the people themselves. I have not allowed political bias to carry me away to such a degree that I would charge any hon. member who does not share my views with disloyalty, but I will say to the hon. member for Frontenac here and now, that the leaders of political thought in the province of Quebec, from Sir Geogre Etienne Cartier down to Sir Wilfrid Laurier have been amongst the most loyal men that Canada has ever known. I remind the hon. member for Frontenac that in 1862, Sir John Macdonald having failed to get a Militia Bill through the legislature, it was the French Canadian leader, Sir George Etienne Cartier, who succeeded in that task, thanks to the support he received from his native province, in passing that Militia Bill. This incident is known to every student of history, but I cite it for the instruction of the hon. member (Mr. Edwards), who for the first time learned last night from the hon. member from Hochelaga that the people of the province of Quebec are a loyal people. Let me say that when Sir George E. Cartier succeeded in carrying that measure, the 'Journal de Quebec,' which was never well disposed towards Cartier praised him for his success in these words:

> The Minister of Militia has succeeded where many expected to see him fall. He has nobly retrieved his fortune and has his revenge for his defeat of 1862.

Another French Canadian paper 'La Minerve,' added:

> All those present at the sittings of the House during which Mr. Cartier expounded his militia scheme are unanimous in saying that no other speech of his ever carried more weight or authority, but nothing else could have been expected from the minister who is considered as master of the situation. This is due to the influence derived from his popularity in Lower Canada and to the confidence which his integrity and honesty as a statesman give him in the other provinces.

Let me say further to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) that if the French Canadian people or at least a large portion of them, are ready to support the government of to-day on a naval policy, it is due to the teaching of the erstwhile leader of the Conservative party, Sir George E. Cartier, and to the teaching of the present leader of the government, another distinguished French Canadian. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Mr. Speaker, let me point out that the French Canadian people do not claim anything out of the ordinary. They have secured certain rights by the treaty of 1763, they have secured certain rights by the Quebec Act of 1774, and they have certain rights which were granted to them by the British North America Act of 1867, upon which our constitution is based. I have yet to hear in the province of Quebec that the French Canadian race are claiming any further rights than those that were given to them by the authority of the British Crown, and those that are given to them by the constitution of their country. Has the hon. member for Frontenac ever inquired whether there might not have been disloyal people from other sources? Does the hon. gentleman remember a speech that was delivered by Sir John Young on his arrival in Canada? Let me quote a passage of it to him. On July 15, 1869, Sir John Young said:

> At the present moment Canada is in reality independent. It has its own destinies in its own hands, and its statesmen and people are recognized as competent to judge of their interests as to what course to pursue to conciliate those interests. England looks to them for her guidance, and whatever their decision may be, either to continue the present connection or in due time and the maturity of their growth to exchange it for some other form of alliance.

This would be fearfully disloyal language if it were used now by me; but I hope no hon. member of this House will charge me with disloyalty because I repeat the words of Sir John Young. As my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton is giving considerable attention to this question of loyalty, I would like for his benefit to read a passage from the 'Times' of London, which is not a French Canadian paper, but the great organ of public opinion in England.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it an editorial or a report?

Mr. DEVLIN. It is an editorial. The 'Times' about the same time said:

Now, what is meant by speaking of England as the mother country? What is to be understood by the description of Australia, Canada and the rest of her colonies? If all that is intended to remind us of the historical fact that the citizens of Canada, New South Wales and Victoria are mainly of English origin and descent, we shall not quarrel with the accuracy of the statement, although we may doubt the pertinence of the phrases.

The article goes on:

Let us then in the interest of truth and right conclusions, discard altogether the phrase 'another country' in the discussions which are before us; let us even use with deliberation, words apparently so innocent as 'England' and 'Colony' and remember that what we are called upon to weigh and determine is the proper relations of Englishmen, Australians and Canadians.

I can hardly understand that such language, coming from such an eminent person as Sir John Young and from the London 'Times', would shock the sensitive ears of certain hon. gentlemen opposite, and I regret for their sake that such language should ever have been used. But I wish to show, from the words of His Excellency the present Governor General of Canada, Earl Grey, that the attitude of the Liberal party upon this subject is the attitude which His Excellency has been proclaiming in this country from coast to coast, and I hope that when I quote his words, as one coming from the province of Quebec, I shall not be charged with disloyalty. After the very elaborate speeches which have been delivered by the right hon. the Prime Minister, the hon. the Postmaster General and other gentlemen who have followed them upon this side, it would seem as if we might have been able to give a vote upon this subject without giving expression to our opinions. But in view of the awful indictment preferred by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) charging injustice, ingratitude and treason to our province, not in the same sense as the charge by the hon. member for Frontenac, but in an opposite sense, it becomes imperative to speak our minds. What led up to this Bill? We have heard of this imperial union which has been spoken of tonight, for many years past in this country. There have been conferences between the home government and the governments of the dominions beyond the seas for a great number of years. England has been telling Canada time and again that we have been knocking at her door for assistance long enough, and she has been asking Canada to assist herself. The right hon. Joseph Chamberlain at one of the conferences asked what contribution Canada would be ready to make to the imperial navy. Canada answered, as Canada has always answered, that she would be prepared to defend the shores of this country. That seems to me to have been a reasonable sequence of the discussions which have taken place in this House from time to time on this question. What did the hon. member for North Toronto propose in this House? The wording of his resolution is this:

That in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self-help and self-respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

That was apparently the accepted policy of the Conservative party, and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier did not propose any amendment or offer any objection to such an attitude being taken by this House. Now, Sir, what interpretation could be given to these words which I have just read? Simply the same theory as has been proclaimed from ocean to ocean by His Excellency Earl Grey, the Governor General of Canada. At the risk of being charged with disloyalty, as a member coming from the province of Quebec, I would like to call the attention of the House to some remarks which were made upon this very subject by His Excellency in the city of Quebec on August 22, 1906.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I must call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that to quote or to refer to the Sovereign or his representative with the view of influencing the minds of members is not in order. I will read to the hon. gentlemen the passage:

The use of the name of the Sovereign, or his representative, in debate, so as to interfere with the freedom of discussion or for the purpose of influencing the determination of the House or the votes of members in respect to any matter pending in parliament, is out of order.

It may be that the hon. gentleman would not seriously think that, but I would prefer that he did not quote His Excellency in this debate.

Mr. DEVLIN. I was not quoting the Governor General, but Earl Grey in the speeches delivered throughout the length and breadth of this land on this subject. I could undertsand that the King must not be brought into the discussion of political issues, but if His Excellency, the Governor General, delivers throughout Canada a series of lectures upon imperial questions, I take it for granted that, in so doing, he is not speaking as the Governor General of Canada, but simply as Earl Grey, and it was simply the words of Earl Grey, that I meant to quote. But of course, Sir, if you rule that I am not to quote any language uttered by Earl Grey——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be better that the hon. gentleman should not. I cannot discriminate between Earl Grey and the Governor General at the present time. The rule is explicit enough.

Mr. DEVLIN. I bow to your ruling, Sir. I had no desire to be discourteous to the Governor General, and shall, in obedience to your ruling, pass over what His Excellency has said.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman has been understood as being in any sense discourteous, but simply as not being in accord with the rule of the House, which forbids any expressions of opinion by the Governor General to be used in debate.

Mr. DEVLIN. I was going to quote from a pamphlet which was printed in Ottawa by the King's Printer and entitled 'Addresses to His Excellency Earl Grey, Governor General of Canada and His speeches in reply,' having relation to the resources and progress of the Dominion. These are, in a sense, speeches from the Throne, which we are allowed to discuss in this House. This pamphlet was sent me, I do not know by whom, but I always presumed it was sent by His Excellency for my benefit; and as I found in it certain passages bearing upon the subject before the House, I was simply going to give the House the benefit of them. I quite understand the rule of the House that no hon. member may use the name of His Majesty or His Majesty's representative or any member of the Royal Family in any way that would reflect upon them or in any discourteous way; but I never knew that expressions of opinion from His Excellency, which he had been giving on every platform in the Dominion, should not be referred to in this House, more especially when such expressions have been commented on by every newspaper and on every platform in the land. Is this House the only place in the whole Dominion in which may not be quoted the words of His Excellency used? It was not my intention to speak discourteously of His Excellency, but simply to quote his speeches. Is that against the rule?

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not a question of discourtesy at all. The rule is that no reference may be made to the representative of the Sovereign for the purpose of influencing the votes or opinions of members in this House.

Mr. SPROULE. I must say that even the statement made by the hon. gentleman implying that the Governor General sent him this pamphlet would in itself naturally provoke discussion if went on with, and would lead to irregularity in the debate which it is very desirable to avoid.

Mr. DEVLIN. I submit, Mr. Speaker, to your ruling.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Without questioning your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I may say that His Excellency drew a distinction in the speeches delivered in the Northwest, in which he said he spoke as Earl Grey, but not as the Governor General.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know what the article is, but I presume it is complimentary to His Excellency, but is it not better to keep all this thing out of debate and observe the rule?

Mr. DEVLIN. I submit to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) says, it may be just as well to keep His Excellency out of the debate; but as most of the eminent men of the United Kingdom have been quoted, I thought it would not be derogatory to the dignity of His Excellency to give his opinion also.

After the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) offered his resolution, the government proposed another resolution which was in the nature of the policy this government intended to adopt. That resolution read as follows:

> The House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.
> The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the imperial treasury.

I would like to call the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite to those words:

> For naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.
> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.
> The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the empire.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) did not at that moment offer any objection or give notice of any amendment, and the resolution was adopted unanimously and declared to be the policy of this country, and that resolution is in conformity with the Bill we are now considering. I submit that, no matter what may have been the differences of opinion as to the advisability of the introduction of such a resolution, once it had been passed, and passed unanimously, there was no alternative for the government, but to bring down the Bill they did. Let me say that the building of a navy for Canada, as one of the great nations within the British empire, imposes itself as a necessity upon the Canadian people. Our population is increasing, our resources are being developed, Canada is gradually growing into nationhood, our exports are increasing beyond the dreams of the Canada of a few years ago. We have been invited, time and again, to do our share towards upholding the strength of the British empire. We have been invited to contribute towards the British navy. We have been invited to build our own ships. And, in the consideration of the different proposals which were before this country, Canada adopted the course which, to my mind, was the wisest, that of building a navy of her own.

Let me say a word about the criticism that is offered to that navy as a navy. The hon. member for St. Anne, Montreal (Mr. Doherty)—and I will not criticise his speech at all—spoke of a navy as a means of attack, and not as a means of defence. Well, Sir, that is a pretty fine distinction to draw. A navy may be a means of attack if attack is necessary, but always a means of defence. Now, not only that but he and other hon. gentlemen opposite have criticised the advisability of building what they have termed 'this small flotilla'. I am unfortunately, not a naval expert, and I have been forced to go to authorities for information upon navy matters. In the course of reading the expressions at the several conferences, I came upon this word, uttered by Lord Tweedmouth, the First Lord of the Admiralty:

> There is, I think, a further advantage in these small flotillas, that they will be an admirable means of coast defence.

Sir, I take the opinion of the First Lord of the Admiralty as against the opinion of hon. gentlemen opposite. And if the First Lord of the Admiralty tells the representatives of our country in London, and tells this parliament, through the conference, that what this government proposes to build in the way of a navy, this 'flotilla' that the government proposes to build, would be a sure means of defence of our shores, then, Sir, I think we have lived up to that portion of the resolution which was introduced in this House by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster):

> To the suitable protection of our exposed coast line and our great sea ports.

—and to the resolution of the government when we say that—> —we are prepared to defend our coast and our shores.

If the opinion of the First Lord of the Admiralty is not proper information in matters naval, I must candidly confess, Sir, that I do not know where to seek for better. During the course of the debate, when hon. gentlemen opposite were forced to change front upon this subject, I was reminded very much of the words uttered by an eminent author: 'The human race is divided into classes, those who go ahead and do something, and those who sit back and ask why it is not done the other way.' It seems to me that is about the position: They sit back and say of every proposition in the matter of the construction of a navy, 'Why wasn't it done the other way?' Let me quote to the House the words of the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden).

Mr. Speaker, I find that it may be some considerable time before I get through the remarks which I propose to make, as I have not entered upon the merits of the Bill, and I propose to discuss the merits. If the House would prefer it, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. The House will go into Committee of Supply, and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) will take up his estimates again.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.35 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, February 25, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE ALBERT MEDAL—HEROISM OF CONDUCTOR REYNOLDS.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Secretary of State). Before the orders of the day are called, I desire to refer to a matter which was brought to the attention of the House the 8th of this month by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden). My hon. friend drew the attention of the House to the herosim displayed by Conductor Thomas Reynolds in rescuing a number of people in the wreck of the 21st of January last, at the Spanish river crossing of the Canadian Pacific railway, and suggested that application be made to the imperial authorities for a suitable recognition of the heroic conduct of Conductor Reynolds. Had I been in my seat at the time, I would have been glad to inform my hon. friend and the House that, prior to his inquiry, application had been made for an award of the Albert Medal, the highest honour conferred in such cases by His Majesty the King. Just before coming to the House to-day, I had the pleasure of receiving the following cablegram:

Greatly pleased to advise you that the King has awarded the Albert medal of first-class to Thomas Reynolds. When received it will be transmitted to you.

STRATHCONA.

SUPPLY—EXPORT OF HORSES FROM ONTARIO.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. GLEN CAMPBELL. Before we go into Supply, there is a matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the House, and more particularly of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). It has reference to the exportation of horses from Ontario to our western provinces. Horses brought from Saskatchewan into Manitoba are met at the border by a veterinary surgeon who examines them for any contagious disease, and in the case of the importation into my province from any other province to the south, the horses are examined at the borders of my province. But horses from Ontario are not so treated. I understand that the custom is to examine them at the point of shipment in Ontario, but that does not seem satisfactory. A case that has occurred within the last few weeks was brought to my attention the other day. A horse shipped from Toronto in a carload developed glanders inside a few days and was shot for that disease. With the method employed in shipping horses a horse thus affected might infect all the animals in the car and all the stock yards at the feeding points; the water troughs, the hay racks and the thousands of horses shipped over the same route are subjected to that infection. Glanders is the worst disease to which horses are subject. It is incurable and very contagious not only to horses, but to men, and men so infected die a horrible death. The horses exposed to contagion in such a case go to a hundred different points and may carry the contagion all through the western provinces. I think it is up to the government and the Minister of Agriculture to take such steps as will prevent the possibility of such occurrences and protect the farmers of my county. I would also point out to him that the sales stables in different large centres are sometimes in the most disreputable condition as respects the health of horses.

Mr. FISHER. Was that horse shot by order of one of my officers?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, I believe so.

Mr. FISHER. Then I can assure the hon. gentleman that any animal that has been in contact with that horse in cars, stables or yards through which it has passed will be carefully watched, and the cars, etc., carefully investigated and disinfected immediately. That is part of the orders and practice of our department. Whenever any animals have been in contact with an animal infected with glanders, they are all watched, and we see that all places where the infected animal has been are disinfected. No doubt a report of this case has been sent to the department. I have not heard of it myself, but I have no doubt my officers have heard and I shall make inquiries.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I received my information from a shipper. The horse passed through and was fed in the various yards all the way from Toronto to Yorkton. It passed through some four or five weeks ago, and up until four days ago there had been no disinfecting of the yards. That is the point that I want the minister to notice.

Mr. FISHER. I shall look into it.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Public works—harbours and rivers, Quebec —Pointe aux Trembles (en bas), wharf improvements, $2,000.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). This $2,000 is to make provision towards constructing a building for use as a waiting room and constructing guards at the side of the wharf. It is expected the work will cost $2,500 altogether.

Rimouski wharf—repairs and improvements, $6,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to put on a new planking.

Rivière aux Vases—wharf near its mouth on northeast side of River Saguenay, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to complete the sheathing on the part of the wharf already built, and to construct 100 feet more, consisting of one pier and head block. It is believed this will complete the work.

River Ottawa—beach protection work on Vaudreuil Cove, $3,100.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. What is the nature of this beach protection work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It has been made to appear to my satisfaction and to the satisfaction of the resident engineer, that this work is necessitated by reason of other works which have been constructed on the river, and which have raised the water so that erosion has thereby been caused by the increased floods. That is the ground upon which it is put. I hesitated until I got all the information and was satisfied there was good ground for that contention.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will this complete the improvements?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It will require $1,900 more.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. On whose property are these improvements located?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not on anybody's property. I think there is a roadway passing near the water, the road allowance goes to the bank.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is there any wharf there or landing at all?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think not.

Mr. WRIGHT. It is not in connection with any navigation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is what the engineer says:

The rapid and dangerous erosion of the bank here is due to the construction of locks and dams at St. Anne de Bellevue, and by the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific railway of numerous large stone piers, thus producing increased high water in the lake. The damages complained of are due to this increased flow.

So the injury we are seeking to guard against was caused first by the construction of the locks and dam at St. Anne, which is a government work, and to a certain extent also by the bridges of the two railway companies, which of course were constructed with the consent and approval of the government. But as I understand, the greatest cause of the erosion has been the construction of the lock and dam.

Rivière Ouelle wharf—repairs and improvements, $4,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to provide for repairs to the Rivière Ouelle wharf urged by the resident engineer. This will complete the work, the total cost of which will be about $8,000.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. Did the government originally construct this wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There was a wharf built there away back in 1856, and the government in 1906 made an extension or built a spur to the wharf. It is owned by the government. This is the place where the government steamer lands which runs in connection with the Intercolonial across to Murray Bay.

Mr. WRIGHT. When did the government purchase this wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it has always been a government wharf since the time of confederation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It was built before confederation. Some years ago the Intercolonial built a spur line from the village of Ouelle to the St. Denis wharf. It gives a winter service to the village of Ouelle.

River Richelieu—improvements, $60,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to continue the very important work of improvement upon the Richelieu river. The matter was fully discussed at the last session, when the vote for this purpose was granted. The improvements consist of a lock and dam at or near the city of St. John upon the Richelieu river, and also of the dredging and removing of large boulders which are in the channel. The object is to improve navigation, and at the same time to prevent the flooding of a vast section of country which has been flooded almost every year by the waters of the Richelieu.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. While I do not object to this appropriation in itself, I wish to call the attention of the minister to the fact that this improvement is designed to perform a service on the Richelieu river which he denied to us on the Fraser river, on the ground that it was impossible for the government to make such expenditure unless it was to be made for the improvement of navigation. Now the minister has just stated that this item was for the improvement of navigation, and also that it was in connection with the works being carried on on the Richelieu river. I have referred to his report, and I see that the primary object of this work is, not for the improvement of navigation, but to save this land from inundation. Now I wish to make myself quite plain, I am not opposing any vote for that purpose; I think it is a matter to which this government should give attention. But, the point I wish to make is that when the Dominion government makes a large expenditure of this kind to save lands from inundation in one province, the government is in duty bound to make a like expenditure in other provinces. I find in the annual report of the Minister of Public Works this paragraph with respect to Richelieu improvements:

Along the upper part of the river from the boundary to St. Johns, a distance of 22 miles, the shores are all low lands, except the first two miles.

These low lands are covered at high water for sometimes over two months, long enough to prevent the culture of large areas. This high water also extends over the shores of the tributaries of the Richelieu such as Rivière du Sud and Rivière au Brochet. Some 40,000 acres of land are thus rendered entirely useless.

Then it gives the parishes. The report proceeds:

In order to lower the water and prevent the annual floods, it was decided to dredge a channel, 1,750 feet wide (the whole width of the river at its narrowest place), and 5,200 feet long.

I wish to call the attention of the minister to the fact that in this official report of the operations on the Richelieu river there is not one word about these improvements being necessary in the interests of navigation. We must take it that the engineer who makes this report, the chief engineer of the department, is speaking by the book, and that he is making a faithful and trustworthy report to this parliament with respect to the real object of these improvements. I wish to call the attention of the minister to the fact that we on the Fraser river are entitled in equity to similar improvements which will protect our lands from flooding at Chiliwack, Matsqui, Langely, Nicomen Island and Ladner, where the conditions are precisely the same as we find here. We claim the protection on the Fraser river that is given on the Richelieu river, and we claim it not only as a matter of equity, but as a matter of compact with this government that has undertaken to give to us in the province of British Columbia expenditures of the same nature as are made in any other province of the Dominion. I wish the minister would take this seriously into his consideration, because, although this is a matter which has been mentioned frequently here, and has been met very casually by the minister, I wish to say that the conditions are getting so serious that the people of British Columbia will not permit their representatives in parliament to go without blame if they continue to vote money for expenditures in other provinces which are denied to the province of British Columbia.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Taylor) says that no stress has heretofore been laid on the fact that these improvements are for the purpose of aiding the navigation of the Richelieu river. I am quite sure my hon. friend is entirely in error as to that.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. If the minister will permit me, I was quoting from his own annual report here, and I said that in this report there is no reference of that nature.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I find in the note which I have, and which is taken from the reports, that it is claimed that this movable dam will afford considerable advantage to the navigation of the river and permit dispensing with the dredging which has now to be done at regular intervals between St. John and Lake Champlain. It will also provide an increased depth in the Chambly canal of at least one foot, and with the additional improvements, 9 feet of water can be obtained in the canal prism instead of 7. I repeat that the object of this improvement is two-fold. One effect will be to improve the navigation of the Richelieu river, which is a very important stretch of navigable water connecting the St. Lawrence River system with Lake Champlain and the Hudson river in the state of New York.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Is the Richelieu river more important than the Fraser river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not compelled to answer that question at the moment. I will come to the Fraser river in a few minutes, and I think my hon. friend will say that this government has done full justice to the claims of those who are interested in the improvement of the Fraser river. I also repeat that the effect of this improvement will be to prevent an enormous amount of otherwise good land from being periodically flooded by the waters of the Richelieu river. I think my hon. friend will agree that the work is an important one. In regard to the Fraser river, my hon. friend says that his constituents will complain if he does not, while considering items for other provinces, insist upon similar work being done on the Fraser. No one appreciates to a greater extent than I do the importance of the Fraser river, and as an evidence of the importance which I attach to that great river, I may say that last year the government, upon my recommendation, purchased a suction dredge called the 'Fruhling' at a large cost, a dredge which is one of the very best operating upon either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast, and the primary object of the purchasing of that dredge was the improvement of the Fraser river. We have, through the engineering department, laid out a system of improvements on the Fraser river, by means of dredging and by means of jetties, which we expect will give a ship channel 30 feet in depth from the city of Westminster to the Gulf of Georgia. We anticipate that these improvements are going to cost this country at least $1,000,000, and yet, when we have engaged in this great work and have asked parliament to vote money for the purpose of carrying it on, it seems that the hon. gentleman feels it to be his duty, when we are asking for a small amount for the River Richelieu, to rise and protest against this item being passed unless a similar item is put in the estimates for a certain improvement on the Fraser river.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I do not think the minister is quite fair in his remarks. I do not think he has interpreted fairly what I said. He seems to have entirely misunderstood my remarks. I did not protest against this work on the Richelieu river, but I did object to the policy laid down by the minister the other evening in answer to a question addressed to him by myself, wherein he said that work of this kind would not be carried on any longer, that this government would not any longer make outlays in any of the provinces except for the improvement of navigation. If that is strictly adhered to, no doubt we in British Columbia can stand it as well as the people of any other province, but I would like to call the minister's attention to the fact that we in British Columbia are very large contributors to the general revenue of the Dominion, that we pay to Canada every year many hundreds of thousands of dollars, or, many millions of dollars, in excess of all the expenditures upon the province of British Columbia. Therefore, it is our good British Columbia money that is being spent to a considerable extent on these Richelieu river improvements, and it seems to us an intolerable position that, while our money is being spent upon the protection of property throughout Canada, the minister should lay down the principle that we must not ask for any of that protection in British Columbia. What I am asking for is equal rights. I am not jealous of any other constituency getting improvements, but I do object to one yard stick being applied to eastern districts which are near, which are under the eye of the minister, and in which the department seems to take more particular interest, and another yard stick being applied to British Columbia. I think the minister lays too much stress upon the cost of this magnificent dredge, the 'Fruhling,' and tells us too little of what the 'Fruhling' has accomplished. The question is not as to whether the minister has spent $300,000 on that dredge. What we would like to hear from the minister is what the dredge is doing, what progress it is making, not giving its capacity per hour or its capacity per lift, but how many lifts will be necessary to carry through the work, and what return we get for this $300,000. Moreover, to say that the dredge 'Fruhling' is working at the mouth of the Fraser river comes very far short of being an answer to our request for improvements on the Fraser river. I would like to point out that the work of the 'Fruhling' at the mouth of the river does not meet the requirements of the people along the Fraser, because, as I told the minister just now, the lands that are flooded are not immediately at the mouth of the river. We are applying for protection at distances long removed from the mouth of the river, at Chiliwack, at Matsqui, at Nicomen island, at Langley, and throughout the Delta, and to answer me that the department has bought a $300,000 dredge and put it to work at the mouth of the river is not an answer to our request for protection to works from Chiliwack down, to which we think we are entitled.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It seems to me that my hon. friend on reflection will see that the question as to the money the government is expending on the Fraser river in British Columbia is an important question to consider in connection with other improvements in the same locality. We cannot spend all the moneys of Canada in the one place, and when we have made out a plan for a million dollars for improvements on the Fraser river I think it will be said that we are dealing—I will not say generously, but dealing justly with the important interests on the Fraser river. The hon. gentleman speaks of the large revenues derived from the people of British Columbia. I am very glad British Columbia is so prosperous. The population of the province is not large but the province has been blessed by Providence with resources of enormous value. We are all glad to see British Columbia improving so rapidly. I notice by the newspapers that the provincial government proposes to expend during the coming year some $7,000,000 which shows that their revenues are buoyant and that they are in a position to make improvements which other provinces are perhaps not able to make. My hon. friend will of course have an opportunity of discussing the Fraser river improvements later on, but when he complains that outside of this dredging work we are doing nothing for the Fraser river, I would call his attention to page 71 of the items for British Columbia in which he will see that under the head 'Fraser river (lower) wing dam, bank protection works inclusive of repairs', we are spending $35,000, in addition to the $25,000 which we expended last year.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. It was not my intention to say that the government were doing nothing for British Columbia, and I do not think I said it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman is certainly giving that impression because he is seeking to convey the idea to the people of British Columbia that British Columbia is being discriminated against with regard to these improvements.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the inference that the hon gentleman (Mr. Taylor) seeks to have drawn by the people whom he represents.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. With regard to this particular kind of work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the item I have read we are providing for work of a similar character to that which the hon. gentleman has already brought to the attention of the committee. But, so far as I recollect the hon. gentleman has not spoken of works to prevent the surrounding country from being flooded. I understood the hon. gentleman to speak of work to prevent the erosion of the banks of the Fraser river. And when the hon. gentleman the other day mentioned that class of work I spoke of the fact that while we have done work of that character in different provinces we were not prepared to recognize that it was the duty of the federal government to engage extensively in such work. I think on reflection the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Taylor) will see that we are endeavouring to treat the province of British Columbia as fairly as any other province in Canada, and I do feel quite sure that if instead of complaining, when some item for another province is under consideration, he would prefer his particular request to my department it would be better, because then the request could be carefully considered on its merits irrespective entirely of what is being done for other provinces. I am sure the hon. gentleman will feel that he should not interpose any obstacle in the way of this vote passing, and when we come to British Columbia I shall be glad to hear any representations as to the particular needs of that province.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I have again to call the attention of the minister to the fact that he is persistently misquoting my remarks. I do not know how parliamentary it is to say that, but I have stated three times, if not oftener, that I have not opposed this item, and I object to the minister persisting in stating as he did state several times—and he was corrected by me each time—that I was opposing this vote. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that as a representative from British Columbia I am not to be gagged in this committee by any misinterpretation put upon my remarks by the minister, and every time such misinterpretation is given I shall feel it my duty to stand up and correct him and to tell him that he is misquoting the observations I have made to the committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Surley when the hon. gentleman, without waiting for the British Columbia items to come under consideration, rises in his place and complains that this item is being put in for improvements in one province and there is no similar item for improvements for the province from which he comes, that is throwing an obstruction upon the item and seeking to raise an objection in the minds of the members of this committee against the vote being granted. In effect, the hon. gentleman says: It is not right or proper to make that appropriation for Quebec unless you make a similar appropriation for British Columbia. Although the work may be similar in principle we are not making an appropriation for any work of a like character. It does seem to me that a fair inference from the hon. gentleman's remarks is that he wants the people of British Columbia and of his constituency to believe that by voting this item for the Richelieu river and not voting a similar item for the Fraser river we are doing an injustice to the province of British Columbia, that we are discriminating against that province and treating the province of Quebec with a favour which we deny to the province from which he comes. If that is not a fair inference to draw from his remarks I fail to understand the meaning of language.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I wish to say that the minister during the course of the last part of the remarks which he has just now made correctly interpreted me. That is precisely what I wish this House and the province of British Columbia to understand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I thought so.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. But, in the first portion of his last address to the committee the minister reiterated that I opposed this vote, and I wish to state again for the fifth time that he is wrong in saying that I oppose this vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What is the purpose of the hon. gentleman's observations?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. If the minister had been listening to me when I first spoke, instead of carrying on a side conversation, he would have understood precisely what was the purpose of my remarks. The purpose of what I said was that whereas the minister stated to this committee the other evening, in answer to me, that works of this kind could not be expected in future, that this government had carefully considered the matter and had come to the conclusion that they would not grant them in the future; that whereas he gave that to me as a complete answer and an intimation that we need not ask for them, we are now called upon to vote this money for similar works. I say we are willing to vote for these works and that it is our duty to vote for them, and that it is the duty of the government to make appropriations like this. But I say, further, that when they are made they should not be confined to one district or to four or five districts and denied to another district. That is the sole purpose of my rising to speak in connection with this vote for the Richelieu river. My purpose was to attract the attention of the minister to the fact that he is giving here a vote which he has represented to us we need not ask for British Columbia because we will not get it.

Mr. COWAN. The minister has made one statement that I cannot allow to go unchallenged. He says that this government is not discriminating against British Columbia. I would like him to understand that this government has so manipulated the power of indirect taxation that it is taking out of British Columbia $3 per head of the population for $1 per head of the population of the rest of Canada. Since this government came into power in 1896, it has actually taken out of the pockets of the people of British Columbia over $11,000,000 that it has not returned to the people of British Columbia, but has expended in the other provinces. Not only so, but this government has borrowed, until the borrowing power of the Dominion is pretty well exhausted, and spent every dollar of the money so borrowed, not in British Columbia, but in other provinces of Canada. Now, I think the object of confederation was that there should be equitable treatment of the various provinces and that the expenditures should not be made necessarily where the big vote is, but where they are needed in the development of the country. What has been the fact? In British Columbia, as every one knows, public works necessarily cost a great deal more than they do in the level provinces of Canada. No account is taken of that fact. The minister has said that the British Columbia government is going to spend a large amount of money on public works this year. It is obliged to spend that money because of the neglect of the duty cast on the Dominion government to look after the public works of British Columbia. The minister says our revenues are buoyant. In British Columbia we have a direct tax on land of 1 per cent of its value in the hands of a solvent debtor, a tax on personal property of 1 per cent, a tax on wild land of 5 per cent, an income tax of from 1½ to 4 per cent, a tax on minerals of $2 per ton. There is not another province in the whole Dominion of Canada that has any one of these taxes; and they are not municipal taxes, but provincial taxes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is not the provincial tax in lieu of all municipal taxes?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR.

Mr. COWAN. No, it is not.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does not the provincial government look after all the roads and all the court houses?

Mr. COWAN. No. A very large portion of British Columbia is not under municipal government. In the very nature of things it could not be. Remember that our arable lands are in most cases in narrow valleys and gulches surrounded by snow-capped mountains, and are not sufficiently settled for municipalities to be organized; they are unorganized districts. Outside of the large cities and the more thickly settled suburban districts, this is practically the condition of things in British Columbia.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend pardon me a moment? I think he will agree with me that it was quite right that I should answer the hon. member for Westminster, but it does not seem to me that it is in order for another hon. gentleman to rise in his place and start in with a general discussion of the circumstances and the local conditions in the province of British Columbia. Of course, my hon. friend might and probably will refer pretty fully to British Columbia when we reach the British Columbia items; but on an item for the improvement of the Richelieu river, it seems to me that the hon. gentleman is hardly in order in giving us a long speech on the municipal and local conditions of British Columbia, its snow-capped mountains and beautiful valleys, with all of which we are very familiar. On another occasion I would be delighted to hear the hon. gentleman, but it seems to me that we should confine ourselves to the item under consideration.

Mr. COWAN. The minister remarked that there was no discrimination against British Columbia, and I wished to show him that his statement is entirely inaccurate. If he will withdraw that statement, there will be no occasion for any further remarks from me.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think I can satisfy the hon. gentleman. I can say that I am not aware that there is any discrimination, and there is no desire to discriminate.

Mr. COWAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me that the minister's lack of knowledge on the subject calls for a little passing comment. Until he has knowledge that will make him aware of British Columbia conditions, it seems to me that it would be better for him not to give us even that negative statement. If he will say that even that negative statement should not have been made by him, I would be quite satisfied, and the only thing I could do would be to take my seat. Does he withdraw it? I understand the hon. minister withdraws even that negative statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am glad you have such a good understanding.

River Saguenay—dredging and other improvements, $30,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is for the improvement of deep water navigation. It is to make a navigable channel by dredging and also improve the approaches to the wharf at Chicoutimi and form a turning basin.

River St. Lawrence—protection wall along south shore between Laprairie and Little St. James river, $11,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This work will be 3,800 feet long and 25 feet on top with slopes. It is to be rip-rapped and covered with concrete. The estimated cost is $11,000.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Is this to protect navigation or the banks of the river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is to protect the town of Laprairie against the annual damage caused by ice shoves and floods, which prevent communication with Montreal by land at certain seasons. The necessity for this has been caused by the erection of the Montreal and Verdun dykes built by the Harbour Commission. That takes this work out of the category of general works for the protection of banks.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is a bend in the River St. Lawrence below Lachine rapids and a large bay fronting Laprairie. For years the whole village of Laprairie, which is an important place, has been flooded and loss of life and property has been occasioned thereby. These works were laid down many years ago by the late Sir Hector Langevin, then Minister of Public Works, and it is absolutely necessary that this protection wall should be built, as the flooding is largely due to the piers of Victoria bridge and the guard pier.

Mr. M. CURRIE. What has the harbour work to do with this?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The land is very low and is submerged during April and the beginning of May. There is a large pier in the centre of the river at Isle aux Millions near Montreal, and this large pier and the piers of the Victoria bridge as well as the Lachine rapids, and the bend of the river, cause these floods.

Mr. WRIGHT. This land was always flooded before the Victoria bridge was built and there are many other places in Canada in the same position. Do the government assume the responsibility of protecting the shores of all navigable waters, which might be affected by erosions? If they do, we ought to know it. I am not finding fault with the work, but we should know if similar work is to be carried on in other sections.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This protection has been rendered necessary by other works which the government, through the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, has carried on in the vicinity. We have had a petition from the mayors of the municipalities affected asking protection against the annual damage caused by the ice shoves and floods, which entirely prevent communication by land with Montreal at certain times. This protection has been rendered necessary by the Montreal and Verdun dykes built by the Harbour Commissioners. The government did not at once undertake this work, but had the matter investigated by their resident engineer who made the report upon it.

Mr. M. CURRIE. What is the date of the petition and of the report?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not the date of the petition, but the report of the chief engineer was made in 1909, so that the petition must have been a little before then. Our resident engineer, Mr. Michaud, a very competent man, reported that the construction of these dykes had diminished the flow of the St. Lawrence at that point, and that the proposed work would not only be valuable to the citizens of the town of Laprairie but also to the farmers of Laprairie and Napierville and other parishes, by permitting them to take teams to Montreal at all seasons of the year whereas now, communication by land is stopped during high water.

Mr. WRIGHT. How far are the works below Montreal?

Mr. LEMIEUX. They are nine miles above Montreal.

Mr. WRIGHT. That would apply anywhere up the river; it might be assumed that the water would be affected in some way by the works constructed there. I want a pronouncement from the minister on the subject as there are hundreds of places in Canada under similar circumstances, and if works of that kind are being taken in hand by the Dominion government I would be pleased to know of it. I am not finding fault at all but I wish for the information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In any case where complaint is made that as a result of the construction of a government work, whether it is a dam or dredging, or any work of a similar character, injury is done to one or more people, I would feel it my duty to investigate the matter, and if I found that by a reasonable expenditure we could relieve the people from the injury caused by such a Dominion work I would do so. That is the only thing involved in the passing of this item. I am not prepared to-day to admit and I think it would require a good deal of argument to induce me to admit that it is the duty of the federal government in all cases to take the necessary steps for the protection of the banks of rivers or the shores of lakes from erosion. I think that this is work of a local character and ought to be attended to by the municipal or provincial authorities. In cases such as I have mentioned, where perhaps there is a vast damage caused and large sections of the country affected, so that it is work of a federal character, we might adopt a different rule. But, speaking generally, I think that work of the character to which my hon. friend has referred is rather for the municipal or provincial authorities to attend to.

Mr. MACDONELL. Did I understand the minister to say that this work was made necessary by works performed by or under the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. MACDONELL. Is the government taking the position that the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, who are a duly incorporated body and are largely subsidized by this country, can perform works of a local character, and that if these works cause damage to localities, this government assumes the responsibility of making compensation for these damages? Surely the works of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal can be taken care of by that commission; they have been liberally subsidized by this government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They do not get a dollar of subsidy.

Mr. MACDONELL. They have had Dominion loans. Is the government taking the position that it is to indemnify either private or public interests for damages caused by the operations or works of the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal? There are harbour commissions in other parts of the country that are doing their work in their own way under proper authority. As far as I know where they create damages they pay for them themselves, some proper provision is made for the indemnifying of public or private interests damaged by the works of these harbour commissioners. Is the government creating this precedent that it will make good damages of this nature which have been caused by the Montreal Harbour Commission? If so, it seems that the government is leading itself into a position that is never-ending in so far as making good damages of this kind throughout the country is concerned.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not intend to lay down any general rule because I suppose the cases would very seldom arise. I regard the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal as really public officials. They are called on to perform a great national duty in connection with perfecting, improving, enlarging and developing the port of Montreal, the greatest in Canada. They receive no bonus, they cannot engage in harbour work without coming to the government for its approval. They pay interest on the money the government loans to them and they are simply a branch of the public service. I think that where in the performance of their duties in improving the harbour of Montreal they cause flooding several miles away, in sections of the country not within their jurisdiction, it is not unreasonable that the government should perform the work of relieving the people from any damages they may have sustained. The harbour commissioners have no funds which would enable them to carry on work of this character. The money which they raise is all used for the improvement of the harbour. This is outside of their jurisdiction, their district is limited, and I do not see how they could do this work. There would have to be special parliamentary authority to enable them to do it. Without laying down any general rule, I would think that if the harbour commissioners of any part of the country in the performance of work which they undertake with the approval of the government for the improvement of harbours cause damage to individuals outside of their jurisdiction, it would not be unreasonable for the government to take steps to relieve the people of the consequences of that injury. However, I do not want to make any statement to extend beyond the particular work in hand.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What difference does it make if the damage is outside or inside their jurisdiction?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The harbour commissioners could not build any works outside of their jurisdiction. They would have to come to parliament to get authority to carry on a work of this character outside of their jurisdiction.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not suppose they would have any power to build a work of this kind in their jurisdiction.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They might if it was for the improvement of the harbour.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have seen some of the works carried on by the Board of Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and it is not conceivable to me, as a layman, that it interferes with the flow of the St. Lawrence to any appreciable extent, whatever might be said of the Victoria bridge.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The dock does interfere.

Mr. WRIGHT. Have not the lands now supposed to be flooded by the improvement of the harbour of Montreal not been flooded before the work was undertaken, in fact every year since settlement first took place on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The representation which was made by the mayors of these various parishes and towns was that the floods had been increased as the result of the building of these dykes at what is known as the Isle au Millions, and the report of the engineer was that while it was not possible to say how much the dykes had impeded the flow of the river, if the waters were held back, the low lands would be flooded, whereas they would not be to the same extent if the waters were allowed to flow freely. The road has been flooded to such a degree that the people could not travel on the highway at high water. We have been satisfied that to a considerable extent this flooding of the highways has been caused by the building of these dykes

Mr. MACDONELL. The representation of the minister makes the case rather worse than I supposed. I am not opposing the expenditure of this money for this particular purpose. I admit this is a necessary public work, from what the minister has said, and from the explanations that have been made. But what I object to is this: Here is a body duly organized under the authority of the government, known as the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. They have large revenues and large resources, they act entirely independently of this government. They cut their coat according to their cloth; they make expenditures, they undertake public works on their own initiative, and carry them out. Now in carrying out these works this board of commissioners causes damage and loss to communities or to indivduals, and this government, without any knowledge of what the board is doing, without having anything to say about these undertakings, without knowing what damages are being done, this government comes along and makes good the damages they have caused. Is that a businesslike proposition? I have some knowledge of the operations of the Board of Harbour Commissioners of the city of Toronto. Whatever work they do, they have to pay for, and if any damages are caused by their works they settle the Bill themselves. Here the country is paying consequential damages resulting from the operations of this board, indiscriminately, without apparently having any control over them, and without knowing the extent to which they are being let in for damages. I object to that principle as unbusinesslike and improper, and I do not think the government ought to ask us to pass this vote.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I am sure I am convinced by the statement of the Postmaster General, and of the Minister of Public Works that this is a very praiseworthy appropriation. I would like to point out to the minister that the operations of this department are more extensive and comprehensive that he has any idea of. If I may be permitted to mention an item which is not in the present estimates, but is taken from the report of the minister, I find that he goes beyond repairing damage done by the Harbour Commissioners, or by works carried on under his government, and he goes beyond works necessary to promote the navigation of rivers. I have under my hand this item in his report respecting the River St. Louis, page 120:

During the spring high water the River St. Louis spreads over the farming lands from the canal feeder to the village of St. Louis de Gonzague, a distance of about seven miles and thus causes considerable damage. During the summer, the river often overflows equally after a heavy rain storm, and extensive fields of promising crops have been entirely lost. . . . By proper deepening of the river bed and straightening of certain curves, the waters should be lowered some four feet, which would be amply sufficient to protect the farmers along the banks.

Now, I say by all means protect these farmers along the banks, but do not limit the protection to those particular farmers.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Does my hon. friend object to the proposed work in the River St. Louis?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Certainly not.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may inform my hon. friend that the flood in that section of the county of Beauharnois is caused every year by the entrance to the Beauharnois canal constructed by the government. The level of the water of the St. Louis has been raised, and for years and years there has been some work carried on there in order to minimize as much as possible the damage caused by that flood. Now, this is a great public work which was started long before confederation, and which has been going on ever since. The new work on the Beauharnois canal made some fifteen or sixteen years ago, has even affected the level of the water to such an extent in the bay somewhere in the county of Huntingdon, that Ste. Barbe, I think, or some other village, was flooded. I remember when Mr. McLaren, the former member for Huntingdon, was in this House, he explained the whole thing. It is caused by the Public Works Department at the entrance of the Beauharnois canal.

Rivière du Loup (Fraserville)—repairs and renewals to wharf, $4,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Rivière du Loup is a very important place upon the St. Lawrence, one of the important towns on the Intercolonial, and this work is very necessary to repair the wharf. It is expected this sum will make all the necessary repairs required at present.

Shigawake—extension of breakwater—revote of $880 lapsed, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This wharf is in the county of Bonaventure, and this work is urged by the resident engineer, Mr. Amyot. It is to build an extension of 300 feet to the present wharf, so as to give it a depth of seven feet at low water. The government owns the wharf.

Mr. DANIEL. Is there any revenue from any of these wharfs?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is no revenue from this one, because it has not yet been transferred to the Marine Department.

St. Alexis, Ha! Ha! bay—extension of wharf —revote of $2,500 lapsed, $10,000.

St. Alphonse de Bagotville—To complete new addition on south side of wharf and repair old work, $8,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to build a head block, 160 feet long by 56 feet wide. It is to be an addition to the present government wharf at St. Alphonse. We require this amount in order to make repairs to the existing wharf, also to build an extension. I understand this wharf will give accommodation to ocean steamers.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What ocean steamers go there?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from Saguenay (Mr. Girard) informs me that the railway is being extended down to St. Alphonse for the purpose of getting to deep water, and ocean steamers will come there. This is the Lake St. John railway, which ships large quantities of manufactured stuff and farm produce over its road.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What will be the total cost?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The contract was $38,350, and this will complete the work.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. What is the population of this place?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for the district (Mr. Girard) tells me that this is a part of the parish, that it is not a separate town, but there are about 3,000 people in the parish. The important thing is that it will afford a deep water terminus for the railway. Until the Saguenay is dredged out ocean steamers cannot go any farther than St. Alphonse.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How many ocean steamers go up there each year?

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from the district says that about thirty ocean steamers will go up during the course of the season. Those are tramp steamers going for freight.

St. Andrè de Kamouraska wharf—extension —revote of $3,200 lapsed, $10,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The total estimated cost is $10,500, so that we expect this will complete the work.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the annual revenue?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think this has been transferred; if not there will be no revenue.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think we ought to have information about such matters in connection with the very large sums proposed to be expended.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think that last session, or the session before, a statement was brought down showing all the wharfs that had been transferred.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That would make it very easy to give the information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It would make it very easy for my hon. friend to get it too.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not passing the estimates.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend had intimated he wanted that information I would have been glad to have obtained it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We should have it always. When we are asked to vote sums of money ranging from $10,000 to $25,000 for these wharfs it seems to me eminently proper that the minister should come fortified with the information in all such cases. This is information that ought to be given to the committee without any request having to be made. It would be very much easier to get the estimates through the committee, if the minister would always be prepared with a certain amount of information in every instance which should be available without any question whatever. When we do ask what seem to be absolutely relevant questions we are told that there is some other minister who might give it if he were here, or that there is some return which has been brought down and from which, if it were available, we could get the information instead of having it ready for us. I do not think the minister is really prepared with his estimates until he has all the information of this kind available.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would call my hon. friend's attention to the fact that all the items for Ontario, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island went through and it is only now that my hon. friend says that he wants a statement as to the revenue.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. Whenever I have been here I have asked about that particularly. I did so a week ago to-day, when the estimates were under discussion. I said then that the information ought to be forthcoming in regard to the revenue.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The reason I did not think it important was this: Where wharfs have not been transferred to my department the revenue is nothing, as my department does not collect any revenue. In building wharfs we are not influenced by the revenue which we will get, in fact, hardly at all influenced by the revenue; it is rather by the accommodation which will be given to the public and by the opportunities for the development of trade and travel. But, if my hon. friend would like it, I will be very glad to find out as to the St. André de Kamouraska wharf and also as to the remainder of these wharfs, but I cannot give it to my hon. friend now. I will undertake to furnish it if he wishes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. When we were considering the estimates a week ago I mentioned the information that I would like to have in this connection. There does not seem to be any principle whatever governing the transfer, or non-transfer, of these wharfs from the Department of Public Works to the Department of Marine and Fisheries. In one case no tolls are exacted; in the other case tolls are exacted. In one part of the country farmers are not obliged to pay any wharfage charges upon their goods; in other parts of the country, farmers, equally entitled to consideration, are obliged to pay such charges. There seems to be no system at all except perhaps a system of political expediency, and I do not think it is a good way to carry on public business. The minister does not think it is a good way to carry on public business, and from his statement there is some proposal now under consideration by the government for the purpose of adopting a general system in that regard. A general system ought to be undertaken. There is a further consideration. In the case of some of these items there may be a very good justification for building a wharf, but I do not apprehend that the government is very much concerned with any general principle in building these wharfs. Not long ago, this afternoon, the minister was speaking of works of a local and private nature. He said that the government could not undertake to engage in the expenditure of public money upon such works. Yet, a great many of these wharfs seem to me to be works of precisely that character. I dare say I might find more than one illustration, but in one case in particular we were asked to spend a considerable sum of money in the construction of a wharf in my own county, where there was a very good private wharf in existence at that time. It is impossible for the minister to suggest that the expenditure of that money was governed by any consideration of public interest. It could not have been governed by any such consideration. The fault I have to find with these estimates that come before us year after year is that they do not seem to be based upon or inspired by any actual consideration of the public interest, but by some considerations that are absolutely foreign to the public interest in a great many cases at least. Where there is a locality, even if it has not a large population, which is to be the terminus of a large railway, and where the produce of a large portion of the country will be brought to the wharf and will be shipped on steamers for export abroad, I can see some reason for the expenditure of public money, because the enterprise is too great for the local community to undertake. But, to spend $700 or $800 upon wharfs, here, there and elsewhere, all along the sea coast and even in competition with private wharfs does not seem to me to be very good policy, and does not seem to be founded on any system that ought to commend itself to the members of this committee.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I know about this wharf, and it was I who asked the hon. member (Mr. Lapointe) to urge for its improvement. The wharf was built long before confederation to serve local traffic, but recently the Trade and Commerce Department has granted a subsidy for winter navigation between River Ouelle and St. André de Kamouraska, and north shore points. Recently a company has been formed at Fraserville to afford both summer and winter navigation between these points and across the St. Lawrence. The enterprise has met with a good deal of success this winter, but of course the winter has been mild. The intention is to have winter navigation between Fraserville and St. André, on the south shore, and St. Catharines, Tadousac and Seven Islands, on the north shore. At the latter place, Clarke City is a large manufacturing centre. The Desjardins firm at St. André are largely engaged in the furniture trade, and they ship their furniture to all the north shore points. I may tell the leader of the opposition that Mr. Desjardins is one of his strongest supporters in that district, and he is a very able man.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Formerly the Desjardins firm were obliged to send their furniture to Quebec and there have it transferred to the Lake St. John railway for distribution to north shore points, whereas now, from this wharf, they can ship direct across the St. Lawrence. I really believe that this wharf will be a great public utility.

Mr. WRIGHT. Some few days ago I asked the minister as to the method of collecting dues at these wharfs, and I would point out that the hon. gentleman was entirely mistaken in seeming to think that I was then making any criticism. I understand that no dues are collected on these wharfs while they are under the control of the Public Works Department, but that when they are handed over to the Marine and Fisheries Department dues are supposed to be levied upon those who use the wharfs. In some cases when these wharfs have passed from the Public Works Department they are simply monopolized by some large interest which takes control of them to the exclusion of everybody else. In instances which have come under my observations these companies have refused to repair the wharfs, and as it seemed to be nobody's business to do so, they fell into disrepair. From what I can learn, it would appear that where a charge is made, the fees are simply handed over to the man who was appointed as wharfinger or harbour master, as the case may be. I inquired as to this a few sessions ago, and I was told by the Minister of Public Works that negotiations were pending between his department and the Marine Department with a view towards bringing all these wharfs under some business management. No progress appears to have been made in that direction. It was then intimated by the minister that the government was considering the question of handing these small wharfs over to the local municipalities, and I think this could be done with benefit to the government and to the trade of the different districts. Where large expenditures have been made on wharfs, it seems to me that they should return some revenue to the government. If the smaller wharfs were handed over to the municipalities the government would be relieved from the charges of repairing them. I would like to see this question finally settled.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I expressed my opinion on a former occasion, as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wright) very correctly says, that the smaller wharfs, and indeed the larger wharfs in the country districts, might be handed over to the municipalities if they would undertake to make the lesser repairs. Of course, the larger repairs would have to be done by the department. I also expressed the opinion that in the case of wharfs used by regular steamship lines, they might be leased to the companies upon the understanding that farmers and others who only bring a small quantity of freight to the wharfs should not be obliged to pay any top wharfage. At the last session of parliament a Bill, having that object in view, was introduced by the Minister of Marine, and passed, but the minister shortly afterwards left for England, and since his return he has not been able to give attention to the matter, which probably explains why it has not been settled. I am very anxious that some satisfactory arrangement should be made as early as possible in this regard. The present condition is unsatisfactory, but the government is not responsible. The same trouble has been existing for the last forty years, and I know of wharfs constructed by the late government which never were transferred to the Marine Department. They came in this shape as a legacy to us. In the case of one wharf which was built twenty years ago, when it was known that I intended to transfer it to the Marine Department and that tolls would be collected, the people entered a very vigorous protest. I hope the question will soon be taken up and dealt with satisfactorily.

Ste. Anne des Monts—harbour improvements at mouth of Grande Rivière Ste. Anne, $4,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to make provision to carry out certain works in connection with improvements now going on at the mouth of this river. This is in the county of Gaspé. This vote will complete the work. The object is to make a suitable and safe harbour at the mouth of the river for fishing boats.

Mr. LEMIEUX. At the entrance of the river there are large boulders, and the tide is very strong.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. Is the river navigable?

Mr. LEMIEUX. For about a mile and a half. During the past three or four years there have been wrecks there owing to the unsafe condition of the river. This work will, so to speak, bridge the entrance of the river. The piers on each side will keep the mouth in fairly good order so as to give ships fairly good facilities for entrance.

Mr. WRIGHT. What will be the total cost of the work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The total estimated cos is $28,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That would seem to be a pretty large expenditure for the removal of boulders from the mouth of a river.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is more than that. There is to be a combined dam and landing pier of brush and stone work on either side of the river and ballasted crib work on the outer end. The pier on the western bank will extend for a distance of 400 feet, and on the eastern bank for a distance of about 300 feet.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the depth of water at the mouth of the river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We shall have 5½ feet at low water and 15 or 16 feet at high water.

Mr. PERLEY. Is this for the benefit of the village and the public or for the purpose of helping some of the sawmills there?

Mr. PUGSLEY. For the benefit of the public, to make a safe harbour.

Mr. PERLEY. Is this not one of the wharfs built for the purpose of helping the sawmill owners?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is no sawmill there.

Mr. PERLEY. The report of the minister at page 123 says that several sawmills are in operation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Rathbun Company of Deseronto were there some years ago, but they have left. It is the largest place in the county of Gaspé. It has a population of something like 1,500.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The report of the minister is hardly up to date.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This work was begun in 1904. There was a sawmill there at that time, and the notes would be carried forward. I did not know that the sawmill had disappeared.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Has the minister an idea of how many fishing boats go out from that place?

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is quite a trade.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do the ocean steamers call there?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sorry that I cannot tell my hon. friend the number of fishing boats.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I thought this was principally for the benefit of the fishermen.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Some twenty years ago there was a fish industry there; but, as my hon. friend knows, the codfish have left that side of the St. Lawrence. A herring industry has been started, however, and there is quite a trade between St. Anne and Quebec. There are no railway facilities on that shore, as it is too hilly, and the people have to go to Rimouski or to Quebec to get their supplies; and, as there is quite a large district served from Ste. Anne des Monts, there are quite a number of schooners there.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Great Lakes Transportation Company, whose boats will call there have also urged this improvement.

St. Charles de Caplan—extension of wharf, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This extension will be 350 feet long and 20 feet wide, and will give 9 feet 5 inches of water at low water spring tide and 17 feet 5 inches at high water. There is an old wharf there, and this is to make an extension to it. The total estimated cost is $20,000. We spent in 1908-09, $5,008.72, we are now asking $5,000, and it will require a further amount of $10,000 to complete the work.

Mr. PERLEY. Will the minister explain the necessity for such a large expenditure? Has not this wharf been there for a long time?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not a very full detail, but the work has been urged by the hon. member for the county. The wharf already built does not give a sufficient depth of water to accommodate the steamers, so it does not fulfil the purpose for which the money was originally expended to an extent that is reasonably necessary.

Mr. PERLEY. Has the minister any facts regarding this work, or is he simply doing it because the member for the county has asked for it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do it at the request of the member for the county.

Mr. PERLEY. Has the minister no report on the subject from any of his engineers?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think there must be a report, but I have no memorandum of it.

Mr. PERLEY. Were there any petitions for this?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have no record of any.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is in my constituency. The wharf was built in 1904-5, reaching into 5 or 6 feet at low water, and the intention is to complete it. St. Charles de Caplan is a parish on the Baie des Chaleurs, and there is another parish in the rear. There is a settlement extending into the interior a distance of some twelve miles from the coast. The population today exceeds 2,000, and the postal revenue of the district is close on to $1,000. It is one of the important localities along the bay. This wharf has been called for during years past. Steamers plying along the coast have to stop in the open and land their passengers and freight in scows, and when the weather is unfavourable people cannot get either on or off the boat, but must proceed to New Carlisle, about twenty miles distant in order to get a landing.

Mr. PERLEY. The explanation seems fairly good, but I would like to ask about the work done on this wharf in the fall of 1908. I see by the report of the Public Works Department that the wharf was suddenly found to be in a dangerous and dilapidated condition in the fall of the year, and it was necessary to repair it by day labour at a cost of nearly $800. How comes it that this work was all done between October 14 and November 7, 1908?

Mr. SPEAKER. In that year there were some very heavy storms in that part of the country, and it is difficult to have this work done in the seasons when the farmers and fishermen are busy. The timber of course can only be got out in winter.

Mr. PERLEY. Was not that the time when the general elections were held?

Mr. PUGSLEY. A heavy storm came on late in the month.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What depth of water for the extension?

Mr. SPEAKER. There is a tide of from 6 to 8 feet, and at the lowest tide the depth is at least 6 feet. The tide rises to 12 or 14 feet. I omitted to state that Mr. Fair has taken over the bait freezer from the fishermen's association there, and has entered into a rather extensive fish industry, the selling of fresh fish. He is doing a pretty extensive business. I have had several reports from him showing that quite a profitable business is being done as the result of the construction of that wharf, and the government have been urgently requested to have it brought into sufficiently deep water to enable steamers to effect a landing.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is it a fishing place?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, according to the report of the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the year 1909, 200 men are there engaged in the fishing industry, and they own 100 boats. Their fishing tackle is valued at $7,750. The fish district, of which St. Charles de Caplan is the most important centre, brought in last year $111,000.

St. Denis—wharf on River Richelieu—revote lapsed, amount, $2,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This will complete a small wharf. The estimated cost is $5,500. We have spent $3,000 and are asking $2,500 to complete.

Ste. Croix wharf—revote of $2,000 lapsed, $20,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The amount voted being so small, I did not think we should enter into a contract without coming back to parliament. We are now asking $20,000. The locality is a very important one, and this work has been urged very strongly on our favourable consideration.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is there any report?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have a very full report. Total estimated cost, $46,000.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How large is the town?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not a town, but it is in the centre of a very populous farming district. There are over 6,000 people to be served by this wharf. For a number of years there has been a regular boat service between Ste. Croix and Quebec, largely used for the transport of agricultural products and other merchandise. The wharf is now badly wrecked, and it is in the public interest that one should be built. We sent an engineer to report and he became satisfied that the demand was reasonable.

Mr. BARNARD. What is the size of the town?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is a village, but the centre of a populous agricultural district. The abutments will be of wood and stone, and the trestle 75 feet wide and 775 feet long, besides a roadway of gravel and sand. There will be 683 lineal feet of open-faced crib work and a head block consisting of 172,175 cubic feet of crib work. We shall have to remove reefs and boulders and level the approaches at both sides to accommodate steamers at low water. We propose to build a waiting room and freight shed and a barn for sheltering stock. Total estimated cost, $46,000.

Mr. BARNARD. When did the minister get the reports?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some time in 1908, I have not the exact date. This $2,000 was expended for improving the approach, I think.

Mr. BARNARD. It seems strange that last year you spent $2,000 and this year you are spending $20,000 and you tell us it will cost $46,000. The ideas of the members for the county seem to have considerably magnified in the last twelve months.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What county is it in?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Lotbinière.

Mr. WRIGHT. $46,000 seems a large sum to spend for a wharf in what must be a small place, as according to the census it was not even incorporated at that time.

Mr. PUGSLEY. At page 125 of the report a description of the work already done will be found, but that is but a small part of the work we will have to do. The amount required did seem large and I hesitated for quite a while. That is why we did not go on actively with the larger work the year before last, but after having the matter fully looked into we find that we cannot build a wharf giving the accommodation required for less than the sum mentioned. It is a difficult and expensive place in which to construct a wharf. I have had many conversations with the member, who knows how I hesitated in the matter, but he showed the benefit which it would be to the people. The large number of people in the locality, 5,000 or 6,000, have no other means of sending their produce to market. There is no railway and this wharf is absolutely essential to give to the people the accommodation required.

Mr. PERLEY. The report says it is on the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. FORTIER. The Intercolonial railway is too far from these localities to transport the produce of the farmers to the market.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understood it was not feasible for the farmers to transport their produce to market by the Intercolonial railway, and that they required to use water transportation.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is only a small community which will be served by the wharf, some 5,000 or 6,000 people, and it is impossible to conceive that all of those people would be nearer the wharf than the railway.

Mr. FORTIER. It is to serve different parishes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I cannot understand how the wharf is to be nearer the scattered community of 5,000 people than the railway.

Mr. E. ROY. The only market for these people is Quebec which is on the north side of the river, while Lotbinière is on the south side. As the Intercolonial railway stops at Levis, people who want to take supplies to market have to go to Levis and take the ferry and carry their produce to the Quebec market. The only practicable mode of taking produce to Quebec is to go by steamer right through to Quebec.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is there winter navigation?

Mr. FORTIER. No.

Mr. BARNARD. If the old wharf was in such a dilapidated condition, why was it deemed desirable to spend $3,000 in repairs, especially when there was a vote of $5,000 for a new wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY. What we have done is all good work that will form the approach to the new wharf.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was the old wharf a government wharf or a private wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY. A private wharf.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then if private enterprise could build and maintain a private wharf for many years, how is it that the government has now to build a public wharf there?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That often happens. You will find sometimes that thirty or forty years ago some enterprising man has been in a certain line of business, perhaps shipping lumber, who would build a wharf. He may have failed in business and not have kept the wharf up. In this case the wharf was allowed to go into decay and it has become necessary, if we are to give the people any reasonable accommodation at all, to build a new wharf.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the government own the land?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have no memorandum with regard to the title, but I feel sure the title to the approach and to the portion which we have built, the crib-work is in the Crown. If my hon. friend wishes the information, I will have it looked up. I am quite sure that is the case, because I remember the question coming up.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How far is the wharf from the railway?

Mr. FORTIER. Ten and a half miles.

Mr. E. ROY. The best part of the municipality consists of farms along the river.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Without speaking particularly of this wharf, the policy upon which the government are embarking will result in the necessity of building wharfs all over this country. Where private wharfs have existed in the past, we are to have government wharfs in the future. That will be a large undertaking. Take the rivers of this country, both sides of the rivers, wherever a wharf is required, and all indentations of the coast line on both oceans, you will have perhaps 12,000 or 15,000 miles of country upon which the government will have to build wharfs. If you carry that out to the extent of building a $50,000 wharf to accommodate 5,000 or 6,000 people, some of whom must be fairly well accommodated by a railway, it is going to involve a large policy. Yet I do not see that there will be any escape from it. I know that in the province of Nova Scotia, up to within recent years, the principle was that these wharfs were matters of private enterprise, they were built by private individuals who charged wharfage.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Up to what time was that?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Up to a recent year, I think. As I have told the minister, I know of one instance in my own county where there was a very good private wharf, and a government wharf was built within a quarter of a mile of it; if I remember rightly it was at Port Dufferin. The subject was discussed in this House six or seven years ago. I think it is the very wharf about which some inquiry was made in the House the other day, but I am not absolutely sure of the locality. I had letters from the place at the time, on behalf of the persons who were interested in the private wharf, and who bitterly complained because the wharf they had built, and from which they derived a certain revenue, would be practically put out of business by the government wharf. Well, that does not seem to be a very provident system, to say the least of it. I think the government are embarking upon a pretty large undertaking.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is not this government which is embarking upon this policy. The old government built wharfs along the St. Lawrence many years ago, and I remember it was a great complaint we used to make in New Brunswick that the federal government were building wharfs on the St. Lawrence and the provincial government had to build them in New Brunswick. My hon. friend now speaks of Nova Scotia; but perhaps a little later on this evening, or at some other time, we will hear members of this House upon the opposite side complaining of how many wharfs are being built in Nova Scotia as compared with other sections of Canada. This is not a new policy at all. All governments since confederation have engaged in building wharfs, more or less, regarding it as a policy in the interest of the transportation system of the country. I am prepared to justify the building of wharfs wherever they are necessary for the accommodation of the people. Wharfs are so intimately associated with transportation, and with navigation, they are so much a necessity in aid of navigation, that if there is any work that is properly federal work, it is the construction of wharfs. Of course, we must draw a line as to the extent of expenditure to which we shall go. For instance, if a large expenditure is necessary in order to give accommodation to a limited number of people, we might hesitate in doing that work. But my hon. friend is entirely wrong when he says that he can fairly take the cost of this wharf as a measure of the cost of all other wharfs which are to be constructed. If my hon. friend looks at the expenditure made upon other wharfs he will see they do not at all come up, upon the average, to the cost of this one.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Why should this one come up so high?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Because the local conditions are such as to make it necessary to expend more than is usually expended upon wharfs of this character. The physical features of the site often make a great difference in the cost. We can build in one place a wharf for $5,000, whereas in another place we might have to spend, owing to the physical conditions, $10,000 to build a wharf not any better, and perhaps not as good. A great deal depends upon the length of the approach, or how far you have to build your crib-work out in order to get a depth of water sufficient to accommodate steamers. In many cases you will get that depth at fifty feet, and in other places you might have to go out 100 feet or 300 feet to get the same depth of water, and to get the same accommodation for steamers. All these things affect the cost of the wharf. I think in this case we are justified in expending this amount of money in order to give this accommodation to the people. Here are some 5,000 or 6,000 people whose natural market is the city of Quebec. There is no railway, as has been pointed out, from that portion of the province to the city of Quebec. To take the produce down that railway to Levis and cart it across to the city of Quebec, adds so much to the cost of transportation as to give no profit to the farmers. I think the expenditure, while it is large, can well be justified by reason of the advantage which we give to the people.

Mr. PERLEY. I do not think the minister has made out a good case for this particular wharf. No one objects to the government building wharfs where they are needed. The minister is continually harping upon what the Conservative party did in the old days; if he followed them a little more closely perhaps he would get on better. He talks about their spending money on wharfs; certainly they did. As a matter of fact, last year this government expended on public works nearly $15,000,000, and in the days of the Conservative party the expenditure was from ten to twenty per cent of that amount. I have no objection to this particular wharf, except that I think the cost is extravagant.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The country has trebled in business since that time.

Mr. PERLEY. But the government is spending eight or ten times as much money on wharfs, and if they were spending it well, I would not mind. But the minister has not yet read us any report from an engineer of his department saying that this wharf was needed at this particular place, a wharf that he estimates will cost $46,000. According to past experience with this government, it is likely to cost $70,000 or $80,000 before they get through with it. The wharf is at a place where there is no incorporated village. We cannot see the place, and we cannot see these wharfs to judge for ourselves. But here is one across the river at Hull which we can see, and it is an expensive wharf, practically no value to any body. Even there it is built in a city of 10,000 people, but it is hardly used at all. Many of these wharfs built by the government are in places where they are not required, and the government often build wharfs costing four or five times as much as it is necessary to spend, because a wharf costing a quarter of the amount would answer the purpose just as well.

Mr. FORTIER. The village of Ste. Croix is not a large town, but it is the chief place in the county. There are six or seven important merchants doing business there, and a bank and the registry office is located at that point. Unless this accommodation is provided, all the products of farmers will have to go by the Intercolonial railway to Lévis, at which point they will have to be transferred to the boat and then taken across the river to Quebec. Instead of doing that, when this wharf is constructed, the produce will be placed on the boat at Ste. Croix and go straight to Quebec, which is the market of the farmers of Lotbinière. This service is now performed by two boats which call at St. Jean des Chaillons and carry the produce to Quebec. One of these boats goes every fifteen days to Montreal with cheese, butter, potatoes and other products intended for shipment to Europe. With regard to the old wharf, I would like to remind my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) that it was built only for the accommodation of sail boats. There is not a sufficient depth of water, and these sail boats could only go to this wharf at high tide.

Mr. S. SHARPE. It seems that we are spending $46,000 of public money to take traffic away from the Intercolonial railway when we have been complaining that there is not enough traffic.

Mr. FORTIER. The Intercolonial never had that traffic It was carried by these boats, but they were not able to come to the wharf at low tide.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I understand that the Intercolonial runs through this parish?

Mr. LEMIEUX. For about 12 miles.

Mr. S. SHARPE. There are a great many farmers throughout the country who have to team their produce 12 miles to the market or station, and I cannot see that it will be any great hardship to the farmers of this parish to team their produce to the station 12 miles away and ship it to Lévis, where it could be sold. It seems to me that we are spending $46,000 to take traffic away from the Intercolonial railway. This seems a most indefensible expenditure. The hon. gentleman who represents the constituency says there are only five merchants at Ste. Croix.

Mr. FORTIER. Yes, at Ste. Croix, but this wharf is to serve five or six parishes.

Mr. S. SHARPE. That will minimize the traffic that will go over the Intercolonial.

Mr. FORTIER. No, the Intercolonial never had that traffic before.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Where is the traffic going to-day if it is not going over the Intercolonial railway?

Mr. FORTIER. It is going by boats of all kinds.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Perley) asked me if we had a report from the engineer. There was a petition presented urging very strongly the necessity for the building of this wharf. The engineer concurred in the views of the petitioners and declared that there was a pressing need for wharf accommodation at Ste. Croix. He says in his report that the parishes supply an immense traffic which must find its way to the market by water. I think that is as strong and distinct as anything could be as to the necessity of this wharf.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. I would like to know if the old wharf has served the purpose of the parish up to the present time?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It did before the days of steamboats. As my hon. friend from Lotbiniere says, this wharf was originally built to accommodate sailing boats.

Mr. FORTIER. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They did a very large traffic, but now their places have been taken by steamers.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. What is the depth of water that these steam boats would draw?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Ten or twelve feet. I am told that a river steamer draws about 10 feet of water. A sailing boat could go up and lie aground at low tide by steamers will not do that and unless they can get wharf accommodation the steamers pass by and these farmers would be put to the increased expenditure in bringing their products to market or would have to go out of the business of raising products except for their own immediate use.

Mr. BARNARD. I understand the minister to say that there were two steamers which called at this wharf.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Two steamers the member for that district (Mr. Fortier) says.

Mr. E. ROY. No, three trips each week.

Mr. BARNARD. That is rather inconsistent with the idea of the minister that only vessels can get near to this wharf.

Mr. E. ROY. This wharf is not built yet. No steamers can come to the wharf but they do call at the wharf in the adjoining parish of St. Jean des Chaillons and these two steamers make two trips a week. So, there is one steamer every day calling at that wharf. When this wharf at Ste. Croix is built there will be one steamer a day. I live in the city of Quebec and we want this accommodation because the market of Quebec is supplied by the farmers of Lotbiniére as well as the farmers of other localities. We will find it impossible to get the products of this county at reasonable rates unless this accommodation is provided. If the products have to be transported ten miles to the railway, transferred from the railway to the boat, taken across to Quebec and then taken from the boat to the market it will so increase the cost that it will be impossible to bring them to Quebec.

Mr. BARNARD. We are then asked to vote $46,000 for a wharf that is to accommodate one steamer a day. Does not the minister think that it would be better to build a $6,000 wharf and put the remaining $40,000 into a steamer?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It has already been explained that we cannot get a sufficient depth of water for the steamers without building out a considerable distance and to provide a wharf that will accommodate the steamers will cost this amount.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. How far does the old wharf extend out?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The old wharf was a private wharf and I have no memo as to that.

Mr. FORTIER. It is crib work joined by bridges. It extends out about 700 or 800 feet.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. Is this wharf to be longer than 700 feet?

Mr. FORTIER. I have not the details of the new wharf. The site will have to be changed as there is no water at the old site of the old wharf.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sorry I cannot give the length of the wharf.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. Surely the minister is not asking for a vote without knowing how far the wharf will extend?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I can give specifications of the plan it is now proposed to adopt. First, we are to improve the road down to the foot of the hill at the shore line.

Mr. ROY.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. How far inland does that shore extend?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Just down the bank to the wharf.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. Is that a private municipal road?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It will be a public road. Then we will have a crib roadway of timber and stone to the foot of the hill, 85,000 cubic feet; new intermediate block 100 by 22 by 17 equals 37,400 cubic feet; head block average 212½ by 52½ by 19 equals 211,964 cubic feet; new trestle roadway 500 feet which will be capable of being removed in the fall. That gives a very good idea in a general way of the extent of the wharf.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. In whom is the fee of the roadway leading down to the wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the government.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. Are the approaches to the wharf and the title of the land on which the wharf will be built, in the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. All in the government.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will this interfere with the private wharf at which the vessels call at present?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, that other wharf is twenty-five miles away. When this wharf is built the steamers which call at the other wharf will call at it.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I wish to know from the minister whether he will entertain with respect to other localities of the same size and importance as this, an application for a wharf that would involve a like expenditure? I have two localities in my riding which have been petitioning for satisfactory wharfs and which cannot get them because the minister seems to think that the expense involved would be too large in proportion to the importance of the district to be served. I have listened very attentively to all the descriptions given of the importance of this district, and as I have said with respect to the other items, if it is a proper item I am certainly not opposed to it. I have heard the minister state that on account of the peculiar situation of this place it unfortunately takes a large expenditure to provide the accommodation, which of course it should have. I quite admit that this locality should have an effective shipping wharf, but I would like the minister to say whether I understood his principle correctly to be, that a wharf should be provided at any cost if a locality needed it. If that is the principle I want to apply it in another direction. Is that the principle upon which the minister asks for this appropriation, and if so is he willing to extend the principle to an application which I shall file when the proper time comes with respect to wharfs which he has withheld from us, because he thinks they will cost more than the trade of the place justified?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not said there was any such principle. The hon. gentleman seems to think that I said that where a wharf was to the public advantage it would be built no matter what it would cost. I said nothing of the kind, and I never intended to lay down any such principle. What I said was that in this particular case, in view of the large number of people to be accommodated, in view of the report of the engineer, in view of the fact that the only reasonable means the people have of getting to market is by water, I thought we were justified in going to this expense. As to any application which my hon. friend has to submit I can give no promise and assurance whatever beyond this: that whenever any application is made I shall feel it my duty to consider the matter very carefully, and I must deal with each individual application upon its merits.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE. Am I to understand that if any damage results to a private or municipal interest by reason of the construction of a public work the department will make good that damage? I may say that I believe that is a proper principle. When the government was constructing the Trent canal there was a road running parallel to the canal between the counties of Victoria and Ontario; and those engaged in the construction threw the excavated sand on to the public road of the municipality, rendering it almost impassable. I understand that petitions have come to the department asking for a grant in reference to the gravel road injured in this way on the Balsam division of the Trent canal. I hope the minister will take these petitions into his favourable consideration. The principle involved in this is the same as that which justifies the government in protecting Laprairie and other villages on the St. Lawrence which were injured by water backing up in consequence of certain work done by the harbour commissioners of Montreal. I would ask the minister to make a grant to the municipalities to regravel that road.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would have thought that my hon. friend had heard the Trent Valley canal discussed often enough in the House to know that it is in the Department of Railways and Canals, and not in my department.

Mr. MAGRATH. I would like to ask the minister if his department has ever prepared a statement showing the length of life of these wharfs, and the expenditure for renewals per thousand dollars of cost of construction. This would be interesting information to have, because this is a growing expenditure, and it would give us some idea of where we stand with reference to the cost of wharfs throughout the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That has not been figured out.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 44) respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company—Mr. Ethier.

Bill (No. 83) respecting the Vancouver, Westminster and Yukon Railway Company—Mr. R. Smith.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 146) respecting the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company—Mr. Harty.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

St. Joseph de Sorel—wharf on west side of River Richelieu—revote of $3,000 lapsed, $9,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to make provision towards the construction of a pile wharf on the west side of the River Richelieu. There has been a petition for it sent to the department. We expect this vote will finish the work. We had a vote for the year ending March 31, 1909, which we did not use. This is a new work.

Sorel—deepwater wharf, $42,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We had a vote last year of $86,000, but we only expended $44,000 of it. We are simply asking now a revote of the appropriation of last year that was unexpended. This will complete the work.

Sorel—breakwater of pile work and stone filling opposite Elizabeth street—revote of $2,500 lapsed, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to provide for the construction of a breakwater of pile and stone work. Nothing has yet been expended on this work. This is the total estimated cost. We took a partial vote for it and allowed it to lapse.

Tadousac harbour, north shore of St. Lawrence—wharf on southeast side of Tadousac island—revote of $4,600 lapsed, $15,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is a new undertaking. The old wharf at Tadousac has got into a pretty bad condition, and has become dangerous. A new wharf is urgently required, and is expected to cost about $30,000. It will be crib-work filled with stone, and there will be a slip in it, and necessarily a shed upon it.

Three Rivers—deep water coal wharf at west end of harbour, opposite windmill—revote of $7,500 lapsed, $50,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to build a wharf which is very much needed at Three Rivers. We took a vote for the year 1908-9 of $7,500, but we did not proceed to let the contract, because the amount was too small to warrant us in entering into the contract without coming back to parliament. The pier which has been built there is required for ordinary merchandise, but there is no accommodation for the very large coal business. The harbour commissioners have urged this upon us, and the member for the county has also strongly urged it. I think also there are petitions for it; at all events, we had an interview by representatives of Three Rivers, including the harbour commissioners. This will be a new work. We called for tenders for the work under the appropriation of 1908-9, but owing to the vote being so small, I declined to accept the tenders and returned the cheques. I cannot give the exact amount, but my impression is that the lowest tender was in the vicinity of $140,000. The matter is entirely open, the deposit cheques having been returned. There is at Three Rivers a pier which was built in 1903-4, but that is for general merchandise, and it is fully occupied, so the engineer reports. This is for the purpose of enabling coal to be handled at the harbour. Three Rivers is a place of a good deal of importance. It is the outlet for Shawinigan Falls, some 20 miles away. Unfortunately, there was a severe fire at Three Rivers a year or more ago, which did the place a great deal of injury, but I am told it is building up rapidly again.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this for the purpose of bringing in coal?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Coal, and also to afford protection to boats frequenting the harbour.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it under a harbour master?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a board of harbour commissioners at Three Rivers.

Mr. MACDONELL. Would the minister inform us just what purpose this wharf is going to serve? Is it the practice of the government now to build wharfs for every municipality that desires that accommodation, or for any private individual who may say that he needs a wharf for his own purposes? Is the government going to lay down piers and build wharfs throughout the entire country wherever there is navigable water? Is the government assuming not only the control of all the harbours, but also embarking in the enterprise of building piers wherever a harbour is to be used? If so it would seem to me that the government is laying up trouble for itself in the future both in regard to putting docks where there are no docks now, and as to perpetually keeping in repair docks and wharfs that they are now building. It seems to be a new departure in the policy of the government. I would like to know from the minister if this dock is going to serve any general public purpose, or whether it is serving a local purpose, and what other docks there are? Are there public or private docks, if so are they under any commission, or is this government simply going to build wharfs and docks at that point?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is a pretty difficult thing to answer my hon. friend categorically. We cannot lay down any definite rule as to what wharfs shall or shall not be built. For instance, at Fort William, the government is building a quay or wharf a good many hundreds of feet in length. We are doing that to facilitate the handling of merchandise, grain and coal.

Mr. MACDONELL. That is a national lake port.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend says it is a national port. I suppose he would say that the harbour of Toronto is a national port. So it is. You cannot say with certainty what is a national port and what is not. In the city of St. John I can well remember that the old government would not do any dredging in the harbour near any wharf because it would be said that they were benefiting the property of the city. They refused absolutely, stating that it was not part of their duty to do it.

Mr. DANIEL. So did this government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Up to a certain date, but we have broadened out since then.

Mr. DANIEL. Lately, yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have awakened to a clearer realization of the needs of this great country.

Mr. DANIEL. That is right.

Mr. PUGSLEY. And I do not think anybody will condemn us for doing it. The government are building a wharf at St. John to facilitate the handling of the business of Canada. I think my hon. friend will say that St. John is entitled to take its place as one of the national ports of Canada.

Mr. DANIEL. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We believe it is, but at the same time there are numerous places throughout Ontario where we have built and are building wharfs. If my hon. friend will go up to Lake Nipissing, to the Montreal river, to Sault Ste. Marie, and scores of other places in Ontario, he will find that we are building wharfs, not to accommodate any particular railway company or any particular coal or lumber company, but to facilitate the particular business which can be properly handled at that port. At Three Rivers what have we? We have a town of large importance. It is the port of Shawinigan, Grand Mere, and other thriving communities situated back from the St. Lawrence. At Three Rivers the coal business has reached enormous proportions. It amounts to 100,000 tons a year, and there is no place at that port where that coal business can be handled. We have a pier built by the government. We had hoped that would be sufficient for the different kinds of merchandise, including coal, but the Harbour Commissioners, the people and the engineers say, no, it is crowded with business, and we have felt that it would be proper to build this pier in order to give accommodation to the rapidly increasing business. I do not know just whom it will help most, but I should think that the community will be the most specially benefited because it will make Three Rivers a very important distributing point for the coal which will be brought there from Nova Scotia and other parts. We do know that a large business is done there in Nova Scotia coal. A 100,000 tons a year, at least, will be distributed from Three Rivers if we give this required accommodation. As to the other question that my hon. friend asked, I may say that the pier which has been already built is placed under the control of the Harbour Commissioners, and this pier, when built, will also be placed under the Harbour Commissioners. I believe the work is a very important one, and if we recognize that it is our duty to assist in facilitating business we can justify to the fullest extent the building of this wharf.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the minister to say that the amount voted last year was so small that although tenders were invited none was accepted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it intended to advertise for tenders again or to act on any of the tenders received under the first call?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have not decided the matter. There would be some reason why we should accept the lowest tender now provided the engineer is of opinion that, considering what difference there may be in the cost of material and wages to-day as compared with the time when the tenders were invited, the lowest tender is fair and reasonable. We might accept that even at this late date because you will see there is some unfairness in rejecting tenders and then inviting them over again, providing the tenders are reasonable in each case. Therefore, all other things being equal, I would rather be disposed to favour the lowest tender now that we have decided to go on with the work.

Mr. SPROULE. If that is done is it intended to add to the amount of the tender the additional cost of labour and material compared with what it was when the tender was submitted?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, if we accept the tender at all we will accept it as it is put in.

Mr. SPROULE. How many tenders did you receive for this work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Six or seven.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose it is too early to give the committee what the tenders are?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There would be no objection if I had them here, but my impression is that the lowest tender is somewhere in the vicinity of $140,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. What was the engineer's estimate of the work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Between $7,000 and $10,000 higher than the lowest tender.

Mr. EMMERSON. Is it fair to give that information?

Mr. SPROULE. He has not given us what the tenders are.

Mr. EMMERSON. No, but the deposits have been returned and the lowest tender need not take it. It does not seem to me to be right that such information should go broadcast, if the department have any idea of dealing with the tenders that have been received by them for the simple reason that this knowledge is given to everybody and to the lowest tenderer that the department deem his figures too low.

Mr. SPROULE. Have the deposits been returned?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Because if the deposits have been returned there is no obligation resting upon any of the tenderers to enter into a contract. It is entirely the option of the tenderer to take it or not.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was stated some time ago.

Mr. MACDONELL. Would the minister please state what work will be covered by the vote for Toronto harbour?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The principal work at Toronto is the building of the entrance to the western harbour which is a very important work. A contract was let for I think $490,000 odd and this vote is to pay the contractor. There is some additional work which we are doing on the pier near the eastern entrance and this vote will also provide for that. I believe the new western entrance is going to be of very great value to the harbour, and while it was costly, it will probably be worth more than its cost to the traffic coming to Toronto.

Mr. MACDONELL. I agree with the minister as to the importance of the work and the necessity for it, and the wisdom of putting this appropriation in the estimates. The work at the western entrance is now being carried out on the basis of an 18 foot channel, and I believe it is the expectation that the inland waterways of the great lakes are to be standardized to a depth of 22 feet, as far as possible. The main harbours on the great lakes are I understand being deepened to 22 feet, and I would now suggest to the minister that the channel at Toronto be dredged to 22 feet instead of 18 feet as at present contemplated. I am informed that if the present contract is completed on the basis of an 18 foot channel it will in all probability have to be deepened in the near future, and that the increased cost of adding this depth after the present work is completed would be far greater than if the channel were deepened to 22 feet now. Would the minister state what is the intention of the department in this regard, and whether the opinion of the resident engineer has been obtained, which I think is a matter of considerable importance, he being on the ground and knowing all the circumstances?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It strikes me that it would be of no advantage to dredge to a greater depth than we are now dredging until the Welland canal be deepened, and even if that work were undertaken at an early date it would be some time before it could be completed. It seems to me there would be no greater difficulty in dredging the channel to the western entrance to a depth of 22 feet later on, than if we did it at present. I think the revetment walls at each side of the channel are sunk to a depth of 22 feet, but of that I am not absolutely sure, and at any future time the channel can be excavated to a greater depth between these walls just as well as it can be at the present time. I thank my hon. friend for the suggestion and I will have it looked into. I quite realize that in the future we must look to greater depth in our harbours. I am providing to-day for a 25 foot channel in Fort William and Port Arthur, and I am looking forward to having a depth of 25 feet in the harbours on the eastern shores of the Georgian bay, particularly at Tiffin and Victoria which are national harbours and which are so closely allied with Fort William and Port Arthur. If we are going to hold our trade we must make our harbours deep enough to give accommodation to the largest lake vessels.

Mr. SPROULE. You would have to deepen the canal as well.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. MACDONELL. The eastern entrance of the harbour requires immediate attention from the government. The eastern piers are rapidly decaying, and unless they are at once put in proper condition it will cost a very large sum to replace them later on. Will any part of this vote be devoted to that purpose?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have done considerable work at the eastern entrance in the past season and the work has been very satisfactory. We intend to continue it during the coming season and we shall take what is required for the eastern channel out of this vote.

Mr. MACDONELL. Toronto island has been practically washed away on one or two occasions and the breakwater is in urgent need of repair. Very excellent work has been performed there which has had the effect of protecting the island from the full sweep of the sea, and if that work is continued the island can be preserved. If steps are not taken now, not only will the island be in danger, but the work already done will be rendered entirely useless.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have received a certificate and report from the city engineer of Toronto testifying to the very satisfactory way in which the work of finishing the breakwater has been done. As now completed it is proving very effective, and we believe, from the reports of our own engineer as well as those of the city engineer of Toronto, that it will give great satisfaction.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Is there any definite system of inspection or checking of the quantities of dredging done? I heard one of the engineers of the department admit on oath that in one case there were larger returns made by the inspector than the capacity of the scow, so that there must have been fraud or looseness or incompetence on the part of the inspector. Where millions of dollars are expended in these dredging contracts there should be competent and experienced inspectors, perhaps more than one on each boat continuously, to check the work properly.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that we have a very thorough, and as we believe, a very perfect system of inspection. We have recently made the rule more stringent than it was previously. We require the inspector to be constantly on the work, to personally inspect every scow load, to make his report and with it a solemn declaration that he has a personal knowledge of the quantity in every scow load. Having said that, let me appeal to my hon. friend not to believe one side of a story until he hears the other side, and not to be too ready to take insinuations which are made, but to look into the facts for himself. The hon. gentleman refers to some questions which were put by a certain member of this place. The gentleman who put these ques- House to the chief engineer in another tions assumed that the capacity of the scow was so many cubic yards.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The engineer said that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. I read the evidence, and he put the words into the engineer's mouth. As a matter of fact, upon that very work there were two additional scows which were hired by the contractors from the department, and which had a capacity of nearly 20 cubic yards greater than the quantity stated by the gentleman who examined the chief engineer. That fact explains the whole matter.

Mr. S. SHARPE. When was the new system of inspection inaugurated?

Mr. PUGSLEY. In 1908, about a year after I became minister.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the minister did not commence a moment too soon, because I have a very distinct recollection of a good many irregularities in connection with the dredging system. For instance, in one case an inspector was inspecting two dredges which were operating a quarter of a mile apart.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He was dismissed.

Mr. SPROULE. And he was at the time an employee of one of the dredging companies. It was admitted, I think, that it was utterly impossible for him to do his duty, but all the same payments were made on the returns he sent in.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When I became minister in August, 1907, I took occasion to look into the matter carefully and to consider with my deputy what we could do to surround the dredging operations with the greatest possible safeguards; and in the following season we did adopt what we think are proper safeguards. We send out instructions in writing to the inspectors that if they do not give personal attention to the work they will be at once dismissed without notice, and we require them with each return to make a solemn declaration that they have been personally on the work and have a personal knowledge of all the scow loads which were removed. In the case to which my hon. friend refers, the moment it came to the knowledge of the department that the inspector was attending to those two dredges we dismissed him.

Mr. S. SHARPE. What is the wage of the inspectors?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The wages vary, but the usual wage is $3 a day.

Mr. S. SHARPE. The inspectors are continuously on the dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BARNARD. What did the minister mean by saying that the member who questioned the chief engineer put the answer into his mouth? Did he suggest to the witness a certain capacity of the scow?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No; what I said was this: The member took the capacity of a certain scow and assumed that that was the capacity of all the scows, and asked the engineer how he accounted for it that 200 cubic yards were returned when the capacity of the scow was only 190 yards. The engineer said he could not account for it. As a matter of fact, at that time there where two other scows with a capacity of 210 cubic yards each.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would like to draw the minister's attention to an application which I have made on two or three occasions to have a small wharf constructed at a place called Beaumarais, on the Muskoka lakes. I do not find any item for it in the estimates. I hope the minister will take a note of it and make provision for it. Beaumarais is a very important point. The wharf is getting into a very dilapidated condition, and is very dangerous to the travelling public. If I told the minister the amount of tonnage that calls at that wharf he would be very much surprised.

Mr. PUGSLEY. May I ask the hon. gentleman if that is a private or a public wharf?

Mr. WRIGHT. It was built originally by a private individual; but he has offered to hand it over to the government free of charge if they will take it. They can get it by building a new wharf.

Manitoba—harbours, rivers and bridges—general repairs and improvements—$8,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is the usual general vote taken every year to cover repairs to wharfs for which there is no special vote. It was $6,000 last year; we are asking for $8,000 this year.

Mr. STAPLES. I have watched the estimates come down from year to year since 1904, and I have failed to find any appro priation for the completion of a wharf on Lake Manitoba, near St. Laurent. The government undertook to construct a wharf there in 1904, but they got it into their heads all at once that it was necessary to commence this piece of work without calling for tenders. They have expended almost $16,000; and so far as any value is concerned up to the present, that money might as well have been thrown into the fire. The work stands there a monument of the wonderful ability of this government to spend public money just before the elections. The people were promised that this would be carried to completion, but the day after the elections, the work ceased, the dredge was taken away and has not been sent back since; but I might tell the hon. minister that there was an election in 1908, which no doubt he remembers when the same parties, or some of them, went to these good people and said they regretted very much that this work had not been completed, but that it would certainly be gone on with provided the people voted for the government candidate. Well, the people did support the government candidate. In a particular poll where I got 28 of a majority in the election of 1904, my opponent got a majority of 65. Surely the people have done their duty. They took the government at their word on two occasions, and yet that piece of work stands there unfinished—not a dollar in the estimates or supplementaries to complete it, and it has so far cost the people uselessly $15,978. I would like to know if the minister still intends to leave that piece of work unfinished? I put a number of questions on the order paper this session regarding it which, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Railways and Canals answered. They will be found on page 1240 of 'Hansard.' The Minister of Railways told the House that this was a piece of work in first-class condition, that it offered facilities to meet the public requirements in that locality and so on. But the fact is, we cannot get to that wharf. His answers, however, would lead the House to believe that you could get there with almost an ocean going vessel. Why, we cannot get there with anything larger than a canoe.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The work to which my hon. friend refers was evidently laid out upon a pretty large scale. It was begun in 1902 or 1903, and at that time it was expected that there would be considerable railway development in that locality, and also that a large freezer would be established there, and it was proposed to build two piers on Lake Manitoba and dredge the channel between that and a lake nearby, and then have a wharf on the other side of the lake, which would be reached by a railway and where a freezer would be located. There were strongly signed petitions for this work, including one from the Board of Trade of Winnipeg The expenditure incurred has been made upon the piers in Lake Manitoba and also in dredging out the channel between the two lakes. By the plan it was intended to dredge across the lagoon and then build a wharf at the opposite side. Just at present, I am not impressed with the immediate necessity of doing that work, particularly in view of the fact that the large freezer contemplated has not been erected and that the expected railway development has not taken place. During the past year we have expended on those piers $513.13, and they are serving quite a useful purpose.

Mr. STAPLES. I do not know where the hon. minister has got his information as to the usefulness of that work. I have letters from various constituents living up there, and I have been there myself and have seen the work, and it is of no practical value. The minister says he is not particularly concerned about it and has no intention of continuing it. It would have been better if this government had taken their present view before spending $16,000 of the people's money for no practical use. But the work, if completed, would be of great practical value to the people of that district. So far as the freezer is concerned, would any sane person undertake to build a freezer, which might cost thousands of dollars, before he could get goods to utilize the freezer for any purpose? And so far as railway development is concerned, the Canadian Northern railway say they are quite ready to build a spur into this wharf as soon as it is built. The minister now says he does not propose appropriating any money to complete this work. What right then had these very keen politicians, before the election of 1908, to advise the people that if they would support the government candidate, this work would be completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend makes statements as to certain alleged facts, of which I was not aware. He says that the railway company has agreed to do its part of this development work by building a spur to the water. So far as my information goes, we have no record of any such offer.

Mr. STAPLES. I do not know that it would be necessary that the department should have any record of what the company intend doing. The people of the district have the promise of that company that when this work is completed, a spur will be built.

Mr. PUGSLEY. During the last year or two we have been obliged to go somewhat slowly in public works.

Mr. STAPLES. You should also go slowly in promises.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My information is that the work done is very useful in connection with the shipping on Lake Manitoba. I have felt that it is not unreasonable that before going to the large expenditure necessary to dredge the lagoon and build a wharf on the other side we should have an assurance from the railway company that they would do their part towards the development of the locality. If the railway company would submit a memorandum of their willingness to make the extension as soon as we built the wharf, the matter would have my most careful consideration.

Mr. STAPLES. On whose advice is the minister acting as to the usefulness of this work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The advice I have is the information I received from the resident engineer, Mr. Dufresne, as to existing conditions.

Mr. STAPLES. Have you any letters containing that information? The people up there would be glad to know just what it is.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend would convey to the people the answer at page 1240 of Hansard', he will see the statement made to the House and the representation of the resident engineer.

Mr. STAPLES. I have several letters from people in that district saying that the answer referred to is anything but accurate, and that if this wharf was completed there is no doubt the railway company would build the spur. I protest at the government expending $16,000 on a work that is of no practical use. It was spent when an election was pending to secure a few votes, the people supported the government candidate and it is up to the Minister of Public Works to carry out the promise that was then made by somebody.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Nobody had my authority to make any statement in regard to this work. I was not aware that any such statements were being made and certainly never authorized any such statement. It would not be unreasonable that my hon. friend should ask the people to communicate with the railway company and ask whether they will engage to build this spur.

Mr. STAPLES. I desire to see this work completed, and I would think the government, to avoid the criticism they subject themselves to by spending that money on a useless work, would be desirous of making it of some practical use.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is curious that I have had no communication from any people in the locality on the subject. It was represented that the Manitoba Fish Company and a Gypsum Company would make large shipments from here, but that has not been the case.

Mr. STAPLES. How could they when the work was not completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The piers could be used for a landing and if the people wished the improvements it would be easy for them to have the Canadian Northern write me that they were prepared to build the spur and for these other companies to write that they would do their share.

Mr. STAPLES. I would expect the minister not to wait to ask the Canadian Northern railway or any other company what they propose to do but would send some one up to ascertain whether or not the work was of any value and then come here and tell us straight.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My engineer has been up there and has reported.

Mr. STAPLES. If the work was not worth completing it was not worth starting, and the government should have had the necessary information before beginning it.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any connection between the building of the freezers and the fishing companies who received the very cheap licenses?

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Why did he spend $16,000 without an assurance from the company that they would build their share?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was all done before I became minister, therefore, I cannot tell what assurances there were. But I would suppose that at the inception of this work there were assurances. Probably the fishermen said: We are going right to work and build the freezers. I suppose the Canadian Northern railway said: We are going to work and build the spur; and the Gypsum Company said: We will ship all our gypsum in that way. Then my predecessor, did the government part of the work, that is the only part that has been done. This Freezing Company has not materialized, this Gypsum Company has not attempted to ship any of their products, and the Canadian Northern railway has not begun to build its spur. Although I have been minister for nearly three years, I have not received a single word from those people, I have not received a single assurance that if we did go on and finish up this additional work, any of these things will materialize.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Would not these assurances still be in the department?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know if they are in the department or not.

Mr. BRADBURY. I happen to know something about this district, although it is not in my constituency. I think if the minister understood the conditions there he would not hesitate for a moment in building that dock in such a way that it could be used. The dock is built in a position to-day that it is of very little use, no steamboat can get near it. I think it would not cost much to do sufficient dredging to let a steamboat in. I would like to say that the Gypsum Company has been in operation for years, they are shipping hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of gypsum down that lake, and they are compelled now, for the want of a wharf, to take it right down to the bottom of Lake Manitoba and up the Westbourne river, and it is very difficult to get up that river, and very expensive. I am satisfied if the minister understood the situation he would complete that dock.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is a curious thing that none of these interests have communicated with me on the subject at all.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. What would it cost to finish that in proper shape?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not that information, but I would be glad to get it.

Mr. STAPLES. Will the minister send his engineer up there and get estimates, provided he is not prepared to take the word of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) and myself with regard to the usefulness of it? Will the minister even go that far, and ascertain what is required to be done, and about what will be the cost?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall be glad to look into the matter further, and to get a report from the engineer, Mr. Dufresne, who I presume is familiar with all the facts.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Would you not have information as to the cost in the department?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We no doubt have the original scheme as outlined, but I would not have a report as to the present condition.

Mr. STAPLES. There is a matter I wish to bring up though it does not come under this item, but under the next one. There is another piece of work the government have been doing in the constituency of Portage La Prairie, adjacent to the constituency of Macdonald; that is on the Assiniboine river. Could the minister give me any information as to the condition of that work? It is with reference to straightening out the river in order to let the water run a little more freely, and prevent the flooding of some land.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like very much if my hon. friend would intimate to me beforehand what information he wants on any particular item. I have not got the papers here to-night, or any notes in connection with any work except those that are actually in these estimates. I could not give my hon. friend the information which he asks for. All I know is that the work was reported as being very useful, but just in what stage it is I am not prepared to say.

Mr. STAPLES. I think it is pretty well completed. I have a return here that I moved for last session, in reference to this piece of work. This piece of work, like other work in that district, has occasioned a great deal of dissatisfaction. There is quite a large return here, and it is really laughable to read some of the communications. I find that some keen politicians were mixed up in it in the election of 1908. They even went so far as to dip down into their own pockets and pay the necessary money in order to keep the work going without creating dissatisfaction until the election was over. That is the position of affairs. They went on and completed this work on a piece of land before they even had a title to it. Now the Minister of Public Works cannot get away from this particular piece of work, he was minister, I believe, at the time. I think it is nearly completed now. But there are some letters here that would really make a person laugh to read them, from men who were concerned, Mr. Macpherson, a lawyer from Portage la Prairie, and even the outside leader of the opposition in Manitoba, Mr. Edward Brown, who was very active in it, and guaranteed the payment to a certain Mr. Armstrong for certain lands. But before he got through with the government, they wrote even to the Minister of Public Works very strong letters, that would indicate they were not very well satisfied with the way in which the government had treated them. I do not know what understanding there may have been between the government and these particular persons. But Mr. Macpherson had to write a good many letters, and write some rather plain letters, before he got his money back that he had put in it, and also certain other bills paid. The minister apparently does not know in what condition the work is in, and I would suggest that he let this item stand until he arms himself with the necessary information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Much as I would like to oblige my hon friend, he must see how unreasonable it would be to let these items for the coming year all stand over until I can get some information of a work that was done upwards of a year ago, and with regard to which he can get the fullest information before the Public Accounts Committee

Mr. STAPLES. I moved for this return on the 22nd of April last year, and only got it a few days ago.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend does not understand. He seems to think it has been done. As far as I know, he regards that as being satisfactory. But what my hon. friend wants to do is to indulge his curiosity in regard to what he says took place between some of the people engaged on the work. I must urge that this item of harbours, rivers and bridges should not be allowed to stand over. We will come later on to a dredging vote. Probably next week there will be some further items in public works, and I shall be glad to get the information for my hon. friend, but I trust he will not urge that these important items should stand over. We want to get along as rapidly as we can. I hope to get as far as the British Columbia items to-night, and I hope my hon. friend will not endeavour to delay these items.

Mr. STAPLES. I do not wish to retard the progress of this House a moment. I have sat in this committee night after night when the minister had his estimates before the committee, waiting for an opportunity to bring up one or two little things regarding Manitoba, and I do not think he can accuse me of entering into any discussion for the purpose of delaying the House. But I do not propose to allow the minister to sit down and say that I have brought these items up simply as a matter of curiosity. I think this committee is entitled to know the way in which this government have undertaken to do certain public works, and that they have undertaken to do this piece of work on land for which they had not the title. I do not think that is conducting public business on a very good principle. This work was done on property before they had the title. The minister cannot get away from that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The title is in the Crown.

Mr. STAPLES. It is now; it was not when this work was going on.

Mr. BRADBURY. Do I understand the minister to say that we can discuss any question relating to Manitoba?

Mr. PUGSLEY. At any time.

Mr. A. HAGGART. Can we get anything more definite than this statement of 'harbours, rivers and bridges'?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perhaps I can answer my hon. friend's question best by showing him what was expended last year. Last year, we only spent $2,654, but the resident engineer thinks that, taking all the different works together, we ought to take a vote of $8,000. We may not spend the whole of it; we may not spend more than two-thirds of it.

Mr. BRADBURY. Just for repairs?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Just for general repairs and work which may spring up during the fiscal year for which we have no other provision.

Lake Winnipeg—wharfs, $10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is an amount which we are taking to provide for what we think possibly may be some wharf accommodation required on Lake Winnipeg in view of the improvements which have just been completed at St. Andrew's rapids, and which will enable steamers to leave the city of Winnipeg, pass down te Red River and to the foot of Lake Winnipeg. We believe that there will be considerable traffic developed, and we think that necessarily it will have to be provided for by the building of one or two wharfs which would probably serve as breakwaters as well. There should be at the northern part of the lake a breakwater, and we may utilize that as a wharf as well.

Mr. BRADBURY. Has the minister any idea where any of these wharfs should be built?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have not decided at what places, because it is a new business that is going to be opened up.

Mr. BRADBURY. I understand. I would like to say that at Gimli there is already a government wharf with an L built across. We hope that the government will extend that L for the purpose of making a harbour there. It is now the terminus of the Canadian Pacific railway on Lake Winnipeg and it is a very important place. I do not know whether the government have a petition or not, but I think that a petition from Gimli was prepared asking for the extension of this wharf, 120 or 150 feet.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They are asking for 100 feet.

Mr. BRADBURY. That is a very important matter, and I would like to impress upon the minister the necessity of doing the work. All the boats that ply from Selkirk to the head of Lake Winnipeg pass this place. It is a very shallow lake, storms come up very rapidly, and the waves get very ugly there. There is no way of getting into Gimli when there is a heavy sea on at the present time, and if this 100 feet were built and a little dredging done it would make a first-class harbour for any boat on the lake, and it would be a great benefit to the people of Gimli, to the steamboat owners and to everybody who is doing business on that lake. I would, therefore, urge the minister to provide a sum to extend the wharf at this point this year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have been already urged to make an extension of the wharf at Gimli, and the matter is under consideration. It will be quite possible to use part of this vote for this purpose. We intend to have a pretty careful survey of the harbours of Lake Winnipeg made with the view of expending any money on wharfs at points where it would be of the greatest advantage, always keeping in mind the importance of having some harbours of refuge which are essential to the preservation of life and the safety of shipping. As my hon. friend knows, storms arise very quickly on that lake, and it is essential to the safety of shipping that there should be some harbours of refuge at different points on the lake.

Mr. A. HAGGART. The building of these wharfs on Lake Winnipeg, the deepening of the river at the mouth and the construction of the St. Andrew's rapids all point to the fact that the destination of the trade which is expected to be developed will be the city of Winnipeg. If it is to be the destination of that trade we certain want wharfs. In the olden times when the river was navigated by the old Red River steamers with flat bottoms and stern wheels, any part of the bank was a wharf. They simply ran the prow of the boat upon the prairie and loaded or unloaded. But, if Lake Winnipeg is to be navigated, it will be by lake steamers which will come up through the lake and the Red river, and we will want a wharf at Winnipeg; otherwise there will be great inconvenience to transportation. There is expected to be a large trade in stone, timber and cordwood, and unless there are facilities for unloading there will be great inconvenience. Just in connection with this I would like to mention that now would be the time to procure a site, and now would be the time to lay out a plan for the wharf, because property along that river is being very rapidly acquired, a great deal of it by the railway companies. The minister ought not to lose sight of that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that the matter will have my careful consideration. I recognize that either the government or the city of Winnipeg must afford wharf accommodation. I do not think the government has been forgetful of its duties so far in assisting transportation. Just what we can do in the city of Winnipeg in the way of providing wharf accommodation is a matter for careful consideration, and certainly it will have my most careful consideration.

Mr. BRADBURY. With reference to the bridge over the St. Andrews dam——

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are going to build that bridge.

Mr. BRADBURY. That is just what I want to know.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BRADBURY. Then I will not discuss it. I am very glad that the minister has seen the necessity of doing that work.

Mr. STAPLES. Does the minister mean that he is going to build the approaches?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The approaches to the bridge.

Mr. STAPLES. The intention is to build the approaches?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The intention is to complete this work by building the approaches. The bridge is designed as a service bridge in connection with the dam, and also for a highway bridge. I just want to say, I have to say it now in the absence of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), that I was greatly surprised at the statement he made here as to the uselessness of that work at St. Andrews rapids, and I was more surprised that hon. gentlemen from Manitoba who are familiar with the facts, and know the vast public importance of this work should allow these remarks to pass unnoticed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) stated it was a waste of public money, that he had been down to see it, that it was a splendid piece of work which was entirely unnecessary, and would not serve any good purpose. That is the effect of what the hon. member for North Toronto said.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the minister is doing the hon. member (Mr. Foster) an injustice. I understood him to say that owing to the elevation of that work, although it is a good piece of work, it would be of no value unless approaches were built.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, the hon. member (Mr. Foster) was speaking of the whole work as being away beyond the necessity of the times, and as being an extravagance and a waste of public money. I desire to say that in my judgment there is no more useful work in Canada than that lock and dam in St. Andrews rapids. There is no work that is more likely to lead in the near future to a large traffic. We have designed the bridge as a highway bridge, and a service bridge. The extra expenditure to make it a highway bridge is not very great, and we purpose proceeding during the coming season with the building of the approaches. I visited this work, and I met there the representatives of the municipalities, and I told them I would take their request into my careful consideration. I have much pleasure in announcing for the information of our friends from that portion of Manitoba which is more particularly interested in this work, that during the coming season we will build the approaches to the bridge so that the people on both sides may have the accommodation.

Mr. BRADBURY. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) does not need any one to defend him in this House, but he is not here to defend himself, and while I think the minister does not want to be unfair to the hon. member (Mr. Foster), yet the minister made a mistake when he said that the hon. member for North Toronto had declared the work to be useless.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He made a big mistake.

Mr. BRADBURY. I was present with the hon. member (Mr. Foster) when he investigated this work, and what he did say was that he considered the expenditure altogether too large for the requirements of the place. As the representative of that constituency I am not prepared to say that the hon. member (Mr. Foster) was not right. The government has spent a large sum of money there, and they have certainly done an excellent piece of work, and I must give the department credit for having erected one of the best steel structures of that kind on this continent.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BRADBURY. Whether that large expenditure is warranted at the present time I am not prepared to say, but at all events, what the hon. member for North Toronto argued was that the putting of the passenger bridge on top of the work required for the steel girders to allow the ice to pass had occasioned an increased expenditure of something like $200,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The increase would not be $20,000.

Mr. BRADBURY. I have to take the word of the minister, but against it I have the word of the engineer in charge of the bridge at the time whom I asked what the extra cost of providing for the passenger bridge was——

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend will pardon me. The hon. member for North Toronto was simply speaking of the bridge that was there; he was not speaking of the approaches, and he said we had spent $200,000 beyond what it would have been necessary to spend if we had not provided that portion of it for a highway bridge, and he said that money was wasted. As to that he is all wrong; my engineer informs me that $20,000 will be the extra cost.

Mr. BRADBURY. Had the minister maintained his position of last session that he would not build the approaches——

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not say I would not.

Mr. BRADBURY. It was pretty near that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. BRADBURY. If the minister had not built the approaches then the member for North Toronto would be right.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have been up there since, you know, and I have seen the place.

Mr. BRADBURY. When the member for North Toronto criticised that work he stated that it was an excellent piece of work, but at the same time he did not feel that the large expenditure was justified at the present time. The hon. member (Mr. Foster) pointed out with reference to the lock, and I think he was right in that, that if the traffic from Lake Winnipeg and the north is going to be anything as great as that heavy expenditure would indicate, then the lock is surely too small, because at the present time it will not take an ordinary lake barge and a tug at the same time. It is only possible to take one barge through the lock by the old style of towing. Probably that is one of the things the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Foster) was drawn to when he was on the ground, and he realized that a larger lock should be provided in view of the great expenditure. I think the minister told me last year that the work would cost $1,500,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not so much, about $1,250,000.

Mr. BRADBURY. I will not criticise this work further. I congratulate the minister that at last he has seen eye to eye with myself as to the absolute necessity of completing that work. It would have been folly to allow that work to stand in the position it was in last year because it was useless for a passenger bridge as no one could get near it. I am glad the minister has made up his mind to complete it.

Red River projection—new entrance to channel at its mouth, $10,000.

Mr. BRADBURY. What does the minister intend to do at the mouth of the river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are to build protecting jetties to prevent the filling of the new channel at the mouth of the river. These jetties are to be respectively 400 feet and 300 feet long, pile work. A new channel 4,000 feet long and about a hundred feet wide, 4 feet 5 inches deep at low water and 9 feet 5 inches deep at high water, has been dredged at the bar, and we propose, by means of these protection jetties, to keep the current in that channel.

Mr. BRADBURY. That is a work which is very much needed, and I am glad the department is taking that way of making the channel. Thousands of dollars have been wasted at the mouth of the river, and the method which the government is adopting will I hope make a permanent channel.

Winnipeg Beach harbour—protection pier on Lake Winnipeg, $10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is a very necessary work, and we propose going on with it this year.

Mr. BRADBURY. I may say that this is a very necessary work. I urged this on the hon. minister last year as strongly as I could. He stated that the finances of the country did not then warrant him in going on with the work, but I am glad that he has provided for it this year. I have in my hand a petition from the residents of Winnipeg Beach, addressed to the minister, and signed by the mayor of the village, W. J. Woods, by counsellors A. C. Dukes, J. Stacey, Wm. J. Howes, and by the secretary, J. D. Forster, praying that this work be commenced immediately and be completed as soon as possible. They point out the absolute necessity of commencing the work before the ice goes away, if the minister has any intention of building it this spring, as I hope he has, because a great deal of the piling can be done on the ice, which could not be done afterwards, except at much greater expense.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that I have seen the locality and recognize the very great importance of this work, in the way of providing a suitable breakwater and harbour of refuge at this point on Lake Winnipeg. We are endeavouring to expedite the work as much as possible. We are taking all the preliminary steps in the hope that by next week we shall probably be able to call for tenders, so that the moment the Appropriation Act passes a contract can be entered into. In the meantime it will be intimated to the parties who are the lowest tenderers, so that they can get the timber out before the ice leaves. Now, let me call the attention of the committee to the remarks of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) on the subject of the dam and lock at St. Andrews. It was a matter of surprise to me that my hon. friends from Manitoba should have let those remarks pass without correcting the hon. gentleman. I think common fair play to the Department of Public Works and to the government should have induced the hon. gentlemen who are so zealous for this work and know its importance to correct the hon. member for North Toronto. This is what the hon. gentleman is reported to have said, at page 1498 of 'Hansard.'

Mr. A. HAGGART. What was being debated at that time?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was the Budget. Referring to St. Andrews lock, the hon. member for North Toronto said:

Mr. BRADBURY

Whilst in the west, I took an automobile trip down the Red river to see a very notable, noted, or notorious work, called the St. Andrew's lock. There you have a very fine work. The total cost of it, I believe, is to be over $600,000.

Mr. BRADBURY. A million and a half.

Mr. FOSTER. Six hundred thousand dollars has been spent now.

Mr. BRADBURY. Over a million.

Mr. FOSTER. It is worse than I thought it was. Supposing we put it at a million or a million and a quarter. Has the Prime Minister ever seen it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have not had that privilege.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the Prime Minister ever inquired into it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very weak reply. The Prime Minister is head trustee for the people of Canada. Will he now justify his conduct as head trustee for the people of Canada in sinking a million and a quarter of money in the St. Andrew's locks? Of that amount, $200,000 is for a highway bridge, for which no vote was ever taken, and that bridge lies there in its naked steel splendour, thirty-five or forty feet up in air from the road on either side.

Let me pause to remark that that bridge is essentially and primarily a service bridge for the purpose of operating these curtains in connection with the dam, and the amount spent to date on making that service bridge a highway bridge, which was also to be used as a highway bridge, was somewhere between $20,000 and $30,000 instead of $200,000 as stated by the hon. member for North Toronto. Then he proceeds:

I want to ask the Prime Minister, as head trustee for the people of Canada, to tell me to-night if he can get any three business men in the city of Winnipeg to put within his hand any justification, on the traffic that exists at present or on the business which may be expected in the near future, for the expenditure of a million and a quarter of money on that work? It is one of the finest pieces of concrete masonry and steel I ever saw; but where is the business to come from? It is an absolute waste of public money at the present time. Was that brilliant work, when the head trustee himself does not know a thing about it? Who does know? Somebody; and somebody ought to have told it.

If my hon. friend thought then, as he thinks to-night, that this was a most useful public work, and that it opened up possibilities for the development of traffic in stone, timber, cordwood and other resources, which will no doubt be developed in the future along the shores of that great lake, which is larger than Lake Ontario, surely it was his duty to have risen in the House and told the hon. member for North Toronto and the people of Canada that he was entirely mistaken in charging the government with building a public work for which there would be no business, and which, therefore, was an absolute waste of public money. I desire to say that I have carefully inquired into the matter, and I do believe that the construction of that lock and dam at St. Andrews rapids is going to be the means of opening up between points on Lake Winnipeg and the city of Winnipeg a traffic which will grow to very large dimensions; and a man does not need to have a very prophetic vision to be able to look forward to the not distant future when, by the construction of a few locks near the mouth of the Saskatchewan, we can have steamboat accommodation all the way from Winnipeg to within a comparatively short distance of the foothills of the Rocky mountains, about 100 miles west of Edmonton, and this dam at St. Andrews rapids is the first link in this great chain of inland transportation.

Mr. BRADBURY. I am not going to dispute what the hon. gentleman says as regards the importance of this work. But I do not think it is altogether fair to the hon. member for North Toronto. He seeks to convey to this committee and to the country that the hon. member for North Toronto condemned the work in its entirety. This would not be fair or correct.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If language means anything, he did.

Mr. BRADBURY. I differ with the hon. gentleman. What the hon. member for North Toronto said was that a million and a quarter was a larger amount of money than was justified under the circumstances. This work has a history which the hon. minister does not perhaps know; but we who have lived in that country some twenty-five years know that government after government has been approached to build this great work. I remember that when the Hon. McKenzie Bowell, who was then premier of this Dominion, was in Winnipeg, he met the board of trade of that city at the city hall, and after listening to their representations, he told them that if they could show him anything to justify the expenditure, he would make it. At that time the engineers of the government estimated the cost at half a million dollars, but it has cost instead $1,500,000 or very close to that amount. I am not prepared to admit that such a large expenditure was absolutely necessary to create the dam and the dock at St. Andrews rapids but the work erected there is a magnificent piece of work and a credit to the government that did it. I believe, however, that we could have built a piece of work there, which would have answered the purpose just as well for perhaps one half the expenditure the government have made. That, I think, was the position which the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) took.

Mr. PUGSLEY. You could hardly get that system of curtains for the amount you mention.

Mr. BRADBURY. The minister will admit that this is the only system of curtains on this continent.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Quite so, and this is the only work of that character on this continent.

Mr. BRADBURY. I do not think so. You will find other rivers that have a dam and a lock built along these lines.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Running from south to north?

Mr. BRADBURY. I do not know.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is just where the difference is.

Mr. BRADBURY. I am quite satisfied that a work could have been built there which would have suited the purpose just as well for much less money. Fifteen years ago we had as resident engineer in Winnipeg, one of the brightest engineers the department has ever had, and he never proposed any such work as this. There can be no question that we could have built a work which would have answered the purpose just as well, without these steel curtains. At the same time, now that the work is completed, I am not going to criticise it; but when the hon. member for North Toronto spoke, what he deprecated was the very large expenditure in excess of what he thought was justified under the circumstances. He was not condemning the work itself or a proper expenditure. Had he done so, I would have expressed my dissent.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. minister to say that work was contracted for, involving an expenditure of about $200,000, before there was any item in the estimates.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. That is what the hon. member for North Toronto said. He said that $200,000 had been expended without any vote, but that statement lacked the essential element of truth.

Mr. A. HAGGART. I think we might now leave this. This bridge has been built, the money has been spent, the work is there, we have had the opinion of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and we now have the opinion of the minister, and I certainly sympathize with the minister and hope that every prophecy he has made will be realized. In connection with the other item, the building of this pier at Winnipeg beach, that is a work in which the people of Winnipeg are deeply interested. That beach has been much improved by the Canadian Pacific railway. It is within about 40 miles of the city, and is one of the outing places for its population of 170,000. By furnishing fast trains and giving good accommodation, the Canadian Pacific railway has given the people of Winnipeg the opportunity of enjoying an outing at that beach for the day or the week's end. A large amount of pleasure craft have their headquarters there, but these boats run the risk of being destroyed by every storm that blows. During Christmas time I was approached by many people who represented to me the crying need for the construction of a pier at that beach, and they want it begun now so that they may enjoy the benefit of it this summer. Now that the river has been dredged, there is water communication between Winnipeg and that beach, but no valuable boat can be left there over night for lack of this protection. Hundreds of people have cottages and live there during the summer months, as it is convenient for business men who can leave there in the morning and be in town in time for their work. It is really the only summer resort near Winnipeg where people can have their summer homes, and at the same time attend daily to their business. All classes of citizens have been urging me to use my best endeavours to have the minister go on with that work with all the expedition possible, but I doubt very much if the sum of $10,000 will be adequate.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It will take something more than that, but we intend to proceed as rapidly as possible with it. It will take about $16,000 to finish it.

Mr. BRADBURY. I want to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that at Hecla island, or Big island, on Lake Winnipeg, there are about 50 or 60 settlers. It is an old settled district. All the steamers coming to or going from the north pass by this island, and a great many stop there to take on wood. A wharf of some kind should be built at that place, and I would urge the hon. minister to investigate it this summer, and have his engineers select a site for a wharf there. I notice in the estimates quite a number of wharfs provided in the eastern provinces, and I do not think I am asking too much when I urge on the minister to provide a wharf at this island. It would not cost more than $5,000 or $6,000 and will be a great accommodation to steamboats and people who have no way of getting from the island except by boat. There is a large quantity of wood there, which has now to be shipped under great difficulties, besides agricultural products.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My object in providing this vote was to do these very things. It is to provide that, after careful examination, we may give wharf accommodation where needed. The representation of my hon. friend regarding Hecla island will have my most serious consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL. With regard to the appropriations for 1910-11, I would like to ask the minister what has happened the yearly appropriation I have seen in the estimates during the last five or six years for the lowering of Lake Dauphin and taking care of the silt at the mouth of the Mossy river? Is there any special reason why these works have been eliminated?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This work, if it be useful work, of course the government will look into carefully. It can be done out of the general dredging vote with our own dredging plant, and we do not require a special appropriation for it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The dredging at the mouth of the Mossy river was done in a very inadequate way, those operating the dredge knew nothing about their business, they took up the mud from one side of the boat and dumped it on the other, and the northeast wind sent the sand back into the old channel. If the dredging is not done this summer, it would be impossible for boats to get into the mouth of the river.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am going to have it looked into. I have not been satisfied with the way that work has been proceeding, and I want to see if we cannot have it go along more satisfactorily.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Thank you.

Harbours and rivers, Saskatchewan and Alberta—Athabaska riier—removal of boulders and deepening channel through sand and gravel bars, $10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to do work urgently required to improve the navigation of the Athabaska river. There is a gerat deal of settlement going on north of Edmonton and we have as rapidly as possible to make provision for the people. The only way to get to remote districts is by the river. Some have motor boats, some small steamers, and some York boats and we are endeavouring to remove the boulders, etc., as fast as we can. The same remarks apply to the items for the Lesser Slave lake and the North Saskatchewan river.

Last Mountain lake—improvement of navigable route, $20,000.

Mr. LAKE. Would the minister give some information in regard to this work, the length of the navigable route, the amount of traffic, etc.?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is a great deal of settlement upon both sides of Last Mountain lake. A steamboat has been put in operation on the lake and is doing a very considerable business. This work is to make the outlet and the mouth of the lake navigable. We have been dredging at the entrance right into the lake so that a small steamer will be able to leave the railway at Craven and go up into the lake. The idea is that lumber and other supplies can be taken up to the settlers by water and grain can be brought down. Last Mountain lake is the one great sheet of water in the western country west of the Manitoba lakes. It is a beautiful sheet of water and there are a number of fine harbours on it. It is rapidly becoming a very favourite summer resort for the people of Regina. There is excellent fishing and, better than all, both sides of the lake for many miles back are settled by a very large number of industrious and thrifty settlers who have been very prosperous and who have improved the country in a few years.

Mr. LAKE. What is the actual distance of navigation being opened up, what has it cost and what is it likely to cost before it is completed?

Mr. PUGSLEY. From Craven to the head of the lake, I would think would be about 60 miles of navigable water. I shall be able to give my hon. friend the details of the expenditure at a later date. I have not a memorandum of them here. We built a small dredge and a tug and have been dredging there. There will also be land damages on account of flooding.

Mr. MAGRATH. What is the area of land damaged?

Mr. PUGSLEY. By building a dam at Craven in order to preserve the water in Last Mountain lake at normal level a considerable area of land below the foot of the lake and in the valley of the outlet was flooded, and we expropriated quite a quantity of land, I think about 1,800 acres, thinking it better to expropriate the land than to pay damages. The Exchequer Court allowed $25 an acre. I believe that by utilizing the dredge to make a dyke along the foot of the lake and at the outlet we will be able to shut out the water and the land in a few years will be worth as much as we paid for it.

North Saskatchewan river—wing dams for improvement of navigable channel from Edmonton to Lake Winnipeg, $25,000.

Mr. HERRON. What does this improvement consist of?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Building wing dams for the purpose of confining the channel at certain points within narrow limits, in order to increase the depth of water. There are a number of places where navigation can be greatly improved in this way. I believe we can get, at a moderate expenditure, very good navigation from the head of Cedar lake, at all events, right through to a point west of Edmonton, without building any locks. Down the river below Cedar lake some locks will be necessary to make navigation reasonably good.

Mr. HERRON. Will the minister say what is the nature of navigation on the Saskatchewan, and what trade is being done there?

Mr. PUGSLEY. At present there are quite a number of steamers operating at different points, but there is no through traffic from Edmonton to Winnipeg. There are steamers between different points. At Prince Albert there are a number of small vessels, and at Edmonton also. There is a good deal of settlement springing up along the banks of the Saskatchewan, and people living at Prince Albert and other points up and down the river, are of the opinion that it is desirable to preserve and improve gradually the navigation of the river. It is felt that it will be a most desirable means of bringing heavy freight from the prairie country, from the towns along the Saskatchewan, and from the farms in the vicinity, freight such as grain, coal and lumber down the Saskatchewan, to go either over the Hudson Bay railway to Hudson bay and thence to Europe, or to the city of Winnipeg. Coal would only be brought to Winnipeg, but lumber might be shipped over the Hudson Bay railway. If it were brought down by water, it could take the Hudson Bay railway at Le Pas and could thence be shipped to Europe. Of course it is impossible to tell the extent to which development will take place. But I do think that our western country is very fortunate in having such a vast system of inland navigation as we have on both branches of the Saskatchewan, and along the tributary streams such as the Carrot river. The main river has been more or less explored from time to time. During the past season, I directed an exploring party to go from the mouth of the river up as far as Le Pas where the Hudson Bay railway will start. A very valuable report has been made, and the engineers report that it will be practicable to give nine feet of navigation at low water to the head of Cedar lake, and in that way lake vessels navigating Lake Winnipeg could go up the Saskatchewan river to the head of Cedar lake, and from Cedar lake on to a point probably 100 miles west of Edmonton. Navigation would be suitable in the dry season only for light vessels drawing three or four feet of water; but that is the class of vessels which are largely used in navigating the waters of the western rivers in the United States, such as the Missouri, the Ohio, and ports of the Mississippi. My hon. friend probably knows about the South Saskatchewan. I know there are steamers, tug boats and other vessels plying upon that river. Of course the building of railways has done away to a large extent with the navigation that formerly was done on the Saskatchewan river. But as the country settles up, I think the time will soon come when people will look to water transportation as the chief means of getting heavy produce carried to market. Navigable rivers will prove valuable to regulate railway rates; and if there is one thing more than another I would like to say to the people of that western country, it is to preserve at all hazards the navigation of these rivers, not to allow any obstruction in them in the shape of building fixed bridges, or otherwise, but rather to induce the government to keep on improving and preserving navigation, because it will be found of incalculable value as the country develops in the future.

Mr. HERRON. I am aware that there has been some navigation on the Saskatchewan river for 30 years back. But the minister has not told us definitely to what extent navigation is carried on there at the present time. I would like to know, for instance, if there are any steamers running regular trips on schedule time from Edmonton east as far as Prince Albert, or for what distance, or are they only used as ferry boats? Is there any freight at the present time carried up and down the Saskatchewan river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I could not say that.

Mr. W. H. WHITE. I think I could give some information to my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Herron). There was considerable boat traffic on that river until the Canadian Northern was built two years ago. There is no boat running regularly between Prince Albert and Edmonton, but there is some boats running from Edmonton taking on freight to Battleford, and it is also used for the shipment of coal. The improvement of this river is much needed. Along the banks of the Saskatchewan river there are many outcroppings of coal, sometimes a hundred feet or 150 feet below the level, and it costs more to raise the coal up and draw it to the railway than it is worth. If the river was made navigable, it would afford a cheaper means of transporting coal than is now available, and would give an opportunity to ship coal to Battleford and Prince Albert. There is no railroad north of the Saskatchewan river, but there are large farming settlements, cattle and grain, and could be better shipped by boat than by rail. I think that if some of the boulders were removed from the river we would see regular boats running during the summer months between Edmonton and Prince Albert. They would carry a good deal of freight, and I think all the coal on the Saskatchewan might be carried that way.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. MAGRATH. I hope the minister will have his department prepare some comprehensive plan for the development of the water routes in that country. He has spoken about the North Saskatchewan. It is desirable, in making expenditures of this kind, that they shall all form a link in the final result that he expects to reach. Water transportation in America has not been satisfactory. The hon. gentleman was speaking, a few moments ago, about the Missouri. I remember when the upper reaches of the Missouri were crowded with steamers, and there are none there to-day. The railroads appear to have been shoving these waterways out of business. I do not hold that that is desirable. I think that expenditures of this character should be in line with a common policy and that a proper engineering force should be put to work along our western streams and a thorough investigation made so that every dollar we spend will be leading towards the perfected plan of final developments.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That comes under the next item for surveys of rapids, &c., on the North and South Saskatchewan river, and other navigable streams.

Northwest Territories—harbours, river and bridge work—general repairs and improvements, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is for work in the Northwest territories outside of the provinces.

British Columbia — Athalmer — Columbia river—wharf, $1,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to provide for the construction of a small wharf at Athalmer, asked for by a petition of the residents. This will complete the work.

Bamfield—west shore of Vancouver Island, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is for the renewal and enlargement of the existing wharf at Bamfield. It is asked for by the superintendent of the cable station and others.

Campbell river—improvements and wharf, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is requested by the resident engineer, and it is for repairs to Campbell river wharf.

Mr. BARNARD. What is the work that is going to be done?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The wharf is to be renewed. It has been very severely damaged by the teredo. It is useless to renew it without protecting the piles. The engineer recommends that a Gold teredo proof pile should be used in the renewals as it will last ten or fifteen years and will cost $5,000.

Mr. BARNARD. I notice that some of the wharfs being built in the province of Quebec, that we were discussing this afternoon, were apparently being built of concrete, and that the cost was more or less estimated by the cubic contents, showing that work of a practically permanent nature was being constructed. I think it is almost conceded that no piles in the waters of the Pacific coast will stand the attacks of the teredo for many more than a few years. Has the minister ever considered the idea of making these wharfs of a permanent nature by putting in concrete or something that will do away with the necessity of this constant renewal?

Mr. PUGSLEY. To build piers of concrete in British Columbia at the present time would be pretty expensive. I do not know that there are any cement works out there.

Mr. BARNARD. I can give the minister some information as to that. There is no trouble about getting cement. You can get a very good quality of cement on Vancouver island.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is it manufactured there?

Mr. BARNARD. Yes, at one of the best plants in the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is certainly worthy of considering as to whether or not it would be better, as far as possible to build of concrete in places where the teredo is very destructive.

Mr. BARNARD. That is everywhere.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It seems that it is almost everywhere on the coast except in the Fraser river where you have fresh water. The chief engineer of the department informs me that there is a timber called turpentine timber which is got in Australia—The Canadian Pacific railway are beginning to use it—which is said to resist the ravages of the teredo, and it may be that we will find it of advantage to use it and that it will be cheaper than concrete. It is supposed that it will last, as against the teredo, for forty or fifty years.

Columbia river—improvements, $14,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is for general improvement upon the Columbia river.

Mr. BARNARD. Where?

Mr. PUGSLEY. At Revelstoke, above Golden and at the Arrow lake wharf. These are three which we are urgently asked to attend to.

Mr. BARNARD. Are any of the works which are to be constructed at Revelstoke in the nature of protecting the bank against erosion?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. BARNARD. I understand that representations have been made along this line by the provincial government on account of this being a navigable stream. I would like to know if the minister has taken into consideration the desirability of doing that work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Part of this money will be used for protecting the works there that we have already contributed to, but we have not in contemplation the undertaking of any new work of this nature upon the Columbia river at the present time. I have been communicated with by the British Columbia government asking me to pay half of a certain work that they are carrying on. I have not felt it advisable to accede to their request.

Mr. BARNARD. We have to-day voted numerous items for the protection of the banks of the St. Lawrence and other rivers in the east. I would like to know if there is any reason why this government should not undertake the protection of the banks of navigable rivers in the province of British Columbia in the same way as they do in the east?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are finishing up some works of this character in the east, which were undertaken some time ago, the same as we have done work in British Columbia and in other provinces, but, for reasons which I stated upon another occasion, I do not feel that we could, as a general rule, engage in work of this character. I do not feel that we could recognize that this is an obligation which rests upon the federal government. There may be circumstances under which we will continue to do it. There may be cases in which the work is of such great magnitude that it would not be reasonable to ask the province to do it entirely. In those cases we may perhaps fairly assume a part of the burden, but to say that we are bound, as a matter of duty and obligation simply because a river is navigable, as a federal government, to do the work of protecting the banks is to put forth a proposition which I deny in toto. I say that there is no obligation of that character resting upon the federal government. It will not do for the provincial authorities or the municipal authorities to attempt to throw that work on to the federal government, and to say this is work which it is your duty to attend to, simply because a river or a lake that is washing away the shores is navigable water. There are cases where we have done it. We have assisted the local government in British Columbia, but it does not follow that because we have given them some assistance we are going to assist them in every work of this character that they undertake. If we did that we would be called upon to do work of this character on the McLeod river, the Saskatchewan, the St. Lawrence, the Lievre and hundreds of other lakes and rivers of Canada. There is another reason. We are already doing work on the Columbia river for which we are asking an appropriation of $14,500, and we are dealing as liberally as the funds at our disposal will enable us to do to improve the navigation of these rivers. We are going to clear out the debris in the steamboat channels for the purpose of assisting navigation. We are doing a great deal of work in various sections of British Columbia along these lines. I cannot undertake that as a matter of federal obligation we would protect the banks of all rivers simply because they happen to be navigable.

Mr. BARNARD. The minister has got heated over this matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not at all.

Mr. BARNARD. I simply asked the minister whether he was going to do this work, and if not, whether he thought there was any distinction between the treatment accorded to British Columbia and the treatment accorded to the province of Quebec. I merely mentioned the province of Quebec in the comparison for the reason that we have had, to-day, several appropriations for work of a similar character in that province. I would like to know from the minister if we are to take it that it is not the policy of the government to do this kind of work in any of the provinces in the future unless special circumstances arise.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is one thing the hon. gentleman seems to desire to forget, and that is that if he looks to the protection work that has been done in the different provinces in recent years, I venture to say that as much or more has been done in British Columbia as in any other province of Canada. But the hon. gentleman does not recognize that, and he seems to be wanting all the time to put forward the allegation that we are discriminating against British Columbia.

Mr. BARNARD. So you are.

Mr. PUGSLEY. As a matter of fact, we have done more of this kind of work in British Columbia than in any other province in Canada.

Mr. BARNARD. I would like to ask the supporters of the government from British Columbia if they consider that the province of British Columbia has been as fairly treated as have the other provinces.

Mr. FIELDING. That is another question.

Mr. BARNARD. That is a question which neither the hon. member for Nanaimo nor the Minister of Inland Revenue will venture to answer to-night.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Mr. FIELDING. That is not the question before the committee.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is a great pity to raise these sectional questions.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. The question before the committee is not a sectional question; it is a question of honour between the Dominion of Canada and the province of British Columbia, which makes it far more than a sectional question. We have a solemn agreement with the Dominion of Canada and that agreement has been violated in several respects. We have a solemn agreement providing that the federal government shall carry on in British Columbia all classes of works which it carries on in the other provinces of Canada. That is the principle for which the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barnard) has been contending to-night. It is not a matter of expediency, it is not a matter of policy on the part of the government, it is a matter of whether or not they intend to break faith with British Columbia. The minister and his colleagues recognize that it is a very difficult thing indeed for a province to compel the federal administration to keep faith in a matter of this kind, but there is such a thing as honour left in this country, and we have put it forward as a matter of honour time after time, that they have made a contract with us to do these works, and that they are doing them for other provinces as I showed this afternoon in regard to the province of Quebec when I read item after item—and I mentioned Quebec merely because the items for that province were before the House when the matter came up—item after item appearing in the estimates for all sorts of protection works in that province. I invited the intention of the Minister of Public Works to that fact in view of this discussion this afternoon. Now I would like to ask the minister whether he repudiates this contract with British Columbia or whether he thinks this government should carry it out in the spirit in which it was made?

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. gentleman asks me the question I would say that so far as this government is aware it is carrying out in the most absolute, good faith every obligation to British Columbia. It does not follow that because we build a wharf in one province we have got to build a wharf in British Columbia whether it is required or not.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. That is not the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are carrying on all classes of work in British Columbia just the same as in the other sections of Canada. The Dominion is giving subsidies for railways in British Columbia just as in other sections of the country; it is building wharfs in British Columbia, and it is doing dredging work in British Columbia just the same as in any other section of Canada.

Mr. BARNARD. Not the same.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. The point before the committee is: Will the government continue to erect protectioin works in British Columbia or will it follow out the policy of refusing to do so, which has been indicated by the Minister of Public Works?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Our policy in regard to protection works will be the same in British Columbia as in every other province of Canada.

Mr. BARNARD. The Minister of Public Works told us he was doing dredging work in British Columbia the same as in other provinces. I have not been in this House very long, but I have had two opportunities of showing the minister that the tonnage of the ports of British Columbia exceeds the tonnage of these pet ports of his in the maritime provinces very largely indeed. And I have also told him that the province of British Columbia in connection with these harbour works and harbour and dredging appropriations gets about 20 per cent in proportion of the appropriations that the other provinces get. I have pointed out that the province of British Columbia is to-day crying out for these public works and it is crying to deaf ears.

Mr. COWAN. The Minister of Public Works is seeking shelter in his own ignorance when he says he 'is not aware,' and perhaps it is my duty to put him wise to the facts. The fact is that this government is taking three times as much per head of the population from the people of British Columbia as it is taking out of the people of the other parts of the Dominion, and this government is spending in public works in British Columbia about one-fifth as much per head of the population as it is spending in the other parts of Canada. In other words, this government is discriminating against British Columbia about eight times. Where there should be an exact equality, where on every principle of honour there should be an exact equality, there is a difference of about eight to one against British Columbia. Now, the minister has sheltered himself twice under the statement that he is unaware of the facts, and I venture to say on the floor of this House that I am stating the facts when I give these figures.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. And I venture to state that my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) is not stating the facts with regard to the proportion of expenditure in British Columbia as compared with the other provinces in the Dominion. My hon. friend, I believe, claims to be the father of the famous better terms proposition of the British Columbia government, and the fallacy of the figures presented in the tabulated statement he has caused to be prepared was absolutely proven by the return brought down to this House a few years ago.

Mr. COWAN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could show where that fallacy is?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. It is shown in the return brought down to which I have referred. The hon. member is making general statements to the House and is not producing any proof whatever to substantiate what he says. He simply says that the appropriations for expenditure in British Columbia are as one to eight in the rest of the Dominion, and he claims that the contribution to the revenue by the province of British Columbia is much larger than the contribution of other provinces Well, that is a very large question, and the hon. gentleman can argue almost anything he likes from that statement, because it is hard to prove a statement of that kind. I do not think it is so myself, and I say so frankly and fearlessly after a very long investigation into the question. I do think that the province of British Columbia is a very large contributor to the revenues of the Dominion, but that is aside from the issue altogether. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said that public works are not being carried on in the province of British Columbia by this government, but I would like to know what demands made upon this government for public works have been refused. What demands have this year been made on the government for necessary public works in that province which have been refused? To my knowledge, I know of none.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I can tell you.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I might point out to the hon. member (Mr. Cowan) that the very large and necessary public work of deepening the Narrows is provided for to just as large an extent as it could be provided for. As much money is being provided for the coming year as can be well spent during the year. And so throughout the entire province, I know of no large public work which has been asked for that is not being done. The Fraser river, which is receiving a good deal of attention from my hon. friend from Westminster, is also being provided for, and the improvement of the channel up to Westminster is being carried out as rapidly as circumstances will permit.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. The minister says that he knows of no public work that has been requested that has not been provided. Without going into many others, that I could mention, I would like to ask him with respect to two, which I myself heard him promise at a public meeting at Chilliwack during the last campaign, namely, a new post office for Chilliwack, another public building for Chilliwack, and dredging for Chilliwack, a dredge being then supposed to be actually on its way up the river. I am bound under the rules of the House to take the hon. minister's denial if he says that he did not promise these, although I heard him promise them myself. I ask him whether he has ever asked for these or whether they have been granted.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This is extraordinary, Mr. Chairman. In the first place, I think I am as non-committal in making promises of public works in a constituency or as to the performance of anything in the future over which I have not absolute control, as any other member of the government, and I deny absolutely that I made any such promises at a public meeting at Chilliwack. But it is a fact that a site for a post office was being considered at that time, if it had not been secured, and if there was not in the estimates a sum of money for a post office at Chilliwack, it was certainly intended that there should be, and if I am not mistaken, it is in the estimates to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is there.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Votes for public buildings at Chilliwack, Vernon and two or three other places in British Columbia were cut out of the estimates last year in consequence of the general reduction of the votes for public works. But I believe that these are in the estimates of this year. I may have said that I was personally desirous of seeing a public building, and would use my best efforts to have it built. If I made a casual promise of that kind, that promise is being fulfilled. As to the dredging in the Fraser river, that is a purely local question. I do remember something about the moving of a dredge from one point to another point to do a little local work. Whether that has been done or not I do not know. It certainly was intended to be done. But I know of no wharf, no dredging, no public building or other public work that should be carried out in the province of British Columbia that has not been carried out when proper representations have been made, and I challenge my hon. friends to say anything to the contrary. The province of British Columbia has not many towns or cities; but in almost every town of two or three thousand people and over we have now a nice public building, whereas when this government came into power there was only one public building if I am not mistaken, certainly not more than two, in the entire province.

Mr. COWAN. May I ask the minister a question? I presume that he knows that the tonnage of the port of Vancouver is second only to that of Montreal. Can he point to one dollar of Dominion money that has been spent in the improvement of that port?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The question is quite an unnecessary one. There is no better harbour in the Dominion than the harbour of Vancouver, and therefore it is unnecessary to spend much money to improve that harbour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have done dredging there. We have had the 'King Edward' at work there.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The great improvement which the port of Vancouver requires is to widen and deepen the narrows, and I believe it is the intention of the Minister of Public Works to buy a dredge for that work. In the last two or three years, one of the finest public buildings in Canada has been put up in Vancouver for a post office and custom house, and we have recently bought a tract of ground for an examining warehouse in connection with the custom house. We have provided all the accommodation in the way of public buildings that is necessary for the great city of Vancouver, and I am proud to say that it is a great city. It is all very well for my hon. friends to make statements in a general way, but they cannot substantiate them. I do not know what more we could get in the city of Vancouver. The deepening of the Fraser river from its mouth up to above Westminster is a very important work on which this government has already spent half a million dollars, and which it will take years to complete. In the city of Victoria we have been spending at least ten times as much money as did the former government, and in this year's estimates, there is twice the sum appropriated last year for the purpose of deepening some points in the harbour in order to accommodate the increase in shipping. It is all very well for my hon. friend to raise the miserable old issue, raised in the last general elections in British Columbia, of the alleged antagonism of this government to the best interests of British Columbia. That charge is a false one, and I challenge my hon. friend to make it good.

Mr. COWAN. I accept that challenge, and I say further: perish my right hand if I ever in this House utter one statement I am not absolutely sure is correct. If I am right in saying that there is discrimination against British Columbia, the government are absolutely unjust to that province. The minister says I am wrong, but I base my statement on figures, not prepared by myself, but by the Dominion's statistician, and they are absolutely correct.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I dispute that absolutely.

Mr. COWAN. Very well, then grant an inquiry. Will the minister agree to that? I would like an answer. If the Dominion statistician will certify to the correctness of my figures, will the minister grant an inquiry?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Which minister?

Mr. COWAN. Any minister—one or all. Will any minister say that if the Dominion statistician will certify to my figures, he will support my demand for an inquiry?

Mr. FIELDING. The proposition is too preposterous and ridiculous to entertain it for a moment. If British Columbia has any claim to any public works of the same class as is provided in any other part of Canada, that claim will receive consideration; but this pretense that one province pays more than another, is one of the ridiculous things we are apt to hear in this parliament. Why, my hon. friend from East Grey will remember when the province of Ontario was troubled with the conviction that it was the milch cow of the Dominion and had to pay for all the other provinces. We have heard Montreal plead the immense contribution it makes to the Dominion treasury because the imports for the west pass through it and the duties are there collected. But these duties are in reality paid by the people further west who consume the bulk of these imports. The same remark applies to Halifax and other ports of entry, so that no statement which could be prepared on the basis of the duties collected at the different ports could give a correct idea of the contribution to these duties by different sections of the country. The goods landed at one port may be consumed a thousand miles away, and it is the consumer a thousand miles distant who pays the tax, and not the importer at Halifax, St. John, Vancouver, Montreal or Quebec. No calculation that can be made on that subject can possibly be absolutely correct, but must be a matter of conjecture. It would be ridiculous to have an inquiry into a matter of that sort; but if British Columbia requires a public work of the same class as is provided by the Dominion in other provinces, and which is necessary and useful for the development of trade, then let that claim be brought forward, and if it be not considered then, and not until then, will British Columbia have a grievance.

Mr. COWAN. I am very much pleased, indeed, that one of the ministers has had the courage to speak out, but I regret the lack of that courage in the Minister of Inland Revenue. The Minister of Finance says that if there be discrimination——

Mr. FIELDING. I did not say any thing about discrimination.

Mr. COWAN. Against British Columbia——

Mr. FIELDING. I did not say that.

Mr. COWAN. And the amount of that discrimination is certified to by the Dominion statistician——

Mr. FIELDING. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. COWAN. Still he says he will grant us no inquiry. Yet this is the minister who in 1886 carried Nova Scotia for the repeal of the union, because that province was not getting fair treatment at the hands of the Dominion. When, however the other man's ox is gored, he gets up, brave as a lion, and says, no, I will give you nothing. Fortunately we can retaliate, to the extent of seven representatives in this House, on any minister who will defy us in that way. Let me say to the Minister of Finance that I know whereof I speak. I say there is a black injustice being done British Columbia, and that it reflects nothing to the credit of the Minister of Finance, or his government, to refuse an inquiry. We are prepared to take the results of that inquiry, let it be absolutely fair and impartial. If we can establish no right, if we cannot make good our claim, we will take the result and take it like men, but I cannot understand how any minister of any government can close the door of justice to any province or any portion of the people. We do not ask anything more than that we should have a fair and impartial hearing on this claim. The minister says that that is ridiculous, and what reason does he give. He says that the goods may be entered at Vancouver, but they may be consumed down at Halifax.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear hear.

Mr. COWAN. And the minister's echo says 'Hear, hear.' But if the Minister of Customs were here, he could tell my hon. friend that the goods entered at the port of Vancouver—the through freight—do not pay duty at the port of entry, and if he would take the trouble of going to the office of the Dominion statistician he would learn that I am absolutely right and accurate in my statement that we can ascertain exactly how much that province is paying per head of its population into the Dominion treasury. I said exactly; I want to modify that to this extent, that there are certain goods going north to the Yukon which leave a little shade of doubt as to the exact amount, but none of the goods going through east or anywhere else than north to the Yukon leave any shade of doubt. Thus his reason for saying, 'no' does not appeal to me as cogent. If that was the strength of the reasons he advanced in 1886 for the repeal of the Union and the secession of Nova Scotia, I do not wonder that the result was changed in 1887.

I wish to assure the minister that I am not raising this point for any purpose other than this, that British Columbia should get a fair, impartial, just hearing of a claim that she thinks is just. It may be that we are wrong, it may be that we have no claim. We are not saying that we have a claim, that we have proved it conclusively; I can say that I know it is proven conclusively, but I am not asking you to accept my word; I am asking you to give British Columbia an impartial tribunal before which that claim may be heard. No man will refuse that—I cannot understand why the exigencies of party—

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member does not oppose this item at all?

Mr. COWAN. No: but I must surely have an opportunity to reply to the Finance Minister's emphatic 'no', and his unemphatic reason for saying 'no.' I would really like the Minister of Inland Revenue to offer his testimony as to whether he would be in favour of British Columbia having a fair and impartial hearing upon this claim or not.

Mr. FIELDING. I wish another word first. I think that if the hon. member felt that he had a good case in British Columbia he would hardly have travelled to the other end of the continent and introduced Nova Scotia. I have settled that question with my friends, with my Tory friends from Nova Scotia, over a long period of years, and there is nothing to be gained by reopening it. I have no reason to regret anything that happened. If I am to treat the hon. gentleman's remarks as serious, what is his proposal? That there shall be an inquiry as to whether or not British Columbia gets back all she pays. What reason is there that British Columbia shall have that inquiry? Why shall not the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) demand a similar inquiry for Ontario? Why shall not my hon. friends from Manitoba, from Prince Edward Island, from Quebec, why shall not the Minister of Public Works and the hon. member for Westmoreland demand a similar inquiry for their provinces?

Mr. COWAN. And if their claims are just why should they not be heard?

Mr. FIELDING. Then it means that we want to find out whether every province gets back 100 per cent on the dollar in actual direct payment—and that is provincialism run mad.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. What harm would it do to find that out?

Mr. FIELDING. I say that this country is not being run on provincial lines; there must be give and take between the provinces. If every province is to be measured, if you are to show that a given province has paid $100 revenue and must get back $100, it is a ridiculous thing, and you never could make a nation on any such ground.

Mr. COWAN. I never suggested that we should get 100 cents on the dollar back. There is not a ghost of a show of our getting that as long as there is in power a ministry that gives the money of this country to the big vote.

Mr. FIELDING. And as the hon. gentleman has no hope of seeing any other ministry I do not blame him for being anxious on the subject.

Mr. COWAN. Still I think they might at least correctly report my statement and not misreport it.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not think I misreported my hon. friend, but I would be glad if he would tell me any reason why an inquiry should be granted to British Columbia and refused to Prince Edward Island, why——

Mr. BARNARD. Possibly Prince Edward Island has not asked for it.

Mr. FIELDING. Prince Edward Island thinks it has a grievance. My hon. friend from Kings county tells us it has a grievance and I have heard Ontario members represent again and again that their province is the great taxpaying province of the Dominion.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Did not Nova Scotia set up the same claim?

Mr. FIELDING. Nova Scotia set up that claim at one time.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. And successfully?

Mr. FIELDING. That was a great many years ago, and the government of the day recognized Nova Scotia's claims many years ago by an additional amount.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Certainly.

Mr. FIELDING. But does my hon. friend contend that the position of British Columbia is the same?

Mr. COWAN. Much stronger.

Mr. FIELDING. If we have to go to ancient history, the great difference is this:

Nova Scotia did not enter the union voluntarily and she had a right to complain if she wanted to. British Columbia and the other provinces came into the union voluntarily; they made their bargain and would have no right to play the baby act if that bargain was enforced. All they have a right to say is that they are citizens of this Dominion and should be treated like other citizens. But it will not make for good government, it will not make for nationality, if we are going to take a tape-measure to find whether one province pays a dollar and gets back only ninety-nine cents.

Mr. COWAN. The minister has asked why British Columbia should prefer a claim and the other provinces should not.

Mr. FIELDING. I did not say that, I said why should they have an inquiry more than any other province; they can make all the claims they like.

Mr. COWAN. Since the question is put to me I wish to answer it. British Columbia has a right to an inquiry, because every trust transferred from the colony of British Columbia to the Dominion is being abused, and I venture to say it is being abused in such a way that if we could get into a court of equity we could get justice.

Mr. FIELDING. This is a court of equity.

Mr. COWAN. But a court of equity that closes its doors; when we come rapping on the door, they say: No, no entrance here.

Mr. FIELDING. Oh, no, you are here.

Mr. COWAN. The fountain of justice is closed. We are denied an impartial hearing.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman is in the position that he cannot get a judgment in his favour and so he says the fountain of justice is closed.

Mr. COWAN. The minister says that because we came in voluntarily in 1870, therefore, we made a bargain. I do not know from what pettifogging lawyer he got the idea that a treaty is a contract. I did not know until I heard it from the Minister of Finance that a treaty such as the terms of union between British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada was a mere contract, and if we got the worst of the bargain we could squeal, but we must take our medicine. That is the position, the little position, the minister takes. Men who have studied these things know that it is not a statesmanlike position to take upon this question. The intention of the union was that there should be without undue taxation sufficient revenues left to the province to enable it to perform the duties assigned to it as a province under the terms of union and that the Dominion should only take such revenues away from the province—and that is the trust—as would enable the Dominion to perform the added duties imposed on the Dominion because of the province coming into confederation. So the Dominion is in the position of trustee of the powers of imposing indirect taxation.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the hon. gentleman would permit me to interrupt him, I would ask him whether it is really fair, on this item of $14,500 for improvements upon the Columbia river, to go into the question of the amendment of the British North America Act so as to give to British Columbia a larger subsidy than it now receives. What do you think, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not understand that the point of order has been raised.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, it is a point of order.

Mr. BARNARD. In speaking to the point of order, I think this discussion is logical.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The point of order being raised, it is the right of the hon. member for Vancouver to explain what he desires to say.

Mr. COWAN. I was induced to rise to my feet by the statement of the Minister of Public Works that he was unaware that there was discrimination against British Columbia, and he seemed to think that that negative statement, that ignorance which he alleged in himself, was some reason for the argument he was advancing.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend will realize that the question of an appropriation for a necessary public work in British Columbia is a very different question from that as to whether the British North America Act should be amended. They are two different questions. I am not aware that there is any discrimination against British Columbia.

Mr. COWAN. No one knows better than the Minister of Public Works, because he is a capable lawyer, that no amendment is needed to the British North America Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Speaking on the point of order, I think any member of this House, in speaking of expenditures in his own province or elsewhere, if he thinks he is not getting a proportionate share of the finances that his province requires, can make a comparison between what is spent in his province and what is spent in any other province, on any item that is under consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would appeal to my hon. friends from British Columbia to allow these estimates to go ahead, because these are all necessary items.

Coquitlam river—removal of obstructions, $1,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We wish to remove these obstructions so as to facilitate navigation.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. This is one of the public works we have been asking for. Is there anything special being done on that river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We had an appropriation for the present year, and up to the 31st of November we have spent $691. We are now asking for $1,000 more, which we intend to use for removing obstructions which exist to free the floating down of logs and shingle bolts. We hope to be able to effect a substantial improvement with this money. There have been some complaints as to the results which have been obtained by past expenditures. We hope that this money will accomplish good work in removing those obstructions.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. When were the complaints made?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I received a complaint not very long ago. I think I also have a letter from my hon. friend on the subject.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. For the information of the Minister of Inland Revenue, who does not know that there is anything required in British Columbia at present, I would like to state that this complaint was sent from Coquitlam about the 16th of December. I will read a copy thereof:

To the Hon. the Minister of Public Works, Ottawa.

We, the undersigned, mill-owners of New Westminster, interested in logging, and residents of the municipality of Coquitlam being land owners along the banks of the Coquitlam river, do respectfully ask you to make an inquiry regarding the work which has been done to improve the channel of this river, for the last five years, by the money you have from time to time voted for that purpose.

Both banks have been slashed, and all overhanging trees cut down and limbed and thrown into the river, with the result that the river channel was covered over with a net work of scrub mattresses on which sand bars have formed, thus forcing the river out of its natural channel, and is doing immense damage to property on both banks.

This makes it very expensive and difficult to drive logs even during a freshet, as they either lodge on the sand bars in the centre channel or get jammed in the irregular side channels.

We respectfully lay this matter before you, as the river has got out of all control, and unless these reinforced sand bars are removed by dredging or other means great damage will result from every freshet.

After inspection we humbly trust you will see your way to supplement your grant for this year, as it is altogether inadequate to meet the improvements required.

If the minister has acted upon this he will have to supplement the vote, I suppose, in the supplementary estimates. If he has done that, it is no use my taking up the time of the committee further. But if not, I think this is the proper time for discussion. Does the minister propose to make a supplementary grant for the Coquitlam river?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is quite impossible for me to inform my hon. friend even as to whether there will be any supplementary estimates. When the estimates are brought down, assented to by His Excellency the Governor General and submitted to the House, my hon. friend will know what they contain, but until that time, very much to his regret, I am quite sure, I am unable to give my hon. friend that information.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. That may be a satisfactory answer from the minister's standpoint, but from the standpoint of an independent member of this House endeavouring to do his duty to his constituents, it is not a satisfactory answer. I do not think it is the answer that a member of this House, acting on behalf of his constituents, ought to receive. I do not think we are sent here to trifle in this manner with the public business. When a member comes down from a riding, presents a numerously signed petition from his constituents and which has been in the hands of the minister for more than three months, asking for an appropriation for this work to avert threatening damage, the minister fails in his duty in standing up in this committee in this cavalier manner and making what is intended to be a smart observation that we shall learn what is in the supplementary estimates when they come down. I am quite as well aware of that as the minister is, and I do not thank him for the information at all. This only emphasizes the gross neglect of the interests of British Columbia by the Minister of Public Works, by the government and by the Minister of Inland Revenue, who is supposed particularly to represent British Columbia and who told us a few minutes ago that there were no unanswered requests for improvements in British Columbia. To my own knowledge thousands of dollars of damage is being done to private property along the Coquitlam river every year by the ravages of the stream because of the insufficient attention given by this department to the matter of controlling the Coquitlam river. As the people say in their petition this money is wasted because of its insufficiency. A thousand dollars a year will do nothing substantial towards the improvement of the Coquitlam river, and if we are going to save these people from damage the government will have to take more vigorous steps than any appropriation of a thousand dollars will enable them to take. I call this matter again to the attention of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Inland Revenue, the representative of British Columbia who speaks without knowledge when he says that no requests from that province remain unanswered.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know anything about the special merits of this work and I do not presume to speak of it, but I might inform the hon. gentleman that he is entirely mistaken when he assumes that the answer of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works could have been given in any other way. The answer of the Minister of Public Works is the answer which he is obliged to give in and out of the House to innumerable requests. It is utterly impossible for the government to determine in advance what the supplementary estimates shall contain. Until these estimates are laid before parliament they are subject to revision and perhaps rejection. Not only did my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works intend no discourtesy to the hon. member, but he gave the proper answer when he said he was not able to tell him what might be in the supplementary estimates. That is the proper answer, and that is the answer that we have to give to people every day.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. There are ways and ways of giving an answer in parliament. It would have been a simple matter for the minister to say politely that he could not indicate what was going to be in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. FIELDING. Is not that what he did say?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. No sir.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What did he say?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. His answer was a very supercilious answer intended to make a laughing stock of the member who asked the question.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member is too sensitive altogether; he is supersensitive.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. The hon. member is not too sensitive, but I do not propose while I stand here on behalf of my constituents to accept an answer which is not a proper one. I guarded myself by stating in advance that if the minister could indicate that he was dealing with this matter in the supplementary estimates or otherwise I would not pursue the subject. Surely that was a proper request to make. I said if the minister was dealing with this I would say no more. But the minister stands up and gives a smart and flippant answer.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am exceedingly sorry that my hon. friend is so sensitive. I wonder if he wants to provoke a quarrel with myself as head of the Department of Public Works, I can assure him that if he does—

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Is that a threat?

Mr. PUGSLEY. He is not taking a course which would commend itself to reasonable men. What the hon. gentleman asked me was to tell him whether a further amount for the Coquitlam river would appear in the supplementary estimates. I do not know that I have shown any discourtesy towards the hon. gentleman by telling him that I could not state even if there would be any supplemetary estimates and that I would be unable to tell him what these supplementary estimates would contain until they had actually received the assent of the Governor General and were actually submitted to the House. If the hon. gentleman says however that this amount of $1,000 which is in the estimates will be utterly wasted, will be of no use whatever, on the Coquitlam river, it raises the very serious consideration for myself as to whether we should spend any part of this appropriation upon the Coquitlam river. My predecessor, in determining to make improvements on the Coquitlam river, stretched a point in his desire to assist the people. Coquitlam is not a navigable river. It is a river which may be called a floatable river, down which logs are floated, and it must have been for my predecessor a serious question as to whether an amount should be placed in the estimates. In view of the fact that the hon. gentleman says that this money will do no good, that it has been wasted in the past, that it has been productive of no results and that it will be productive of no results in the future it raises the important question as to whether any portion of this appropriation shall be used for this purpose.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I wish to state that, to use a sporting expression, that cock does not fight. I am not at all terrorized by the threat of the hon. gentleman to withdraw this appropriation from the Coquitlam river. I presume that it was placed in the estimates in pursuance of what he considered to be his public duty. I do not presume that, it having been so placed there, the Minister of Finance, or the Postmaster General, or the minister from British Columbia will permit him to withdraw it for the unworthy reason stated, because it is not a matter for the Minister of Public Works alone. It is a matter for the government. I do not presume that they will permit him to say that he will withdraw it as a threat against any member of this House who is pursuing his duty. I wish to correct again the minister in the statement that I said this would be entirely useless. I told him that this was altogether insufficient to procure the effective results which should be procured on the Coquitlam river. Even $50 or $100 could be used to advantage there, and $900 can be used to advantage. But, the minister has not been using this appropriation in a way which would bring advantage from the expenditure; there are ways however in which it can be used.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not intend my remarks should be regarded as a threat, but I feel bound to take any hon. member of this House seriously, and when he alleges, as I understood my hon. friend to allege, that this amount would be practically useless unless we had a larger sum, I felt I was bound to take him seriously as a representative of that constituency, when the constituency, through him, spoke as it did speak to-night, and said it would be utterly useless to expend this money.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order. I object to the minister misquoting my remarks, particularly as I have explained just now what I said.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I was referring to what the hon. gentleman had said previously.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman's declaration of what he said must be accepted.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Of what he said previously. Then, all I can say is that I did not feel that it was out of place for me to take the hon. gentleman seriously, and any remarks which I made were the result of my so regarding the observations of the hon. gentleman.

Fraser river—(lower) wing dam, bank protection works, inclusive of repairs, $35,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to make further provision to maintain existing works from the city of Westminster to the Straits of Georgia, preventing the formation of detrimental side channels, protecting banks from erosion, also services in connection with the maintenance of navigation in this river.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Has the minister received a communication from the city of New Westminster lately in respect to this work, and what action, if any, has been taken upon the communication?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did receive a communication from the city of New Westminster as to going on with the very large works of importance which had been laid out, and which consist not only of the dredging, but also of the building of jetties for the purpose of giving direction to the channel and so improving the navigation.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Has the minister done anything in pursuance of the indication he gave to a public meeting at New Westminster last summer, that he might put two shifts a day on the dredge 'Fruhling' in order to obtain more effective work from it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am not sure that I addressed a public meeting at New Westminster, I do not think I did.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. If the minister wishes to be very exact, it was a meeting of citizens and the board of trade.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, it was not a large meeting; it was a meeting of the members of the board of trade. I did state that I intended to make provision for working the 'Fruhling' two shifts per day, and the estimates we have before the House provide this very service. We hope to have two crews working on the 'Fruhling' so as to do the work with the greatest rapidity possible.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. When does the minister expect to have the channel upon which he is now working available for traffic?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No one can tell in a work of that kind when there are shifting sands. It is a very large work, but we hope, in the comparatively near future, to have the channel in good order.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I put a question on the order paper the other day, and I thought possibly that if the answer to it was given seriously by the minister he would remember it now. I am sorry he does not remember what time he told me then, because he placed the date so near in the future that I was more encouraged by it than by the reports I heard from New Westminster. The people of New Westminster are very anxious indeed about the progress of this work, and on the 7th of January of this year the board of trade at New Westminster addressed a petition to the Rt. Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier on this subject. I presume that petition found its way to the Minister of Public Works. It reads as follows:

To the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, G.C.M.G., P.C., Ottawa.

Sir,—The New Westminster Board of Trade deems it necessary to again bring to the attention of your government the matter of the Fraser river ship channel.

The board desires to express its appreciation of the work done so far by the new 'Fruhling' dredge, without which the channel at its entrance, would probably have become impassable for ocean vessels of any size. As it is, however, it is only when the high tides occur in daylight that vessels drawing 22 or 23 feet can pass in or out, the latter draught being the limit that may safely attempt the channel at all at the present time.

The usual volume of ocean traffic on the river has been maintained during the past year, but various large industrial propositions have been and are deterred from locating on the river by the fact that much time may be lost by vessels having to await daylight tides to enter and clear. As cases bearing on this point it may be mentioned that the board recently received a communication from the agents of the Blue Funnel line of steamships, plying direct between Liverpool and Vancouver, intimating that upon assurance of the adequacy of the channel for their vessels, they are desirous of sending them to this port; also that a vessel chartered to deliver a cargo of iron pipe at this city due to arrive in March next, will not be able to come here, as there will not be sufficient water for her on the Sand Heads.

To accommodate the trade now offering, it is imperative that a channel be provided without delay, sufficiently deep for the passage of the largest vessels plying on the Pacific ocean, at any stage of the tide, and buoyed and lighted so as to be navigable by day or night.

The board is of the opinion that to attain this result within a reasonable time, it will be necessary to either augment the dredging power now available for use on the river, or to proceed at once with the construction of a jetty from Garry Point to the outer edge of the Sand Heads, as suggested and recommended in reports heretofore submitted, on behalf of the citizens of New Westminster for the consideration of your government.

The board earnestly hopes that this matter will receive the immediate and favourable consideration of your government, and that provision will be made at this session of parliament for the vigorous prosecution of the work necessary to this end.

The minister will see from that, that there is more than ordinary interest taken in the carrying on of this work rapidly, because there is a great deal of shipping that would be headed for the Fraser river if there was any reasonable assurance of its getting in there. There are some very large industries there, and particularly to the new industries established at New Westminster it is a very serious matter that those interested should have to bring in their freight by any other route than by the Fraser river.

Fraser river—to refund to the municipality of Delta one-half their expense of constructing emergency works to protect the south bank of the river near Ladner's Landing, on condition that the government of British Columbia will refund the other half, $1,850.

Mr. COWAN. Why the division?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it was Mr. John Oliver who saw me on behalf of the municipality, and he said they had an assurance from the provincial government that they would pay half the cost of this work, provided my department would pay the other half, and therefore I put the vote in in that way.

Harbours, rivers and bridges—general repairs and improvements, $10,000.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. In connection with this vote I have pleasure in further refreshing the memory of the Minister of Inland Revenue as to works applied for in the province of British Columbia and not granted. I see nothing in the estimates about a work to which I refer now, and so I must presume it has not received the attention of the government. I have here a letter which bears every evidence of authenticity, and which reads:

I wish to call your attention once more to the need of removing the obstructions to navigation in the Upper Lillooet river. All our farming implements and heavy goods that we cannot take in on horseback we have to bring by the Harrison and Lillooet lakes and the Upper Lillooet river, and it is almost impossible to get boats up the river. There are so many log jams in the river that men are in great danger of losing their lives in trying to get these goods up the river in boats. The government spent a few thousand dollars in removing log jams in the river in 1908 with very good results. We wrote to Mr. Templeman requesting him to try and get a grant for the above work. In his reply he said he would do all he could to comply with our request. We sincerely trust you will do all you can to get the government to remove log jams from the river, as it would be a great benefit to this settlement.

I would like to ask the minister whether he has given any attention to this case of the Upper Lillooet, which is before the government not only now, but was before it last year, on application from the same man who has written this letter?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say to my hon. friend that I have given consideration to the matter.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. The minister has given consideration to it, but will Mr. Punch get any result?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I cannot tell my hon. friend that. But this item will be available for that work, and I recognize the Lillooet river as a navigable river where improvement of the navigation might very well be done. My department has done work there already, and out of this very vote I trust that we shall be able to make further improvements during the coming season.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. There is another item which has been before the government for some time. I took the liberty of mentioning it to this House last year, and the minister promised me then that he would give it attention. That is the matter of improving the Fraser river between Chilliwack, the head of navigation, and Agassiz. I pointed out to the minister that on account of the river having been allowed to silt up between those two points, it is impossible to get navigation into Agassiz. This is a matter of recent date, because when this government took over the affairs of the Fraser river, navigation extended to Yale, which is far above Agassiz. I pointed out that the people of Agassiz were very much in the position of those of Ste. Croix, mentioned this afternoon, in that it was very advisable for them to make their shipments by water, but that it was impossible for vessels to get to the place. I suggested to the minister a very small appropriation for snagging between Chilliwack and Agassiz, and a provision for some sort of wharf at Agassiz, almost the cheapest kind that he could construct, so that these people might have relief from what they consider the excessive freight rates of the railway and send out their produce by steamer to New Westminster. I would like to ask the minister what has been done between last session and the present in the direction indicated.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think my hon. friend must be wrong in his statement that I said I would give attention to this matter, if he takes that to mean that I would do it.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. No, the hon. minister did not promise it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Nothing has been done between that time and the present that I am aware of; but perhaps we might be able to do it out of this vote. I will have the matter looked into, and see if we can use a part of the money for that purpose.

Mr. HERRON. When did the government adopt the policy of doing no further work in the way of protecting the banks of streams? Has it been adopted within the last year or two, or has it been in force a considerable length of time?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that since I have been Minister of Pubic Works I have been thinking the matter over, having regard to the largely increasing demands being made on the government. My colleagues and I have discussed the matter somewhat. We all recognize that if it were our duty to do work of this character, it would involve the Dominion in very large expenditure. While we have not shut down on this work entirely, we are limiting it largely to matters in connection with works that have been already entered upon. In the very items under discussion some work of this character in British Columbia is being provided for, but I am endeavouring to curtail our expenditure for this class of work as much as possible.

Mr. HERRON. Perhaps the elections had something to do with that. The minister had an appropriation for protecting the banks of streams of my constituency—in fact, protecting government property—and he withdrew it after the elections of 1908 were over. Was it because the constituency did not deliver the goods to the government on that occasion?

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I would like to call the minister's attention to another matter which was before his department, a request for assistance which was not granted, and as to which the Minister of Inland Revenue has no knowledge. This comes from Mr. William Wilson, of Cottonwood island, near Chiliwack, who says he has been petitioning for two or three years in regard to the devastation of his farm by the current induced by the formation of a bar in the Fraser river opposite his place, a bar which would be removed if the suggestion which I make with regard to navigation to Agassiz were carried out. Mr. Wilson reports that the matter went so far that Mr. Kickbush, the gentleman in charge of the government work there, brought up the assistant district engineer, Mr. Gauvreau, who spoke of dredging through the bar. Mr. Wilson also reports that a petition to the government was being circulated at that time—the 22nd of November last. I wonder if the minister proposes to do anything in the matter of this protection work at Chiliwack?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have not thought of that. When matters come up for consideration, we will have to see what are the most urgent demands that can be met out of this general vote of $10,000. I regret that I cannot say anything more to my hon. friend to-night as to the matter.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I have another matter that I must bring to the attention of the minister. It is from the same locality, and is in connection with a request, not only for dredging, which would enable the river steamers to come up to the proper wharf, but, if the dredging cannot be got, for road improvements which would enable the traffic to come down to the spot on the river where it has to meet the steamer. When I mentioned this the other night, the minister stated that he had no request from Chiliwack for that purpose, and the only meaning that we could take from that was that if he had such a request, he would pay attention to it and give it his kind consideration. I have here a memo from the Chiliwack Board of Trade which indicates the extent they are suffering for lack of just such an improvement as I have in mind. The letter covering it reads as follows:

I beg to inclose herewith copy of report concerning conditions re the Fraser river landing at Chilliwack, and statistics in support of claims of the residents of this valley for an improvement in the condition of the same.

The facilities afforded merchants and farmers, the latter class forming the majority of the population, for the shipping of goods at the Fraser river landing are entirely inadequate and cause a great deal of inconvenience, expense, and frequent loss to those engaged in business and the farmers.

The object of the inclosed report is to place in your hands some reliable information regarding the amount of business conducted in the Chilliwack valley, and setting forth the very inadequate assistance supplied for the facilitating of the same.

Trusting that this data will be of value to you in setting forth the claims of this district for an improvement of the existing conditions,

I beg to remain, yours truly,

H. P. WILSON.

Then, their memorandum, which will give the minister a fair idea of the importance of the trade generally in the Chilliwack valley, reads as follows:

CHILLIWACK, BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Merchandise received and shipped at Fraser River Landings,

The amount of general merchandise received and shipped at the port of Chilliwack, on the Fraser river, for the year ending in July, 1909, comprises the large total of 26,474 tons.

The steamer 'Beaver,' operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, carried 16,474 tons, as per the returns given by the general freight agent, and the steamer 'Ramona' and other boats operated by the Western Steamboat Company of New Westminster, carried as near as can be ascertained by the records furnished, about 10,000 tons.

Wharfs.

There is a government wharf at this port, situated at such a point that it is only available for use by the steamers for a few months in the year, and from a statement made by the steamboat officials, fully three-quarters of the freight handled has to be shipped and landed at a point more than a mile below the government wharf, owing to the fact that the water is too low to allow the steamers to reach their proper landing place. For many years this fact has been a source of great worry and hardship to the merchants and shippers of this valley, and it must be pointed out that the period of low water comprises the rainy season in the fall and the winter and spring. The bulk of the shipping is done by the farmers in the fall and winter, their shipments comprising fruit and vegetables of all kinds, potatoes in large quantities, hay and live and dead stock; and at the same time the merchants are receiving their winter stocks of merchandise, &c. In the winter and spring, there is still considerable shipping of hay, potatoes and other farm produce held over, while the merchants and dealers are receiving their summer stocks of merchandise, machinery, flour and feed, &c., so that during the period in which the government wharf is in commission, from the months of May to September, there is comparatively little shipping to be done. The accommodation provided at the nearest point at which the boats can reach during the low-water period is only of a temporary nature and is situated on a gravel bar; the rush of high water each spring usually destroying it.

Shelter is provided by a shed built on a scow, and in many cases perishable freight has to be left out in the wet owing to lack of room. Goods having left the care of the transportation companies are frequently damaged by exposure, and the merchants have therefore no claim for damages, and after coming, perhaps, many thousand miles, are liable to the most damage within three miles of their destination.

Owing to the nature of the gravel bar at which, as stated above, the bulk of the freight is landed and shipped, it is impossible to maintain a road that will stand the heavy traffic during the seasons when the best of roads get out of repair through wet and frost, and the hardship inflicted in hauling heavy, costly and bulky freight over practically a beach and along shelving banks is nearly unbearable, to say nothing of the dangers incurred in conveying passengers to the boats.

Time and time again have the Dominion government been appealed to to have the channel dredged and maintained——

I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Inland Revenue to that:

—so that the wharf and sheds standing idle the greater part of the year can be used and this hardship now suffered by shippers and consignees alike be relieved, but nothing has been done except promises given to have matters remedied, and after great pressure being brought to bear, some temporary repairs to the inadequate shelter provided at the lower gravel bar.

Statistics.

That the district of Chilliwack, comprising the city and the fertile country surrounding it is an important one, and entitled to be relieved at the hands of the government from the condition of affairs with regard to better shipping and landing facilities on the Fraser river, is shown by some figures dealing with the post office, express shipments, &c., output of factories and population.

Population.

The population of the district, including the city of Chilliwack, which is incorporated, according to the last estimate made some time ago, is 5,500, but the next census will probably show larger figures, as new families are coming into the district every week.

Then follows a page of statistics which I shall not read. I would say, however, that I think the matter is sufficiently important to engage the attention of the committee even at this late hour of the night. An inspection of these statistics shows that the cost to the people of Chilliwack, because of the lack of facilities for making connections with steamboat traffic, is estimated on the rate per ton which they pay in addition to the normal rate, and that amounts to $10,000 a year. That is the amount of tax levied on those people every year because of the neglect of this government to provide a work which probably all told would not cost what the people pay in one year. That is a matter which ought to have been within the knowledge of the Minister of Inland Revenue as representing British Columbia. It seems to me that it must have been within his knowledge. I have heard him address public meetings at Chilliwack. I know that he spent a whole day there, and I think he did make himself familiar with the surroundings. I am surprised, therefore, that he should tell the House that he knows of no application for assistance to this riding which has not been granted by this government. Why, the people are paying $10,000 a year as a special tax to make connections which the government should provide without this tax. This ought to be considered a matter of urgency, and the minister should make it a very special case, considering the number of years the people have been suffering.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. When I challenged the representatives from the province of British Columbia to show that any application which had been made for public works in that province had been refused, I was referring, of course, to works of large magnitude and not to works such as the one to which my hon. friend refers. No one knows better than my hon. friend the difficulties of the Fraser river, and I quite appreciate the difficulties under which the farmers of Chilliwack county suffer. It is true that certain wharf facilities are not available, but that is in consequence of the continual shifting of the river, the formation of sand bars, the washing away of banks and islands, the formation of new ones, and the continual changing of the channel. Right opposite the Chiliwack landing I will show broad areas of gravel bank, were some ten years ago a farm of 160 acres had existed that had been washed away. The Fraser river will always be a difficult problem for any government with respect to navigation and to construction of retaining works. I have discussed the matter frequently with Mr. Keefer, the resident engineer, and work has been done, but not probably of a nature sufficient to enable steamers to come to the present wharf. Mr. Keefer is most anxious to use the money voted for the Fraser river, so as to give the farmers all along the valley as far as Chilliwack all the facilities possible; and I am quite sure it is the intention of the department to carry out just that class of work to which my hon. friend refers. I repeat that when I made the statement that the representatives of British Columbia could not make good their challenge, I desired that they should point to some considerable public work which has been refused. There are here and there throughout the province, I know myself, places where wharfs ought to be built that are not in the estimates yet; we will have them there before very long. There are places on the Fraser river that should be dredged, and probably some places where wharfs should be built, but they are not very numerous and no doubt in a very short time all these wants will be attended to.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I must congratulate the Minister of Inland Revenue on the condition of affluence which he enjoys which makes him think that a public work —the absence of which costs the people of Chilliwack $10,000 a year—is not worth his lordly consideration.

I want to bring another need before his attention. I refer to the matter of aids to navigation on the Serpentine river, which serves the municipality of Delta, near the mouth of that river. This was undertaken many years ago, the minister of that day recognizing the importance of providing water transportation by the Serpentine river. In the course of years the work then done has become decayed. On September 24 last, this letter was addressed to the secretary of the board of trade of New Westminster who had interested himself on behalf of the petitioners:

Ottawa, September 24, 1909.

Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th inst., in reference to aids to navigation in the Serpentine river, and would advise you that Captain Gaudin referred your previous correspondence to this department promptly, with a recommendation that the piles formerly marking the channel of the Serpentine river should be replaced. The lowest offer Captain Gaudin could get for doing the work was $1,062, and besides which, the department would have to provide several buoys, and as the life of the piles from previous experience, appears to have been only two or three years, we question whether the traffic in the district would warrant so large an expenditure, and propose deferring action until a technical officer of the department can visit the locality and determine conditions on the spot. We have only a limited vote available for aids to navigation, and must spend the money where it will be an advantage to the greatest tonnage of shipping.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) C. STANTON,
Assistant Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

CHAS. H. STUART-WADE, Esq., F.R.G.S.,
Sec.-Treas. Board of Trade,
New Westminster, British Columbia.

Since this letter was written there has been ample time for the inquiry by a technical officer indicated. I would ask what the result of that inquiry has been.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend is asking about matters with which the Minister of Public Works has nothing to do. This belongs to the Department of Marine and Fisheries and if my hon. friend would defer this matter until we get into the Marine and Fisheries items I have no doubt the acting minister would be very glad to give the information desired.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Haven't we been providing aids to navigation?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is in the Marine Department.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. You have been providing works like this?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Some time ago I asked that the House should adjourn. I now ask the deputy Speaker to count the House out.

Mr. FIELDING. No, I would rather move the adjournment of the House.

Some resolutions reported.

ADJOURNMENT—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING TARIFFS.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I wish to ask the Finance Minister whether he could give any information as to negotiations with Washington respecting tariffs. I am informed there are press despatches from Washington indicating that something important is going on there and there is some public anxiety to know whether the minister has any communication that can be made.

Mr. FIELDING. The matter is not in a position that would permit me to make any intimation to the House at present.

Mr. SPROULE. What business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. FIELDING. We will proceed on Monday with the naval debate.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m., Saturday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, February 28, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to an incorrect report which appears in the edition of the Toronto 'World' of February 25 last. The statement reads as follows:

> Ottawa, Feb. 24.—(Special.)—If the Naval Bill is not withdrawn and held over till next session, it will not be the fault of a couple of western Liberal members, who are to-night circulating for signature a petition to Sir Wilfrid Laurier to do one of two things—either bring this naval debate to a sudden conclusion so that they can get to their homes by Easter or withdraw the Bill.
> It is impossible, of course, under the present conditions, to limit this important debate, and at the present rate the House cannot rise before June, even although future Wednesday evenings will now be requisitioned for the work of the Commons. Therefore the petition narrows itself down to a request for withdrawal of the Bill.
> Western Liberals in common with western Ontario Liberals are not enamoured of the Bill, and would gladly see it dead.

This statement contains only a semblance of truth. It is a fact that there was a petition circulated amongst the members of both sides of the House; it was not prepared by western Liberal members, but was prepared by Liberal and Conservative members who sit on both sides of the House. There was nothing stated in the petition as to the bringing of the debate on the Naval Bill to a conclusion before Easter, nor was there any statement with respect to the withdrawal of the Naval Bill. The petition was simply got up by a number of members on both sides of the House for the purpose of bringing the attention of the right hon. leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) to the desire of a great many hon. members of this House to get home by Easter, if possible, and to prevent them from being required to come back after the adjournment. I have in my hands part of a petition that was signed and which is a very harmless document. It is simply a request to the two leaders of the House that steps be taken to ensure the prorogation of the House before Easter. There is no attempt shown in the document to prevent proper discussion of the Naval Bill or any other matter of general public interest, and that the petition did meet with general favour by members on both sides, is, I think, demonstrated by the fact that the part of the petition which I hold in my hand was signed by seventy members on both sides of the House.

Mr. STAPLES. By how many on this side?

Mr. W. M. MARTIN. I think that before newspapers spread reports of this kind they should make themselves thoroughly familiar with the facts.

Mr. STAPLES. How many on this side?

Mr. W. M. MARTIN. If my hon. friend will be quiet for a moment, the statement which I made will be corroborated by members on the other side of the House.

Mr. STAPLES. I simply rose to ask how many members on this side of the House signed the petition.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN. I have in my hand the pettions, except one that was circulated on the other side. I see on one the names of at least two members on the other side of the House.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I am one of those responsible on this side of the House for starting and circulating the petition, but as the hon. member (Mr. W. M. Martin) said, our whole object was to bring to the attention of the leaders of the House the desirability of securing prorogation within a reasonable time. So far as I can learn there is very general discontent on both sides of the House at the long time which has elapsed since this House assembled and at the small amount of business that has been done. I am safe in saying that members on both sides would like very much to secure some better arrangement than we have at present for the meeting of the House and the prosecution of business after we do meet.

THE BANKING ACT.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the Finance Minister if he has any information to give to the House as to when we may expect the Banking Bill.

Mr. FIELDING. I had contemplated bringing forward a revision of the Banking Act, and it is in an advanced condition. I am aware of the representations made within the last day or two on both sides as to the desirability of curtailing the government programme and bring about an early prorogation, and I would like to know what progress is likely to be made in that regard before deciding definitely. I still desire to bring forward the Banking Act, but if there is to be an early prorogation the proposed Act might stand over until next session, as the bank charters do not expire until July 1, 1911. If the session is to be protracted the Bank Act will be brought forward, but if there is a desire to curtail the session it may remain over until next session.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. LEWIS. I would ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made by the committee which he appointed for the revision of the rules with a view to shortening the session, if possible.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There has been one sitting of the committee, and it is intended to have another one this week.

MANITOBA FISHERIES REGULATIONS.

Mr. BRADBURY Eight or ten days ago I requested the Prime Minister, who is acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries to bring down the proposed amendment to the Fisheries Laws for Manitoba. This is a very important question. I understand the fishery officers were called in from Manitoba and spent eight or ten days revising the regulations, and I would like to suggest that I should see the regulations before they are put into force. I presume they will not become law until an order in council is passed, and they should be referred to the Select Committee on Fisheries, who would have an opportunity to look into them.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. A Bill has been prepared, notice of it will be given to-day, and it will be submitted to the House immediately, covering the amendments to which my hon. friend refers. It is in relation to all fisheries.

Mr. BRADBURY. I think the minister hardly grasps my meaning. A commission was appointed to investigate Manitoba fisheries. They made a report, and on the strength of that report it is proposed to adopt new regulations, and it is of those new regulations I am speaking now.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand the government has taken Mondays and intends to take Wednesdays. There are some motions on the order paper, and I wish the Prime Minister would arrange so that those unopposed motions might be taken up this week.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I see no objection to that.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 118) to incorporate the Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Cowan.

Bill (No. 140) for the relief of Frederick Joseph Gustin McArthur.—Mr. A. Haggart.

Bill (No. 144) for the relief of Jessie Mary Maxwell.—Mr. Boyce.

QUESTIONS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG:

Has the government Holsteins and Jersey cattle represented in the dairy herds at the experimental farms? If not, why not?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER:

No. Any more breeds than are there at present could not be satisfactorily dealt with.

HEATING OF RAILWAY COMMISSION BUILDING.

Mr. S. SHARPE:

1. Does the owner or does the government pay for the heating of the Railway Commission building, Queen street?
2. What has been the yearly expense of the heating of said building since the date of the lease?
3. What is the total number of cubic feet in the building?
4. Approximately from what date in the fall of the year to the spring of the following year, must the building be kept heated?

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY:

1. The government.
2. Annual expense of heating, including salary of fireman at $55 per month:

1903-04	$1,170 38
1904-05	1,272 50
1905-06	1,311 00
1906-07	1,318 00
1907-08	1,216 50
1908-09	1,164 00

3. 166,777 cubic feet.
4. The building must be kept heated about eight months, say from September 15, to May 15.

MANITOBA—SALE OF SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

1. Was the N.E ¼ section of section 11, township 1, range 9, west of the 1st meridian, in Manitoba, sold at the last school lands sale at Manitoba? If so, at what price?
2. How much has been paid on this land, and when were the payments made?
3. If it has not been sold, when will it be put on sale?
4. What is the upset price of the land?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER:

1. The north-east ¼ section of section 11, township 1, range 9, west of the 1st meridian, was disposed of at the auction sale held at Manitou on the 30th of May, 1907, to Mr. W. J. Crosbie. The price at which the land was sold was $13 per acre. At the request of Mr. Crosbie, the sale was subsequently cancelled.
2. The amount paid on this land was $208, the payment being made at the time of the sale.
3. It is not possible to say at present when the land will be offered again, as it is not the intention of the department to hold any auction sales in Manitoba in the immediate future.
4. The upset price of this land was $10 per acre.

MANITOBA—FEDERAL SUBSIDY FOR SCHOOL LANDS.

Mr. SCHAFFNER:

How much money was paid to the Manitoba government from the federal government, re school lands, from March 31, 1909, to January 31, 1910?

Mr. OLIVER: $221,056.52.

BAIT FREEZER AT INVERNESS, N.S.

Mr. RHODES:

1. Has the government established at Inverness, Nova Scotia, a cold storage plant for bait?
2. If so, by whom was it built, what did it cost when completed, and is it a separate building, or is it in connection with another building?
3. Has any bait been stored there? If so, how much?
4. How many fishermen are there regularly engaged in fishing at that port, what amount of fish and what kinds did they take last season?
5. What fishing station is the Inverness freezer expected to supply, and from what point will the freezer secure bait?

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN:

1. The government assisted in the establishment of a fishermen's bait freezer there.
2. The Inverness Fishermen's Association. $1,980.76. The department understands it to be a separate building.
3. Not yet, as the freezer was completed only last summer.
4. There are fourteen boat fishermen from Inverness and vicinity.

235 bbls. herring.
45 bbls. mackerel.
300 cwt. dried cod.
130 cwt. dried haddock.
70 cwt. dried hake.
100 bbls. squid.
90 bbls. coarse fish.
2,900 lbs. lobsters (canned).

These figures are for the year 1908-09, those for the year 1909-10 not being yet available.

5. Inverness and vicinity. Bait will be secured for storage in the freezer at Inverness and vicinity or neighbouring localities.

LIGHTKEEPER AT BAY ST. LAWRENCE.

Mr. BLAIN:

1. Who is the lightkeeper at Bay St. Lawrence, Inverness county, Nova Scotia, and how long has he held that position?
2. Has there been reported to the government any complaint against the said lightkeeper as an official of the government?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN:

1. Charles Jamieson, appointed 21st September, 1893.
2. Yes.

49TH REGIMENT.

Mr. NORTHRUP:

1. Has a commanding officer been recently appointed for the 49th regiment?
2. If so, does he reside within the limits from which the men composing the corps are drawn?
3. If no appointment has been made yet, will the department, in making same, select an officer from those residing within the above limits?
4. Has the department consulted the officers of the regiment, or in any way learned their views and opinions as to the effect on the regiment of appointing a commanding officer who does not reside within the said limits?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3 and 4. The department is awaiting a recommendation from the officer commanding the eastern Ontario command.

ROSS RIFLE.

Mr. WORTHINGTON:

1. Is the manufacture of any Ross rifles, mark II. double star, now under contract? If so, how many?
2. Have such rifles been contracted for since the initial order of 500?
3. Will the manufacture of other patterns be stopped and future manufacture consist of mark II. double star?
4. In view of the greatly increased efficiency claimed for mark II. double star, as a target rifle, does the government consider that competitors are fairly treated at the Dominion Rifle Association matches unless the pattern is equally available to all competitors under similar conditions?
5. What action, if any, is the government disposed to take should the National Rifle Association decline to admit mark II. double star, for use at the Bisley competitions?

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1 and 2. An order is being given for the conversion of two hundred Ross rifles.
3. No.
4 and 5. These are matters which pertain to the Dominion Rifle Association.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN.

DUNKIN AND HIGHWATER MAILS.

Mr. WORTHINGTON:

1. Was the contract for the conveyance of mails between Dunkin and Highwater, Quebec, recently awarded to one Charles A. Barnett? If so, at what rate per annum?
2. Was such contract subsequently set aside and the contract awarded to another tenderer? If so, at what rate per annum, for what reasons, and to whom was the work subsequently awarded?
3. Is the government aware that the communication awarding the contract to Mr. Barnett, was said to have been opened while in the mail before reaching its destination? If so, what action does it contemplate taking in regard thereto, and if not in possession of any complaint made in regard thereto, will due inquiries be instituted?
4. Does the person to whom the contract was re-awarded also occupy the positions of postmaster and sub-collector of customs?
5. Does the government consider it sound policy that one individual should occupy dual positions in the Civil Service, and at the same time become a contractor for work in competition with the general public?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX:

1. Yes. $99.75 per annum.
2. Yes, the contract was subsequently awarded to Mr. Clinton R. Crowell at $100 per annum because the performance of the service by Mr. Barnett involved a change in starting point, to which the people interested objected.
3. No, but if a representation to that effect is made to the department, inquiry will be made, and if the case can be proven, the guilty party will be punished to the full extent of the law.
4. He is not a postmaster, and this department is not aware that he is an officer of the customs.
5. It is a fact that in many instances country postmasters are also contractors for mail service, and in some cases it has been considered advisable and convenient by the customs department that they should also be appointed as sub-collectors of customs. This practice is considered to operate advantageously to the public interest in every way, as doing away with the delays incident to the collection of customs on articles addressed to distant post offices.

In the case of services where the remuneration is small and where only a small portion of a postmaster's time is occupied in the performance of his work either as sub-collector or a mail contractor, it is considered an advantage to the government to have these services in the hands of the same person. Express provision is made in the Post Office Act, permitting the amalgamation of the duties of postmaster and mail contractor, wherever it is found advantageous to the public.

BOAR'S BACK POST OFFICE.

Mr. JAMIESON:

Has a petition been received by the Post Office Department asking for the opening of a new post office at Boar's Back, Digby county? If so, when was the same received, and what action, if any, has been taken thereon?

Mr. LEMIEUX. A petition was received at the department on the 7th September, 1901, and was subsequently reported upon by the post office inspector, but the circumstances were so unfavourable to the establishment of an office that the matter was allowed to stand. Looking over the case again it is found that an office has since been opened within a short distance of Boar's Back. and there would therefore be even less need for an office at Boar's Back than there was in 1901.

PEACE RIVER COUNTRY.

Mr. BEST:

1. What part or parts of the Peace River country are open for settlements?
2. What portion of Peace River country will be opened up this season for settlement, at what price per acre, and on what terms can land be purchased?

Land can only be acquired under homestead entry, except in cases of fractional areas of 80 acres or less, which under the regulations may be sold at $3 an acre to the homesteader or owner of land lying alongside. WEDNESDAY EVENING SESSIONS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That from this day to the end of the session, the House will meet on Wednesdays at three o'clock p.m., and that the sittings on such days shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other sitting days.

Motion agreed to.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright). Mr. Speaker, before resuming the line of my remarks, I would like to call attention to a sentence in the Halifax 'Herald' of February 25, 1910, which reads as follows:

> Order was at last restored by Mr. Devlin promising not to quote His Excellency, although he added with some bitterness, 'What did he send me his speech for if I am not allowed to read it?

I used no such language, and in the matter there was absolutely no bitterness in tone or otherwise. My words, and I give them for accuracy, in order that the organs of the Conservative party may sometimes speak fairly of gentlemen on this side of the House, were:

> This pamphlet was sent me, I do not know by whom, but I always presumed that it was sent by His Excellency for my benefit; and, as I found in it certain passages bearing upon the subject before the House, I was simply going to give the House the benefit of them.

When the House rose on Thursday night I was pointing out as well as I could that the attitude which had been taken by the government upon the question of the Naval Bill, which is now under discussion, was a natural and logical sequence to the different resolutions which had been introduced into this House by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the right hon. leader of the House. Since the first resolution was introduced peculiar scenes have been witnessed. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) constituted himself in matters naval, the leader of the opposition, but he had hardly given the word of command before the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) found that he also should give his word of command, which was more directly to be applied to the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) and other hon. gentlemen thought that they also should give a word of command which might differ from the word of command given by the hon. member for North Toronto, the leader in naval matters, and immediately the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. R. L. Borden) bolted from his party. The hon. member for Jacques

Cartier, (Mr. Monk), the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes), and the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), went in search of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden). The hon. member for Jacques Cartier found the hon. member for Halifax addressing the multitudes in the province of Quebec; the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton discovered him addressing the multitudes in the maritime provinces, and there he had a different creed; the hon. member for North Toronto found him addressing the multitudes in the province of Ontario, and there again he had a different creed. After these three hon. gentlemen heard the different creeds of the hon. member for Halifax, they marched him back here to the seat of government, and there made him expound his article of faith, which is to be found in the amendment which he proposes to the Bill now under discussion. What does he say? In speaking to the province of Quebec, the hon. leader of the opposition—I refer now to the hon. member for Halifax—says at page 3067 of 'Hansard':

I would invite my right hon. friend to-day to again respond to the popular will, and the will of this country to-day is that these different proposals ought to be submitted to the people and the people ought to be permicted to pass upon them before any permanent policy of this kind is engaged in.

Then, addressing the masses in the lower provinces, he goes on to say:

I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of that course. I am as strong as any man in this country in the belief that it is the duty of Canada to participate upon a permanent basis in the defence of this empire and to do our reasonable share in that regard.

But, addressing the multitudes in the province of Ontario, he says, at page 3068 of 'Hansard':

So, Sir, I say we should make our aid prompt and generous, so that it may bring to the motherland the assurance not only of material support but of courage, faith and determination which shall proclaim alike to friend and foe that whether in peace or in war, the empire is one and undivided.

These hon. gentlemen, after they had thought the matter over, as the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) told us, in the morning, in the afternoon, and while lying awake at night, prepared the ammunition which they were to discharge at the government, and, if I were permitted to use the words of Senator Beveridge, I would say that they engaged in what we on this side, and what the Canadian public are beginning to understand to be mere pot-shot warfare with wax bullets from air guns. Let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite whether they think that, in order to prevent the British empire from going to smash, we must immediately cable over a sum of $20,000,000 or the equivalent of two Dreadnoughts. The imperial House has been now in session some time, yet we find no mention there made of this imminent peril from Germany. But we need not go to the old country to find what is the opinion in England, we have had it expressed in this country; we have had it expressed in the press so fond of supporting hon. gentlemen opposite; we have had it expressed by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) knows well that there is in this city a newspaper which has always supported the opposition. It is a fair newspaper, for which I have the greatest possible esteem, and which bears weight in this country when it speaks upon imperial matters. What did the 'Evening Journal,' on the 21st December, 1909, say, in a very important editorial, dealing with the question of the American colonies. It said:

England will make no further mistake in the old direction; but some of our own people now want to make that old mistake by forcing on the rest of our people the idea of sending our taxes to England to be spent there, and such a policy is as sure to produce the same old sort of festering irritation among ourselves against the imperial tie, though not so acute in degree, as did that old policy of one hundred and fifty years ago. A Canadian navy would be a continually growing powerful support to the empire, free from all complication as regards imperial finance. Periodical Canadian contributions to the navy of England——

Such as hon. gentlemen opposite advocate to-day—

—would not at best amount to shucks as an imperial asset in the long run, and would tend to stir up continual friction and turmoil in this country, which might ultimately go far towards smashing British connection.

Not only did the press speak in this manner but hon. gentlemen opposite, before they heard the speeches of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), gave expression to their views to the same effect, and in no unmeasured terms. We have for instance the utterance of one hon. gentleman who is prepared to do as much for the empire as any hon. member in this House—an hon. gentleman who risked his life for the empire, not only in this country, but on the battlefields of South Africa. I refer to the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. S. Hughes). What did he say? On the 14th February, 1907, as you will see by 'Hansard', page 2898, he said, referring to the proposed sending of men and money from the colonies for the building of the empire:

That falls to the ground because we have no representation in the British parliament, and the principle is dear to the heart of every colonial that taxation carries the right of representation.

Nor was he alone. Another hon. gentleman in this House, and one who commands our respect as an ardent imperialist, gave utterance to his sentiments as follows: I am referring to the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Chisholm):

In direct violation of that British principle it is suggested that Canadians should contribute to Great Britain's navy, which they have no means of controlling; that they should assist in British wars which they have no means of preventing, and that they should do all this without having any voice whatever in the expenditure of the money which they themselves would contribute for these purposes. Do the inhabitants of Great Britain imagine that Canadians will submit to something which they would not tolerate themselves?

We have also the opinion of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) himself, when he introduced his resolution. That clause is to be found in the very wording of his resolution, which I wish again to read:

That in the opinion of this House, in view of her great and varied resources, of her geographical position and national environments, and of that spirit of self-help and self-respect which alone befits a strong and growing people, Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports.

It is argued in this House that such an attitude taken by Canada in withholding ships from active participation in all the wars of the empire before the government has pronounced is disloyal. But if it be disloyal for Canada, it is equally disloyal for Australia. And in the Australian memo, we find this passage:

It is, however, to be understood that if the services of any of the coast defence vessels be desired in seas remote from Australia, the approval of the Commonwealth government shall first be obtained to their removal.

One hon. gentleman gave expression to views which were sound in great measure. He is a gentleman for whose opinion I have the greatest admiration, inasmuch as at one time he was a professor and at another he was a judge on the bench in the courts before which I have the honour to practise. Here is what he said in connection with the naval proposition:

The proposition I lay down is this: I may have the most implicit, the most unbounded, confidence in another man—I am glad to say that I count friends in whose honour and spirit of rectitude I have as unwavering confidence as in my own—but I have no right to hand over to the most trusted of these men the keeping of my conscience. And I say that this country has no right, however great, however implicit, however absolutely complete and perfect, her confidence may be in the imperial authorities, to hand over to their keeping her conscience.

That is exactly the position I take. I think it would be injudicious for this government to bind itself down to participation in all the wars of the empire before this government has had time to pronounce on the merits or demerits of those wars.

I would like to say a word on the proposition held out to us in the amendment of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), which meets with favour from his friends in the province of Quebec, but not from the great majority in that province. Not wishing to assume the responsibility of his acts as a member of parliament, apparently not understanding the responsibility of a member of parliament in coming to a decision, he tells us that this is a difficult question upon which opinions differ and that consequently it should be referred to the country. 'I have gone to my electors of Jacques Cartier—good, honest citizens—and they have advised me how to act; and I come back now and ask you to do the same'. The amendment says:

This House, while declaring its unalterable devotion to the British Crown, is of opinion, that the Bill now submitted for its consideration changes the relations of Canada with the empire and ought, in consequence, to be submitted to the Canadian people in order to obtain at once the nation's opinion by means of a plebiscite.

I unhesitatingly say that I fully appreciate the position which I hold in this House as a member of parliament, and I believe I have the right to give expression to my opinion upon this subject. I do not feel disposed to submit my judgment beforehand to any body of electors. I claim that, when the time comes, the electors will have the right, as a court of appeal, to express their opinion upon the vote that we shall give. I object to this amendment and oppose it because I do not believe, as it declares, that this Bill changes the relations which exist between this country and England. If the government measure were a direct contribution, then the sacred principle of 'no taxation without representation' would be violated, constitutional relations would be changed, and in that case, I should have absolutely no hesitation in supporting such an amendment as this. But I am opposed to this sub-amendment because I am opposed to government by plebiscite. We have duties to perform as responsible members of this House, and I claim that we should perform them and should not shirk our responsibility. Other men have spoken upon this question of referring the judgment of the member to his electors. I may be permitted to refer for one moment to some words uttered, when addressing his electors of Bristol, by one of the greatest statesmen that Britain ever knew, Rt. Hon. Edmund Burke. He said:

> Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

He said also:

> To deliver an opinion is the right of all men; that of constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear, and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions, mandates issued, which the member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey, to vote, and to argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience, these are things utterly unknown to the laws of this land, and which arise from a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenor of our constitution.

Following that argument of Rt. Hon. Edmund Burke, I say I shall have absolutely no hesitation in recording a vote against the sub-amendment introduced by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).

Now, I come to the Bill. In beginning my remarks on Thursday I said that the time had come when Canada must assume the responsibility of a self-governing nation. We have our militia, which replaces the imperial troops in this country, and, for every British ship that leaves our shores, we shall have a Canadian ship to take its place. We need our ships. I am not one of those who advocate the principle that Canada is protected by the Monroe doctrine. I am too proud of my Canadian citizenship to ever go to the Stars and Stripes and seek aid from a foreign power when we have in this country strong arms ready to hold and defend our own. While I say I do not believe the Monroe doctrine applies in any one letter to this country, yet, even if it did, that is all the more reason for us to proudly hold up our heads as Canadian citizens and say we will protect our own flag with our own ships. The time will come when Canada will realize that the navy is one of the richest assets which this country can possess. It will develop our industries, will open up our mines, will give general employment, and will relieve us from the condition of dependency in which we now find ourselves. Therefore, I say, I have absolutely no hesitation in voting against the sub-amendment and against the amendment of the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) and in favour of the Bill introduced by the government.

Before I resume my seat, and for the sake of accuracy, I wish to refer for a moment to an impression which was thought to be conveyed by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards). I do this, not that I believe it worth while to go back to it, but simply to justify the poor, maligned Conservative party of the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Frontenac, on Wednesday last, quoted from the Winnipeg 'Telegram' a certain article which is not borne out by facts—in short, which is untrue. That article contained these words:

> Five hundred dollars were spent by the Quebec government to distribute this book as prizes among the children of the schools of Quebec.

Mark well the words 'as prizes among the children of the schools of Quebec.' The hon. member refers to Mr. Tardivel's work 'Pour la Patrie.' And the hon. member goes on to say:

> In my estimation, a wrong is accentuated when the legislature of the province of Quebec votes, as it did vote, $300 of public money to buy these books to scatter that treason throughout the province of Quebec.

And I have this further quotation at page 4184 of 'Hansard':

> I assert that $300 of the public money of the province of Quebec was voted for that purpose, and the proof of my assertion will be found in the Votes and Proceedings of the legislature of the province of Quebec for December 3, 1896.

I have no mandate to speak for the Conservative party of the province of Quebec; in fact, I find myself forced very often to speak against that party for some of their acts. I have no doubt that I should have condemned the act which they performed at that time—at that time, I say, at the time when the Conservative Provincial Secretary took from the vote the sum of $300, or perhaps more, to purchase that book, if I thought he had taken it. I know nothing about the book; I am not arguing about the merits or demerits; I did not read it. But if he undertook to distribute it as prizes among the children of Quebec I would have condemned that. But what are the facts? In 1896, the Conservative party was in power in Quebec. The Provincial Secretary was Hon. L. P. Pelletier, a gentleman who is not only usually but always found supporting the Conservative party, and who is its organizer in the province of Quebec. He took the sum of $300 from the money that was voted to purchase prize books in the province of Quebec and he purchased Mr. Tardivel's work, but let me hope that he purchased it in order to destroy it or in order that it might not be circulated in the province of Quebec. I find, Sir, that according to the Votes and Proceedings of the legislature of Quebec on April 5, 1909, a question was asked by Mr. Walker as follows:

1. Did the government of this province ever purchase, for distribution in the public schools, any copies of the work of J. P. Tardivel, called "Pour la Patrie"?

2. If so, how many copies were purchased, at what date, and by whom was the order given?

Answer by Honourable Mr. Roy:

1 and 2. On the 25th September, 1895, the Provincial Secretary, Hon. L. P. Pelletier, purchased 500 copies of Mr. J. P. Tardivel's work, "Pour la Patrie", at 60 cents per copy.

This work was not given as prize books, as appears by the answer given by the Provincial Secretary, not a Liberal Provincial Secretary but by the Provincial Secretary in the Flynn ministry, the Hon. Mr. Hackett, on the 3rd of December, 1896. The purchase price was paid out of the item 'prize books,' in the estimates of public instruction. Do you think by order of the legislature? By order of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec? Not at all, by order of the Provincial Secretary, the chief organizer of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec, the Hon. L. P. Pelletier.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in the course of the remarks which he offered to this House upon the Naval Bill, for some reason or other—and I shall leave it to the judgment of the House what his reason was—made a direct onslaught upon two gentlemen, French Canadians by race, the late Hon. Mr. Mercier, whose memory is held in the highest possible esteem in the province of Quebec, and the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who is honoured and respected in the highest degree in that province. At page 3467 of 'Hansard' the hon. member (Mr. Foster) said:

He (Mr. Mercier) was allied with men in the United States of America, he drew his salary from them, he paid his expenses out of their collections. He travelled the country, as I said, enlisting French Canadians, and men of other nationalities, prominent American citizens, all in favour of the independence of Canada; and along with it was the propagation of continental union, and the union of Canada with the United States.

Further on he says:

Now, I ask my right hon. friend, and I ask this House: What would have happened in this country if my right hon. friend had been successful, and Canada had demanded and had obtained that power? There would have been no guarantee for the union of Canada with the empire for a single five years. It was a demand, not for autonomy, it was a demand for sovereignty, and a sovereignty which, if it were exercised, would make two nations where now there is the mother country and the Dominion under the mother country.

He goes on to quote certain words that were quoted by the right hon. the Prime Minister, and then he concludes:

These were not the outpourings of a youthful and immature imagination, these were the studied statements of an old and seasoned public man.

At page 3468 he says:

Up and down this country he has preached that doctrine. Why? To lessen the respect of a British country for its home country and its home government, to instil the insidious poison into the minds of young and growing citizens that the old country does not know what it is doing and has not treated us fairly. To-night, Sir, I cannot go into the matter of the record of British diplomacy, but I am willing to do it at any time, and I have not much use, I say it straight, I have not much use for a public man representing the highest position in this country who finds nothing better to do than to go up and down this country deriding and misrepresenting British diplomacy and wishing for the day when we may be rid of it.

We can understand the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) using similar language, because he is not supposed to be familiar with the history of Quebec, but I know of no keener, no abler student of political history in this country than the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and I say that it ill-becomes that hon. gentleman to cast any insinuation at all at the right hon. the Prime Minister, or at any French Canadian of the province of Quebec, because he reflects on them when he reflects on Mr. Mercier and the French Canadians who were supposed to have supported him. I take his opinion, and I am sure the people in the province of Quebec will take it at its full value, but I would like to oppose to that opinion the opinion of an eminent British statesman, a man who is really a statesman, I refer now to Earl Dufferin. Earl Dufferin, apparently, could not have been very well acquainted with the hon. member for North Toronto, or the hon. member for North Toronto could not have been very well acquainted with the Earl of Dufferin, because they do not seem to hold the same views on the subject. Let me refer for a moment to Earl Dufferin's words uttered at Windsor on the 18th of August, 1874. I need offer no apology for quoting them in French. He said:

J'ai écouté avec une satisfaction toute particulière l'adresse que vous m'avez fait l'honneur de me présenter. Je suis bien convaincu que nulle part dans la puissance Sa Majesté n'a de sujets plus loyaux, plus fidèles et plus intelligents que ses sujets de race française et je me réjouis de l'occasion qui m'est donnée d'exprimer mon estime et mon respect pour les représentants de ces héroïques pionniers, à la hardiesse desquels nous devons, en grande partie, l'héritage dont nous jouissons.

Mais ce n'est pas à un seul titre que nous sommes obligé envers la race française. Il ne faut pas oublier que c'est à son élévation d'esprit, à son amour de la liberté et à son exacte appréciation des droits civils contenus en germe dans la constitution primitivement accordée par l'Angleterre au Canada, que nous devons le développement de cette autonomie parlementaire dont le pays est fier à si bon droit....

I submit the two opinions to the judgment of this House. I further say that if hon. gentlemen opposite find that the Hon. Mr. Mercier, at one time Prime Minister of Quebec, sinned, at least he sinned not for his own material interest, he sinned through loyalty, and for the people that he loved so well. Let me ask the hon. member who represents North Toronto, and other hon. gentlemen who wish to carry on this warfare against the province of Quebec to study a little into the history of their own party. Are they familiar with a certain manifesto which was published in this country and which was sent broadcast asking not for independence, not that Canada should remain the home of Canadians, but asking for what is described by the words which are found in the sixth clause of that manifesto?

Of all the remedies that have been suggested for the acknowledged and insufferable ills with which our country is afflicted, there remains but one to be considered. It propounds a sweeping and important change in our political and social condition, involving considerations which demand our most serious examination. This remedy consists in a friendly and peaceful separation from British connection and a union upon equitable terms with the great North American confederacy of sovereign states.

A manifesto in favour of annexation with the United States. The hon. member for North Toronto says that he has no use for a man who would proclaim a doctrine in which there could be conceived words asking for the severance of the tie which binds this country to Great Britain. Why, Sir, he would in a moment support such a man if it suited his own interests, because he not only supported, but he formed part of the Cabinet of a man whose signature appears first upon that manifesto. I regret to have to bring his name here, but since hon. gentlemen opposite have gone into the graves of the dead and have brought the dead forth in their struggle against the government and the Prime Minister, I am compelled to say that the hon. member for North Toronto formed part of the government of the hon. Sir John J. C. Abbott, the Conservative Prime Minister of Canada in 1891, whose signature we find first attached to that manifesto asking for annexation to the United States. But, Sir, the hon. member for North Toronto and hon. gentlemen opposite supported that gentleman. They studied and they believed in the doctrine enunciated by two other gentlemen who lived in this country, but who unfortunately are now in their graves. I refer to Sir John Rose, a Conservative Finance Minister of this country, and I refer to Sir A. T. Galt, another great Finance Minister, both members of a Conservative cabinet, both great lights in the Conservative party, and both of whom signed the manifesto asking that the British tie should cease, and that this country should become annexed to the United States.

Some people should read the history of Canada, before casting insinuations right and left at our friends from the province of Quebec. If they value their title of British subjects as much as they appear to do they would learn that if Canada is still a British colony, it is due mainly to the loyalty of the province of Quebec, and it is due mainly to the loyalty of the French Canadian people of that province. It is well known that at the time of the war of Independence, the English population in the province of Quebec was only a handful. The French population was in the great majority. What happened in that year? In 1775 an army invaded Canada under the command of Montgomery and Arnold. That is a well known fact, but, as appears by this discussion, some people never knew, or seem to have forgotten, that this army of English speaking people took three cities in Quebec by surprise attack when they were not defended—the city of Montreal, the city of St. Johns, and the city of Three Rivers. General Carleton, and his name is familiar to every hon. gentleman opposite, was bound to fly from the city of Montreal, and he had to do it during the night time, because the city was in the hands of the Americans. He was taken down the St. Lawrence in a canoe by two French Canadian officers. He could not go by land, because both sides of the St. Lawrence at that time were in the hands of the Americans. They succeeded in bringing him successfully to Quebec, travelling at night on their difficult journey, and Carleton, with the help of a Scotch regiment and French Canadian volunteers under Chabot and Dambourges, organized a defence of the city which was stormed during the night of the 31st December, 1775. It was due to the bravery of these two officers and to Colonel Nairn of the Scotch regiment, that the invaders were repulsed and there ended the campaign. Who can gainsay that if the French Canadians had not taken part in the battle Carleton would not have been able to withstand the invasion of the American people and Canada would have been known to-day as one of the states of the North American continent? But, that is not all. I give this history and I give it willingly that hon. gentlemen opposite may go upon the same platforms where they have been decrying the leaders of political thought in the province of Quebec, and give to their hearers the benefit of some of the history of their own country. During the following year Congress sent over to Canada three men whose names are well known in the history of this country—Franklin, Chase and Carroll —whose mission was to try to persuade the French Canadians to join the rebels. The people, following the advice of their clergy and of the seigneurs who had become attached to British connection and British institutions, refused to join hands with the rebels. Later on Admiral D'Estaing and General Lafayette, appealed to the French Canadians, tried to work on their sentiments and recalled to them the ties of kinship to induce them to fight against the British army which had so recently conquered them, but again the French Canadians were true. What was happening at this time in the province of Quebec—in this disloyal province of Quebec? That great old community the Ursulines so well known throughout this country, under the direction of Monseigneur Saint Onge, the Vicar General, caused to be chanted in the churches the anthem Domine salvum fac regem—Lord preserve the King. Was this disloyalty on the part of Quebec? Are these disloyal acts? Look at the history of the war of 1812, and you will find the same evidence of loyalty and attachment to British institutions brought forth during that war. I have no hesitation in saying that if again the French Canadians in the province of Quebec had not been true to their loyalty to Great Britain and had refused to take part in this war Canada might have become a part of the United States. Refer for a moment to the bravery and courage of de Salaberry with his band of faithful, loyal and courageous French Canadians upon the banks of the Chateauguay. I refer to these facts of history, because I know no time in this discussion when they might be more appropriate. I know of no time in the history of this country when the people displayed to greater advantage their loyalty to British institutions than the year of 1812, when Frenchmen, Englishmen, Irishmen and Scotchmen from the Highlands and the Lowlands joined hands to protect the flag of Canada. So also, if needs be, they will be found together bravely fighting for the flag which waves over this parliament, the emblem of our constitutional rights, sacred to you, sacred to me, protecting all races, protecting all classes and protecting all creeds. Let us live down our prejudices and our passions and unite in upholding the dignity of Canadian citizenship. I beg of all hon. members of this House to cease racial appeals and to place country before province, to place country before party, to place country before self. This land is not the home of the Frenchman, it is not the home of the Englishman, it is not the home of the Scotchman, it is not the home of the Irishman; it is the home of the Canadian. It is a grand heritage that has been bequeathed to us; it is a noble heritage bequeathed unencumbered by sterling patriots; men who have fought for it, men who have died for it. Let us live for it, let us protect it, let us if needs be die for it, that our children may enjoy the same freedom and the same liberties as we have, proud to proclaim their nationality as we are proud to proclaim ours: Citizens of Canada and Canadians, first and always.

Mr. C. A. MAGRATH (Medicine Hat). The hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) who last spoke is possessed of a very excellent virtue; he is sensitive as to anything that may be said against his province or the character of her people. As I am practically a native of that same province, having lived there my earlier years, I must confess that I too am somewhat sensitive in that regard. I believe, however, that the hon. member (Mr. Devlin) was over sensitive when he imagined that the hon. gentleman from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) in his address the other evening had been attacking the people of the province of Quebec. I did not so understand him; I considered that his criticisms were levelled more against some political methods that he believed prevailed in that province, methods which are not good for the people of that province or for the people of any other portion of Canada. I did not follow the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) very closely in his remarks but I understood him to say that the book published by Mr. Tardivel had not been distributed as prizes to school children but that the edition had been brought up, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Devlin) told us that the gentleman who purchased it was a Conservative. I must say that I commend that gentleman's conduct in that respect.

Now, Sir, this debate has dragged along for some weeks and it is evident from the appearance of the House that it feels it has heard enough of the subject. In some respects that may be so, but so far as I am concerned I have not yet heard as to what this proposed navy is going to mean to the people of Canada, or, the relationship which is going to exist between it and their pockets. Now, Mr. Speaker, some months ago I was to a slight extent brought into the limelight because I had the hardihood to go out and talk to the public on this question, and ventured to express what appeared to me to be some very ordinary common sense views on the navy situation; views that were primarily directed against the construction of any local navy. I was quoted in some journals as wishing to contribute $10,000,000 to the motherland, the contribution to be spread over a period of some few years. It is true that I used these figures but did so purely for the purpose of illustrating my idea. I assumed that our government had some clear and definite idea as to what this new navy departure was going to mean to our tax-payers, but up to the present I have failed to glean any very intelligent idea as to that feature of the question. Our government had this matter before it for some months when parliament assembled in November last, and we were allowed to remain here for nearly two months, we were allowed to leave for the Christmas holidays and up to that time our government had not the courage to come out into the open and expose their plan to the public upon whose shoulders they are placing this burden whatever it may turn out to be. I assumed that our government would be able to inform the people that this project had certain definite things in view, the accomplishment of which would mean a certain expenditure. I assumed we were aiming to assist in overcoming an emergency, of which, I will speak presently, and as Canada is not engaged in the building of warships, nor am I particularly anxious to see her engage in such an industry—it appeared to me, the only thing we could do was to make our proposed expenditure by way of contribution spread over some few years so that the burden might rest as lightly as possible upon the shoulders of our tax-payers. I was not attempting to lay down any naval policy for this country; I was and I still am strongly opposed to any local navy project until we at least know if the British empire is going to be launched on some more stable basis than that of sentiment alone. And, Sir, for my purpose in discussing this matter from that point of view, $10,000 would have served equally as well as $10,000,000.

The right hon. the Prime Minister does not appear to be very sure of his ground in the matter of imperialism. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am an imperialist—that is, if it means one who believes in the firm welding together of the British people on a permanent basis. Unlike the right hon. gentleman I shall discuss present day conditions in dealing with this question. I am not going back to the wars of the Roses, I will not concern myself about the vagaries of Peter the Hermit, nor shall I theorize as to the results on the development of the Anglo Saxon people, had Julius Cæsar when he landed on the coast of Britain been encased in woollen socks. And, yet Sir, if I should so disport myself I would be as near the subject under consideration as the right hon. gentleman was during three-fourths of his address. I repeat Sir, I am an imperialist, because I believe from the very depths of my soul it is best for us and best for civilization. I suppose I should make that admission with bated breath as there are some few men in this country—and now my thoughts are very far from the right hon. gentleman—men who take themselves more seriously than do their fellows; men who strut our streets and imagine the cosmopolitan population landing on the shores of this country, are ready to kneel and cry out: We want to share your citizenship, when as a matter of fact, if they are even being noticed it is probably with the thought, expressed in the vernacular: Those guys are struck on themselves. Sir, in the upbuilding of a young country a necessary factor is that spirit found in the imperialist; men filled with a desire to unite their race; men who are active in the assimilation of the people who come to the shores of their country, and unlike some of these others, to whom I have referred, who might as well remain in bed the entire 24 hours for all the use they are in that respect and who have to put out their hands to feel so as to discover if they are awake.

Sir, that spirit is as necessary in Cuba as in the British empire. Where is there a greater evidence of that spirit than in the United States of America? See what they have accomplished in binding together the elements that have drifted thither. Then, Sir, we occasionally hear some snears cast at the waving of the flag. In that respect I think we can take a few lessons from the United States. When we realize that the vast masses of immigrants landing on the shores of that country must naturally regard the flag as so many yards of material, and that they are there but a few years when they commence to appreciate the benefits they receive under that flag, and soon are joining in the procession that keeps it afloat. In a new country, it is absolutely necessary for us to keep the flag before the people. I do not want to be offensive to anybody in regard to the waving of flags, but if we feel that a national emblem is of any consequence in this world, I do not see that we should be ashamed of it.

I do not know what the right hon. gentleman's conception of imperialism is; but I do know that he has seen fit to cast slurs at those who have an abiding faith in it; I do know that he has referred to the Pharisees of imperialism. Still, I am not aware that one holding the high and important position of premier of Canada adds to his cause by such methods. If, however, it pleases him, if he feels it is going to bolster up this peculiar naval measure with the people of Canada, then he and I have formed very different estimates of the character of our citizens.

I am not going to discuss the material benefits that accrue to Canada as a member of the British empire, as I believe all hon. gentlemen are of one mind in that respect. If there are selfish reasons why we should be in that empire to-day, it appears to me that there are the same reasons why we should go down into the future as a member of that family. If it is to the advantage of the sovereign states of New York and California, situated as they are some five days apart in the matter of travel, to be firmly fixed in the same union, it appears to me that there are equally good reasons why Great Britain and Canada should be likewise situated. If it is to the advantage of New York and California to have a single navy, I cannot see why that same principle will not equally well apply to Great Britain and Canada. While the ocean may not be receding, it certainly is being rapidly narrowed in the matter of the time it takes to cross it. In the current of this young country's life there will be many shoals and many rapids to pass over; and instead of guiding it by clean, strong and wise statesmanship, the only evidence I can see is that it is not only allowed, but actually encouraged to drift on towards the rocks of independence, while our government chants some dirge about autonomy very much like the Indian who feels that he is warding off some evil spirit by singing a few meaningless phrases as he jogs past some cemetery.

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming nearer to the question under consideration, what is the situation in Europe to-day? There, there are some 415 millions of people, some few millions of whom have never known a full stomach, and yet the very vitals are being ground out of them by the tax gatherer for the upkeep of armaments for the maintenance of peace. What an extraordinary situation! There are only two positions open to those nations. They must recede from the position they are taking or with taxes bounding upward, the breaking point will be reached, which means bankruptcy, which means fight to wipe their fellows off the face of the earth. There is an extraordinary condition of things on that continent. I say there is an emergency. When we find the two political parties of Great Britain practically receding from the methods of taxation which have been in force for many years in order to extract more money from the taxpayers for the purposes of the navy, then it appears to me we have that dollars and cents argument that an emergency does exist, and an argument which we cannot overlook. It was this condition that awakened the several elements of the British empire last spring, and it is this condition which is responsible for the Bill now before us, whatever it may be. I wish to lay down an axiom, that Canada as Canada, with her comparatively small population of seven million people, with her vast natural resources requiring all the men and the monetary energies that we can command for the development of the country, for the betterment of the conditions of the people that we have and for preparing for the people that we hope to receive—I say that Canada, standing alone to-day, has as much need of a navy as a resident of Hades has of a buffalo overcoat. But Canada lies within British North America, and we are British subjects. Then it is not only a question of duty but of decency for us to go to the aid of the British people, a people who during the past hundred years or more have contributed at least $500,000,000 to the welfare of this country. It is, therefore, a duty that we owe ourselves, a duty that we owe to the empire of which we form no inconsiderable part, and, on higher grounds, it is a duty we owe to civilization. The greatest calamity that could happen to the human family would be the disintegration of the British empire. It would mean the putting back of the hands of civilization. Great Britain cannot be permitted to go under. Britain has her faults; so has every individual who goes to the making up of the smallest community; but Britain has been standing out for the best in mankind. Her doors have been open to the religious and politically oppressed of every European nation. Hers are a free people, a self-governed people. The great nation to the south of us is a free people, a self-governed people. Free people cannot be permitted to go under. I hold it would be the duty of Great Britain to go to the aid of that great nation to the south of us if its life was in any way endangered. The best thought in the United States realize that Britain's strength must remain unimpaired. They know as well as we know, that if disintegration should set in, in the British family, the white man's burden would be thrown within narrower limits for support. Then Canada has a part in this very serious matter, and we should act promptly, and above all, act efficiently, and without committing this young country to any definite policy of a Canadian navy.

A Canadian navy would not, in my opinion, be in the best interests of this country, or meet the want of the moment. The present stress and trial through which Britain is striving, cannot last many years; and my cry is, let the over-seas dominions put their shoulders to the wheel and push the motherland through this emergency, thereby giving other nations clearly and distinctly to understand that it is absolutely useless for them to attempt to jeopardize the life of the British people. But above all things, I am convinced we should not now attempt to saddle on this young country any Canadian navy proposition, especially when we can render much greater and more effective service by the proposed contribution to the British navy and at a greatly reduced cost to our taxpayers. Have I any justification for that statement? It is only necessary to refer to the first paragraph of the British admiralty report, in which it is declared clearly that the maximum effect at the minimum cost can only be obtained through a central navy. And the report then goes on to say, that owing to political and other consderations, some of the oversea dominions cannot support a central navy. Then for the first time the question of separate navy units is discussed.

For my part, I cannot quite understand what is meant by political and other considerations. Some gentlemen oppose a plan of contribution on the ground that it is unfair for us to ask the British people to do our share of the fighting, while others take the view that we cannot afford to send our taxes to Britain for the building and upkeep of a navy. I am not disposed to quarrel with either of these sentiments. As the matter appeals to me, the British navy is built, operated and controlled in and from the British islands, simply because the British taxpayer supplies the money; surely it must appeal to us that if the various elements of the British empire should decide to support a central navy, conditions would be at once changed and that navy would pass out of the sphere of a British navy and become imperial in character..

There is only one place where a man puts his money and does not follow it. That is in charitable work. But this is not a question of charity. It is a question of insuring our existence on this sphere, it is a question of protecting our own commerce or, to put it in another way I might say it is a question of returning to the motherland but a moiety of the vast sums she has expended on our behalf at various periods in our history when we were unable to help ourselves. Therefore I cannot see how intelligent people can conceive that by supporting a central navy our money would be expended in England alone. That position appears similar to the one taken by an individual who, on being invited to join in a large enterprise, refused because, having no voice in its management before he invested therein, by some peculiar reasoning reached the conclusion that he would have nothing to say in its direction afterwards, and that man wandered down the wayside and started a corner grocery of his own.

In short, if the British navy should become an imperial navy, it will be built, operated and controlled in and from the British empire, and its moneys expended in the erection of docks throughout the empire while contracts will be given for the construction of vessels wherever facilities have been created for such purposes. The taxpayer in Canada is not particularly concerned about owning fighting ships. What we want now is something that will have the greatest fighting capacity for the least money, and that we can only have through the British navy; I cannot conceive how any Canadian would fail to point with pride to the British navy and say that is my navy, and I venture the opinion that that is the navy to which some of those adherents of a Canadian navy would rush to get behind in the event of any trouble. This young country has neither the means nor the energy to waste in buying experience on the high seas.

Some hon. gentlemen have taken the attitude that because we have our land forces, we should have our sea forces. The two are not analogous. Our land forces operate within our own territory; they are always at home. Sea forces operate within the barn yard of the nations of the earth, where the one people put up the one front on the one sea. We have heard a good deal during the course of this debate about a section in our Militia Act which provides that our militia shall not leave Canada without the consent of the Canadian government. I am not particularly concerned about that feature, but some hon. gentlemen seem to think that, because it is in our Militia Act, it should be in this Naval Act. We all know that our land forces can only assist Britain in land wars. And Britain's land wars have in recent years been practically wars of colonization. They have been wars which never really endangered her life. Take, for instance, the South African war, which was carried on for months and years. Her life was never really threatened during that conflict; but any man who does his own thinking must realize that the moment Britain fires the first gun in her defence on the high seas, from that moment until the trouble is ended, her life will be hanging by a very slender thread. We all know that no nation or combination of nations will undertake to challenge her on the high seas unless they felt confident that they can cripple her, and we ought to know that the back of a naval war might be broken inside of six days. And here we have before us a Navy Bill which undertakes to provide that Canada's navy will not go to the aid of the mother country until this parliament is assembled, and we, in our wisdom, pass upon the justice of Britain's cause. To my mind the proposition is a preposterous one. I say in all seriousness to the right hon. gentleman that I do not believe it would be possible to bring a measure into this House containing a more objectionable feature. My doctrine, as a British subject, is that wherever we may be on the face of the earth, we should 'pull, pull together, in all kinds of weather'; and my policy, as a British subject, is to jump into the breach and go to the aid of my fellow British subject, wherever on this earth he is, and discuss the righteousness of his cause afterwards. Before I would accept that feature in this Bill, I would throw down my British citizenship and take up some other. No matter what government presented that most objectionable feature to me, I would not take it in that shape, because it puts a bar to our giving aid to the mother country, which would make us absolutely helpless. Any assistance we may be able to give is one which can only be of use when Britain is threatened on the high seas, and the assistance provided in this measure would be utterly useless in such an emergency. And to advance the argument that because such a feature is in the Militia Act, and should be in our Naval Bill is preposterous as conditions are entirely different. I trust I have made myself clear in that respect.

Coming back to the question, which after all appeals to our taxpayers, that is, the question of cost, by the contribution asked for in the amendment of the leader of the opposition, we know exactly what we are giving and where it ends as well as the positive service it will render. By the government proposition now before us, the future is a sealed book. What it involves, our taxpayers cannot know. The expenditure will be a growing and a most serious one. Again I repeat we have no money for such experiments. But some gentlemen will say: You are providing for the present emergency. I say, Sir, is not that enough? Let us turn our eyes inward and continue to develop this vast country. The British empire must get down to some business arrangement, if it is going to stand, and if that does not come before another emergency we can meet it as British subjects should. I wish to say with all the force within me that we Canadians are dealing too much in theories; we are dreaming pleasant dreams. Gentlemen pass through this land and tells us that we are a wonderful people. But the vastness of our virgin wealth will be an obstacle to our becoming a strong, clean people, unless we are cautious. And, we continue to dream on. 'We are making our own treaties,' and the same authority in the next breath will tell us that we are 'one of the sister nations.' These two ideas do not harmonize with my view of the situation. I realize that we must control our own domestic matters. I realize that we know better than those outside of Canada what we have to trade and what we want in return. But I realize that there must be some revising board within the empire to pass on our negotiations before they become effective; otherwise we shall get out of the British empire. If all the sister nations are to make treaties, to do as they see fit, then the end of that empire is in sight. In my judgment we have reached a point in empire development, when one final forward step is necessary for us to become a great empire world power. Changes come rapidly in these days. Who will prophesy as to what will occur in the next ten or twenty years? I believe they will be most momentous in the history of the British empire. Therefore, let us not try to push too far into the future in this matter.

So far as Canada is concerned, it is not a theory that faces us, but as Cleveland once remarked, it is a condition, that confronts us. The fact that some gentlemen in London hold the opinion that what is good for Australia is equally good for this country—a separate naval unit—only shows, in my opinion, that those men are not familiar with Canadian conditions. It is not the London view point that we should pay the greatest heed to as that is practically uniform as respects the various elements of the empire, but it is the individual viewpoint of each of the dominions that must be carefully scrutinized and studied if we hope to maintin the integrity of the British empire. Canada is not an island like Australia whose new people from the moment they land on her shores are for ever separated from their old associations and old political affiliations. Canada lies side by side —nay, to a certain extent, is surrounded by—one of the largest and greatest nations on earth, peopled by probably the greatest aggregation of intelligence to be found within the confines of any country in the world. Of course, that does not injure us. Canada's immigration, which is to make Canada large and populous is to come largely through, or from the United States of America. We cannot get away from that. If there were time, I believe I could satisfy any hon. member as to the soundness of that view. There, then is the condition with which we Canadians are sleeping today.

Mr. Archibald Carey Coolidge, a prominent political economist associated with Harvard University, in a recently published book, 'The United States as a World Power,' refers to Canada, and to Canada's future. Mr. Coolidge has reached the conclusion that 'Canadian public opinion is inclined to look forward to ultimate independence, with friendship and perhaps alliance with Greater Britain.'

Japan is an independent country and an ally of Great Britain. Is that the destiny some gentlemen have marked out for this important country? I believe that Mr. Coolidge is justified in reaching his conclusion. He is standing outside this country, without any interest here, looking inwards, forming his opinion, not, unfortunately, from meeting our people, but from the views which are expressed from time to time by our public men, some of whom, especially some members of our government who do not appear to be able to get on any public platform without making some reference to Canada as a 'nation.' Before giving Mr. Coolidge's views on western Canada, let me point out to the House that our immigrants are settling east of the great lakes, are locating around our important cities, where their political sentiments can be moulded and controlled, that is leavened by the centres to which they attach themselves. But that is not the situation in western Canada, where our new people are spreading out over a vast area, building up their own centres of population, and carrying into them their own political sentiments. Mr. Coolidge is willing to admit that some portions of eastern Canada are loyal to British institutions. Here, however, is what he has to say with reference to the people settling on our western plains. Speaking of loyalty to Britain, he says:

> It is an exotic plant, too delicate to flourish in such soil. In these new regions, with their mixed population imbued with a materialism of frontier life, the whole tone is latter date American rather than English. The people are too matter of fact, too much taken up with their everyday affairs, to indulge in such luxuries as loyalty to a distant throne ; to them it seems very unreal sentimentality.

Now, Sir, Mr. Coolidge has failed, in my opinion, to grasp the true conception of the situation. It is not a question, in the British empire, of loyalty to thrones, but it is the reality of a constitution which allows free people of every race, every tongue and every creed to stand together on the highest known plane of citizenship. And, if the millennium were here, no further steps would be necessary to bind together the self-governing element of the empire more closely than they are today. Our new people do not come to us from any knowledge they possess of our constitution, and our American citizens do not leave the United States from any dissatisfaction with that country's constitution. They make good ciizens. But there is a citizenship in the British empire different from any other in the world. He who goes to Australia will be essentially an Australian; he who comes to Canada will be essentially a Canadian until we show them what our enlarged citizenship means. To what extent are we engaged in doing that work? Absolutely nothing that I can see when we have our public men talking so much about 'Canada as a nation.' I say that if we want to remain in the British empire, if we want to be a living, burning entity in the empire, standing out for peace in this world, if we want to push forward civilization, then we must become more active in bringing together the various elements of the empire into some closer compact than mere ties of friendship, which is practically the condition to-day. And if we do that we will have less time to prate about 'Canada as a nation,' 'Canada making her own treaties,' and 'the one final act in the rounding off of our nationhood.' Loyalty based on sentiment, is doubtless, of the highest order, and if nations grow by natural means, that is by an excess of births over deaths, that loyalty will seep down through many generations, but where ethnical conditions are in an almost constant state of change as is the condition in Canada today and will be in the younger elements of the empire, then we will have to weave in with that friendship, some business into the empire fabric, if it is to stand.

Now, Sir, doubtless I will be accused of wishing to deny Canada the right to hold up her head and proudly proclaim herself a nation. I will be accused, Sir, of wishing to deny Canadians what the Patagonians possess. I understand some hon. gentlemen opposite have referred to what the Patagonians are accomplishing in the matter of a navy. I am not aware that the Patagonians have been advanced in scale of importance among the peoples of the world because they can say their country is independent of any other. I am not aware that the rounding off of Patagonian nationality by means of its toy navy has added to its pre-eminence though that is practically the view that one member of our government has taken in connection with this proposed Canadian navy. I do not wish to deny any one the right of a membership in a nation. As a Canadian citizen I am a member of the British nation and I venture the opinion if some of those gentlemen who are so anxious to talk about our nationhood should find themselves in Russia, and their rights being invaded the talisman they would employ would be I am of the British nation. They would not be shoving forward at that particular moment any idea of Canada's nationhood. This is but an instance of the value of that citizenship which some people in this country appear to be only too anxious to shove into the background. The word 'nation' is quite unnecessary in its application to Canada at the present time. We know we are a free people, a self-governed people. How can we explain to our new people that we are of the British nation while we are pouring into their ears all this talk about Canadian nationhood. There is no necessity to play with words or phrases. The right hon. gentleman has frequently become poetic in referring to the attitude of Canada to the empire, an attitude which he has affirmed of filial affection. When we realize that our doors are wide open we must realize that the household will become filled with step-children and adopted ones and that filial affection to which he has referred will probably find itself in a heap in the back yard. The methods in vogue are not likely to instil very much filial affection in our adopted children.

I have already given my reason for supporting this contribution, because in the present emergency it renders the motherland the most effective aid at the least cost to our taxpayers. I am opposed to a Canadian navy because we do not want any such extravagant appendage at the present time. I am opposed to it on the still more important ground that I regard it as a step away from the motherland, I cannot see that it is a step closer. I look on it as a step towards disintegration in the British family. Some hon. gentlemen will say no, but they must realize that there are men in this country who believe that Canada is to be an independent country, and of them there is a certain proportion who feel that it is our duty to do something now. I venture the opinion that every one of these gentlemen will be found holding up his hands for a Canadian navy so that to use the phrase attributed to the right hon. gentleman, when the fruit is sufficiently ripe to drop from the tree Canada will step out as a nation with her full-fledged navy. If through our vain-glory, I will not add hypocrisy, though at times I am disposed to doubt our own sincerity, if we continue to dream on, if we fail to begin right now to knit the steel into the concrete which is going into the structure we are upbuilding on this North American continent. If, in short, Sir, through our sins of omission, we and the other self-governing elements of the empire fail to do our duty and the glory of that empire, upon which the sun never sets, be allowed to pass away, thereby causing the people who will then control the destinies of this land to work out its national status, I say that in this age of centralizing of power which is growing stronger year by year, the result will be a fusion with the great nation to the south of us.

An important question for consideration is, what are we Canadians looking forward to, are we not building a structure on this continent? If so, what is it to be. An intelligent builder, from the moment he puts his hand to the foundation, has some clear idea as to his ultimate aim. Is Canada going to be permanently fixed in the British empire or is she to withdraw from that empire, dreaming of an independence which will ultimately lead to absorption by the United States. If that is our view let us be honourable and get out now. If we are to take the purely animal view, let us retire from that empire and put aside all ideas of a navy, imperial or otherwise, as under existing conditions, with our present resources this country does not need a navy. I feel that the proper place for us is to be firmly fused into the British empire, and it is to that end I wish to see Canada, the premier dominion, work. The other elements of the empire will surely follow us. If we believe that the civilization of Britain has reached as advanced a stage as that of any other country in the world, if we believe that Britain has been standing out for the best in mankind, then realizing that the stronger that people is made, the stroner these influences for peace will grow, it seems to me our duty as a people is quite plain. The question which has absolutely no answer to me is where better could the Canadian people find themselves than in the ranks of such a family.

May I be permitted to indulge my fancies for a few moments. Is there any visible reason why Britain and her first-born on this continent could not be now living in the same union. It was not the Boston tea party alone that was responsible for that unfortunate separation. There were dissentions among the colonies, there were vain glories then with a single eye to local importance only. If, however, mistakes had not been made on both sides, and those two peoples had continued together down through the last century, what would be the situation to-day? Simply this, instead of having two powerful nations standing out separately for practically the same principles, we would have their forces united, and whatever influences there are for peace to-day those influences would be practically doubled. With such unity existing who is there to suggest that America would be sending taxes to England for the building and upkeep of navies? Who is there to suggest that the United States would be asking England to do her share of the fighting? It might mean that while Britain's domestic affairs would be handled at Westminster, imperial matters would be dealt with more frequently at Washington than at London. In the days of the separation England and America were removed by a long and perilous sea voyage of fifty to seventy-five days. If that position had remained constant the United States might have remained insular, but conditions have changed and she has become a great world power. Her founders could not foresee that situation any more than we can see what is ahead of our people. Distances are measured by the time it takes to overcome them. Britain and Canada are closer to-day than the exterior members of the thirteen colonies were a century ago.

Let us not try to disguise the outcome of this navy move. It is the result of a desire on the part of certain citizens to do something to help the motherland. I cannot congratulate the government upon the manner in which they have met that request. I realize the force of Mr. Bourassa's statement, that if Canada is to take part in Britain's wars she must have something to say in the making and settlement of them. It appears as if there will have to be some systematic business arrangement within the empire as it will not stand on sentiment alone, and if we cannot see its solution clearly to-day, it will unfold itself, if we press forward having our minds resolutely made up, that its accomplishment will be best for us and best for civilization. Then, that accomplished, there will in course of time, be fusions with other people in the great march forward of civilization. We are pushing into the forefront a Canadian navy with no intelligent idea where it will be found in the event of certain emergencies. It might be the very instrument to drive us out of the empire if we should refuse its aid to other elements of the empire. Sir, I consider that we are starting at the wrong end. Let the self-governing elements of the empire first decide the responsibility to be accepted by each, in the event of trouble and follow that up with some unified policy for naval development within the empire. Then it will be time enough to talk about a Canadian unit of the imperial navy. Meanwhile let us refrain from taking any step which will make the accomplishment of that desirable end more difficult than it is at the present time and evidently it is difficult judging from the manner in which this Bill has been brought before us.

Now, Sir, to repeat, if Great Britain is forced into a naval war her life is in jeopardy it is our duty to give her effective aid. The Russo-Japanese war is sufficient evidence that naval engagements are not advertised in advanced-like auctions. The only indication of a possible war is the evidence of activity on the part of other nations, we can have absolutely no confidence in their professions during these trying times. The British taxpayer knows that. We have the dollars and cents arguments to which I have referred. That is sufficient evidence for me. I do not want to take any more chances, and therefore, wish to put on some more insurance by throwing into the fighting line a couple of Dreadnoughts. Then I say let us turn our faces inward and continue the development of this country. We have heard some vague rumours that the starting of this Canadian navy is going to develop the shipbuilding industry in Canada. I see no objection to encouraging the building of docks as well as the development of our merchant marine. If that service has not been keeping pace with the development of our inland transportation lines, there is good reason for it. We know that we cannot find sufficient money to enable us to engage in developing all the varied interests in this vast country. The natural result is that those interests are allowed to remain stationary, which can be supplied by sources outside of the country. If there are merchant ships of other countries available to carry our products it is altogether likely our merchant marine will not be actively developed until we are looking for opportunity to invest capital. That, however, is not to-day, but it will surely come. And, for my part, I cannot see that by having shipyards constructing the few naval vessels which our government say will be ready in five years, that that is going to force forward the development of our merchant marine. Do some hon. gentlemen opposite believe a few capitalists walking by our navy yards will be attracted by the sound of hammers and like children gazing at a shop window loaded with toys, go in and order a few vessels. After all, Sir, it is an economic question. And, so far as Germany is conecrned I have had nothing to say about the German scare. I will say this, however, that no nation should be allowed to develop both fighting arms to the highest efficiency. Germany has the greatest army in the world and unquestionably she is ambitious to have a navy equal to the most powerful on the seas. If she is allowed to reach that point she at once becomes a menace to the rest of Europe. To whom in Europe will she be a real menace? Any school child knows that it is Britain, because outside of Britain she can now practically dictate her terms to any of the other nations.

In concluding my remarks there is another feature to which I will briefly refer, and that is Canada, in years gone by, has appealed to the United States for reciprocity, but without success. The next request, I believe, will come from our friends to the south of us and perhaps much earlier than we imagine. Now, I realize that it is not our place to interfere in the politics of Great Britain, but I would like some of our free trade friends in Britain to keep that feature in view when studying Canadian conditions, and upon which I have attempted to throw some light to-day. Again I say there is too much drifting, too much running to political corners to sift out the winds of temporary political advantage too much placing of ears to the ground to listen for the rumblings of discontented vote manipulators, too little thought of great principles and the willingness to go down and out for them, too little effort to create a strong healthy public opinion in this country to deal intelligently with all large issues. The next few years will determine whether the British empire is going to enter upon the greatest epoch-making period of its history, the greatest epoch-making period in the history of the world. Canada had an epoch-making period. I refer to the days immediately preceding confederation. There is a confederacy in the balance, greater than the world has ever seen. And it is for us to do our duty—to-day, not to-morrow, it may then be too late. I say then, let us play up! play up! and play the game as members of the great British family.

Sir, we are engaged in the building of a ship—the empire. Civilization also demands the strengthening of the union of the elements of that empire throughout this world, therefore let our constant cry be:

Sail on, O ship of state!
Sail on, O union strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations upon this question, I feel encouraged to do so from the importance that has been given to the subjects by the leaders on both sides of this House. We have the authority of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) for saying that this is the biggest and most important question that has come before this House for the last 25 years. I do not quarrel with the hon. leader of the opposition in the position which he has arrived at upon that point. But, referring to the observations of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Magrath) I have very little quarrel with him when he says that he is an imperialist in the sense of being loyal to British institutions and in addition loyal to Canadian institutions as far as they contribute to our strength in our connection with the mother country. He cannot be any stronger in this regard than I am. Therefore, in lauding himself, or his party upon that ground, I have no quarrel with him. I have not come across any member of the Liberal party in this country who has failed in his support of these principles. But the hon. gentleman thinks that on the government side we have not shown a great deal of courage in dealing with this question. Well, Sir, if courage means that we are taking the initiative, that we are prepared to put a measure through this House upon our own convictions, I think that we possibly were more courageous than the hon. gentlemen opposite who say that they cannot undertake anything until they can ascertain what their respective constituents have to say about it. The proper principle is that statesmen, that leaders, should lead public opinion and not that public opinion should lead statesmen.

If we are doing what is right, there is no occasion for us to go back to our people to direct us. They have sent us here to do the business of Canada, and it is our duty to carry out their mandate. Now, there were a few things said by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Magrath) to which I call attention. Sir, in loyalty to the British empire and in strong conviction as to the necessity for maintaining British institutions, the Liberal party are as strong believers as is the hon. gentleman. He tells us there is an emergency, that there is danger to Great Britain, and that something should be done on the spur of the moment, and suppose we do accept his advice and hand $25,000,000 over to the British authorities, the idea no doubt would be that they should start to build a Dreadnought. But do gentlemen on the other side say that Great Britain has not money enough to build Dreadnoughts as fast as she can build them; do they assert that the British exchequer is exhausted, and that, therefore, we must turn on the tap, as some would say? Why, Britain has abundance of money to build her warships as rapidly as she can build them, and it is, therefore, unnecessary for us to give aid in money. Would it be any proof of our loyalty if we gave this contribution? Does any Conservative member in this House assert that Britain does not believe in the loyalty of the Canadian people, and that it is necessary to come with a sacrifice of $25,000,000 and place it on the altar to prove our loyalty? I am as anxious about Canadian loyalty and British supremacy as any man in Canada, but I do not believe there is any emergency. I do not believe that the supremacy of Great Britain requires this money, nor do I believe that it is necessary to prove our loyalty to His Gracious Majesty the King or to the people of the motherland. We have shown our loyalty whenever the occasion arose, and we will show it again when it is demanded from us. Are we of the family of the empire, or have we to go aobut guessing what the conditions are? What would you say of a son who is told that his father is ill and needs a physician, and who would think it necessary to go about the streets to ascertain from strangers if the report be true, instead of ascertaining the facts in his father's house? Have we not political institutions in this country in close touch with the political institutions of Great Britain; have we not the King's government in Canada as well as in the motherland, and can we not learn directly what are the necessities of Britain without seeking haphazard to find them out second-hand? If there is need in England, why proclaim it from the housetops, when we can know it privately through the machinery of government, and if help is wanted Canada will give her help in the proper way and through the proper channels.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the hon. gentleman expect the English people to come to Canada as beggars for a contribution?

Mr. McKENZIE. If Canada is one of the family of British nations; if Canada is a substantial part of British territory, governed by His Majesty the King, and if the protection of the great empire requires a contribution from Canada, then, Sir, I would not regard it as an act of beggary that the motherland should ask our aid; when the hon. gentleman calls it beggary I resent such a term. I would not regard it as beggary; I would regard it as a duty on our part.

Mr. LENNOX. Or the payment of tribute.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not talking about tribute, and when I come to talk about tribute I can do so without any unseemly interruptions from hon. gentlemen who seem to be here for no other purpose than to interrupt members on this side when they are addressing the House.

Mr. LENNOX. I ask the hon. gentleman's permission to speak for a moment. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that during this debate I have not interrupted a single gentleman until I made the interjection just now, which I am very glad appears to have annoyed the hon. member very much.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the hon. gentleman —I forget the county he misrepresents— thinks it is his duty to let every one else go without interruption and to interrupt me, that does not help the situation very much. My experience with the hon. gentleman is that he was never in this House when I spoke but he interrupted me, and if he turns up 'Hansard' he can prove that this statement is correct.

Mr. LENNOX. That is a compliment to you.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not regard his interruption as anything at all. I do not regard his interruption as intellectual or otherwise, and if he chooses to indulge in interrupting me, and if he thinks that I am a person that he can with impunity interrupt it does not bother me at all. Well, Sir, as I was proceeding to say when interrupted, if the government of Great Britain needs any assistance from the Dominions beyond the seas we have a perfect right to expect that that necessity will be made known to us through the proper channels, and then it will be time for us to act. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Magrath) has said much more that I wish to criticise, but I would direct attention to the very striking difference between himself and his leaders on this question. He says there is no more need for a navy in Canada than for a man to wear a buffalo coat in Hades. The hon. gentleman has chosen to put it in that very forceful language, but I would remind him that there are some who describe Hades as an extremely cold place and possibly a buffalo coat may not be too much of a burden for the hon. gentleman to carry if he expects to travel in that direction. Now, as to the difference between the hon. gentleman (Mr. Magrath) and his leaders. Last year the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) brought down a resolution to this House—a resolution which was on the order paper for months, and which he had plenty of time to consider—setting forth that the time had come when the people of Canada should provide a navy for the protection of Canada and for Canada only. It may be said by him that what he meant was not only the protection of Canada, but the protection of every part of the empire.

If there was any lingering doubt on that point, he made it perfectly clear when, in speaking in this House on the tenth of this month, he said that he had nothing in his mind when he moved his resolution except the protection of Canada. The hon. leader of the opposition spoke on this subject a little over a year ago, and again a little over a month ago, and in one of his speeches he committed himself to every word uttered by the hon. member for North Toronto, saying that that hon. member had spoken by his authority, and with his approval. We have thus the hon. leader of the opposition approving of Canada having a navy, and for the protection of Canada alone. Therefore, when the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath) says that there is no more necessity for this navy than there is for an inhabitant of Hades to have a buffalo coat, he is going very far from the leadership of these hon. gentlemen.

Other hon. gentlemen made some observations to which I wish to make some slight reference before coming to the main question which I wish to discuss. We were given a great treat of constitutional law a few evenings ago by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan). He put himself forward as a great constitutional lawyer, and gave us to understand that the passing of a Naval Bill in the shape of this Bill would be disrupting the empire and in direct violation of the Canadian constitution. In support of that contention, he offered an argument which he thought put the whole thing in a nutshell, so that nothing more could be said about it. He had it completely proven by reading section 15 of the British North America Act, which says:

The command-in-chief of the land and naval militia, and of all land and naval forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

The hon. gentleman has very little knowledge of the force and effect of constitutional law and usage in this country if he thinks that the mere fact of these words being in the British North America Act gives any greater power to the King to control any public property in this country. For example, the highways of my province, as I presume in the province of Ontario, are vested in the King. Is anybody silly enough to say that the King could put fences across the public highways or streets and keep people from using them, because, forsooth, the title to them is in the King? The Crown lands in my province, as I presume in the province of Ontario, are vested in the King. So are the public lands in the Northwest. Does anybody say that that simple fact gives the King any right or control over them? They are simply vested in the King as the trustees of the people, subject to the control and management of the representatives of the people, acting through this House, through the provincial legislatures and through the various municipal bodies down to the minutest part of the machinery of government in this country. Is there any different law to apply to a navy? Because the military and naval militia are vested in the King, does that mean that the King can order these forces to war, and that they must automatically go wherever he may point? Nothing of the kind. The same principle of ownership applies as in the case of the Crown lands. If the hon. gentleman who, with such a flourish of trumpets, read this fifteenth section of the British North America Act, would just turn over a few pages and read section 91 of the same Act, he would come to a different conclusion, if he was capable of reaching any logical conclusion from any set of facts. That section says:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated.

Mr. McKENZIE.

Then it gives twenty-nine different subsections, the seventh of which is 'militia, military and naval service and defence.' That section covers the subject before us at the present time, and is a straight and positive mandate from the parliament of Great Britain to deal with this very subject. I say again that this question of military and naval service is not a new one in this country, because if it were not a live question at the time of confederation, would we not find it provided for in this Act? That, as far as the law is concerned, ought to satisfy my hon. friend from Vancouver that there is no foundation for the objection he raised as to the constitutionality of this Bill. I might further give him the authority of the Privy Council for saying that the legislative power of this parliament is as great as that the parliament of Great Britain itself in regard to the different subjects given to us to legislate upon. That being the case, we are not restricted in any way in dealing with this subject or in providing for the control of this naval force, or deciding where it shall be used. There have been attempts to make little of the fact that the Militia Act is the same as the Naval Act, and to show that they were different and that while one was a good law and constitutional, the other was wrong. I submit that is good reasoning. If hon. gentlemen will turn to the Militia Act, they will see that section 4 of that Act is the same as section 4 of the Bill now before the House:

The command-in-chief of the militia is declared to continue and be vested in the King, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the Governor General as his representative.

That is word for word the same language as is used in the present Bill. Let me quote further from the Militia Act:

The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

That is exactly the same language as in the present Bill.

Mr. DANIEL. Does that require the matter to be brought before parliament?

Mr. McKENZIE. Certainly.

Whenever the Governor in Council places the militia, or any part thereof, on active service, if parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of parliament within fifteen days, and parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

In time of war, when the militia is called out for active service to serve conjointly with His Majesty's regular forces, His Majesty may place in command thereof, a senior general officer of his regular army.

That is word for word the same language as we have in the Act now before the House.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE. Immediately before adjournment at six o'clock, I was explaining the provisions of the Canadian Militia Act for the purpose of showing that there was no material difference—in fact, no difference at all—between these and the provisions of the Naval Act now before the House, in so far as these provisions have reference to the services to be rendered by the naval forces in support of the British empire, or to be put at the disposal of the British empire when an emergency should arise. The definition of 'emergency' is the same in this Act as in the Militia Act and the other sections, although not numbered the same, are alike in their provisions. Section 4 of the Naval Bill now under consideration, says:

The command-in-chief of the naval forces is vested in the King, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty, or by the Governor General as His representative.

That is exactly the same as the Militia Act. Section 17 of this Bill says:

The Governor in Council may place the naval forces or any part thereof, on active service at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

And sections 18 and 19 are as follows:

18. In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal Navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

19. Whenever the Governor in Council places the naval service or any part thereof on active service, as provided in the preceding section, if parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall issue for a meeting of parliament within fifteen days, and parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

These terms are identical with those of the Militia Bill; I can find no difference at all between them. If, for the last forty years, we have had a law on our statute book, in connection with our land forces and land protection, which was acceptable to both parties, acceptable to every man who lives in Canada. I do not understand why it should be considered an act of treason, an act of disruption of the connection between the mother country and Canada, or a violation of the constitution, to have the same thing, word for word, applied to the sea or coastal forces. Such an objection has no valid force, and, when examined, it will be perfectly clear to any person that it is used for a purpose, that it is not in the best interest of the country, and is not worthy the best thought of our people. If there is anything wrong about this law, would it not have been the duty of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) who, for thirty years has occupied a conspicuous place, and who is a very capable lawyer, and, of course, loyal to the core, to call attention to it, and propose a suitable amendment? The old Militia Act is a product of the Conservative administration and of Conservatives, as I take it, they were then as loyal as they are to-day. If it was so satisfactory to them in those days, and during the twenty or more years when they ran this country, I submit that a similar Act, having reference to the sea forces, should be just as satisfactory to them as this old law. I mention this in order to do away with the argument that is being strongly put forward by speakers on the opposition side, who endeavour to show that we are departing from the customs in vogue in this country and are legislating in a way that has a tendency to break the close ties that now exist between the mother country and outside.

I wish to make a few slight references to the observations made by some of the gentlemen who have already spoken on this question. First, I should say a few words concerning the speech of the hon. member for St. Anne division, Montreal (Mr. Doherty). That gentleman has dealt with the question very soberly, and in that judicious manner in which we would expect him to approach a question of this kind. In its last analysis, there is not a great deal in his speech. The hon. gentleman dealt particularly with two or three points. The first was that, before we do anything in this country towards the establishment of a sea force that will be intended in any manner to take part in empire wars, we must have our constitution so amended that we in this country shall have an equal voice with the mother country in deciding when war should be declared. That is the condition precedent that he lays down before we can do anything at all in the direction of having a navy. If there is an emergency, or if there is a necessity for an early start in providing this navy, the condition precedent that the hon. gentleman lays down would preclude any action along this line. I submit, the day is not yet in sight—and I venture to say that few of us, perhaps, will live to see the day—when such machinery will be put in operation between the mother country and the colonies, or the dominions beyond the seas, as will put us on an equal footing with the mother country in international questions, and the declaration of war. I think that our proper course is to develop our own country and—to use a military term—to make Canada a complete unit within the empire, and to equip her for every duty she may have to discharge, as well as the Canadian people can bring that about. I submit that the condition that the hon. member for St. Anne lays down would make it impossible for us to do anything in this country. The next proposition which he makes—and he makes it with a view to pleasing some of the super-loyal friends of his party who sit behind him—is that we should give money to the empire.

But he does not put it upon a footing that would please his friends of the opposition. His friends of the opposition say we should come with gifts in our hands, we should come with sacrifices to the throne of the mother country and say: Here, if you have any doubt about our loyalty, if it is though that we in Canada are not in sympathy with your navy, in sympathy with your progress, in sympathy with your ideas of empire, here we are with $25,000,000 as a gift to prove to you beyond peradventure that we are loyal. That seems to have been the doctrine put forward by hon. gentlemen opposite. If that is their doctrine, the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) does not agree with it at all, he puts it on an entirely different footing, upon a commercial footing, absolutely commercial and selfish. He says: If we are in partnership with this big concern on the other side, and if we are satisfied that it will fail, it will drag us down with it. That is the argument he used: if the empire is going to pieces we will be dragged down with it, and entirely apart from the question of sentiment or loyalty it is a question of business with us to give the money, to lend that big concern money to keep it afloat. We will give them a letter of credit, that is his language, to the extent of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000, and we will give it with the distinct understanding that it is not to be used, the money is not to be used at all.

Mr. DANIEL. Did he say that?

bability, that is his language, that the money is not to be used. That is what the hon. gentleman said, it is on 'Hansard.' I know too much about my duty to the gentleman who has preceded me to say anything but exactly what bears the construction that can fairly and reasonably be put on the language he used. That is the proposition, you cannot give anything until you have an equal voice in the disposition of matters in the old land, you cannot do anything at all, and if you want to do anything now it is a commercial transaction, you can promise this money and the probabilities are that you will not have to use it at all. That is the position which was taken by the hon. member from St. Anne (Mr. Doherty). But although a great deal of time was taken in giving us the very able speech of that hon. gentleman, he did one thing for which he will always have my gratitude and for which he should have the gratitude of every hon. gentleman in this House who wishes for the best to happen this country and who wishes for the true welfare of Canada, he rebuked his colleagues in this House for the trend that they have followed in connection with the so called disloyalty of the French Canadians. I was delighted that the rebuke came from the source it did, from a member of the Conservative party, whose loyalty to that party could not be questioned, and from a gentleman living in the province of Quebec who could speak with authority on that point, and I have been delighted to find that the speeches made since he gave them that wholesome rebuke have been largely purged from this unwholesome element that was found in all the speeches from the hustings and in the House by the opposition members before the rebuke was administered. I believe that if the hon. gentleman from St. Anne never did anything else in this House that would be of note, except that he has given that well deserved rebuke to his colleagues in this House and has put an end to this very undesirable if not reprehensible conduct on the part of those who want to make political capital in their own counties and provinces against the people of Quebec, by continually insinuating that they are not a loyal people, he would deserve our thanks. Nothing could be more calculated to injure this country in its every interest than to have it go abroad from this parliament that if not one half at least a large third of the population of this country was not loyal to the Crown and to the institutions of this country. It is useless to think that we can assimilate large populations coming into this country and gain their sympathy for British institutions, British government and British laws, when the leaders of the Conservative party in this House and from the hustings proclaim to the newcomer that a certain class of citizens who have been living under our institutions for 150 years, are still disloyal and not true to British institutions and the British Crown. If that is to go abroad in this country and to be believed by the foreigner from Europe and other places, it must have an unwholesome effect in relation to the assimilating to our institutions of the people who are coming into Canada. I submit that there ought to be enough patriotism, enough loyalty in the members of the opposition, even if they believe it is going to bring them to power, to prevent them resorting to such tactics. The remedy is too drastic to be applied in this country. I thank fortune that in the province from which I come such a thing is never heard as accusing any citizen of disloyalty. We have Acadians, French Canadians in Nova Scotia, but nobody ever dares to think of using such language in reference to them. The same thing applies to New Brunswick. I never heard of it in Prince Edward Island. Such a thing is never mentioned in Quebec, and I believe that when you pass the boundary between Ontario and Manitoba the disease stops, such language is used in the west. Am I to be told, am I forced to believe by this geographical elimination, that the great premier province of Ontario is to be fed on such food as this stuff meted out to us in this House, about the disloyalty of people in this country? In other matters Ontario has a right to claim leadership in its wealth, population, education, and very many other excellencies. Is it to be said that that province shall be the last to drop this pernicious system of attributing disloyalty to citizens of Canada? I repeat to the credit of the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) that if he never did anything else in his life except the meting out of this rebuke to his colleagues and supporters in this House, he has not lived in vain.

We are told by hon. gentlemen that nothing should be done until we appeal to the country, we should go with this proposition to the Canadian people and should get their verdict upon this new departure of a navy. I submit that the doctrine laid down by the representatives of this country in England in 1902 were well known in every part of Canada from that year down to the present. They were well known by every leader of either party from the time they were laid down in the conference. I will not say, for it would not be right for me to say, that the leader of the opposition did not know in 1902, in 1903 or in 1904 what those principles were or what Canada intended to do with regard to the establishment of a navy or extending aid to the empire to which we belong. That policy was well known. If it was not satisfactory to him or the party which he leads, did he not have an excellent opportunity in 1904 of submitting this question to the people? The leader of the opposition is not a novice at making platforms. He could very well have adjusted his platform and have put a plank in it in 1904 representing this very question, declaring that the principles and rules laid down by the representatives of Canada at the conference in 1902 were not satisfactory, and that therefore the people should pronounce upon them and vote against the Canadian government. I repeat that the hon. gentleman is not a novice at making platforms, and he makes his platforms always on the extension table principle, so that he can put this in and take that out as it suits him and suits the company in which he speaks. Therefore, what was to prevent hon. gentlemen opposite, if they thought we were not doing right in connection with the preparation for the navy in 1902, from submitting the question to the people? The argument in use about 1902 can also be used about 1907, for it is perhaps a strange coincidence that in 1908 we had another general election. The hon. gentleman and his party had the experience of 1902 and 1907 as to what the intentions were. In 1908 there was a general election, when there was an excellent opportunity of putting that policy before the people and getting a pronouncement upon it. I submit to you that if they did not submit that question to the country in 1904, and if they did not submit it in 1908, they had really no desire of submitting it to the country at all, and were perfectly satisfied with the steps taken by the government and the platform and principles laid down by the representatives of this country at both conferences.

Mr. BLAIN. Does my hon. friend say that it was a leading plank and the policy of the government of which he is a prominent supporter, in either the general election of 1904 or 1908?

Mr. McKENZIE. I did not say, Sir, that it was a platform at all. I say that it was the well understood policy of this government, as represented and as disclosed to the world by the representatives of this government who were present at the conference in 1902. From that day down to the present the policy of the government was well known and there was no need to make a platform about it. It was an understood matter and the hon. gentleman opposite did not make an issue of it. When the hon. gentlemen who were leading the opposition party in the country will not raise an issue, the strongest and the only logical conclusion to be drawn is that the principles disclosed and the line of action laid down by the government are satisfactory to them. That is the contention which

I make here, and that I think is the only logical conclusion to be drawn. If to-day hon. gentleman opposite think that it is necessary to submit this question to the people as to whether there should be a navy at all, or, if a navy, what should be the size of it and that sort of thing, the proposition of the navy, its size, and all that have been before the people, there has been knowledge of the question since 1902, if it is a proper thing to submit to the people to-day it was a proper thing at either or both these elections, and if they did not think it proper to take advantage of the opportunity, I submit that they are not sincere to-day when they are asking to make of this an issue to go to the people with. We had this question very well threshed out less than a year ago. The hon. member for North Toronto placed the first resolution upon the order paper the very first day of the sitting. From the little knowledge I have of that hon. gentleman, obtained since I have occupied a seat in this House, I venture to say that the bringing down of that resolution was not the first thing he did in connection with it. I submit that he gave it careful thought, that he looked at it from every standpoint, considered it carefully and possibly wrote a great many resolutions before he found one that suited him. The resolution with which he came down to the House remained on the order paper for seventy days or thereabouts, and it was well considered by every hon. gentleman on both sides of the House, I presume. When the time came to discuss it, he discussed it fully and pointed out clearly and unequivocally that his intention was to make a start in the direction of having a Canadian navy for the protection of our own people and for no other purpose. The leader of the opposition agreed with him that that was the thing to do. The right hon. leader of the government stated clearly and distinctly that neither he nor his party, was going to depart in the slightest degree from the lines laid down in 1902 and 1907, and that he would not be stampeded by any false cry that might be abroad in the country. After hearing that clearly and distinctly laid down, the hon. leader of the opposition said: I fully and emphatically agree with the position taken by the leader of the government. That is the position that he took then. The leader of the government said: We cannot afford to lose any of the privileges which we have to-day as a country. We must have the same control over our own affairs that we have now, and we cannot and will not have any less. The leader of the opposition agreed with him and said: We have well earned every privilege that we have in this country. They are not favours, they are rights, and the government cannot go as far as, or any farther, than I will go, in fully sustaining and upholding every privilege and every bit of the autonomy that we have in this country. These are the statements made by the leader of the opposition in his speech of the 29th March last. His words are to be found in 'Hansard,' and if it is to-day a dangerous thing to retain the powers which we have in the Militia Act, if it is to-day a dangerous thing and tends to disrupt the happy relations between the empire and this country, were the dangers less a year ago? If there was any difficulty at that time the leader of the opposition, if he was sincere then, or if he is sincere now, should have stood up and said: These conditions must not continue; everything should be left entirely at the disposal of the British Crown, and we will not now undertake to exercise control. But that was not his position nor the position of his party. They were unanimous in support of sustaining the conditions which we have now and which we have had for the last forty years. We have heard no reasons for such a right about face on the part of the leader of the opposition and his friends in connection with this matter. There is not a reason to-day that was not in existence a year ago. Whatever discussion took place in the English House of Commons about the German scare, so-called, took place ten or twelve days before the resolution was brought down. I think it was on the 20th or 22nd March that Premier Asquith made his speech on the subject in which he made reference to the necessity of further provision for the navy in Great Britain and I think he made some observations from which it could be gathered that there was some difficulty in that country. That period has passed, explanations have been given, and the excitement had subsided before the leader of the opposition and his followers made their speeches. We are now told by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Toronto that we must all of a sudden have a tremendous navy that would be able on the first day of its appearance on the water, to cope with any of the great navies of the world. That is an extraordinary position to take, and it is very different from the position taken by them less than a year ago.

Mr. DANIEL. Did the leader of the opposition ever make such a statement as the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) has attributed to him. If so, when and where?

Mr. McKENZIE. I did not attribute that to the leader of the opposition. If the hon. member (Mr. Daniel), wants to know who made that statement, I may tell him it was the member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath). My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Daniel), may rest satisfied that I do not belong to the class or tribe that misquotes people. If he has anything else to do he can rest content that he has nothing to watch in me, because my training and experience in life has been along other lines, and I have made my living in situations where it would be little benefit for me to misquote, because I would be brought to time very soon for it. On the other hand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Daniel) belongs to the medical profession and he may be able to hide his mistakes under the ground, but those in my profession cannot do that.

Mr. DANIEL. That is a very old chestnut.

Mr. McKENZIE. Not much older than the hon. member. To say that we must not have a navy until we have a great big one is like the old lady who told her grandson that he must not go near the water until he learned to swim. If my hon. friend will follow the speeches of the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), he will see that that hon. gentleman said last year, that, the proper thing for us to do is to have a navy of our own, that the matter of a contribution was out of the question, that it had been a failure wherever tried, and that we should make a small beginning in our navy. But less than a year after the hon. member (Mr. Foster) advised the House in that direction, the House would hardly believe such a change has been wrought in his views. I submit that when the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) advised the House that the proper thing to do was to make a small beginning with a navy of our own and develop it as every other enterprise in this country had developed, he was stating the wise course for us to pursue, and when he departed from that advice he departed from the path of wisdom, and is not taking himself seriously. If there was any necessity for further proof that such was the idea in his head a year ago, it is to be found in abundance in his speech where he told us: To sow the seed in the soil, to start something to which we could look with pride and which we could develop, to start something that would train up our young men so that they would take pride in the defence of the empire, and not to leave to other people to do that which we could do best ourselves. We have heard it said that in Canada we have not the capacity nor the means, or the experience to build a navy. But, would not the same argument be applicable in the initiation of some of the greater enterprises, which have obtained such an enormous growth in Canada. We have no canal in existence for instance at all comparable to what the Georgian Bay canal will be, and yet I am satisfied that we have talent and industry and ability in Canada sufficient to successfully complete the Georgian Bay canal. When the Canadian Pacific railway was started there was nothing in this country in any way commensurate to the vastness of such an enterprise, and yet the Canadian Pacific railway grew and the country grew wih it, and the Canadian management of that railway is capable of giving the best service in the world. All this goes to show the immensity of the capabilities of the people of Canada when the occasion demands. I submit too that the history of the maritime provinces justifies us in believing that the shipbuilding industry can be developed there just as well as in any country in the world. Sixty years ago we had in Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia men who went to the woods and cut the timber, brought it back and built the vessel, rigged that vessel, found cargo and passengers for her, and then took command and sailed her in two oceans to New Zealand and Australia. Such men we had by the score in the maritime provinces and we have their descendants there today, competent to utilize all modern appliances for the construction of ships equal to any that sail the ocean. I have no fear but that there will be found in Canada men competent to build a navy, to man it, and to command it. I read in the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe that in one of the ports on the great lakes they have a ship building plant capable of turning out vessels 500 feet long and of 7,000 horse-power. If that can be done in one part of Canada, why cannot it be done in another. I am glad to see that there is a thriving ship building industry on the great lakes, and I have not the slightest doubt in my mind, but that the industry can be pursued in the coastal harbours of the maritime provinces and of British Columbia, with just as much success as in any other part of the globe.

The hon. gentleman from Simcoe pointed out that we have at Sydney harbour, in readiness for the building of steel ships, one of the finest plants in the world, fully equipped and ready to produce the necessary material. The premier of Australia, in the speech he made at the conference of 1907, pointed out to the Lords of the Admiralty that the coastal service in Australia would be of great efficiency and usefulness to the home government in getting ready the supplies that may be necessary for the fleets of that station—that it would protect the coal and other supplies that might be necessary, and furnish men if men were required. All this is true with reference to British Columbia and Nova Scotia, where we have coal in abundance, and I would suggest to the government that the very first duty of government is to put the security of these magnificent coal supplies beyond peradventure. It ought to be made impossible for any foreign ship or squadron to take possession of our coal supplies. I do not know how it is in British Columbia, but in Nova Scotia and Cape Breton the coal fields are on the coast within gunshot of any vessel that might come near; and for that reason it is entirely necessary, if this country is to maintain full control of her coal supplies in the eastern part of Canada, that the protection usual in cases of that kind should be put up. It may be said that we have not a sufficiency of these things to launch upon so great an enterprise as the building of a navy. Let me tell you that the largest coal seams and possibly the largest coal fields in the world are in the province of Nova Scotia. If you ask me where the largest coal mine in the world is situated, I tell you in the province of Nova Scotia and in the island of Cape Breton. If you ask me where are the largest iron and steel plants, which would be a basic necessity for the building of this navy, I tell you that one of the largest in the world is to be found in the province of Nova Scotia and in the island of Cape Breton. We have also the people who are equal to any emergency, and who will educate themselves for any conditions that may arise. Our steel works in the Island of Cape Breton are not more than seven or eight years old, and 4,000 or 5,000 people are necessary for the working of those plants, largely experts, skilled labour. You ask me where we get them. We get them in the island of Cape Breton and in the province of Nova Scotia. Our own people, with very few exceptions, have in that short time educated themselves to do whatever is necessary in connection with these plants. The same thing can be said about the handling of our coal mines. The engineers, the underground managers, and all the managers to be found about these works are our own people. There is not in the world any people who will more quickly and readily come up to any of these requirements than the people of Cape Breton. The building of this navy is but another step in the opening up of new avenues for the development of the dormant powers of many of our people. It gives an opportunity to the poor man as well as to the rich man to gain for himself a position. Under the conditions that will prevail in our navy the poor man's son will have an opportunity to make a name for himself as well as the son of the rich man. That being the case, if it was for nothing but the chances it is going to give to our people to develop themselves along these lines, the starting of this navy would be justified. It was less than a year ago that this House unanimously decided that the building of a navy by our own people with our own money was the proper course for us to take. Nothing has happened since to change in any way the conclusion we reached on that occasion. And why should there be a turnabout of this kind? Possibly the explanation is given by the 'Canadian Courier', a paper which I believe is independent in politics, but is edited by a strong friend of the leader of the opposition and of his party. That paper says of the opposition:

> The situation is absolutely senseless. Their attitude betokens either a sad loss of reason and judgment, or else a weak-minded resort to a dangerous political expedient. So far as Mr. Borden is personally concerned, we believe that he is too well informed and has too much 'horse sense' to justify the resolution on any other ground than political necessity. However, definiteness and unity cannot be expected from a party which is so sadly divided on a question as the Conservatives are on the proper policy for Canada to pursue in naval matters.

That is the position which this independent journal takes, a position with which I entirely agree; and if the hon. member for Ste. Anne (Mr. Doherty) had made his speech last year and had declared to his colleagues in this House that this cry of disloyalty had to be eliminated from the utterances of the leaders of the Conservative party, and from the rank and file of that party, I believe we would not have the break that we have at the present time. One of the reasons is that those who won their elections on the cry of disloyalty raised against the Prime Minister and his supporters in the province of Quebec, would find themselves in a very awkward predicament if they should accept his policy on the naval question. They could not very well then go among their own people and raise the cry of disloyalty against the province of Quebec.

Mr. OWENS. Would the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question? Does he think it right to lay at the door of all the members from this side of the province of Ontario the statement that the followers of the government who come from Quebec are disloyal, simply because one or two have made it?

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not a prophet or the son of a prophet, and I am only judging those who have made the statement.

Mr. OWENS. The hon. gentleman should name them.

Mr. McKENZIE. I can assure my hon. friend that I did not have him in mind at all, and entirely acquit him from any imputation of the kind; but if he will read the rank party press of Ontario and follow those who undertook to speak for his party in Ontario, he will find that the affirmation I make is only too well founded. I am a Scotchman, and a Nova Scotian, and a loyalist from away back, as far as there is anything to be spoken of, and for that reason I have no love or standing for any such thing in this country as charging my fellow countrymen with being less loyal than myself. I regard such a charge as most pernicious, and in that connection I cannot do better than quote the language of so distinguished a Conservative as the late Mr. Chapleau, who said in this House that the man who starts the cry of disloyalty and racial and religious prejudices is a traitor to his country and his God. That was the language of so distinguished a Canadian as Mr. Chapleau, and I am sure that there is not a man on the opposition benches who thinks himself a bigger Conservative that was that distinguished gentleman, and that was his measure of the contemptible line of action which we find followed to-day in the interests of the opposition. I repeat that if the Conservative party were purged of that element, if no cry of race or religion were raised in one part or another, the leader of the opposition would have stood manfully to the position he took less than a year ago, which he reaffirmed in England and which he afterwards repeated in his own constitutency of Halifax and the city of Toronto. I for one thought that he would have stood by it, I thought he had the backbone to do so, but others said, no. Wait, they said, until the psycological moment arrives and you will find that the barnacles will drive him as they please, just as they did before. Events have since proven that those who thus predicted knew the leader of the opposition better than I did. A year ago that hon. gentleman was perfectly satisfied with the course followed by the government. He had heard that policy declared clearly and distinctly by the Prime Minister, there was nothing hidden, he knew it all, and he agreed with every word of it. I do not regard the decision of this House as a trifling matter, even a majority decision. But when the high court of parliament deliberately, after all the facts are before it, comes to a unanimous conclusion, I cannot look upon the breaking of that compact or the reversing of that decision as at all a light matter. Why should we reverse to-day the position then taken? No new principles of law have since come into existence nor have any new facts, nor has any new light appeared. If there were any reasons in subsequent events to justify the decision we took a year ago, one would understand this change of front. But nothing has occurred since to alter the position. There has been no change of facts or law, we are exactly in the same position, and I ask hon. gentlemen on the opposition benches where they would find themselves now if they had to go back to their constituents and explain this sudden change of opinion and doctrine on their part in less than a year. I submit that the only explanation of that thing is party expediency as stated by the 'Courier,' which I quoted a moment ago.

Mr. BLAIN. Would my hon. friend permit me to say that the Conservative party last session were in favour of giving Dreadnoughts.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not recollect that there is anything in the resolution to that effect.

Mr. BLAIN. I did not say there was anything in the resolution, but that the Conservative party had declared in this House that they were in favour of giving Dreadnoughts in the emergency now before the country. If my hon. friend wishes, I will quote the language of the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for North Toronto.

Mr. McKENZIE. I remember well that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) at the very end of his speech, in a very milk and water way, said that if there should be an emergency he would agree to provide for it, and that he was sure hon. gentlemen on this side would stand by him in that proposition. But the hon. the leader of the opposition did not say anything at all about it, except that there should be a door left in the resolution which would enable us, if an emergency should arise, to come to the rescue of the mother country. Language to that effect is in the resolution which could be construed to give us the right to make that provision should an emergency arise.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie). He is very gentlemanly in the debate. But would he permit me to place on 'Hansard' the statement by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) with the concurrence of the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden)?

Mr. McKENZIE. I had intended to put a number of the pages of those speeches on record, but time will not permit. I have no objection to my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) reading what he proposes.

Mr. BLAIN. It is just a word or two. In the speech delivered on January 12 this session——

Mr. McKENZIE. I was talking about March 29 last.

Mr. BLAIN. Yes:

My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) said in that debate with my concurrence: 'Let me say to my right hon. friend that, if after careful consideration, he proposes to this parliament a means for meeting that emergency adequately, now and as it should be, whether it be by the gift of Dreadnoughts or the gift of money of this country, this side of the House will stand beside him and stand for Canada in supporting that measure.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Blain) think, or does any hon. member on the opposition side think, that the opposition are more desirous of maintaining the British empire in its integrity and full power and prestige than are the supporters of the government? Does he think that we would hold, any less than they, that any check that might be given to the indisputable power and prestige of the empire as it stands to-day would be a blow to us? Do they think that we are indifferent to the position occupied by the mother country? If that is their opinion, the sooner they dispel it the better. When an emergency arises in this country—as, for instance, in the South African war—do you find any nationality, or any creed not rushing to their rescue, or doing what we can to maintain the integrity of the empire? I am glad to say there is no such thing. Grit and Tory join hands in maintaining the integrity of the empire so far as that could be done by the Canadian people. The suspicion that there is less desire and anxiety amongst Liberals than amongst Conservatives to maintain the empire is a fallacy and a mistake without the slightest foundation, or fact, or even in appearance. I have said already and I say it again—and I think I say it on the basis of constitutional usage—that we have government machinery in this country, and in the motherland under which the looking after of the defence of the empire is a matter in the hands of the government of the old land, and looking after any thing that would be done in co-ordination and unison with the home government towards the protection of the empire at large is a matter for the government of this country. And I say that if confidence does not exist today between the home government and this government by which the interests of the country can be properly communicated from one government to another, that is as it should not be, and the sooner we are put in a position to know exactly what is necessary for us to do in case of an emergency the better. We have a High Commissioner in London, a highly honoured gentleman, a man in whom the whole country has confidence. He is right in touch with the English government, with English officialdom. It would not be difficult for him to communicate with the Governor General of Canada what the Canadian people should do. We should then have it in an official way and could do what was necessary to be done. I submit that the wishes, the interests, the policy of the mother country in regard to anything that requires the money of the people of Canada is not to be conveyed to us by stool-pigeons, or something that might carry a letter, or a newspaper in its mouth. That is not the sort of relationship that must exist between this country, and the mother country. And, until we are properly informed, and it is put beyond peradventure what the conditions and necessities are I, for one, would not speculate on what money we should put at the disposal of the mother country. That money is not wanted. They have abundance of money. The hon. member for East Huron (Mr. T. Chisholm) said it was rather absurd for us to have to go to the mother country to borrow money and then give it back. But that is the position. If we are to get money we have to go where the money is, then either bring it here and send it over, or pass it over when we have borrowed it. Do hon. gentlemen think that the credit of Canada is better than that of England? Can we borrow cheaper than England can? Nobody would say we could. They have abundance of money and the facilities to build these Dreadnoughts. Our money is not necessary, except to convince any unfriendly power that we are behind the mother country in case of an emergency. I should say that pointing to our record when necessity arose would be the best way of doing that. If Germany is the great enemy in this emergency, Germany knows all about us in the South African war. It does not need twenty-five millions of money, or any other sum to convince any power in Europe that Canada, Australia, Newfoundland, and the other dominions beyond the seas are behind the mother country in case of an emergency. I submit that the position we have taken from the beginning is the proper position, and, for my part, I am prepared to stand to it.

I have heard with a good deal of regret in this discussion assaults, more or less trenchant, made upon the leader of the government along the line of accusing him of not being the right stamp of Canadian, not being, perhaps, what he ought to be in many respects. I have here a clipping from the Montreal 'Witness', an independent paper, a paper that is very much respected in this country, a paper whose views on matters of public policy are not questioned. I wish, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, to read the independent view of this paper of the much honoured Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and of the standing of the country in several regards. I read it the more readily, because it deals with the growth of this country and, in showing its growth, shows the justification for starting upon this new enterprise upon which we are about to enter. It says:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been continuously in harness as Prime Minister of this country for the past fourteen years.

During the whole of that period, and for a number of years before it, his labours have been incessant and all on the heroic scale, a few months of which is enough for most men.

His vacations have been in homœopathic doses, unless we count among them those progresses abroad which have made such strenuous demands upon his powers as few men could cope with.

During all that time he has kept up his reading, has kept in touch with the world of events, and has maintained a general correspondence with all and sundry.

For a man who in his first prime was accounted unusually delicate, this is a surprising record. He used the recent Ash Wednesday holiday, not for rest, but to look after things in Montreal.

Some who then saw him remarked on his placid, untired, unwrinkled, unruffled appearance, as though of a man who, although he had many a thought, had never a care.

To all, the fact that he has had even momentarily to withdraw from the active guidance of affairs will be great matter of concern, for there is no element in the country that does not respect him, and few who do not honour him. His record as a ruler of the country has been a marvellous one.

Under him Canada has made amazing strides in material prosperity and political importance.

The population has increased from under 5,000,000 to 7,500,000, or 50 per cent; the total overseas trade has increased from about $240,000,000 to $650,000,000, or more than 2½ times; the bank notes in circulation have increased from about $30,000,000 to $70,000,000 odd, or more than double; the total deposits of the people in the banks have increased from $193,000,000 odd to $711,000,000 odd, or between three and four times; two new flourishing provinces have been added to the older ones; industries have sprung up on all sides, and some of them are now of international importance; river channels and canals have been deepened and widened and harbours fitted for the exigencies of modern commerce; public utilities have reached a high state of efficiency in the cities, and thousands of miles of railway have been built or are projected all over the country.

All this has happened during the Laurier regime.

Sir Wilfrid's continuous reign as Prime Minister has only twice been equalled in British annals—in the case of Walpole and the younger Pitt, though the thirteen years of Sir John Macdonald's last reign follows close upon it.

Gladstone was Prime Minister of England four times, but his longest term of office was but six years and altogether he was Prime Minister only about twelve years, as compared with Sir Wilfrid's fourteen years, which we hope may extend indefinitely into future years.

No one can deny that Sir Wilfrid's regime has been wonderful and glorious; and it will surely be remembered with goodwill and thankfulness so long as the history of Canada and the British empire endures.

It has not been all sunshine—there have been clouds; it has not been all success—there have been failures; it has not been all applause—there has been disapprobation from the patriotic as well as from the paid claqueurs.

But, taking it for all in all, the period has been 'an age of gold.' Canada has had the good fortune to have her destinies presided over by a great man.

That, Sir, is an impartial verdict reached by what I understand to be an impartial paper. When we think of that career and when we know that this is a digest of public opinion if truly expressed in this country, and when, on the other hand, we think of the parties who in this House and out of it, undertake to make political capital by attacking the premier, we cannot help but think of the oft-repeated metaphor of the boy with the squirt gun storming Gibraltar. The one is just as likely to have success as the other. I would say to my Conservative friends—that there are two things to which they might as well make up their minds. The first is, that if any gentleman on the opposite side wants to make a reputation for himself in this House he should do it by some other means than attacking the Prime Minister. Another thing is that if they expect to strike a policy which will bring them into power that policy will not be the abuse of the Premier of Canada. For my own province, the greatest thing we have on which to appeal to the electors is the pure, lofty name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and I hope we will have it for many years to come. I am sure that the same thing is true in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and every part of the maritime provinces, and the results for the last thirty years in a great many elections all over the country show that there is that same confidence, with few exceptions, throughout every province in the Dominion. I am satisfied that we are making the proper step in the right direction in starting this navy, in the hope and belief that our finances will enable us from time to time to enlarge it until at last it will be a navy of which we may all be proud, equal to the navy of the United States or any other navy with which we have a right to compare it. That being the case, I hope that this is but to be another step under the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the development of this country, and as we have developed our railways and canals, as we have developed our immigration system, as we have developed the proper administration of our laws and everything else that comes in the scope and influence of this government, so will we also bring to maturity and success the development of this important project of which we are now entering.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL (St. John City). Mr. Speaker, the intense importance of this Bill and the effect which it may have on the future history of Canada, and of the great empire of which we form a part, justify me in speaking on this question even at this late stage of the debate. Personally I feel a very deep interest in anything which has relation to naval defence. The constituency which I represent is on the Atlantic sea-board, and in the event of a naval combat between Great Britain and any country which has accumulated seapower enough to attack her supremacy on the seas, if unfortunately that other navy should be successful, the constituency I represent would probably be the first to feel the fatal effects.

As far as I am concerned, I am deeply interested in this, not only as a citizen and a British subject, but especially as representing a constituency down by the sea. Now, Sir, I intend to make my remarks brief and as much to the point as I can, and before coming to them I feel myself bound to reply to some few observations of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McKenzie). In the first place, he spoke about there being no necessity for sending this very important proposal back to the people. He said that we were here elected by the people to represent them and to decide on these questions. Under ordinary circumstances I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, but what do we find in this case? This is the most important matter that we have ever had to deal with in this parliament, and the people have never had an opportunity of giving any expression of their views upon it. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat knows as well as any member of this House that this question has never been proposed to the people in any shape or form, and how he can intimate that such has been the case is something I do not understand. We have never had a proposal about a navy for this country until this very session, and it is the proposal that we are now discussing. How any hon. member can say that the people have had an opportunity of discussing and deciding this question is more than I can understand. He also made a reference to the fact that leading members on this side of the House have hitherto confined their wishes and desires to a navy for the purpose simply of defending our own shores. He quoted my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) as stating that my hon. friend the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) had made a statement when the resolution was passed in 1909 which had met with his concurrence. He intimated that the statements that were then made by the hon. member for North Toronto were devoted to the advocacy of a fleet simply for local defence. I had always thought that the hon. gentleman was one who prided himself on being a gentleman who did not misquote or misrepresent the language of another. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read what the leader of the opposition said, and I will give the quotation that he made from the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto. The leader of the opposition said:

One of the criticisms which has been made upon the resolution is this: That parliament did not then proffer to the empire in the hour of peril anything more than an expression of a desire to co-operate and an intention to perform. Well, Sir, so far as we on this side of the House are concerned that is not our fault. My hon. friend from North Toronto said, in that debate, with my concurrence:

To-day peril stands at the gateway. It is not for me to say how great it is, but I cannot brush it aside. To-day it impresses itself upon the greatest statesmen of the old country; to-day it appeals to Australia until public subscriptions are taken, and the government is being importuned to do even more than its settled policy to meet the emergency; to-day little New Zealand gives one Dreadnought and offers a second, and to-day Canada faces that position of peril and emergency. Let me say to my right hon. friend, that if after careful consideration he proposes to this parliament a means for meeting that emergency adequately, now and as it should be, whether it be by the gift of Dreadnoughts or the gift of money of this country, this side of the House will stand beside him, and stand for Canada in supporting that measure.

I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of this House, whether the hon. member for Cape Breton, in making the statement he did, quoted the hon. member for North Toronto and the leader of the opposition correctly. The hon. member also spoke to the effect that we had never been asked to assist the mother country in this emergency. That they did not come over and ask us to give them some money, that they should have sent a request for funds through the regular channels or in some other way. I would like to know in what way the hon. member would expect the statesmen of the mother country to intimate to this country that they would be glad of assistance in the emergency that is now before the whole British empire. I should imagine that a gentleman of his standing in the legal profession, one who has occupied a seat on the bench, if he wished to give a judicial statement in regard to the matter, would have studied the question to some extent so as to satisfy himself that the remarks he was going to make were actually based on fact. I am sorry to make these quotations because they have all been placed on record before, but the statements of the hon. gentleman make it absolutely necessary. Lord Tweedmouth's statements have been already quoted, and I suppose that even the member for Cape Breton will allow that Lord Tweedmouth was in a position to speak for England because he was at the conference of 1907. Speaking to the representatives of the empire at one of these notable conventions, he said:

To the representatives of the empire——

Those from Canada included.

—we ask you to take some leading part in making the national defence of the empire more complete. We thank you and recognize the free, unstinted help already given. One reservation we make, and one only, that we hold the command of the naval forces for the defence of the empire for which we are responsible. Unity of action, unity of command. We want you to give us all the assistance you can.

Is that not plain? Is that not distinct? I wonder if the hon. member for Cape Breton wants anything more than the language to which I have just alluded that the mother country would be glad of our assistance in this great emergency?

We want you to give us all the assistance you can, but we do not come to you as beggars. Whether you help or not we are still to protect the King's dominions across the seas to the best of our ability.

The people of England are not beggars. They will defend themselves and they will defend this whole empire until the last shilling or the last man is used up in the fray rather than go on their knees to Canada or any other part of this empire and ask them any more plainly or openly for funds than they have already done. Then there is Lord Rosebery. He also made some remarks, I think at the press conference, and I quote the following:

When I see one country alone asking for 25 millions of extra taxation for warlike preparations; when I see the unprecedented sacrifices which are asked from us on the same grounds, I do begin to feel uneasy as to the outcome of it all, and to wonder where it will stop. . . . Gentlemen, we can and we will build 'Dreadnoughts' or whatever the newest type of ship may be as long as we have a shilling to spend on them or a man to put into them. All that we can and will do, but I am not sure that even that will be enough, and I think it may be your duty to take back to your young dominions across the seas this message and this impression: that some personal duty and responsibility for national defence rests on every man and citizen of the empire. Yes, gentlemen, take that message back with you. Tell your peoples — if they can believe it — the deplorable way in which Europe is relapsing into militarism and the pressure that is put upon this little England, to defend itself, its liberties—and yours! But take this message also back with you—that the old country is right at heart; that there is no failing or weakness in her; and that she rejoices in renewing her youth in her giant dominions beyond the seas. For her own salvation, she must look to herself, and that failing her she must look to you.

Surely, in view of these two quotations from eminent statesmen holding responsible positions in Great Britain, surely the position of the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) is untenable when he says there is no need for a contribution from Canada or any other part of the empire to aid the motherland in this emergency. The hon. gentleman tells us he does not believe there is an emergency, but the answer to that is that there are none so blind as those who do not wish to see. He reminds me of that story in sacred writ where some Hebrews from a distant part of Judea came to the Saviour and stated that they wanted a sign; the Master told them they had Moses and the prophets, and if they would not hear them, they would not believe even though one rose from the dead. I take it that no matter what evidence is submitted to my hon. friend he would not believe even though one rose from the dead. The hon. gentleman has referred to the fact that the British North America Act places the control of the naval and military forces in His Majesty, and I would point out that if the British North America Act is in force, then clause 18 of the Bill is of no effect, and it being of no effect, why insert it? The very fact that clause 18 is in the Bill determines me to vote against it even though I should be in favour of some of its other features. Clause 18 says:

In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in the Royal Navy, the naval service or any part thereof.

That seems inconsistent, for if under the British North America Act His Majesty has command of these forces, why should the Governor in Council be in a position to place them at his service or not just as they think fit. The inference is, of course, that if the government did not wish to place the naval force at the disposal of His Majesty they need not do so. If clause 18 does not mean that, it has no effect at all, and that being so, I object to it. To my mind that clause gives the Governor in Council a chance to declare the independence of Canada whenever it should think that it was a fit and proper time to do so. I say, Sir, that this parliament has no mandate from the people of Canada to go to any such length as that, and whether this Bill is submitted to them for their judgment or not, they certainly must have a final say on such a momentous question. Such a radical change as that in the constitution of the country, this parliament, I submit, has no power to bring about without the consent of the people. That is the great reason why I shall vote against this Bill. The hon. gentleman from Cape Breton admitted that the British North America Act is in force, and as that gives the command of these forces to His Majesty, what is the good of clause 18 of this Bill at all? To my mind it gives the Governor in Council the power of making an Act of separation for this country. If the Governor in Council should choose to allow this navy to take part in the wars of the empire; if they wish the navy to be put under the command of His Majesty, then they are to call parliament together, but if they think that the navy under no circumstances should be placed under the command of His Majesty, then parliament is not even called together. Parliament is to have no say in such a contingency; it is entirely a matter for the Governor in Council. And, as the member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) said: It was not the King's navy, or the Canadian navy, but the Governor in Council's navy. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) stated that the members of the opposition have changed their mind since the resolution was passed by the House last year, but I may tell him that it is because the proposals of the government, as contained in this Bill, do not carry out the terms of the resolution that we object to it. Here is what the resolution says:

> This House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy along the line suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire, and the peace of the world.

That resolution recognizes our imperial responsibility, and it provides that any aid we may give for imperial purposes should not be simply a little local defence flotilla that we are going to keep under our own care and prevent from taking part, under the command of His Majesty, in the general defence of the empire. The proposal in the Bill is a complete negation of the resolution that was passed unanimously by the House last year. We have good reason indeed to vote against it, and to submit to this House such an amendment as that proposed by the leader of the opposition, which if adopted will afford to the people of this country an opportunity of expressing their views on such a very radical change in the constitution. The hon. gentleman referred to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Anne division, Montreal (Mr. Doherty), and intimated that if this money were sent over, it would be sent with the intention that it should not be used. In my memory the hon. member for St. Anne never said anything of the kind. The remarks of that hon. gentleman evidently referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton, are these:

Gentlemen, to meet the imminent needs of the empire, we put at your disposal this sum of money. Mr. Speaker, if that money is drawn under those circumstances, it will be done by men in whom this government has implicit confidence, and upon their testimony that there is imminent need. Will anybody here impute to the government of Great Britain the flagrant dishonesty of drawing money that is put at their disposal when there is no imminent need for it, and that she will take it only to put it in her pocket? When hon. gentlemen tell us that we are throwing $25,000,000 across the Atlantic to these people, giving it away as a pure gift, as the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) said—that is an imputation upon British statesmen whose testimony we are willing to accept as the testimony of men who know what the truth is with regard to the question of urgency. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this money is drawn, I say we have conclusive evidence on the most reliable testimony of the need of that money, if it is drawn we have given it when there was imminent necessity; and even the right hon. gentleman and his government say that in case of imminent necessity, of course, we ought to give immediate assistance.

I would like to know where the hon. member for Cape Breton finds in that speech or in these words any statement that could give any one with ordinary judgment and common sense the idea that we were sending this money over with the knowledge and expectation that it was never to be used. Yet the hon. member once or twice congratulated and felicitated himself on the fact that he never misquoted other people.

The hon. gentleman also brought in the loyalty question. Now, I do not care to talk on the loyalty question. When a man is easy in his own mind with regard to his feelings of loyalty to the empire to which he belongs, he is not ready to suspect others of disloyalty. I had the privilege the other morning of attending the annual meeting of the Dominion Rifle Association, at which there were present militia officers from all parts of the Dominion, and I think one of the most loyal utterances I heard on that occasion came from a colonel commanding one of the regiments in Quebec. He said that if this matter of a navy could only be left to the militia officers of the country, they would soon settle it in a way that would be agreeable to the people and provide properly for defence, or words to that effect, and he was cheered to the echo. I have no doubt at all of the thorough loyalty of the people of Quebec, and never have had, and certainly since this matter has come up, if any one had any doubt about it, that doubt must have been removed by the expressions of loyalty that we have heard on all sides from gentlemen from that province. Outside and beyond that, and appealing only to self-interest, if there are people in any one province in Canada to-day who more than any other should have a feeling of loyalty and reverence for the British Crown and the British power, it is the people of the province of Quebec. They hold a position unique in the whole British empire. They have treaty rights which no subject of the Crown in any other parts of the world have; and if the power of Britain were broken and Canada separated itself from the British empire, those rights would pass away, and be as if they never had been. So I say the people of Quebec, loyal as they are, have more business reasons for loyalty to the British Crown and for a desire to support and strengthen it, than the people of any other province in the whole Dominion of Canada. So much for the remarks of my hon. friend.

With regard to the question before the House, one of the hon. members, in discussing the ideas of the members of the opposition, endeavoured to poke a little fun at us by saying that no matter how we on this side might criticise the proposals of the government, this was the first time anything practical had been offered to be done. Supposing for a moment that is true, I reply that this is the first time there has been any necessity for anything of the kind to be done. The rise of the nations of the world owning navies has been of the most recent date. The navy of the United States is only a comparatively few years old; Japan is a new nation; while Germany as a sea-power has risen into prominence only within a very few years. The Royal Navy has been patrolling our North Atlantic ocean up to within the last three or four years, when a new policy was inaugurated by Sir John Fisher, the new Lord of the Admiralty. Before that Halifax was the naval station of the North Atlantic squadron in summer and Bermuda in the winter. It was a larger and stronger fleet than the one proposed by the government in the Bill now before the House. This fleet or parts of it visited different parts of the country, including Quebec and Montreal, and it was not until that fleet was withdrawn and until Germany had been showing its determination to have immense power on the sea as it has on the land, that there has been the slightest necessity for Canada to go to any expense, large or small, for naval purposes. I think there is no doubt about that, so that in the circumstances I take it nothing has been done hitherto because there has been no necessity for anything to be done. But now all that is changed. A new naval programme has been given to the world. Germany has announced her intention, in most unmistakable terms, to dispute the supremacy of the sea and wrest that supremacy from Great Britain. That she will succeed I do not believe, for England will spend her last shilling and her last man before she will allow Germany or any other nation to get the upper hand. But the war, if you call it war, is on now. It is a war of construction and must be kept up. The people who advocate making every endeavour to keep up with this great war of construction which is going on, are not militarists and jingoes. This rapid building of new battleships and Dreadnoughts is not for the purpose of making war, but for the purpose of preventing war, and that is the only way war can be prevented, especially with such an enormously wealthy and powerful country as Germany. I came across the other day a statement made by a Chinese Minister of War some five centuries before the christian era, and what did he say. He said:

> To fight and conquer one hundred times is not the perfection of attainment, the supreme art being to subdue the enemy without fighting.

That is the reason why this building of Dreadnoughts as rapidly as possible is being carried on. It is in order that war may be prevented and the enemy conquered without fighting.

With regard to our connection with Great Britain in the empire, that appears to me one of the most important subjects in connection with this debate. I take it that our interests are bound firmly with those of Great Britain and the rest of the empire. Britain is our best customer. The men who, out on the great rolling prairie, are gathering in those enormous harvests, find a market for their product in the old country. We can say the same of the products of the east. Who are the people that buy our lumber and the other commodities we have to export? The British people take by far the largest part. So that outside of the bonds of heredity, tradition, history and affection, there are the bonds of business interests, which unite us to the mother country. And this vast business can only be safely carried on if protected by a navy. And for that protection we have to depend on the British navy, or rather, I would say, if my wishes were carried out, the navy of the empire. The supreme law, in connection with governing bodies, is the safety of the people. The safety of the people is the highest law of all, and in order that this empire may be safe, the royal navy must be supreme. Destroy that navy and you put an end to the empire.

Take this Navy Bill we are discussing, what is the object of a navy? Is it for the purpose of establishing ship-building plants or docks? I should say not. I quite agree that the establishment of shipbuilding yards is important because shipbuilding is a great industry which will give employment to a great number of people.

I take it that docks are necessary, whether we have a navy or not, but the great reason for a navy is strategical. The great object of a navy is defence, so that in considering what is the best kind of navy to have, I take it that the strategical reason is the one which should come before all others. But if we want a navy for strategical purposes we must have a great imperial navy. That is my idea of a naval force—a navy of imperial dimensions, a navy for the defence of the whole empire, a navy under one control. In that connection the Prime Minister of New Zealand gave expression to a sentiment which appeals to my mind as absolutely correct. He said:

Recognizing how important it is for the protection of the empire that the navy should be at the absolute disposal of the admiralty, Your Excellency's advisers do not desire to suggest any conditions as to the location of the ships, as they are confident that the truest interests of the people of New Zealand will be best served by having a powerful navy under the independent control of those responsible for directing it in time of peace or war. What the government does feel concerned in is, that the navy in whatever part of the world it may be, should be under one control, so that the most effective results for the defence of all portions of the empire may be assured.

Those most effective results can only be obtained by one navy, one control and one flag. We are an immense chain of countries, a chain surrounding the globe, separated—no, not separated—bound together by the sea, and immense possibilities open out before us when we consider what may be our destiny as part of this great British empire.

Away off to the south we have Australia, an island it is true, but a continent as well; some four millions of people there now, but to become many millions; with, at this moment, two transcontinental railways projected to run from the southern part of the island to the north bringing into cultivation and opening out for settlement the immense territories some of which have hardly ever—I suppose some even never—been viewed by white men. And we have stretching away across this ocean, New Zealand. It appears to me that the very dream of such an immense empire as this will become, if we are true to ourselves, is sufficient not only to fire the imagination but to warm the heart of every well-wisher of the flag that flies over us and of the country to which we belong. Such a navy, an imperial navy, should be, in so far as we are concerned, supported by all the wealth which we are able to give to that end. It will be just as important for us in the future as it is in the present for the great heart of the empire in the old country that this navy should be great. I do not look for it in my life time, but I think of the time in the years to come when Canada will be the dominant partner in this great British empire if we are so minded as to draw closer the bonds of union and not separate them or loosen them as, I am very much afraid, this present navy Bill will do—and that is one reason, and a great reason, why I am opposed to it. I have spoken of one navy. That does not mean at all, and I do not mean to convey the impression, that we should not have the opportunity of building the ships for that navy, or of our part of it, in Canada. I see no reason why, when we provide the facilities in this country to build vessels of war to become part of our navy and thereby part of the great imperial navy, they should not be built in this country. On the contrary I see every reason why they should be built here. The same thing applies to the manning of the navy. For that purpose this legislation is not required. The old Militia Act divides the militia of this country into land forces and sea forces. Under the Act the militia of Canada is divided into active and reserve militia and the active militia consists of (a) corps raised by voluntary enlistment; (b) corps raised by ballot. Included in the active militia are seamen, sailors and persons whose usual occupation is upon any steam sailing craft navigating the waters of Canada. It even makes arrangement for submarine work. So this naval militia is not confined to the present Act, but as a matter of fact, years ago, there were companies of naval militia in Canada. There was a company of naval militia in the port of St. John and not only that, but they had a training ship there loaned from the royal navy, the old 'Charybdis'. She was there for quite a long time, an old full-rigged sailing ship with some auxiliary steam. But she was not popular with the naval militia there and the movement finally died out. But the fact that these naval militia corps were in existence and that we had the training ships show that we had and have sufficient power to train men for the sea, to utilize training ships and all that that implies. We have had that power for years. Since I came to this House, I have noticed the vote of $10,000 for naval militia. But it was shown that part of that vote for one year was spent in paying for the trip to Paris of the then Minister of Marine. That much I have been able to find out, but not how the rest of the money was expended. But there is the fact—the appropriations were made showing that we have the power to enrol and train naval militia. I say, let us stick to that. This Act gives us power to establish a naval college. Let us establish it. And let us put our trained men on the ships that we build, after we get facilities to build them, and make these ships part and parcel of the great imperial navy. Another thing is that, if we have the naval college, and ask young men to go through, take the training that that college affords, we must be able to offer them a career when they fit themselves for these positions. Such a navy would give a magnificent career to any young man passing through the naval college, because he would not only have a little navy such as the government propose to establish, but he would have a career in which the whole imperial navy would open out for his ambition. And, if we have an imperial navy, there must be some voice in the making of war and controlling the policy the navy is intended to carry out. This would require an imperial council, and we may hope that this could be formed. I do not doubt that the authorities in the old country have had that under consideration. A scheme could be devised under which, if all the nations of the empire took part in making a great imperial navy, arrangements could be made by which each portion of the empire would have its say in the control of that navy. If we are to get the best and the most for our money, to offer the best and brightest career for our young men, giving a chance also to the men who would not be officers but would man the fleet and giving to every one an opportunity to become a member of that fleet, this would be the best course. It would be a navy which we could call our own; it would not be like this little local fleet that we are proposing to build, but we would have a share in this great imperial navy which even now is by far the strongest that the world has ever seen. Therefore, I think it is a matter which ought to be given every consideration.

We have had a number of quotations from writers in the Fortnightly 'Review.' I wish to quote from an article in that periodical by Mr. J. L. Garvin, in a note entitled 'The Dominions and the Navy.' He says:

> It may be asked, what of Greater Britain? Canada is founding a navy of her own. A few decades hence it might begin to be a serious force in the world if the territories of the Dominion are still under the same flag——

It would look as if the significance of clause 18 of this Bill had travelled across the Atlantic, and the people over there really understood its meaning.

> —if the territories of the Dominion are still under the same flag. There is lively dissension on the whole subject. Some Quebec Liberals are still against all naval expenditure. Many Conservatives denounce 'tinpot navies,' and are strongly in favour of direct contributions to the imperial fleet, but there seems not the slightest chance of unanimity in this sense. Australia is also creating a federal navy, which will not be able for many years to throw a sensible weight into the strategical scales. With the system of direct contributions, New Zealand is not entirely satisfied. South Africa, as yet, is not moving. One conclusion is clear. What was called last spring the 'awakening of the empire' upon the naval problem has not been very effective for strictly imperial purposes. Under the systems they have decided to adopt (and it may be conceded that, in view of the present state of sentiment in Greater Britain, no other course was possible), Australia and Canada can neither save themselves nor effectually help us.

I would call the attention of members to this statement:

> Stern experience may teach the people of the Commonwealth——

I presume that should be commonwealths.

> —the necessity of larger sacrifices and closer combination with the mother country and each other. Meanwhile this island must go forward by its own strength, and upon that the whole empire depends. Australian and Canadian squadrons can do nothing to affect the issue in the North Sea. Our efforts in the North Sea may mean all for them. That is the situation, and we must rise to it. If we have full determination to keep the sea, we can keep it. Though the price will be high we can pay it, and nothing in our history will be greater than the spectacle of this little island staking all its resources once more for naval supremacy, wearing down a more formidable rivalry than we have ever met, and holding on at all costs through peace and, if need be, through war until events, far hence, perhaps, shall compel, as they will, the fighting partnership of the whole English-speaking world.

By this Bill, in addition to a naval militia, provision is made for a naval college, a permanent force and its control. Of course the important features are the permanent force and its control.

The Prime Minister, on the 15th November, speaking on this subject, said that we should look on this matter not alone as Canadians, but as British subjects. He said:

> We are Canadians, but we are something else also, we are British subjects as well. We have to consider this subject, not only from the standpoint of our status as Canadians, but we have to approach it from the standpoint of our status as British subjects. If we have duties to perform as Canadians, we have also duties to perform as British subjects. If we have rights, privileges and responsibilities as Canadians, we also have rights, privileges and responsibilities as British subjects."

In another part of his speech he says: 'I am for Canada first, last and all the time, and then he introduces this Bill, and in it puts a clause which gives him or his successor the power to say that we will not go to war, and that the navy shall not be placed under the command of His Majesty unless the Prime Minister and the government so decide. It appears to me inconsistent and contradictory for the Prime Minister to state at one time that we should consider this matter as British subjects and then introduce a Bill which gives him power, if he chose to exert it, to run his knife into the very heart of British connection and cut it off, making in fact a declaration of independence. That is what he has done. You may well say the voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are those of Esau. We have had no mandate from the people for any declaration of independence, we have had no mandate from the people to give the government of this country the power to separate us from the rest of the empire. That is the reason we on this side say that this matter should go back to the people, that they should have an opportunity of declaring themselves and of directing their representatives in parliament so that their representatives should know their will before taking such an enormous step in advance, a step which I believe the majority of the people do not approve, of which I believe they will express their disapproval at the very first opportunity. That is my great objection to this Bill. We have no mandate to pass any such legislation as this. It is taking advantage of the people. It is giving them no opportunity of expressing their opinion or indicating the kind of legislation they would like to have passed. I feel, however, as far as my judgment goes, that the majority of the people would prefer to keep up the connection with the empire, to draw closer those very slight bonds which already bind us, not only the bonds of sentiment, tradition, heredity and affection, but the bonds of business interest, the bonds which shall give us an opportunity of growing and developing in a way that no independent existence could assure to us. That, I believe, is the wish and the desire of the people of this country, and before I would consent to any such declaration as is contained in the Bill before us to-day, I would say: Send this Bill back to the people.

So, Mr. Speaker, I intend, on that account, to vote for the amendment which has been introduced by the leader of the opposition. I think that is the only fair thing. I think it is only treating the people squarely and fairly to give them an opportunity of expressing themselves on this, the most important question that has ever been brought before this House. This Act, and especially clause 18, are in entire disagreement with the spirit and words of the resolution which was unanimously passed by this House a year ago in March. The expression which is contained in this Bill, and especially in clause 18, is one, in my opinion, of offensive bluntness. If we had wished to inform the people of the old country that we are considering the idea of separating from the empire, surely we should have chosen some other time than a time when England is stretching forth every power that she has, vital and financial, to secure her own existence and ours as communities in this family of nations. We should have chosen some other time and some other form of expression rather than put it into such a Bill as this and in such an offensive and blunt way. That is my view of it, and I think that will be the view of a great many of the people of this country. I cannot consent to bring myself to vote for any such proposal. I think it is opposed to the best and truest interests of this country, and I believe it is opposed to the wishes of the majority of the people.

There is one other point that I would just like to glance at in passing, which we have not had referred to by any member of the government, I think, so far, but which is significant in this connection, and it is the question of the flag. At page 27 of this pamphlet relating to the imperial conference there is this statement:

> The question of the flag was discussed, and it was arranged that the admiralty would give the matter consideration and would communicate its views at a later date to the Canadian government.

There is no question of the flag in connection with New Zealand, there is no question of the flag in Australia, but there is a question of the flag apparently in regard to this Dominion of Canada. What does that mean? No member of the government has referred to it. It goes without saying that no vessels of war, not under the command of the admiralty, could fly the admiralty flag on the high seas. This very question of the flag adds point and poignancy to clause 18 of this Bill and shows conclusively that there was in the minds of the gentlemen who were our representatives at this conference the idea of using a separate flag from that which we have been so proud of all our lifetime. That is a matter that must receive more consideration and more explanation. The people of this country are not going to lose their flag with any such complacency as that. There will be something doing before they allow the Union Jack to be hauled down from the masthead, and when this matter is fully thought out and laid before the people, they will have something more to say than they are apparently saying now, and they will know more about the true inwardness of this Bill than they have been allowed to know up to the present time.

We have spoken of the emergency. The emergency appears to be so apparent that it seems almost a waste of time to dwell on the matter. We have had the statements of the Prime Minister of England, of the First Lord of the Admiralty, the man who probably has a better idea than any of them of the conditions in so far as naval affairs are concerned, of the Foreign Secretary and others within and without the government, and they all tend in the same direction. Is it for any in this House, who has not had an opportunity and never will have probably of being intimate with the conditions with which these gentlemen whom I have named are intimate, to question the information which they give us? They know far better than we do what the royal navy is up against, what it has to contend against, and they know what they have to prepare for. There is no doubt in regard to Germany. Germany is a country of most intense ambition. Its military history proves that. It has made itself the dictator of Europe, and now it is trying to make itself, through the supremacy of the seas, dictator of the world. Let me read a short statement taken from a letter written on the 18th March last by Mr. Frederick Harrison, who is a well known publicist, what has no political affiliations whatever on one side or the other, and who has been a consistent anti-militarist. Speaking of Germany, Mr. Harrison said:

The German navy is not built for distant voyages. It is built to act only as the spear head of a magnificent army. No, whenever our empire and maritime ascendancy are challenged, it will be by such an invasion in force as was once designed by Philip and Parma, and again by Napoleon.

It is this certainty which compels me to modify the anti-militarist policy which I have consistently maintained for forty years past. The conditions are now changed; new risks involve fresh precautions. The mechanical as well as the political circumstances are quite different from what they were in the days of Wellington, or even of Palmerston and Gladstone. To one now it is no question of loss of prestige, no question of the shrinking of the empire; it is our existence as a foremost European power, and even as a thriving nation. To talk of friendly relations with Germany and the domestic virtues of the Fatherland is childish. Who in 1860 knew that Prussia was to be the dominant power in Europe? Who in 1864 imagined that she was to defeat Austria? Who in 1868 foresaw that in two years she would be in Paris? Who in 1888 dreamed she would be our rival at sea? And what impelled the cultured realm of the Hohenzollerns to break out in 'blood and iron' to smash Denmark, to humiliate Austria, to overwhelm France, to defy England on the sea? What was the motive, or the cause? What but the thirst of national glory?

It cannot be that the ambition of Germany in naval construction is simply for the purpose of protecting her mercantile marine, because the United Kingdom and her colonies own a total of 9,181 steam and sailing vessels with a tonnage of 18,826,442 tons, while Germany owns only a total of 2,171 steam and sailing vessels with a tonnage of 4,266,703, or less than one-fourth of the tonnage of the British empire. And yet Germany is straining every nerve and with feverish activity is building Dreadnoughts in an attempt to equal the navy of Great Britain herself. Three years ago Germany had only two slips capable of turning out Dreadnoughts, but to-day she has 17, and in the Krupp concern there is an army of 38,000 men producing guns, equipment and armament for the German navy. I need not give any further reasons to show that there is an emergency facing the people of the empire. Now, supposing our amendment were carried, it is said that our contribution for two Dreadnoughts would be $25,000,000. It would make no matter to me so far as my vote is concerned whether two Dreadnoughts would cost $25,000,000 or not, but I would point out that the first Dreadnought cost $8,811,866 when completed in 1906, and that in 1909 the 'Superbe' cost $8,147,930.94, and the 'Temeraire' $8,510,559.84, which included the armament and equipment of these vessels. The proposal in the amendment is to send an amount sufficient to supply the Royal Navy with two Dreadnoughts or their equivalent, and I do not think Canada should be mean or finnicky or small in a matter of this kind. We should give sufficient to attain the object we have in view, and that is in this emergency to supply the Royal Navy with two Dreadnoughts at our expense. We propose this, Sir, not that England will not supply herself with sufficient ships, because even though we did not send a dollar we know she would take precautions in that respect, but we have been told by responsible statesmen in Great Britain that the weary Titan staggers under the load. It is sufficient for me to know that the mother country is in need, to cause me to vote cheerfully for sending to the motherland an amount sufficient to build two of the most modern Dreadnoughts or super-Dreadnoughts to be added to the Royal Navy, so that when the time of stress comes as it may before long, we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that in the firing line Canada will be represented by two of the very best of the fleet. If Canada is represented in that conflict we shall feel a pride in the achievement of these ships, and we shall know that we have helped in the success which I have no doubt will attend the arms of the empire. We took an interest in the Boer war because we had our own men there. We had a personal interest, in many cases a family interest, in it. The war was ours because our own people were interested in it.

These are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, why I intend to vote for the amendment of the leader of the opposition. I take it that the statements that have been made with regard to the immense efforts that Germany is making, the feverish rapidity with which she is struggling to make herself the equal or the superior, if she can, of Great Britain on the seas, are something that we must take to heart. The preparations of Germany, already a great colossus of military power, with a million of men under arms all the time, and four millions to call upon whenever she needs them—not raw recruits, but men who have passed through the landwehr or similar school of military training—are something that we should take to heart. It is a matter of as much interest to British subjects in Canada as to British subjects in Great Britain or to British subjects in Australia. I for one will never vote to haul down the Union Jack from this country. I will not vote for the passing of any Bill which can be turned into a declaration of independence or an Act of separation from the empire of which we form a part; but I stand for British connection, for a closer consolidation of the various portions of this empire, so that we may look forward to the realization in the future of that dream of which I have spoken already, when these great countries, and as they will be in time these populous countries, bound together by ties of interest and blood and affection and sentiment, shall become the greatest galaxy of nations in the world, able not only to protect ourselves from injury, but to uphold the peace of the world.

Mr. A. VERVILLE (Maisonneuve). (Translation).—Mr. Speaker, after listening to the numerous speeches which have been delivered in this House on the momentous question now occupying our minds and that of the people at large for the last few weeks; after witnessing the thrusts exchanged by hon. gentlemen, and listened to the sharp words bandied from one side to the other; finding what precious hours were being taken up by that wordy warfare, I have come to the conclusion that in the interest of the country one should be as brief as possible. Accordingly, I shall take up only very little of the time of the House with the object of discussing this proposal from another viewpoint, one that has not been very much in evidence until now, I refer to the economical and social aspect of that important question.

So then, Mr. Speaker, in rising to take a hand in this important debate, I would like to be endowed with as much courage and enthusiasm as was shown by the class I represent in its efforts towards securing national and social peace.

I shall take the liberty of speaking in the name of those 60,000 persons who were left derelicts, on the shores of the St Lawrence in the seventeenth century, as was so well stated by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), in his speech at the opening of the debate on this question. That community left single-handed, and with stores of courage and energy as their only means of defence, were abandoned by their then leaders, as we learn from history.

I speak in the name of those who, with a real spirit of sacrifice and abnegation have not ceased propagating the idea of and respect for just vindications in favour of national and social peace and freedom. I speak in the name of those 150,000 organized men who are a powerful factor towards the buoyancy of our national finances. I speak in the name of 750,000 people who make up the families of those Canadian workingmen, and on their behalf, I say: Let us have peace. I speak on behalf of the people at large, and I pray the advisers of the nation to set the example of a peaceful community, without any thought of aggression, intent only on developing the resources of the country, on increasing its population, on making the most of its immense possibilities, in short, on applying their energy to promoting the happiness and the welfare of the inhabitants of our young and beautiful country.

In view of the coming celebration of the centenary of peace between Canada and the United States, in 1912, the termination of one of the happiest periods in our history, I entreat the representatives of the people on this momentous occasion to pause and realize that our naval armaments will be a dangerous provocation in days to come. And lastly, I beseech the advisers of the nation to show respect for the principle advocated by modern democracy, with its millions of voices loudly protesting against the threatening armaments effected by civilized people.

Mr. Speaker, I recognize that in speaking thus, I lay myself open to the charge of being sentimental; but I notice that from the outset of this debate, appeals to sentiment have been more numerous than arguments bearing on the proposal under consideration; so, I shall follow in the footsteps of those who have spoken before me. I shall dwell on a few facts which I desire to submit to the House and to the country and, I shall take the liberty of stating my humble opinion as to the future of our nation, though in no wise posing as a prophet.

In a general way, hon. gentlemen have concerned themselves with the dangers threatening us in a more or less distant future, as well as with our obligations towards the mother country and the commercial and business interests of the country. I conceive and the fact was apparent on more than one occasion, that private interests have sometimes exerted a decisive influence on the trend of our legislation; and large capitalists, with a view to protecting their own interests proclaimed loudly that we should in the first place safeguard our trade by providing a navy, and with that object in view a large expenditure is incurred, while at the same time our coasts are at great cost protected against attacks from outsiders. To that danger of invasion, the right hon. leader of the government referred as not at all immediate. On the other hand, the hon. leader of the opposition points to that danger as imminent and urgent enough to induce us to donate at once two Dreadnoughts to the empire. In the third place, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is desirous that the question should be submitted to a referendum. We are then called upon to consider these various proposals and come to a conclusion in regard to them.

I regret to find, Mr. Speaker, that very few hon. gentlemen apparently realize the importance of the part played by the labouring people, in the settlement of those great social and economic problems, and particularly this one. The labouring classes in this country as elsewhere make up the great majority of the people, and, to my, mind, they should have, if not a preponderating influence, at any rate, the right of voicing their opinion. Being the sole representative of labour in this House, I think it is incumbent upon me to speak on their behalf, and to advocate as far as possible the opinions and contentions specially dear to the labouring community. I shall endeavour, within the scope of my feeble attainments to acquit myself of that task, feeling that I am voicing the views of thousands of my fellow-citizens.

We are justly entitled to inquire who are the promoters of warfare. Surely, they cannot be the people who are sent out to fight and who, from that very fact, bring on misery to their families. Those who meet death on the battlefields are heroes, but through their death, women and children dependent on them are made miserable and exposed to the direst privations. The instigators of war are seldom, if ever, those who bear its burden or suffer from its disastrous results. In what class of citizens are soldiers recruited? Among the masses, among existence of hardships, and who give up their lives, mown down by unmerciful guns rather than remain the object of the perpetual scorn of the classes.

Numerous are the examples of wars brought about through the ambition or selfishness of eminent people. Numerous rebellions have been provoked as a means of forwarding selfish objects. And who are the unconscious tools in those wholesale slaughters of human beings? The destitute and the workingmen. So I am justified in saying that the views of labour, and especially of organized labour, should be taken into account when questions of armament and of the establishment of navies are being considered.

Who are those who bear for the greater part the hardships of war? Is it not a fact that the masses are mainly its victims? Is it not a fact, as history shows, that war in a great many cases is nothing else but downright robbery in the interests of the few and at the expense of many? Is not that fact demonstrated from day to day by our most eminent men?

Look at the steps which are taken in our times with a view to conciliating capital and labour, or bringng about harmony through the settlement of those far-reaching and terrible strikes, which after all are the outcome of the persistent rivalry of conflicting interests between individuals or classes. It is actual warfare under a new form, and not the least disastrous.

The settlement of those conflicts between capital and labour should occupy a greater place in the minds of persons in authoirty in all countries. and surely it is not by making preparations for war, by building warships. that we will succeed in humanizing the people and developing widespread ideas of peace, harmony and good-will.

Legislation in our country, in the United States, and I might add in most other countries bearing on the settlement of labour disputes through conciliation and arbitration, is evidence of the people's desire for peace, and goes to show that throughout the world it is within the ranks of democracy that this yearning for peace is mostly to be found. Should we engage in a policy of militarism, we may well expect agitation as a result among the masses in the near future and it would be unwise on the part of the government to close their ears to the protests which will be forthcoming from the people.

The time will come when we will be confronted with the enormous expenditure incident on militarism and when we will have to impose a tax on revenue. Then, the great financiers and captains of industry, the wealthy holders of the nation's resources, will be obliged to contribute their goodly share of the expenditure. Then, will loud protests and recriminations be heard. We all know what has been going on of late in England, and I refer to it as evidence of the truth of my contention. What did we see going on in the mother country, when the government in a spirit of fairness demanded a just and equitable contribution from those who in every part of the empire had called the people to arms? Indignant clamours will be forthcoming from those who in justice should pay their full quota towards the maintenance of these engines of war and destruction; but the least we can do is to recognize the right of the masses, who make up the bulk of the army, to say to the wealthy classes who are not represented in the rank and file: Pay your share of the expenditure required for defence purposes.

What has just occurred in England and what is occurring in other countries, will also happen very soon in this country, we may rest assured; and if ever we are under the necessity of imposing a tax on revenue in order to meet the cost of this undertaking, the welkin will ring with the protests against armament emanating from these wealthy men; in the very near future we will be the witnesses of the revolt of capital against militarism.

Now, Sir, one of the reasons given in the course of this debate, in support of the measure, is that armaments are necessary in order to maintain peace. The principle thus laid down seems dangerous to me: peaceful dispositions cannot be expected from a nation armed to the teeth. It is the same with nations as with individuals: citizens going about unarmed are not objects of fear. Their means of intercourse are reason and good will, while those who go about armed, are intent on violence and destruction. Fortunately, we find to-day that it is more difficult to enlist men than formerly, and that may be the reason why in our schools inducements are offered to the youth that they may take a liking to arms and warfare. Nevertheless, persons in authority and organizers of our militia corps know how difficult it is to recruit men, bloody warfare being repugnant to human nature in general and particularly so to the workingmen.

Why then should we incite our people to wage war? Would it not be better to educate the people and satisfy them as to the benefits of peace as compared with the horrors of war. This century is the century of peace, harmony and good will among civilized nations. Jealousy and envy are less rampant; hands are extended in brotherly friendship in a common endeavour to put a stop to those troublesome conflicts of individual and social life.

Now, what will be the outcome of that policy of militarism about which we are about to enter? Can it be reasonably expected that the proposed expenditure represents the maximum of the yearly outlay? An amount of $15,000,000 is laid down; to my mind, $25,000,000 would be closer to the mark. But the actual amount is not of great importance just now; a more serious matter is that of knowing exactly what will be done later on. We will go on increasing the navy, increasing the land forces; that will be deemed indispensable. And when we have reached the point when we are unable to spend any more, we will then be ready for the fray, and as soon as there arises some trouble in diplomatic intercourse, a matter readily brought about through the influence of one or several of the magnates of finance, we simply will have to fight in a great many cases. I need not dilate, Mr. Speaker, on the ill results of war, on the disasters they bring about, and which are known to all.

A weighty argument in favour of the present policy, in the eyes of the working classes, it is the prospect that these ships will be built in Canada and be the means of ensuring much employment to our people. Of course, we may be allowed to hope that Canadian workingmen will get employment in those great dockyards required for the building of those warships; but as a matter of fact, will it be so? Are we in a position to shut out foreign labour? Far from it, alien labour will be resorted to more than ever; skilled labour and even large numbers of unskilled workmen will be on hand, and as a result a lamentable condition of things will ensue; wherever one man is needed, ten will be offering, and thereby the army of unemployed far from diminishing will increase in numbers. And when we are through with that work, what will become of that army of workingmen thrown out of employment? It may be answered that they will take to farming, to various forms of industry, or enlist in the navy. Unfortunately, many will be constrained to do so; and I am satisfied that the thought had already occurred to the advocates of armaments, that such a contingency will do away with, or at any rate postpone, conscription. It should also be well understood that a goodly proportion of these employed have no qualification whatever for the calling of the farmer; after engaging in an industrial calling, they will be unfit for agriculture. Some will object that these men may be available for the building of our railways. Alas, the number of workingmen is already quite sufficient, and the great corporations which have all the men they can employ, will have no pity on these poor unemployed vainly asking for work and left a burden on public charity. Such will be the mournful situation before our eyes.

Now, sir, I intend dealing with that question from another point of view, to which apparently very little attention has been given, although its interest is paramount: I refer to the economic value of each individual producer as a unit in the producing power of the nation as a whole.

It is a well known fact that nations entering on a policy or armament have to face on that account an ever increasing expenditure. That is a foregone conclusion, as from the very necessity of the case each nation strives to outstrip its neighbour in that respect. Such expenditure is not limited merely to the pay and maintenance of the forces on land and on sea; the cost of armament, plant, ships, &c., reaches a much higher figure and the employment of a great many more men is required in consequence.

It may be even reasonably expected that the army, the navy, the dockyards, workshops and manufacturies will soon, in a country such as ours, occupy about 180,000 men, that is to say about 25 per cent of our working class. Of course, that proportion will not be employed from the first; I am speaking of the time when the system will be well established and in full swing. We all know that European countries have exceeded these averages, and that soldiers and sailors there number several thousand men. So that the figure given above, though approximate only cannot be considered excessive, and is probably a very conservative estimate.

In round figures, and taking the census of 1901 as a basis it may be said that on the average the workman earns $387.16 per year. For the 180,000 workmen required for militarist purposes, that would give a total of $70,000,000. Then, it should not be forgotten that these workingmen will be of a high class and that in consequence their salaries will be higher on the average. If to this amount in the shape of salaries, is added the cost of maintenance —which is always heavy under government control—it will be seen that the above amount should be doubled to say the least, and that even then the estimate would be on the low side. Of course, when attempting to figure out the loss inflicted by militarism the full salary of the workingmen should not be taken into account; but the difference between their normal earnings and the salaries paid by the State, should be debited. That difference will probably amount to twice the normal figure, if conditions prevalent on our continent hold good; it should not be less than abut $50,000,000, that is somewhat less than two-thirds of the normal salaries which give a total, as we have seen, of a little over $70,000,000 for 180,000 workingmen. That would mean $50,000,000 applied to unproductive work. That same census of 1901 showed that the total production of our workingmen amounted to $992,719,000, that is about $1,090 for each workingman.

Mr. Speaker, I have just roughly indicated the cost of militarism to the country once established on the lines proposed. Now, to be fair, and not to take undue advantage of the meaning of such figures the very statement of which might at first sight cause anxiety to the most hardened consciences—I must admit that credit should be given, on the other hand, for amounts to the extent of which the various industries and trades in the country will be benefited through militarism I may be allowed to point out in what measure the country will, from the financial standpoint, profit through militarism.

In the first place, I allow $200 for board to each man, it being well understood that the state must provide the required food for the sustenance of the men, and that trade will profit thereby. In the same way for clothing, I allow $50 per man, maintenance, 50; heating and lodgings, $50; arms, $50; transportation, $50; management, $45; contingencies, $50, which makes up a total of $545 per head, that is one half of his value as a producer.

Now, that amount of $545, representing the expenditure entailed per year by each of these men as a unit in the forces, should be multiplied by 180,000, representing the number of men which militarism employs at unproductive tasks. The total expenditure on account of the men so employed amounts to $100,000,000, which should be deducted from the total of $200,000,000, leaving a net loss of $100,000,000 per year.

Then, Mr. Speaker, if we were to take into account the waste of ability and education to the detriment of productive callings, we will realize that the loss to the country under that head is difficult to estimate. Surely, if hon. members could have afforded to give some time to the study of the economical and social aspect of the question, I am satisfied that we would have listened in the course of this debate to many an expression of broad views favouring peace and condemning armaments.

Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent on me to take a stand against all militarist proposals made in this House, satisfied as I am that, such a stand is the only means of liberating our generation from a state of slavery which is unjust, cruel and unworthy of modern civilization, and the only means also of promoting democratic ideas existing in the latent state among our people.

It was stated previously and justly so that we can have peace only in so far as democratic ideas are deeply rooted in the public mind, and I take this occasion to enter protest against militarism on behalf of modern democracy. However, as far as I am personally concerned, as between the two proposals submitted to this House, apart from the referendum, I believe our Canadian workingmen would object more strenuously to the granting to the empire of the equivalent of two Dreadnoughts than to the providing of a navy strictly and sincerely Canadian in character.

I must say besides, that organized labour in Europe and America have solemnly resolved never to fight one against the other for the protection of private interests, and it is that resolve that causes anxiety to governments and makes them fear that the day has come when free and independent men will refuse to murder their brethren, will consider it a crime to be the accomplices of those who favour war between men through motives of jealousy, of hatred, of vengeance, or for the upholding of private interests.

The hour may not be far distant when the people, the genuine people, borne down by too heavy burdens, harassed by the hardships and the misery of every-day life rendered more and more difficult to bear, will refuse to assume the enormous burden of militarism, and will cry out in powerful tones: 'Non serviam.' And then where will we find soldiers? I shall leave the answer to those who are more particularly entrusted with the care of studying and solving social problems. That cry may seem revolutionary, and no doubt organized labour will be accused of being disloyal to His Majesty. But, in our opinion, the loyal subject is the man who keeps peace with his fellow-citizens, who observes the golden rule, and works towards ensuring the general prosperity of the country. The loyal subjects who have fallen on the battlefield have left us noble example, and their names will live in history. During their lifetime, they have contributed to the wealth and welfare of the nation, and being desirous of following in their footsteps, workingmen for that purpose request that militarism be done away with.

In so doing they have still another object in view, the very thought of which is distasteful to me; so I shall be content with mentioning that militarism is in many cases and in many countries a very active factor of immorality and degradation. I shall only refer in passing to the misfortunes and shame inflicted on families under circumstances when soldiers judge that everything is allowable to them.

I may say in closing that I could not help being aggrieved at hearing hon. members cast aspersions on the French nationality to which I am proud to belong. Accordingly I feel bound to protest with all the energy that is in me on behalf of my constituents against such insults.

I am happy to proclaim highly that my constituents of various nationalities and religious beliefs have nevertheless enough liberality in their ideas to understand that we are one same people under the same flag, and free from all racial or class prejudices. They certainly will be surprised and aggrieved on learning in what narrow and mean disposition that debate was carried on in this House.

Mr. VERVILLE.

The French Canadian, on account of his numerous and brilliant qualities, is surely entitled to the respect and esteem of his fellow-citizens of different origin; and it is regrettable, to say the least, to find that men occupying a seat in this House take every opportunity of casting aspersions on the French Canadian name.

Mr. Speaker, I love my fellow-people above all and I know that this same love of country and of our institutions is deeply engraved in the hearts of the workingmen I represent; but at the same time. we have a great respect for the British flag which protect us. What we wish for as French Canadians, it is equal rights with our English-speaking fellow-citizens and the respect if not the esteem to which as fine and strong a race as ours is entitled. True, as a workingman, the whole world is my home, for labour is required everywhere, finds refuge and protection under all flags.

Therefore, I shall vote with all my heart against any military proposal which will come before this House, and with the full persuasion that I am fulfilling my conscientious duty as a representative of the working classes. But being the representative of an important constituency made up of all classes of society, and having heretofore spoken on behalf of my fellow-people who make up the great labour organization, I shall now give an opportunity to those outside of that organization of expressing their views; and consequently, I shall close by stating that I will vote in favour of the sub-amendment.

Mr. JOHN BEST (Dufferin). This question, Mr. Speaker, is one of the most important that has ever come before the people. What strikes me as very inconsistent on the part of the hon. members on the government side is that while they insist on telling us that there is not the slightest danger of any nation going to war with Great Britain, still they want to put this young country to the enormous expense of building a navy. The reason why I rise to oppose their policy is that I believe it is the first step towards separation. In the first place the cost to be incurred will be enormous, and then the navy, when built, will be of no use in time of war, and we certainly shall not need it in time of peace. If I could go east to the rising sun and west to the setting sun, north to the north pole, and south pole, I believe it would be almost impossible to get the opinion of any man which has not been already expressed in this House at least a dozen times; and in almost every case, the opinion would be that Germany was preparing to go to war with Great Britain. That is another reason why I want to oppose the Bill of the right hon. the Prime Minister; and the reason why I intend supporting the amendment of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) is that I believe in the imminence of that danger, and that we should help Great Britain in time of war. From nearly every hon. member opposite, we have heard that there is no danger of war, but that is an opinion which is not concurred in by Englishmen of prominence. The majority of English authorities believe that war between Great Britain and Germany is imminent, and that opinion is largely shared by Frenchmen. Already the greatest military power in the world, and having no proportionate commercial interests on the ocean, and no extensive and important colonies demanding overpowering naval strength, Germany is building a navy which, it is her avowed intention shall equal—i. e. excel—the British navy; and this, in the face of a long standing explicit warning that Great Britain shall regard any challenge of her command of the seas as a menace. And if the storm breaks, and when it breaks, we shall, nolens volens, be within the disturbed area. Every hon. member of this House believes that Germany is building a powerful navy.

We cannot maintain British connection and stand aloof from Europe. Nor can we turn Turk and run at the first note of the bugle and thereby escape the consequences of the war! What says history? In 1775 Canada was attacked. Why? Because England was at war with her New England colonies. In 1812 Canada was attacked. Why? Because England and France had offended the United States by issuing the Berlin Decrees, and the Americans struck a blow at England by invading Canada.

What then? Shall we surrender our connection with the mother country, and take independent rank among the lesser powers? That will avail nothing! The weaker powers are under the aegis of the greater, and exist on their sufferance! Practically it would mean transferring our allegiance from the mother to a stranger! And would the stranger's hand lie lighter than the mother's? Weakness has never saved a nation from attack. Civilization has not reached that point where it is counted immoral for a strong nation to attack a weak! In the wars that have occurred between two white peoples, in the last quarter of a century, the inequality in the strength of the combatants has been enormous. There is no corner of the world so remote that we could retire thither, live at peace, and escape the notice of the spoiler!

In dealing with the main question, 'Shall Canada possess a fleet?' Let us note, first, that Canada is young, and in her growing time—that all her energies, all her resources, all her wealth of men and money, are needed in laying her foundations secure and well, and building up her nationality. She needs railways and canals, and docks and harbours—she has to secure settlers for her unoccupied territory and build roads for the pioneers! To make surveys and prepare maps of her lands, and charts of her water-courses; to light her coasts and streams, and make them safe for her merchantmen; to draw closer together the outlying boundaries of her scattered population, by an efficient and frequent mail service; to open up new markets and avenues of trade; and to commission swift ships to carry her commerce and correspondence across the seas. She must provide the means for carrying on the work of government, and for carrying out government undertakings. She must build and endow colleges and universities. hospitals and asylums, and provide for the destitute and maimed; she must administer justice, redress wrongs, relieve the oppressed and punish the evil doers, to the uttermost ends of her Dominion. She must care for and support the native race whose heritage she has usurped. She must protect her people from pestilence and the ravages of infectious diseases attacking man, and beast, and tree.

Farther: It is of the gravest importance to Canada that Great Britain should maintain her ascendancy at sea. We would emphasize the fact, that we have but one market for our agricultural produce—our most valuable exports. Close it, and our farmers become impoverished, our whole industrial system paralyzed. We know too well that the United States, in the arranging and adjusting of her tariff, has ever done so to our annoyance and loss. We know that no other country than Britain stands for an open door and equality in trading in her home markets, in the markets of her dependencies, as well as in the markets of the world, and that no other country requires so much of what we have to sell. All our interests centre in the conservation of the British markets. In 1908 our exports by sea were $156,000,000, by land (United States) $90,000,000. Apart altogether from any feeling of loyalty, or gratitude, we are compelled in our struggle for existence, to keep open the British markets for our produce. Let us ever bear in mind that what we do to aid Britain, we do primarily for ourselves; and if, in our endeavour to secure buoyancy for our own life-boat, we aid Great Britain in breasting the storm, we are none the poorer. We have but to contemplate for a moment the condition of affairs if Great Britain were defeated, and, assuming the impossible, that we survived. Where could we place our wheat, our beef, and our dairy produce? We well remember how our markets were paralyzed, in so far as they were affected by the McKinley tariff—and how prices fell to the vanishing point before we secured a footing in England, and that because of an increased duty on a few minor commodities.

This is the situation that faces the people of Canada to-day, and recognizing its importance, and importance which may at any moment become very acute.

And here, I think, will be found the key to the position. Canada cannot hope to be able to engage, successfully, in a naval contest with any first-class power that is likely to attack her. She has not the men; she has not the money. She cannot build battleships, ton for ton, with the United States or Japan, or any of the greater European powers. And so far as the United States is concerned she can never hope to overtake her, either in population or wealth; or to excel her in the skill and energy of her citizens. And, if a quarrel is put upon her by her greater neighbour, which can only be settled by the arbitrament of war, whether the attack be by sea or land, the result can at no time be in doubt. Should that unfortunate event ever occur, we may rest assured that the whole power of Greater Britain will be sent to our assistance; and that we shall not be vanquished while a gun and a man remain under the British flag.

I believe, Sir, that the government should not assume such a large expenditure without first submitting it to the people in some way.

The hon. the Prime Minister tells us that this proposed navy will cost the people of Canada $15,000,000, and the annual maintenance will be about $3,000,000, and that it will not be of much use in case of war for at least five years; $3,000,000 a year for five years will be $15,000,000, and the initial cost of $15,000,000 will be $30,000,000. And if the cost increases the way it has since the 12th of January until the hon. Minister of Militia spoke a few days ago, and the way the expenditure on the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the Quebec bridge increases, at the end of five years the people would have to pay between one and two hundred million dollars.

I believe that the farmers of Canada are willing to aid Great Britain in time of war. And our best way is to send either a money contribution, or Dreadnoughts. The farmers of Canada pay fully two-thirds of the taxation of this country. Last year, about $1,000,000 was spent in agriculture. I claim, Sir, that the government should try to build our canals and make railways so that farm produce would reach the consumer as quickly and as cheaply as possible. I have been taught from my youth that we are British subjects. I have always believed that a man was free while he was on British soil so long as he obeyed the law. Imagine my surprise when, a few days ago, I heard the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) throw it as a taunt across the floor of this House that we on this side were thinking for ourselves. Sir, we think for ourselves and speak for ourselves. I am glad to know that I belong to a party that dares to express its own opinions. If ever I was proud it was to have this assurance from a member on the government side that the party to which I belong was a party of independence of thought and speech. I hope the day will never come when the members of any party in this country will be afraid to speak for themselves. We are British subjects. We love the land of our birth, and the great empire of which we form a part; and I hope the day will never come when that great empire on which the sun never sets will be dismembered or divided.

Mr. M. J. DEMERS (St. John and Iberville). (Translation). The present debate, Mr. Speaker, is one of the very greatest moment and to few questions has the House given greater attention. This is not because the subject of the debate is a new or an unexpected one; it is indeed nothing more than a normal step in that evolution which confederation has prepared. Canada, conscious of her power and of her obligations and gradually taking her place among the nations of the world, must continue to complete that national organization becoming the position she claims as a nation within the British empire.

The fathers of confederation, whose patriotic wisdom is conceded, understood that the bright future of Canada depended upon the union of the provinces under a central government; divided they could never have been properly organized and would not have developed sufficient strength to secure respect. An undefended country would be in the position of a private owner in a land without courts or officers of justice, and it is needless to say that no nation was ever held to be of any account without the possession of adequate defences by land and sea. Modern improvements and discoveries have so far failed to reveal any other means of attaining the noble aims of nationhood.

That the creation of a navy as well as of an army formed part of the scheme of confederation cannot be more clearly established than by the words of Sir George Etienne Cartier in 1864, speaking at the time as the leader of the Conservative party, to the people of St. John, N.B. This is what he said in explanation of the advantages and of the necessity of confederation:

> Another consideration of the highest importance is that of the defence of the country. In our present condition one province cannot claim the assistance of another in case of attack, but with confederation we shall have an army of 200,000 men, a navy of 60,000 men and we will be in such a position that England will be much better disposed to help us than if we depended upon her alone. We should do our best to explain these matters to the people.

On the same day, 14th September, 1864, 'La Minerve,' the Conservative organ in Montreal, printed the following:

With a federal government the central power might dispose of powerful armies and fleets and develop imposing strength in dealing with foreign nations. The government and the nation thus protected would be sure of being respected.

And further on:

It will thus be seen that the object of the federal system is to conciliate the outward strength of a great nation with that respect and care for private interests which under governments embracing too extended a sphere can scarcely be secured.

The same idea was present in the mind of Cartier when at the military camp at Niagara on the 17th June, 1871, he spoke as follows:

A nation can never expect to become great if it is not in a position to resist the enemies who may threaten its existence. The imperial government has been blamed for so promply withdrawing the regular troops from Canada. What ever may be our views on that point, it should not prevent the government and the people of Canada from organizing and maintaining, according to the means and resources of the country, a sufficient military force to secure respect.

If half a century ago the leader of the Conservative party recognized the necessity of a naval force of 60,000 men, how much more urgent must it be to-day to organize a small nucleous of 3,000 or 4,000 men? After the arguments advanced by the champions of confederation in support of the idea of a central government, after the provisions contained in the British North America Act concerning a Canadian navy, similar in all essentials to that creating the land militia, after the revision of the Militia and Defence Acts of 1883, incorporated in the Revised Statutes of 1886, providing for the establishment and the maintenance of a Canadian naval service, it is by no means fitting to speak of the present measure as 'A new departure,' or a 'turning point in our history.'

At the imperial conference of 1902, the Canadian representatives rejected the idea of a contribution in money to be made by all the self-governing colonies of the empire towards the maintenance of the army and navy, and they expressed their views in a document from which I will read the following extract:

At present Canadian expenditure for defence service are confined to the military side. The Canadian government are prepared to consider the naval side of defence as well. On the sea coasts of Canada there is a large number of men admirably qualified to form a naval reserve, and it is hoped that at an early day a system may be devised which will lead to the training of these men and to the making of their services available for defence in time of need.

In conclusion, the ministers repeat that, while the Canadian government are obliged to dissent from the measures proposed, they fully appreciate the obligation of the Dominion to make expenditures for the purpose of defence in proportion to the increasing population and wealth of the country. They are willing that these expenditures shall be so directed as to relieve the taxpayer of the mother country from some of the burdens which he now bears; and they have the strongest desire to carry out their defence schemes in co-operation with the imperial authorities, and under the advice of experienced imperial officers, so far as this is consistent with the principle of local self-government, which has proved so great a factor in the promotion of imperial unity.

This clear and definite attitude on the part of our representatives stating that although we were not disposed to contribute sums of money towards the maintenance of the imperial army and navy, we were none the less ready to establish a navy of our own, was approved of throughout the country and the delegates on their return to Canada were, as we all know, received with distinguished marks of approval. Then came the elections of 1904 and the government's policy as defined by their representatives in 1902, was ratified by a majority of the citizens of the country. There could be no doubt as to the trend of Canadian public feeling at that time, nor is there any reason to believe that it has altered since.

Afterwards came the conference of 1907, where the same principles were laid down but with greater precision, and once more the people of Canada manifested their unequivocal approval of the conduct of their representatives, not only by the manner of their greeting them on their return, but also, as in 1904, by granting them renewed confidence at the election of 1908.

What has happened since which might cause us to swerve from the line of conduct followed on these different occasions?

The resolution of the 29th March, 1909, adopted unanimously by this House, was a complete endorsation of the stand taken by our representatives in England in 1902 and 1907. The third paragraph of the resolution reads as follows:

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation ot the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential of the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.

Sir, the importance and exceptional nature of the present debate is the result of the stand taken by the majority of hon. members to our left and their present predicament shows us to what extremities the partisan spirit may lead.

It is hard to believe our ears when we hear to-day the hon. leader of the opposition, who was one of the framers of the resolution of the 29th March, 1909, and the hon. members of the opposition, who were unanimous in their approval of it.

What else has been done, what else is now proposed, but to implement that resolution of the 29th March? What was unanimously decided has been faithfully carried out, but it is apparently considered wholesome and proper to oppose every government measure and the hon. members of the oposition refuse to be bound by their former consent. That is the only reason—and it is a very bad one—for their present oposition to the government Bill.

It is quite reasonable to debate upon details of the Bill, but it appears to me unreasonable and even ridiculous to question its principle after its unanimous endorsation by the whole House. It will be difficult to persuade the public that such an attitude can be sincere.

There are in this country many different opinions on the question of the navy—many of which are sincere and respectable, but others inspired by less patriotic feelings and which scarcely can be prompted by the national interests. There are people in the province of Quebec who, whenever matters of an imperial nature arise seem inclined to decide them as if the province of Quebec was the whole of Canada, as if we were still living under the gloom of 1837, when the bureaucracy and the family compact did everything to persecute, humiliate and exploit French Canadians. They never stop to reflect that circumstances have completely changed and that we are now enjoying peace and justice in the land of freedom 'par excellence,' under the shadow of the British flag, which protects those liberties; yet even those who refuse to defend that flag would dread to see it disappear. Such people would, none the less, declare: 'We are loyal,' as if their lip loyalty were of any avail, when every sacrifice for the navy or the very idea of defence is refused.

Some of those who hold such opinions or who at least profess to hold them, are influenced purely and simply by political considerations; they are by no means convinced, but they desire to pander to a feeling which they think they discern in the province of Quebec; they are most fortunately mistaken as to the sound and judicious opinions prevailing among the masses of the Quebec population, who have time and again shown their desire to live in peace and harmony with the other portions of the country and their readiness to assume uncomplainingly their fair proportion of the national duties and obligations.

As for those who, desiring to avoid any direct contribution, are asking for a plebiscite what is their position? Is it a reasonable or a rational one? Can any man having listened and observed hesitate as to the sentiment which existed in the country previous to the resolution of the 29th March, 1909? It is to that period that we must go back if we would understand the inconsistency of those who, being opposed to a direct contribution, desire an appeal to the people. That resolution of the 29th March, 1909, had the useful result of modifying public opinion by reminding the citizens of this country that Canada is a self-governing nation. Is it not true that the great majority of the country before that time favoured a direct contribution that the great majority of the people of this country, swayed by sentiment rather than by sound common sense, would have desired to offer Dreadnoughts, &c. A plebiscite would then have meant neither more nor less than a direct contribution, and as I would be ready to admit the apparent logic of a request for a plebiscite on the part of those who favour a direct contribution, but not, however, an appeal to the people, being apparently so sure of public opinion that they desire to impose it immediately; so also do I deny to the opponents of direct contribution the right of complaining that the government has not acceded to their request which is ridiculous when the inevitable result is considered. I am convinced that a large number of those who are clamouring for a plebiscite are doing so because they are convinced that the thing is impossible after the resolution of the 29th March, 1909.

Mr. Speaker, when I consider the consequences of a plebiscite, the popular passions and the racial hatreds it would let loose, I look upon it with the utmost alarm, and I would consider such a measure a crime. And at this point, I have a word to say to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has not taken in this debate a position consistent with his avowed principles. He is asking for a plebiscite. Would he respect the verdict thus rendered? I do not think so. The hon. member has seen fit in the course of his speech of the February 3, 1910, to go over the details of the Manitoba school question and of the Alberta and Saskatchewan questions. Now, we have had plebiscites, and very important ones, on these questions at the elections held in 1900, 1904 and 1908. Does the hon. member respect these expressions of public opinion and submit to the popular verdict? What security does he offer that he would respect it better in the present case, and where is his title to pose as a champion of the rights of the people as expressed by plebiscites?

As to the contention that, constitutionally speaking, we have no right to act without consulting the people, I think that it is quite unfounded, and no more sincere than the demand for a plebiscite. The representatives of the people have received a mandate to administer the affairs of the country during five years, and as the question we are debating is not even a new one, I may now say this: that we are the mandateries of the people and that our mandate is a general one enabling us to vote and to act to the best of our judgment and ability, with the sole obligation of rendering an account to our constituents; our action in so doing will be constitutional and legal. I will quote, by the way, a passage from a book by Raymond Poincarré:

> In a free democracy no government can enjoy any other authority but that resulting from the general will, and in the exercise thereof they are responsible yet subject to control. This does not mean that a government must remain the passive instrument of popular caprice or of every wave of opinion. Like every mandatory and administrator such a government has its obligations and especially the duty of carrying on the business of the country with activity and foresight. They are obliged to render an account of their actions, but they have a right to act. They must not attempt to hold in tutelage the country and the legislature, but they none the less hold an authority which must not be weakened.

Sir, I will refer but briefly to those other extremists to be found chiefly outside the province of Quebec. Extremes meet. They also believe that we are still at that period of our history when the Canadian colony existed only by the tolerance of England and when Canada was a mere toy in the hands of the metropolis to be dealt with according to each passing caprice. For them, Great Britain is still, with respect to Canada, the sovereign master to whom everything is due and before whose will alone all must incline. From their point of view we should give up all we have, because their views are so narrow that they believe that nothing belongs to us.

On the other hand (and this opinion appears to me to be the result of the sound common sense of the great mass of the people of this country) there are those who believe that Canada has become a nation within the British empire and that when we lose no occasion to proclaim our loyalty our action should not belie our words. Some of us believe that we live in the best country of the world, under the best possible system of government, that the protection of Britain is our safeguard and the buttress of our progress and development. Many of us consider that for the present at all events and even from a business point of view alone, we are directly interested in the maintenance of British supremacy on the ocean, and that were that supremacy to be lost the result would be the most complete disturbance of our trade, without mentioning the uncertainty of our own national existence. Many of us believe that our dignity as a nation within the empire requires that we should begin to organize our own defence, the protection of our coasts and rivers, our fisheries and trade in order to secure by our own efforts our national existence. Some of us also aspire to a still greater future and consider the establishment of an exclusively Canadian navy as a guarantee of the coming greatness of the Dominion of Canada and as the last step towards nationhood of a great people. I belong to the latter class and I am prepared to vote in favour as the Bill brought down by the government, believing as I do that I am thereby doing my duty as a Canadian citizen and as a British subject.

On motion of Mr. Lewis, the debate was adjourned.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BLAIN. Will the naval debate go on to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 1, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 150) respecting the Restigouche Boom Company, and to change its name to 'The Restigouche Log Driving and Boom Company.'—Mr. Reid (Restigouche).

CLAIMS AGAINST GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Mr. GRAHAM moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 151) to provide for the adjudication of small claims arising in respect of the operation of the government railways. He said: The provisions of this Bill are, in short, to create of the Board of Railway Management a body that can be sued for small claims for damages, as they could be sued if they were a company, and that no fiat or petition shall be necessary before making such claims. There is a provision that under certain circumstances a case may be removed to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the limit of the claim?

Mr. GRAHAM. $200.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does it include actions for negligence, as well as under contract?

Mr. GRAHAM. Damages for negligence, but not under contract.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WATERWAYS TREATY.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the orders of the day are called I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he expects to make any announcement before the end of the session with regard to the Waterways treaty?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All I can say is that I hope to be able to do so.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the Naval Service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. E. N. LEWIS (West Huron). Mr. Speaker, I believe we are face to face with a question which will have a greater bearing on the future prosperity, comfort, health, and wealth of the people of Canada than any other question that has been before this House, I was going to say, since confederation, but during the last decade. And, Sir, it is very gratifying to me, and it must be gratifying to every one, to know that both parties in this House are of one mind in regard to the great principle embodied in the Bill which is now before the House. As an evidence of that, I may cite the words of the hon. the Prime Minister, when he said that in case the supremacy of Great Britain on the high seas was endangered, it would be the duty of all the daughter nations to form a rampart around the motherland and protect her from attack; and in winding up his remarks, he said that the life of Canada depended on the safety of Great Britain, or words to that effect. And, Sir, those words were endorsed with stronger language by my own leader, the leader of the opposition.

What more significant event could there be than that which took place when, in one of the daughter nations, 3,000 miles removed from the motherland, 200 men, themselves descended from other lands, English, French, Irish, Scotch, German, and no doubt others, but citizens of the daughter nation, elected as the representatives of the people in parliament, rose, not by concerted action, but as one unanimous whole, and sang together that national anthem of the motherland in honour of him who is every inch a king and every inch a man. But, Sir, how absurd it must have seemed to some of the neighbouring nations when they saw afterwards that some of the rabid partisans of both sides and some of the newspapers, probably looking for news, were crawling over each other in the effort to establish the claim that the national anthem belonged to them, that they were the only true, loyal party, that they were the only party that belonged to the motherland. This country is downtrodden, or will be, if we keep on in the way we are going. And the people will be over-ridden and depressed by combines and trusts, and I call upon the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. King) at this juncture to add to the Bill which he has laid before the House this session a provision that there shall be no combine or trust in reference to the national anthem, the national flag or the loyalty of this country. That pernicious, avaricious, unpatriotic idea should be stamped out. Why cannot we all be of one mind with respect to that matter? In reference to the question of loyalty, my grandfather, when a young man, in 1776, left the state of Connecticut and came to Canada to follow the flag. In 1812 he was one of the yeoman guards of the St. Lawrence river, repelling the American invasion, anl I take second place to no man with reference to my loyalty to the flag. Probably I know more than any one, excepting two hon. gentlemen in this House, when I say that there are no more loyal people than the sturdy yeomanry and mechanics of the riding from which I come. Who were more distressed, felt bluer or looked more so on the black days during the South African trouble than the men of Huron? Sir, it is easy enough in the large cities for young men to get together and enthuse and froth at the mouth in reference to loyalty, but when the scattered yeoman of the county from which I come came together and enthused in a patriotic way, as they did after the relief of Ladysmith and upon other notable occasions during the South African war, no one can require better evidence of their loyalty, and no overt act is needed. Outside the relatives of the men of the 42nd regiment, which was cut to pieces in South Africa, I do not believe there was a man in England who felt that event as keenly as did the people whose representative I am. I have been elected by the voters of West Huron to represent them in this parliament. This country is run by the larger of two parties, and it is impossible for all men of the different parties to think alike individually. Some have to give way to the others. It has been stated repeatedly in the Liberal press that the loyal opposition was divided on this question. I speak with knowledge when I say that there is no more division in the ranks of the opposition than there is in the ranks of the government. There are men on this side who will vote against their ideas and there are men on the other side who will vote against their ideas. There are Liberals who have been elected to follow the Liberal policy and to follow the Liberal party, and while they do not see eye to eye they will vote for their leader as we will vote for our leader. They would not be doing their duty if they did not do so. I wish to note that I have been told by hon. members on both sides of the House, personal friends of mine, that if I publicly took the stand which I have taken privately I will not return to this House the next general election. If so I shall be sorry, but I trust my people will believe I acted in their interest as I believe I do.

Mr. CONMEE. Tell us what it is.

Mr. LEWIS. The hon. gentleman is asking me for information. There are two bad habits becoming prevalent in this parliament which tend to warp the dignity of parliament and interefere with the continuity of debate. One is asking questions which generally, like boomerangs, recoil on the persons who ask them. I have been very sorry at times to hear questions from this side of the House, because I felt that the person who asked them sometimes got the worst of it and vice versa. I am only going to speak for ten minutes, and if any person wants information I will be glad to give it to him, if I can, when I get through, but until then I do not want to be interrupted. One of the important features of the question before the House is what is the great pressing danger threatening the British empire. There is no doubt that the supremacy and life of the mother country rest entirely upon the $400,000,000 of toll which she receives for the carrying of the commerce of the world, and without which she could not stand for a moment. The main question is: How can we, as we have all agreed to do, help the mother country if she is in trouble? I do not think, from the documents which I have read and some of which I will hand into the House, that there is any pressing danger as far as Germany is concerned. Lord Beresford and Lord Roberts come out here and say there is. They have earned the right to say what they like, but they are men of war and they come out here and talk of war. The great canal man would come here and talk of canals, the great medical man would come and talk about tuberculosis or similar matters, but it rests with us to give consideration to all these views and help the country in the best way we can. I believe, Sir, that what Germany is preparing for is intervention by the United States in South America.

In support of this contention I give not my own opinion, but that of Captain Mahan, the greatest living naval expert who has declared that the German fleet is not unlikely to be used to establish a new state of things in Brazil or to dispute the control of the Panama canal. I also cite as an authority the Ottawa 'Citizen,' in which it was stated that the Germans are looking for a large tract of country in the Argentine republic, and Professor Schmoiller, a German, has declared that he looks forward to the day when there will be a second Germany of 30,000,000 people in southern Brazil. And, Sir, in this connection I would point out that the emigration to Brazil and to South America is of an entirely different class from that which comes to the shores of the northern part of this hemisphere. The German who comes to the land of the beaver or the land of the screaming eagle is rapidly assimilated into the population and becomes a supporter of the established institutions of these countries, but the German immigrant to South America is German, first, last, and always. But, Sir, notwithstanding the fact that there are experts who assure us there is no danger to England from the German menace, it is nevertheless the part of prudence to be prepared for war. As a recent editorial in the Toronto 'Telegram' pointed out the unity of the British nations during the South African war prevented the terrible consequences of intervention by other nations, and the strength of the British fleet during the Spanish American war prevented intervention by Germany. The maxim is as true to-day as ever it was, that in time of peace we should prepare for war, and, Sir, the life blood of the British nation depends on the British fleet. The question then remains: How can we as Canadians discharge our duty to the motherland. I say, Sir, that the solution is not to be found in the creation of a Canadian navy. Canada as a country is not ready for militarism, and God forbid that militarism should ever thrive in this peaceful land. I stand here taking my political ife in my hands to say, that I am unqualifiedly, unreservedly, and unconditionally opposed to regular militarism in Canada whether it is to be found in an army or in a navy. Of course, I do not include in that our militia system, but, I should be horrified to think that there would be imported into this country that militarism which is the curse of some European countries and which can only end in officialism, red tape, circumlocution, poverty, and socialism. We have the evidence at hand that our young Canadians will not join voluntarily—and they cannot be forced to join under our present happy conditions—the regular military service whether in the navy or in the army. I might point to the regular regiment at Halifax, which I believe is now only three-quarter strength, and I am told that 90 per cent of the men are British army pensioners. In a prosperous and growing country like Canada the young citizens of the country cannot be induced to give up their prospects and to tie themselves down to a life of idleness in the barrack room. For my part, I do not want to see in this country one-half the people working, slaving like the people in the old lands, keeping their noses to the grindstone, in order to support the other half in idleness preparing for a war which may never come. Then, I may be asked how do you expect to help the motherland? In a work entitled 'The A B C of the British navy,' prepared by Admiral Henderson and Mr. Russell, it is pointed out that the great need of the British fleet is men. Lord Beresford has intimated to the British House of Commons that four-fifths of the British fleet is undermanned, that one-half of it had only the nucleus of crews, that one-fifth of the fleet only had its full compliment, and in a document which I shall lay on the table of the House for publication in 'Hansard.'

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must read anything which he wishes to appear in 'Hansard.' The custom of the House is that anything that is to be published in 'Hansard' must be spoken or read.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, Sir, I will have to take up more time than I intended, and I regret having to do so, but I am in hopes that these citations may have some bearing on the question before the House. The literary digest, as quoted in the London 'Standard,' and the Hamburgher 'Nachrichten,' referring to the report of a German naval expert on the British navy says:

England's Half-manned Ships.

England at present, to judge from her parliamentary reports, is in a terrible condition of alarm over Germany's naval expansion. Each party blamed the other because ships with less than half crews had been ordered to sea. 'We have the ships, we have the men, we have the money too,' rang the old music-hall song. It is now admitted that England has the money, and can make as many ships as she chooses, but the men are wanting. The present state of things we thus summarize from the London 'Standard':—

The grave position of the home fleet is made plain in the details of its units as it assembles to-day off the mouth of the Thames for a cruise. Although it is composed of four squadrons, consisting in all of eleven battleships and fourteen cruisers, the startling fact is disclosed that of these twenty-five vessels, fourteen are dangerously undermanned.

Of the undermanned vessels, six battleships have only half-crews; two of the cruisers have half-crews, while the remaining cruisers have only two-fifths crews.

Fourteen of the twenty-five ships, therefore, can not manœuvre with the remaining eleven, can not fight, and can not run away. It is officially announced that this British war fleet is to exercise in the North Sea—where it will be subject to the keenest foreign criticism.

Commenting editorially on this avowal, the 'Standard' observes:—

Such is the fleet which Mr. McKenna has sent to manœuvre in the North Sea in winter. The useless hardship unnecessarily inflicted upon officers and men, the gratuitous waste of money, need no comment. But there are wider aspects of this incredible action to be considered. These are two. The first may be briefly indicated. At a time of somewhat critical international relations, the first lord sends to sea a fleet of twenty-five ships which an efficient squadron of half its size could sink or destroy, and the pitiable state of disorganization and weakness to which the British fleet has been reduced is advertised in the face of the whole world.

Of the keen foreign criticism which this London organ anticipates we may perhaps find a sample in the following remarks of the 'Hamburger Nachrichten':—

'It is not the ships but the men that do the fighting,' still remains the truest of dictums. And yet one often hears the question of a navy's strength or weakness decided merely by the number of its vessels—cruisers, battleships, torpedo boats, and submarines. As to the question of the number of her sailors, the recently formed reserve fleet is both undermanned and undertrained, but probably this will not be recognized until the moment of mobilization, which will result in its incorporation in the regular fleet. But what is very apparent is that in case of war Great Britain will suffer most from the insufficient manning of her own vessels.—Translation made for the 'Literary Digest,' March 27, 1909.

I cite the following from the Ottawa 'Citizen':

Men wanted in Navy—Ships are wasted for lack of Hands—Some have two-fifths of the Complement—Where will Crews be found for New Ships?

London, Oct. 25.—It has been stated officially that the battleships of the Albion class, which are to be stationed at the Nore as a reserve for the home fleet, are to be manned with reduced nucleus crews—that is to say, with about two-fifths of their full complements.

The ships of the Albion class—the Albion, Canopus, Glory, Goliath, Ocean, and Vengeance—though not large vessels, are very useful. They are of 12,950 tons, and carry four 12-inch and twelve 6-inch guns, and are still capable of making eighteen knots when pushed. They have all been completed since 1900.

The Albions will join a number of ships which are already laid up in reserve, manned with a fraction of their nominal complements.

The obstacle in the way of sending them to sea, however, is shortage of men.

Among the battleships which are laid up at the home ports in the third and fourth divisions of the home fleet are eight ships of the Majestic class—ships of 14,900 tons, armed with four 12-inch and twelve 6-inch guns and completed in 1895-8. These ships have—or are supposed to have— about three-fifths of their full complement on board, a large proportion of the short service men, who spend their years in the navy, principally in the ships, and are then passed into the reserve without any adequate training in the work of a sea-going fleet.

The 'Prince George,' of this class, is kept 'in dockyard hands,' for no other reason, apparently, than to save the cost of a crew.

Now, Sir, we have been told by the First Lord of the Admiralty in England that the preponderance of Great Britain in ships is so great that he absolutely refuses—I quote his own words to take over ships which are being built in England for foreign countries:

No Cause for Alarm—Britain is quite Safe—First Lord of the Admiralty says the present supply of Dreadnoughts is Ample.

London, March 25, 1909.—Reginald McKenna, First Lord of the Admiralty, stated in the House of Commons that he declined to consider the advisability of purchasing one or other of the three Brazilian battleships now under construction in this country. He added:—

If we require more ships I think it would be better to build them ourselves, but we don't require any more ships at present. As regards the future, we will have ample time to build them.

I have some short citations here which I would like to have published in 'Hansard' without taking up the time of the House to read them.

Mr. SPEAKER. I regret that I cannot grant permission to the hon. gentleman because it has led to abuses in the past. The 'Hansard' must be a report of what is said or read in the House.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, Sir, I trust that when the Prime Minister is revising the rules of the House he will make provision under which such citations as these may be printed without being read. Were such a rule in force it would in my opinion lead to a great saving of time. Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that England is not wanting in ships at the present time. England is building a $40,000,000 navy for Spain, she is building three battleships for Brazil, she is building two for Chili, two ships for Italy, and other ships for other foreign countries, and under agreement with the builder the British government has the right to take these ships at any time they are needed. We have, as I have read, the refusal of the First Lord of the Admiralty to take these ships because he says they are not needed, and this would seem to establish good ground for my saying that England is not in need of ships. Now, Mr. Speaker, while I agree with the naval policy of the government—(and in this I am speaking for mysel alone) with regard to building dry docks which are needed in this country, I absolutely disagree with them as to the building of a Canadian navy. As was said to me by a gentleman from the west, a man who knows the feeling of the people in the west as well as any other man in the House: Canada needs a navy just about as much as a man needs a fur overcoat in that land to which a good many of us are going hereafter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. LEWIS. Now, Sir, a word with regard to battle ships. If we looked at the history of the three last wars, the Chinese-Japanese war, the Russo-Japanese war, and the Spanish-American war, it will be seen that the naval strength of a nation depends on her battleships. In the A. B. C. of the British navy by Admiral Henderson and Mr. Russell, the dictum is laid down that the great final issue will be decided by the battleships alone; it was so at Trafalgar in days of hemp and wood; it is still so in the day of steam and steel. Therefore, Sir, if ships we are to have, it would seem that the best thing to provide are battleships, and together on the firing line. I cite that great family paper the Montreal 'Star':

The mobilization of a great British fleet of three hundred and fifty warships is a magnificent object lesson of the naval power of the empire. No such object lesson would appear if we were told that six British fleets were being mobilized—one in the home waters, another off Halifax, a third off Vancouver, a fourth near Australia, a fifth near New Zealand, and, possibly, a sixth under Table Mountain. Yet this division of the fleet and wide scattering of its power would be the logical outcome of the proposal to establish colonial navies.

The 'Free Press' of Ottawa, on March 24, 1909, in an editorial headed 'Has Canada gone Batty also?' said:

We believe that the great body of public opinion in this country is against the idea of Canada being drawn into the vortex of European militarism.

The Huron 'Expositor,' Seaforth, Friday October 15, 1909:

The announcement is officially made that the imperial government of Germany will ask for a loan of $125,000,000, this enormous amount being required to cover deficits. This is one of the first fruits of intense militarism.

The common people are being ground to death to maintain an army and navy to gratify the vanity of the ruling elements and to provide positions for the sons of the aristocracy where they can have an affluent living at the expense of the toiling masses.

Now, Sir, how can we help the mother country? There is one way in which we can help her, and if the English experts knew it, they would at once grasp the idea. We have in this country 84,323 fishermen, the finest men that sail the waters, in the maritime provinces and on the great lakes, the descendants of those men who sailed the cutters of England and the luggers of France; and we have 11,490 sailors on the great lakes. I am sorry that we have not more sailors on the ocean, because we have hardly an ocean-going steamship or vessel under the Canadian flag. These men are busy in their vocation for six months in the year; and if you came with vessels of the type of the 'Charybdis,' and asked them to volunteer for a navy, you could not get one of them to leave his big pay and his prospects. But after their return on the first of December, and after they had their holiday of one month at home, this government on the second of January of each year could get 40,000 or 50,000 of these men—and I guarantee that I could get 5,000 from the shores of my own lake and 200 from my own town—sailors, stokers and engineers, to volunteer to go to Halifax or Vancouver and take three months' training at the big guns; and I would suggest that this government do not buy any expensive warships, which will be scrap in a few years, but make an arrangement with the motherland under which she will send out a dozen or more men-of-war on which these young men can be trained. Canada to pay them. I will guarantee that after three years' training 40,000 young Canadians would be likely to give as good an account of themselves as the several thousand Canadians, Australians and New Zealanders who went to South Africa during the Boer war and there gave evidence of their loyalty. Why, Sir, the people of my county were tumbling over each other to get to the recruiting office in their desire to be taken to South Africa. We could have sent 10,000 from western Ontario in case the motherland got into trouble, to say nothing of the two or three hundred we did send. I also quote the words of the Earl of Clan William, in an interview with the Toronto 'News' last July:

> Canada would do a great service to the empire if it built up a reserve of seamen, who would be invaluable in case of war breaking out.

If the Admiralty were asked if they would prefer forty thousand sailors trained to big guns they would say yes. I say it advisedly, from investigations made by myself and by members on both sides of the House who have spoken to me on the matter, that I believe that four out of every five men in Ontario—and I have heard the same from other provinces—do not believe in a navy for Canada, and I believe there are more who are against a contribution to the motherland. Some people go wild on the subject of imperialism; but, Sir, there are threads of love and affection and friendship and sentiment uniting us to the motherland which, though fine as silk, are stronger than steel. But, Sir, if you are going to try to put handcuffs of iron on the hands of the free Canadian citizen, and try to put him in an iron cage, those handcuffs will snap like thread. There is no overt act of loyalty required from a Canadian. We are always ready when the time comes. There is a definition of ingenuity which applies to the Canadian people—to do the right thing at the right time without being asked to do it. But, Sir, when you ask us to repay those bonds of love and friendship and kinship with money or with paid help, you are making a mistake. There is nothing like personal service in matters of this kind. In reference to the British men of war and the Canadian seaman, I cite the case of a present editor of the Toronto 'Globe,' Mr. Ewan, who was sent by his paper in 1899 down to the island of Newfoundland, to go round that island with the British fleet, which was trying the expedient of ascertaining what Newfoundland sailors were made of. They went from port to port and called the fishermen and sailors together and spoke to them. At first the men were averse to any questioning. Finally a large number, probably 2,000 or 3,000, volunteered for a voyage to the West Indies and back. They went and returned, and the British admiral was very much pleased with them, and they were pleased with their experience in handling the big guns. What was the result? The British admiralty sent out the 'Charybdis' and tried to get men to volunteer for the whole year, but they found that it was an absolute impossibility. We are not ready for regular militarism in this country. Now, Sir, as to war: It is not a question of ships altogether—and I probably know more about it than most other members of this House, from my youthful training on vessels, though I have never been on a man-of-war—it is not a question of ships or of the number of men, but it is a question of the quality of the men. It is the man behind the gun. Drake's ships would not have roared so loudly or so strongly had they been manned by others than the seamen who did man them. Why cannot these two parties meet together on this great question and do what is best under the circumstances? Both parties are asking Canada, which knows all about railways, to build battleships. We do not know anything about battleships, but we do know that we have the best class of men to man them that can be found anywhere, and they are all from the same common stock Frenchmen and Englishmen, they all come from the same stock. I have it on the authority of a high personage in this House that when the Welsh sailors and fishermen, from which stock I am descended, and the French mariners from St. Malo, and other ports in the province of Normandy and Britany—St. Malo, famous as the point from which Jacques Cartier came originally—when these two nationalities meet in the channel on their fishing voyages, they speak to each other in the one mother tongue although parted for centuries. That shows conclusively that we are all descended from the one stock, and there should not be any division among us in this matter as regards loyalty. We ought all to be one in that sentiment.

I repeat that I am absolutely opposed to spending $25,000,000 for a Canadian navy or $25,000,000 for two Dreadnoughts. There are one million people who pay the taxes of this country, and that means a tax of $25 on every man of them. There is not one of them who will stand for it. It is not a question of going to the country. There are enough people in the country who would vote for men and not for measures, but if a plebiscite were taken, both the policy of the government, and the opposition would be defeated by an overwhelming majority.

His Majesty, King Edward, our sovereign, has by his wisdom, policy, and tact, earned the title of Edward the Peacemaker, yet still his battleships are being launched with increasing rapidity, each new one stronger than its predecessor in every thing that goes to making a fighting machine. And that supremacy on the high seas, which England gained 300 years ago from Spain, has continued until this day, and has ever been the greatest safeguard to the peace of the world. I look to see the day when England and Celtic peoples shall be bound together in one harmonious whole—Gael and Gaul alike—for the peace of the world.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN (South Huron). Under ordinary circumstances, I should feel almost like apologizing to the House for taking part in a discussion which has been so prolonged. But since I have the honour of a seat in this House, and while I have been endeavouring to attend to the discharge of the duties pertaining to that position to the best of my ability, I do not think I have trespassed upon the time of the House by over much, or over long speaking; and I might be permitted to say, without desiring to give offence to any one, that if some hon. gentlemen were to follow my example in this respect, there would not be such necessity for revising the rules of the House. In this matter, however, I feel that I would not be doing justice to myself or those I represent were I to give a silent vote. The question we are discussing is probably the most important that has come before parliament since confederation. It involves an entirely new departure. It means the inauguration of an entirely new policy, rendered necessary by the increased prosperity and influence of this country, and its increased attachment to the empire.

I have no very great objection to many of the remarks which have been made by my hon. friend and good neighbour from West Huron (Mr. Lewis) who has just spoken, and consequently I do not intend attempting to make any particular answer to any particular point he has raised; but there are some things on which he has dwelt to which perhaps I shall refer as I proceed. But at the outset, let me say that I do not intend to treat this question from a technical, scientific, or even constitutional standpoint. Technically I know very little about it, but I shall endeavour to deal with it from a plain, practical, common sense point of view. In my opinion, having regard to the very great importance of this subject, it is necessary that the people in every constituency should be seized of all the conditions, and the only way which they can get that information is through the discussion in this parliament. Consequently I feel that any discussion on this matter is not by any means time wasted. As I have said I intend to deal with it from a plain, practical, common sense standpoint, and the question before the House, stripped of all superfluity, may be reduced to a very plain, practical, easily understood proposition. In the first place, the opposition propose that a large sum of money be donated to Great Britain for the purpose of enabling her to improve and extend her navy, Great Britain to continue the expense and the responsibility of the naval protection of Canada, and the money which we give to Great Britain to be expended in that country for the benefit of British ship builders and artisans. On the other hand the proposition of the government is that a lesser amount of money be devoted towards the establishment or erection of the nucleus of a Canadian navy for the protection of our own shores, thus relieving Great Britain of the expense and responsibility of the naval protection of this country, and this money to be expended in our own country for the benefit of Canadian ship builders and artisans and also for the purpose of building up a larger shipbuilding industry in Canada which will give employment to thousands of our working people and enlarge the home market for our farmers and manufacturers. It is quite proper that I should say that our love for and devotion to the mother country is only right and proper. Filial affection, I am sure, is one of the noblest traits of human nature; but filial affection divorced from self-preservation does not amount to a very great deal. It is the boy, the young man, which makes the best use of his opportunities and the gifts with which he has been endowed, and who shows a disposition to carve out his own future and to paddle his own canoe who is always dearest to the mother's heart. And, Sir, if Canada shows a disposition to take advantage of the great privileges which have been placed in her way, of the great natural advantages with which she has been endowed, and if she shows a disposition to take care of herself and do what is right and necessary in her own interest, she will, I contend, do that which is most likely to win the esteem and confidence and trust of the people of Great Britain and of every other country.

Sir, I was sorry to notice, whether consciously or unconsciously, running through nearly every speech of hon. gentlemen opposite, a vein deprecatory of Canada and of Canadians.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. M. Y. McLEAN. Yes; we had it stated here, over and over again, that Canadians have not the ability nor the skill to construct their own ships. We have had Australians held up to us as a bright and shining example because she has sent her money to Great Britain and looks to Great Britain to construct her ships. We have heard, in almost every speech from the opposite side of the House, attempts made to detract from the honour and credit which is due to the right hon. the leader of this House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Attempts have been made, time and time again, to show that he is disloyal to his country, that he has betrayed the trust which was reposed in him by the people, and that he is not acting in good faith with the people, and so on and so on; and, lastly, that he is introducing a policy which is simply the thin end of the wedge of disruption of the empire. One hon. member—I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan)—spoke for two mortal hours here the other night, and at least one-third of his speech was devoted to that sort of thing. Sir, the name and memory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier will remain bright and green in the minds and hearts and affections of the people of Canada long after the hon. member (Mr. Cowan) and I are forgotten. We have also had a brilliant word-picture placed before us showing Great Britain at war with Germany; her immense fleets were assembled upon the high seas; the word went forth to Australia and she came forward courageously and promptly with her fleet unit: the word went forth to little New Zealand and she came forth, with equal promptitude, with her Dreadnoughts: the word went forth to Canada, and she came up at the heel of the hunt with her 'tin pot navy.' And when the great British admiral cast his eye over his assembled fleet as they rode the sea ready for action, he looked upon Australia and beamed upon her with pleasure and pride; he looked upon New Zealand and she equally met with his approval; he looked upon Canada, he frowned upon Canada, and ordered her to the rear and instructed her to sail for her own shores as fast as her ships could carry her: and poor Canada had neither part nor lot in the bloodless conflict of that picture. When I heard all this, it seemed to me that the author of it should have been a novelist instead of a politician. I ask: When has Canada undertaken any great national enterprise and has not carried it out successfully? Have not Canada's sons, in almost every department of life and in every country of the world, signalized their ability and proven their integrity and uprightness and every characteristic which goes to make a good, a worthy, a proper man? Wherever the sons of Canada have come into competition with the people of other countries, have they not almost invariably come to the front? If there is one thing more than another for which I am truly thankful it is that I am a Canadian. I am proud of Canada, and proud of Canada's sons; and I have not the least hesitation in saying that, should Canada undertake to construct a navy, she will have a navy that will be a credit to her at home and abroad. And should this country, unfortunately, be dragged into a war either at home or abroad, I for one do not doubt that Canada's sons will acquit themselves with the same prowess, the same bravery that has distinguished them and given them a name in every country of the world. In view of the facts, I say that it is not fair, it is not manly, for hon. members opposite to endeavour to cover their veiled insinuations against Canada by loud protestations of loyalty to the mother country.

But there is something else that should be said. I believe it is the duty of every true Canadian to preach, and, in so far as he can, to practise the doctrine of peace and not the doctrine of war. For the future of this great and growing and grand country depends upon the farm and the factory and not upon the sword or the battleship.

I notice that in nearly every speech hon. gentlemen opposite profess disappointment with the provisions of the Bill now before the House on the ground that it is not comprehensive enough, that it does not go far enough. I, too, am disappointed, but I am agreeably disappointed; for, I am free to confess, I did have a lingering fear, if I might so express it, that the government would ask this House to commit the country to an elaborate scheme requiring an immediate expenditure of millions of money which, I think, could be more profitably devoted to developing the latent resources of the country. I therefore say that it is a fortunate thing for Canada that we have in power at this time a government, and more particularly a prime minister, with the stamina and courage to resist this wave of jingoism which seems to be passing over the country, and to refuse to do unwise and foolish things which afterwards the people might regret for many years to come. No person dreads war, or is more opposed to militarism, than I am. And I think it does not say much for the Christian civilization of the twentieth century when the civilized nations of the world cannot come together and agree on some more rational and sensible means of settling their disputes than in wasting their money in armaments and their efforts in killing one another. But we must take conditions as we find them. And we find that the nations of the world have not yet reached what we might call the ideal point, when they can settle their disputes upon a rational and sensible basis and in a manner which would be a credit to the integrity and character and intelligence of the country. Until such is the case, we must meet conditions as we find them. And I am free to confess that, in my judgment, the time has come in the history of Canada when it is necessary that we should make some fitting preparation to meet the requirements of the country in this direction.

Such a time does come I think in the history of almost every country and every nation, and it comes to a lesser extent even to municipalities. For example, for a village or a town one policeman is ample for the purpose of maintaining peace and order within that municipality; but when that town grows to become a large, populous and influential city. a whole regiment of policemen are required. So it is with Canada. If I may be allowed to use the expression, Canada has emerged from the town stage to the large, prosperous and influential city stage, and consequently it is necessary that some provision should be made such as is now proposed. I would not have been disappointed, in fact possibly I would have been rather pleased, if the government had seen fit to adopt a smaller plan than that which is proposed. But there is not sufficient difference between them to justify a difference of opinion, as both are practically the same in principle. But I believe in making this provision, we should commence on a modest scale such as the government proposes, and that we should allow the enterprise to grow in strength as the country grows in strength, power, wealth and influence. Also, I think that what we do should be done under the direction of Canada, and should remain entirely under the control of Canada. And we should take very great care indeed not to allow this country to become in any way entangled or mixed up with old world troubles or difficulties. What I mean is that we should keep Canada in this position, that if even Great Britain should engage in a war of which we did not approve, the justice and righteousness of which we were not convinced of, this country should stand aloof, as we have done on other occasions, and act the part of a looker-on. But if, on the other hand, Great Britain became engaged in a war of self defence, or for any interest of humanity, or for purposes which appealed to our sympathies and our sense of right, then we should join in and help Great Britain even to the extent of our last dollar and our last man.

I also believe that whatever we do should be done entirely in the interest and for the benefit of Canada, and not in payment of any supposed debt which we owe the mother country. Now the idea has pervaded the speeches of many hon. members opposite, and especially the speech of the hon. member for North Toronto, that Canada is in some way materially and morally indebted, even immensely indebted, to Great Britain, and that this proposed donation is in payment of that supposed debt. Now, Sir, I am not in the habit of proclaiming my loyalty from the house-tops, but I take no second place to any man in my loyalty to Great Britain, the birth-place and home of my forefathers. But, Sir, I am a Canadian, I am loyal to Canada first, last and all the time; and I think that at the present time perhaps a little plain speaking on this subject might not do any harm. I say this claim of our hon. friends opposite that we are greatly indebted to Great Britain is a fallacy which cannot be supported by fact. As a Canadian, I wish to say that in a material sense we are not indebted to Great Britain for anything, and in no sense is Canada indebted to her for more than good will and filial affection. If I desired to establish that point, I think I could do so by a few words which fell from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) in the concluding part of his address in this House. I understand that that hon. gentleman is the leader of the Conservative party of the great province of Quebec; I know he is a deputy leader of hon. gentlemen opposite. So long as he is their leader, they are responsible for his utterances until they repudiate his leadership. I have not heard that they have endeavoured in any sense so far to repudiate his leadership, and I think they dare not do it; consequently they are responsible for his expressions in this House and elsewhere as their political leader.

Now, Sir, I would like to bring the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite down from the realm of pure sentiment in which some of them so much delight to dwell, to plain facts, every day facts. If I can do this, they will find that Canada has never received one dollar from Great Britain for which she has not given a good big dollar's worth in return. It may be said, and it has been said in this House, that Great Britain furnishes us our best market for our surplus products. That is quite true, but it is equally true that this is a mutual obligation, because Great Britain requires our products just as much as we require her market. And she has never given us the fraction of a cent more for our products, for our apples, our cheese, our butter, our bacon, our bullocks, our cereals, than she could get them for elsewhere, or because they were Canadian. On the contrary, she has persistently, for years, maintained against this country a barrier to our live stock going into her markets. Now remember I do not blame her for this. If she considers such a policy in the interest of her own people she has a perfect right to pursue that policy, and we have no right to complain. But what I want to point out is this, that Great Britain adopts the policy which she considers in the interest of her own people, irrespective of the results which it may have upon Canada; and so I say in that respect as well as in other respects we should follow her example. It has always been said in this House and throughout the press of this country that most of our great national enterprises are carried on by means of British capital. That is quite true, but it is equally true that we have never borrowed one dollar from Great Britain for which we have not given her the highest current rate of interest and the very best security. It is equally true that she has never loaned us a dollar upon better or more favourable terms than she has loaned to other countries.

But, Sir, the most silly contention I think I have ever heard made in this House is that she has protected our shores from invasion by foreign foes. Now I ask when, in the memory of living man, have our shores been even threatened by a foreign foe? The only occasion I remember is what was known as the Fenian Raid, and that was not inspired by any dislike for Canada but by a dislike for Great Britain, because she denied to a certain portion of her subjects the rights and privileges which they thought, and which I think, they were justly entitled to. The last contention along that line that I shall refer to is that she has protected our commerce on the high seas. That is also quite true, but it is equally true that any protection she has afforded to Canada in that way has been purely incidental. She has protected her own breadstuffs and she has afforded to Canada in that respect the same protection that she has afforded to other countries and nations from which she has drawn these breadstuffs. I do not give these illustrations in the way of complaining that we have not received just and proper treatment from Great Britain. On the contrary, I give them to show, in the interest and in defence of Canada, that Canada has done her whole duty to the mother country, that she has not played the part of a sponge absorbing everything and giving out nothing.

Let me refer for a moment or two to the amendment which has been placed before this House by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). I think we can divide it into three parts very properly and justly. In the first place, it is proposed that Canada should bestow on the mother country a gift of from $22,000,000 to $25,000,000; secondly, that a real emergency exists by reason of the danger of war between Great Britain and Germany, and thirdly, that Canada should provide a navy of her own, but that before she does so she should take a plebiscite of the people. Now let me consider each one of these proposals, made by our friends opposite, separately. The first is that Canada should bestow on the mother country a gift of from $22,000,000 to $25,000,000. Why, in all that is sensible, should Canada give to the mother country any such sum? If the mother country were in need of this money, if she were in stress, then I say that it would be quite right and proper for Canada to give her that money, and it would be the duty of Canada to do so. But, is the mother country in need of money? No, as the boys say, she has money to burn. From the money standpoint she could buy out Canada twenty times over and that being the case why should we in this House vote the hard earned money of the labourer, the artisan, the farmer, the merchant and the manufacturer of this country to fill the already over-flowing coffers of Great Britain? I do not think we would be justified in doing anything of the kind, because there is no necessity for it. Now, let us come to the second proposition that an emergency exists. In order to prove their case hon. gentlemen opposite must, of necessity, prove that an emergency does exist, and if they fail to do so, in my humble judgment, their whole case falls to the ground. How have they gone about proving an emergency exists? They have quoted from the speeches delivered by British statesmen over a year ago, speeches that were delivered for an election and for political purposes and also for the purpose of bringing the British people to a realization that they had not been keeping up their navy to the standard which it formerly had been kept up to, and that it was necessary to provide funds for that purpose. That, Sir, was the object, and in these respects it has been realized. The emergency has passed over, the scare is no more, and now only exists in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. But, Mr. Speaker, who is it that they have sought to show that Great Britain has really to be afraid of? Afraid of Germany. Why should she be afraid of Germany? Are not the ties of kinship as well as of commerce, against any such proposition? Is not Great Britain one of Germany's very best customers? Is not Germany one of Great Britain's very best customers? Why then should Germany desire to destroy her best customer? It is said that Germany is rapidly increasing her navy. That is quite true, but it is necessary that she should increase her navy just the same as it is necessary for France, or Austria, or Japan, or other surrounding countries to do so. She was obliged by that necessity to do it, and it was not for the purpose of going to war with Great Britain. Let me tell you that the Germans are not a foolish people, the Germans are not a people who are foolish enough to bite off their noses to spite their faces. They are an intelligent, hard-headed, frugal, enterprising, law-abiding people and they know too well upon which side their bread is buttered to instigate a war with Great Britain or with any other country that they are so dependent upon as they are dependent upon Great Britain at the present time. There is a word that I would like to say here if the House will pardon me for a short digression. I was very much pleased and delighted at the intimation which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) gave to the House the other day, that the little commercial war which had been in existence between Canada and Germany for a few years had been closed up and that a truce had been proclaimed. I was not pleased so much on account of the improvement in the commercial relations that that would accomplish, or the commercial advantages that might accrue to Canada from that, although I have no doubt they will be very considerable, but I think it will have a strong tendency to encourage immigration from Germany to Canada, and we cannot get a better class of immigrants from any country in the world than we can from Germany. It has been proved in this country time and time again, and any of us who have German settlers in our constituencies know how valuable these settlers are in the cities, towns, villages and communities, in which they live throughout this province without any other evidence. They are an industrious, well-doing, enterprising, law-abiding people and we cannot get Canada populated with a better class than the German people. Now let me come to the third part of the amendment, that Canada should provide a navy of her own, but before she does so should take a plebiscite of the people. I do like consistency, but I am sure there is no consistency in the position taken by the leader of the opposition in this amendment. He is quite willing that $25,000,000 of the money of the people of this country should be given to Great Britain right off the reel, without a word, for the benefit and advancement of the people of that country. But, Sir, when it comes to devoting a smaller sum of money to the development of the manufacturing industries of this country for the purpose of constructing a navy for our own protection, for the protection of our own shores, the whole of which money will be expended in this country, then forsooth, we must go to the country and ask for the consent of the people. As far as I can judge the amendment of my hon. friend was moved simply for the purpose of gathering in the stray lambs of the flock and herding them into one fold on the division. An hon. friend remarks that there are no lambs in that flock. Perhaps they are all grown sheep. If we really desire to aid Great Britain, and if we could aid her I think it is right and proper that we should do so. I think that we could do this much more effectively by helping ourselves, by devoting every dollar that we can raise to the development of the great natural resources of this country, by extending, improving and increasing our traffic highways to the sea-board and from the sea-board across the Atlantic, so that we can lay down our products in the British markets, and her products in our markets in the least possible time, in the best possible condition, and at least possible cost. We should provide profitable investments for the immense horde of surplus capital in Great Britain, and we should provide comfortable homes for the teeming millions of her population. These are the ways in which I think we could aid Great Britain much more effectively, much more to her interests as well as to our own interest, than by presenting her with Dreadnoughts, which, by the time they are constructed, will, in all probability, be fit for the scrap heap, and for which there is no necessity. In this way, I think we should work and build up on this continent a great nation which will be at least the equal, if it does not surpass, the greatest of the great nations of the civilized world. A nation that will work in harmony and consonance with the old mother who will look with pride and pleasure justly upon her brightest and best sons. This, Mr. Speaker, is an ambition worthy of young Canada. This, Sir, is an ambition which is worthy of our best energy, and our best intellect, and we have the men to accomplish it. Let us set ourselves to this work, and do it to the very best of our ability, and let us place this country of ours in the position which nature has destined her to occupy. And, Sir, if we do this, if each one of us does his duty, we need not trouble ourselves very much about difficulties between Germany and Great Britain. Why, thirty-five years ago, or possibly a little more, we had a similar scare to this. We had then precisely the same arguments which are to-day being used by hon. gentlemen opposite and notwithstanding all that, no trouble and no war between Germany and Great Britain has supervened in all these years. On the contrary, these two great countries have worked hand in hand together, and in trading with each other peacefully, they both have made profit, while advancing their own interests. Under such circumstances is it not a craven and cowardly thing for hon. gentlemen opposite, to be going up and down this country whining that Great Britain is afraid of being swallowed up by Germany. This is a species of loyalty which we on this side of the House, at all events, do not profess.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). I have listened to most of the speeches which have been delivered on the question before the House, and I cannot but feel that this parliament is now dealing with a measure of unparalleled importance in the history of Canada. There are three things which present themselves for our consideration as Canadians; the first is: the consolidation of the British empire; the second is: the maintenance of that empire, the greatest the world has known; and the third is the question as to what best we can do to bring about peace among the nations of the world. It is well, Sir, that we should consider this question free from personal or party bitterness and controversy I could not help but think this afternoon, in listening to the speech of the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) that his language did not express the sentiments of the people of his riding. He has talked a great deal about autonomy, as most hon. gentleman on his side have done, and in this connection I would like him to explain the relation between paragraph 4 of this Bill and paragraph 18. It would be a great comfort to members on this side of the House if hon. gentlemen opposite would reconcile these features of the Bill, the one with the other. Section 4 of the Bill distinctly states, as does clause 15 of the British North America Act, that the Canadian navy shall be placed under the control of the King, but section 18 of the Bill just as distinctly states that the government of Canada shall have control of the navy and that they need not send it to war unless they wish to do so. This seems a contradiction. Then again, gentlemen opposite have been telling us that they are greatly in favour of peace throughout the world. The Minister of Labour, speaking in Harvard University hoped to see the day when the government of Canada and the government of the United States would join in building a monument on the border line to celebrate 100 years of peace. On the 8th of July last, the Prime Minister endorsed that suggestion of his Minister of Labour, and on the same day, speaking in Plattsburg, New York, the Postmaster General used this language:

> Sir, is this not the fittest occasion to proclaim our determination that now on and forever the American Commonwealth and the Dominion of Canada shall always promote and advance the cause of peace, harmony and civilization on this vast continent.
> There are heroes of peace as there are heroes of war, under different flags we are pressing towards a single goal—freedom, righteousness and duty.

But, where is that hero of peace to-day? Did we not find him a few weeks ago urging his compatriots to furnish the money to build a Canadian navy, which by the way I may say would be of no use to Canada for her own defence and of no service to Great Britain in time of war. I quote the words of the Postmaster General from 'Hansard':

> Why should we not have a navy as we have an army? The Canadian militia began fifty years ago; it is now a fighting force. May I not prophesy the same happy results for the Canadian navy.

Are we to understand from the Postmaster General that fifty years hence we will have a fighting force, in our navy? Well, it is quite possible that half a century in the future the Canadian navy, as proposed in this Bill, may be of some consequence. Then again, the Postmaster General says:

> We must exhibit our fighting qualities and take care of ourselves against the United States.

And the member for Huron (Mr. McLean) gives his hearty approval to such language. Are we to say to the people of the United States: Wait a little longer until Canada has built a fleet, wait until we have abrogated the Rushe-Bagot treaty and built our cruisers on the great lakes? Is that what hon. gentlemen opposite would wish as the outcome of this navy? I can tell the Prime Minister that the United States ship builders would only be too glad to see the abrogation of the Rushe-Bagot treaty so that they might build on the great lakes war ships and naval armament. And, Sir, does the protection of our shores only mean the Atlantic and Pacific coast line, are we not to take into consideration all of the 7,600 miles of shore line which we have in this Dominion? On the eastern coast we have 3,000 miles of shore line between the United States boundary and Hudson straits; on the west we have 1,000 miles of coast line between the United States boundary and Alaska, and in addition we have 3,600 miles of boundary line between the United States and Canada. When you take into consideration that most of our wars have come from the United States, one can readily understand that in preparing for coast defence it is necessary also to take into consideration preparation for the defence of the boundary line between Canada and the republic to the south. It must be remembered that were England to be engaged in a war with Germany, there are 16,000,000 Germans in the United States who would not sympathize with the Monroe doctrine being enforced on the northern half of this continent. Then, have we not some duty to protect our mercantile marine? When we realize that 70,000,000 tons of water-borne freight passes through the Clair river every year, and that a large portion of it is carried by Canadian merchant marine, we must also realize that that merchant marine demands protection.

When we realize that we own half of this continent, with seven millions of people scattered over its length and breadth, we must see that with our limited resources it would be perfect folly on our part to attempt to protect all our boundary line. Have not the people of Sarnia, Goderich, Sault Ste. Marie, Port Arthur and many other prominent cities on our great lakes just as good a right to expect shipyards and dockyards to be built in them as many of the cities on our eastern and western coasts? If we enter upon a career of navy building, as proposed by this government, we will have no end of competing cities on our coasts all wanting to build ships of war. If we pass this Bill we enter on a mad race for naval construction, and commit our people to an indefinite, perpetual and ever-draining policy. The Canadian people are a patriotic people, proud of their homes, their lands and their progress. They do not shrink from assisting the motherland; but I do not believe that they are anxious to undertake the expenditure which this government is proposing for the purpose of building a navy, especially one that will not be of any definite help to Great Britain. The defence of the empire is not the defence of the British islands alone, but includes the defence of Great Britain's colonies and dependencies. The Prime Minister may well say that when Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war, because the only hope of Canada remaining a part of the British empire depends upon Great Britain having the command of the sea. If Great Britain were defeated in a war, of what good would be all this talk about autonomy and having the rights of the people of Canada protected? I am absolutely opposed to militarism in every sense of the word; but I realize that there is only one court of appeal to which nations can go at present, and that court is war. However, I sincerely hope and believe that the day is not far distant when the nations of the world will come together in a bond of peace and submit their differences to a court of arbitration similar to the Hague tribunal, and war will be no more. Only a few weeks ago I received a letter from a Mr. Marburg, in the city of Baltimore, at whose home a conference was held a few nights previous at which a large number of prominent citizens of the United States were present. At the conference a plan of campaign was mapped out for this continent and the different nations of Europe to educate the people up to a sense of their duty on this question of peace. The President of the United States, Senator Root and many other prominent men have given their hearty approval to the project. Within the next few months we may expect to see a propaganda started for the holding of public meetings in the United States and in Canada to urge the people to assist in bringing about a cessation of the mad rush for armaments on the part of the nations of the world. I sincerely trust that whatever can be done in the way of assisting this movement will be done by the men of Canada. Until we are able to build a navy worthy of the name, or until international peace is consummated, it would be folly for us to undertake to build such a navy as is proposed by this government. The proper position for us is to stand by the British navy. On this occasion there is a distinct line of cleavage between the two great political parties of this country. The opposition say: submit the question to the people and give two Dreadnoughts to tide over the present emergency. If you look into the records of Great Britain, Germany or the United States you will find that it takes years to build Dreadnoughts, and if we placed at the disposal of Great Britain the money proposed by the hon. leader of the opposition in his resolution, it would probably take two years or more before the battleships would be ready to go into service. The present government propose to build a little navy that dared not go to war, would be of little service if it did, as it is to be built apparently to run away and not to fight. Let the government give the people of Canada an opportunity to vote on this question. Do not attempt to dragoon them into the building of a navy if they do not want it. Trust the people. This is an entirely new question which should be submitted to them for consideration. The last speaker said that he did not consider this subject of sufficient importance to submit to the Canadian people; but you may depend upon it that if we enter upon this expenditure it will increase as the years go by. Inside of ten years we will have expended at least $100,000,000, and even then we will not have a navy worthy of the name, or one that will be of any great assistance to Great Britain in time of war. Whereas if $20,000,000 were placed at the disposal of Great Britain for the building of two battleships, these would be in the front line of the fleet and would be doing a service not only for this country, but for the whole British empire. The government have proposed a plan which they themselves knew little about. They have not stated the cost of the dockyards or of the ships or how long it would take to build them. The only figures that have been placed before us are those which the Minister of Militia gave us a few days ago; and if you investigate those figures you will come to no other conclusion than that they are most misleading and are entirely too small to be considered seriously. For instance, the estimated cost of a dockyard is given as $100,000. What perfect folly to think that we can build a dockyard capable of holding a ship for that sum of money. Why, the Postmaster General only a few days ago had an appropriation of $300,000 passed through this House for the construction of a dock in his own riding. If you will investigate the records you will find that in the dockyards of the mother country and in the States, millions of dollars are being expended instead of a paltry $100,000. Take the dockyards at Portsmouth. Great Britain has expended over $16,000,000 on it already; and for the building of one dock for the purpose of holding a Dreadnought, she has spent $5,000,000. Take the naval base at Rosuth where Great Britain is building now. I find by the Navy League Annual for the year 1909 that the estimated cost of the work for the establishment of this base, which is on the Frith of Forth, is £3,000,000, exclusive of the cost of machinery. That includes basin, entrance lock, straight river wharf, an emergency exit from basin, space for stacking coal, a dry-dock, a boat slip, a basin for submarine boats and electric light and power. And since the completion of this work is not expected for ten years, it is understood that the admiralty have under consideration the provision of two or three huge floating docks capable of berthing a Dreadnought or Invincible, one of which, they say, might well be stationed in Cromarty.

I merely call attention to these facts to show that instead of $100,000 being a reasonable estimate for the erection of a dry dock and ship yard, it will not cover the cost of the necessary plant and machinery. Let us consider for a few moments what will be necessary in order that we may build ships in Canada. Member after member on the government benches has emphatically and distinctly said that the one great reason why we should build these ships here is that they will give employment to a lot of men and be of very great benefit in other ways to this Dominion. Well, what would we have to do? We would have first to provide a naval board, with an admiral at its head, pay and pensions to officers and thousands of men on the ships and in the shops, dock yards, dry docks, ships, factories for the manufacture of different parts of ships, engines, machinery for bending and shaping steel plates, iron and brass foundries, machine shops, boiler and copper smith shops, blacksmith shops, containing immense steam hammers, pattern shops, drawing rooms, ordinance repairs, rope houses, block and boat making houses, store houses for torpedoes, general mountings, chains, cables, ammunition, arms, armouries stores, uniform, clothing and equipment, targets and buoys for rifle practice, rifle ranges for use of naval service, also material for construction, maintenance and repairs for naval establishments and other vessels. We have also ships to supply navy with coal cranes for lifting, shears and docks, naval colleges and academies for training ships. Work without end, without including the gun factories, which would be necessary to supply the guns.

When we take into consideration this enormous amount of plant, we must conclude that it is folly for this government to pretend that its estimate of $750,000 would cover all the items I have named, including a naval college. The government estimates the cost of the naval college to be $150,000. Why, our military college at Kingston has cost us upwards of $300,000. Therefore, I am warranted in saying that if this estimate is taken as a sample, we may expect a very large increase with regard to them all.

British sentiment in Canada is strong. There are but few who would cut the cable and let Great Britain go. You can depend upon it that when the people realize that, if we are to have a navy worthy of the name, the expenditure will increase with such rapidity, their present sentiments are apt to undergo a change, and this expenditure will do more towards cutting the cable and letting Great Britain go than anything else possibly could. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Northwest Grain Grower's Association, public gatherings in different parts of Canada, Boards of Trade and many prominent men of all shades of opinion, including the premiers of three provinces, have all most emphatically urged on the government to send an emergency contribution to Britain at present, and submit the question of navy defence in Canada to the people. There can be no question that the mother country is facing a crisis. This year she is spending over $175,000,000 on her navy, which means over $4 for every man, woman and child in that country. That is a large increase over last year, and in addition His Majesty the King, in his speech from the Throne the other day, emphatically stated that they would have to make a material addition to their naval estimates. We have always had the protection of the greatest sea power on the earth. England has loaned us, in addition to that protection, hundreds of millions of pounds sterling for the development of our waterways and railways and public institutions in general, so that when the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) made the statement that Great Britain had done little for us, that statement was not based on fact. Between 1852 and 1902, Great Britain spent $85,000,000 on military expenditure in this country. Go back 100 years and you will find that she spent $170,000,000 in addition, making a total of $255,000,000 in 150 years. In addition she spent $35,000,000 on the citadel and public works in the city of Quebec and $81,000,000 on our canals before we took them over. Again she spent $56,000,000 on all kinds of public works in this country before confederation. And I want you to remember that I am not taking into consideration the war of 1775 or the public works on which enormous sums of money were expended in 1778, when these were built at Levis, Kingston, Montreal, Halifax, Toronto, St. John and many other places. I am not taking into consideration the war of 1812, which lasted, so far as the British taxpayer is concerned, from 1811 to 1815, and I could go on and show you what she expended on roads and bridges which she made in this country. The expenditure taken out of the treasury of Britain on our railways and public works including canals and defence would reach over $1,000,000,000. In addition to this England loans us $200,000,000 annually and has invested in our securities over $1,000,000,000. Therefore, when I hear the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) say that we do not owe Great Britain anything, that she got dollar for every dollar she gave us, I cannot understand how he can make such a statement, so utterly unfounded on facts. Is it not a humiliating spectacle to see the right hon. the Prime Minister and his government forcing through this House a measure that cannot possibly be of any service to Great Britain? The Canadian people are willing to assist Great Britain, they consider it their duty to give her their valuable assistance, but to bring in a measure that cannot possibly protect our merchant marine or be of any service in the wars of Great Britain, is nothing but sheer folly. There is not a bit of danger that Great Britain would ever ask this government to send the navy proposed in this Bill to help her in time of war.

It would be of no use to her, and nobody knows better than the Prime Minister himself that he is placing us in a false position in regard to this very important question. Great Britain is increasing her public debt and adding to the burdens of her people in order to build Dreadnoughts for the protection of her colonies and dependencies. Why should we not relieve her of some of this responsibiilty? Japan, Germany, the United States, France, Italy and Austria are all discarding their old ships and building Dreadnoughts. What does a Dreadnought mean? A Dreadnought, Sir, is a death dealing monster with 22,000 tons displacement, with 12 inches of steel covering her deck, with ten 12-inch guns that can all be fired at once, throwing over four tons of death-dealing missiles. Each one of these guns can discharge a shell containing 750 pounds of missiles, and back of it 200 pounds of cordite, capable of sending that shell 10 or 12 miles. Compare that with the puny cruisers which this government are trying to make the people believe will be any protection to this country or any assistance to Great Britain in time of war. Compare their little cruiser of 3,000 to 5,000 tons with a 22,000 tons Dreadnought, a little cruiser with four and 6-inch guns capable of carrying a shell only two or three miles. If the shell struck the deck of a Dreadnought it would either go off as a fire-cracker, or have as little effect upon it as a pea fired at a barn door. It is humiliating to see this government trying to make the people believe that this navy can be of any service in protecting our shores, or in assisting Great Britain in her wars. We must remember that in years gone by Great Britain has sent her best men and has spent her blood and treasure in protecting this country in order to bring it up to the splendid position of a nation we now occupy. It would be most humiliating to see a measure like this going through, wasting money that could otherwise be usefully employed in building battleships that would be of some assistance to Great Britain in time of need, wasting money in building a useless navy that can be of no service to Canada or Great Britain. England's nvay is closely associated with her greatness, with the mighty deeds which have extended her empire and made her mistress of the seas. The British fleet to-day, centred as it is around Great Britain, is within striking distance of Canada. We must remember the fact that within five days of our shores is the British fleet, practically as near to Canada as the eastern portion of Canada is to British Columbia. Wireless telegraphy and cables render the protection of our shores by the British fleet more effective than they would be by a separate squadron. Australia and New Zealand, lying as they do at a greater distance, require an entirely different system of defence. We have no enemies excepting the enemies of Great Britain. And we must remember this fact, that our people are not only self-reliant and confident, a people full of energy and hope, but they are a people willing and ready to contribute of their means towards assisting Great Britain in time of crisis. We may make mistakes in the legislation that comes before this parliament, mistakes which we can remedy, but, in forcing this Bill through parliament, we shall make a mistake in imperial policy which will be irretrievable. The colonies have been the cause of most of Britain's wars, and while Britain owns one-fifth of the land area of the globe, and controls a quarter of the world's population, it will be necessary for her to have a large army and a large navy.

We cannot but admire the justice with which Great Britain has governed her overseas dominions. She has displayed unflinching confidence and absolute justice in dealing with Canada, not only with the French Canadians of Canada, but with every other nationality, since she has put them all on the same footing. She extends the same square dealing to all her colonies and dependencies; justice in administration is always the uppermost aim in England's administration. Then England is the greatest importer in the world. She imports food and raw material for her population, and she exports manufactured goods. Seven-eighths of her imports are food and raw material, and seven-eighths of her exports are manufactured articles. To keep the British empire together, we must first protect her commerce, and this is done by helping her to keep command of the sea. We hear much said about the necessity of protecting our commerce on the high seas. In that connection I would like to read an extract from a report of the Royal Commission on Food Supply in Time of War. This commission was appointed in 1905, and we find that many of the most prominent men of England were on that commission. At the head of it was His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and among the members were the Rt. Hon. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, His Grace the Duke of Sutherland, the Rt. Hon. Lord Berkeley, the Rt. Hon. John Henry Chapman, and many others. Now let us see what this commission has to say with regard to Great Britain's food supply in time of war, and the protection of that food supply. Here is what they say in the course of their report:

The imports of wheat and flour in 1904, given in millions of quarters, were as follows: United States of America, 4·40; Russia, 5·53; Roumania, ·35; Argentina, 5·10; British India, 5·95; Canada, 2·13; Australia, 2·65; minor exporting countries, 1·59.

So when we hear hon. gentlemen opposite talking about sending to Great Britain the whole of her food supply, they must take into consideration the fact that India sent to Great Britain in 1904 double the amount of wheat that Canada did. The report gives the various sources of Britain's food supply as follows:

The supplies from the principle sources begin to arrive as follows: January, wheat from the Pacific coast of America; February and March, Argentine wheat; April, Australian wheat; May, June and July, Calcutta and Bombay, Delhi and Karachi Indian wheats; July and August, American winter wheat; September and October, American spring and Russian wheat; November, Canadian wheat.

This goes to show that Great Britain has practically a supply from various sources all the year round, one source or another every month, as I have just shown. On page 28 of this report we have some very important facts:

In their communications to us the admiralty admit that the policy of attacking the floating trade of a country has always played an important part in maritime warfare. But in a summary of the events of the various maritime wars of the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries they point out that naval history demonstrates the truth of these two general principles.

I would ask your consideration to this, Mr. Speaker:

1. That the command of the sea is essential for the successful attack or defence of commerce and should therefore be the primary aim.

2. That the attack or defence of commerce is best effected by concentration of force, and that a dispersion of strength for either of those objects is the strategy of the weak, and cannot materially influence the ultimate result of the war.

And, surely, Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman who leads this House would consider the statements of these men, made in 1905, when there was no general election on in Great Britain, and would apply their suggestions to the case of the Canadian navy, he would see that the policy he is undertaking is named by them, 'the stategy of the weak', and they say that it 'cannot materially influence the ultimate result of a war'. They emphasize this further on page 30 of the report:

We were specially anxious on this point, on account of the evidence warning us that we must expect captures, and we asked the following questions:—

(1) Assuming the country to be at war with any two of the great maritime powers, are the admiralty of opinion that our supplies of wheat and flour would arrive in practically the same volume as they come at present?

. . . Practically, the reply is yes, as the admiralty believe that there would be no material diminution in the supplies of wheat and flour reaching the United Kingdom.

The question and answer in this report proceed:

(4) Supposing popular pressure took the form of demand for more direct defence of our food supplies, and special protection of ships carrying foodstuffs to this country than the naval authorities would otherwise contemplate, and was successful, do the board consider the probable result would prejudice arrangements for the general conduct of our offensive operations of war against the hostile fleets?

The answer to that is as follows:

If a portion of the naval forces at the disposal of the admiralty were deflected from the main operations of the war for other purposes of whatever kind, the general conduct of these operations must of necessity suffer, and the entire course of the war might be injuriously affected.

Just the very thing the present government are doing is the thing which the British admiralty and this commission most emphatically state should not be done. Another statement is as follows—page 32:

The number of British merchant steamers which would be taken up by the government in war time is so small compared to the total number available that it is not believed the British carrying trade could be seriously interfered with. The admiralty have already been in consultation on the subject with some of the leading shipowners.

Sir Cyprian Bridge also thought that if proper naval arrangements were made, the losses by capture, or by ships being driven on shore, of vessels bringing imports into the United Kingdom, would not exceed a very small percentage of the total, and he suggested that the proportion lost would probably amount to about 5 per cent.

So, if this government are building their navy for the purpose of protecting our merchant marine, it is easy to see what folly it is. And what do these gentlemen say as regards torpedo craft?

It should be added that torpedo-craft (i.e., destroyers and torpedo boats) can neither spare prize crews nor accommodate any one above their complement numbers. If, therefore, employed against commerce, for which they were never intended, such craft could only compel merchant ships to follow them into port under threat of being torpedoed. Moreover these crafts can only operate within a comparatively short distance of their shore bases.

I think that is sufficient at least to call your attention to the fact that, so far as the navy proposed by this government is concerned, it is utterly inadequate and can be of no service for the protection of our merchant marine. The government talk about protecting our commerce. Let us, for a moment, take the United States as an example. Out of the port of Baltimore went 50,000,000 bushels of grain last year of which only 10,000 bushels were carried in American bottoms. Out of the port of New York last year went 1,200 ships, and of these only seven carried the American flag. If you investigate the commerce of the United States you are forced to the conclusion that they are not building their navy for the protection in particular of their own commerce. They are in an altogether better position as concerns population and consumption than we are. It seems utter nonsense, therefore, for us at the present time, with our small population and small income, to attempt to build a navy such as would adequately protect our commerce.

War is organized force. When peace is broken the nation best organized and prepared for war has the best chance of defeating its opponent. Only men make war, and it is a well-reasoned affair and conducted on business principles. Germany, when she defeated France, demanded from France a thousand million of dollars of indemnity. What would be the indemnity Germany would demand of the British empire if she defeated that empire on the high seas? Instead of a thousand millions, the indemnity demanded would be five thousand millions. And, would not we feel the burden if we had to pay our share of that into the coffers of Germany? Then the people would say of the men now in charge of our affairs that they did not consider the best interests of the Dominion, or of the empire, or they would have sent to the motherland without delay sufficient money to show, at least, that they were ready and willing to assist her in time of emergency.

Increased knowledge and practice, with a liberal expenditure of money, are perfecting day by day the navies of the world. Well may we say: When will this conflict cease? The nations are vieing with one another to see which will build the best boats and build them in the shortest space of time. The fighting, so far as England is concerned, will be done in the North Sea. If you follow up what England has been doing with her battleships during the past few months, you will see that she is gradually gathering around her shores in the North sea the best battleships she has. In addition to that, she is protecting her shores to the utmost extent and making all preparation for the war that is likely to take place.

The admiralty made a definite and distinct demand on the people who were represented at this colonial conference, that the best way to assist Great Britain was to keep her navy a unit instead of in separate squadrons as suggested by this Bill. And though the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) may think that he did a noble and a good thing in bringing in this measure, yet, if he will take into consideration the contributions of Australia, New Zealand, and other colonies which have been giving to Great Britain in large proportions to their population, and if he will compare the Dreadnoughts of New Zealand, and the fleet unit of Australia, with the navy that he proposes by this Bill to build in this country, he cannot but see that his navy is not to be compared with the splendid fighting fleet that these other governments are ready and willing to give.

There is no question about it, when you consider the means of protecting the British merchant marine, the only way at present, as the members of the admiralty will tell you, is to send a battleship alongside a number of merchantmen to carefully guard them and protect them. So far as our little ships are concerned, they would be no manner of use whatever. On reading the reports of these various conferences, we cannot but feel that the men who represented us were not ready or willing to do even a reasonable amount for the assistance of Great Britain in time of war. Here is the one outstanding fact; the aim in naval warfare is to attain command of the sea; the power that attains this control can attack its enemy where and when it pleases. England has had command of the sea for generations. Fifty years ago her commerce went into every port. At that time, Britain had command of the commerce of the world. To-day, France, Germany, the United States and Russia are vieing with one another to take away that commerce from Great Britain—as they have a perfect right to do. But, we must recognize this fact that it is our duty, as far as British commerce is concerned to assist and protect it to best of our ability. How is command of the sea to be won? Not with such a fleet as is proposed by the government, but simply by the possession of a navy stronger than your opponents. Courage is necessary, and a careful study of the enemy's resources, their naval methods and intentions. An opposing navy could not commit a more serious mistake than to detach a squadron with the object of reducing some outlying fleet. She would spoil her concentration, and you would spoil yours if you attempted to follow.

The government say that we must give money and men for the building of a Canadian navy. What have they been doing during the past few years?—spending over a million dollars per annum for the purpose of bringing people to our shores to develop our resources. Would it not be wise to continue this instead of taking money to bring men here for the purpose of assisting in building a navy. The men engaged in the development of these resources, who would otherwise be engaged in the useless defence of our country, would earn sufficient to give a large annual grant to Great Britain, if that were thought advisable. But, I do not believe in an annual grant to Great Britain, and I do not believe we will be called upon to duplicate the two battleships that have been proposed by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition in his splendid resolution. Let us leave the naval question for the present to the powers which have to keep up their navies. Great Britain has the men and we have the money to help her to increase her navy. If we have a navy we have to consider that it means an ever-increasing annual expenditure until that expenditure reaches the sum of $50,000,000 per year. Great Britain will spend on her navy in 1910 $175,000,000. That is $480,000 for every single day of the 365 days in the year. In adition to that she is maintaining her great army at a cost of $430,000 per day. There are $900,000 taken out of the treasury of Great Britain and spent every day for keeping up her army and navy in order that she may protect herself, her colonies and dependencies to which Canada is not contributing one dollar. In addition to that she spends $3,000,000 per annum for her consular service to which we do not contribute a dollar. The South African war cost England $1,000,000,000. That, at interest, represents a payment by the British people of $30,000,000 per annum. It is true that Germany, ten years ago, brought in a measure whereby she set aside $1,000,000,000 for the purpose of building her navy. Since that time she has appropriated $500,000,000 for the same purpose. During this present year she has set aside $105,000,000 for the purpose of building ships, and if you will investigate the German reports, and the German books which tell you of the position of Germany at the present time you cannot but feel that as far as Great Britain is concerned she is not in the position to build these large battleships of the Dreadnought class with the rapidity with which Germany is building them at the present time.

Germany made her plans years ago to construct her dockyards sufficiently large to hold the Dreadnoughts that she is turning out at such a rapid rate. In England's Navy League Annual you will find such facts as these: By the year 1914 Germany, at the present rate of speed will have one ship of the Dreadnought class more than Great Britain will have. You will also see the different firms in Germany which are manufacturing ships of the Dreadnought class and the rapidity with which they are manufacturing these ships. You cannot come to any other conclusion than that which I have indicated with the enormous amount of money that she is expending. Fifty years ago Germany only had $18,000,000 of a debt while to-day she has a debt of $1,000,000,000. Last year she expended $83,000,000 on her navy, and this year she is expending $105,000,000. From year to year, the expenditure has grown until on her army and navy she is expending $224,000,000 this year, or double what the expenditure was in 1900. We know it to be a fact that she has one million men in line, and that she can call upon 4,000,000 more who are fully prepared to fight upon land. We know that she has spent enormous amounts of money in addition to those I have mentioned in preparing her canals and rivers for just such large ships as those of the Dreadnought class. Not only that, but Germany's population is increasing at about the rate of 1,000,000 souls per annum, and her total population to-day is 65,000,000 on a land area less than that of the province of Ontario. There is no place for these people to go unless to some of the colonies owned and controlled by other nations. I do not wish to say one word against the German people as a people. I believe they are a thrifty progressive people, and I sincerely hope that the government, may take steps to bring about better trade relations with Germany, and that they will put a sufficient amount in the estimates to provide for trade representatives who will try and increase our trade with that land. Our government have taken a step in the right direction in the late treaty arrangements, but we are not in as favourable a position in the German markets as we were in 1896. Great Britain's population, in the British Isles, only amounts to 43,000,000 people, and with her limited resources she is spending at the present time $222,000,000 on her army and navy. I have just been handed a copy of to-day's Toronto 'Globe,' in which the following statement appears:

Gathering her Soldiers—Germany ordering her scattered Sons Home—All Unnaturalized Germans in United States receiving Instructions to report for Military Physical examination—An Order never before issued.

(Special despatch to the 'Globe.')

Dallas, Texas, Feb. 28.—Whether or not she is preparing for war with Great Britain, Germany is serving notice on all her available citizens in the United States to report for military physical examination, to decide if they are still fit for military duty. In view of the fact that this order has never before been issued, and considering the loud talk of war between the countries, this development is full of significance, and shows that Germany is getting all her forces lined up in case a conflict comes. Nearly two hundred Germans of Dallas and Fort Worth who failed to serve their allotted time in the German army have been called upon to submit to physical examinations. Unnaturalized Germans in Texas have been ordered to report to the German Consul at Galveston, where transportation to the fatherland will be supplied.

That is an article which appears in the Toronto 'Globe' and one which is worthy of consideration. It bears out to some extent the position that the opposition are taking on this important question. If we are going to assist Great Britain in her wars, now is the time to act. Do not let us wait until we have expended tens of millions of dollars on a useless tin-pot navy, but let us place at once at the disposal of Great Britain a sum sufficient for two Dreadnoughts, and we will be doing something worthy of our country and worthy of the name of patriotic sons of England. We were told by the Minister of Militia, and by other hon. gentlemen opposite, that a contribution of two Dreadnoughts would mean $25,000,000, but the fact is that the official returns disclose that the largest battleship built in the United States has not cost them $8,000,000 (this estimate did not include guns), and of all the Dreadnoughts turned out of the British dockyards not a single one has exceeded a cost of $8,800,000. Last year the United States spent $219,000,000 on its army and navy, and this year they have given a proof of their anxiety for international peace in reducing that expenditure by $60,000,000. Look at what the countries of the world are doing in naval construction to-day, and you will find that not a single one of them is building cruisers of the type which this Bill proposes for their protection. In 1904 Great Britain put out of service 155 ships, and I have no doubt that if we continue to purchase second-hand vessels we will have among our fleet a number of those discarded from the British navy. The control and management of the British navy is under the direction of the Lords of Admiralty, and surely the sea lords should know whether it would be better that we should have a unit of the British fleet or a separate squadron. Practically the first word of the British admiralty to the gentlemen attending the British conference was that they would prefer a naval unit I submit, Sir, that the proposition of the leader of the opposition now before the House renders the most effective aid to the motherland at the least cost to our people. When war is declared is not the time for the colonies to help Britain; help must come in advance to be of any use. The Prime Minister has told us that if Great Britain were at war, he would go up and down this country to arouse the people to a sense of their duty, but, Sir, when the smoke of battle is seen and death-dealing missiles are hurtling through the air and Britain calls us to her aid, are we to say Please give us time to think, we have not yet decided whether the war is just or not? Can any one imagine a more humiliating position for a nation such as Canada to be placed in? We are told by the Prime Minister that when the beacon fires are lighted on the hills, Canada would come to the aid of the empire. Yes, but when the beacon fires are lighted on the hills, the war will be on and there will be no time for the right hon. gentleman to go up and down the country urging assistance. It is our duty to declare that we shall stand by Great Britain always for the sake of the empire, and not when the Governor in Council thinks it fitting that we should do so. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McLean) tells us that he would investigate whether a war was just or not before sending the fleet, but I can tell him that if the British fleet is defeated on the high seas, Canada will be defeated that same hour. The first few hours of a naval battle decide who shall have command of the seas. The decisive part of the war between Japan and Russia lasted forty minutes, and the taking of Santiago harbour by the United States in the war with Spain took less time than that. Dreadnoughts, and Dreadnoughts alone, will count in the wars of the future. What inducement is there for a young man to enter the Canadian naval service, when he knows that the height of his ambition is limited to command a cruiser that dare not go to war, and which if she went to war would be of no service. It is an insult to the intelligence of our people for the government to declare that this navy would only cost $3,000,000 a year, when every one knows that even for such a navy as they propose, it will cost at least eight or ten million dollars per annum. Does not everything done by the government in this connection, lead us to the inquiry as to whether this is another Grand Trunk Pacific humbug, or another Public Works Department job, or an example of how this business government conducts public affairs? I have tried to place before the government what would be necessary should we attempt to build a navy in the Dominion. I have pointed out that we need a new Welland canal, a new Soo canal, a new Georgian Bay canal, the Hudson Bay railway, the Hudson straits lighted, and numerous railways and public works in different parts of our country. Last year the government told us that they had to cut down the estimates to the extent of eight or nine million dollars for the want of money, but to-day, just a year after, they appear to have money to burn on a useless navy. Let me point out also that the English navy is a long service navy. Boys enter at Greenwich between 13 years of age and 15, the marines enter between 17 and 23 years of age, and they serve for 12 years. Where are the Canadian boys who are going to train for 12 years in the hope of some day attaining the command of such cruisers as we propose to build? It has been my privilege to have gone through the Greenwich Naval School, and while I have every confidence in the patriotism of the young men of Canada, I do not believe that they are ready to undergo such a training as the boys undergo there, when their only ambition can possibly be such promotion as this proposed navy can afford. Great Britain does not build battleships for coast defence; for that purpose she uses the ships which cannot accompany the fleet, and the pay and salaries in Great Britain are only about one-half of what they would be in Canada. Suppose, for example, such a navy as that which the government proposes were present at the demonstration in the North sea last year, or suppose our little navy should be invited to American waters, how humiliating it would be for the people of Canada to have to admit that they own them. Last year Great Britain sent to the scrap heap 155 vessels of all descriptions. Her age limit for battleships is 25 years, for cruisers 20 years, for destroyers 12 years, so you can readily see that if we build a navy we must continue to build, and pay, pay, pay. This government admits that the construction of the ships will cost us 35 per cent more in Canada than if they were built in England. If the two Dreadnoughts will cost $25,000,000, as the Minister of War says they are likely to, a saving of 35 per cent on that amount would mean $8,750,000 to the people of Canada. If the total cost of two Dreadnoughts would not exceed $20,000,000, which is the proper estimate, then we would save $7,000,000 by having them built in Great Britain, because the 35 per cent is the difference between $20,000,000 and $27,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about giving a preference to Great Britain in our markets and about contributing to her maintenance in so doing. Why not give her a preference by having two battleships built in Great Britain, as proposed by the leader of the opposition, when they can be built there so much better and at so much less cost? Australia and New Zealand are having their ships built in Great Britain.

Great Britain is the greatest colonizing nation the world has ever known. Germany has tried it, France has tried it, Russia has tried it, Italy has tried it, the United States has tried it, and they have made a complete failure of it. Everybody knows the constitutional principles that govern this country. The King is Commander-in-Chief, here as well as in England, and here this parliament exercises the prerogative as parliament exercises it in England. The King can dissolve this parliament; he is practically the only man who can. Canada is either a part of the British empire or it is not; but this government are driving a wedge between Canada and the motherland by proposing to build an independent navy.

All Canadians have hoped that war was a thing of the past, and that as the years went by war would cease. We look at the militarism in force to-day in the nations of Europe, where men in uniform parade the streets and ships of war are constantly in evidence. These nations are burdened with debts and responsibilities that should warn us against undertaking any such burdens. The nations of the world deplore the state they are in and are seeking means to get away from it. Witness the various naval conferences that have taken place and the means that have been used to maintain peace in different parts of the world. These recognize the futility and needlessness of the barbarous spirit that forces them on. We should be glad that we are privileged to live in a land of peace, and we should welcome some universal congress of the nations to put a stop to this insane competition for armaments. Why should we, in the light of the twentieth century, when all are talking of the days when war shall be no more, deliberately and voluntarily assume that which other nations are trying to get away from? We like to believe, and there are many signs which show, that mere might is not the only way to conquer. Nations formerly carried on their wars with swords and spears. Now the weapons that are being used, and that should be used, are brains, tariffs and treaties. Building a navy is the first step in the opposite direction. The old-world powers are compelled to keep up their present armies and navies. Why should we attempt to imitate them? The only true position for us to take is to assist in keeping one central navy, and not to build a separate and independent navy, as proposed by this government. If we follow the government's plan we will add to our expenditures without subtracting from Great Britain's expenditures. Thus far Great Britain has carried us, and in this undertaking we would not be helping her or yet be helping ourselves. It is recognized that the central imperial navy must be maintained at adequate strength. The question therefore, is, who is going to pay for maintaining it up to the proper standard? The people of Great Britain must do it if we do not assist them. New Zealand says: 'We will give a Dreadnought, and thereby deduct $10,000,000 from the amount of money which the taxpayers of Great Britain will have to expend'. Australia and the other colonies and dependencies of Great Britain have been saying the same thing. Every dollar they give in the form of a direct grant means a dollar less from the pockets of the English taxpayers, while this government's proposition will not add to the strength of Britain's navy nor deduct a penny from the burden of the British taxpayer. The government of Canada says: 'We will build a little navy of our own. That little navy will be under the control of parliament, and we will not send it to assist Great Britain unless we choose. We will add $17,000,000 to the expenditure and debt of Canada, and place an everlasting burden of annual expenditure on the people of this country.' But the government are unable to show that this expenditure will mean a dollar less of necessary expenditure on the part of the British taxpayer to keep up the imperial navy. What one navy introduces to-day other navies strive to get. Never in the history of the world did false prophets or quacks have better opportunities than they have in this age, and this government can furnish more false prophets and quacks to the square inch, particularly in regard to this question, than any that ever existed before. We can count up an enemy's ships, and calculate the number she will put into line, but we cannot forecast the ability of her commanders. Who expected Russia to produce a Suvoroff, or Corsica a Napoleon Bonaparte, or Austria a Tegetthoff or Japan a Togo? If we study history, we will thank God that we have never had a navy to send to sea, and be more than glad if we never will. You may paint a tiger's face on a shield as the Chinese do, but you will need more than the craft if you propose to accomplish anything in war. We cannot mimic or deceive the nations in regard to our naval strength. The world to-day is alive to our military and naval strength, and it is impossible to disguise it. Sea-borne commerce must be defended, and Great Britain's statesmen say that the best way to defend it is by a united navy. There is the convoy method where groups of merchant ships can be escorted by a man-of war, and it is the proper method. What kind of an escort would we give with our puny cruisers and torpedo boats? The object of cruisers is to observe an enemy's force and strength, and return and communicate whatever information they have obtained to the officers waiting. Fighting would be quite outside of their duties. In a cruiser high speed and fuel endurance are necessary, more necessary than ability to fight. We must remain masters of our destinies and not slaves. If we become slaves to war tactics, our energies will become divided. We need all the force and energy we have to develop our resources. Local defence of its very nature must be repeated at many points to be of any service. The enemy will choose the point of attack and the time of attack.

Before we decide on a navy for Canada, let us ask the military class and the working class, the farmer and the artisan, the capitalist and the miner, those who live inland and those who live on our coasts, whether they want for ever to pay, pay, pay. The government has no mandate from the people to force this measure through the House. The only hope for Canada if she embarks on navy building is to set her teeth, build and maintain, and pay, pay, pay. If we are to build and maintain a navy, all parts of our country and all sections of our people must cling together in a manly, patriotic spirit and stand true to our country and to our flag. Let one flag, one fleet, one throne be our motto.

Look at the humiliating spectacle that we are presenting to the world. Canada ready to assert her independence. She will not go to war without the consent of parliament. Are we not drifting towards independence at a rapid rate?

Picture, if you will, Great Britain, with its back to the wall, fighting the foe, sending over a request for Canada to come to her assistance, and the Prime Minister of Canada and his cabinet discussing the merits of the British case and calling parliament together to hear all sides of the question before determining whether we should go to the assistance of the mother country or not.

There is no danger of European nations sending their battleships to Canada until they have defeated the British fleet at home. They would weaken their unit and serve no end. While Great Britain holds command of the sea there is no fear of a foreign foe attacking Canada. Where they would strike would be at the heart and not at the extremities. Canada's ships, as proposed, will never be called to battle, and after the battle, should Britain's power be supreme, they will not be needed. Should, on the other hand, Britain's power be lost, they will either be sunk or captured.

In closing, let me say to this government: do to England as you would wish England to do to you. If she is in need of help to-day, and I believe she is, you are denying her that help by introducing this Bill. She has asked you for bread, you are offering a stone. You are taking money that you ought to expend to assist Great Britain in building ships to go to the fighting line, like the ships of New Zealand and Australia, and you are instead squandering that money on a useless navy which will be no protection to either Canada or the empire.

If she has displayed ignorance in making her request in the manner that she has, you must remember that had she exposed her whole wish in this matter it would be the public property of her enemies to-day. Stand by the good old flag and answer England's call, and depend upon it you will never regret it.

An independent navy, as suggested by this government, involves years of delay. The construction and armament of which means enormous capital expenditure, added to which, it will necessarily follow, the up-keep and renewals of our fleet, in addition to the maintenance of schools and academies.

I have unbounded faith in my king and country, and undieing belief in the empire to which I belong. Let the British navy continue to be the floating bulwark of our land and her parliament our guiding star. The most effective contribution we could make, and one which may never need to be repeated, would be to give to England's navy two Dreadnoughts. Then if you must build a navy, submit the whole question to the Canadian people. I am prepared to assist in maintaining the splendid inheritance received from our forefathers. I love my country, I believe in her, I honour her, I am prepared to work for her, to live for her, and, if needs be, die for her.' In order that her territory may remain intact and her name untarnished.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. VICTOR GEOFFRION (Chambly and Verchères). Mr. Speaker, this already long debate of the very important question of the creation of the Canadian navy has, in my opinion, elicited two facts—the wisdom of the measure now before the Chair and the illogical position of the hon. gentlemen who oppose it. The opponents of this measure are divided into two classes—those who are in favour of giving tribute—or, perhaps, I should not use that expression, but let us say, making a contribution—to the British admiralty, and those who are in favour of doing nothing at all. The most illogical feature of those who oppose this measure lies, of course, in the fact that, having voted and spoken in favour of the policy expressed in the resolution of the 29th of March last, they now oppose it. The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), when this resolution was before the House, took a certain position; to-day, he adopts a different policy altogether. I shall have to quote some parts of the speeches of hon. members opposite, but I shall endeavour to make my quotations as brief as possible, as many of them have been used by other hon. members. Still, in order to make my own argument complete, I think I should be allowed to make a few brief quotations. Here is what the leader of the opposition said when he was addressing the House on the resolution of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) as reported at page 3517 of 'Hansard':

In so far as my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to-day outlined the lines of naval defence of this country I am entirely at one with him. I am entirely of opinion, in the first place, that the proper line upon which we should proceed in that regard is the line of having a Canadian naval force of our own. I entirely believe in that. The other experiment has been tried as between Australia and the mother country and it has not worked satisfactorily in any respect. In Great Britain the contribution has perhaps been regarded as rather unsatisfactory.

Then, at page 3518:

So, I am at one with the Prime Minister as far as this is concerned. I am at one with him in this respect also that I think that an expenditure of money designed for that purpose ought, in the main at least, to be under the control of our own parliament and that by making an appropriation of that kind and attending to the defence of our own coasts, by co-operation and co-ordination with the imperial naval forces, we would be rendering a real service in defence of the empire and we would be doing our duty not only to Canada but to the empire as a whole.

The leader of the opposition, since that day, has seen fit to change his policy three times. The first policy was on March 29, 1909—rapid construction of a Canadian naval service according to the recommendation of the admiralty; no contribution in money. The second policy appeared on January 12, 1910: Rapid and prudent construction of a Canadian navy, plus a contribution in money to the value of one Dreadnought. Third policy, February 3, 1910: No Canadian navy; immediate contribution in money to the value of two Dreadnoughts.

Now, Sir, what is the reason of these changes? Everybody knows that the leader of the opposition is a statesman, a very eminent lawyer, able to grasp every question which comes before him, able to analyse a question from all sides. Who can comprehend the reason why he has seen fit, within one year, to change his policy three times?—unless it be that the thumbsrew and the rack so much spoken of by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) have been applied to the leader of the opposition by his own followers. I cannot see any other reason for it. The leader of the opposition has seen fit to increase the tribute he wants this country to pay to the mother country in proportion to the decrease of the German scare. On the 29th of March last, when we discussed the resolution of the hon. member for North Toronto, the German peril cry was launched in England and soon reached this country. Some of us who had not studied the question naturally felt obliged to pause, fearing there might be something in it. At that time, the leader of the opposition was in favour simply of a Canadian navy. But after the thing had been discussed, and when it was found out in England, during the elections, that this was simply an election cry, when the people who govern England, the Prime Minister and some other statesmen said it was simply raised for election purposes, the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) wanted to contribute immediately one Dreadnought. But after the elections were over, when the German scare was found out to amount to nothing, the leader of the opposition declared that he did not want a Canadian navy, but that he did want this country to contribute $25,000,000 to the treasury of the admiralty. Well, Sir, I desire to address particularly those gentlemen on the other side of the House who think that a direct contribution is the policy that should be adopted by this country. I wish to quote the admirable argument of the hon. member for North Toronto when he discussed his resolution of the 29th of March last. This quotation, like my others, will be very brief, but I am sure every hon. member of the House will enjoy it. It is couched in most admirable terms, and is a most logical argument. Everybody knows that, at that time, the hon. member for North Toronto made a most powerful speech. For my part, I was so much impressed with that argument that I think we cannot quote it too often. The hon. gentleman was discussing the different modes by which we might help England, and was dealing particularly with the mode of a direct contribution. I quote from page 3494 of last year's 'Hansard':

While these objections have some force, though as I think not a force that is irresistible, there are some reasons which appear to me to have deeper force with reference to that method of taking our part in defence. I do not know whether I can make myself understood to the members of this House on this point, but I shall briefly try to do so.

The first and greatest objection which I have to a fixed money contribution is that it bears the aspect of hiring somebody else to do what we ourselves ought to do; as though a man, the father of a family, in lusty health and strength, should pay his neighbour something per month for looking after the welfare and safety of his home instead of doing that duty himself. That seems to me, when you work it out, to be a basic objection to this form of aid. It goes still further than that. Suppose you contribute this year your sum, and next year your equal sum, and thereafter year after year. After ten, or twelve, or twenty, or thirty years, you will have paid out an immense amount of money. You will have been protected in the meantime; but in Canada itself there will be no roots struck, there will be no residue left, there will be no preparation of the soil, or beginning of the growth of the product of defence. Yet some time or other, no one can doubt that with resources and with a population constantly increasing, we must and will have in this country a naval force of our own for our coast and home defence.

The interest that we take in a contribution spent by another is not the interest that I desire for Canada. I want to see something grafted on the soil of Canada's nationhood, which takes root and grows and develops until it incites the spirit of defence in this country, leads to a participation in the defence, leads to that quick interest in it, its glories, its duties and its accomplished work, which is after all the one great thing that compensates a people for great expenditures either on land or on sea in the way of defence and of the maintenance of the rights of the country.

Sir, I am entirely of the opinion of the hon. member for North Toronto in that regard. I think he made a most logical argument. But now, to cover his changed base, the hon. member has invented the emergency cry; and he pretends that his policy on this question at the present time is quite consistent with the speech which he made on the resolution of the 29th of March last. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. The emergency cry which he has invented is based, according to his own admission and the admission of his friends who take the same stand, on the assumption that Germany, who is now arming rapidly, will in a few years, probably in four or five years, have caught up with the naval power of England. Well, Sir, if this apprehension of the hon. member is correct, that emergency will be still more pressing next year, and when that fatal day apprehended by him does come, the emergency will be still more pressing than ever. Therefore the hon. gentleman, in order to be consistent with himself, must ask next year for the gift of another twenty-five millions to England, to be followed by still other gifts as the emergency increases.

Now we know that the hon. member for North Toronto is a very talented actor, and instead of going from town to town, and from village to village to preach temperance, as he did in the past, he should have adopted the profession of actor. He gave us sentiment and pathos in his speech when he spoke of the position of England. He represented the mother country, with her daughters assembled around her, and saying to them: Will you do something for me? Look at me, I am exhausted, I can stand the strain no longer. Do something for me; but if you do not, I will love you just the same. He represented the old British lion limping along exhausted, surrounded by his cubs, and saying to them: Boys, look at me, I cannot stand it any longer, you must help me. Sir, how flattering such a picture must be for the proud and justly proud, British nation! Just think of it! England with her glorious history, with her long series of victories, England surrounded by powerful allies, surrounded by colonies ready to rush to her help in the hour of need, England with her world-wide, famous corps of diplomats, with her enormous wealth, a nation of landlords, and of lords, half of whose wealth would be enough to meet the emergency imagined by the hon. gentleman. Think, Mr. Speaker, the effect such words would produce when read in Germany. What must the Germans think when they read of a British statesman representing the great British nation in such a deplorable condition? Sir, we would have heard a different tale from the hon. gentleman if the Prime Minister had committed the error of adopting the policy which he and his friends now advocate. Then we would have heard the hon. gentleman telling us of the poor settlers of this country, how hard they had toiled, themselves, their fathers and their grandfathers, to settle up this country and preserve it for England; he would have pictured them to us as burdened with taxation in order to send this twenty-five million dollars to England, when she did not need it, and when she had all the money she wanted. He would have told us that the best policy for Canada to adopt was to develop this country and make Canada strong and powerful. Sir, that would have been a manly speech, and it would have been true.

Now, what about the policy of those who are opposed to the government Bill for creating a navy, those who pretend that we owe nothing to England, and that we should do nothing at all for England? That is the policy advocated by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and by some of his friends from the province of Quebec. Now, I believe that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is not really responsible for this policy; I think he has been led astray and deceived by the leader of the nationalist group in the province of Quebec. Sir, there is a rumour current in Montreal and in the province of Quebec that the leader of the nationalist group in Quebec took the hon. member for Jacques Cartier upon the top of Mount Royal and showing him the great and beautiful province of Quebec, with its mountains, and lakes, and fertile plains, and vast resources, and its happy and prosperous population, and said to him: All these things will I give you if you will follow me and adopt my policy. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier answered the great tempter of the province of Quebec, that he had voted for the resolution of 29th March last. But said the great tempter: You can always say that you did not read it, or if you did read it, that you did not understand it. But, replied the member for Jacques Cartier: My leader has another policy, he wants to make a contribution to Great Britain. Then said the tempter: There is always the double game policy; you can always say that Laurier does not want to do anything, that he is a traitor to his province, that he is sacrificing the interests of his own province to England, while in the other provinces your own leader can say that Laurier is a traitor to England, that he wants to keep everything for the province of Quebec. Thus was the hon. member for Jacques Cartier tempted, and thus he yielded to the temptation. He started for Lachine, followed by the sardonic laugh of the great tempter in the province of Quebec. At Lachine he made that famous speech in which he said that we did not owe anything to England, that the best policy for Canada was to develop our own resources, that we owed nothing to England, but if anything, England was indebted to us.

He made a long and elaborate speech, full of arguments, but when he came back to this House there was a little different story. He made another speech, but he was not so enthusiastic about his policy as he was at Lachine. He quoted parts of reports, editorials of newspapers, and he read some letters, but he could not muster courage enough to make the eloquent plea that he made in Lachine, because he saw in front of him the stern and evil eye of his master right in the press gallery here. One moment he seemed to have courage to make one of those pronouncements that Canada did not owe anything to England at all, but it was too much for him, his legs failed him, and he rolled under his desk. The great tempter left the gallery in disgust and we have not seen him since. But the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was also led astray by other influences in the province of Quebec. We have some newspapers in Quebec that contend that we should not do anything at all in the way of helping England under any circumstances. We have, for instance, a great daily newspaper called 'L'Action Sociale' which puts as the headline of its first page 'Instaunare omnia in Christo'—Restore everything in Christ. That paper is deceiving the population of the province of Quebec, when it pretends as it does, that it is speaking in the name of the Catholic clergy of Quebec. It is impossible for it to speak in the name of the Catholic clergy of Quebec, knowing as we Catholics do what the Catholic clergy owe to England and knowing that we have the most perfect liberty and the most complete protection under the British flag to exercise our religion and maintain our institutions. The editors of that paper deceive the people of Quebec, when they say that the clergy of Quebec are against the policy of my right hon. friend who leads the House. We know that when Sir George Etienne Cartier presented his Militia Bill which provided that a navy should be created at the same time the clergy of the province of Quebec, rightly, we hope, were in favour of Cartier to a man and approved of his policy. Then the country had a revenue of only $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year and to-day we have a revenue of $100,000,000. Then we had a commerce of about $150,000,000 while now we have a commerce of about $800,000,000. It is impossible that the clergy of Quebec would inspire that paper as they pretend that they are inspired. It is my privilege to have for friends some of the most eminent of the clergy of Montreal and the province of Quebec, and they have deplored the attitude of this paper when they pretend to speak for the clergy. What would happen if the policy advocated by that paper and by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) should prevail? What if England should say: I cannot get anything from you; you absolutely refuse to do anything for me; what interest have I to keep you; what interest have I to help you? Where would the Catholics of Quebec turn for better protection? Would it be towards the United States? Sir, everybody knows that that would not be the wish of the clergy or of the Catholic people of Quebec. Would they turn their eyes to Germany? Sir, asking the question is to answer it. Would it be to France when we know that the clergy and the Catholic people of Quebec deplore the policy of the French government against certain of the Catholic institutions of France, and when we know that the members of those Catholic institutions are flocking to Canada where they are able to obtain a secure and peaceful home under the protection of the British flag. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier misunderstood the loyalty of the population of Quebec. It is strange that we, the Liberal members in this House, should have to fight for it against those parties in the other provinces whose speeches we have heard in this House, and even against some of our own friends in Quebec. The French and the Catholic people of Quebec are loyal and their's is a true loyalty. It has been manifested so often that it looks almost absurd that we should have to defend it. Not many years ago, when the news reached us of the death of that most illustrious, kind and admirable woman, Queen Victoria, there was true sorrow manifested in the province of Quebec. To-day, it is not only loyalty that the people of Quebec feel for our great and kind King, but it is a sentiment of friendship. Not long ago, again, there was joy all over the province of Quebec when the news reached us of the establishment of the great entente cordiale between France and England, and if there came a war in which England would have to meet her enemies on the seas it would be a happy day in the province of Quebec, if, through that entente cordiale, France should launch her powerful fleet side by side with that of England.

Now, I desire to say a word about that referendum that has been proposed by different members on the other side of the House. I think it is the policy of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. How would it be possible, I would ask my hon. friends opposite, to go before the people with such a referendum. How many questions would we ask? Should we ask as many questions as there are policies in the House? There is the leader of the opposition with one policy favouring an immediate contribution, there is the hon. member for Jacques Cartier with his policy of doing nothing, there is the policy of the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) favouring the giving of five or six Dreadnoughts at a time, and the policy of the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty). It was very hard to follow him, and find out what the policy was which he did favour, but after he had spoken three hours, in the last five minutes of his speech, he managed to say, if I understood him properly, that he would be in favour of an immediate contribution provided we would have a word to say as to the expenditure of the money.

There would be four policies and consequently there would be four questions to put to the electors, and even if we should put these questions it would still be very difficult to get at the true meaning of the electorate. For example, some enterprising newspapers in Montreal have endeavoured to ascertain the opinions of their readers all over the country as to this naval policy and the result of their replies received was an evidence of very divergent views. Thousands of answers came in; some said: I am in favour of the statu quo provided we should promise that if England calls us we should rush to her aid; some said: We would be in favour of building a Canadian navy on the condition that we should not engage in foreign wars of the empire; and some said: We would be in favour of a fixed contribution on the condition that we should have some say in the foreign diplomacy of Britain. Now, how would you proceed, what were you to do if the result of your referendum was anything like the result of this newspaper vote. Is it not after all more logical, that having a responsible government elected every four years to conduct the affairs of this country, this question which in fact is a sequence of the military policy of this government should be left to the government and the parliament of Canada to settle. I submit, Sir, that the best way to prove we are true Canadians is to follow the course I have outlined. We must not forget that the paramount reason for the building of the Canadian navy is the protection of our trade. Putting aside for the moment the sentiment of loyalty which actuates every man in every part of Canada, and looking at the question in a business way only, is it not a fact that the development of the ship-building industry would be a most important thing for this country? Is it not a fact that the ship-building industry in England has been a great source of wealth, and is it not a fact that in Canada we have all the things necessary to construct ships of war as well as merchant vessels? As was pointed out very eloquently by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) we have in Canada the iron, the steel, the coal, the timber, and we have to back it all up, an energetic and intelligent people. Every civilized country in the world to-day is making great sacrifices to open up avenues of trade within themselves, and why should Canada be lacking in this respect. Putting aside, as I have said the question of sentiment, we have the opportunity to create an industry which will probably mean millions of dollars of wealth to this country and which will give employment to thousands of our citizens. Shall we lose the opportunity? Shall we prefer to take $25,000,000 and send it to England, or shall we be content to rest on our oars when at the same time we gladly vote millions of dollars for the betterment of our canals and for the equipment of our ports, and, for our militia? Well, Sir, I think we ought to be more Canadian than that. And, Sir, if we build a Canadian navy as outlined in the Bill which we are now discussing, then, when the real crisis comes to England, in the province of Quebec as in the other provinces of this Dominion, England may rest assured that every man will do his duty.

Mr. P. E. BLONDIN (Champlain). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I shall take the liberty of congratulating the hon. member from Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion in his magnificent piece of oratory, but I de not deem it incumbent upon me to follow him in the more or less obscure intricacies of his reasoning. He did not even try to prove that he had authority from his supreme ruler, the people, to solve the important question which is now before the House, or that he had a mandate to that effect.

Much as I regret it, I feel that I am bound to protest loudly both against the policy of the government and against that of my own party as regards the question of creating a Canadian-imperial war fleet or of making a cash contribution.

In rising to concur in the amendment moved by the hon. member from Jacques Cartier asking that the question be submitted to the people before the government solve this matter, I am fully confident that I am merely ruled by my regard for the people and the institutions of this country, as the hon. member himself was.

I do not intend to cast the least doubt upon the sincereness of the hon. members who preceded me nor to inquire as to what extent rhetorics stand for logics and sometimes for truth, but I may be permitted, Sir, to state that the reasoning of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier still stands untouched in spite of all these attacks more dazzling and cunning than grave and convincing.

His speech still sheds upon this discussion rather obscured all the glowing light of the principle which inspired it and as already stated it shall remain upon our parliamentary records as 'a page of true history and a monument of logics and common sense.'

Much has been said up to this date about dangers from all sources which, according to me, threatened more the far distant shores of imagination than those of our country; but very little has been said of the danger, the sole danger evident and really imminent which threatens our most cherished and sacred rights: the government of this country by the people and not by autocratic ministers, the government of this country by the people and not by one hundred and forty members without mandate and authorization. For it is without any mandate from the people, without their knowledge and their consent that these hon. gentlemen propose and sanction this extraordinary measure which, as every one agrees, exceeds in importance and in formidable consequences the most serious and perplexing problem which has ever been before this country. And I ask these gentlemen when have the people, who after all are the sole masters, the only sovereign of this country, because in this British country the King himself is only the supreme representative of the national will, I ask these hon. gentlemen opposite when have the people given them a mandate to propound and execute such policy?

What is the use of invoking the resolution adopted on the 29th of March, 1909, a resolution which does not bind the members of this House any more than a thousand other resolutions unanimously adopted in the same way. This one has been laid away and will remain forever in the wide cemetery of the government, where it will never hear the trumpet of the resurrection? And even if this resolution could bind us, by what magical logic can it be claimed that it binds the people who have taken no part in it, who have not given consent to it nor authorized it? And is this report of the different imperial conferences, whose long publicity is pleaded a more serious and more justifiable reason than the first to refuse a plebiscite?

But even if this report, which may contain, but in a far less measure than it has been contended, a few imperceptible germs of the present policy, has been partly communicated to the electorate, to the mass of the people, it has been interpreted as containing the absolute refusal of Canada to take any part in the imperial policy, and nothing else; that is all what the people of this country have ever understood—that is all what they have learned. And who can contradict me when I assert that never has this government, nor the hon. Prime Minister, nor any of his followers ever done anything up to the present in order to modify or efface this popular belief.

Nowhere have thep explained to the people the policy now before us.

Some hon. ministers came to my constituency at the last general elections and they kept a most complete silence upon this question.

And I am still within the truth and moderation when I say that on the contrary they have expounded the very opposite during the last election; and since this question was started, and I will quote just one evidence amongst a thousand others. Here is what is said in 'Le Canada' of the 5th October, 1903, in an article entitled 'Participation Militaire:—

It would only be necessary that a few enthusiasts would pass a resolution and ask intervention to authorize England to take Canada at her word and say: 'all right, send your soldiers and your ships.' And our brave Canadians would be obliged to go and fight for the sake of Macedonia and at the greatest glory of Bachibouzouczs. While if we remain as we are, no one can ask us to go to the front. Let those who have adopted this resolution go if they like, but the Canadians won't go. Oh, yes, let us keep for a long time to come the statu quo, where is our safe guard. Let us keep firmly into power Sir Wilfrid Laurier who has given to the Canadian people the assurance that he will not let our country run into the vortex of militarism nor meddle in the disputes of other nations. We are well, let us stay as we are.

But in order to avoid this reproach which is impossible, the hon. gentlemen have adopted their ordinary tactics; they keep silent in their weaknesses and their sins, and never uttered a word in defence. But in order to escape the strict consequences of this evident fact, they have undertaken to belittle before the public the immensity of the undertaking in which they will engage the country and they consider as a mere bagatelle the enormous sums which we will be obliged to spend.

They have been obliged, nevertheless, to admit that the first expense will amount to fifteen million dollars, and if we keep in mind this important admission of the First Minister 'that it might be the same with those estimates that it has been with the estimates of the Transcontinental, and that a great deal larger ones might follow,' if we put together the new information which comes to light every day, and which go to make the expense greater and greater, as for instance the estimate of admiral Kingsmill, which the hon. Minister of Militia seemed the other day, so afraid to communicate to the House, we must, without any great effort of imagination calculate this first cost at twenty-five millions of dollars and not fifteen millions.

And this is only part of the truth, because these hon. gentlemen take great care to keep before the public eye the veil which still hides our future obligations, this vortex of militarism upon which the hon. premier was speaking so eloquently in the days gone by, and which the experience of the old nations show in a way so clear, so precise, and so alarming. Neither have they said to their constituents that once entered in the game of armaments, a nation must increase and always increase her armies, multiply and always multiply her men of war. But the example of our own militia of which the budget has increased by the sum of $6,000,000 in a few years, is enough to make us suspicious about the silence of these gentlemen and the cautious of their optimism. But they go further than that when they try to benumb public opinion, and since the beginning of this debate, their aim has been to explain that this new unprecedented law is a natural sequence of our statutes and that it is only the development of our Militia Act.

Clause 69 of this Act expressly says that the Governor in Council can put our militia in active service on the frontiers or farther, only for the defence of Canada. Nothwithstanding allegations to the contrary, I claim that this clause does not justify the argument of these hon. gentlemen, 'that Canada is obliged to share in all the wars of the empire,' but that it means that 'Canada is only obliged to take part in his own wars, and that he is at war only when being attacked.'

The people of this country have always interpreted the law in that way, and the law which is proposed to-day is one which they ignore, which is contrary to their political ideas, and upon which they have never been consulted.

But the people, in the eyes of the hon. gentlemen opposite, have repeated it long enough, they have given it sufficiently to understand, the people, for them, is a great child in guardianship who never must be consulted on the grave questions, for fear of fanatism and juvenile passions. This belief holds so firmly in the mind of the hon. gentlemen that it overflows in all their speeches, it escapes by all the numerous breaks of their arguments. Mr. Speaker, I must sincerely admit that I cannot understand what good it would be to call parliament after our navy would be gone, in order to express our approbation or disapprobation when the thing is done. And I cannot see in this clause anything other than a last subterfuge to hide unmannerly to the people the fatal blow given to his absolute right to control public expenses and take obligations for the future and without his consent as we do presently; a last subterfuge to hide in a very feeble manner and contemptious manner the humiliating attitude which will be an everlasting blow to the conscience of the country, in imposing to a whole people a war which he will not have declared nor desired, and which he will probably disprove. After all, Mr. Speaker, the people have a right to know and to appreciate all these new facts before being bound to them for ever.

These are new considerations which amply justify the amendment of the honourable member for Jacques Cartier, and which will make this Bill, if parliament adopt it, not only an abuse of our mandate, but an infringement on the liberty and institutions of this country.

But I do not wish to take my seat before saying to this government that I am ready to suffer the extreme consequences of my convictions and in order to release my responsibility of the claim which is about to be perpetrated and if the hon. gentlemen refuse the appeal to the people which we ask and which is asked by the thousands of people who signed the petitions which we have presented, I am ready, Mr. Speaker, to put immediately my resignation into your hands, if the honourable Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) who has made himself a champion of this policy in my province, will do the same and run with me the risks of an election in the county of Champlain, where he will find, I can assure him, a population above the spirit of fanatism and party which he and his honourable friends seem so much to fear in our people.

Mr. Speaker, I heartily join with the honourable member of Ste. Anne (Mr. Doherty) in the congratulations which he offered to the right hon. Prime Minister upon his happy return to health. I was most happy about it, but I am assured that the hon. member has not spoken all his mind and omitted the best of his wishes. He would have liked to see the hon. premier younger. We would also, all of us, see him in the prime of his bright youthful years, so that he would find also his past convictions, and instead of defending this Bill in the House, he would fight it on our side.

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval). Mr. Speaker, before the trumpets of the last judgment of our parliamentary institution, blown by the hon. member of Jacques Cartier, and echoed by the hon. member of Champlain (Mr. Blondin) have ceased to be heard——

Mr. BLONDIN. At the resurrection.

Mr. WILSON. I ask permission to raise my feeble voice before the government, the Liberal party, and the whole people has entered into that eternity, happy or unhappy, of which the honourable member has spoken. I will speak in a language which is not my own, but which every one here understands.

Mr. Speaker, I will support Bill (No. 95), and I desire, in a few words to state to this House my reasons for doing so. The main reason, rather I would say the sole reason, for it includes all the others, is because Canada occupies now the position of a nation, and as such has a status, a rank, amongst the other nations of the world, and more so amongst the dominions, colonies, possessions forming part of the British empire, an empire on which the sun never sets.

As a nation Canada has: (1) a dignity to uphold; (2) a territory to defend; (3) a trade to protect; (4) various obligations to herself, to the mother country, and to the empire; which obligations and duties I will, with your kind indulgence, the full measure of which I claim, submit to this House for consideration.

The building of a national navy is a duty of the hour which this government cannot escape without being unfaithful to the mandate entrusted to it by the people of this country, a duty which it could not ignore without impairing the most sacred rights, the welfare and the interests of the people.

The advantages of the construction of a Canadian navy from an industrial point of view, namely, the creation of a new industry, ship-building; the construction of dockyards; the construction of the ships on Canadian soil by the people of Canada; the various trades that will benefit by it; the creation of a naval school; the defence of our sea-boards; the defence of the country in co-operation with our militia; the protection of trade on the coasts, on inland waters and on the high seas—are also questions of vital importance to the people of Canada.

I will also try to meet a few of the objections formulated against this legislation My conclusions are to be found in the various clauses of the Bill laid the other day on the table of the House and which constitute the subject of the present debate.

But, Mr. Speaker, at the outset, is Canada a nation? Above and before all the essential and distinctive characteristics of a nation, the qualifications sine qua non of its existence, are: the community of the law, the body of legislation, the participation in governing power, the rights to express freely the will of the whole and to affirm it in Acts, the constitutional organs which it possesses, and in a word, the personality, public and judicial. The power in the hands of the people and the full exercise of the faculty of self-government in all matters of legislative and municipal administration, are the principal attributes of nationhood. Has the Canadian people, according to the above classical and complete definition, a life organic, political, social, judicial, common and international? Does it fulfil the conditions above enumerated? It is for you, Sir, to pronounce. For my part, I will not go as far as to say that 'poser la question c'est la résoudre,' but my mind, my conscience and my patriotism are satisfied and crave no further definitions. It is true that this title of a nationhood has been denied to Canada. Some people say: 'We sometimes call ourselves a nation, but we are only a colony. Our constitution is as liberal as it possibly could be in view of the fact that Canada is a colony and therefore a dependency.' In reply, I much prefer the assertion of the learned Professor Wrong of the University of Toronto, who in presence of no less a prominent man than Hon. James Bryce, the British ambassador at Washington, emphatically affirmed that Canada was in reality a free country; that the British ambassador at Washington had one of the most difficult positions to fill, a more embarrassing task, to perform than had the other diplomats, because he had to serve and represent two nations instead of one, to wit: England and Canada. And he also said:

> In theory the King reigns, but in reality he has no political powers, it is the Prime Minister who governs. In theory, Canada is a colony, but in reality she is an independent nation.

After all, Sir, it is not a question of mere play on words. As a learned German professor, M. Bluntschli stated:

The international law established no human tribunal to decree whether a body of men are qualified or not for nationhood; the tribunal of God alone may pronounce and its decrees are recorded in the history of the world.

Sir, I have uttered a most terrible word, the word 'independent.' I presume I will have to account for that most heinous crime to my hon. friends from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), who the other day charged the Prime Minister with being a very bad man, who, from 1866 to the present day, went and is still going up and down the country, preaching independence, belittling and deriding 'the diplomacy of the British empire, instilling insidious poisons into the minds of young and growing citizens.' And he goes on to say:

But he has done more than that. He has never given up an opportunity, during the last ten or fifteen years, of representing Canada as engaged in deadly peril, wrenching from the British government, tyrannical government, rights and privileges, and he has stretched to the very verge of a very vivid imagination the rights and privileges which we to-day enjoy by virtue of the concession of the British prerogative. And so his Minister of Marine afterwards comes back from the conference of 1909 and says: We have wrenched from Great Britain our political autonomy, we have wrenched from Great Britain our treaty-making autonomy, we have wrenched from Great Britain our fiscal autonomy, and now I come back with our naval autonomy. All these things my right hon. friend speaks; lesser men echo what he says. These are but the results of teaching.

And he plays that tune for many more lines. He also quotes a few detached phrases from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, at various dates, to wit, from 1888 to 1890, the following:

In 1888 in the House of Commons he says:

The time is coming when the present relations between Great Britain and Canada must either become closer or be severed altogether.

At the Club National, on the 2nd of July, 1890, he made another profession of faith:

I do not mean to say that we should always remain a colony; on the contrary, the day is coming when this country will have to take its place among the nations of the earth. But I do not want to see my country's independence attained through the hostility of one race to another.

Oh, in the opinion of my hon. friends from North Toronto, Frontenac and others that Quebec French Laurier is a most disloyal and monstrous man because he spoke such a language. There is no man in the whole British empire who would not repudiate such assertions. Certainly, at least, nobody would entertain such a proposition in the good city of Toronto or in loyal Ontario.

Far from me the intention of irritating the nerves of my hon. friends nor offending their pure and disinterested imperialism, but for their own edification I will ask them permission to read the following:

But it is no longer possible for any Canadian to deny to his country the status and dignity of a nation. British ideals and practice assure to us continuance and growth of the powers of self-government with which we have been so long entrusted. Our connection with the British Crown, though formed by the deepest and most strenuous loyalty, is a connection which involves no economic fetters, and which is rapidly tending in all foreign relations towards freedom of contract and full powers of management, in respect of Canadian affairs. We make our own laws. No attempt is made at imperial control. It seems no longer possible to withhold from us the right to make our own treaties, even in cases which may indirectly affect imperial interests. British garrisons have been withdrawn, and Canada manages, without review or appeal, her military affairs. The great fortified harbours of Canada, which Britain deemed an essential part of that great maritime system by which she maintained her naval supremacy and effectively policed the world, have been assumed by Canada. In her outlook towards Britain, Canada, while loyal is independent. She faces the rest of the world, in every essential sense, a free, autonomous and imperial power.

And this is an extract from a valuable essay entitled, 'Shall Canada have a navy of her own?' by Mrs. W. Hewes-Oliphant, Toronto, and Toronto was so proud of her that a prize of $400 was awarded to the author! And in Toronto!

But perhaps, Sir, this authority would leave my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) indifferent and his conscience will still rest at peace.

Far from me the idea of converting him to that doctrine, but let me bring forth in support, in a different order of things, it is true, but on the same lines, the parole of a prominent man formerly from Toronto and now occupying a very high position in that more or less loyal city of Montreal. I refer to His Grace Archbishop Farthing. I am quoting from a newspaper report:

A most outspoken address was that delivered by Bishop Farthing before a representative gathering of churchmen at the first annual dinner of the Federation of Churchmen's Associations, held last night at the Canada Club.

Speaking on behalf of the Anglican church in Canada, he made a striking declaration of absolute independence from the mother church in England. Then he proceeded to castigate the city council of Montreal for its inaction in regard to the outbreak of typhoid, and to call on all churchmen to work for a higher ideal of citizenship.

Owe Allegiance only to Primate of Canada.

We need to remember said Bishop Farthing, that we are a national church. There is a tendency across the water to think that we must not legislate or move a step forward unless the mother church tells us we may.

No one has more respect for the mother church than I. No man here owes more to the mother church than I. Everything I possess, morally and spiritually I have from her.

But here we are a daughter setting up housekeeping for ourselves. We are not always to be under the dictation of the mother whose home we have left, and for whom we have the deepest respect, and love, and veneration. We are here as an independent national church.

We realize to-day, more than ever, the prophecies of all the great statesmen, the far foreseeing political geniuses, who have adorned the political summits of the empire, more specially during the last half century, and at the head of whom sparkles with a most brilliant eclat, the late Lord Russell. If you will allow me I will quote just a few words of the famous speech which he delivered in Westminster on the 8th February, 1850, when addressing the House on the question of colonial policy. I am sorry the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) is not in his seat, because I think he would be much scandalized at what Lord John Russell said. I shall only read a brief quotation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Read it all.

Mr. C. A. WILSON. I shall be happy to do so. He said:

The next point, I think, is that in conformity with the policy on which you have governed your British North America colonies, you should as far as possible, proceed upon the principle of introducing and maintaining political freedom in all your colonies. I think whenever you say political freedom cannot be introduced, your are bound to show the reasons for the exemption, and to show that the people are a race among whom it is impossible to carry out free institutions—that you must show the colony is not formed of the British people or even that there is no such admixture of the British population as to make it safe to introduce representative institutions. Unless you can show that, I think the general rule would be that you should send to the different parts of the world, and maintain in your different colonies men of the British race, and capable of governing themselves; men whom you shall tell will have full liberty of governing themselves, and that while you are their representative with respect to all foreign concerns, you wish to interfere no further in their domestic concerns than may be clearly and decidedly necessary to prevent a conflict in the colony itself.

But what I say is this, we should not be considering whether we should part with those colonies—whether we should make the connection looser—or whether we should even leave them with less means of defence against foreign aggregation.

I believe not only that you may proceed on those principles without any danger for the present, but there may be questions arising hereafter which you may solve without any danger of such an unhappy conflict as that which took place with what are now the United States of America. On looking back at the origin of that unhappy contest, I cannot but think that it was not a single error or a single blunder which got us into that contest, but a series of repeated errors and repeated blunders. . . . I anticipated indeed with others that some of the colonies may so grow in population and wealth that they may say—Our strength is sufficient to enable us to be independent of England. The link is now become onerous to us—the time is come when we think we can, in amity and alliance with England, maintain our independence. I do not think that that time is yet approaching. But let us make them as far as possible, fit to govern themselves—let us give them, as far as we can, the capacity of ruling their own affairs—let them increase in wealth and population, and whatever may happen, we of this great empire shall have the consolation of saying that we have contributed to the happiness of the world.

And to think that Lord John Russell was the Prime Minister of England!

Without endorsing all the above remarks, without sharing in all these opinions expressed by such pre-eminent men, I thought it proper to repeat them in this House for the benefit of all, who may, in my humble judgment, draw from them useful lessons of tolerance, of liberty, of speech, in British parliaments at home and abroad. Nobody would have thought then, nor would think to-day of accusing Lord Russell of treason or disloyalty because of such utterances and predictions? But, here, to a certain class of men, it seems almost a crime to dissertate on the future of our country, on the possibilities of the future, on the preparations for the coming times.

Sir, I don't want to be misunderstood or misconstrued on this question. I am not in favour of the independence of Canada, in the sense that some people attach to the expression. I am not advocating that doctrine. Whatever may be the term employed, whether it be independence, or autonomy, nation or colony—it is of little moment to me so long as we remain what we are, as we are and where we are. Nothing more but nothing less. We need the protection of the mother country and at all and every point of view either national, political, commercial, and even sentimental, Canada has nothing but to gain and benefit by that protection. No disconnection, no severance, but good amity and alliance between the mother country and her autonomous daughter nation is my motto.

But, Sir, we do not know what the future has in store for us; what natural evolution will bring about. We may be left alone and this is one of the reasons why we should prepare, and, amongst other preparations, I believe that the building of a navy is the one most to the fore and of pressing necessity. Is it reasonable to have a navy of our own? What would happen to us in case of a conflict between England and Germany, for instance, or any of the great powers of Europe? For one, Sir, I am in doubt on the question whether there is or there is not a German menace, and a reasonable cause for it; whether those who apprehend the conflict, are right or wrong. The only thing we may assert is that this agitation has caused the question of naval defence to spring up to more life again. And the people of this country, and the majority of the members of this parliament, are convinced that it is time for us to fortify and protect our young nationhood.

It would be useless to give too much importance to the stirring articles of a Robert Blachford, or of the legion of journalists of his type, who wrote thousands and thousands of columns on the German question in the German press, in the English press, in the European and American press, not to say in the universal press. Without giving too much consideration and importance to the more or less terroristic speeches delivered by stumpers and lecturers on this subject, I feel justified, in saying that, with all due respect for those who think otherwise, one may draw the following conclusions: Germany is increasing her war material—her navy; she is trying to follow England as close as possible in that line. Is it in view of capturing the supremacy of the sea? England, if not scared, took notice of it any way, and she is now increasing her own navy. It is not war yet, but a serious Dreadnoughts' competition to say the least. It was one of the favourite themes of the politicians during the last campaign in England, and statesmen of no small importance firmly believed in the German peril.

Lord Beresford, speaking at a banquet tendered to him in New York during last summer, went as far as to say:

Personally, I am not at all easy about the immediate future. I see red sky ahead, and I do not like it. Prominent statesmen have made speeches full of anxiety for the possibilities of the situation.

Thousands of people have thought and have spoken that way. A Canadian imperialist writes:

Germany has been for the last few years, ever since the success and power of the first British Dreadnoughts became known, concentrating her national energies in the construction of a fleet of Dreadnoughts and of suitable docks in which to refit and repair them. Neither argument, persuasion nor threat prevails to turn her a hair's breadth from her policy in this respect. Thinking and reflecting men know that in building her fleet at such tremendous national sacrifices as her people are compelled to submit to, Germany can only be doing it for the purpose of wresting from Great Britain her naval supremacy.

After all, Sir, can a sensible man reasonably ask himself the following questions: Why all those peace conferences without practically any results, during the sessions of which every delegate is keeping, with a sentiment of suspicion, his eyes wide opened on his neighbours around the table ronde of the deliberations? What messages do the delegates bring to their respective governments, we know not. We cannot tell. But the evident result is armaments, armaments and more and more armaments?

What is the significance of that steeplechase for Dreadnoughts? It may not be war at once, but assuredly Sir, it cannot be peace! If it is peace, it is a terribly armed peace.

But I do not believe its reign will soon commence. War has ravaged the world since the early days of creation, and will ravage it, I am afraid, as long as there shall be human beings under the skies. That is my honest belief, and I cannot but feel convinced that all these tremendous preparations for war will only result in war. We all applaud the appeal of the pacifists, and allow me to quote the following from Lord Beresford, who, on the same occasion, said:

The English-speaking nations, the United States and the five nations of the British empire, are the great trading nations of the world. Why should they not join and say that there shall be no war? That again, could be no threat; it would mean only that we mean to maintain the peace that at present reigns.

But was that appeal echoed by anybody? Will that long sighed for peace ever come? Will its reign ever begin? And after all, supposing the English speaking races were to join together to prevent war, what would be the result? This alliance of the English speaking peoples would provoke a counter alliance, and the situation would be practically the same. The nations of the world are far from being prepared to accept such a condition. They are not homogeneous enough, and their relations have not the necessary uniformity. The result may perhaps be attained some day in the distant future, when these relations and the essential character of humanity will be better understood, and the nations may then be ready to hear and understand the language that will appeal to them. In case of war between England and Germany or England and any other nation, in what position would we find ourselves? We all admit that we have a seafaring traffic to protect, and sea-boards to defend. The Prime Minister has clearly defined the position when he said: 'When the mother country is at war, Canada is at war . It would be wasting time for me to repeat the explanation, any unbiased man will understand it. In case of war breaking out to-morrow, or for many years to come, England needs all her navy for her own defence, England cannot put a single gun at our disposal. England being attacked cannot defend herself and all her dominions at the same time, one hundred Dreadnoughts would not suffice. Supposing England lost all her possessions and colonies, that would not relieve her from the expense of building a single ship. England needs all her fleet. Why, Sir, her fleet is not strong enough, apparently, because every day she is expending more and more money to augment it, and to modify it to meet new inventions, and more modern devices. How can we reasonably expect help and protection from her in case of a clash between her and Germany, or any other country? England would be pleased, no doubt, to receive money contributions from us, or to receive Dreadnoughts; she needs them, but that is not the question as I understand it. The question is: What can we do to assist her, and what should be the form of this assistance to make it the most effective both for Canada, and England, if we take into account, as we are in duty bound, our status as a nation, the provisions of our constitutional Act, our geographical situation generally, and more especially the strategical point of view, our resources, our revenue and our wealth? These are questions which our representatives at the various colonial conferences have well considered and understood, and upon which they have taken their stand. The result was the present legislation, which I think wisely and reasonably enacts that we should equip a navy of our own. In case of emergency we may put our naval force at the disposal of His Majesty to form part of the royal navy. This bring up clauses 17, 18 and 19 of the Bill against which there has been levelled so many criticisms by the group of members headed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and by Mr. Bourassa, who both wrongly pretend to represent in this House the sentiment of the majority of the people of Quebec. Mr. Bourassa says frankly, in an editorial in his paper 'Le Devoir' of the 11th of February, and in another on the 14th of February, that he is in favour of a Canadian navy:

(Translation). Had the question been the building of Canadian navy, for the defence of Canada, under the control of the Canadian government, I would have nothing to say against clauses 17 and 19, nor in fact against the Act as a whole Had the government committed us to an expenditure, and even a large expenditure, for the organization of the naval defence of Canada, the protection of her harbours and her coasting trade—a trade which, after all constitutes our whole maritime trade—the Nationalists would perhaps pointed out more urgent works to be undertaken, even from the viewpoint of the security of our territory; but they would not have urged any objection against the measure itself.

What seems to us foolish and at variance with national interests, even from the mere financial standpoint, is the fact of throwing Canada into the 'vortex of European militarism' for the exclusive benefit of England.

That is the main objection of these gentlemen to the Bill. These three clauses have been so fully discussed that nothing new can be said with regard to them. However, for the sake of argument, let us wipe out these three clauses, then the Bill would be satisfactory to my hon. friends. The law being so amended, let us suppose a clash occurred between England and Germany, or any other power, and in case of war the prestige, the honour of the empire would be at stake. Would my hon. friends be prepared to say that Canada should do nothing in these circumstances? Are they prepared to say that while England's fate were in the balance, or in great danger, that our fleet should remain inactive, at anchor, at Quebec, Halifax, St. John and Esquimalt, unconcerned and disinterested? Are they prepared to say that it would not be the duty of Canada to do something for England, because these three clauses did not appeal to them? I know too well my hon. friends, even my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Blondin) who has just spoken. I am satisfied that he would approve of the action that is contemplated in these three clauses. My contention is that the Governor in Council, under those three clauses, should place the Canadian navy at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in the royal navy. This patriotic action would be endorsed by parliament, by the people at large, and by every patriotic French Canadian in the province of Quebec.

Now, Sir, let us not confine our views and our actions to the limited horizon of the moment. Let us think about the future, the near and the far future. As the old proverb has it: 'An ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure.' Let us face the future with the calm of men who feel the responsibility of their office, of men who will not sacrifice the interest of their country, the welfare of the people for petty party purposes, of men who realize, who know that their action of to-day will be echoed for years and years to come, for centuries to come of men engaged in the solemn and sacred operation of moulding the destines of a nation.

Mr. Speaker, the British empire is vast, immense and powerful, but it cannot assert, it cannot claim eternity as her privilege. What is a century in the life of an empire? What is a century in the evolution of a nation? To pretend and assert that the British empire will not dissolve some day, would be to ignore, to deny history.

The British empire is not the first one that was founded. Many empires have spread over the world their alternatively beneficent, and malevolent power and majesty. What has become of the empire of Alexander, of Caesar, of Charlemagne, of Frederick, of Charles V, of Napoleon? The empire we are so proud of, we are so happy to form part of, long may it live for the happiness of Canada, and the whole world! But war has often unexpected and unforeseen results. War means victory, it means also defeat. What would become of us, if, for the empire, it was defeat? Nobody can give a definite and positive answer. Some far seeing minds may only predict, may suppose, may conjecture. Now, Sir, I firmly believe that this is not the time nor the occasion when one may say: 'Dans le doute, abstiens-toi'—in doubt, abstain,' but: 'In doubt, prepare.' So vis pacem para bellum. I believe in legislating and preparing for the future. Let us not consider only the cares and views of the moment; let us look farther ahead. England has always protected Canada. From 1760 to 1906, from the capitulation of Quebec to the abandonment of Halifax and Esquimalt, England has maintained a body of troops in Canada, maintained here an army and a navy for about a century and a half. Now the last of the English soldiers has embarked for the mother country. Why has England withdrawn all her troops and squadrons? It is because she believed it was time for us to have a militia of our own. It is because she intimated that our wealth was large enough to maintain and enlarge our military force and to build a navy of our own. It is because she had faith in our loyalty to such an extent as to give us the command of our army and navy. England surrendered to us the fortified places of the land. What does England expect us to do now that we have been left entirely to our own selves? Does England expect us to give her money or build ships for ourselves? Does England expect from us imperial gifts of Dreadnoughts when we have not even a rowboat? No, Sir, the only conclusion to draw is that when England recalled her troops from this land, she believed that we were capable of providing for ourselves to a certain extent, and so we do and so we shall do.

Now, Sir, you will remark: In case we should be abandoned to ourselves, to our own resources, have we not the Munroe doctrine to protect us. The hon. Postmaster General has so eloquently given a masterly answer to that question, and in so able a manner, that for me to repeat it would be to minimize it. I will simply say this: Perhaps our neighbours would protect us, but would this protection be for our advantage or for their own? No doubt they would, at least, ask for a contribution. We would have to foot the bill in proportion to our population, territory, borders and what else and what not. In what proportion would it be—one-tenth or one-fifth? For my part I prefer to help the mother of our liberties, as my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) so truly described her the other day, the mother who, for more than a century and a half has accustomed us to concessions of freedom, of government, of liberty, the result of which is what we are to-day, a prosperous, a free nation. And the best manner to help her, and prevent bad results, is by building a Canadian navy. We owe that to Canada; we owe that to England and the empire. England does not impose any contribution of money on her dominions. She has always been satisfied to let each of them provide for itself, remembering, however, that they form part of the greatest empire of the world and that they have obligations of honour, of solidarity, and confraternity.

The building of a navy in Canada will be, in my opinion, a most beneficial innovation. Industry and labour, at large, will derive the greatest advantage therefrom.

On this subject I cannot do better than quote the following from a valuable magazine called the 'Iron Age':

The Army and Navy as Industrial Schools.

That military discipline is an excellent preparation for work in factories, is asserted by a writer in the 'Iron Age' (New York, July 29, 1909). In his opinion the enforced military service of the continental nations of Europe is of use to them in this regard, and he suggests that our own navy may perform the same function for us. He writes:—

An American who has spent considerable time in German shops comments upon the excellent discipline which prevails everywhere as the direct result of the military or naval service which all Germans are compelled to perform. The years of absolute obedience to superior officers have a lasting influence upon a large majority of men, as shown by them in the industrial works where they are employed in after life. Quick compliance with orders need not mean servility. It is the same obedience which the men from whom workmen take orders extend to their own superiors. It does not of necessity curtail suggestion, because the trend of discipline is of a different sort. We have heard American employers say that they like to get young men who have been trained in the navy under conditions as they have existed in recent years, because they have been well grounded in their work, are resourceful and above the average in their ability and willingness to make suggestions, and at the same time obey quickly, without sullenness and seldom with resentment. The author of a communication to one of the metropolitan dailies, answering a criticism of the navy as a national extravagance, takes up the question from the employee's view-point, saying:—

As for 15,000 young men 'turned from productive industry'—well, the navy requires electricians, telegraphers, carpenters, plumbers, machinists, engineers, coppersmiths, boilermakers, clerks, 59 trades in all, and it educates boys to fulfil these duties. I know whereof I speak. I learned my trade in the navy, was honourably discharged two years ago, having saved $800 in my four years, and I am now on a salary of $3,200 per annum. The navy taught me all I know of 'productive industry.'

The American navy seems to be an industrial school worth taking into consideration. The industries of the country need well-trained men. Schools are being established in many centres in order that the supply may be increased. The suggestion of the benefit of the modern naval training is a good one. The warship of to-day is not unlike a great industrial plant. The immense complexity of machinery which performs the various functions of the vessel, combined with the equipment which looks after maintenance and repairs, affords the opportunity for a practical training which should be of great value to a young man after his term of enlistment has ended, especially if he follows the trade in which he has been specialized. Moreover, the fact that he has lived under strict discipline is a consideration not to be lightly discredited.

I shall quote now from a French Canadian who seems to be a gentleman of experience and an able writer, Mr. Fred. E. Gauthier, who in a letter to the Winnipeg 'Free Press,' dated September 15, 1909, says:

As for the raw material, our St. Lawrence river and gulf, the Atlantic and Pacific coasts can furnish a magnificent and intelligent class of men; all we require is to encourage young men to enter and remain in a naval service belonging to Canada, whether government or merchant, in the same manner as has been done for our permanent militia corps.

The officers and crews of all Dominion vessels, whether employed as cruisers, survey vessels, in the fishery service or lighthouse service, should be drilled by competent instructors at sea, during the summer; this would not interfere with their regular routine of duties; in winter all these men, or at least those who are willing, could be attached to the permanent militia units in Halifax, Quebec, or Esquimalt, where further instructions could be imparted, and greater discipline infused. Canada would have, before long, a very fair nucleus of trained officers and men, who would feel proud of their service, in the same manner as do the officers and men of our permanent militia corps.

Schools of navigation could be attached to the depot points such as Halifax, Quebec and Esquimalt, where the men could be taught navigation, qualify under the rules of the board of trade, and obtain certificates as masters and mates. Later on, as the government through experience, perfects this system, the men instead of remaining in barracks in the winter could be put on board a regular training ship and sent on foreign cruise.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have to protect our whole trade and not only a portion of it, we have to protect not only Canadian goods on Canadian ships, but also Canadian and foreign goods as well, on British ships. It is true that the six large steamship companies, plying from Canada to British countries and elsewhere, are English, but they carry away our own goods and carry in the foreign goods we consume. We need those ships for our exports as well as for our imports.

I have a few statistics on our trade with the various countries of the world which to save time, I shall hand to the reporters.

These figures show the immense trade of Canada, half of which, at least, is maritime, which we should protect.

I shall now, Mr. Speaker, deal briefly with the question of the plebiscite which is the great cry of some of our hon. friends opposite. To those who demand a plebiscite, let me say, this: When the people of Canada returned this government into power, it was a renewal of confidence. In 1896, 1900, 1904 and 1908, the country by a large majority expressed its faith in Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party. The people do not expect from us that on each and every Act of legislation and administration we will spend a quarter or a half a million dollars for a consultation with them. The defence of our territory, the defence of our sea-boards, of our ports and our harbours, the protection of our trade, the protection of our commerce on the sea, are all primordial questions and so much within the scope of the constitution that this parliament, by the very fact of its existence, has as its sacred mission and duty to take all the necessary steps to protect and defend the people and the territory. The defence of our territory is an elementary duty of a governing power; a sine qua non condition and reason of its existence. The people will ask: Why a plebiscite? We have sent you to parliament to perform your duties and this is one of them. Was there any plebiscite in England or in Germany, to approve or disapprove of the construction of Dreadnoughts and the increase of the naval forces at large? No. Nor was there a plebiscite here in 1899, and the people ratified in 1900 the action of the Governor General in Council. In 1907, on the 12th of July, a law was passed by the French parliament reducing the time of military service from three to two years, and the effect of that amendment to the law, was the licensement of nearly of 50,000 men, and there was no plebiscite. There was no plebiscite in 1862 or in 1868 for the Militia Act, there was no plebiscite even for confederation.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Was there not a plebiscite on the prohibition question.

Mr. C. A. WILSON. Certainly, and I am glad my hon. friend has asked that question. That was a plebiscite on a question of internal economy, while this is a question international in its scope, and one which affects the defence of our territory, and there is a great difference between the two. My hon. friend knows what was the result of the plebiscite on prohibition? Does he think that that plebiscite advanced the question of prohibition in any degree? No, Sir, I believe that the good will of the people, the work of the temperance associations, and the preaching of our ministers of different creeds do more for temperance than any plebiscite could do. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier urges that this is a question of too large an expense, and one which involves too heavy obligations for the future. He does not want to spend on our protection $15,000,000, but he proposes a heavier expenditure of $100,000,000 or more for the Georgian Bay canal, and for that he does not propose a plebiscite. Supposing a plebiscite would be ordered, what would my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) and his supporters say to the electors? Would they say that we must not protect ourselves now that England has withdrawn her Pacific squadron, and her North Atlantic squadron from our waters, and now that the last of the English troops has departed from Montreal, Quebec, Halifax and Esquimalt, for the mother country. Will they tell them that what was decided at the various conferences was unwise, derisoire, disloyal and unconstitutional? Will they go against the statement made to the House of Commons by Mr. Asquith on the 29th August, 1909, which is resumed as follows as far as Canada is concerned:

> As regards Canada, it was considered that her double sea-boards rendered the provision of the fleet unit of the same kind unsuitable for the present. It was prepared, according to the amount of money, that might be available, that Canada should make a start with cruisers of the 'Bristol' type and destroyers of the improved river class—a part to be stationed on the Atlantic sea-board and a part on the Pacific.

Will they say that we will not help England in case of danger? Will they say that we don't need the protection of England? Will they say that we must not vote a penny for the defence of Canada? Will they say to the other dominions and colonies: Do what it pleases you to do, we will not contribute in any shape or form? Will they say our trade with Great Britain and ten or fifteen other British countries, our trade with more than forty or fifty foreign countries need no protection? No, Sir, we know them too well; we all know they would not dare speak such a language. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has pretended that on this side of the House there were some grinding of the teeth; the hon. member for North Toronto has discovered a composing room, a rack, a thumb-screw and other forms and instruments of torture. These gentlemen must have had terrible nightmares, and it is no wonder. They are fighting so much between themselves that they have lost their heads and all control over their nerves and imagination. The hon. member for Jacques Cartier must be deaf and insensible if he does not hear the grinding of teeth his policy has aroused in his party against the province of Quebec and himself whose sentiments, fortunately, the hon. gentleman does not reflect on that question. He must be insensible if he does not feel the ferocious bites of his warm friends of yesterday and of the last elections; his leaders, the hon. member for North Toronto, the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton, and last but not least, the hon. member for Frontenac. I am sorry that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier has belittled that national and patriotic question to a paltry party question. Have you heard him accuse his leader of lack of courtesy towards him, and the member for North Toronto, of having failed to keep his word towards him? But, Sir, is it a real fight between the members at your left or a sham battle? It looks as if it is a case where they all agree to disagree —for party purposes. They are preparing, sharpening their favourite weapon, the double-faced policy. But the people have not been fooled in the past and will not be this time either. The people of Quebec will never consent to play that isolation game. What the people of this country expect from us and want us to do is that: Having been chosen and elected as members of this parliament for its legal term, we shall govern and legislate for the people; having taken the oath, that oath we shall keep; we shall faithfully do our duty to the full measure, without feebleness or faltering; we shall be faithful to the King and to the constitution of our country; that constitution we shall not disobey, but shall preserve intact and sacred; we shall not sacrifice the slightest parcel of our autonomy to jingoism or partisanship; whatever may be the expenditure for the naval defence, we shall spend the money, and the whole of the money in Canada for Canada. Some people pretend that by building a Canadian navy we are helping to break the bond that ties us so closely to the mother country. This proposition I cannot entertain for one moment. We shall uphold, and very highly, the dignity of our nation. We shall enjoy to the limit the full liberty of self-government, and we will not allow any one to interfere in our domestic affairs.

Let Canada build her own navy with her own money; let Canada train her own men on her own ships. In 1775, in 1812, in 1854, in 1865, in 1899, during the African war, and elsewhere, it was our trained men who added lustre to the Canadian name and advanced our progressive march toward nationhood. Canada in making a start with a navy does not intend to enter into any naval competition, but to bear her share in the great work of maintaining the prestige of the Canadian and British names. By making safer her commercial routes, Canada is thus adding to her commercial renown. Canada with a navy, commands more respect as a nation in international relations. Canada's name has become great and respected because of our ties with the British empire, whose grandeur and prestige we are in duty bound to uphold and increase if possible. Let Canada not break those ties, but let her be more and more worthy and proud of her position within the empire.

Mr. S. SHARPE (North Ontario). Mr. Speaker, I desire to trespass for a short time on the attention of the House while I offer a few observations on this important question, in order that there may be no uncertainty in the minds of my constituents as to the position I desire to take on this question, and no uncertainty as to the motives which impel me to take that position. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat that few questions have occupied the attention of the House which have been fraught with graver results to Canada and her future and which have created greater diversity of opinion than this naval question. I congratulate the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Wilson) upon his very fair presentation of the government's position. He made a patriotic speech, recognizing the plain and manifest duty of Canada to the empire under existing circumstances, and I think it would be well if some of his colleagues from the province of Quebec would follow in his footsteps.

In the discussion of this question it is quite natural that the future of Canada should be canvassed by those who take part in it. What is to be that future? Is Canada to remain an integral part of the British empire or is it destined to become independent and possibly annexed to the United States? If Canada is to remain an integral part of the empire, what is the only reasonable logical position for her to take, and what is her plain manifest duty at the present juncture? Whatever sentiment there might have been in favour of independence with possible annexation to the United States prior to 1891, was wiped out in that memorable campaign in which that distinguished and respected Conservative leader, the late Sir John Macdonald, sacrificed his life for the maintenance of British connection and institutions, and his rallying cry, 'a British subject I was born and a British subject I will die,' will go down reverberating through the ages of Canadian history, to steady any waverers in in their allegiance to Great Britain and to strengthen the bonds of Canada and the mother country. And the Hon. Edward Blake, in his famous letter to his electors of West Durham, drove the last nail into the coffin of that traitorous sentiment that then existed. As we are aware, Mr. Blake wrote his constituency prior to 1891, informing them that he was unable to accept the nomination for that constituency because he believed the policy advocated by the leaders of the reform party would ultimately lead to union with the United States, and he further expressed his opinion that the destiny of Canada was irretrievably wrapt up in that of the empire. If Canada is to remain an integral part of the empire what is our duty? There are only two courses for us to adopt. One is to do nothing, and thus remain inactive and 'unresponsive to all the demands of duty and gratitude to the mother country. The other is to do something and thus acknowledge that while we remain a part of the British empire and share in the benefits we must assume some of the duties, burdens and responsibilities of that relationship.

I have sufficient confidence in the patriotism and sense of justice of the Canadian people to believe that an overwhelming majority are in favour of this House making substantial sacrifices for the benefit of the empire, and the only question on which there should be any possible difference is as to the extent and character of that assistance.

I wrote to a great many of my constituents of both political parties to ascertain their views upon this question, and after a careful perusal of the replies I received, I am at a loss to know what a majority really do want. A very small number desire no expense whatever incurred. A very important and influential body of public opinion desire a cash contribution or a contribution of Dreadnoughts. And a very important and influential body of public opinion desire the construction and organization of a Canadian navy.

This shows that public opinion is still in a fluid condition, that it has not yet become crystallized; and before any definite permanent policy be entered upon, before this House should lay out a permanent policy, time should be given to the people to canvass the situation more fully.

For reasons some of which have been advanced in this House already, I am unalterably opposed to a cash contribution or even a contribution of Dreadnoughts as a permanent policy of this country. A cash contribution looks too much like paying some one else to do our fighting, and also savours a little of tribute. Canadians are not serfs prepared to contribute their taxes to some sovereign powers beyond our borders, even though it be Great Britain herself. Besides a cash contribution as a permanent policy involves the principle of taxation without representation. which is foreign to our democratic notions of government and is thus an impossible solution..

That there is necessity for making some provision is admitted. The very fact of our making any appropriation at all for this purpose is at once an acknowledgment of the necessity for some provision, and hence, the principle being admitted, the policy being adopted, the extent of our help should be in proportion to the necessity of the case.

If the British navy is being challenged, if the empire is in danger, our assistance must be commensurate with the peril.

Then, the question naturally follows, is there a real emergency in the affairs of the empire?

Is the sword of Damocles suspended over the British navy?

Every student of imperial affairs must acknowledge the gravity of the situation. Germany and England are at present engaged in a strenuous struggle. A war of construction is now being waged; a war of destruction may follow. Germany by reason of her geographical position is essentially a military, and not a naval, power. Her inland position without much coast line and without colonial possessions naturally make her an inland power. She possesses the most perfect fighting machine in the world. By intense organization, by her technical education, and by her highly specialized methods of training, she has become on land without a peer among the nations of the world. There is no army comparable with hers in efficiency, in numbers and in effective fighting force. It is estimated that she could put in the field upwards of 4,000,000 fighting men.

England on the other hand is essentially a maritime power. Her insular position with vast colonial possessions has peculiarly fitted her for the premier naval position among the nations of the world.

As England at present is supreme on the water, so is Germany supreme on land.

Why are these two great powers not content to allow this equilibrium to be maintained? Why is Germany not content to allow matters to remain in statu quo?

England is content that Germany should maintain her supremacy on land because this is essential to her very existence surrounded as she is with aggressive, watchful and resentful neighbours.

Germany, however, is not content that England should maintain her supremacy on the high seas, although this is essential to the empire's very existence. Germany, with her vaulting ambition, is apparently desirous of being supreme on water as she is now on land. She strives for naval as well as for military supremacy.

If the British fleet demolished the German fleet, Germany would still be immune from successful attack by England's forces by reason of her military strength and power.

But if the German fleet once defeated the British fleet, England's supremacy would be lost—the army of Germany could overrun the country—the British empire would be dismembered, and the rich self-governing dominions beyond the seas would in all probability, be the prizes of war—and eventually Canadians would pay dearly for the indifference they have displayed to the empire's interests.

Why then is Germany challenging England's naval supremacy? What is the object and purpose of the great activity? At whom is her great naval programme aimed, if not at England? Her fleet to-day is stronger than the combined fleets of France and Russia. She has nothing to fear from these two powers. What then is her purpose? Germany has a population of 60,000,000 people and is increasing at the rate of 1,000,000 each year. She must secure colonial outposts for her surplus population to which her subjects may emigrate and continue to live under the German flag and suzerainty. Canada, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa would make rich prizes for any nation to contend for.

Max O'Rell, the famous French lecturer says that France fights for glory; Germany fights for a living, but England fights for trade and peace.

I have heard a number of hon. gentlemen opposite on the floor of this House declare on several occasions that the Monroe doctrine would protect Canada in the last analysis. I say that such a declaration is unworthy of any Canadian. I was pleased to hear the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) and the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean) resent the imputation that was cast upon Canadian character by some of their colleagues. To entertain the idea that we could look with complacency to a foreign country for protection is revolting to any true British subject, and to rely upon the indefinite and uncertain policy of a foreign country known as the Monroe doctrine is to lean upon a broken, at any rate an untried reed, and to pace us at the mercy of and under obligation to a foreign country. Such a prospect does not commend itself to the patriotism of any true Canadian. Sir, to state such a proposition is to dismiss it from our minds. The question, I think, must be answered, and the course of this parliament must be determined by the answer to that question: Is there a real emergency in the affairs of the empire? If there is, the insignificant contribution offered by this government is of no assistance in the time of need. Long before the general elections in the old country, British statesmen speaking upon the status of the British navy as compared with foreign navies, raised distress signals. They sounded cries of alarm at Germany's naval activity. During the elections, they attempted to neutralize the effect of their previous statements; but it was too late, the people took them at their word, as that word had been uttered prior to the election excitement. Hon. members opposite offer many authorities to prove that there is no menace at the present time from Germany, no emergency in the affairs of the empire. But of all the authorities that were quoted, the most peculiar and extraordinary was that quoted by the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden). That hon. gentleman quoted from a speech of the German ambassador who, he said, was speaking in England—I presume making an after-dinner speech—to show the pacific intentions of Germany towards Great Britain. That is the proof the hon. gentleman relied upon—that the German ambassador, speaking in England, told the English people, in an after-dinner speech that Germany's intentions were not hostile and that Germany was not intending to attack England, because of these preparations. As has been stated here, the German people are not the people to hunt ducks with a brass band.

Now, the wisest men in both political parties have conceded the absolute necessity of maintaining Great Britain's naval supremacy. Mr. Gladstone, in 1878, used these words:

> The strength of England is not to be found in alliances with great military powers but is to be found henceforth in the efficiency and supremacy of her navy—a navy as powerful as the navies of all Europe.

And Sir Edward Grey, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in June, 1909, said:

> The navy is the common security of the whole empire. If it ever fails to be that it will be of no use to discuss any other subjects, and the maintenance of the navy in that position must therefore be the care, not only of us at home, but of the self-governing dominions beyond the seas.

At the imperial press conference, one of the colonial press men interviewed Sir Edward Grey, and the result was published in the Evening 'Journal' of Thursday, January 27, 1910. Sir Edward Grey, upon that occasion, said:

> I cannot think that there is a likelihood of war. I cannot bring myself to believe that a great and intelligent and christian nation like Germany could attack us without provocation—without grave fault on our own side. But I am compelled to admit that the historical fact is that in the course of her imperial expansion, Germany has in our time gone more than half way to meet war with Denmark, with Austria and with France, and has within a few weeks practically presented an ultimatum to Russia giving the option of war or silence regarding the annexation by Austria of Bosnia and Herzegovina. We must face the possibility that our turn might come. It is possible, though I cannot think it probable, that if Germany were strong enough on the sea to risk an encounter with our navy the encounter might ensue in spite of ourselves.
> If war were to come, and our navy were worsted, it would spell the ruin of the British empire. Germany would not need to land a soldier in England. Our food comes across the seas. We could be starved into absolute submission in a month.
> No other great power has to face such a consequence of defeat.
> We have two courses open. One, to allow Germany to easily catch up with us in sea power, and take the chance of a quarrel. The other, to try to keep so far ahead of her naval force that no quarrel will occur.
>
> The latter course seems the necessary one. The possibilities of the other are too grave to risk so long as our resources enable us to keep ahead.
> I would hardly contradict any one who would say that it is a hundred-to-one chance against our having war with Germany even when Germany has arrived in a position to risk it. And yet I am compelled to feel that even though it be a hundred-to-one shot against war, we must not, if we can help it, take even a single chance when that single chance includes the possibility of the ruin of England—the possibility of the end of our thousand years of English story.

And Sir Edward Grey spoke on March 29 in the House of Commons, and is reported in volume 3 of 'Hansard' of 1909, page 54, as follows:

> First of all the House and the country are perfectly right in the view that the situation is grave. A new situation in this country is created by the German programme. Whether that programme is carried out quickly or slowly the fact of its existence makes a new situation. When that programme is completed, Germany, a great country close to our shore will have a fleet of 33 Dreadnoughts. That fleet would be the most powerful which the world has ever yet seen. It is true that there is not one of them in commission yet; but it is equally true that the whole programme comprises what I have said, and when completed the new fleet will be the most powerful fleet which the world has yet seen. That imposes upon us the necessity, of which we are now at the beginning—except so far as we have Dreadnoughts already—of rebuilding the whole of our fleet. That is what the situation is. What we do not know is the time in which we shall have to do it.

We must be prepared to defend our national existence under the conditions which are imposed upon us in our own generation. I am glad that it is not to us alone that this feeling is confined. I am glad that the colonies, such as New Zealand recognize that their national existence is one with us in this matter.

The friends of the government, including the leader of the House (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in their speeches have quoted Lord Charles Beresford as being in favour of local navies for the component parts of the empire. They do not, however, accept his statement that there is a real peril, and that the true policy is one of preparedness on the part of the British navy. I submit that if they accept him as the highest authority on one point, they are bound to accept him on the other. Lord Charles Beresford on January 1, 1910, spoke as follows:

Germans have said that if they intended to attack England it would be without warning. I suggest that Germany would send out her tramps with six-pounders and attack the trade routes--and even a tramp could sink a Mauretania. The pretext is easy—a little difficulty about Holland or Belgium, the Congo, or the Persian gulf, a diplomatic letter would follow, and what is to stop Germany from striking a blow at night and getting hold of the trade routes? Great Britain has left her arteries undefended.

I say seriously that Germany is deliberately challenging us to make all preparations.

Then Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, leader of the Conservative opposition, speaking on January 4, 1910, said:

He hoped and believed that Germany and Britain may not come into conflict, but said the diplomats of the lesser powers did not share this view. He insisted that Britain was now in a position as regards her navy which she had not been in within the memory of living men. Indeed, her naval superiority on her own seas would be threatened within the near future.

'I don't believe there is going to be war between this country and any great foreign power,' he exclaimed. 'Heaven knows I don't desire it. I don't believe it. But please remember that absolutely the only way in which you can secure the peace which you all desire is that you shall be sure of victory if war takes place.'

The empire existed only on sufferance if the navy were not supreme, and he was not content to exist on sufferance.

Now, I purpose quoting a gentleman who has been somewhat assailed in this House, Mr. Robert Blatchford. Mr. Blatchford is a talented and educated socialist who wrote for the 'Daily Mail' in London in connection with the German peril. His principles are opposed to a military and naval programme, but in this crisis he subordinates his principles to the welfare and salvation of the empire. In this crisis he was a British subject first and a socialist afterwards. He wrote as follows:

The strongest evidence of Germany's designs against Britain is the German navy. There can be no stronger evidence of any nation's intention to make war than that afforded by wholesale, feverish, and systematic preparations for war.

Now the German preparations are naval preparations. Against whom can these preparations be directed if they are not directed against us? Manifestly they are not meant for Russia, nor for France, nor for America. The magnitude of the preparations points to a prospective struggle with a fleet more powerful than that of Russia or France.

The construction of the German ships prohibits their use in distant seas, against Japan for instance, or the United States. And whereas we have been told in a hundred books and newspapers and pamphlets and speeches that the German navy is meant to wrest from Britain her command of the sea, it would be difficult to find a single German suggestion that the German navy is meant to try conclusions with any power other than Britain. Germany can reach France or Russia by land. Her fleet is already more than a match for France or Russia combined.

Her fleet is built for the North sea, it is exercised in the North sea, it remains in the North Sea.

Her ships were built against our ships, the object of the German builders being always to go one better than the British in each type. . . . If we do not want to war with Germany, we must be strong enough to want Germany to cause peace.

Though Germany is a brave, resolute, and mighty enemy, she is not omnipotent, nor is she invulnerable. But she means business—blood and iron business—and all conciliation, subterfuge, and compromise provoke her to contempt and scorn.

Germany puts her destinies into the hands of warriors; we leave ours in the hands of politicians. Germany acts; we talk. Words count for nothing in the game of blood and iron.

Arm or surrender; fight for the empire or loose it. We can choose our alternative; no middle course is open to us.

Now, I submit that when prominent British statesmen on both sides of politics agree in pointing out the gravity of the situation, we as Canadians cannot longer remain indifferent. British statesmen are not extremists, they are not jingoes, they are not alarmists, their language is not violent or exaggerated; their utterances are usually characterized by discretion and moderation, and consequently we should give due weight to their deliberate judgment upon this supreme issue. I think that on the evidence adduced it must be conceded that the British navy is menaced at the present time by the German naval programme, and the question naturally suggests itself: Is the Naval Bill introduced by the government commensurate with Canada's duty to the empire? Does it discharge our plain and full duty to the empire under existing circumstances? In my humble opinion the government has lamentably failed to meet the situation. It is a matter of universal regret that the government has refused to comply with the wishes and plans of the British admiralty as outlined at the recent conference of 1909. The British admiralty are peculiarly fitted and specially adapted to know the wants and needs of the British navy, and they expressed their preferences for certain lines of action, but the Canadian government refused to meet their wishes. In the first place, the British admiralty suggested as an ideal method of assisting the navy, a money contribution, but this was refused. Then they suggested a complete fleet unit which would include a Dreadnought, but this was refused. Then they suggested that this fleet unit should be stationed on the Pacific coast in order to relieve the British men-of-war stationed there, and this was refused. Then they expressed the opinion that the local naval forces, in the event of war, should come under the immediate command of the British admiralty, but this was refused, and made subject to the consent of the Governor in Conucil. The ideal of the British admiralty was that the five component parts of the British empire should each furnish a fleet unit which would, in time of war, come under the control and command of the British admiralty in case of emergency. Canada's danger lies in the defeat of the British navy. Once it is defeated, Canada's contribution of her insignificant defensive force would be of no avail whatever. Canada, in my opinion, should have organized a fleet unit as suggested by the British admiralty, and when the summons to arms was issued, that each fleet unit from the colonies should proceed to array itself with the British navy and forming a component part thereof dovetail into that great fighting machine. When you compare the fleet units as suggested by the British admiralty with that contemplated by the government's Bill, there is not much difference in the number of ships, nor in the actual maintenance charges. The fleet unit as suggested by the British admiralty consisted of 13 ships, being one armoured cruiser of the 'Indomitable' class and of the Dreadnought type, three protected cruisers, six destroyers and three submarines, costing $18,500,000, and the maintenance charges amounting to $3,000,000. The proposed Canadian unit consists of 11 ships, being 4 Bristols, 1 Boadecea and 6 destroyers, costing $11,000,000, and the annual maintenance charges being $2,500,000. In the matter of initial expense there was only a difference of $7,500,000, and for annual upkeep, a difference of $500,000. But there is a great difference in the effective fighting force of the two units. But the government programme makes no provision for a Dreadnought, and a Dreadnought is the effective fighting machine in modern naval warfare. Superiority in Dreadnoughts will decide the naval supremacy of the future. The British admiralty asked for a complete fleet unit, a living vital fighting force. This government is merely presenting a skeleton without any effective striking power. Hence, I submit there are two fatal defects in the programme of the government which make it impossible for me to support the measure. Although I have in the past expressed myself in favour of the principle of a Canadian navy as a permanent policy, there are two fatal defects in the government programme. One is the absence of a Dreadnought, which would have formed part of the fleet had the government organized a fleet unit; and the other is the presence of a condition that the navy will assist the empire only with the consent of the Governor in Council. Paragraphs 17, 18 and 19 of the Bill are fatal paragraphs, in connection with this measure. Paragraphs 17 and 18 read:

> 18. In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the royal navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

And section 19 provides that parliament shall be called for a meeting within fifteen days after the Governor in Council has placed the naval service on active service. These clauses, in my opinion, destroy the whole effect and purpose of the government's Bill. A few men in the cabinet could withhold the consent of the Governor in Council for a considerable time, and in the meantime the British navy might be annihilated. These clauses may become in effect and substance a declaration of independence. Should war be declared against the empire, and should this government decide not to allow our so-called navy to participate in the empire's wars, down would come the British flag and up would go the Canadian ensign. I submit that this is tantamount to a declaration of independence. Should our Canadian navy stand aloof from the British navy in time of great national danger? I would like to ask if our so-called navy, when organized and constructed, is to be ordered up the St. Lawrence and Ottawa rivers to be anchored to parliament hill until this fickle, faltering cabinet shall have come to some compromise decision in reference to its ultimate destiny? Personally, I am in favour of the principle of a Canadian navy as a definite permanent policy for Canada, but I want an effective fighting force—a complete 'fleet unit,' under the central control of the British admiralty, and not subject to the delays nor to the whims and caprices of a hesitating, halting, vacillating cabinet, which in the past has not displayed any great alacrity in assisting the empire in time of great stress and danger.

The leader of the government in his Toronto speech said that the British navy had a displacement of 2,000,000 tonnage, while Germany had only about 600,000 tons displacement. He, thereby, made the deduction that the British navy was far superior to the German navy, and attempted to minimize the gravity of the present situation. But I submit that this is not a fair basis of comparison. It is not by tonnage displacement that the efficiency, the effective striking force, of a navy is estimated, but by the number of its Dreadnoughts. It is not the number of obsolete war vessels (of which all count in the computation of tonnage), but it is the number of Dreadnoughts that will decide the naval supremacy of the future. Germany in 1912 or thereabouts, will have more Dreadnoughts, if their present plans be carried out, than England, and hence by this Dreadnought standard of comparison (the only real standard) England is in danger of losing her supremacy.

Hence the present Bill ignores the vital matters in this titanic struggle, and when Germany and England engage in the inevitable final combat Canada's insignificant contribution, handicapped by conditions that will thwart and defeat its very purpose, will not be able to appear in the imperial firing line doing effective service, (along with New Zealand and Australia), in defence of the empire.

Is this inferior position not humiliating to every Canadian subject? Contrast the position of Canada with that of our sister colonies—Australia and New Zealand—and is there a Canadian that does not feel deeply humiliated? In comparison with New Zealand and Australia our efforts are feeble, our efforts are unworthy of our people, unworthy of our vast resources, unworthy of our premier position as the richest and most populous self-governing nation in the empire.

But what else could the people of Canada expect? The leader of the government is always eloquent when the occasion requires eloquent in his loyalty, and loyal in his eloquence—and if loyal speeches could win battles Canada alone could furnish 'invincible armadas' comprising stacks of bound volumes of 'Hansard' and illustrated editions of the Toronto 'Globe'.

But while we indulge ourselves in the harmless and pleasant occupation of making patriotic speeches, and passing loyal resolutions, our sister nations (New Zealand and Australia) are offering Dreadnoughts and fleet units to the empire.

Humiliation! This is not the first occasion on which the bitter draught has been placed to the lips of Canada by this government. This is not the first time Canada has trailed in the rear of her sister colonies instead of blazing the way. When war was declared in South Africa, and German intervention was feared, where was the leader of the government? Where was Canada when all the other colonies were vieing with each other in rushing troops to the scene of hostilities? The right hon. leader of the government was giving an interview to the Toronto 'Globe' of October 4, 1899, as follows:

> The Premier's Statement.—Government has made no offer of Troops to the Imperial Authorities.
> There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so. Then, again, how could we do so without parliament granting us the money? We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon parliament. . . . And so it is that we have not offered a Canadian contingent to the home authorities. The Militia Department duly transmitted individual offers to the imperial government and the reply from the war office, as published in Saturday's 'Globe,' shows their attitude on the question. As to Canada's furnishing a contingent, the government has not discussed the question, for the reasons which I have stated, reasons which I think must easily be understood by every one who understands the constitutional law on the question.

Does that memorable interview display any enthusiasm for imperial interests? What happened is familiar to all: The public clamoured for action, the press was loaded with protests, the wave of patriotism throughout Canada became irresistible and would have swept the government out of existence had it not yielded to the popular demands. Not one, but many Canadian contingents were sent to distinguish themselves along with the Australian and New Zealand contingents, and their life's blood has left indelible stains upon the veldts of South Africa and brought imperishable fame upon Canadian valour. Although all Canada knows full well that the leader of the government resisted to the utmost the sending of the Canadian contingents to assist the empire in the Boer war, and not a man would have been sent, nor a dollar spent if he had had his way, yet when the war was over and victory had been won by the valour of the imperial troops, the right hon. leader and his supporters took all the credit to themselves—they presented themselves with all sorts of bouquets, waved the old flag and sang the national anthem over and over again. They have been turning handsprings in their paroxisms of loyalty ever since, little surmising that their outbursts of loyalty would soon again be put to the test. The government is now being tested—they are standing under the measuring rod. Are they measuring up to the full stature of their professions? It is for the Canadian people to say after a perusal of this proposed Naval Bill.

Now, we come to the question of what Canada's duty is at the present time. If the supremacy of the British navy is being challenged, and I believe it is, if the emergency be pressing, urgent and compelling, and I believe it is, then this House should act and act promptly, definitely and decisively. It is Canada's duty to order, not one, two or three Dreadnoughts, but a sufficient number of Dreadnoughts to meet the emergency. We should order Dreadnoughts according to the extent of the peril, according to the magnitude of the danger to be apprehended, according to the exigencies of the case. These Dreadnoughts should be manned with British men and officers until Canadians can be trained for the service—all at the expense of Canada. Then the question of Canada's permanent policy should be left to the people. Having thus, in part, atoned for our past neglect, and having, in part, liquidated our obligation of long standing, we could then consider with due deliberation and with due regard to our constitutional obligations to the electors who have sent us here, the permanent policy which this country should adopt in regard to the construction, organization and maintenance of a Canadian navy service. Then we would have time to consider and adjust all imperial questions relating to the navy and its relationship to the empire—the question of the control and final command of the navy in time of war and what voice Canada is to have in deciding imperial questions. The people of Canada have a right to be heard before this permanent policy is decided upon. We have no mandate from the electors. The public have a right to be heard for many substantial reasons. The government, it is true, says that this question has been before the people since 1902. I challenge the truth of that statement, but even if it be true, that this question has been before the people since 1902, what has the policy of the government been since 1902? Absolutely opposed to the construction of the Canadian navy or to any contribution towards imperial defence. If the question has been before the people in the elections of 1904 and 1908, they have pronounced against the construction of a Canadian navy or any contribution to imperial defence, and now the government, by the present Bill, is flying in the face of the result of these two general elections. But, everybody knows that this is a new policy and that it has never been discussed in any general election. The question is far reaching and involves large and permament obligations upon the country. Important public bodies have requested that the question should be submitted to the people before the government inaugurates a new policy upon which the people have not had an opportunity of pronouncing. I refer to the Dominion Grange and the Manitoba Grain Growers' Association, and I may add that the 'Weekly Sun' and other prominent papers that represent a very large sentiment that exists throughout the province of Quebec and in other provinces demand that the question should be submitted to the people before any definite permanent policy is inaugurated. Whenever a new and important policy is being framed it is usual, and the constitutional practice is, to appeal to the people or to postpone the inauguration of the policy until after the electors have had an opportunity to pronounce upon it. As I stated a short time ago, I am in favour of the principle, as a permanent policy for Canada, of the construction, organization and maintenance of a Canadian navy. That, to my mind, is the only proper solution of this important question. True, I believe that the prevailing sentiment of Canada is against the construction of a Canadian navy and in favour of a contribution by Canada of cash or Dreadnoughts to the empire. Does any one imagine that a cash contribution or a contribution of Dreadnoughts will discharge Canada from further contributions and relieve her from all future obligations? Not at all. The British navy must be maintained and Canada must continue, in some form, its assistance to imperial defence. Canada must adopt some definite permanent policy of continuous assistance. And, Sir, in my opinion, as a permanent policy, either a cash or a Dreadnought contribution is an impossible solution. The government has, subject to the approval of the people, if it were submitted to the people—adopted in my view, the correct principle, of constructing, organizing and maintaining a Canadian navy, thereby exploiting and utilizing our vast natural resources in building up a great industry in Canada. But while adopting the correct principle, the government has destroyed the objects and purposes of a Canadian navy by not making it a complete fleet unit and by annexing an impossible condition to its service under the control of the British admiralty, namely: that it cannot go to war without the consent of the Governor General in Council. If the government of Canada intend doing anything towards assisting the empire in its time of stress and need, she should do something generous, and she should do that something promptly. To accomplish that it is necessary to organize a complete fleet unit with a Dreadnought at the head and not subjected to any bonds or chains in the form of onerous conditions. Had the government taken this course it would have commanded the respect and support of a large and important body of public opinion.

Let us suppose, Mr. Speaker, that a Conservative government were in power, do you think that that Conservative administration would have brought down such a Bill as this? I do not believe it would. As this Liberal government refuses to recognize Canada's duty to the empire, and has failed to interpret the will of the people in that regard, and as its contribution is not a true index of the heart and feelings of the people of Canada, it may devolve upon the Conservative premiers of the four provinces under Conservative administrations to get together and devise some scheme whereby one or two Dreadnoughts shall be sent to the empire as Canada's contribution. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is a great misfortune, not only for Canada, but for the empire, that a Conservative administration has not been in control of the affairs of Canada during the past ten or fifteen years. Had the Conservative party been in power during these momentous times, and particularly during the imperial conferences, I am absolutely satisfied that some satisfactory scheme or plan of imperial federation would have been devised, and put into operation, and I believe that long before this an imperial council representative of all parts of the empire would have been created, and the dream of all true British subjects would have become a reality. This Liberal government in Canada has always applied the brakes to any such movement, and it has not only refused to assist, but has absolutely discouraged any such plan at every turn, and on every opportunity. When war was declared in South Africa, the government of Canada lagged behind all other colonial governments, and showed no sympathy with the empire. At the imperial conference of 1907, the leader of the government expressly refused to support a motion, introduced by one of the colonial delegates, which was calculated to unite the empire into bonds of closer union. The grumbling assent of this government to the imperial conference of 1909, to the military and naval defence committee, and the niggardly policy as outlined in this Bill all show a lack of enthusiasm for imperial interests.

Now, Sir, in conclusion, I think, that it is the duty of Canada to place an immediate order for Dreadnoughts to form a part of the Canadian navy and to act in co-operation with and as a part of the imperial navy and under the control, in times of danger and emergency, of the British admiralty. We should then postpone the inauguration of any permanent policy until the Canadian people have been heard from, either by means of a referendum or in a general election. In the meantime, speaking for myself, I desire to go on record, as I have done on previous occasions in my own constituency, and in the corridors of the House, where I have expressed myself in favour of the principle of a Canadian navy. I desire to go on record as in favour of the principle of a Canadian navy as the means best calculated to serve the interests of the empire of the future, and best calculated to work out the great destiny of this country. I regret, therefore, that I cannot support this Naval Bill of the government, because of its meagreness, its niggardliness in not providing for a fleet unit as it should have done, and also because of the impossible condition that the government has annexed to its service in the empire's wars, which condition must render it unsatisfactory to every true Canadian who loves British institutions and British liberty, who is conscious of our deep obligations to the mother country, and who believes that universal peace depends on the maintenance of British supremacy, which is now being challenged and jeopardized by England's greatest commercial, military and naval rival.

Mr. J. BOYER (Vaudreuil.) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it would be commonplace to undertake to prove that Canada passes through an important national evolution. Everbody feels this and it is admitted by all, but every one does not see the causes. These causes are not very complicated and I will try to place them before the House.

Modern nations should never be isolated, as China has done in the past to its detriment. The policy of each of them depends more or less upon the policy of the rival nations, and all are ruled by one great law, the international law.

Well, let us see what has given rise to this evolution of this sort of crises through which we now pass, and which forces us at this moment, willingly or unwillingly, to come to a decision upon which our future will rest.

A great European nation, Germany seeks domination. She is fatally brought to that, not so much because her citizens love warfare or hazardous adventures, but because she has a very large population, and is congested in her own territory, so that she must look for other fields and colonies for expansion. Germany must fight an economical war. England is situated in somewhat an analogous position, but on account of her supremacy on the seas, she has by this very fact the outlets which the other nation needs.

Many will say, this economic war will not turn into actual war. Let us hope that they are right, but we must admit that appearances do not justify this optimism. On both sides armaments are going on frantically, so much that in both countries the budgets are frightfully surcharged and one of these nations thought proper to say to its colonies, "Look at the sacrifices which I am obliged to make. Will you not help me?"

"We will gladly help you" responded the over-seas dominions, of which Canada is one.

"And how will you do it?"

Firstly by taking on ourselves the defence of our territory and our shores; secondly by lending you our troops and our ships, if you are attacked.

This is a natural and proper answer, because:

1. A free nation surrounded by armed nations, must necessarily assume the means of defending herself.

2. Unless being absolutely blind, a people cannot refuse to defend its own home and civilization, when such are threatened with destruction.

The interest of Canada is twofold, because it is inhabited by two races who spring from the civilization of two great peoples, who for a long time were rivals, but now attached to one another. We have not two metropolises, one Anglo-Saxon, the other French. And let this not be forgotten. The latter would suffer just as much as the former by a war which would hand over the domination to a foreign civilization opposed to the ideas and the traditions which animate both of these two national groups.

We are consequently confronted by the following problem:

1. Is it necessary that we should defend the territory and the coasts of Canada?

2. If so, shall we undertake ourselves this country, take charge of it? Is it necesfence or let Great Britain, our mother sary to defend our country? The question is answered by itself; but there are some who hold a different view. But have they ever clearly understood that Canada is one of the greatest countries of the earth, on account of its territory and natural resources; that if it is not parcelled in the future it will be one of the most powerful. Canada holds already almost the foremost rank through its agricultural products and through the development of its merchant shipping. Its mineral resources are immense. Its forests cover the country from one ocean to the other, and we have on that score reserves of the world.

All over the country there is at present a fever of development. Wealth flows like a wave in the west. The great provinces of the centre stand already amongst the strongest foundations of the world. In a word, everything in our country is so great that we cannot grasp it.

Let us merely glance at a part of our maritime coast. Let us go through that region which extends from Montreal, our commercial metropolis, to the extreme end of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The river of that name is the grand waterway of our trade, and through its whole length is navigated by hundreds of ships, the imposing transatlantic steamer as well as the humble schooner or the fisherman's boat. We first come across a pleasing country of a remarkable beauty and fertility, and further on we find mountainous regions, dark and wooded, but everywhere we behold villages, fields, herds of cattle and industrial establishments busy and flourishing, till we come at the entrance of the Gulf, and to the coal fields of Cape Breton; they are immense, and the only ones we find on the Atlantic coast, even if we were to travel from one pole to the other. They are situated precisely at the spot where the American continent is nearest the continent of Europe.

It is there that France erected the fort of Louisburg, under the walls of which the fate of the new world was decided.

Looking at these ruins one is struck by the wisdom of the great engineer who selected this place from which a vessel could go out and offer battle to the enemy coming from the east, between Cape Breton and Newfoundland. While the enemy that might have seized that place, could block the route to Canada and demolish all the plan of defence. That is what happened, as we know, after the capture of Louisburg by General Wolfe. To-day this military position is still most important. The coal fields of Cape Breton had become for modern navy purposes, an inexhaustible and essential defensive post. Who holds it holds doubly the key to Canada on the Atlantic. That fort defends treasures of forests and fisheries which the general of Louis XV. could not imagine. But principally this lengthy north coast, with its aspect so inhospitable, but composed of iron, white coal and deep ports, cannot pally this lengthy north coast, with its dockyard for steel vessels.

The Pacific coast offers the spectacle of natural wealth almost equal; but it is not necessary for me to go on further with this demonstration. We the owners of this wealth, are completely disarmed on the sea. Around us everybody, all nations are in arms. In the east we see Japan, immediately to the south, United States, one of the great naval powers of the world in Central America, each republic has its war vessels. In Europe, as we know, some great military nations are congested for want of colonies.

Under these circumstances how long will we remain free asd protected against the ills of war, if we do not defend ourselves? We are too rich a prey not to excite the covetousness of others. If Great Britain were not there, is it not evident that we would inevitably fall under the tutelage of some other great nation that would make us pay very dear for the protection which she would give us, and it would be a great chance if she did not absorb us completely? Of this common sense alone will convince us; it is not even necessary to read the significant comments which are printed every day in the papers of the nations that have their eyes on us.

Is it our duty to defend ourselves as much as we can in our present conditions? I say yes. It is not surely for lack of citizenship that some Canadians are opposed to the idea of an effort on our part to defend Canada on the sea. They look at the question from another point of view, and they say that our money would be far better utilized in developing our natural resources. They would be right if the world were disarmed.

Unfortunately, our dignity as well as our interest demands that we should leave no stone unturned to accomplish by our own initiative this essential duty.

I say that it is our interest, and where could we find in the history of the world a people who has succeeded in keeping his national life by leaving the care of his defence to other arms, even to those of friends or allies? We cannot find one. In the life of nations as in the life of individuals, interest is the measure of actions; every one looks before all to things which are of personal interest to himself. It is the law of the world; who will not respect it will fall. The present emergency recalls that law, and Great Britain herself who has protected us heretofore is in need of our help, towards maintaining her rank and dignity among the nations.

Besides, the practice of military and naval arts, carries with it certain important and direct advantages. While increasing the strength of the country, the energy and self-reliance of its inhabitants, it helps powerfully, through the exertions it requires, in promoting the progress of the human race. Is it not owing to war, owing to the efforts made in defending a position or directing an attack that many modern discoveries have been effected.

On the other hand, the establishment of a national navy for Canada will bring with it direct substantial benefits. Great dockyards will be provided which will give employment to many hands, while at the same time developing to great extent our resources. A certain number of our young men will receive from year to year instruction and training in the naval schools; the spirit of discipline acquired while on duty will be an education in itself; numerous families of seamen inhabiting our coasts, and whom the dwindling of the coasting trade has impoverished, will see the good old times recur; a trip to our maritime sections enables one to realize the need for such a revival. As we all know, on the coasts of England, France, and Norway, the sons of fishermen on returning home after doing service on the warships, no longer show the spirit of routine, at any rate not to the same degree as formerly; they show a greater openness of mind, they are no longer chary of innovations which make for greater prosperity and happiness. Such influences are of a nature to transform a people by developing their abilities and imparting self-reliance and initiative.

Of course, all these things will of necessity cost a great deal; and that is the stock argument of our special pleaders. Do you not perceive, say they, that we are disbursing large sums for providing a navy which will never be in a position to hold its ground against those of the great powers. In other words, you are going to provide a mock navy, a tin-pot navy. Under the circumstances we would be better off with no navy at all, and if we are bound to make sacrifices let it be in the shape of a yearly money contribution to the British navy, and let that settle the matter.

Such a plan is entirely without foundation. What I have previously said is sufficient evidence to that effect; but there is more, and much more, that could be said. Canada is not yet a great nation, at any rate in point of population, but that is increasing rapidly. The next census has in stock for us great and pleasant surprises. Twenty years hence, our numbers will greatly exceed twenty millions, and we will actually be a numerous and very wealthy people. Will we be powerful as well? That depends on what steps we decide to take just now. Possibly, we may be a mere human hive without strength or dignity; it might even happen that our national existence would be done away with. A fleet of warships cannot be created in a moment. Several years of preparation are necessary to provide fully equipped dockyards, under competent management, with skilled workmen, well trained officers and men.

That is the work to which we are setting ourselves just now. It might have been wiser to start before now, but we were not at liberty to do so. And when all these meausures have been taken, we will be in a position to hold our own among the nations of the world. Even those of us who are only of mature years will likely see the Canadian nation strong, self-sufficing, on a par with other nations, though stil, let us hope forming part of that great galaxy of free nations working towards the progress and peace of the world, and safeguarding as a sacred trust the ancient and noble civilizations out of which they have sprung.

Is not that prospect preferable to the mean alternative of keeping aloof altogether or of remaining in a state of dependency both inimical to dignity, honour and duty.

The proposal to establish a navy is not a novel one, although never heretofore has any such proposal been brought before the House in so definite a form. While we find references to such a matter in 1897 and in 1902, as far back as 1868, closely following on confederation, a man whose memory will live as long as the Canadian people, Sir G. E. Cartier, undaunted by the ill-success of a previous attempt to pass a measure on the same subject, submitted to the House a Militia Bill providing, as one of its main features, not only the establishment of a land force, but also that of a naval force. I refer the House to section 6, chapter 40 of the statutes of that year, reproduced as chapter 41 of the Revised Statuts of 1886:—

> The active militia shall comprise the voluntary militia, the regular militia and the naval militia.
> The voluntary militia shall be composed of corps raised by voluntary enlistment.
>
> The regular militia shall be composed of men who enlist voluntary in the militia, of men obtained by ballot for service, or of men who enlist voluntary to serve with men obtained by ballot.
> The naval militia shall be composed of seamen, sailors and persons whose usual occupation is upon any steam or sailing craft navigating the waters of Canada.

Sections 48, 49, 50 and 51 of the Militia Bill of 1868, R.S.C., chapter 40, provide regulations for the naval force. Which shows that at that early date, the establishment of a naval defence service was already proposed.

It is not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, that the provisions of that Bill have ever been changed since it was first voted. That Bill received a great many additions, but its fundamental principle was never altered in any way. Why, even previous to the passing of this Bill through parliament the people had been made acquainted with its provisions, and I find evidence in that regard in the speech delivered by the mover of the Militia Bill himself, Sir G. E. Cartier.

> Another consideration of the highest importance is the defence of the country. In the present condition of things, a province is not in a position to obtain help from another in a case of emergency; but, under confederation we will have a force of 200,000 men and a navy of 60,000; and with such a force, England would be much more inclined to help us in case of need than if we were entirely dependent on her strength. We should do our best to spread a right understanding of these questions.

Apparently the people approved of the proposal at that early date, since Cartier was returned to the House and had the Militia Bill put through parliament. So, Mr. Speaker, I am justified in stating that the plan for the establishment of means of defence on the seas is not a novel one, and did not originate with this government. The question is merely entering on a new phase, as a result, on the one hand of the change in the relative strength of the British navy, which is not quite as dominant as it was in 1867, and, on the other hand, as a result of the great development of Canada, which is in a better position than fifteen years ago to contribute its quota both morally and materially towards the defence of the empire.

I say, Sir, that the recurrence of this proposal, which dates back to early confederation times, should not be a matter for surprise. That was bound to happen some day or other. If those nations which have provided navies for themselves, and particularly Germany, had started ten years sooner to make provision for those gigantic armaments which are seen to-day in their harbours and dockyards, this House would have heard ten years sooner this discussion going on with as much warmth as it is now. On the contrary, if the powers on the other side of the ocean had remained stationary if the principle 'si vis pacem, para bellum' had not prevailed, and been used to screen secret political ambition which nations are prone to cherish in the same way as individuals, the Dominion parliament would continue to be engrossed with no other but peaceful plans for the development of the country's resources.

We have been so much in the habit of boasting of our privileges of self-government, Great Britain herself has granted us such a free hand in the making of our own laws, and the management of our domestic affairs, that we have little by little got accustomed to the idea that we are at liberty to legislate in relation to all possible subjects. However, in dealing with the present issue, we should not lose sight of the actual facts.

I am free to say, Mr. Speaker, that when this Bill was first introduced, I was far from being in sympathy with it, and together with many of my countrymen, was rather struck by the heavy expenditure which would be required for that purpose. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that, from the very beginning, the proposal of inserting in the estimates an item amounting to several millions for naval purposes was not at all pleasing to me. However, after considering the matter in the light of a business proposition for the promotion of Canadian interests, and more particularly after the leader of the opposition had made known his own policy, it did not take me much time to alter my opinion. I am not a partisan of militarism, although a military man, and proud of holding a fairly high rank in the Canadian militia, which enables me every year to recruit a number of young countrymen of mine and acquainting them with the duties which would be incumbent on us should some day or other the Dominion or the mother country require men to defend our homes. There cannot be any harm, if I am not mistaken, in imparting to one's folks the teachings of bravery, dutifulness and honour.

I am still less an imperialist. I approve of our present relations with Great Britain, but I do not wish for any closer union, considering that the present state of things is satisfactory from the national point of view.

However, from a comparison of the two policies submitted to the House it is easy to draw the conclusion that the most national and advantageous to the country is that advocated by the right hon. leader of the House.

What do the government say, speaking through the Prime Minister:—

It is our intention to build eleven ships—four Bristols, one Boadicea and six destroyers—It is our intention to have them, if possible, built in this country. . . . . The cost of these ships would be a little over $11,000,000, and the total cost of maintenance, stores, fuel, interest and depreciation is estimated at $24,253,000.

In answer to Mr. Foster, who inquired what the Prime Minister meant by saying that it would take a year to provide the plant for building the ships and four years more to build the navy, the Prime Minster answered as follows:—

That is what I believe.

And what is the Conservative plan? The hon. leader of the opposition proposes in in substance:

That Canada should immediately place at the disposal of Great Britain a sum equal to the purchasing value or the contsruction of two Dreadnoughts, that is, the sum of $25,000,000.

I have first of all studied this question from the economical point of view. I cannot for that reason be accused of disloyality. For in spite of what our opponents have been saying since a few days ago, French Canadians have just as good a right as others to consider this or any measure from a business point of view. The member for North Toronto has proved especially bitter. The other day, in the House, he had taken at task the venerable leader, not only of the French speaking Liberal members of this House, but also of the Liberal party in Canada of which they form part, and he insinuated that the Prime Minister's policy was devised to please the population of the province of Quebec; that he would have this House adopt it with the evident aim of bringing about the independence of Canada. That, Mr. Speaker, was stated not later than last week by a man whose political career comprises certain matters which could not be written on the walls of this edifice in golden letters.

Here is what he said, on the 10th February, 1910: Independence is still his (Sir Wilfrid Laurier's) aim. We understand why in 1902, in 1907 and in 1909, and now in 1910 he has refused to link us to the empire. He refuses to do anything else but to construct in Canada, for Canada and for Canada's use only. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, when has the province of Quebec desired the independence of this country more particularly than any other province? When have the French-speaking Canadians who inhabit it ever attempted, in that sense, to raise the standard of revolt?

From certain speeches delivered by members of the opposition, one might really suppose that the province of Quebec is seething with treason and darkly preparing the ruin of Great Britain. It is high time that these wicked and unjust insinuations should cease. There may possibly be amongst the French Canadians some who would prefer the independence of Canada—the colonial condition. Others might possibly prefer annexation to the United States.

People might be found who think in a like manner in all the other provinces of this confederation, without regard to nationality. But why should anybody wish to attribute to the French Canadians an active propaganda in favour of independence when nothing of the kind exists? If ever the question of independence is raised in Canada. and it may well be, Lord Strathcona is right in supposing 'that at the end of the 20th century Canada will have a population twice as large as that of the British isles.' I have no doubt that when that time comes, all the provinces will have their say, and that any changes then made will be by general consent. Having made these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I claim for my compatriots the right to judge of a political question, whatever it may be, which comes before this parliament in whatever manner they please without being accused of being disloyal or remiss in their conception of duty. At the same time it would be idle to maintain that the naval Bill was received with enthusiasm by the French element of the province of Quebec.

But does this mean that the French Canadians are disloyal to England, because a certain number do not like the principle of this Bill in which they may perhaps find too pronounced a tendency towards imperialism, while a certain number of others here protest more or less discordantly because of the enormous expenditure the measure will entail. After all, let us frankly admit it; the French Canadian cannot have the same reasons as his English speaking fellow citizen to become enthusiastic in this matter, because in his case blood relationship does not exist; nevertheless, his attachment to the British crown is too evident for his loyalty to be one moment doubted; albeit it must be admitted that with him, the favourable appreciation of the naval question comes from a feeling of gratitude and justice.

I might, Mr. Speaker, cite many of my English-speaking fellow-citizens who have taken up either one or the other of the points of view to judge of the merit of the measure that we are at present discussing, and who will never be accused of disloyalty for all that.

I therefore appeal to the spirit of justice of my opponents and I would ask them in future to conduct their plans of attack on other grounds than that of the French nationality. That we have our fanatics, that is true, and they have perfect right to exist, to discuss and to bring forth their theories as the fanatics of the English language, but they are not the less loyal for all that.

One consideration, Mr. Speaker, and this one alone would be sufficient to secure my support to any measure of a nature to help Great Britain to-day or at any other period of danger or difficulty. This consideration is the protection of our mutual trade which has heretofore been the work of British ships alone. But indeed there are many others which justify Canada in following in the footsteps of the other colonies, to answer the pressing appeal of the metropolis as has been put by several hon. members, amongst them the leader of the opposition.

What it behoves us not to forget in the present debate, and that which from my point of view, justifies the Canadian Government, apart from all matters of sentiment, in yielding to Great Britain's appeal, is the immense and increasing trade between Canada and Britain. England is our best and largest customer. Last year Great Britain purchased nine-tenths of the natural products which Canada exported. For the present, I am looking at the question from a business point of view. I am asking myself the following question. Should Canada help Great Britain in maintaining the empire of the sea? Outside of national sentiment, I say, yes. Let us examine briefly the important commercial motives which should encourage and justify such an opinion; and here let me repeat what I was saying a moment ago. England is Canada's best client, and should she for a moment cease to buy from us, the greater part of our population—I mean the agricultural population, for 45 per cent of the Canadians are interested in agricultural pursuits—would feel very ill at ease. On the other hand, who could stop England buying the greater part of the natural products which she consumes from her other colonies instead of giving such a marked preference to the products of our country.

In 1908, the total commerce of Canada with Great Britain was $230,440,043; our exports being $134,484,156, and our imports from Great Britain $95,855,887. You may answer me: but England finds a profit in having commercial relations with our country, since she herself sells for $95,855,887, and that the other obligation in this case is reciprocal. Yes, we might possibly buy elsewhere the manufactured products which she sells us, but we could not so easily sell our agricultural products to other countries, for if England is not an agricultural country, if her dense population on a relatively small territory forces her to buy 75 per cent of the products necessary for her subsistence, it is not likewise for the other part of Europe where agriculture is still in many cases the principal industry of the nation.

It is not in France nor in Germany, the centres of science and of practical agriculture, that we would seek to sell our farm products. It is not in Denmark that we would seek to sell our butter and cheese. In fact, the countries of Europe, with the exception of England, would be very uncertain markets for our agricultural produce shipped in large quantities.

On the other hand, Australia, New Zealand and other colonies would be serious competitors to our agricultural products; if England were to purchase from them exclusively all her natural products and food stuffs she requires.

In 1908 the natural products of Canada were valued as follows:

	Total produce.	Sold to Great Britain.	Foreign Countries.
Agricultural products	$363,126,384	$100,000,000	$10,852,825
Dairy products	29,731,932	23,955,940
Forest products	51,052,689	11,843,094	27,470,754

It is plain that Great Britain offers a vast market for our agricultural industry;

she buys from us nine-tenths of what we can produce. Our cheese and butter find there an excellent opening. Canadian cheese continues to hold first place, notwithstanding a formidable competition from New Zealand, 80 per cent of Great Britain's cheese importations are supplied by Canada (1908 statistics), and we know how this commerce tends to grow under the impulse which is given to the agricultural class to produce goods of high quality able to compete successfully with those of other countries. We could further add to these figures already mentioned, the sum of $7,472,257 that Canada has exported to Great Britain in manufactured products.

In 1908 Great Britain bought from Canada goods to the value of $3 per head, whilst purchases from the United States only bought $1.15 per head. Nevertheless, half of our commerce is with the United States. But here is the difference. We buy more and they buy less. Our total commerce with Great Britain in 1908, was $230,340,043, that is to say, that we bought from them for $95,855,887, whilst we sold $113,520,500 worth of goods to the United States, while buying from them $220,191,-209.

Now, we must not forget that we are in commercial relation with all the other English colonies, with whom we have special tariffs.

Newfoundland..	$6,963,836
Australia	3,410,396
New Zealand..	1,250,456
British East India..	4,066,973
British West India	694,199
British Guiana..	2,698,353
British Africa..	2,043,575

So far, Mr. Speaker, I have dealt with the trade consideration. Let us now review the various incidents which preceded the bringing down of this Bill before parliament and those which have transpired since it was laid on the table of the House. There is nothing more amusing than to review the attitude of the opposition and to analize the conduct of its leaders at each one of the various phases through which the navy question has passed so far.

Let us analyse the incidents, Now, for the first attitude. It was in November, 1909, that the hon. member for North Toronto, in order the better to show to the country his undying filial love for the mother country, as if the British authorities were neglecting or delaying the execution of a project or plan of naval defence which had been examined during the intercolonial conferences of 1897, 1902 and 1905, placed upon 'Hansard' a spech of several hours' duration to show the absolute necessity of speedy action and of building a navy, the immediate object of which would be the protection of our coasts and which would also go to the assistance of the mother country in case of war, should she require our services. Finally, on the 29th of March, the right hon. the Prime Minister, acting in concert with the leader of the opposition, drafted a resolution in the folowing terms:—

> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of the Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last imperial conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of the commerce the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.

That proposition was moved by the right hon. the Prime Minister and seconded by the hon. the leader of the opposition, and agreed to without a dissentient voice; which means that not even the voice of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was heard against the motion. Such was the first attitude of the opposition. The second attitude was that taken in 1909.

In the year 1909, the intercolonial conference of London took place. That conference gave birth to the plan which is the object of the Bill now under consideration, the building of a Canadian navy and the British admiralty endorsed the proposition then made by the representatives of Canada. It was then that one could gather from the reading of the newspapers that the leader of the opposition, as became a good patriot such as he claimed to be, gave his approbation to this pre-eminently national policy and he professed to be in entire accord with the views of the Prime Minister as to the draught of a programme of naval defence. Thoroughly satisfied that the construction of a Canadian navy was what was most desirable in that respect he said that we would by that means discharge our duty to Great Britain, to Canada and he added:

> The establishment of a Canadian navy unanimously asked for by both parties would much better answer the purpose than any gift of Dreadnoughts.

And while the leader of the opposition was thus holding forth, the hon. member for North Toronto took up the burden of the song and in a speech delivered in the capital of Nova Scotia, said:

> That we should be ready to defend our country and that a magnificent future was smiling upon us. That the creation of a Canadian navy would result in giving a fresh impetus to the shipbuilding industry and to the construction of steel ships in Canada, thus creating an enormous quantity of labour and promoting an immense development.

There is a third leader of the opposition who also delivered himself of a speech on that subject, but with a most jarring note as concerns the attitude of the two former leaders. I refer to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who stated at Lachine that he was opposed to any naval contribution to England, either in cash or in Dreadnoughts or by the creation of a Canadian navy. It was peremptory, but such was the attitude then taken by the hon. gentleman.

Now as an ironical rhythmical accompaniment to the statements of these three honourable gentlemen, these came to us from the remote region of the far west that fragment of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Magrath) who wanted by all means that we should give millions of dollars or send a couple of Dreadnoughts to England. Meanwhile, the government went on making known throughout the country their programme which was always the same.

I now come to the third attitude of the opposition, which was taken in January, 1910. The leader of the opposition is still in favour of the building of a Canadian navy, but moreover he wants a cash contribution to the tune of $12,000,000, representing the value of a Dreadnought.

The fourth position was that by the opposition on the 3rd of February, when the same leader of the opposition, in his reply to the speech so full of practical sense delivered by the right hon. the leader of the House, bitterly reproached him with not having done enough for Great Britain and was so cynical as to embody into his own speech quotations from the harangues delivered by the Prime Minister when still a young politician in 1866, and thereby he was trying to show that if the Prime Minister had not done more, it was because he was hankering after the independence of Canada or something to the same effect, and in winding up his speech he moved an amendment of which the two main paragraphs are as follows:

> That no permanent policy should be entered upon involving large future expenditures of this character, until it has been submitted to the people and has received their approval. That in the meantime the immediate duty of Canada and the impending necessities of the empire can best be discharged and met by placing without delay at the disposal of the imperial authorities as a free and loyal contribution form the people of Canada, such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two battleships or amoured cruisers of the latest Dreadnought type, giving to the admiralty full discretion to expend the said sum at such time and for such purposes of naval defence as in their judgment may best serve to increase the united strength of the empire and thus assure its peace and security.

So, according to this motion, the hon. leader of the opposition proposes nothing more nor less than that the Dominion government should send $25,000,000 to Great Britain, in order that she may buy Dreadnoughts with this money. But after all the hon. gentleman is humane, and he would feel loath at spending the people's money without giving the people a voice in the expenditure of that money; he would agree, but, of course only after the $25,000,000 have been subscribed to England, that we should refer the matter to the people, in order to know whether they want us to give more.

I could hardly give the finishing touch to this authentic description, without referring to my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier. Well, sir, I am happy to be able to state that among the leaders of the opposition who can speak with any authority, he is the only one so far who has stuck to his guns. It is true the hon. member from Jacques Cartier, like all the hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, did approve of the resolution of the 29th March, 1909, which aimed at a speedy organization of a Canadian naval service; but he did not feel like sleeping on his laurels, and in his Lachine speech, he emphatically stated that he was opposed to any kind of contribution or marine, etc. Since then, the hon. gentleman has ever maintained the same attitude.

In another respect the hon. gentleman is entitled to credit, and that is for the manner in which he advocates a plebiscite. He wants the government to refer the matter to the people, befor any expenditure is incurred for the navy, while his leader, less exacting, would be quite satisfied, if the money were spent first. Surely the hon. gentlemen disagree as to the manner of helping Great Britain and as to the manner in which the matter should be referred to the people.

That is, sir, a very incomplete but a truthful statement of the flagrant contradictions into which the leaders of the Conservative party in this House have fallen, since the 29th of March, 1909.

Is such conduct calculated to inspire the electorate with confidence? Is there a single hon. gentleman here, opposed on principle to the building of a navy, who could in the face of such tactics, vote down the measure introduced by the government? He could not even follow my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier in his fictitious opposition, because, if his leader has exaggerated the amount of our contribution, he himself has sinned as much in the opposite direction. That there should arise some difference of opinion as to the mode of assisting the mother country, that is easily understood; but that we should deny her everything, especially at a time when her prestige is threatened, is inadmissible under the circumstances.

The position taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) on the Naval Service Act reminds me of the attitude he took in 1905, during the second session of the legislature, when I witnessed an exhibition such as the one which is now being given us. We were then debating the Act to establish and to provide for the government of the provinces of Alberta and of Saskatchewan. The government, going even beyond the limits allowed under the British North America Act, had in the first place brought down their Bill granting to the minorities and particularly to the French Catholic element identical rights to those engaged by the English Protestant element, in the province of Quebec. The opposition which was under the same leadership as they are to-day so bitterly opposed the provisions of this Act in connection with legislation concerning education in those provinces, that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) had to part company with his colleagues and in order the better to explain his flight, he moved, just as he is doing to-day, a motion unacceptable under the terms of the law, that is to say, a motion to make the French language official before the courts of the province.

Do you know what later on became of that amendment or resolution? They caused it to play a very sad part in the province of Quebec. The French Canadian speakers of the Conservative party, wherever they addressed the electorate on the hustings throughout the province took up as their theme the famous Monk resolution: 'Gentlemen would they say, behold the hon. member for Jacques Cartier was the only gentleman who stood up on the floor of the House of Commons and tried to save the French language in the two new provinces. But the Liberals voted down his motion. It is an infamous action.' The gentleman who opposed me in the county which I have the honour to represent failed to tell the electors that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier had proposed an impossibility, under the terms of the British North America Act; he also refrained from telling them that his chief, the leader of the opposition and his followers had voted down his motion; but he was severely punished by the electors, so much so that he even lost his deposit. Now, Mr. Speaker, do you know what will happen with the present attitude of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier? At the next general elections, you will find that Conservative speakers, addressing the electors on the very same hustings will tell them that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) is the only member from the province of Quebec who stood up on the floor of the House to oppose the establishment of a national navy and they will exclaim that the Liberal members from Quebec did vote down the amendment to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. But they will again omit to say that the leader of the opposition and the Conservative members did also vote it down.

You will find that I shall, that at the next elections Conservative speakers will themselves state in the same localities that the member from Jacques Cartier was the only member from the province of Quebec to oppose the creation of a national navy. They will claim that the Liberal members from Quebec voted against the sub-amendment submitted by the member from Jacques Cartier. But at the same time omitting to mention that the leader of the opposition and the Conservative members had also voted against it.

Whilst this comedy will be enacted in Quebec, the leader of the opposition and the remainder of the Conservative phalanx will overrun the English-speaking provinces claiming everywhere that the government did not do its duty towards England, because its leader, the Prime Minister, who is a French Canadian, submitted to the dictates of the members of his race sitting in this House. That is their double game, and the trick is played. Later we will find the Conservative leaders taking shelter under the same umbrella, and the understanding will still continue. Such are the elements of which His Majesty's loyal opposition is actually composed. And certain persons would like the Liberal members to betray the government on the naval question, to vote with such a party!

On Friday, the 11th February, Mr. Bourassa published in 'le Devoir' this significant avowal as regards to the Naval Bill:

'If it had been for a Canadian navy, for Canada's defence, under the Canadian government's authority, I would not have found fault with Article 17, neither with Article 19, not even with the whole article. Even if the executive had abused of the powers that Article 17 gives it, the fleet remained under its authority, and parliament being convened within the fifteen days, might have overridden the government's decision and recalled the ships. But it is on reading Article 18 that I saw the bottomless depth in which we were thrown without warning and by deceit. It seems to me that the point has been made quite clear by the words of the leader of the opposition himself when in his speech he arraigned the government in the following terms: That the government's propositions do not agree with the Admiralty's propositions and recommendations, inasmuch as they allow the government to refuse to unite the naval forces of Canada to those of the empire in time of war; they are ill-advised and dangerous. In fact many other opposition speakers apparently hold the same views. It would be idle to attempt an analysis of their different shades of sentiment.

Our fleet will be entirely under the Canadian government's control and the government cannot definitely place that fleet at the disposal of England without the ratification of parliament. Sections 18 and 19 make this quite clear:

18. In case of an emergency, the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal Navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

19. Whenever the Governor in Council places the naval service or any part thereof on active service, as provided in the preceding section, if parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for a meeting of parliament within fifteen days, and parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation and shall continue to sit in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

But let us take the trouble of referring to the Militia Bill of 1868 and we will there find section 61 which reads in a far more peremptory manner than that of the navy.

His Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof for actual service, either within or without the Dominion, at any time whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them; and the militia men when so called out for actual service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required so to do, or for any longer period which Her Majesty may appoint:

Has the King ever once exercised the prerogative thus conferred upon him, before it was changed in these latter years by striking out the words: Out of the Dominion? Has the government itself ever forced a Canadian regiment to take part in the wars of the empire, without each one of its members being consenting? But it may be asked, why should the government not consent to a plebiscite?

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us be frank. Is it the government's fault if the people are not consulted on this question, or does not this fault rest with the opposition? If on the 29th March, 1909, instead of agreeing and seconding with enthusiasm the government's proposition, the leader of the opposition had asked for a plebiscite, would not such a policy been more reasonable than to come to-day, as does the member for Jacques Cartier, and demand that the question be referred to the people.

Why did he not state his objections at the right time, instead of giving encouragement to the government, by his adhesion to go on with their policy? It is too late now, Mr. Speaker, to ask for a plebiscite; even if the government were authorized by the constitution, they could not virtually do it, at this moment. An appeal to the people at this juncture cannot be admitted; it would be considered as an act of weakness at a time when British colonies and their naval policy towards the mother country it would be interpreted as a want of patriotism on our part. The government is the constituted authority in the land, and as such, they are bound to exercise their authority, more particularly on a question of so great importance, not only to England, which is more directly interested, but also to all other countries which hate and envy England, and which would be the first to rejoice over the least hesitation on the part of the colonies. The time is no more for a plebiscite. It should have been asked for, before the policy of the government was laid down and presented to the House.

I am opposed to a plebiscite for another important reason, besides those already given.

We live under a representative government; we are directly responsible to the people, and every five years the electorate is called upon to ratify or condemn the position taken by their representatives on the several questions that have been submitted to parliament. The people pass judgment upon their representatives at election time, when all the political questions are fully debated on the hustings. It is on that solemn occasion that the electors make a choice of the men that are supposed to be in a position, not only to represent them with dignity and liability, but also to represent their views on the public questions of the day. During the term of a parliament the electorate cannot reasonably interefere and dictate to their representatives in this House.

The Canadian parliament is not a municipal council obliged to submit to the taxpayers every proposal entailing the expenditure of a few hundred dollars. The constituencies and their representatives have wider attributions and the idea of submitting to the people all important questions proposed to the House for discussion would be an anomaly that the people themselves would be the first to reprove.

Let us suppose for a moment that the government accept the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and ask the people to give their verdict on the naval policy. How many members outside of the cities, would be in a position to assert that over 25 per cent of their constituents could decide on that question with a reasonable degree of competency, keeping in mind the limited amount of information and knowledge they have on the subject. There is nothing astonishing about it. At the present moment I know for a fact that a great number of my fellow-countrymen look only at the economic side of the question, that is to say, the expenditure it will entail, leaving aside all the wider and higher considerations.

Then, let us suppose that the people of the province of Quebec reject all naval policy, when the English-speaking provinces decide on the other side, this verdict would not mean that my fellow-countrymen are not loyal to the British Crown, and that is, nevertheless, the conclusion that would be drawn from their verdict. We all know what disastrous consequences would follow for that province. We would be isolated from the rest of the confederation. The French Canadians would be an isolated group, looked upon scornfully by the population of the other provinces. We cannot have in this parliament, without great danger of our race and creed, a party not in accord with one or the other of the two recognized political parties of this country.

There is a time for everything: at every election a chance is given to the people to pass judgment upon their representatives and upon the policy they have approved or opposed during the term of their mandate. At election time the electorate become the master, and then we have a real plebiscite.

Now, Mr. Speaker, do you happen to know what is said amongst other things that I do not believe in? Supposing that we had a plebiscite, did we not hear it said, that the province of Quebec, under the guidance of the clergy, would vote against all contribution of help of any kind to England, on the ground that it would be a step toward imperialism? Did we not hear it said that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, and an ex-member of this House, making appeal to prejudice, would stump the province, would make a canvas from house to house, would knock at the door of every vicarage and would preach the rebellion, shielding their political aspirations behind the Catholic clergy?

That is what is being said, Mr. Speaker. I need not say that I energetically and emphatically denounce all such slanders and calumnies, specially in so far as they are directed against the Catholic clergy of the province of Quebec. The past history of this country is there to teach us what valuable services the Catholic clergy have given to the British Crown in the hours of need, and how they would to-day as in the past, preach devotion and loyalty to the British flag under whose folds we have lived happy and free.

Moreover, is it not that same clergy that assisted in the re-election of Sir George Etienne Cartier, when he came before the electorate with his Militia Bill?

Sir, I have not the mission to defend the clergy of the province of Quebec against certain insinuations that have seemed directed against it in some places. My confidence is strong enough in that clergy, and I admire so much those who direct it, that I can't help saying here, in this House, that the clergy would not pursue such course. There is a tendency to make people believe that if we had a plebiscite, we should be surprised of the mass of English citizens who would be against all contribution to England, direct or indirect.

Well, Sir, I do not believe in this badly calculated prediction, if I may judge by the countenance of this House. Here, all the members are unanimous in having Canada contribute to the defence of the British empire. And, even the opposition expresses a desire to do more than is proposed by the government. On the other hand, all the prominent Englishmen, the large and small journals of the country, are for one or the other policy except, perhaps a few individuals.

Some take pleasure in saying that the English farmers do not agree with the idea of creating a national marine, nor of directly contributing for the defence of England. Here, let us be fair towards them. I may for a moment admit that they would not like to see money spent that way, but as to pretend that their greediness would speak higher than their patriotism, I say that is an injury to their address. So, the best proof that the English farmers are not antipathic to the policy, is seen in the two following facts: Lately, at Toronto, there was a convention of the 'Dominion Grange.' The president of the association at the beginning of the meeting spoke, I may say quietly, but cursing war and brining forth the idea that Canada should not spend a penny for war. Some of the members wanted to convert the opinion of the president into a motion, but the discussion became so hot that it was not thought wise to invite the votes.

Not much later, the 'grain growers' had a convention at Prince Albert, Saskatchewan; there was on the bill a resolution in favour of a direct contribution to English marine by Canada.

It was decided not to discuss this question, because it was not in accordance with the object of the association. Here are two facts, Sir, that are quite contrary to the idea conveyed that the English farmers are antipathic to the mother country. Supposing that we have to face a real crisis, that our territory and our coasts need defence and that our dignity as well as our interests command that we should at once make ready for self defence; all these thoughts are not suggested by what I just said, but by the reflection that such a subject must bring to every mind. But, these considerations do not cover that ground. We must take a higher standpoint, and perhaps this will help us to understand our duty in this case, always possible, that a storm may break over our heads before we can accomplish all the necessary work of resistance. We are here on the Canadian land the offsprings of two great countries, rivals for a long time, to-day together and friends to defend against the possible aggression which would be principally the result of circumstances than bad will; but, even then just as dangerous.

France and England have the duty to defend oneself. What each want to keep is their territory their riches and their civilization, but it is also and before all their spirit itself which would be apt to disappear with the invasion and remain for men only as a great souvenir, such as are to-day the Greek and Roman spirit.

So, this spirit, this civilization, the languages which are the expression of it are ours also. We are interested to keep them intact and we could not view with indifference a war by which either of these would be in danger. We would feel morally concerned in such a cause, with all our might, our resources, and even our blood.

We would be, we are in solidarity here, and this circumstance will not only bring us closer to our forefathers' countries, but they will unite us better together. It is perhaps a means of creating a durable sympathy, a fraternity between the two Canadian races.

This sentiment does not exist actually, we are bound to declare. We live peacefully, but without sympathy, for we know very little of one another, and each group has his pretensions that the other refuses to admit. The politicians remark this wrong with sadness, and it will not soon disappear since it must do so without abdication.

If, on the other hand, each group could add to the love of the Canadian home which tends to bring them closer, the sentiment of their solidarity in the defence of a still more elevated ideal if this is possible, and for which each group concerned would be ready to sacrifice very much, the unity would become easier and nearer; the result might be a real alliance which would add some day to the rich bunch of civilization, a new variety formed of the two prettiest and most ancient flowers which compose it. Let us not fear to take strong determinations.

Let us enter, without any mental reservation, upon the new path pointed out to us by honour and duty, as well as by the well understood interests of Canada for the present as for the future.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL (Terrebonne) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adiourned at 11.45 p.m.

Mr. ROBB:

In view of the report from Dr. J. T. Donald, expert analyst and assayist, on the use and quality of explosives employed in district 'F,' of the Transcontinental Railway, and his report of the principal causes of the accidents on construction work of the railway, have the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners considered the advisability of issuing a circular forbidding the employment in the handling of explosives of all workmen who cannot read printed instructions in either the French or English language?

The office had for some time been very badly managed and had on several occasions been the subject of official inquiry and report. No improvement being shown in the management, it was found necessary in the public interest, to make a change in the postmastership.
2. As stated, in answer to No. 1, the change was made after official investigation, as a result of repeated complaints made to the department in regard to the unsatisfactory management of the office. 2. Who are the persons who asked for his resignation or removal?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Mr. Alfred Gagné was removed from the postmastership of Delisle in November, 1903. Mr. LEMIEUX:

2. The mayor and secretary-treasurer of the municipality and others were complainants in the matter.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. Do I understand the minister to say that this question has been answered?

Mr. GRAHAM. The information asked is too voluminous to give in the form of a question. If the hon. gentleman moves, it is all right.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) wish it to stand as notice of motion for a return?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Certainly.

'COTTON'S WEEKLY.'

Mr. HERRON:

Is the Postmaster General aware that a paper alled 'Cotton's Weekly,' published at Cowansville, P.Q., claims that it is being unjustly discriminated against in the matter of excessive postal charges? If so, what grounds are there for such a claim?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

A communication has been received from the publisher of 'Cotton's Weekly' respecting the rate of postage chargeable on copies of his publication. There has been no discrimination, and, in the view of the department, no ground for complaint exists. I might explain further: The department was informed that the publisher of 'Cotton's Weekly' had sent various bundles of his paper to different post offices addressed to other than regular subscribers. It appears that the postmaster of Cowansville, instead of collecting postage at the transient rate of one cent per four ounces, allowed such bundles to go through at the bulk rate of one-quarter of one cent per pound. The department has contended that persons who subscribe for fifty or one hundred, or a similar number of copies, of but a single issue cannot be regarded as regular subscribers, and, therefore, that such copies can only be transmitted by post at the transient rate of one cent per four ounces, or fraction thereof, to each separate address. The publisher has recently written resenting the action taken, and a reply dealing fully with his inquiry is being sent to him to-day, to the effect that he is not in any manner being discriminated against, but is enjoying the same privileges as all other publishers, and not in any way knowingly treated differently.

NEW BRUNSWICK MAIL ROUTE.

Mr. DANIEL:

1. When were tenders called for the Milledgeville-Holderville mail route in New Brunswick?

2. (a) Joseph M. Sleep	$636
William Sleep	690
Thomas L. Martin	690
Edgar Miller	700
John Harrity	707
H. A. Currie	800

(b) Mr. Thomas L. Martin.

3. The contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer, but he failed to provide the necessary security and the department was obliged to set his tender aside.

STEAMER 'HUDSON.'

Mr. DANIEL:

1. Has the government or any department thereof recently purchased a steamer in St. John, called the 'Hudson'?
2. If so, what was the price paid, and for what purpose is she to be used?
3. What are the dimensions and tonnage of this steamer?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN:

1. Yes.
2. $3,600. For patrolling the lobster fishery.
3. 57 feet 7 inches long, 12 feet 6 inches beam, and 4 feet 7 inches depth; 33·59 gross tons.

PURCHASE OF SUPPLIES.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR:

1. Has the Minister of Railways received any complaint or complaints as to the alleged unfair manner in which the Railway Commission has purchased its supplies?
2. Has the minister any information which would indicate that the contractors on the Transcontinental railway are compelled to purchase their supplies from any one firm, or is he aware that such is said to be the case?

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. It is not unusual when public bodies or governments are purchasers of supplies or goods, for dealers who think they should sell a greater quantity of such supplies and goods than is purchased from them, to make complaint, and the Minister of Railways has had the usual experience in this respect.

2. No.

POULTRY DEPARTMENT, EXPERIMENTAL FARM.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

1. How many men are employed in the Poultry Department at the Central Experimental Farm, and what is the salary of each?

2. 3·05 acres.

3. 323.

4. Revenue:Fiscal year 1908-9, $620.91; 10 months, fiscal year 1909-10, $350.87.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

Mr. SAMUEL HUGHES (Victoria and Haliburton. Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are proceeded with, I beg, with your permission, to move the adjournment of the House in order to discuss the regulations of the National Rifle Association of Great Britain and Ireland, in which discrimination is made against the official arm of the Canadian militia. I regret that the Minister of Militia, owing to illness, is not here; but as the matter is of very great urgency, I would be pleased if the right hon. the First Minister would kindly bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Militia.

Leave being granted,

Mr. HUGHES. I regret exceedingly that it is necessary to bring this matter before the House; but it is a matter of very great importance to the riflemen of Canada, and in fact involves the honour of the whole Dominion. The old rule, under which our riflemen competed at Bisley, is covered by section 98 of the regulations of the National Rifle Association, page 61, as follows:

Any ·303 rifle as issued by the British government or the government of any British colony or dependency for the arming of the troops, including the Charger Loading M.L.M. and M.L.E. rifles, or similar rifle of private manufacture of bona fide government pattern and bearing the government viewer's mark.

From time immemorial the Canadian riflemen, being armed with the British Snider rifle, were allowed to fire unquestioned; those who used the Martini-Henry were allowed to fire unquestioned, and those who adopted the Lee-Enfield rifle, of one pattern or another, of all the various marks it has gone through, were allowed to fire unquestioned. Last year, owing to the success attending the use of the Ross rifle by the Canadian riflemen, an attempt was made to prevent the use of that rifle on the ranges at Bisley; and although the council of the National Rifle Association, under the regulations, could not possibly object to the rifle, they passed a new rule for future years, which I shall read:

National Rifle Association,
Bisley Meeting, 1910.

The council have decided that no service rifle of any pattern other than the official pattern in use by the British army be admitted in service rifle competitions unless an officially certified specimen of such rifle be deposited with the National Rifle Association at least three months before the commencement of the Bisley meeting and approved for use at the Bisley meeting.

Now, contrast the two rules. The old rule permitted the use of any ·303 rifle, provided it was of British government pattern; but the evident object and intent of this new rule is at least to leave it uncertain in the minds of the riflemen whether this ·303 rifle of Canada may be used or not. After the success attending the use of the Ross rifle at Bisley last year, orders were being received for the Ross rifle, not only from Canada, but from all over the world; and thousands of these rifles would have been ordered but for this new regulation, which made it uncertain whether the National Rifle Association would allow its use or not in the coming year; consequently, thousands of riflemen beyond the seas as well as in the Dominion of Canada, who otherwise would have purchased it, have not done so. This new regulation practically charges the Canadian government with fraud. Let us see what the record in this matter is. For a long time, as long as the Ross rifle was a short one and had no chance of competing at Bisley with a long rifle, there was no serious objection raised against it by any one. Everybody knows that a short-barrelled rifle cannot be held as steadily in the hands of a soldier as a long-barrelled rifle. But as soon as the Canadian service adopted the long-barrelled Ross rifle, and the record of that rifle became known in England, objections began to be raised against it. In 1908 one or two of these long rifles were fired at the Bisley meeting without any serious objection being raised; nobody paid much attention to the matter. But last year, when the Canadian team went over there, during the two weeks of preliminary practice, there was what was called the 'Pride of the Army' match, in which the Canadian boys fired against the picked shots of the British army. Previous to that the prize shot of the British army, Sergeant Wallingford, reported on the Ross rifle that it was one point per range better than the British rifle. In the early stage of this 'Pride of the Army' match, the Canadians made such scores that had the match been finished they could have made outers at the final ranges and still have beaten the crack shots of the British army. But at the early stage the match was called off, and from that moment serious opposition was raised against the admission of this rifle in the matches. There was no reason for it. It was claimed that it was not the rifle issued by Canada for the arming of her troops. Well, let us see if the British riflemen were using the rifle issued for the British troops. The British army to-day is armed with a short Lee-Enfield rifle, and not one of these was fired throughout the matches at Bisley. It would have no chance there. They fired what has been in the past few years regarded as obsolete—the long Lee-Enfield and the long Lee-Metford. Our people have seen the advantage of the long rifle, and since we have recovered from the fads of the Boer war we have adopted it. The Germans have also adopted the long rifle, even for their cavalry. So that there was nothing whatever improper in the Canadian team adopting a long rifle at the Bisley matches. It was practically the same as the long Lee-Enfield and the long Lee-Metford. Put them side by side and the ordinary observer cannot distinguish one from the other. There were no special changes made in the long rifle. There was not one point of difference between the short Ross rifle and the long Ross rifle, where there were 20 and in some cases 100 points of difference between the various marks of the long Lee-Enfield; and yet objection was made to the long Ross rifle being used on the ranges.

Now, according to the British Bisley regulations, the rifles are classed as service, match, sporting, &c. Then there are the various patterns of rifle, including the Lee-Enfield, the Lee-Metford, the Martini-Henry, and the Ross. Then there are the various marks of each of these classes. There are three marks of the Ross rifle—I, II and IIxx, while there are about thirty different marks of the Lee-Enfield and the Lee-Metford. Why should mark IIxx be an objection to the Ross rifle when the various marks are not held to be an objection to the British rifles? The long Ross rifle has exactly the same action as the short Ross, having a straight pull. Practically the only difference is in the length of the barrel. I do not blame all the members of the National Rifle Association for the intrigue which brought about this new regulation. Nor do I blame the range officers as a whole for the treatment of certain members of the Canadian team on the ranges. The feeling got so high last year on the ranges that one officer of the highest standing in Canada, a man of honour, Captain Neil Smith, of Chatham, who is known throughout the length and breadth of Canada, and who was complimented by Lord Roberts on the magnificent score he made on the long ranges, when about to shoot, heard one of the range officers come up and say to the register keeper: 'Watch that Canadian and see that he does not change his ammunition'. This is something like what happened to Lieutenant Spittal, the year before last, when objection was made to him to prevent him winning the King's prize. These gentlemen are determined to force out the Ross rifle. Last year they coaxed and begged our men to use the Lee-Enfield, offering to sell the rifle under the cost price, which by the way they said was $15. Finally they offered to lend them, practically to give them for nothing, if they would use them in the matches. But the Canadians stood firm, as they had authority to use their own rifle, and refused. There is another aspect of this case. We are told that the price of this Ross rifle is altogether out of the question. Here is an advertisement in the 'Territorial Service Gazette' of Great Britain:

Bisley Rifle Meeting, 1910. £1,000 First Prize. £1,000 (One Thousand Pounds Sterling), will be paid to the winner of the All-comer's Aggregate Competition at the N. A. R. Meeting at Bisley, 1910, provided such winner shall, throughout the several competitions embraced in the aggregate, have used an 'Ommundsen' service rifle purchased by him from us on or after 1st September, 1909. And, subject to the same conditions, we undertake to pay the following additional prizes to the—

Winner of the	'Daily Graphic'	£50
" "	'Graphic'	50
" "	'Daily Telegraph' ..	50
" "	'Stock Exchange' ..	50
" "	Alexandra	50

The 'Ommundsen' Service Rifle, of the highest quality and finish, costs 9 guineas, cash with order. Territorial pattern, 10s. extra. Obtainable only from Daniel Fraser & Co., Edinburgh. London office: 48 Dover street, W.

Thus the British competitor, when he purchases a private rifle, has to pay $50 and upwards for it, whereas the Canadian rifle, the Ross, is retailed at $35. Therefore, the charge as to the excessive cost of this rifle will not hold. I am not charging that it was deliberately arranged to shut out the Ross rifle, but that was the effect, had not certain action been taken by the government of Canada in regard to the rear aperture sight, which it is found expedites shooting. The National Rifle Association passed this regulation:

Subject to the provisions set out in this subsection, an additional backsight may be used, or either of the backsights as issued may be removed, by withdrawal of the hinge pin only, and another backsight may be substituted for the removed backsight.

That would permit the use of the rear aperture sight; but it could be used only on a rifle which had already this rear aperture sight, so that by the removal of the hinge pin it could be used. They might as well have put in that regulation that no one could use the rear aperture sight except on a Lee-Enfield or a Lee-Metford rifle. Objection was taken to the fact that the Canadian rifle had a different rear aperture sight; but it having been authorized by the Minister of Militia, it was therefore within the rules, and objections were reluctantly withdrawn.

As to the success of the long Ross rifle, I may be permitted to point out a few of the winnings last year. It seems impossible that these can be a mere matter of chance. I do not want to take up time giving reasons why the Ross rifle is superior to others, but any of those skilled in the use of rifles can easily explain why. At Bisley last year it won the McKinnon cup, for the first time in history, with a score of 1,609 out of a possible 1,800. It won the Kolapore cup with a score of 765 out of a possible 840. It also won the Graphic cup with a score of 35 out of a possible 35; the Daily Graphic cup with a score of 35 out of a possible 35; another Daily Graphic cup with a score of 35 out of a possible 35; the Jubilee trophy, with a score of 2,375 out of a possible 2,640; and the All Comers aggregate, with a score of 167 out of a possible 175.

In the province of Quebec the long Ross rifle swept the entire match. In the Ontario matches, in the Tait-Brassey match, it took the first six places in Toronto last year. In the Osler match, it made a score of 49 out of a possible 50, and took the first five places in the extra series No. 1. In the Great West Tobacco match, it took the first two places, and in the Militia Aggregate, the first three places; and in the All Comers Aggregate, the first four places.

At the Dominion Rifle Association Meet, in the Bankers' match it won the first seven places, except the second. That could not be a matter of chance at all because the same class of men shot all round. In the Governor General's match, it made a score of 198 out of a possible 210. In the Bisley aggregate it took the first four places. In the Tyre match it took the first two places. In the MacDougall challenge cup it made a score of 68 out of a possible 70, and took the first two places. In the President's match it took the first three places. Extra series 'a', first two places; extra series 'b', first two places; Barlow match (team of four) it made a score of 361 out of a possible 420, all Ross rifles; in the extra series aggregate, 213 out of 225 and the first nine places; Gillespie aggregate, 233 out of 245, first five places; Grand aggregate, 334 out of 350, first ten places.

I have a list of the other matches in England but it is not necesary that I should refer to them. What I maintain is that this regulation is very objectionable. I would not seriously object to the rifle having to be submitted in advance, although I think the three months is altogether too long. The object of withholding approval all that time is evident. On the 1st of April, let us say, the rifle must be submitted at Bisley for approval, and it will not be known for another month whether it is adopted or not. What is the consequence? Every rifleman, who would have bought a Ross rifle last year, were it not for that arbitrary rule, is held in suspense. Then we find a bonus of £1,000 held up to men to buy the Lee Enfield, manufactured in Great Britain. Even Canadian riflemen, under the regulation, are not certain whether they can use the Ross rifle or not. It is a regulation which no self-respecting association or government should submit to. It is claimed that the troops are not armed with the Ross rifle. Well, that rifle is in the hands of the troops in Canada, and has, moreover, the approval of the government of Canada, after having been put to the most severe tests in comparison with the Lee Enfield. In every instance in which the two rifles were brought into competition, the Lee-Enfield failed to touch the Ross rifle. After thousands of rounds had been fired, the latter came out ahead and stands to-day the best rifle in the world. No doubt our troops are not all armed with this rifle, but neither were the British troops all armed with the Lee Enfield. And to say that because a few hundred short Lee Enfield rifles were issued to the British troops in Matabeland years ago, the British army was not armed with the Lee Enfield, would be absurd, and the man who would say that would be laughed out of court. All our troops are not armed with the Ross rifle. Some are armed with the old Lee Enfield and the Martini Henry and maybe some with the old Snider Enfield, but that does not prevent the Ross rifle being the official arm of the Canadian troops, and is no excuse for this regulation to which I object, and to which no self-respecting country should submit.

The old regulation provided that:

Any ·303 rifle as issued by the British government or the government of any British colony or dependency for the arming of the troops——

But, now there is a change. The new rule provides that the rifle authorized by a colony shall not be used until it is submitted for endorsation, thus keeping the people in suspense until within three months of the match, and the National Rifle Association may take six weeks to come to a decision. Here is the rule:

The council have decided that no service rifle of any pattern other than the official pattern in use in the British army be admitted in service rifle competitions unless an officially specimen of such rifle be deposited with the National Rifle Association at least three months before the commencement of the Bisley meeting and approved for use at the Bisley meeting.

You must walk up three months in advance and say here is the rifle authorized by the Dominion, in use by the troops of the Dominion, manufactured in the Dominion, which swept Bisley last year and put the Lee Enfield out of existence, and yet you have nevertheless to walk up hat in hand and say: Please, will you let me shoot with it next year?

The other objectionable part is that the Ross rifle must be approved for use at the Bisley meeting. What we should insist on is that the rifle authorized by the Canadian government should be admitted to the competition at Bisley without any demur. Otherwise, no Canadian riflemen should go to Bisley. I think this whole business is engineered in Canada by conspirators in the pay of the small arm companies of England to discredit the Canadian rifle and make it appear that there is something crooked about it, when there never was a straighter transaction. What do we do? We adhere to the British caliber and a ·303 bullet. What we should have is a ·280 bullet, that is what we want. Still, in order to be able to use the same ammunition in any part of the world, we adopt the ·303. We should have a rimless cartridge. The British use the obsolete rim cartridge. We maintain the old pattern so that the soldier who uses the Ross rifle may use the same ammunition as is used in the Lee-Enfield. We maintain these obsolete ideas merely to comply with the standard set up. But, moreover, only last month, the British government themselves have come out with the statement that their rifle is obsolete, and they are going to change it at an early day. Yet, they want to force us—no, I am not speaking of the British government now, but of the National Rifle Association, which is a sort of private institution—that association is endeavouring to force us to give up the use of our long Ross rifle. But the self-respect of this government cannot rest under that rule.

Mr. J. D. REID. How are you going to make them change?

Mr. HUGHES. I am very glad my hon. friend has asked that question. How are we going to make them change? Let the Canadian boys stay at home, if the British government will not step in and take action. The British government allow a lot of their officers to take part as range officers, and thus save the association thousands of dollars every year. Let the government be notified that the use of these obsolete ideas in regard to rifles does not meet with the approval of the Dominion of Canada. Then, if our boys go there, let them carry the rifle bearing the official stamp of the Dominion of Canada, and with the order in council in the pocket of the commandant of the team. They go on the ranges and say: 'Here is the official certificate, and here is the rifle bearing the stamp of the Dominion of Canada.' That is is all that should be necessary from any colony in this empire, and no self-respecting colony would tolerate the demand of more. If they do not agree to that, so far as I am concerned not a Canadian rifleman will fire at Bisley this year or any other year until these gentlemen are brought to time. If they cannot be brought to time by reason, why, we can bide at home, shoot our own matches, and get along without them. We have shown at Bisley what the Ross rifle and the Canadian boys can do.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I desire to add just a word to this rifle controversy. I have no intention of detaining the House, for I know that it is desirable to go on with another debate. I do not hold a brief for the Ross Rifle, nor do I hold a brief for the private manufacturers of the Lee-Enfield rifle, which latter, I believe, are at the bottom of this trouble. We must look at this matter fairly and sensibly. Rifle matches, to my mind should afford a test of the marksmanship of the men and of the qualities of the rifle as well. We all know that the rifle, at the present moment and all over the world is in a transition state. The Boer war showed the necessity of improving, not the shooting quality of the rifle, but the sights and the means of manipulating the sighting with a view to giving greater effectiveness than had up to that time been attained at the long ranges. The old sights on the Lee-Enfield are almost identical with the sights on the old Brown Bess. The most experienced sportsmen and marksmen know that in order to obtain the highest degree of skill in the use of the small-bore rifle some improved methods of sighting must be adopted over those in vogue during the Boer war. While I do not wish to take any particular part in the controversy, I may make a brief statement of the matter. The difference between the Lee-Enfield rifle and the Ross rifle is largely a difference of the action, and the action has nothing to do with the shooting properties of the rifle, but is simply a matter of the mechanism that puts the cartridge into the barrel of the rifle. The shooting qualities depend entirely upon the quality of the barrel and also on the sights, plus 'the man behind the gun.' Now, the whole trouble with the National Rifle Association is that any Canadian who wishes to go to Bisley where he must fire the Lee-Enfield rifle or the Lee-Metford rifle must go down in his pocket for an expensive rifle manufactured by one of two or three well-known private makers of rifles in the old country. If he does not do that, he stands no show in the matches. After our men went to England, immediately after we had adopted the Lee-Enfield—which was different from the rifle they had, the Lee-Metford—our men carried off prizes to about the same extent as last year. Mr. Hayhurst carried off the Queen's prize, and did it with a rack rifle—not with a private rifle. This caused great clamour amongst the manufacturers of rifles in the old country, for it is an extensive business with large interests, as can be seen by the prizes offered for those who shoot a particular rifle. The British government then adopted the Canadian Lee-Enfield.

My view of the whole matter is that the self-respect of both countries should see to it that these matches are made contests for rifles as well as of skill. This is necessary for us, and Great Britain, in order to have rifles more modern than any other nation. The English rifle is entirely obsolete. I agree with the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton, (Mr. Hughes), on that point—its calibre is too great and the cartridge is useless, for it is a rim cartridge, instead of cannelured, and besides the sights are altogther obsolete. In view of the fact that this whole question is in a transition state, I think the self-respect of both countries and of all colonies that compete at Bisley should insist on virtual free trade in the matter of rifle shooting. If any colony insists on adopting a certain pattern of rifle, it must necessarily, in my opinion, carry a bayonet. I think that was the chief fault of the short Ross rifle. But the short Ross rifle was as good as the territorial rifle which is the standard arm of the British soldier to-day. I claim, as I said that there should be free trade in this matter, and that Canada should insist that the rifle she adopts, whether the Ross rifle or any other pattern, shall be authorized in these matches, so long as the ammunition and the bayonet are the same as those in use in Great Britain, and that the length of the rifle we fire is not too great. Also, marksmen should be permitted to experiment with their sights, in order that some sight may be invented which will make this rifle deadly accurate up to two thousand yards. The old open rifle sight is not accurate for more than six hundred yards, and everybody knows that in modern warfare the casualties occur at from about 1,800 down to 1,000 yards. A man must be able to use a rifle with deadly accuracy at 1,800 yards. What the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton says is right; this rifle which they want to have used at Bisley is of an obsolete pattern. The rifle with which the British troops are armed is the territorial rifle, the short-barrelled Lee-Enfield, which they adopted after the Boer war. They cannot and will not use that arm at Bisley, because it is not nearly so good as the rifle they formerly had. Therefore, they want to insist that we should follow their method, they want to compel our riflemen to purchase expensive rifles from the old country manufacturers of the match rifles. It seems to me that this is all a matter of 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians.' I do not care in this matter to use such strong language as that of my hon. friend from Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes), but it is not right to compel our marksmen to pay up to $60 or $70 for a rifle in the old country which is no better than our standard rifle with which we carried off prizes, greatly to our credit as I think. We are no more breaking rules than they are, because the rifle that they use at Bisley is not their official arm. I think the time is opportune for us to make a protest. And, in view of the fact, that the British army is about to change their weapon—and possibly we might change also—this match at Bisley this year should be an open competition both as regards the rifle and as regards the sights. From the experience thus gained, the British government and this government will be better able to judge the right kind of rifle to choose. Unless rifles are subjected to the test of these great matches we cannot tell which one of them is the best. I might say that it is a matter that concerns every nation in the world to know which new rifle is to take the place of the old. The Japanese have adopted a new automatic rifle which fires ten shots automatically. The new Mauser fires seven or eight shots without reloading, by simply pulling the trigger. The recoil of the rifle after a shot is fired is used for reloading. These changes have been adopted in rifles now in use. But the most important question of all is to know what form of sight we are going to use, and in order to develop the ingenuity of mankind, and help our soldiers to perfect a good sight, we should insist that they be allowed to use whatever sight can be adopted to the rifle, that might be used as a military sight. I am glad this question has come up, and I hope the National Rifle Association will not stand for the welfare of the English private rifle makers against the interests of the empire.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I think, with all due respect to self-respecting nations and Diana of the Ephesians, that we have here a tempest in a teapot. I think the real question before the National Rifle Association to-day is the question whether Mark II. double star, Ross rifle is the standard arm of the Canadian militia. I maintain it is not the standard arm of the Canadian militia to-day, and I base my statement on answers to questions which I have asked during this session. As to how many of this Mark II. double star rifle have been ordered, I was told that 500 had been ordered. Now it is not intended surely to arm the Canadian militia with 500 Mark II. double star rifles; if it is, it is only for the purpose of issuing this rifle to rifle clubs and to sharpshooters in different regiments so that they may compete, if necessary, with the rifle associations here and abroad. In doing this, I think the department is taking an unfair stand, because it is not every one who has a Mark II. double star, which is, I may say, a very good rifle. I think the fact of its being a good rifle is due largely to the fact that the Conservative party have been insisting upon the Ross rifle being perfected. I think if the Conservative party had not insisted on this matter the militia of Canada would be armed to-day wtih the Mark I. rifle, which is a very inferior brand of rifle. I think the only question before the National Rifle Association of England to-day is whether this rifle is the standard rifle of the Canadian militia or not. If it is the standard rifle of the Canadian militia, further orders would be given for this rifle, and we would not find so few rifles of Mark II. being ordered, but we would find an order given for enough rifles to arm all the militia with it. Now, as to the idea of conspirators throughout Canada who are said by the hon. member to be in the pay of the small arms companies of England, and are consequently objecting to the manufacture of the Ross rifle, I think this is only a delusion which exists in the imagination of some people, whose form of paranoia may lead them ultimately into the belief that they are actually Ross rifles themselves, doing business at both ends simultaneously.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have to express my regret that my hon. friend and colleague the Minister of Militia and Defence could not be in his seat to-day. I appreciate the fact that my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) has given a great deal of attention to this matter, which is one of so much importance, and that he should not delay to lay it before the public. I do not pretend to be an authority on militia matters, but it seems to me that the facts which he has advanced are worthy of consideration, and I will ask my colleague to give them special attention.

Mr. HUGHES. I thank the First Minister for his approval. I am not surprised to find that the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Worthington) is so well posted on the reasons actuating the Rifle Association of Britain in their improper action last year. We know to-day that the National Rifle Association had piles of newspapers about two feet high, and of questions put by the hon. member in the House of Commons here, and of letters written by gentlemen who should know better, and who should be above such things. All these letters were written to the National Rifle Association, and for what purpose? Was it done for the purpose of improving rifle shooting in the empire? No, but to prevent the use of the Ross rifle at Bisley. These are facts which can be substantiated at the proper time and place. Why is it said that this is not the standard arm of Canada? When Britain sent her troops to Matabelaland with 1,000 short Lee-Enfield rifles, was it not the standard arm of the empire? It was used in war by the British troops, and it was used, not after two years of testing, but after two weeks of testing, yet the government sent the troops into action with these rifles. Nobody would pretend to say that a man, because he carried one of these rifles in Matabelaland and presented himself at Bisley, should not have a right to use that rifle. I may inform the House that there are 1,500 of these long Ross rifles ordered, which is an infinitely greater number for Canada relatively than 50,000 would be for Great Britain.

My hon. friend says that he speaks for the Conservative party. The Conservative party, let me inform him, was not behind the conspiracy against the Ross rifle. A few irresponsible gentlemen in the party were in that conspiracy, but the Conservative party was not behind it. And let me inform my hon. friend that before he ever opened his mouth in this House of Commons, for or against the Ross rifle, criticising it one way or the other, every change that has been made in the rifle to-day had been proposed, and had been practically carried out, and was being experimented with, more than a year before he ever came into the House, much less before he opened his mouth on this question. The hon. gentleman has spoken of the various marks of the Ross rifle. There are three marks of the Ross rifle. There is Mark I, which was the first rifle; then there is Mark II, which rifle is in the hands of the soldiers, and the shooting from which has surpassed any shooting done by the Lee-Enfield rifle. The shooting from that Mark II rifle in the hands of the soldiers throughout Canada last year, was infinitely ahead of any shooting that was done with the Long-Lee-Enfield rifle. Then there is the 'Mark II' rifle, whose record I have given you from Bisley, and which surpasses any other rifle that has ever been made in the history of the world. I shall not detain the House any further than to say that although we have three marks of the Ross rifle which I gave to the House some years ago, taking the long Lee-Enfield, the short Lee-Enfield, the long Lee-Metford and the short Lee-Metford, some 30 different marks. We have not four or five changes, but hundreds of changes in one part or the other, in the construction of these rifles, yet we never object to them. Competitors are allowed to come and shoot with any service rifle they like at the Dominion or any other ranges in Canada. We claim that when the Dominion of Canada puts its stamp on a rifle as the rifle of the Dominion of Canada and furnishes the committee with a copy of the order in council authorizing that rifle, there the duty of any self-respecting colony should end, and the National Rifle Association of the British empire should be too big a British institution to be worked and run around by any rifle company, I care not what it may be.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. As the hon. gentleman has used the word 'conspiracy', in relation to my connection with this discussion, I wish to say that any connection I have had with the discussion of the Ross rifle has been actuated by a desire to see in the hands of the Canadian militia a good, safe, sound and efficient rifle. I have no interest, as some other people may have, either with the company or as A. D. C. to the Minister of Militia; I am simply here to see that a good, safe and efficient rifle is put in the hands of the militia, and by taking a stand against the first brand of that rifle issued to the militia I think I may safely say we have been successful in having at least 200 changes made in the rifle. To-day the result has been the production of an excellent shooting rifle, but a rifle which experts claim is not an efficient service rifle, that is the Mark II.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not want to impugn the motives of the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Worthington); I shall let his actions speak. If he can assure the House that he has not been instrumental in inspiring the Rifle Association of Great Britain to refuse the use of the long Ross rifle I will be only too glad to accept his explanation; but he cannot do it.

Motion negatived.

Mr. HUGHES.

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST RABIES.

Mr. BLAIN. Might I ask the Minister of Agriculture what the recent regulations of the government are in respect to requiring dogs to be muzzled. This regulation applies, I understand, only to western Ontario. What agreement is there between this government and the government of Ontario in respect to the enforcement of the regulations? Has my hon. friend any news to communicate to the House as to whether this regulation is likely to continue in force for any considerable length of time?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER. The Department of Agriculture in its administration of the Health of Animals Law has the authority to issue an order placing any particular part of the country under regulations which may be formulated to protect the health of animals. The provincial authorities have certain powers in regard to the protection of the health of human beings. These powers are largely exercised through by-laws of the municipalities, or orders of the local or provincial health authorities. The outbreak or epidemic of rabies in the western part of Ontario assumed a dangerous form, not only to dogs and other animals, but to human beings and seemed to call for some action. The director-general of the Veterinary Branch of my department communicated with the provincial authorities of Ontario, and after visiting Toronto and discussing the matter with the provincial authorities, it was agreed that the Department of Agriculture here should issue an order putting certain parts of the province of Ontario, in which there seemed to be danger, under a regulation for the muzzling of all dogs that were at large. Unmuzzled dogs were required to be kept in and tied up. The provincial authorities issued at the same time an order from their department by which the municipal authorities of the province were to enforce our order and their own similar order. The object of both authorities issuing similar orders was that there seemed to be some doubts in the mind of the legal authorities as to which department had the full control, and in order to make sure that there would be no mistake and no difficulty in the enforcement of the orders the provincial authorities and the Dominion authorities issued identical orders covering the same area, and the provincial authorities undertook to enforce these orders through their municipal officers and machinery.

Mr. BLAIN. Is it expected that this order will continue for any considerable length of time?

Mr. FISHER. We are not in a position yet to note any condition of affairs which would justify a cancellation of the order.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Is there any possibility of compensating farmers whose stock are destroyed by rabies in western Ontario? It is very unfortunate that a poor farmer wakes up in the morning and finds that a mad dog has entered his premises, and has bitten several cows and possibly his horses. The first he knows of it one of his cattle takes this disease, the farm is quarantined, the veterinary officer orders the destruction of the cattle and horses as they develop the disease. I understand the law permits compensation in the case of rabies, the same as in the case of hog cholera and glanders. No compensation has been given, and no attempt has been made to sift the cases and give compensation to the sufferers, many of whom are not guilty and may not even own dogs. The whole amount of compensation that would be paid would possibly not amount to more than $8,000 or $10,000. Has the minister the matter under advisement, and can he say that some system may be devised that would afford relief to these people?

Mr. FISHER. I think in such a case as the hon. member describes the owner of the cattle would have recourse against the owner of the dog,

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. A mad dog runs perhaps fifty miles in a night and nobody knows whose dog it is.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—MR. EDWARDS.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the attention of the House to a question of privilege. In yesterday's issue of the Toronto 'Globe' there appeared a very lengthy editorial. I shall not quote the whole editorial, but inasmuch as it referred to myself unfairly I shall take this opportunity of correcting some misstatements. In referring to myself it says:

> His blind partisanship is revealed by the fact that he made no allusion to the position of Messrs. Monk and Bourassa. He preferred to quote the alleged utterances of Mr. Tardivel, who is dead, and of Father Hamon, who is not a French Canadian. The correctness of his translations even from the utterances of these gentlemen were denied by his own fellow-Conservative, Judge Doherty.

I wish to state that as regards my reference to the first of these works I gave my authority, the Journals of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Quebec. I have only this to say: that the amount which I said had been given, $300, was given on the authority of the Provincial Secretary out of the vote for education, for prize books, and if it was not used in that way then the government of Quebec at that time stands convicted of a misappropriation of public funds. In regard to my reference to Father Hamon's work I wish to say this: I was incorrect in saying that the extract was altogether from chapter 18. Two-thirds of the extract that I gave is a literal translation of what is contained in chapter 18; the other one-third is not contained in chapter 18, but is the substance of parts of chapter 17. Therefore, the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) was quite correct in saying that the part of the quotation to which he took exception, was not to be found in chapter 18. I was incorrect in saying that it was all from chapter 18; the hon. member for St. Anne (Mr. Doherty) was quite correct, I repeat, in saying that the particular part of the extract to which he took exception was not to be found in that chapter.

Mr. HUGHES. You did not make the translation.

Mr. EDWARDS. I did not. I have the book here, and I am perfectly willing to submit to any gentleman in the House who is able to translate from the French, and I think he will verify what I say. I wish also to take exception to the editor of the Toronto 'Globe' accusing me of a wish to raise the race cry; and I think it comes with very bad grace from the editor of that paper. My memory carries me back to a memorable election which took place in the province of Ontario, a very bitter election in fact, the bitterness of which may very well be indicated by a pamphlet which was circulated by the Liberal party at that time, and which was given expression to in the Toronto 'Globe,' and one verse of the poem contained these words:

> Beware the French Canadian horde,
> Who robbed you of your just reward,
> Ontario, Ontario.

I think any allusion of the kind I have referred to comes with very bad grace from a paper like the 'Globe.' As regards the reference to the member for Jacques Cartier and to Mr. Bourassa, I wish to say simply this, Mr. Speaker, that I do not share the Nationalist views of Mr. Bourassa, and neitner do I share the separatist views of the editor of the Toronto 'Globe.' But I respect Mr. Bourassa to this extent at all events, that he is a man who expresses his opinions fully and freely, and I despise the editor of the 'Globe' as a fawning, cringing sycophant, who advocates a policy of separation and which, to use his own words 'should be advocated in such a way as to attract little attention.' I do not think the 'Globe' is quite fair in wishing to deny to me the privilege of expressing my views, because, Sir, when the 'Globe' gets into a tight place through following its well known policy of misrepresentation and calumny, its editor is very quick to show the yellow streak in him and to whine like a whipped cur for the privilege of the press.

THE NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. W. B. NANTEL (Terrebonne). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before opening my remarks on that important question, I wish to refer to certain arguments employed by hon. gentlemen on the other side in support of their position. If we are to accept the statements of the hon. members for Beauce (Mr. Béland), and for Vaudreuil (Mr. Boyer), universal peace, the safety of Canadian trade, and even the supremacy of Great Britain, are all dependent on the presence, the coming in the near future, on the Pacific and Atlantic oceans of that great naval force represented by Canada's imperial fleet.

Now is not that awful? And where will these good farmers, their electors in Beauce and Vaudreuil, be compelled to go in order to sell their eggs, potatoes and onions? Strange to say, they only thought of that quite recently, and goodness knows what wonders of imagination they have already accomplished.

Mr. Speaker, we will try and reassure these good folks by saying to them: My good friends, in time of peace there will hardly be any change. You will sell your eggs just as you did before. Only you will please to lay aside a little percentage out of each dozen, just a few cents, to enable you to pay the cost of those floating fortresses and the salaries of the great and high officers who handle them.

In time of war, your fleet will have to be protected by the British navy, or else it will soon be blown out of existence.

What amuses me, Mr. Speaker, is to hear all these great pacifists of 1896, to whom I shall refer presently, shouting 'To arms, Canadians! Nations are arming around us! The United States, China and Japan are arming themselves all around us! To arms, Canadians!'

Close your ears, dear hon. member for Maisonneuve. For polishing warlike implements and treating us to a smell of powder in time of war, such colonels as the hon. member for Vaudreuil have no equals.

What sounds rather strange is to hear such constant appeals to the memory of Cartier. Here is a statesman who by his death, gained a great deal of praise from hon. gentlemen opposite. Cartier was a far seeing politician. He has endowed his country with great and lasting benefits. But as far as defence is concerned, and I challenge contradiction on this point, I have no hesitation in stating that in his military legislation he never had in view anything further than the defence of Canada, his 'own beloved country.'

I am glad to notice the admission made here last night by the member for Laval (Mr. Wilson), that even if we were to strike out sections 17, 18 and 19 of the Bill, the fleet would have to take part in the imperial wars. Such is my own opinion and I must tell the hon. member that he is making my task quite easy, because my intention is to demonstrate that very fact.

Mr. WILSON. In case of emergency.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) At all events, Mr. Speaker, by keeping silent, I voted for the resolution of the 29th of March, and yet, I shall vote against the Bill. I shall also vote against the proposal in amendment. I am in favour of the sub-amendment and of that only.

On the 29th of March, the German peril was the outcry. The right hon. Premier said: Germany is preparing to treat England on the ocean as she has treated France on land in 1870. He recently stated at Toronto, and he repeated in this House, when he introduced his Bill, that the German peril had ceased to exist. If the German peril justified the resolution, we have no more need of the latter. The Bill itself has no more reason to exist, and neither is there any justification for the military navy.

The resolution referred to a Canadian naval service for national defence. The Bill contemplates a military navy which, in time of war, shall be put at the disposal of the empire.

In my estimation, national defence means the defence of Canada. I am a British subject, and I am proud of it. I am a Canadian, and I am doubly proud of it. Canada is a part and parcel of the empire, but within the empire, each component part has its duty especially assigned to it, and Canada's duty is the defence of our homes, of the country, for the country and for the empire, and for my part, when I speak of my country, I mean Canada.

If there is no more German peril, we have no need of being in such a hurry to establish this military navy and put it at the disposal of England. After all, is it likely that Canada will before long have a naval war on its own account? I do not think so. Evidently this fleet will only be useful for the wars of England. It will only exist for that purpose.

In time of peace it will not be useful. The hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Brodeur) stated at the imperial conference of 1907 that Canada had her boats for the protection of her fisheries. In time of war, will it really be useful to England? The question is disputed and is very doubtful. It will evidently be a fleet destined to serve in imperial wars and the efficiency of which will be more apparent than real.

I shall vote against the Bill because it involves the recognition of military imperialism, because it aims at having that principle recorded in our statute books. I shall vote against the amendment because it involves the same principle and because I do not admit that there is any emergency under the present circumstances. I do not wish to justify the motion of the leader of the opposition. I have just said that I am against it. But I believe, in all sincerity, that it does not involve such serious consequences as the government measure. It involves an expenditure not of $25,000,000, as stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, but of only 18 or 20 millions, the cost of two Dreadnoughts, without consulting the people, because it assumes that there is a case of emergency. Furthermore, the policy to be carried out later on would depend upon that appeal to the people. The proposal of the government involves an initial expenditure of 15 millions, with a yearly expenditure of $7,157,000. Then, everybody knows that this military navy will cost, later on, more than 100 millions, with a proportional yearly expenditure. And in that policy there is no provision for any emergency which might arise within three or four years. 'La Patrie,' a Montreal newspaper, which is in favour of the government's scheme, published the following despatch from Washington, dated January 14th last, which shows the extent of the consequences which may result from the policy to which the Dominion is being committed:

MILITARY NAVY.

This question is hotly discussed in the United States.

(Special despatch to 'La Patrie'.)

Washington, January 14,—The Canadian Navy Bill as introduced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier is being discussed with great interest in diplomatic and naval circles. While the diplomats hold that the present debate shows the dependence of Canada as regards Great Britain in case of war, the naval officers are of opinion that Canada is binding itself to an undertaking much more costly than her people think, and that the Canadian navy will have no importance unless the Canadians are willing to spend hundreds of millions of dollars. You cannot have a navy with a few vessels only. Such is the opinion expressed by a distinguished naval officer, and he adds that shipbuilding is not the only expenditure to be considered and that the recruiting of the crews and the general organization are sources of expenditure which call for the most serious consideration. Others express the opinion that it would have been preferable for Canada to have built six or eight vessels of the most modern type and to have made a present of them to England. A certain group even go so far as to pretend that the United States would defend Canada in case of war and that the Dominion had no reason to fear an invasion in the future. Sir Wilfrid Laurier having declared that any war with England means war with Canada, many persons are of opinion that any war with Canada would mean war with the United States.

The sub-amendment, which calls for a referendum to the people on a question of such importance, is the only proposal which meets my full and entire approval.

Personally, I believe that the policy to be followed by Canada is, and will be for a long time to come, the policy which has been followed ever since 1863, admitted by British and Canadian statesmen such as Gladstone, Disraeli, Salisbury, Sandfield, Macdonald, Cartier, J. A. Macdonald, Blake, Mackenzie, until the days of Chamberlain, and which is limited to the defence of our land, to the defence of the empire on Canadian territory, so as to entirely dispense the mother country from any such trouble and care.

Up to date, three different modes of contribution to the defence of the empire have been recognized and accepted, both by England and by the colonies. First, a contribution in money or materials. Secondly, a local fleet which, in time of war, shall be put at the disposal of the empire. Thirdly, certain local works, which, if they were not built by the colonies, would have to be paid out of the British treasury. Canada has adopted the last mentioned mode and has contributed to the imperial defence in that way until the present day. Now it is proposed to make a change and adopt the second mode of contribution.

If it is thought proper to do this, let there be an appeal to the people. It is only fair, and there is ample time to do it, for there is no more German peril, as admitted by the Premier himself.

Then, if it is found that, by reason of the circumstances, another kind of contribution must be given for the defence of the empire, it seems to me that there would be much to do and to settle previously, as between the empire and the colonies.

So long as the colonies have no voice in the chapter, and until they have their word to say in the council of the empire, which decides of war or peace, no system devised to make the colonies participate in the general defence will have any chance to live or to last.

For my part, I have very little confidence in this kind of vague, optional and indefinite support which certain colonies are now giving to the imperial defence, without ceremony, and in proportions more or less generous and accentuated, with ostentation, in certain cases, on the part of some colonies, as if they sought to humiliate others. It will not produce any durable affect unless it engenders friction, rivalry, hatred, dislocation and rupture of bonds which unite the colonies to the empire.

We are not a nation; we are simply a self-governed colony, making our evolution within the bounds which unite us to England with a proconsul who represents the point of junction. It is all very well to say the contrary in election time, to flatter the people, or after a banquet among the fumes of wine which lead to boasting, to overestimation, and to the burning of frankincense.

Our treaties are made through the intervention of the British diplomacy, our own ministers being, however, allowed to act freely, just as the master often allows his subordinate to act, and feels very much amused when he sees the latter put on airs as if he was a real ambassador.

Our constitution of 1867, defines our station, the part we are to play in the empire, determines our rights, our powers and our obligations. Thus, on the question under discussion, section 91, sub-section 7, traces our line of conduct—authorizes the parliament of Canada to create a militia and a naval service for the defence of the country —just as sub-section 5 of the same section authorizes the establishment of a postal service for Canada.

Under those powers, could we establish a postal service for New Zealand? Evidently not. Could we create a naval service for the defence of Australia? No more. Could we create a naval service for the defence of England, when our constitution authorizes us to do so only for the defence of our own country, Canada? I do not think so. Unless through a fiction, it were held that the defence of England is the defence of Canada. Such an interpretation would be improper and unacceptable.

We are a portion of the empire; but our duty, the part we have to play as concerns the defence is limited to Canada. Everything is restricted to Canada; to the defence of our own country we have but the powers which are delegated to us, and those powers allow us to legislate only for the defence of Canada.

The Militia Act of 1906 is based on those powers, and could be construed only in the light of those principles. So, in section 2 of the Militia Act, paragraph B, should the word 'emergency,' which means war, invasion or insurrection, real or apprehended, be construed as meaning a war; an invasion or an insurrection, real or apprehended outside of Canada, as in India, for instance? I do not think so.

As to the naval service, are we clothed with larger powers? No, it is the constitution itself which grants us that power. Why then should we take larger powers under this Act than those contained in the Militia Act passed by parliament in 1906.

Our Land Militia Act is known as: 'An Act respecting the Militia and Defence of Canada.'

The present Act should be intituled: 'An Act respecting the Naval Service and Defence of Canada. The words 'and defence' have been omitted and it merely reads: 'An Act respecting the Naval Service of Canada'

Subsection 7 of section 91 seems to admit of no other idea but that of defence; it seems to eliminate for Canada all wars except that undertaken for the defence of Canadian territory.

In the Militia Act there is no similar clause to clause 18 of the Naval Service Act. Still, under section 69, chapter 41, Revised Statutes of 1906, the Governor in Council may place the Militia, or any part thereof, on active service beyond Canada, as well as in Canada, provided it be for the defence of Canada.

When this Bill was brought down, it was stated that when England is at war, in any part of her empire, Canada is at war.

Theoretically, that axiom is true, in so far as Canada could be attacked; but practically speaking, it is neither correct nor should it be taken in an absolute and strict sense.

Then, there is a permit which should be well understood and made clear to us; namely, in case of war, when and where should Canada be set in motion, to participate in the war?

Under the constitution of 1867, according to the letter and the spirit of the Act, and the construction placed upon it, as well as by practice and custom, Canada, so far has never had to go to war, except for the defence of her own territory, while at the same time she participated in the defence of the empire, in compliance with the part she had to play, and as she had been called upon to do.

When Great Britain is at war, Canada is at war. Be it so; but there is a distinction to be made between civil or intestine war, and offensive or defensive war. Should a civil war in England or in Ireland, or an insurrection in India break out, would Canada be at war? I do not think so.

In the case of an offensive war of England, a war of conquest; say against Belgium, would Canada be at war? I say no. We are under no such responsibility, and we should beware of assuming any. Section 91, subsection 7, provides only for defence. A defensive war? Just so, the British North America Act provides for it and imposes upon us such responsibility. Let us defend the Canadian territory, within its limits and beyond those limits. Then if, by defending Canada, we happen to protect the empire, so much the better. Let us in that way promote the defence of the empire, according to our means and with all our strength.

In order to achieve this end, that is to say the defence of Canada, while at the same time protecting the empire, or vice versâ, we need no more provision than that which is already ambodied in the Militia Act. Under that Act we may defend Canada, by placing our militia on active service, even beyond the limits of Canada. Through a certain fiction of the law, we could even send our militia to fight on the coasts of England, should it be desirable to prevent an attack being made upon Canada by the enemy, we could send our troops ahead to fight against the enemy. Under the Act, as it is worded, the Governor in Council may simply declare that, in thus sending our militia beyond Canada, his intention is to prevent an attack being made upon Canada by the enemy and thereby to provide for the defence of Canada. The Governor in Council exercises that power and discharges that duty, under his own responsibility to parliament and that is all.

But because it would be justifiable for Canada in a defensive war, in a war waged by England upon a powerful enemy, to go to her assistance by contributing men and money, in order to prevent an attack being made upon Canada, it would not be warrantable to participate in a war of conquest, when Canada has no quarrel nor any ground for a quarrel, nor any fear of an invasion and it would be impossible to plead the defence of Canada.

Were the wording of this Act similar to that of the Militia Act, and especially were clause 18 eliminated, it would be just as easy to do with our naval forces what we are now doing with our land force, under the same responsibility. Those naval forces could be sent beyond Canadian waters to fight the enemy, and participate in the defensive wars in which Canada or the defence of Canada might be concerned.

Then there would be left no room for doubt; the control of the navy would be similar to that of the Militia; the constitution would be safeguarded and the present policy would be the very course followed by Sir George Etienne Cartier, whose name has been invoked, when this Bill was brought down.

In order to make of this Act the counterpart of Cartier's Militia Act, the preamble ought to be amended and clause 18 struck off; then the only thing it could be reproached with would be that it is from twenty to twenty-five years ahead of the times.

By embodying clause 18 into the present Act, this legislation is given an imperial character and it is thus intimated that the intention is to amend the Militia Act in the same direction, by introducing into it a similar provision. And the conclusion which is inferred therefrom is this: that the intention is to take part in all the wars of the empire, whether offensive or defensive wars; that the end aimed at is to establish solidarity between Canada and England; that the intention is to place Canada at the mercy of England, every time England may go to war; now, such a policy is at variance with our constitution, and cannot be applied, so long as the relations between Canada and the empire remain what they are, or the constitution remains what it is now, and so long as Canada has no voice in the council which will be called upon to decide those wars. It is the infringement of the principle: no taxation without representation.

If the defence of Canada is what is aimed at, while occasionally lending a helping hand to the empire, as I explained a little while ago, that could also be done without clause 18, by the Governor in Council under the ministerial responsibility. Then, clause 18 serves no useful purpose here.

The hon. Minister of Militia said the other day: 'For the navy as well as for the militia, there is no doubt that, in a case of emergency the Governor in Council would not want to take action till the meeting together of parliament. That would not be necessary and such is not the intention of the law. The militia may be called out for active service whenever required by critical circumstances, but the law provides for the meeting of parliament. Should parliament then pronounce itself against the action taken by the government, the ministers should resign.'

I think that this is the right construction. But what leads to confusion is that, on the 15th of November last, the right hon. the Prime Minister, when replying to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, said: 'My hon. friend also said that if we were to build a navy we would be drawn thereby into European wars. Need I say to my hon. friend that whether we have a navy or not, we do not lose our rights to self-government; that if we do have a navy, that navy will go to no war unless the parliament of Canada, including the hon. gentleman, choose to send it there.'

The doctrine propounded by the Minister of Militia seems to me sounder than that laid down by the Prime Minister. The Governor in Council takes action for the navy, just as for the militia, although the wording of the law be somewhat different; then parliament comes in and gives or withholds its sanction and there is an end of it. The meeting of parliament does not involve any other remedy; the downfall of the cabinet or their remaining in power. In time of war, it would be better not to drive the government out of power; and there would be nothing left but for parliament but approve and to pay.

It is none the less true that clause 28 which is not to be found in the Militia Act, as the Minister of Militia told us, is not necessary in order to empower the Governor in Council to call out the militia for active service, for the service of the King, for the defence of Canada, within the limits of the country as well as beyond those limits. Why then should that clause 18 not be eliminated from the Naval Service Act, and thus be deprived of its imperialistic character? Should that clause remain in this Act, undoubtedly it will be also embodied into the Militia Act and we shall have military imperialism, carried into action.

The hon. the Postmaster General, cited here, the other day a pretty definition of the word 'imperialism' given before the Canadian Club at Quebec by his Excellency the Governor General of Canada. Has the minister been entrusted with the special duty of imparting this precious definition to the House? I do not know, but all the same I congratulate him; he has discharged his duty very well. By the mouth of the hon. minister, as a preparation to his definition, Lord Grey tells us:—

> Is there in the world a people more privileged than the people who inhabit the fine province of Quebec? Your laws, your language are under the special protection of the British Crown. In return for so many privileges and advantages, the Crown exacts nothing from you except sentiments of loyalty. The word 'imperialism' does not imply active intervention from England in the government of this country; the word 'imperialism' symbolizes the power of each of the units of the empire and absolute unity in each of these units.

I desire to say to the hon. minister, whether he be or not authorized to express the views of the noble lord: Our feelings of loyalty in the province of Quebec towards the British Crown are well established and they cannot be shaken. We were loyal in 1775 and in 1812, we are loyal to-day and we will die in loyalty. We regret, however that certain parties seem constantly to question that feeling of loyalty.

It may be quite true that the right hon. the Prime Minister may in former times have said more than he should during his travels to Boston in the matter of annexation.

The Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER. (Translation.) Annexation?

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Independence.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) Annexation. . . At least that is what I understood, that at that time independence meant annexation; but that should not be counted against us. He was at that time in the cold regions of the opposition; those were days of rampant democracy, as Mr. Bourassa says, when the premier himself despised medals and badges which he called 'tin pot decorations.' He desired to scale the heights of power; that was all. Times have changed.

Let us return to imperialism, a word which does not mean loyalty. There is a great difference between them. In spite of the euphemistic and optimistic definition of the word imperialism that I have just read, in spite of all my loyalty, I decline to accept any such definition any more than I could be made to accept the doctrine of free trade in the name of loyalty. I cannot avoid stating that military imperialism is the enemy of Canada and of the empire.

The Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, father of that doctrine, has given us a different definition. 'Imperialism or the empire,' says he, 'is trade and trade is the empire.'

But in truth imperialism as it is sought to impose to-day is a union, a solidarity between the colonies and Great Britain for trade, defence and war, under imperial control and dominion, without representation of the colonies in the councils of the empire which decide as to peace and war, it is, therefore, militarism begetting pauperism as it exists in Europe and particularly in England; I repeat it, such an idea is inimical to Canada.

It is also inimical to the United Kingdom and to the empire, because it will end by bringing about the disaffection of the colonies.

Great Britain lost her finest colonies in 1776 because she sought to impose upon them 'taxation without representation.'

What difference is there between the taxation of the colonies for the benefit of the empire. . . . . the direct method of taxation, and that which consists in obliging them to tax themselves for the maintenance of armaments to be used in defense of the empire and for wars of the empire? Is it not the same thing under a less forbidding aspect, that is imperative, ruinous hideous taxation?

The fact is contrary to the principle of autonomy, whether it be sought to force the payment of the money directly or indirectly by the maintenance of ships of war, that fact remains unaltered.

As far back as 1778, by the statute 18, George III, chapter 12, England, repealed the tax which caused all the harm in the thirteen colonies and consented to molest them no more; but this came too late to put an end to the revolution; the cry of independence had been raised. The effect was useful, however, as concerned the other colonies. England adopted a magnificent colonial policy resting upon the principle of autonomy and the most absolute colonial liberty, the control exercised by the metropolis became gradually less tangible and more and more of a moral influence. This was the secret of the success of England's colonial policy; and what a splendid policy it was! Colonial autonomy, defence of the colonies at their own expense and consequently at a cost correspondingly less to the British government. By this system, the British fleet was untrammelled, the immense British domain could be freely patrolled, commerce protected and food stuffs brought in for the inhabitants of the British isles, while a base was to be found at every fortified colonial post.

The consequences of a return to the former system might be most unfortunate. The Anglo-Saxon resents the idea of taxation without representation. Empires do not exist eternally. The British empire has been preserved by its wise policy and if in the future that policy is abandoned for that followed by other empires, its fate may also be the same. The new system will not last as long as did the old.

When the military budget of Canada becomes unduly large—it represents at present $7,000,000 for the militia alone,—when the present Bill becomes operative, 15 or 16 millions will be expended for the building of the fleet and the annual expenditure for the fleet will be about $7,157,000, with a gradually progressive increase; this will be a yearly sum of $14,157,000 which will probably be doubled within a few years. The amount is enormous if it be considered that not quite half a million is voted for agriculture. When the war budget of Canada shall have reached the proportions of that of an independent nation, when Canada has a fleet, Ontario may begin to grumble as well as Quebec and the west, the cry of independence may be raised. It may be that the cry may not at first be raised by a Canadian from Quebec, but that it may originate in the other provinces for history repeats itself, and the liberty cry in 1837 and 1838 came from Mackenzie as well as from Papineau. The breaking of the colonial bond will then be close at hand. The burden of war will have proved too heavy for a young country obliged to attend to its population, organization and development, while at the same time furnishing money, men and blood for the wars of the empire.

The blue book: 'Naval and Military Defence of the Empire' is not an ordinary official publication; it is a plan, a programme, imperialism in action.

Everything seems to be determined, concerted, decided, ordered and settled. All these polite suggestions and requests are none the less formal and imperative, and I see there written in letters of fire: You must bend or be broken.

That programme will be adopted, the Bill will pass, soon the Militia Act will be so amended so as to place our land forces on the same footing as those we have on the sea.

When our army and navy are so organized that at the slightest invasion, insurrection or apprehension in India, for example, they may be placed at the disposal of the imperial authorities, or rather when, in time of war, they will always be at the disposal of the empire, our autonomy will be a vain word, it will have ceased to exist.

Hon. J. BUREAU. (Translation.) Will the hon. member allow me to put a question?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) Certainly.

Mr. BUREAU. (Translation.) The hon. member fears that our autonomy will have ceased to exist as soon as we have a navy, yet he asserted a moment ago that this autonomy did not exist and that it was spoken of only on the hustings and at banquets where the fumes of wine had let loose men's tongues.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) There is a great difference between the two positions. We have autonomy, but not that independence as a nation of which so much has been said. That is a boast to be used on the hustings and at banquets. We are not an independent nation since we are under the control of a governor appointed by England.

In fact, in order to comply with the suggestions of the military and naval authorities of Great Britain, we are creating a fleet to be used by England in time of war, and can it be supposed that in any case of war those forces would be withheld from the very purpose of their creation. Such a contention cannot be seriously sustained.

When Canada builds a fleet at England's request to help in time of war, that fleet will go to war every time there is a war. That is certain.

Such a conclusion is the more easily reached if it be admitted that the word 'may' is imperative when the prerogative of the Crown or the execution of the laws and wishes of parliament are concerned.

An argument in favour of this interpretation is found in the wording of the Bill. On examining closely sections 17 and 18, the following words will be found at the end of section 17: 'or when it is considered advisable to do so;' these words have been omitted in section 18, as it was desired to get rid of the restriction.

Then, in time of war, will any government or cabinet be found to give it any other interpretation? No, never. If in time of war, it were sought to make the word 'may' imperative, as will invariably be done, will anybody object to such an interpretation? No, never. The present Prime Minister will be the first so to interpret it, if we may judge by what he did at the time of the Transvaal war.

The word 'may' in section 18 is, therefore a mere delusion.

The programme is being carried out and it will be carried out. Not with good grace.

I would be unjust if I stated that the prime minister bows gracefully to this necessity.

On the contrary he complies with a very bad grace and I believe that he is acting against his better judgment. He may be doing so unwillingly, but he is complying none the less. He is an imperialist, albeit an unwilling one and while denouncing imperialism——

Mr. LAPOINTE. (Translation.) Will the hon. member allow me to put him a question?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) With pleasure.

Mr. LAPOINTE. (Translation.) The opponents of the navy bill in the province of Quebec contend that there is an understanding between the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition on this question.

I would like to have my hon. friend's opinion on the question.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) My answer to my hon. friend is that on this side of the House, we are allowed to entertain different views from those of our chief. I do not know if they enjoy the same privilege on the other side, but we have it here.

Mr. LAPOINTE. (Translation.) That is not an answer to my question: in your opinion does an understanding exist or not?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) I know nothing about it; I was not there.

Mr. LAPOINTE. (Translation). Mr. Bourassa was the only one present, I suppose.

Mr. PAQUETTE. (Translation.) My hon. friend could ask that question from the right hon. getnleman.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Translation.) There is none.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) There is two kinds of imperialists; those who profess imperialism openly, avowedly; they stand erect and are moved by their convictions; they are entitled to our respect. Others wear masks and disguises; they think that they are obliged to preach imperialism in a spirit of conciliation, not to say of weakness; they are to be pittied, to say the least. I am inclined to think that on the present occasion, the right hon. Prime Minister is an imperialist against his will, as he has been in 1899, when he sent volunteers to South Africa.

We all know that he sent volunteers to South Africa, after having solemnly declared that he would not send any. He had to let them go grudgingly. In the bottom of his heart, he cursed that war, but he took part in it because he was compelled to do so.

Mr. NANTEL.

On the 17th January, 1901, at the New Reform Club of London, the Hon. Lloyd-George said: 'The Prime Minister of Canada, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in a public speech, the other day, stated that Canada was an independent nation, and yet, that colony pretending to be independent has sent troops in South Africa to crush down the independence of men who have an equal right to the independence that Canada claims for herself.'

Later on I have heard the right hon. Prime Minister eulogize that campaign and state that the Boer war was a just one. I did not suppose then, and I do not suppose to-day that he was in earnest; his mental tendency does not lean that way. If he became convinced, it is by persistent efforts and under the strain of circumstances. The right hon. gentleman, it is my sincere conviction, is an imperialist against his will, and what is more astonishing, is that he speaks against the imperialists.

But I say without the least hesitation that the most dangerous of all imperialists are the disguised imperialists, because people are not on their guard, because they do not show their hand, because they instill their doctrine drop by drop, as a deadly poison.

Unhappily, the province of Quebec has sent here to many adepts of that doctrine, imperialists against their will, disguised imperialists, ever ready to bow passively at the command of the big chief, and not enough, on this side of the House, of anti-imperialists to check effectively the tendencies of the ultra-imperialists.

Mr. Jules Edouard Prévost, editor of 'L'Avenir du Nord' of Saint Jerôme, whose liberal orthodoxy cannot be doubted, Mr. Prévost, the recipient of numerous favours from both Liberal governments, the bestower of patronage in the county of Terrebonne . . . .

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) And who is to-day a member of the Council of Public Instruction.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) . . and who in that capacity, sits with the bishops of the province. Mr. Prévost has been appointed lately to the Council of Public Instruction, by the Hon. L. Gouin, Prime Minister of the province of Quebec. Mr. Prévost is a good Liberal, a descendant of the 'Lions of the North,' who have fought the battles of the party in that part of the country since 1854. That same Mr. Prévost has conscientious scruples about that naval service Bill. Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to quote what that gentleman wrote on the question, and my hon. friends from the other side will not complain that I quote only Conservative papers. The following editorial was published on the 21st January last:—

NAVAL SERVICE BILL.—A DESIRABLE AMENDMENT.

Mr. Prévost begins by a comparison between sections 69 and 71 of the Militia Act, and sections 18 and 19 of the Naval Service Act, and says:

The Militia Act is intended for the defence of Canada, the Naval Service Act is intended for the wars of the empire generally.

Since we are not admitted in the councils where the wars of Great Britain are decided, since we are not represented in the British diplomatic service where international conflicts originate, we think that it should be left to the Canadian Parliament to decide on the opportunity of our participation in the wars of the empire, before the government can dispose of our ships and our men.

We base our theory on the old english saying 'No taxation without representation.'

The help that Canada might decide to give to the mother country will never be so necessary and urgent that the Governor in Council will not be in a position to foresee the situation early enough to call Parliament together before interfering.

It would be quite different if the defence of our territory was in question, and we see no objection to section 69 of the Militia Act, nor to section 17 of the Naval Service Act, where the power granted to the Governor General in Council affects exclusively the defence of Canada.

In our opinion the order in which sections 18 and 19 are given, should be charged so as to give parliament the undeniable right, before engaging Canada to decide upon the opportunity of our participation to a war of the empire declared without and perhaps, against our parliament's consent.

In that way we should preserve our autonomy without disowning our obligations.

And further:

Our rights and our obligations would be more in accord. That is all.

So much so, that the Bill, so drafted, would be more in conformity with the national policy so ably and so energetically pursued by Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

You will please note that the question here is not as to the principle of the Bill, but as to its application.

Just as we have openly and firmly recognized our obligations towards Canada and our ally Great Britain, we proclaim with the same energy, the same frankness, our sacred rights, as a self-governed country.

We do not retract a single word of what we have published on the question of a Canadian navy. As a citizen of Canada, as an ally of Great Britain, we see in that proposition a necessary obligation which Laurier will make as light as possible for the country.

And further again:

But we want and we ask that Canada upholds her right to judge and her freedom to act

That is a fundamental principle that Laurier has affirmed more than once and that should not be departed from.

The government, it is true, are responsible to parliament who will approve or disapprove their decision taken in 'critical circumstances.'

We concede that. We also admit that the Bil, as drafted, does not completely fail to recognize the legitimate exigencies of our autonomy. But, if parliament must be consulted, why not consult it before the country is involved in an imperial war, rather than after?

We say it again it is not possible to suppose a case...

Here is the conclusion:

This objection is a serious one, but not without a resolution.

Let parliament be called together before all participation from our port, in a war of the empire, and let it decide by a division taken 24 hours later, if yes or no, Canada ought to participate in that war.

In asking that the Naval Service Bill be so amended, we are inspired by the broad British principles upon which rest our constitution and our autonomy, and we were greatly surprised to read in the speech delivered in the House of Commons by the leader of the oposition, Mr. Borden, on the 12th January last, the following sentence:

J'ai été un peu surpris de la déclaration que le très honorable premier ministre a faite dans les premiers jours de cette session lorsqu'il a dit que si nous créons une marine canadienne, que cette marine ne prendrait pas part à aucune guerre de la Grande-Bretagne avant que ce parlement y donne son consentement. Je suis heureux de voir que mon honorable ami abandonne cette attitude aujourd'hui, si je le comprends bien.

Contrary to the views entertained by Mr. Borden, we deplore that change of front.

We believe that all Canadians subjects, be they English, French, Irish or Scotch, would be unanimous to approve a law reserving to the Canadian parliament, the right to give its consent before saddling the country with the burden of a war, and the most painful of all contributions—the contribution in blood.

Once more we say: No taxation without representation.

I am free to admit that the situation is a difficult one, that the right hon. gentleman stands between two fires. I can understand that he thinks it proper for him to be more or less nebulous as said Mr. Bourassa, to conceal, to dissemble his thoughts.

It is not an easy task to build a navy which Canada does not need and will not need before twenty or twenty-five years; to build a navy for Great Britain, to comply to Great Britain's exigencies, to Great Britain's injunctions, given in the form of suggestions, and to say in the same breath that this navy will or will not participate to the wars of the empire, as the parliament sees fit. Surely it is very hard for one to preach military imperialism, to lay down its most fundamental principle, and to say and make believe that one is fighting military imperialism.

On such occasions, one must accomplish wonderful feats and display a prodigious suppleness; one must have recourse to biblical language and indulge in parables. One must even go to the length of borrowing the words of Jesus of Nazareth who, knowing that the end was near at hand, was weeping over Jerusalem.

But instead of going to Jerusalem, the right hon. gentleman went to Toronto, and there he exclaimed: Oh, Toronto! oh, Toronto! thou that killeth the prophets, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings! Cannot you see the scene from here, Mr. Speaker? The good people of Toronto, sticking to the sides of the leader of the government, and the right hon. gentleman, trying to warm them up under his wings. During the process, he gives them a lecture on feudality in the Middle Ages; he explains the meaning of sovereignty and suzerainty. But the good people of Toronto, were not satisfied, and did not understand him. And now, it is the prophets of St. Jérôme, represented by Mr. Prévost, which do not understand him, and threaten to disregard his teachings.

Sir, the war fleet is established and created as a help for the wars of the empire, and evidently to be placed in the hands of the imperial authorities, in time of war, although this may not be mentioned in clause 18. And when parliament will have a chance to approve or blame the government, the fleet will be far away, wrecked and in the bottom of the sea perhaps.

But why speaking, what is the use of those texts which can be differently interpreted? Why, sir?

In order to keep the power of Quebec in her illusive hope and pay her with words; for the purpose of giving a chance to the Prime Minister to go and tell his good Quebec friends: 'My old friends, I built a war fleet, because I could not help it. But I did not forget you, just listen to me; that fleet is yours, she will not be called to help England except on your consent, when you will be willing to allow her to go, when your parliament will be willing to let her go.'

And in Ontario, to the people of Toronto, who kill the prophets, he will say: 'My friends, you know me, you understand better than that, I had this fleet built for the defence of the empire. It is the raison d'être of that war fleet. The fleet is England's property as well as my heart, my own being and my whole person, I am "British to the core."'

Why not playing the cards on the table, why not tell frankly what is the aim in view? If it were believed that it may be necessary to change the policy followed so far in this country as regards the question of defence, and that England really needs another participation different from that which Canada has given so far for the defence of the empire, and that she has a right to have it, let it be openly known; let us work effectively and endorse the responsibility of our action.

Would it be given through irony of fate, to the right hon. Prime Minister, he an imperialist in spite of his own will, to crown his work not with a national railway, but with a war legislation; with the institution of militarism, which he is to establish under the great principle of conciliation, a principle which he has adopted and wishes to follow to the end, and which will cause him to sanction a compulsory conscription, a compulsory military service in this country, if he would be called to do so by that government beyond the sea.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear!

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) Sir, the German peril? I find there are two German perils. There is the industrial and commercial German peril, the most dangerous for England. Canada is powerless against that peril. If England is not sound in that point, let her strengthen herself, and apply a suitable remedy. As for the other, the military peril, I do not believe in it. I am in good company, because I am with the Prime Minister.

The latter German peril sounds to me as an imperialist attempt. The noble Lords do not believe so much in the German peril as the endeavour to make others believe in it, because if they did so, they would not have opposed the Budget in a critical time, because such an opposition might have brought about a disaster, and fatal consequences for England. The return to power of the Hon. Lloyd-George has decidedly convinced me that the people of England are not so strong believers in the German peril as we are in Canada. I am positive that at least the majority of the English people does not believe in it, and that same majority of the people of England is not so fond of imperialism and militarism as we seem to be in Canada. And I cannot but help to come to this conclusion, when I think of that Lloyd-George, whom the English people have returned to power, that Lloyd-George who never missed a chance to protest with his eloquent voice, against the South African war, and who was, they say, so cynical as to scoff the British troops' defeat. Since that time, the English people was kind enough to give him his confidence and maintain him in power, as a consequent reward. I do not believe in the German peril, because France will not consent to the desertion of England, although England closed her arms in face of France's disaster in 1870; because I believe in the European equilibrium which is worth something better for national peace than the school of peace; because, those who are the opponents of ancient and modern butchery are gaining ground. Imperialism is the enemy, and is called to do more harm than profit to England; it might hasten the German or any other similar peril.

Sir, shouting again and again, with all means, here and there, everywhere: Let England rule the waves, let her hold her supremacy on the seas; she must have it, it must be her own against all comers; supremacy is her right! And for such a maintenance of supremacy, let her group all her colonies around her and be furnished with fleets and invincible armies.' All that noise is, in my opinion, wrong diplomacy. The principle is lovable, but it was useless to blare it out so loudly. If they had maintained it quietly, I mean that supremacy on the seas, and had taken the necessary means for its maintenance, without awakening up all echos, I believe the result would have been better. All that noise has contributed to the fast building of Dreadnoughts by the rich and powerful nations, and that state of things may finally weary the two countries, if they keep on so sturdily. Moreover, if, at the present time, those untimely roarings, those appeals to the colonies, would be put to an end if we showed more calmness and self-control, it could likewise stop.

A wise and loyal Englishman. who offers no ground for suspicion—I speak of the editor of the 'Witness,' of Montreal—wrote what follows:—

Those who use this argument surely fail to see that there is in it a challenge to all the other nations, that it call for hostilities at their address, individually, a provocation to dispute Great Britain's supremacy if possible. There is in it a claim which is impossble to keep up if the nations, including the United States decided to set against it. It is impossible to make, without proof any statement of a more dangerous or injurious nature than this to Great Britain.

Justice and fair play do more honour and give more credit to a nation than the armaments and Dreadnoughts. It is this justice and this British fair play that gives Great Britain its force more than would do its men of war. Let England keep and firmly hold its supremacy on sea, but it must not be boasted of too much. On the contrary, let her be seemingly ignorant of the fact and conduct herself with other nations as though she was not superior, or as if she was ignorant of that supremacy. By this means she may keep it longer. As soon as this justice and this fair play become an object of suspicion to other nations, there could be no possible supremacy. In life, a man who defies everybody finds his superior. Napoleon had for a long time European supremacy, he at last found his way to Ste. Hélième through Waterloo. The grouping of colonies around England with their Dreadnoughts will defy other nations.

I believe that the imperialists who wrote a lot of things besides their appeal to the colonies, and in so saying could lead people to the belief that there is some weakness about England, and such being only in their own imagination, do a very bad turn to the mother country. There is no worse enemy than an imprudent friend to a nation or a policy.

On this subject Mr. J. A. Macdonald, editor of the Toronto 'Globe,' chief organ of this government, one of the delegates to the imperial conference of the press in London last June, relating his voyage impressions and his visits in the streets and suburbs of London and other English cities, has been one of these imprudents in making following picture:

The thing, he says, that impressed me most, the thing that stands out as the background of every reminiscence, was the bloodless, mirthless, hopeless face of the common crowd. He declares that the pale, sunken faces of the nameless city crowd haunt one like a weird. He says: We could not shut our eyes or steel our hearts to that Britain which is out of work, which may not even want to work, and which has long forgotten how to play.

The social problem in England, Mr. Macdonald says, everywhere is appalling almost to the point of despair. Wherever we went, it forced itself upon us. The least dangerous aspect of it was that hollow-eyed procession of the homeless of London kept moving along the pavements by the police in the early dawn, waiting for the opening of the soup kitchens. London, Sheffield, Manchester, Glasgow, Edinburgh—each had its distinctive features, but everywhere the marks were deep of disease and degeneracy in body and mind and morals.

In some of the smaller places where the industrial percentage is large, Mr. Macdonald continues, or the occupation unhealthy—as in the black country or the pottery-making communities—the blood-poisoned workers present an appearance that to unaccustomed eyes is simply ghastly.

In places like Portsmouth, where we drove through the streets after viewing the greatest array of warships ever presented in the whole world's history, the human sediment that littered the doorways and lanes crowded out of mind all thought of Britain's glory.

It was hard to exult over the spectacular realism of the sham-fight on the shore with those haggard skeletons of lifes real conflict shuffling before our eyes uncheered and uncheering on the street.

Mr. Macdonald adds: 'Sheffield staggered all the delegates. Its residental districts and its neighbouring hills are good to see. It is a hive of industry. Its name the world over is a warrant for good steel. But its human specimens! The conditions of the poor may, perhaps, be worse in other industrial centers in England, but certainly no delegate to the imperial press conference had ever seen the like in any white country overseas or even imagined it possible within the limits of human nature.

He says again: 'What struck every observant delegate was the utter blankness of the faces that looked up at us from the pavement, or down on us from the windows, with scarcely enough capacity for human interest to wonder who we were or what we wanted. Block after block it was the same. Never a sign of humor. Never even a flash of human envy. Stooped shoulders, hollow chests, ash-coloured faces, lightless eyes, and ghastliest of all, loose-set mouths with bloodless gums, and only here and there a useful tooth. Literally hundreds of women between seventeen and seventy crowded close to our motor cars that day, and the marks were on them all. Those toothless mouths of men and women and children told the story. One touch of disease made the whole crowd kin. 'What do you think of it?' asked a London reporter of a Canadian editor. 'It's hell,' said the Canadian. And his companion from Australia could not suggest any other fitting word.' Finally Mr. Macdonald says: 'How long will a great nation go on breeding weaklings? How long will such a nation remain great? And how long will it be counted safe for Canada to admit the human output of Britain's drink-cursed slums?'

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, such statements cannot be justified. I rejoice that their author is not a French Canadian from the province of Canada. If they are without foundation, their author is guilty; if they are founded on fact, he is indiscreet. If that description corresponds to reality, the inference is that an economic and social reform is of greater urgency in England than armaments or the building of Dreadnoughts. Because, after all, such specimens of the human race are not likely to spread terror in the enemy's ranks, even with the help of any number of Dreadnoughts.

And that reform, it is the British authorities who are in a position to effect it, not the colonies. There are numbers of landlords in England holding large areas, in some cases extending over 175,000 acres, while swarms of human beings fill the suburbs and slums of London and other British cities. If only those great landowners would dispose of those lands in favour of the people and workers, recruits would be forthcoming as by magic from all parts of England. It is in the ranks of the ploughman who tills the land at the sweat of their brow, that soldiers are to be obtained ready to fight like lions for the defence of the territory in time of war. As for us in Canada, who have nothing to do either with pauperism or militarism in England, let us endeavour to keep aloof from both these scourges.

I oppose with all my might such legislation; I openly expres my opinion, I would express it in the same manner in Ontario and in western Canada, as well as in the province of Quebec. In doing so, I do not consider myself disloyal to the British Crown, neither am I appealing to race prejudice.

I shall now read an extract from the 'Daily News,' of Peterborough, dated the 27th December last:—

The French Canadian newspapers, without exception, are decidely viewing this question from a narrow race standpoint. They are repugnant more than ever to the idea of closer relations with the empire. French Canadians are breaking party ties to subserve race interests. Should it be necessary in connection with this issue to go on the battlefield, we are ready. Canada is part of the British empire; any attempt to change that state of things, will terminate in war.

I shall not express any opinion regarding the author, as I do not wish to say anything disagreeable. I shall be content with stating for the information of the 'Daily News' and other papers, which had taken the lead in that kind of thing, that such writings are not likely to improve matters and forward their view of the case. The French Canadian Conservatives of the province of Quebec are not breaking away from their party; they remain faithful to the policy followed by Macdonald, Cartier and Sir Charles Tupper when the latter lived in Canada. The French Canadian Conservatives of Quebec are not changing their policy; those who are open to the charge of so abandoning the old policy are imperialists of to-day, who no longer follow in the footsetps of the statesmen I have mentioned.

The views I have expressed have partisans and advocates outside of the province of Quebec, and why should not the people of the province of Quebec have the liberty of making known their opinions on a question of such importance. Why, who would expect us to put up with the denial of such a right?

The French Canadians of Quebec have never spoken nor written on the subject in stronger language than some Ontario people, for instance, contributors to the 'Weekly Sun,' of Toronto, the 'Farmer's Advocate,' 'Farm and Dairy,' 'The Grain Grower's Guide,' Prof. Marshall of Queen's University, Prof. McCurdy of Toronto. The latter is not a resident of the province of Quebec, and his opinion cannot be lightly set aside, holding as he does professorship in a university of the standing of that of Toronto. The same may be said of Prof. Marshall of Queen's. I shall read a letter which Prof. McCurdy wrote to the Right Hon. Prime Minister on November 11 last. It is rather long, but I am anxious it should apear in 'Hansard':—

Canada and the World's Peace.

Prof. J. F. McCurdy has addressed the following open letter to the Premier:—

The Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Premier of Canada:

Dear Sir Wilfrid,—I venture to address a few words to you and to as many as may be of the people of Canada upon the question of the creation of a Canadian navy, because, so far as I have seen, no attempt has as yet been made to set forth in a succinct form the most obvious arguments against the immediate building of a navy from the standpoint of the common people of our country. To be as concise as possible, I shall present the statement in a series of propositions:

1. In all our conferences with the imperial government, and in all legislation affecting matters of imperial concern, our first consideration should be regard for the well-being of Canada, for the sake of Canada herself, and also more remotely but not less really for the sake of the empire. Loyalty is good, but patriotism is better. We have no direct responsibility for the empire as a whole, whose policy we cannot control, and whose real and fancied difficulties we have done nothing to bring about. We are responsible to our fellow-citizens for the destiny and fair name of Canada. Canada is the home of our people and our most sacred trust, and where our treasure is there will our heart be also.

2. Expenditure upon Canadian war vessels, such as will ultimately satisfy the demands of agitators in England and Canada that hold the popular ear, will go far to ruin our country financially, just as the present draft upon the people of England is bringing England herself to ruin, according to the statement of the British premier. Let Canada avoid the malestrom while it is yet plain sailing.

3. The motive of the demand for a Canadian navy is not Canada's own needs, but the possibility of foreign wars, or rather of a foreign war, in which it is remotely possible that England may be engaged. We do not need warships to protect our sea coasts or lake shores. 'Our natural enemy,' the United States, is now regarded as our natural ally. She has also been recognized as the inalienable friend of England in declarations recently made by the English government in connection with the so-called two-power standard. On the other hand, we have constant occasions of friction with the government of the United States, which warships, in the place of revenue cutters, would render much more serious and perhaps dangerously irritating.

4. We have no voice in the making or unmaking of foreign wars, or in the policy of the empire generally. All the more should we consider our moral obligations both to ourselves and to the empire.

5. Our obligations and our self-respect as citizens of Canada make it out of place for us to involve ourselves and our children in wars over whose beginning, conduct and ending we have no control. To do so is to forfeit our Canadian birthright.

6. The fact that some of the wars waged by England, within our own recollection, have been of doubtful justification, makes it incumbent on us in every case to consider well the motives and grounds of England's wars before pledging ourselves to take part in them. To quote from an editorial in one of Toronto's dailies, 'the brain and brawn of Canada must have her quarrel just.'

7. The power now dreaded is Germany. A war between England and Germany would be the greatest crime and folly in modern history. Both the victor and the vanquished would be humbled and crippled almost beyond repair, and they would deserve and receive the condemnation of a war-cursed world.

8. If England and Germany go to war, both would be about equally to blame, because, apart from other considerations, principles and motives of humanity and tolerance will play little or no part, though these two countries have been the leaders of the world in Christian civilization. Canada cannot afford to aid and abet such a war by practically intervening at a moment of only half-abated national excitement.

9. What England most needs from Canada is not ships and money, but respectful, sympathetic counsel and possibly solemn warning. At this moment, the best way for us to 'think imperially' is to take account of England's obsessions of panic and other signs of national weakness and lack of self-control, which no munitions and men-of-war can counteract. England's worst enemies are not her armed competitors. Her foes are those of her own household. If a modern Isaiah were to arise in England, he might say of her: 'The whole head is sick and the whole heart faint.' Millions of England's population are unfit to serve their country with head or hand or heart, and that in large measure because of economic and social conditions fostered by those who are foremost in their clamour for a vigorous foreign policy. The most pressing question for England is not who shall fight her battles, but who shall do her work.

10. Canada is seemingly predestined beyond all other countries to a mission of peace and good-will to men. By systematic co-operation with England in military and naval expenditure and armaments our thoughts and impulses will be habitually turned to war, and, poisoned by international jealousy and suspicion, the most promising democracy which the ages have evolved will be diverted from pursuits of peace, and our country will be made a less desirable home for the war-burdened people of the world.

11. Germany is now held to be England's enemy. A few years ago France was placed exactly in the same position. Are England's supposed enemies always to be our enemies also? Are we always to think mechanically and automatically and along zig-zag lines? Let us try to see and think clear and straight on the deepest and the most vital problems of our relations to the empire and to the world.

12. It was at a time of panic in England that the original resolution of the Canadian parliament was adopted. Since then there has been some time for consideration. As we are not yet committed to the building of warships, the question should be taken up more soberly in the light of changed conditions. The arguments used by the advocates of the immediate construction of a Canadian navy consist largely of traditional generalities, and are chiefly addressed to the prejudices of our people, and not to their intelligence and reason. They have little regard to the lessons of the past and to the problems of the future—a fact which may be due to the substitution of a policy of death-dealing force for methods of tolerance and conciliation. Canada is being treated as an impulsive, half-grown boy, and not as a man, and a man of business. Let the people who have to pay the bills and bear the burdens of a national military policy have an opportunity to decide the question for themselves after calm and mature reflection.

Yours respectfully,
J. F. McCURDY.

8 Prince Arthur avenue, Toronto, November, 11.

Here is an extract from the 'Weekly Sun,' of Toronto:—

It would be scandalous if two hundred and some odd men, returned at a time when nobody even dreamed of the question, took on themselves to tie for ever the hands of 7 millions men.

The paper 'United Canada,' of Otawa, has just published the following:—

Under the influence of fear and frenzy, a government grown old and feeble, criminally binds a great country to a policy of corruption and graft at home, and of folly outside.

I have just quoted, Mr. Speaker, utterances not of Quebec French, but of Toronto and Ottawa people, and though a Quebecer, I have the right to repeat those utterances, and to state my approval of them, and that I do.

Especially do I congratulate Professor McCurdy, who shows his courage and talks Canadian patriotism and not only sentimentalism towards Great Britain.

I have said what I thought of the obligation on the part of Canada to contribute towards defending the empire, and I think I am in good company. I will add that in an urgent case and well characterized as such, in a defensive war and not in a war of conquest, each case to be considered according to circumstances, I would be in favour of granting the mother country a substantial aid, without laying down any principle for the future.

This is what has been done in the past. But as much as some are wedded to the idea of having parliament embody in our statute books an obligation towards the empire for the future, so much do I oppose the idea of inserting and sanctioning this principle without first consulting the people.

But we do not want any solidarity in the wars of the empire. We have no use for militarism, the curse of European countries. We are disposed to defend this immense country of ours so as to relieve the empire from that burden, as far as our strength and our needs will permit, and in proportion as it is necessary.

We have a military budget of seven millions already. We want our money to develop the country and our population, and to put ourselves in a position, when the time comes, though we hope it shall never come, to help England in a substantial manner and to receive here those of her children who wish to escape militarism and pauperism. Canada provides for her own defences, she is not a burden for the empire and has not been for many years.

She has a service of coasting vessels which has been deemed sufficient, as England has withdrawn, since 1870, her Atlantic and Pacific squadrons, so as the garrisons she used to keep at the naval stations of Halifax and Esquimalt, which are now defended and protected by our own soldiers, thereby leaving Canada without any other defence but her own.

Sir Charles Tupper was quoted in the course of this debate. I shall also quote him, but I shall quote him as he spoke in 1893, when he was in his prime, when he was merely a Canadian, before he had become a 'jingo,' and Sir Charles Tupper, as I shall quote him, said in Winnipeg on the 22nd of September, 1893, the words which I am going to read:

Note.—We add a few extracts from the speech of Sir Charles Tupper, translated from the 'Winnipeg Free Press,' September 22, 1893.

I deny that we are a burden to the empire. I say that if to-morrow Canada was dissevered from the Crown of England; if to-morrow Canada became a portion of that great republic which lies to the south of us, England could not reduce her army by a man nor her navy by a ship. She would want more soldiers and sailors and ironclads than she has to-day in order to maintain her prestige. I say if this great continent was closed, as closed it would be to the ships of England under the circumstances I have named, if they had no harbour in which to run nor a place where they could obtain a ton of coal instead of England being strengthened she would be enormously weakened. Her power in the Pacific, her posessions in India and China would be imperilled, and her prestige as a nation entirely changed. If Canada ceased to belong to her, instead of relieving her from any charge for diplomatic services or her army or her navy, it would impose greater burdens upon the taxpayers of Great Britain than at present. I deny that we are a burden. There is not a pound of British money spent in the Dominion of Canada from end to end for any Canadian purpose.

I have a word or two more to say with reference to the defence of the empire. They say why should Canada, with her enormous mercantile marine, her sails whitening every sea, not contribute from her resources to the defence of the empire? I say she does. I say Canada is discharging that duty nobly and well. No person holds more strongly than I do the unquestionable duty of every British subject, wherever he may be found, to contribute to the support of the defence of this great empire. If you are going to strengthen a fortification what would you strengthen? The strongest or the weakest part? Where is the weakest part? Is it in England, in the United Kingdom, or Canada, or Australia? No person can question that if England was engaged in war with any great power in the world they would strike, not in its strongest but weakest part and therefore if you wish to strengthen the defences of the empire, to increase the power, to resist invasion, the best way to accomplish this,—I have no hesitation in saying it is by looking after Canada. Those who say that Canada contributes nothing to the defence of the empire must be very ignorant of facts at all events, and I would recommend them to peruse a little of that very interesting literature contained in blue books.

Then he enumerates the great public works executed in Canada the Canadian Pacific Railway, the canals, etc.

But some might answer that these works were not done for that purpose but for commercial purposes. So much stronger our claim. The greatest the most important, the most vital question in connection with the defence of Canada, which means the defence of one of the most important sections of the Great empire, is to people it. This railway, although a commercial line, opens up this magnificent future granary of the world for settlement by stout hearts and strong arms, not only from Great Britain but by the best men from Scandinavia and Germany and Ireland to become settlers and as brave defenders of British institutions as native born Canadians.

Is not this assisting in the defence of the empire? There is no way of contributing better to this object than in this practical manner in which we are spending annually $10,000,000 for services of the most vital importance alike to Canada and Great Britain. I do not intend to detain you longer than to say I am quite sure it was only right for me to seize an opportunity—the only one I have had in Canada—to say something upon this question of imperial federation, and of pointing out what, in my judgment, is the fallacy and the mistaken policy of those who have adopted the line of advocating the unity of the empire upon a basis calculated, in my judgment not to promote that unity but to destroy it.

Mr. Balfour himself has already declared that even should the colonies of England be snatched from her, she could not dispense with a single one of her ships. The defence of Canada never obliged England to build a single ship more for her fleet or to spend one cent more for her budget, as far as the army or the navy was concerned. Canada has no enemy nor could she, for a long time to come, have another enemy but the United States, and England will never be at war with the United States for our sake. So as to help up towards settling our dispute with our neighbours, she might lend us her diplomatists but never would she lend us her warships.

If it is humiliating to accept the Monroe doctrine, it will not be claimed, however, that we should lose all the advantage of our geographical position and that this geographical position is not better than that of Australia and New Zealand, as far as Canada's defence is concerned. Should we build the Georgian Bay canal, should we put ourselves in a position to favour the English people with a rebate of two or three cents on every bushel of our western wheat, we would render England a more important service than by building up this war fleet.

Mr. Speaker, how times have changed! I am told by the older members of this House that, formerly, it was hardly possible to discuss this question of imperialism, even the most inoffensive part of it, such as commercial imperialism, without running the risk of speaking to no purpose, before empty seats. To-day, the most complete military imperialism is warmly discussed. Mr. Speaker, before the question of military imperialism was raised we should have had commercial imperialism. But we are far from commercial imperialism, because the kind of imperialism which we have to-day is but an 'ex parte' commercial imperialism where Canada concedes and gives without getting anything in return.

We have favoured England commercially, by granting her goods preference duties on our markets as against similar goods of other countries. And the other country, in order to please her own traders and cattle-breeders and to protect them while preaching against protection, to protect them, I say, against Canadian competition, continues steadfast keeping the 'British embargo' in existence against our Canadian cattle, at the risk of defaming it and of leading the world to believe that our Canadian cattle from the west, the driest and the healthiest country on the face of the earth, is contaminated and struck with dangerous diseases. I say again that our Canadian statesmen: Sir A. McKenzie, Sir George Etienne Cartier, whom the Liberals have vilified to such a great extent and upon whom they now rely in order to have the present Bill adopted, and Sir John A. Macdonald, have rejected this doctrine of imperialism at all times, and especially in 1863 and 1885. And it is more than probable that if Sir John A. Macdonald had been the leader of this country in 1889, our Canadian militia would not have gone to fight in South Africa. We are an integral part of the empire, but are we authorized, for that reason, to meddle with everything concerning the empire? I really think, however, that the intention is to have us meddle with the wars rather than with the affairs of the empire.

A few years ago, this parliament adopted a resolution of sympathy for the Irish cause and the Home rule, and that resolution was comunicated to the imperial parliament. We got an answer to the effect that we should meddle with our own affairs, and to-day something would be said against us if we thought, to some extent, of meddling with our own affairs.

If we are called upon to support together with the English people, part of the defence of the British Isles, called the heart of the empire, it is obvious that our lot, our task shall be more onerous than that of the population of the Isles. Our condition is, economically, different. The Isles are a country which is already built up and organized, their population has only to live and to defend itself, whereas, here, in Canada, everything remains to be done, created and organized. Will they help us doing that work? Yes, perhaps, by lending us money. But then, if they are rich enough to lend us money, they do not need us for their defence. It is said: 'this policy has been before the public for a long time.' What free and easy talk? What audacity? I was about to say: what shamelessness? Mr. Speaker, who has set before the country this war policy and this navy question for a long time? Is it the honourable Minister of Marine who, as another St. John the Baptiste, would have prepared the way to that war policy when he said, on the floor of this House, on the 22nd of April, 1896 (Hansard, session 1896, vol. II, page 6171):

Mr. Chairman, I cannot let the proposition now before us be carried, without protesting loudly against its adoption. The government asks us an estimate of one million dollars for the purchase of rifles.

It is sufficient that we need this million of dollars to pay a certain debt contracted towards the English government; debt that would have been contracted during this present session. I regret, Mr. Speaker, to learn that on this occasion the government had bought these rifles from the English government and not from an individual, nor from a particular company, but that he has bought these rifles from the English government and that the same government asks us to be repaid. Is that the kind of protection promised by England to Canada? Is that the situation which is destined for this colony? I think that we have the right to expect another treatment on the part of England.

Parliament is asked to spend this sum of $1,000,000, when our debt is already over 300,000,000 dollars. I think this debt is sufficiently high and that there is no use of propounding a jingo policy, and increasing by that fact, by a few millions of dollars the debt of the country without justifying in any serious manner the expense. I don't think that this expense is needed under the circumstances, and I, for one, I will strenuously oppose the vote of that sum.

And the elections of 1896 were made in the province of Quebec on that question, appealing to every prejudice against the Conservative ministry who had thought proper to spend $3,000,000 for the armament of our militia and the defence of Canada. And the most ardent and zealous in this campaign of prejudices were the Minister of Marine and a few friends whose names I will not mention because they have received their reward, some by seats on the bench and others by lucrative positions. The organ of these gentlemen, 'l'Electeur' of Quebec, superseded since by 'Le Soleil'; published amongst other extracts which I will read, an article to the applause and delight of all these gentlemen, the great peacemakers of the time, and to-day don't mind laying upon the country an expense of over fifteen millions for battleships, guns and rifles. 'l'Electeur' father of the 'Soleil' said this:

Why these armaments? Why fight for England?

Why all these armaments said 'l'Electeur' if we are not to have any war?

And why fight for England? Their electors must not forget that these high and great chiefs who are always anxious to show themselves more patriotic than are others, more loyal than others, always ready to launch the country into wars for the benefit of others, will not be those who will bear the burden.

These rifles, these guns, will have to be manned by the electors. You are looked upon as only fit food for cannons.

The Tuppers, the Angers, the Taillons will sit quietly in their cabinets, and will send you to death joyfully, while they will drink champagne. Once more why have all these rifles, these bayonets, if these Tuppers and Co. do not meditate some underhand work? They will send your sons to Africa or Asia whence they will never come back.

If you vote for the 'bleu' candidates, you approve of all these preparations for war. Does the government come to your help when some casualty comes upon you, either a flood or a fire? And they have spent $3,000,000 for rifles.

Vote for Laurier and his candidates if you want your country continue in peace, and we do not want to be sent some day to foreign countries, leaving at home our wives, our children, and our dear ones.

Spirit of 'l'Electeur,' spirit of Ernest Pacaud, how much you must have trembled when you saw Canadians departing for South Africa, not by the orders of those whom you were denouncing in 1896, but the supreme will of the right hon. Prime Minister, whom they admired and adored. They must also shiver on seeing this sinister juggling with millions, organized and prepared by the same first minister to burden this country with cannons, engines of war, murder and destruction, which so haunted with fear at that time the patriotic and ardent Pacaud.

Spirits of the Dorions, the Laflammes, the Jolys, the Merciers, the Marchands and the Frechettes, you must be tempted to cry from your outer world to the hon. gentlemen opposite: 'You vilify, you taint the memory of Papineau in your organ, 'Le Canada,' that Papineau, father of all of us who have praised him to the skies, Papineau the founder of the 'rouge' party in Lower Canada, and this only to demolish his grandson, because he refused to sacrify to opportunism, because he had the courage to remain firm and attached to the tradition of the past, and retain the liberty of speech of olden times.

Mr. TALBOT. (Translation.) It was the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton who attacked Papineau.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) You now exalt Cartier whom we have together vilified and despised, for the sole object of justifying your naval law with the Militia Act, which you misrepresent. You adore what you have burnt, and you burn what you have advised.

Have the ways not been prepared for this policy by the first minister, when, on the 15th April, 1902, he said in this House:—

It would be the most suicidal policy that could be devised for Canada to enter into the vortex in which the nation of Europe, England included, are engaged at the present time, and which compels them to maintain great military armaments. Sir, what is the relative position of Great Britain and Canada? Great Britain is one of the foremost nations of the world, in many way, perhaps, the foremost nation, certainly the head of the greatest empire which exists to-day, the greatest which has existed since the Roman empire. Great Britain, by reason of her situation, has to maintain a large and permanent army. Hon. gentlemen are aware how repugnant to the British people ever was the necessity of maintaining a standing army; hon. gentlemen are aware how the English people have constantly fought against that idea, but they have been forced by events, forced by the position the empire occupies in the world to maintain a standing army. To-day the principal item in the British budget is the expenses for naval and land armaments, and my hon. friend says that Canada should follow in the same course, that we should, that we should take part in a scheme of naval military defence! Sir, Canada is in a different position. Canada is a nation with an immense territory, but with a sparse population of five and a third million of souls, scattered over an area 3,000 miles in extent from east to west. The principal items in the budget of Canada are what? Public works, the development of the country, the construction of railways and harbours, the opening of ways of transportation. This is the work to which we have to devote our energies and I would look upon it as a crime to divert any part of that necessary expenditure, to the supply of guns, cannons and military armaments generally.

But we must be fair. 'Le Canada' of Montreal, a paper who looks solely through the eyes of the Prime Minister, who obeys at the lift of his finger, reproaches, in its issue of the 17th of February, to the 'Devoir,' the paper of Mr. Bourassa, that he does not quote integrally, quote the speaker of the Prime Minister in this circumstance, and specially to omit this part of its speech which I will read:

Certainly we must improve our own militia, and we have a scheme before us to-day for that purpose; we must look after our own defences. But there is all the difference in the world between undertaking this military expenditure and embarking in such a scheme as is embraced by my hon. friend's vast conceptions.

And also of not saying a work about the memorandum which the Prime Minister presented in London a few months after and which concluded in this way:

Presently the expenses of Canada for the defence of the country is limited to militia; the Canadian government is exposed also to bear some expenses for the creation of a marine.

Mr. Speaker, when making these declarations which I have read from the speech and from the memorandum, declarations which after all related only to the defence of Canada, has the First Minister declared that he intended to put them to execution so briefly? At a near date, and that it would be a part of the programme at the next elections, either of 1904 or 1908? Has he given to understand that the war navy would be put at the service of the empire in time of war? No, never, neither in 1904 nor in 1908, a single word has been uttered that would mean that. But in the meantime, in 1907, he said and his Minister of Marine said also: Let us begin by the Minister of Marine.

Colonial Conference, 1907, page 487, 8th May, 1907.

Mr. BRODEUR. There was a discussion in previous years to the effect that we should contribute something directly to the British navy. I may say with regard to that, there is only one mind in Canada on that question, and if it was necessary I should be able to quote the remarks made lately in an article published by Sir Charles Tupper, who is certainly one of the men best qualified to speak in Canada, upon the question. I think, perhaps, I might mention what he said in regard to that. He said: 'It is known that from the outset I have felt the interests of Canada and the true interests of the empire to be opposed to the demand for colonial contributions to the imperial navy,' and 'I maintain that Canada has discharged that duty in the manner most conducive to imperial interests.'

So it shows that both sides of politics in Canada agree with the policy which has been going on for some years there. He adds, also, in that article that 'Canada protects her fisheries by her own cruisers.'

9th May, 1907, p. 47. Dr. Smartt: Resolution.

That this conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the upkeep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—the contributions to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the admiralty, and as would best accord with their varying circumstances.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry to say, so far as Canada is concerned, we cannot agree to the resolution. We took the ground many years ago that we had enough to do in that respect in our country before committing ourselves to a general claim. The government of Canada has done a great deal in that respect. Our action was not understood, but I was glad to see the First Lord of the Admiralty admitted we had done much more than he was aware of. It is impossible, in my humble opinion, to have a uniform policy on this matter; the disproportion is too great between the mother country (you must remember they have no expenses to incur with regard to public works), whereas, in most of the colonies, certainly in Canada, we have to tax ourselves to the utmost of our resources in the development of our country, and we could not contribute, or undertake to do more than we are doing in that way. For my part, if the motion were pressed to a conclusion, I should have to vote against it.

And the resolution of Dr. Smartt was lost owing to the adverse attitude of the Prime Minister of Canada. And on his return the right hon. gentleman had the satisfaction of reading in his organs that he had saved Canada and Canadian autonomy.

It is evident, therefore, that the policy was not before the country, and had not been accepted by the Prime Minister, neither at the time of the 1904 election, neither at the time of the 1908 election; that neither he or his ministers were thinking of submitting it to parliament, since they never uttered a single word on the matter at either of the elections of 1904 or 1908. Indeed, they were opposed to it at the time. Not only that, but I have no hesitation in saying that the position taken by the right hon. gentleman during the imperial conference of 1907 accounts in a great measure for his success in the province of Quebec at the 1908 election.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

Mr. NANTEL

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NANTEL (Translation). Mr. Speaker, up to the time of the sending of a contingent to South Africa, in 1899, the Prime Minister was actually an anti-imperialist, and in no uncertain way, just as our Canadian statesman had been without distinction of party, in times gone by. In 1899, after flatly refusing, he gave way, he hauled down the flag, although still contending that such action should not be considered a precedent. Since then, he has time and again taken a stand against any participation on our part to imperial wars.

Mr. M. BEAUPARLANT. (Translation). Will the hon. member allow me to put a question?

Mr. NANTEL. Certainly.

Mr. BEAUPARLANT (Translation). Does the hon. member consider that the question of the building of the navy, which is now under discussion is the most important question that has come up in Canadian politics since 1902?

Mr. NANTEL. I believe so.

Mr. BEAUPARLANT (Translation). Does the hon. member approve of the stand taken by the hon. the Prime Minister at the conferences which took place in London in 1902 and 1907?

Mr. NANTEL (Translation). The policy followed by the Prime Minister in 1902 and 1907, as regards the navy has been approved, because it was on the same lines as that followed by all our statesmen.

Mr. BEAUPARLANT (Translation). If the stand taken by the right hon. Prime Minister at the conferences of 1902 and 1907 commended itself to the hon. member, and if the navy question is the most important that has come up in Canadian politics since that date, may I inquire from the hon. member whether in 1908 he was up for election as a supporter, or as an opponent of the government?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) The hon. member is perfectly well aware that I was not a candidate of the Prime Minister or I would not occupy a seat on this side of the House. As a matter of fact, I am at a loss to answer such a question, and I wonder if my hon. friend knows exactly what he is driving at?

Mr. BEAUPARLANT. (Translation.) You were returned as an opponent of the Prime Minister whose position you approved?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) The Right Hon. Prime Minister opposed me in the course of that election. He even came to Ste.-Thérèse and elsewhere, and was well represented by supporters of his. But the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe is perfectly well aware that not a word was spoken in connection with the navy at the elections of 1904 and 1908.

In 1902 and 1907, as previously stated, the Prime Minister took a decided and effective stand against militarism. But, in 1910, he gives up the sponge just as he had done in 1899.

Mr. Speaker, in years gone by, when the Prime Minister was sitting on this side of the House, he was fond, during the great debates of 1880 and 1884 on the question of the Canadian Pacific, of trotting in at all times his famous wizard, whose devilish incantations was to his mind the only satisfactory explanation of the policy followed by his then opponents.

Mr. GERVAIS. (Translation.) What wizard?

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) One moment and you will hear enough of him. On September 21st, 1880, he spoke as follows:

> Like the wizard in the legends whose life was at all times imperilled by the scratches and bites of his strange progeny, he has brought to life a monster who threatens to take his life at any time...
> They have taught us to look on the government as that servant in the Scriptures who answered every call and went whither he was bid.

In 1884, the right hon. gentleman once more called in his magician. I find the following at page 441, vol. 1, of 'Hansard' for 1884:—

> We can see no other reason than this, that the government are to-day controlled by a power mightier than they. They are like the wizard of old, who, through his incantations, gave life to a monster which made him its slave and in the end destroyed him. The government are in the hands of a company which it must obey, just as the servant in the Scripture, to whom his master said: 'Go, and he goeth; come, and he cometh.'

I thought it desirable, Mr. Speaker, to quote these utterances, even if it were the sole object of recalling to the right hon. gentleman old-time memories, and point out to him how unmerciful he was in his attacks on his then opponents. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that these evil spirits, these magicians, these goblins, will not trouble our public men of to-day, and flit about over their heads. That is my sincere prayer, and may the powers above grant it.

In regard to this important question, our friends on the other side show some anxiety as regards the province of Quebec, any hypocritical tears fill their eyes. They fear that through its present attitude, that province may put herself in a state of isolation. Indeed, these hon. gentlemen have become over scrupulous and wise. Fear is the beginning of wisdom; they have not shown the same reserve or nicety in the Manitoba school question, or in the Riel question, when the right hon. gentleman was intent on shouldering his 1837 musket; or again, throughout the elections, from 1896 to 1908 inclusive, when hon. gentlemen opposite made the most of the race and religion cry, crying out unceasingly to the electorate: Vote for a French Canadian, one of your own people, a Catholic who should be given a preference over a Protestant or Orangeman. Mr. Speaker, let me say to these gentleman in closing: You have sown the wind, you will reap the storm. When principles are lacking, expediency is the only door left open.

Mr. WILSON. (Translation.) Before the hon. gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. NANTEL. (Translation.) Go ahead.

Mr. WILSON. (Translation.) Does the hon. member for Terrebonne intend to support the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) at the next election?

Mr. NANTEL (Translation.) I may say in answer to the hon. member for Laval that on this side of the House we are free to differ from our leaders. We have opinions of our own. We stick to principles in preference to mere expediency.

Mr. CYRIAS ROY (Montmagny). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, at this late phase of the discussion on the Bill now before the House, I hope I am not expected to take up seriatim the various statements made by the previous speaker (Mr. Nantel) in support of the sub-amendment submitted by the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). However, I do not wish to leave the impression that the arguments, or so called arguments, brought forward by him are uncontrovertible, and with that object in view, I may be permitted to refer to a few of them.

The hon. member, I observed, opened his remarks by stating that he was in favour of the creation of a navy for the defence of our coasts, but not of a navy to be under the control of England. That statement seems to be for circulation in the province of Quebec; but in that case, it seems to me that instead of coming to the conclusion to which he has come, that is of voting in favour of the sub-amendment, he should have decided to support the Bill now submitted to this House considering that it provides for that very control of our government over the Canadian navy.

I shall now rapidly go over the notes I have taken while listening to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman for Terrebonne. He stated that the proposal made by his leader (Mr. R. L. Borden), if adopted, would lead to results less objectionable than those which would follow on the passing of the Bill. Nevertheless, he has just stated that he is in favour of providing a Canadian navy. Now, as we all know, the Bill provides for that contingency, while the hon. leader of the opposition contends, in his amendment, that the Bill is not far-reaching enough. That is the first inconsistency which strikes me in the speech delivered by the hon. member for Terrebonne.

Then again, the hon. gentleman says that under the British North America Act, this House has not the power to provide a navy for the defence of the empire, but solely for the defence of Canada. The hon. member is a lawyer, and a few words will be sufficient to show that—if he will pardon me for so stating—he cannot be taken seriously. The British North America Act was passed to define the respective powers of the Canadian government and of the governments of the various provinces making up confederation If, as the hon. member suggests, there is a provision in the Bill whereby the Canadian navy will be made to serve as part of the imperial navy, we are making a gift, and there is nothing in the constitution to prevent us from making such a gift to England. No such clause exists.

Mr. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Translation.) If my hon. friend thinks that we are making a gift to England in providing a navy which is to take part in the wars of the empire, he must approve also of the proposal of a money contribution, without involving the principle of imperialism. Does he really believe that we are laying down a principle of imperialism by making a gift to England in the shape of a money contribution?

Mr. ROY. (Translation.) I do not hesitate to answer no, and when I say that it is a gift, I am merely repeating the arguments of the member for Terrebonne in order to show their inconsistency.

Now, the hon. gentleman is of opinion that the Bill would be much better if clause 18 was struck out. But he holds that even then the measure would be premature. It seems to me that it is precisely that very clause which protects the rights that the hon. member wishes to preserve for the province of Quebec, for it is therein provided that the government reserves the right to send out the navy whenever it sees fit to send it out.

A great part of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Terrebonne aimed at showing that the leader of the government and all his supporters are imperialists. I believe that such remarks ought to apply to the hon. gentlemen sitting on his side of the House.

When speaking of imperialism, and when charging the members of the Liberal party with being imperialists, I believe that the hon. member has only been summing up and repeating what he thought he had from the members of the party with whom he is sitting.

He has used the words: 'No taxation without representation.' Well, is that an argument to use against this Bill? If adopted, this Bill, as submitted, will oblige us to build a Canadian navy, but it will be at our own expense. We are here as representatives of the people, and we have a right to decide whether or not we shall build a Canadian navy at our own cost.

Therefore, the argument, 'No taxation without representation,' is not applicable to the present case. The people are represented in this House, and we have a right to decide whether we will allow the government to build a navy or not.

I have a lot of other notes, but I do not wish to take up the time of the House by using them all. However, unless the hon. member is very hard to suit, he will find in my further remarks a full answer to the arguments adduced by him before this House.

The Bill now under discussion has been met by two amendments moved by the opposition. I would like to show to this House that neither of them amends anything, and to do this, I will take as a basis the allegations contained in these amendments and certain remarks made by those who spoke in favour thereof. I think I can prove that these so-called amendments are wholly inconsistent, that their conclusions do not derive from the premises laid down, and that their movers have not spoken as business men, but that their sole aim has been to court popularity.

But before doing that, if you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I intend to reply to certain criticisms, to refute certain charges made in the most gratuitous and overbearing manner against the Liberal members of this House, and especially against the members from the province of Quebec, by the nevertheless called hon. members from North Toronto, Jacques Cartier, Frontenac, and other members. These staunch champions of patriotism, of sincerity, and of all virtues, have suspected our sincerity. They have charged that our approval of the government measure can only be explained by promises of personal favours and favours for the constituencies we represent; that our opinion cannot be freely given. The hon. member for North Toronto even went so far as to say—forgive him that expression and forgive me for repeating it—that our faithfulness was only the faithfulness of a dog who barks to defend his master. Mr. Speaker, no time ought to be lost in replying to such utterances. It is better to leave them in the foul depths into which.

whoever has made use of them, has seen fit to dive in order to find them.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier, besides charging us with lack of patriotism, says that we are treating the present scheme in a childish manner. It is the hon. member himself, not us, who is acting like a child when he uses such an expression before any hon. member from Quebec has expressed his opinion before this House.

Mr. Speaker, although I am still a young member of this House, and perhaps because I am a new member and therefore need to establish my reputation in this House, I throw back to him this insult gratuitously aimed at his colleagues from the province of Quebec. We remember the history of our young Canada as well as he pretends to remember it. Our ancestors fought to vindicate our rights, that is perfectly true, but the gospel of recriminations which he has preached in his remarks will not be favourably received by the French Canadians in this country.

Administrators who have ignored our aspirations, have persisted in refusing to recognize our rights, but we were glad to find, later on that the British government, after having been fully informed as to the real situation, had recognized them. Is it good policy, under the circumstances in which the province of Quebec is to-day with regard to the other provinces, when we all admit that we are enjoying in this confederation an almost illimited freedom, to unearth the hatchet of war and to appeal solely to the French Canadians, as has been done by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier? Would it not be better, instead of trying to promote the sole interests of one political party, to let both French Canadians and English speaking Canadians consider this question from the standpoint of business, of Canadian interests, of a practical spirit of loyalty and justice? Before I was called upon to represent my constituents in this House, I had heard, in my own province such speeches as the one delivered by the hon. member. His new companion in arms is still making some. I allude to one who is well known in this House, who had the reputation of walking on the waters, but who, for all of that, often stoops to use prosaic expressions of his own in order to insure the triumph of his ideas—and I was under the impression that the English speaking Canadians were ill-disposed towards us. Allow me to state, Mr. Speaker, that I now hold an opinion quite different with regard to our fellow citizens who speak a language other than our own. I am not speaking now of the hon. member for North Toronto, nor of the hon. member for Frontenac, but I have noticed that here, we French Canadians from the province of Quebec, may obtain justice by appealing to the spirit of uprightness which characterizes the English Canadian element.

But, Mr. Speaker, I must fulfil my promise. I said in my opening remarks that I intended to dissect the amendments submitted, in order to ascertain whether, after having been thoroughly and impartially examined, they are found to contain any good. All honour to whom honour is due; I shall begin by the amendment moved by the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition.

I will take the first words of the amendment: 'The proposal of the government do not follow the suggestions and recommendations of the admiralty.' I do not admit that statement, but I will, for a moment suppose to be well founded, and there I will come to the conclusion, that if we are bound to follow the recommendations of the admiralty, there is no need of this appeal to the people, which the hon. leader of the Conservative party is asking, with the obvious object of coaxing another leader who has the reputation of being the leader of the numerous Conservative members from the province of Quebec. But I do not think this assertion is well founded, and among other proofs already adduced before this House by others than myself, I will add the following extract from the memorandum of the British admiralty paragraph marked 3, page 23 of the Report of the Proceedings of the Imperial Conference, parliamentary paper No. 29. It says:

> The various circumstances of the oversea Dominions have to be borne in mind. Though all have in them the seeds of a great advance in population, wealth, and power, they have at the present time attained to different stages in their growth. Their geographical position has subjected them to internal and external strains, varying in kind and intensity. Their history and physical environment have given rise to individual national sentiment, for the expression of which room must be found. A simple contribution of money or material may be to one Dominion the most acceptable form in which to assist in imperal defence. Another, while ready to provide local naval forces, and to place them at the disposal of the Crown in the event of war, may wish to lay the foundations upon which a future navy of its own could be raised. A third may think that the best manner in which it can assist in promoting the interests of the empire is in undertaking certain local services not directly of a naval character, but which may relieve the imperial government from expenses which would otherwise fall on the British Exchequer.

Furthermore, what do we find in the summary of the result of the sittings of the conference with regard to Canada? After the Caandian representatives had declared that they could submit two plans, one of which involving a yearly expenditure of £600,000, the admiralty suggested after discussion I am quoting textually:

That the Canadian government might provide a force of cruisers and destroyers comprising four cruisers of improved 'Bristol' class, one cruiser of the 'Boadicea' class, and six destroyers of improved River class.

Such is the opinion and the suggestion of the admiralty, and it has been accepted by the Canadian government. Therefore, any contention that the government has not acceded to the wishes of the admiralty is futile and unfounded. Many other details were discussed and finally the whole was 'unanimously agreed to.' I am quoting from the report of the decision of the conference. I will now continue to read from the amendment:

The proposals of the government do not follow the suggestions and recommendations of the admiralty and in so far as they empower the government to withhold the naval forces of Canada from those of the empire in time of war are ill-advised and dangerous.

I, also have always understood that it was in case of the empire or any one of the colonies being a war, that the admiralty wished to obtain help from the colonies. It is for that reason that the Bill says 'in critical time," or 'in case of war,' so that instead of withholding the naval forces of Canada, as stated in the amendment, the Bill provides that those forces may be sent out. By the way, Mr. Speaker, you can see in that part of the amendment a good answer to be made to the contention of those who, together with the leader of the opposition, are working against the adoption of this Bill, of those speakers and newspapers in the province of Quebec and elsewhere who, in order to promote a cause which has nothing to do with the fulfilment of a duty, are making never ending dissertations with regard to 'shall' and 'may' or 'peut' and 'doit.' He, the leader of the opposition, contends that the government may withhold the naval force, while the contrary is affirmed in the province of Quebec. Any means whatever, are good for such people.

'Ill-advised proposals' are the words used in the amendment. Has the hon. leader of the opposition any doubts as to the soundness of his own judgment, and of the judgment of every member of this House, or of the judgment of those who will succeed us, that he should be unwilling to leave to parliament the discretionary power which the government intends that it should have?

Those same provisions offer certain dangers. I have always thought that the creation of a navy was caculated to ward off danger. Such is the opinion of the British admiralty, even though that opinion were not shared by the leader of the opposition. But I know that it is his own opinion, as in another portion of his amendment, the only condition required by him previous to the discussion of the project of a permanent navy is that it should be referred to the electorate. He would be loath, I suppose, to present to the people a measure fraught with danger.

The amendment goes on:

The proposals do not insure that unity of organization and of action without which there can be no effective co-operation to any common scheme of empire defence.

In giving expression to that opinion, the mover of the amendment seems never to have read clause 48 of the Bill which says:

The Naval Discipline Act, 1866, and the Acts in amendment thereof passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom and now in force and the King's Regulations and admiralty instructions now in force, shall apply to the naval service and shall have the same force in law as if they formed part of this Act.

If the rules of discipline, the King's regulations and the admiralty instructions form part of this Act, how may any one seriously pretend that this Act does not insure unity of organization and of action, and that there can exist no effective co-operation.

It is a most singular coincidence that, last year, the leader of the opposition, with all his followers including the member for Jacques Cartier, gave his support and approbation to a resolution to the effect that the House would cordially approve of any necessary expenditures designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service.

This House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service.

Now, this year the House is seized with a Bill providing for such a naval organization, but the hon. gentleman will have none of it. He was ready to approve of any necessary expenditure, but is no longer willing that parliament should make any expenditure with that object in view. Last year a plebiscite was out of the question; this year a plebiscite is an absolute necessity, but when should it take place? He does not say so; and still he speaks of 'the impending necessities of the empire.' But to cap the climax, when the hon. gentleman is making his speech, he thinks that the government does not go far enough, and when he drafts his amendment, he does not even think to suggest the creation of the navy which he means to have. In order to please his friends of Jacques Cartier and of Terrebonne, he proposes to consult the people, but about what project? I would not like to say that the hon. gentleman does not know what he is talking about, but I may well say that he does not know his own mind; and it was with good reason that the Minister of Militia explained to the House why that change of mind had happened and how the hon. gentleman had got into that trouble.

I now come to the last paragraph of his amendment. 'In the meantime,' that is to say when the hon. leader of the opposition shall have made up his mind, 'the best means of discharging the immediate duty of Canada,' which means that later on important business will be dealt with, 'and of meeting the impending necessities of the empire,' here is that sublime means, 'consists in placing without delay at the disposal of the imperial authorities such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two Dreadnoughts.'

Now then go it: I have just said that he felt loath at spending a small portion of our yearly income for the organization of a Canadian navy; and now he is ready to borrow $25,000,000, to be spent not in this country, as the government intends to do, but to make a gift of it to England. Did you notice, sir, that the word 'Dreadnought' had been inserted at the end of this amendment just to please the extremists of his party who are always clamouring for Dreadnoughts? Personally, he is not anxious to have any, for, down to the end of his amendment, he says, 'giving to the admiralty full discretion to spend the said sum, at such time, &c.,' therefore, he is not quite sure about those 'impending necessities,' 'and for such purposes of naval defence,' for any purposes whatever, that is quite immaterial to the hon. gentleman, he forgets that this money was offered for Dreadnoughts; 'for such purposes of naval defence as in their judgment may best serve to increase the united strength of the empire.'

Yes, union is strength; but surely, all the members of the opposition did not combine their efforts in order to give strength to such a colourless amendment.

All the Conservative members who have addressed the House did state that they would support the amendment proposed by their leader. Let me tell them that they have very little pride. It cannot be said that they are urged and induced to do so by the allurements of ministerial promises and favours; but what may safely be said is that they are zealous party men, burning with a zeal which nothing can damp, not even a feeling of the heart or a breath of their intelligence.

But I also said that I would try to show that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier had not been happier than his leader in the statement of his views.

This Bill, to his mind—I quote his own words— 'with the exception of clause 18, does not present any very striking feature; it is the extension of legislation which we have had in a diminished form upon our statutes ever since the mother country called upon us to assume our proper share of the burdens of defence. Elsewhere he tells us that 'it is impossible to grasp and to thoroughly understand the meaning of a policy which the right hon. Prime Minister has not explained to him.' Further on, he says: 'This policy is absolutely new and novel, differing in every way from any policy enunciated or suggested before, and as to the real meaning and import of which the people have been so far kept in the dark.

What a mass of contradictions! How are we to believe now that the intelligent gentleman (Mr. Monk), the mover of an amendment to a bill, the meaning and import of which he does not grasp, can speak with authority on the question? This Bill 'does not present any very striking feature,' and yet he is impressed by clause 18. The Bill has not been explained to him; he does not grasp its meaning; still he admits that it contains a policy that is absolutely new and novel. That proposed policy cannot be new and novel, if, as he says, 'it is the extension of a legislation which has already been placed upon our statute-books.' Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman tries to show that this policy is new and novel, and with that end in view he gives quotations from newspapers.

As we are called upon to interpret the provisions of this Bill and not the statements of newspapers, let me rather quote a few words from the speech delivered by the Hon. Mr. Asquith, at the conference of 1909, and which the hon. gentleman himself did quote. Here is what the Prime Minister of England said:

> This conference was of a purely consultative character. The result is a plan for so organizing the forces of the Crown wherever they are that, while preserving the complete autonomy of each dominion, should the dominions desire to assist in the defence of the empire in a real emergency, their forces could be rapidly combined into one homogeneous imperial army.
> As regards Canada, it was considered that her double sea-board rendered the provision of a fleet unit of the same kind unsuitable for the present. It was proposed according to the amount of money that might be available, that Canada should make a start with cruisers and destroyers.

It is those decisions of the imperial conference that are embodied in this Bill. There is nothing new in all this, and such has always been the policy of the Liberal party: the safeguarding of our autonomy and loyalty to the empire.

The hon. gentleman asks by his amendment that the people be consulted. Have the electors changed their minds since 1908? They were consulted when it was decided to build the transcontinental and we all know the nature of their answer.

A member of parliament has something else to do here besides moving amendments to bills. The mandate he has received at the hands of his electors is quite sufficient to enable him to vote in the passing of new laws, and were we to be called upon to go before the people, whenever there arises a new question to be decided, there would be no end to elections. Is it necessary to have a plebiscite and to consult the people, in order to know whether they are willing that the government should consult parliament when a new war breaks out in the empire? The government is only doing what the House last year with one voice and without any plebiscite, decided what it should do. We know the people's opinion just as well as you do, gentlemen of the opposition pro forma, and we have not found that the people is anxious to be consulted, no more than the people from the other British dominions.

To put the public under the impression that this is a new policy, an innovation, the hon. gentleman stated in his speech that the Canadian delegates at the conference of 1909 fully endorsed everything that related to naval defence.

His political leader, on the other hand, thinks that the representatives of Canada did not follow the suggestion of the British admiralty. Both the hon. gentlemen state what is contrary to the truth; the hon. member for Jacques Cartier does not even attempt to substantiate his statement. But in order to convince us that the delegates yielded to the demands of the British authorities, he sums up all the conditions required from the colonies that desire to establish a fleet unit.

The hon. gentleman also went in a disquisition bearing on the word 'suzerain,' used on a certain occasion by the right hon. the Prime Minister, and all this in order 'to show the province of Quebec what lurks behind the government mea sure.' Whether this word was rightly applied or not, the use of a word cannot change the terms of the present Bill nor the decisions of the imperial conference. The delegates of the various dominions had been called together in order to be consulted as to the intentions of the dominions which they represented; the responsibilities assumed by those delegates had to be submitted for approbation to the respective parliaments of these dominions, and in the famous clause 18 of this Bill which the hon. gentleman seems to find fault with, we find the words: 'The Governor in Council may.' Should parliament pass this Bill it will not be in pursuance of an order of the sovereign or the suzerain, if you like, but it will be enforcement of a suggestion of the sovereign, represented by his ministers. It is a pact or a convention which both parties must respect. He who makes a promise binds himself, after acceptance of the promise; but he does not bind himself beyond what he has promised. After having agreed to do a certain thing, a dominion cannot be forced to something else, unless the relations between that dominion and the empire be severed. Under our constitution, the sovereign can disallow our laws, but he cannot modify their terms.

In the light of these incontestable principles, the three conclusions arrived at by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier are illegal, invalid and void and it is right to call public attention to them in order to prevent the errors they contain from spreading. He says: 1. We will be more closely bound by the foreign policy of the British government and will, therefore, undertake to support by force of arms its action abroad. 2. If we approve of the plan submitted by the Imperial Defence Conference we will be bound to take part as belligerents in imperial wars. 3. We will be held responsible for Great Britain's engagements towards foreign nations.

In short, the hon. gentleman's argument rests upon nothing when he contends that we have undertaken to take part in all the wars in which England may be concerned, the contrary being stated in section 18 of the Bill. Let us, therefore, set aside as idle phraseology all the instances given by the hon. member of circumstances under which we might be obliged to go to war and his declaration that we explicitly 'guarantee the integrity of the empire.'

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier points to the declaration of the right hon. the Prime Minister that 'When Great Britain is at war, Canada is also at war.' The present bill is not required to make such a statement true. The government of a nation has a right to make use of all the resources of her colonies, without however infringing upon their constituencies, if they have any. But apart from this consideration, should not a colony which enjoys the advantage of the protection, prestige and generous policy of the dominant power, in its own interest and from motives of gratitude, place its resources at the disposal of its benefactors? In that sense it is true that Canada, like all other British possessions, is at war when Great Britain is at war. When there is a question of duty at stake, whether that duty arise from gratitude or from interest, or from both, the members of this House are bound to accomplish it. It is not necessary in such a case to consult the people; on the contrary, our constituents would blame us if we hesitated to accomplish that duty, especially when it is enacted that our navy shall be used only when we so desire it, 'if at any critical period the Governor in Council wishes to place the navy at His Majesty's disposal.'

In support of the same contention that we will be for ever bound, the hon. member quoted the Ontario 'Sun' that 'if the Canadian people are bound to bear the responsibility of British policy, their attention will be more and more turned from Canadian to English affairs.' If such were the case it might suit some of our Conservative friends who are ardent partisans. It is in no case a gratuitous insult to the people of the province of Quebec and of the other provinces to state that they are not sufficiently educated to perceive that they are being led away from the path leading to their own interests and aims.

The hon. member quoted another extract from the same paper: 'There exists a plan conferring upon the government power to send the Canadian land forces wherever the central authority may desire.' The hon. member should be well versed in Canadian policy; has he discovered any such plan? If it exists why has he not disclosed it to the people? No, the statement is without foundation and the question which arises is always the same. If any such plan exists, before carrying it out the consent of the government and of parliament are required. Moreover, our Militia Act says the contrary as to our land forces.

Here is another bad reason: 'We have neither control over nor representation in the British parliament which makes war and peace and guides our destinies.' If we were represented in the British parliament would he then favour the government's measure? Would he who refuses to take any part in the wars of the empire be better satisfied if we had four or five members in the great imperial parliament? Does he suppose that we would be then in a better position than he is now in a House of Commons called by the Governor in Council to decide as to the advisability of taking part in any special war?

In another part of his speech the hon. member admits 'that Canada is obliged to provide for its own defence and that the duty should be carried out.'

He must therefore be in favour of the present Bill. Canada faces two great oceans. It is possible to defend the country against any enemy without a navy?

The hon. member mentioned the name of Sir George Etienne Cartier in an attempt to prove that former Conservative leaders never contemplated the creation of a navy, except for the defence of Canada. We find here another proof that the question is not a new one. The very memory of that great Conservative leader is a reproach to the hon. member. Cartier did not consider it necessary to appeal to the people when he first submitted the Militia Bill to the House. In doing so he was not at first in accord with the feelings of the majority in his province, but appealing to the interest of the country in its own defence and also to Canada's debt of gratitude to England, he won the people over to his views. In doing so he did not hesitate to make use of the same arguments as might have been used in any other province. If he still lived, he would not be the man to shirk his responsibilities by demanding a plebiscite. He would declare that in consequence of our increased wealth the time had come to create a Canadian navy for the protection of Canada and also, as he said in his lifetime, to offer England out of gratitude all our available resources in time of need.

The hon. minister also mentioned in his speech the reply made by the Canadian cabinet in 1862 to a communication of the Duke of Newcastle concerning the sending of a military contingent. The principles stated in that answer are precisely those contained in the present measure, and the hon. member for Jacques Cartier will allow me to submit in his name that reply to his leader. The hon. member will not object as he said himself in his speech that 'the whole note the Canadian cabinet is a protest against the principle that the military and naval forces of Canada should be submitted to any control but that of the legislature that established them.'

The hon. member next descants on the attitude of British governments in the past in negotiating treaties concerning Canada. He is perhaps right in claiming that we have not always obtained justice and it is probably for that reason that thanks to the persistent efforts of our distinguished leader we have obtained almost complete liberty as regards our treaties of commerce. Why should he have made such a digression when he had only to show, which he did not do, that a plebiscite was necessary before beginning to discuss this measure. All this may be useful in proving his erudition, but will not in any manner help to prove his case.

Many other similar contradictions would be found were we to take the necessary time for dissecting the speeches of our opponents on this question of the navy. But I have held long enough, Mr. Speaker, the attention of the hon. members who have listened to me.

Let me therefore sum up: Although a Canadian of French origin, I am none the less disposed, as are all my countrymen of the same origin, to help the mother country inasmuch as the condition and resources of the country allow. The empire is not now at war; should such a case unfortunately occur before our navy is fully built and equipped, it will then be time for the parliament of Canada to decide as the nature and amount of the help to be sent over.

Certain opposition newspapers and leaders are endeavouring to mislead public opinion as to the loyalty and sense of duty of the French Canadians. It is of the utmost importance that the position we intend to take should be well understood. In compliance with a desire expressed by the admiralty, we think that we should increase our share of imperial burden in proportion to our resources. But, contrary to the impression sought to be conveyed to the people of Quebec, we have no intention of beginning a career of militarism. They are deliberately deceiving the public, those parties who, speaking without any sense of responsibility, declare that the policy of the government will entail expenditures which will cripple our public works. Without our present revenue of one hundred millions, as the hon. the Finance Minister has declared, it will be possible, without resorting to a loan, to provide for the building of our navy and also for the normal development of our natural resources.

But the government will never agree to give of the slightest portion of responsible governments, of that autonomy which we enjoy, by consenting to waive the right of complete control in the future over a fleet built by us and with our own money.

What can be the meaning of this sudden zeal for placing our fleet under the control of the empire, even in times of peace, when we find that in a memorandum from the general staff, it is stated to be the 'duty of each self-governing portion of the empire to provide as far as possible for the security of its own territory.'

Some have gone to the extent of spreading throughout the province of Quebec the falsehood that the government is building a fleet with the view of obliging every person able to bear arms to take part in the wars of the empire. In the face of such an absurdity we are obliged to explain that those only who desire to take service in the navy will be called upon to go to war if the government and parliament of the day so decide.

I need not add, Mr. Speaker, that I will vote against both amendments in support of the government measure.

Mr. T. W. CROTHERS (West Elgin). Mr. Speaker, that so much thought and energy and wealth are still being devoted throughout the world to the invention, construction and operation of instrumentalities designed to destroy our fellows shows that as a race we have not entirely emerged from savagery, nor yet within measureable distance of the millennium. That such conditions and others akin thereto obtain nineteen centuries after the advent of the Prince of Peace shows that from a finite viewpoint the upward movement of humanity is exceedingly slow. It will thus be seen that I am not one of those who believe that war or preparations for war are per se essential to the highest weal of this or any other country. While it would seem that all right thinking men regard the horrors of war as too terrible to contemplate, and deplore the many evils incident to the preparations for war, still we must adjust ourselves to world-wide conditions, and to escape the greater must manfully endure the lesser evil. And there are greater evils than war or preparations for war. There are grounds for the belief that the best way to avoid war is to be prepared for it. A few months ago, at the launching of a great battleship by the Japanese government, one of the ministers declared that the ship would be used to maintian peace in the far east. At the same time they liberated a large cageful of white pigeons as an emblem of peace. Mr. Roosevelt, when president of the United States, said: 'I hail the building of the American navy. Our voice is now potent for peace, and it is so potent because we are not afraid of war.' A few months ago our own King declared at Liverpool that the best guarantee for peace was thorough preparation for war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the conditions in which we are more immediately interested? One hundred and fifty years ago Canada became a part of the British empire, and it seems to me that the first question we have to ask ourselves is: Do we desire that Canada shall remain a part of the British empire? Do we appreciate the privileges and advantages of being a part of the British empire? Is the British empire worth preserving? If these questions are answered in the affirmative, we are imperialists; if they are not so answered we are separartists; and when the Prime Minister of this country says, as he did the other day, in introducing this Bill that he did not pretend to be an imperialist and did not pretend to be an anti-imperialist, the two positions are absolutely inconsistent. He is either an imperialist or a separatist; there is no middle ground between the two. I say that one hundred and fifty years ago Canada became a part of the British empire comprising today the United Kingdom, the four great self-governing nations of Canada, New Zealand, Australia and South Africa, and numerous other smaller possessions scattered over the globe, separated from the centre and from each of the parts by thousands of miles of water. The high seas are the world's highways of the different parts of the British empire, and the continuance and integrity of the British empire depends upon the safety and security of these great highways. The United Kingdom for two hundred and fifty years, ever since the Dutch fleet bade defiance to the British fleet in the Thames river, has been mistress of the seas. Russia, Sweden and Denmark in 1801 challenged the supremacy of the British navy at Copenhagen, and challenged it in vain. France and Spain in 1805 at Trafalgar challenged the British navy, but in vain. The continuance of Canada as a part of the British empire depends upon a continuance of the supremacy of the British navy. We have a country growing up near the United Kingdom, a country that has developed more strength during the past fifty years than any other country in Europe, the German empire, a great people, an intelligent people, a moral people, a skilled people, a thrifty people; sixty-five millions of them, and increasing at the rate of a million a year; with an army of four millions of soldiers who could be put in the field in a few hours. There is but one obstacle that stands between the ambition of the German Emperor and the leadership of Europe, and that one thing is the British navy. With sixty-five millions in Germany, and increasing at the rate of a million a year ,and her lands nearly all occupied, Germany must emigrate her surplus population or burst. Where are they to go? It is the ambition of the emperor of Germany that when his people emigrate from Germany, they shall go to a place where they shall still be under the flag; that is, Germany must have colonies. Where is she to get them? Where are there any colonies that she desires? Only those that are held by the British empire. In the year 1900 the German people undertook to rebuild their navy, and in the preamble of their naval Bill they put these words:

> Germany must possess a battle fleet so strong that a war with her would, even for the greatest naval power, be accompanied by such danger as would render that power's position doubtful.

'Even for the greatest naval power'—read between the lines. What is the greatest naval power to-day? It is the British navy. So that, in the preamble of their Naval Bill, the Germans say practically that they must build a navy stronger than the British navy. Why? Can any one suggest for one moment any reason for building this navy except to be prepared to challenge the British navy. Such a navy is not necessary to protect Germany's coast, and there is no other navy in the world that calls on Germany to build such a navy as she is building except the navy of England. Therefore it seems to me perfectly clear that what the German people are aiming at is to have a navy stronger than the British navy for the purpose of challenging it. And if they succeed in getting such a navy, and if they should challenge the British navy and the German admiral should come off triumphant in the North sea, where the fight would be bound to take place, that would be the end of the British empire as it is constituted to-day. There can be no question about that. The Germans are systematically going to work to educate their people in favour of a great navy. How do they go about it. They build a battleship and give that ship the name of some inland city or town. The one I have in my mind they christened the 'Nuremberg'. They built a model of that battleship and sent it to the city of Nuremberg in Bavaria, over 300 miles from the sea. The model was placed in the city hall, the people were invited to come and inspect it, and they came in hundreds and they said: This is our battleship; this is the 'Nuremberg'. In that way the whole people of Germany are becoming imbued with the desire to possess the greatest fleet in the world. For what purpose? For the purpose of challenging the British navy. There can be no other object.

We have had a good deal of evidence brought forth to show that there is no ground for alarm. Newspaper clippings have been read by the score, brought to us second or third hand, and written in the old country during the excitement of an election campaign. One hon. gentleman read a letter from some one who had put in a few weeks in South Africa. Another read what purported to be a copy of a telegram sent by some unknown individual in the old country. We all know how much reliance can be placed upon political statements written during the excitement of an election campaign and published in party organs, whether on the one side or the other. We all know that little if any reliance can be placed upon these, and for that reason I do not propose to read newspaper articles written during the excitement of an election, but I want to read a few words delivered by responsible statesmen in the English House of Commons at a time when there was no political campaign on hand. You will find the few words I am going to quote from Sir Edward Grey, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in the English 'Hansard' on March 9, 1909, page 50. Sir Edward Grey said:

> We desire by a just, fair and reasonable statement of our position to get not victory but confidence. Let me review the situation in that light. First of all, the House and the country are perfectly right in the view that the situation is grave. A new situation in this country is created by the German programme. Whether that programme is carried out quickly or slowly the fact of its existence makes a new situation. When that programme is completed, Germany a great country close to our own shore will have a fleet of 33 Dreadnoughts. That fleet would be the most powerful which the world has ever yet seen. . . . That imposes on us the necessity of rebuilding the whole of our fleet.

Consider that for one moment. The German programme proposes to build thirty-three Dreadnoughts. A country with which she is now in close alliance, Austria, has eight Dreadnoughts; and if a war were to occur between Germany and England, Austria would be in the line with Germany, so that England to-day requires to rebuild her navy, requires to build at least fifty Dreadnoughts, which are to be the great battleships of the near future, to meet the German programme. What does that mean? Each Dreadnought costs about $10,000,000, and the complements of smaller vessels in each case, costs another $10,000,000. Fifty Dreadnoughts and their complements at $20,000,000 each, means $1,000,000,000. That is what it will cost to rebuild the British navy. And that British navy is to be rebuilt for what? Not for the mere purpose, as these statesmen said in the House of Commons, of protecting the British isles, but for the purpose of protecting the remotest part of the British empire. It is necessary for the British exchequer to expend $1,000,000,000 in rebuilding a navy to protect us as well as to protect the British isles. Are we to take advantage of that expenditure for our protection, at least during the next twenty years while we shall be constructing our navy, and contribute nothing towards it. That does not strike me as being self-respecting or honourable. Let us see what Mr. Balfour, the leader of the Conservative party, said in the British House of Commons:

NAVY ESTIMATES.

I therefore do most earnestly beg the government and the committee to consider not indeed in any spirit of panic, but with a full recognition of the absolutely novel and as I think alarming circumstance in which this country finds itself whether they cannot do something with the enormous resources which we have at our disposal in the way of the building of ships, guns, mountings and armaments, and our power of finding the necessary funds for dealing with the question of national defence. I ask them not to hesitate, not to delay, but to use to the utmost and as quickly as possible without paltering every possible machine which they have at their disposal for restoring to this country what I greatly fear we have temporarily lost—not that two power standard which is far beyond question in this debate, but the one power standard in the matter of ships of first-class power which for the first time in our history seems to be slipping from our grasp.

And Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister, said on the 16th of March, last, as reported on page 962 of the English 'Hansard':

If any one will refer to the speech I made a year ago, he will see that I said, with some confidence, that whereas it would take the Germans 30 months to build one of these ships, we could do it in 24. I was not, of course, committing myself precisely to the number of months, but I did maintain that we had a substantial advantage in the rate of construction, which would always enable us to quickly overtake them when the event occurred. I am sorry to say that is not the case. I believed it to be the fact at the time at which I spoke, but there has been such an enormous development in Germany, not only in the provisions of shipyards and slips on which the hulk or fabric of a ship can be built or repaired, but in what is still more serious—in the provision for gun mountings and armaments of those great monsters, those Dreadnoughts, which are now the dominating type of ship—such an enormous development—and I will venture to say this without attempting to excite anything in the nature of unnecessary alarm in this country—such an enormous development as to be so serious a development from our national point of view, that we could no longer take to ourselves, as we could a year ago with reason, the consoling and comforting reflection that we have the advantage in the speed and the rate at which ships can be constructed.

He said also, in the same debate:

I made two assumptions which have turned out, I shall not say to be inaccurate at the time I made them, but which have not been verified by subsequent experience. I admit it to the full. I got my information from the best possible sources, and I am perfectly certain that the admiralty had taken every means in their power to satisfy themselves of the actual facts. What were these two assumptions I made? The first assumption was that the German paper programme was one that might not be realized and certainly would not be exceeded. That has turned out not to be true, because it is undoubtedly the case that during the autumn of last year there was an anticipation with four ships which belonged to the German programme of 1909-10, in the sense that orders were given, materials collected, and it may be in one or two cases, possibly in more, ships were actually laid down. It was in view of that most grave, and to us not only unforseen but unexpected state of things that we had to reconsider our programme of the present year. When we had that state of things brought home to us, it was a great surprise to us, I confess—the falsification of one of the hypotheses on which we had hitherto proceeded. The discovery of that state of things made it necessary to reconsider our programme and to submit a different set of proposals to parliament.

Now, I wish to read a little authority for the benefit of some of our friends on the other side of the House, which they may appreciate even more, perhaps, than that of the statesmen whose views I have just read. I desire to quote a short quotation from the Toronto 'Globe', which my hon. friends opposite will probably accept as a very good authority. The 'Globe' of 24th March, last, said in its leading editorial:

British feeling for Germany until the last few years has ever been friendly and admiring. Germany's feeling for Great Britain, as was manifested during the Boer war, has been jealous and unfriendly. This unfriendliness reached its climax when Britain and France recently entered upon a friendly understanding. The policy of Germany since the war of 1870 has been to isolate France in Europe. The friendly relations with her neighbour across the channel have been openly and avowedly resented by the Berlin war party.

The German nation has groaned for years under the weight of military preparations. Without lightening that burden an ounce, the Kaiser and his advisers have superimposed the burden of creating a great navy. There is not another nation in Europe which, if in the same position as Great Britain, would allow another nation to prepare an engine for its destruction without asking for explanations and an understanding. There is not another nation in Europe which would impotently stand by and see an instrument forged for its destruction. They would seize the reptile while it was still weak and strangle it.

But that is not the British way. They have instead endeavoured to keep pace with German activity in augmenting naval power. The contest has become a desperate one. It is a contest between a nation of 65,000,000 and constantly growing, with a nation of 42,000,000, from which its sons swarm across the seas year in and year out. War is deprecated, but, as a matter of fact war is in progress. The contest in ship-building is war. If the mother country were engaged in a deadly conflict, Canadians could not get across the ocean fast enough to the aid of the motherland. The Canadian exchequer would be open to the last dollar in such a cause. But we must recognize that our aid is as much needed now as if a physical war, instead of a war of ship-building were on. Germany appreciates that if ever she is to challenge British supremacy and break up the British empire, now is the time.

This is from the Toronto 'Globe', I would ask my hon. friends opposite to remember:

Every year is adding to the might of the British possession, and ten years hence would be too late. The colonies can show by prompt and decisive action that it is already too late. They have it in their power to proclaim to all the world that the empire is one and indissoluble. It will be a stroke for peace, for the moment Germany perceives that the strength and resources of every colony have been cast into the scale, from that moment she will see that she has lost the game. She began her programme too late. It is Canada's duty, from every point of view, our affection for the land of our fathers and our own self-interest to take prompt and practial action.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the author of that article is one of those whom the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Congdon) so modestly and elegantly referred to as 'old women of both sexes'. I shall have occasion to give my hon. friends opposite some more light from the Toronto 'Globe' before I finish.

Mr. Speaker, as I said a few minutes ago, we have for a hundred and fifty years been living under the protection of the British navy. No one for a moment will dispute that. We propose to live under the protection of the British navy. Even hon. members opposite will admit that they cannot construct anything in the way of a navy, that would protect this Canada of ours, in less than twenty years. They will admit that, during the next twenty years, at least we Canadians are to be protected by the British navy. And we have never contributed one dollar to the construction or maintenance of that navy; we have never promised to contribute one dollar to the construction or maintenance of that navy; we do not propose now, under the Bill before the House, to contribute one dollar for the construction or maintenance of that navy.

Now, the Prime Minister in introducing this Bill spoke about the position that was taken at the imperial conference of 1902.

The Postmaster General was good enough to put upon 'Hansard' the whole of the material part of that memorandum of 1902. The Prime Minister said, at page 3032:

This was in 1902, nearly eight years ago, and for eight years this policy of the present government has been before the country. From this policy the present government has never deviated. This policy we affirmed again at the imperial conference of 1907.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look, for a moment and see whether these statements are true. We will examine the memorandum of the Imperial Conference of 1902, we will examine the memorandum of the British Conference in 1907, to see whether these statements are true. The Postmaster General was kind enough to place upon 'Hansard', at page 3114, the material parts of the memorandum of the Imperial Conference of 1902. The substance of it is this:

At present Canadian expenditures for defence services are confined to the military side. The Canadian government are prepared to consider the naval system of defence as well. They are willing—

Now notice the condescending generosity in this proposition:

—they are willing that these expenditures should be so directed as to relieve the taxpayer of the mother country from some of the burdens which she now bears.

Wasn't that generous? What is the proposition? The proposition was that:

We are prepared to consider a naval system of defence as well.

We are prepared to consider it. Five years afterwards there was another imperial conference, in the year 1907. I do not remember whether the Postmaster General was a member of the government during those five years, or any part of the period from 1902 to 1907; but if he was, I am asking him if the government, during those five years, considered this proposition that in 1902 they declared they were prepared to consider. Now there is nothing in that memorandum of 1902 promising to do anything more than to consider the question, that is the whole thing. Did they consider it during those five years? I do not know whether they did or not. If the Prime Minister was here I would ask him. The Minister of Finance is here, perhaps he knows whether the Cabinet, during those five years between 1902 and 1907, considered a naval system of defence as well. He does not answer.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not making a speech.

Mr. CROTHERS. I have the report of what occurred at this general conference in 1907, and I think I shall be able to show that although they promised to consider it, they said they were prepared to consider it in 1902, I think it is fair to assume that they did consider it during those five years, and I think the action they took in 1907 shows that having considered it for five years, they came to the conclusion that tney would do nothing. Now let us see. At page 541 of that report you have a motion moved by Dr. Smartt, one of the members of that conference, the Commissioner of Public Works for Cape Colony. He moved a resolution in these words:

That this conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire—

Is that something, Mr. Speaker, we can all agree to?

—to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy—

Do we all agree with that?

—in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the upkeep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the admiralty, and as would best accord with their varying circumstances.

Now, where was the representative of this government when that motion came up? Remember they told the British government in 1902, five years before, that they were prepared to consider the establishment of a naval force. Here was a proposition submitted by Dr. Smartt, recognizing the duty of the over-seas dominions to make a contribution towards the up-keep of the navy. You cannot get out of it by saying that it was a proposition to give a money contribution

The contribution to take the form of a grant of money, or the establishment of local naval defence or such other services.

Or in such other manner as would suit the circumstances of each dominion Now what was the evidence of their having considered the matter for five years? We find on the very next page, 542, the remarks made by the right hon. leader of this government in opposition to that motion. Here is his language:

SIR WILFRID LAURIER. I am sorry to say, so far as Canada is concerned, we cannot agree to the resolution.

We cannot agree to give money, we cannot agree to establish a naval defence, we cannot agree to do anything. The right hon. the Prime Minister stated the other day, as I have just read to you, that they reaffirmed the proposition in 1907 that they would establish a navy. Let me give you some more:

I am sorry to say that so far as Canada is concerned we cannot agree to the resolution. We took the ground many years ago that we had enough to do in that respect in our country before committing ourselves to a general claim. We have too much to do otherwise. . . . For my part, if the motion were pressed to a conclusion, I should have to vote against it.

Now there you have, in the year 1902, the Prime Minister of this country telling the British government that they were prepared to consider a system of naval defence, and after considering it for five years, he says, I am against a monetary contribution for the establishment of a naval system or any other service, and we do not propose to do any more than we have done.

In the face of that we had him in this House the other day saying:

This was in 1902, nearly eight years ago, and for eight years, this policy of the present government has been before the country. From this policy the present government has never deviated.

Was that a deviation from it in 1907 when the right hon. gentleman declared: No money, no battleships, no tin-pot navy even, no nothing? In the face of that he comes before this House on the 3rd day of February, 1910, and tells us that in the year 1907 at this conference he reaffirmed the proposition that was made in 1902:

This policy we affirmed again at the imperial conference of 1907. We affirmed it again last year in this House when the question came up for concrete and immediate action. This policy is embodied in the Bill now before this House, and by this policy the present government stands or falls.

What did Dr. Smartt say to Sir Wilfrid Laurier after he made those observations, after he refused to give any money, after he refused to establish a naval force, after he refused to do anything, saying we have too much to do otherwise? Dr. Smartt said:

I thought the wording of this resolution would have specially met your views, because towards the up-keep of the navy it may take the form either of a grant of money or the establishment of a local defence force or other services.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

I have said all I have to say on the subject.

That settled it, we will do nothing, I won't even discuss it with you any further. Then the report proceeds:

Dr. SMARTT. I should like very much to hear the opinions of the representatives of the other portions of the empire.

Mr. DEAKIN. I have no hesitation in entering into the discussion if desired; but if we are not going to pass the resolution, is it worth while?

Dr. SMARTT. I think it is a great pity we do not pass something. We have done so much in the way of pious affirmation, that I am anxious we should do something of a practical character.

I should say so. Then the discussion continues:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It can be passed if there is a majority. For my part I must vote against it.

Sir JOSEPH WARD. To do any good we would require to be unaminous about it.

Dr. SMARTT. Yes, I suppose so.

Mr. WINSTON CHURCHILL. It is not much good to have a resolution at all if we cannot be unanimous.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we had better not proceed any further just now.

The motion was allowed to drop.

If you will pardon me for repeating for a moment, because I want to impress this thought upon your mind and upon the minds of my hon. friends who are in this House, and through this House upon the minds of the electors of this country, that we have had our Prime Minister in this House declaring that he confirmed in 1907 the proposition that he made in 1902, and I think I have proved to the hilt from the record that he did nothing of the kind. Instead of confirming the proposition in 1907, which had been made in 1902, he absolutely and positively refused to do anything. And this has another aspect: the statement that the Prime Minister made the other day is invoked as a reason why the people of this country should not be consulted before we enter upon this interminable expenditure of the construction of a Canadian navy. He has said to this House, his organs throughout the country, and his supporters in this House are repeating it, that this proposition has been before the country for eight years and has never been varied during that time, that he confirmed it in 1907. What are the facts? The facts are that the people of this country in 1904 paid no attention whatever to what had been done in 1902. We all know it was not a subject of discussion on the public hustings at all, but even if it were discussed what was done in that year was cancelled in the year 1907 and prior to the last election. The last announcement the people of this country had from the right hon. gentleman on the question of a navy was: We shall do absolutely nothing. That was in the year 1907. So I say that we have done nothing, we have never promised to do anything, we have absolutely refused to do anything, and we do not propose now to do anything to strengthen the royal navy. I overlooked something, the government did promise to do some little thing when they were over there in 1907. Sir Wilfrid Laurier left the matter of addressing the conference largely to Mr. Brodeur. At page 138 Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

Mr. Brodeur will speak for Canada.

And Mr. Brodeur proceeded to speak and to tell the people there how much we had expended in protecting our fisheries and in establishing a hydrographic survey, etc., but not one word that they would do anything to strengthen the British navy, except what we find on page 141:

We have taken over, or are going to take over, the Halifax and Esquimalt dockyards—in fact, we are in possession already, from the 1st of January, of the Halifax dockyards. I do not know exactly how much those dockyards were costing the British admiralty—or the one at Halifax, but I may say we have assumed all the obligations in connection with those dockyards, and we have provided specially that the amount which the British admiralty was to pay as an annual subscription to the graving dock at Halifax, would be paid by us instead of by the British admiralty. We have, as I have said, provided for the establishment of docks at Halifax and Esquimalt.

That was in the year 1907, nearly three years ago. The hon. the Postmaster General a few days ago quoted from an address delivered by Sir William White on the 17th day of November last, before the Royal Society of Arts in old London, and I shall quote a few words from the same author, which will be found at page 16. You will remember that in the year 1907, in the presence of the right hon. the leader of this government, Mr. Brodeur undertook to take over the Esquimalt and Halifax dockyards, and to assume all obligations in connection with them. Sir William White last summer examined these dockyards, and I call him as a witness whose testimony will be accepted at once. On November 17, 1909, he says:

During the past summer I have visited the naval yard at Esquimalt, and obtained first—hand knowledge of its present condition. . . . The only naval base possessed by the royal navy on the western coast of the American continent. I found the fort unarmed, the guns lying on the ground at the foot of the hill in the open. The naval yard was without a staff capable of maintaining in good condition the expensive machinery left in the work shops, or the buildings, some of which were erected only a short time ago. The stores had been disposed of locally at ridiculously low prices and a naval base of importance had been virtually abandoned and was rapidly deteriorating.

From information received, I have reason to believe that the naval base at Halifax is also in an unsatisfactory condition.

So that we have the representative of this government at the imperial council in the year 1907 undertaking to take over the dockyard of Esquimalt and to maintain it and to assume all obligations in connection with it and, more than two years afterwards we find this report by Sir William White that they are allowing it to tumble to pieces. And still they tell us that the same policy that we adopted in the year 1902, we affirmed in 1907, and have been carrying it along ever since.

Mr. SPROULE. That was to do nothing.

Mr. CROTHERS. To do nothing.

Mr. SPROULE. And they sold the stores.

Mr. CROTHERS. And they sold the stores at ridiculously low prices as Sir William White says. So we have had the protection of the British navy for 150 years; and the government proposes to have it for the next twenty years at least, never having paid a dollar towards the construction or maintenance of that navy, never having promised to pay a dollar and not proposing to pay a dollar now. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is not a position which the people of Canada, English or French desire the government of Canada to take.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the duty of Canadians in these circumstances? What we should do, it seems to me, depends entirely upon the conception we have of the destiny of this country. What is our conception of the destiny of Canada? Is it that we shall remain in the empire, is it that we shall become independent, or is it that we shall become a mere annex of the United States? And, before we can properly and satisfactorily answer the question as to what we ought to do we should first determine what is our position. There never was a time in the history of this country before when Canada so earnestly called on every one of its sons to think and consider, and judge for himself what is best to do. It would seem to me, judging by the speeches we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite, that they have never yet grasped the idea of empire, and I say that without any desire whatever to be offensive to any one Their speeches do not indicate that they have ever risen to the idea of empire. Let us read what some of these gentlemen opposite have said. The hon. the Minister of Militia in his speech (page 3388 of 'Hansard) referring to the leader of the opposition said:

To-day he wishes to tax the people of Canada $25,000,000 and to send it away out of sight where Canadians can have no possible interest in it.

Just weigh these words for a moment, Mr. Speaker: To send $25,000,000 to the British government to build two Dreadnoughts away out of sight of Canada where Canadians can have no possible interest in it. Did the man who uttered these words ever grasp the idea of empire?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CROTHERS. We had the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McLean) saying in so many words in this House: We owe England nothing, we are indebted to England for nothing, why, because she does not pay us any more for our apples, or any more for our cheese, or any more for our bacon, or for our canned goods than she does for similar merchandise entering England from the United States, and therefore we owe her nothing. Narrow, selfish, picayune provincialism. As well might he say that the merchant of Montreal pays him no more for his eggs, and butter and cheese than he would to an American coming into the market of Montreal, and therefore, we are not indebted to Montreal at all, and if Montreal be attacked we shall not come to the rescue of that city. A gentleman from Nova Scotia (Mr. McKenzie)) told us that England has more money than we have, that she had facilities, for building ships, that she could build all the ships that were necessary to protect not only the British isles but to protect the remotest part of the British empire. And, he, a member of the House of Commons of Canada and a citizen of Canada was willing to allow the taxpayer of the United Kingdom alone to raise money to construct and maintain a navy to protect him in this country. Narrow, selfish, picayune provincialism. And, Sir, we have had similar remarks from member after member on the other side of the House. Talk about defending our coasts, or protecting our trade routes, why Mr. Speaker, this empire of ours, as the 'Globe' truly said, is one and indissoluble; the British empire must stand or fall all together. We have had remarks made by the Prime Minister showing, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that even he has never grasped the idea of empire. Many of you have read the remarks he made on independence a few years ago. Now, I do not desire to be offensive; I want to say boldly that if there be any man in this country who believes honestly and sincerely that it is in the interest of the British empire that we should become independent he has a perfect right to that belief and he has a perfect right to advocate it if he pleases. But, the people of the country, if he be a public man, have the right to insist that he shall come out in the open and say so. We had the Prime Minister a few years ago stating, that he held out to his fellow countrymen the idea of independence. That is not the only time the right hon. gentleman has made some remarks he should not have made in my humble judgment; remarks, which coming from a man occupying the prominent position he does, have a disintegrating effect upon the affections which the people of this country should entertain towards the British empire. And, it is not away back in the year 1902 either that he made those remarks, for, in the year 1907, the right hon. gentleman said in the city of Toronto:

We have to realize that John Bull has not always done his duty to his Canadian son. If we take all the treaties from the treaty of 1783 up to the treaty of 1903, we Canadians do not feel particularly cheerful over the way we have been treated by the British plenipotentiaries.

And in Ottawa, in the same year, addressing the Manufacturers' Association, he said:—

We take the record of diplomacy in Great Britain in so far as Canada is concerned, and we find that it is a repetition of sacrifices of Canadian interests. We have suffered on the Atlantic, we have suffered on the Pacific, we have suffered on the lakes, we have suffered wherever there has been a question to be discussed between British diplomats.

Mr. Speaker, what would be thought of a son who would delight in parading before the world the shortcomings of his mother? Whatever else might be thought of him, no one would think of accusing him of having any affection for her. So seriously did the British Ambassador the Right Hon. Mr. Bryce, regard these observations made by the Prime Minister of this county, that in Toronto he referred to them, and said: —

I will ask you to suspend your judgment upon all those questions in which it is alleged that British diplomacy has not done its best for you. In those matters you have only heard one side of the case, and I feel it is my duty to my country, and to the government which I represent, to tell you this, and that I believe you are entirely mistaken if you think that British diplomacy has been indifferent to Canada or has not done the best it could for Canada.

When the right hon. premier of this country says that Canadians do not feel particularly cheerful over the way we have been treated by the British plenipotentiaries, I ask, who were the British plenipotentiaries? I asked you what would be thought of a son who would delight in parading before the world the shortcomings of his mother; but what would you think of a son who would parade before the world accusations against his mother of which she was not guilty? And I want to show you, Mr. Speaker, that these very plenipotentiaries to whom the right hon. gentleman refers were named by himself, every one of them. In speaking of the treaty of 1903 he referred of course to the Alaska boundary treaty. I have in my hand the correspondence touching the Alaska Boundary, and in it you will find at page 63 the following:

To the Earl of Minto, Ottawa, from the Secretary of State, March 7, 1903.—The ratifications of the Alaskan boundary treaty were exchanged on the 3rd instant. Time for the preparation of the case, article 2, has consequently begun to run against us, and it is important that composition of British half of court, also appointment of British agent, should be settled without delay. Hope, therefore, your responsible advisers will favour us with their views on these appointments as early as possible.

On the very same day the Governor General sent this message to the Colonial Secretary:

In view of the short time given for preparation of the case, my ministers desire to proceed immediately, and, therefore, suggest an early settlement of preliminaries. As to the composition of tribunal, my ministers suggest chief justice of England and two Canadian judges, names to be telegraphed hereafter. As to counsel, my ministers desire that Mr. Edward Blake, K.C., London, and Mr. Christopher Robinson, K.C., Toronto, be of counsel to uphold the British contention and junior counsel. Under that clause of the treaty which provides for the appointment of an agent to represent each party before the tribunal, my ministers desire that Mr. Clifford Sifton, Canadian Minister of the Interior, be appointed to fill such position.

On the 17th of March, 1903 the Governor General sent this message to the Secretary of State:

In addition to chief justice of England, my ministers propose Sir Louis Jetté, a retired judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, and now Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec, and Justice Armour, of the Supreme Court of Canada, as members of the Court of Imperial Jurists under treaty for settlement of boundary of Alaska.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the late Justice Armour died, and the present Minister of Justice was appointed to his place. This correspondence shows conclusively that the government of Canada named all three of the gentlemen who represented the British empire on that board of arbitration, and that the Chief Justice of England, named by the government of this country, agreed with the three gentlemen who represented the United States, and hence there were four to two against us on that question. And in face of the fact that Sir Wilfrid Laurier named the three gentlemen who represented Great Britain on that board, we find him at Toronto blaming the British government for the award that was given. Have I made it clear, Mr. Speaker, that the right hon. gentleman has taken delight not only in parading the shortcomings of his mother before the people, but in making accusations against his mother that are not borne out by the record? Only a few days ago the right hon. gentleman delivered another address in Toronto, and what did he say? It is very peculiar, Sir, that a gentleman occupying the prominent position that the right hon. leader of the government does, should make such remarks. I venture to say that no one ever knew or ever read of a British statesman speaking of the government of Canada as the Prime Minister of this country so glibly and so delightfully speaks of the British government. This is what he said, as reported in the Globe of the 5th of January:

The King of England has no more rights over us than are allowed him by our own Canadian parliament.

Now, what was the necessity of making a remark of that kind? What is the object? Did you ever hear Sir John Macdonald talk that way? What are the facts? I have here some extracts from the British North American Act in these words:

Be it therefore enacted and declared by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same as follows:

1. This Act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1867.

3. It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being more than six months after the passing of this Act, the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick shall form and be one dominion under the name of Canada.

9. The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Section 17. There shall be one parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen and an Upper House, styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

Yet in the face of these facts, we have the right hon. gentleman saying that the King of England has no more rights over us than are allowed him by our own Canadian parliament. Why, the sovereign of England, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons, created this parliament. The King himself is a part of this parliament. And in the face of that we have our Prime Minister saying that the King has nothing to do with us except as we allow him. But the parliament of Canada was created by the sovereign and the House of Lords and the House of Commons of England. Where did these get their rights? The King of England did not acquire his rights from the parliament of Canada. Why then are these observations made? We had the right hon. gentleman going out of his way the other day to say that he would not have allowed Canada to have taken part in the Crimean war, if he had anything to say about it. On page 3044 of this year's 'Hansard', I find the right hon. gentleman reported as saying:

There was another instance. England was at war in the Crimea with Russia. For myself I do not hesitate to say that if that war were to be undertaken by England under similar circumstances, I would hesitate very much before I would give my consent to our taking part in any such war, if conditions were the same now as they were then. But they are not, because at present we have British Columbia to look after; and if war were declared between Great Britain and Russia, our first duty would be to look after British Columbia, which might be attacked on the Pacific ocean.

Those are the ideas of our Prime Minister touching the Crimean war. Let me read in contrast what the Rt. Hon. Sir John Macdonald said about the same matter. He said:

Who can look back to the time when the Crimean war broke out and not remember with pride how Canada rose as one man to stand by the mother country and by France when the French Tricolor and the Union Jack were joined together fighting the battles of liberty against absolutism on the shores of the Crimea? There was a rush of Canadians to the battlefields, and I had great pleasure—

Notice the contrast.

—I had great pleasure, as a member of the government of Sir Allan McNab, to be instrumental in carrying a vote of $100,000, given unanimously out of the public treasury, in order to show that Canada made common cause with England and with France in the Crimean war.

There you had a man down into whose heart had sunken deeply the sentiment of loyalty and patriotism, and had become the inspiration of his life. Contrast that with the disposition of our Prime Minister whom we had saying that if he had been here then, he would not have so acted. Things, he said, are different now. We have British Columbia now, he said, and if British Columbia were attacked, he would fight like blazes. Sir, I choose to look upon the matter in this way. If Vancouver is attacked, the British empire is attacked. If the city of Quebec is attacked, the British empire is attacked. I look upon it in that large sense. I am proud of being a citizen of Canada, but prouder still that I am a British subject, and a citizen of the British empire. The instance I have cited is but another instance of the small ideas, the provincial ideas, that some people have. If British Columbia is attacked, why, we will run to the rescue. If Montreal is attacked, we will run to the rescue; but if some distant part of the empire is attacked, we will sit down in our comfortable chairs and consider whether we will go to the rescue or not. How satisfied would we be, were the British government to take a similar position with regard to us? If Quebec were attacked, would we not expect the British government to send a fleet over as fast as that fleet could get here? I think we would. The English statesmen whose words I have quoted said over and over again that Britain requires a fleet sufficently large to protect, not only the British isles, but the remotest part of the empire. If British Columbia is attacked, says the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) we will rush to the rescue. What narrow, selfish, picayune provincialism.

Our Minister of War (Sir Frederick Borden) is on the same line. He gave us a speech the other night in this House, and during it he was asked some questions. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) asked him:

> Will the hon. gentleman say whether or not he is in accord with the sentiments concerning independence expressed by the Prime Minister in 1892.

What was the answer of our brave Minister of War to that question? He said:

> I am generally in accord with the views of my honoured leader, and I have absolute confidence in his leadership.

That is, our Minister of War does not know whether he is in favour of independence or not, but when the Prime Minister says 'thumbs up', up go his thumbs.

I might quote from the speech delivered by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to prove that he showed just as narrow, selfish, and picayune provincialism as the other hon. gentlemen to whom I have referred and even more so. I think I might extend that discription to almost every one of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have delivered themselves during this debate. I think there was one exception, but I forget the name.

Mr. COWAN. The hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. McLean).

Mr. CROTHERS. To protect our coasts, to look after our trade routes—never rise to the idea of empire. Mr. Speaker, if there is to be any fight for supremacy on the seas, that fight will occur in the North sea. Sea fights are not like land fights. You may have a war on land for four or five years. But Togo destroyed the Russian fleet in the Sea of Japan in forty minutes; the fleet of Spain was destroyed in the harbour of Manilla in an hour and a half; the Spanish fleet at Santiago was sunk in a few hours; Nelson won the victory of Trafalgar in three hours. And if the British fleet is ever to be challenged by the German fleet, it will be challengd in the North sea, and the battle will be finished in not more than a few hours. We are interested in seeing to that, if the supremacy of Britain on the seas be challenged by Germany or any other power, our interest should be protected. And, if we have a feeling of loyalty towards the British empire, if we appreciate the advantages and privileges of living under British institutions, if we really desire the empire's success, if our conception of the destiny of Canada is that she should remain in that empire, we should be anxious to contribute to the strength of the only weapon that can protect the integrity of the empire

The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) was in Toronto a short time ago and made a speech there before the Ontario Club, which is reported in the 'Globe' of Friday, February 18 last. Speaking of us poor sinners on this side, he said:

> They disregarded the resolution of last session, in which they had concurred, that a contribution of money would not be satisfactory.

And further—

> He did not believe that the people of Canada to-day were going to send tribute across the Atlantic to be expended by other men.

Now, knowing the hon. Minister of Justice as well as I do, I was unwilling to believe that he would misrepresent the position taken by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and I set myself to ascertain, if possible, whether he had any excuse for making that statement. And I think I discovered it. Our minister of war (Sir Frederick Borden) delivered a speech here on February 10, and if hon. gentlemen will look it up, they will see that the hon. minister declared that the resolution that was presented by the Prime Minister last March was the one that was finally adopted by this House, and he puts it on 'Hansard' just as it appeared when first read by the Prime Minister. Let me read it to you:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House reaffirms the opinion repeatedly expressed by representatives of Canada, that under the present constitutional relation between the mother country and the self-governing dominions, the payment of any stated contribution to the imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be a satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

You will remember that that is the paragraph as it appeared in the resolution brought in by the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Militia has referred to that as the one finally adopted. But it was not so. The one that was finally adopted was changed to make that paragraph read 'the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the imperial treasury' would not be satisfactory. You catch the difference at once. The resolution as first brought in by the Prime Minister would prohibit us giving any monetary contribution under any circumstances. It was amended as I have said. The Minister of Militia, our minister of war, did not know then, and does not know now, that that amendment was made by the resolution. Not only the minister of war does not seem to have known of that amendment, but the Minister of Justice also. For I cannot believe that the Minister of Justice misrepresented the case. We studied law together, and I do not believe he would do such a thing; I choose to believe that he did not know that the resolution was amended so as to permit the giving of a monetary contribution. The Minister of Militia puts into this resolution a whole paragraph that was cut out:

The House has observed with satisfaction——

They actually wanted to put this in at first.

—the relief afforded in recent years to the taxpayers of the United Kingdom through the assumption by the Canadian people of considerable military expenditure formerly charged upon the imperial treasury.

It required a high degree of courage to propose to send that home to the old country when Sir William White had examined the dockyards at Esquimalt and Halifax, and had found that the government had allowed them to tumble to pieces. That paragraph is entirely cut out of the resolution as finally passed, but our war minister did not know it. There is no mistake about that, for I took the trouble to read his whole speech to see about it. Before reading the resolution, he said:

The hon. member for North Toronto introduced a resolution which was afterwards changed into the resolution which finally and unanimously passed this House. . . . Without detaining the House, I shall proceed to read that resolution.

Then he proceeds to read the resolution that the Prime Minister first brought in. I thought that perhaps he had made a slip, so I took the trouble to go to the Printing Bureau on the 21st of last month, to examine the proof-sheets, and I found that they had all been corrected, but the resolution was left there. And you will find it in the revised edition, as I have it here represented as having been finally passed, namely the one that the Prime Minister brought in first. So that accounts for the Minister of Justice making the statement he did in Toronto. He did not know that it had been amended—our minister of war did not know that it had been amended—he does not know now. He revised the proof-sheets and this is in the revised edition. It is going down to future generations of our people as the resolution passed by this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CROTHERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is not a laughing matter, it is really a very serious matter; because we may fairly assume that, not knowing when he delivered that speech on the 10th of February that that resolution had been amended, and not knowing three or four days afterwards when he revised the proof sheets, and not knowing it now, I think it is safe to assume that he carried over to England with him the original resolution. And what do we find him doing? On page 26 of the report of the Imperial Conference of 1909, we find the Canadian representatives explaining in what respect they desired the advice of the admiralty in regard to measures of naval defence.

They desired the advice of the admiralty in regard to the measures of naval defence, which might be considered consistent with the resolution adopted by the Canadian parliament on the 29th of March, 1909.

A scheme limited to torpedo craft would not in itself be a good means of gradually developing a self-contained fleet capable of both defence and offence.

Now, this was a private consultation, they dont give us the particulars. We can fancy what occurred. Sir Frederick had met the First Lord of the Admiralty before, and he introduced to him his hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and he told the First Lord of the Admiralty that this was the gentleman who was at the head of the department in Canada which the commission had found was lacking in conscience, and he asked the First Lord of the Admiralty what they could do to help strengthen the British navy. The First Lord of the Admiralty told him what you will find on page 23:

> If the problem of imperial naval defence was considered merely as a problem of naval strategy it would be found that the greatest output of strength for a given expenditure is obtained by the maintenance of a single navy with the concomitant unity of training and unity of command. In furtherance, then, of the simple strategical ideal, the maximum of power will be gained if all parts of the empire contribute, according to their needs and resources, to the maintenance of the British navy.

So when our minister of war first introduces the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the First Lord of the Admiralty says to him: Why, you can best assist to strengthen the navy by giving us a monetary contribution. Oh, but our minister of war had to say to him, I have in my pocket a resolution that the House of Commons unanimously passed.—Let us see that resolution. The resolution is brought out,—a payment of any contribution to the imperial treasury would not be satisfactory. He read the resolution he had with him, the one the Prime Minister had brought into this House at first and evidently that is the only resolution he knew anything about. The people of Canada wont stand for a monetary contribution. Well, it is very peculiar, the First Lord of the Admiralty said; how do you account for that? Why, the Minister of Militia says, I will tell you a little secret. The Prime Minister of Canada suffers from what is known in Canada as the brain storm of autonomy, an insidious malady that soon possesses all the mental powers and consumes all the nobler parts thereof; and when it reaches that stage the victim has the hallucination that not only himself, but every body else is troubled with the brain storm of autonomy. And that, Sir, accounts for this resolution that they wont contribute anything. Now, I submit that in all probability the whole matter has been misrepresented to the British admiralty, that the resolution of this House unanimously passed has never been presented to the British admiralty, that we must begin de novo and ab initio the whole thing. Why, our minister of war did not know the resolution we passed. I can scarcely believe it; but when you look at the 'Hansard', and look at the revised edition, and look at the corrections of the whole thing revised down in the Printing Bureau, you will find that the man who is minister of war of this Dominion does not know the substance of a resolution that was passed in this House to change the whole relations of Canada with the British empire. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the brain storm of autonomy—we must have autonomy. Why, every one knows that it is absolutely impossible that we should have absolute autonomy and continue in the British empire. We hav'nt it now. We do not appoint the Governor General, he is appointed by the home government. We do not appoint the ambassadors to foreign courts to look after our business there. Talk about autonomy! What have we to do with the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that decides the most important cases that arise in this country, interprovincial and between the Dominion and the different provinces and other important cases? We have nothing to say about the constitution of that court. So, Mr. Speaker, the only way we can get the autonomy from which the Prime Minister is suffering, is by separating from the British empire, that is absolutely certain. Talk about autonomy! Has the province of Ontario autonomy? Within a certain sphere she has autonomy; but when it comes to matters in which the whole Dominion of Canada is interested, then she has to submit to the people of the whole country. Has British Columbia to-day, sending a majority of Conservatives to this House, and Manitoba with a majority, and Ontario with a majority—have we autonomy, that is, have we a right to govern ourselves as we please? Not by any means. Why? Because we belong to the Dominion of Canada, we are part of the Dominion of Canada, and we have to submit to the majority of the people of Canada. And if we belong to the British empire, if we desire to enjoy the privileges and rights of British subjects, we cannot have perfect autonomy, it is utterly impossible. We have autonomy within a certain sphere, we have not absolute autonomy, and we cannot have it without absolute independence.

Then they talk about taxation. Why, I read to you a few moments ago that Sir John A. Macdonald made a motion that we should send to the British government at the time of the Crimean war $100,000. That was a greater sum to Canada then than $20,000,000 is now. How did it affect our autonomy? Have we had autonomy since, or have we been slaves of the British government ever since, because we voluntarily sent them $100,000? We sent $50,000 to France in aid of the flood sufferers; we sent $100,000 to San Francisco for the sufferers from the earthquake; we sent $100,000 to Sicily, without violating the great principle of autonomy; but we cannot send a dollar to assist the British navy without violating autonomy. England is contributing now $1,250,000 a year to assist Australia in building a large navy. British statesmen do not seem to understand anything about autonomy. They ought to come over here and get a few lessons from the Prime Minister of this country. When I listen to our friends on the other side from the province of Quebec speaking on this subject, I do not understand much what they say, but I can catch the word 'autonomy'. Sir Wilfrid has an idea that there will be trouble over the question of autonomy. I noticed to-day one of these gentlemen talking about taxation without representation. There is another thing. Why, this amendment was put into this resolution for the very purpose of allowing us to make a contribution to the British navy.

I promised my hon. friends opposite that I would give them some more information from the 'Globe' and I want to keep that promise because I think it may have some influence upon their votes. Here is what the 'Globe' said on March 31, last:

While the British fleet is master of the channel no European fleet could be a serious menace to the shores of Canada. . . . In the day of trial the all-important aim would be to make the imperial fleet so strong that the issue of a combat would not be doubtful.

On the day the resolution was passed, March 29, last, the 'Globe' said:

There can be no resisting the conviction, in view of these facts, that the mother country will accept the aid of her colonies at this time of crisis with thankful enthusiasm. Nothing is so likely to bring the mad competition to a stop as a conviction on the part of Germany that it is hopeless. In such case the colonies will be conferring a boon on the German taxpayers as well as on the British. We are not of those who believe that an invasion of Britain just now is feasible. That is not the danger. The danger lies in the future, when the German fleet would have arrived at a pitch of strength when there would be no need for evasion. There would be a direct challenge to a trial of strength, and if the German admiral prevailed, the British empire, as now constituted, would be at an end. English, Scotch and Irish valour would be of little avail. The islands would be beleaguered, their food supplies cut off and a surrender at discretion forced on them. That is a consummation which cannot be paltered with or derided, and while it is even remotely possible that every part of the empire must stand shoulder to shoulder in rendering it impossible.

I have another quotation from the 'Globe' on March 26 last, that will please these hon. gentlemen better. I want them to pay particular attention to this:

The sort of vessel that should be built is fixed by the circumstances. The competition now raging between Great Britain and Germany is in the direction of first-class battleships. If Canada were to build a little fleet of wasps and hornets it would have no moral effect on the situation at all. What we would like Canada to do would be to manifest by a veritable act that in this competition of the fleets she ranges herself proudly and gladly by the side of the mother country.

They were not in favour in those days of a fleet of wasps and hornets such as the present government is proposing to build.

I have another little extract from the 'Globe' that may be of interest to some of my hon. friends opposite. It was written some little time after the resolution was passed, viz.: April 7th last.

A good deal has been said about protecting the shores of the Dominion.

That is what our friends across the way are talking about now, protecting our coasts, protecting the coasts of British Columbia. They have some imaginary enemy over there on the Pacific who is going to attack British Columbia and they are proposing to send these wasps and hornets to repel that enemy.

A good deal has been said about protecting the shores of the Dominion. The only way to make our shores invulnerable is to make sure that the fleets which surround the British Isles are the unquestionable masters of the ocean.

That is the kind of material we want.

The only way to make our shores invulnerable is to make sure that the fleets which surround the British Isles are the unquestionable masters of the ocean. The moment she is in doubt, that moment Canada is in a position of danger.

Never mind the little wasps and hornets, the moment that British fleet in the North sea is in danger, Canada is in danger, if she has any love for the British empire and desires to remain in it.

The moment that is in doubt, that moment Canada is in a position of danger, and any vessel or vessels that the Canadian people could provide for shore defence would be but a feeble barrier against the foreign fleet or fleets that gained the mastery. The question which the admiralty should be asked to answer is: What can Canada do within her means that will be of most assistance to you? and that thing we believe the government is prepared to do with the backing of the whole people of Canada.

Still one more quotation from the 'Globe,' March 23rd last:

The Canadian people do not indulge an exaggerated opinion of what they can do to augment the mighty naval instrument which guards the integrity of the King's possessions. But if any rival nation is disposed to dispute the capacity of Britain to hold her supremacy at sea we should make it clear that in such a competition Canada is prepared to fling the smug maxims of financial prudence to the winds and do more than her share in the game of turning Dreadnoughts from the stocks. If the 65,000,000 of Germans have concluded that they can build more monsters of the deep than the 42,000,000 of Britishers, it is time that it should be brought to their attention that there are more Britishers than those in the British Isles. Plucky little New Zea-and has had the honour of uttering the first reminder. The Dominion of Canada ought not to leave New Zealand long alone in that respect. Within the next two years the colonies of Britain should be able to place three Dreadnoughts at the disposal of the motherland—and they should do it.

The British admiralty was consulted and they told them first that in order to strengthen the British navy the best thing they could do would be to give some money, but the British admiralty very generously, when they found they would not give any money, said:

The various circumstances of the overseas Dominions ought to be borne in mind.

Yes, the various circumstances.

Their geographical position has subjected them to internal and external strains, varying in kind and intensity. Their history and physical environment have given rise to individual national sentiment, for the expression of which room must be found.

5. In the opinion of the admiralty, a Dominion government desirous of creating a navy should aim at forming a distinct fleet unit; and the smallest unit is one which, while manageable in time of peace, is capable of being used in its component parts in time of war.

6. Under certain conditions the establishment of local defence flotillas, consisting of torpedo craft and submarines, might be of assistance in time of war to the operations of the fleet, but such flotillas cannot co-operate on the high seas in the wider duties of protection of trade and preventing attacks from hostile cruisers and squadrons.

A scheme limited to torpedo craft would not in itself be a good means of gradually developing a self-contained fleet capable of both defence and offence.

First they asked for money and if money was not forthcoming then a fleet unit. The representatives of Canada refused to give them either. And then, these gentlemen say that the British admiralty approve of what they are doing. The British admiralty is composed of gentlemen, and when they asked for money and were told they would not get it, and when they asked for a fleet unit and the representatives of the Canadian government said they would not provide it, then they said: how much money are you going to spend, and the reply was: we do not mind spending £200,000 or £300,000 a year; and we are told the British admiralty expressed their approval of that. Of course; they were gentlemanly enough to say: we are very glad you are doing that much.

Now, Mr. Speaker, under that resolution we have a perfect right to give this contribution. Let me say a word about that resolution. Every member of the House knows the circumstances under which that resolution was passed, and I do not think it is quite honest or fair for gentlemen opposite to go throughout the country and make statements that are not consistent with the circumstances. As the hon. member for Jacques Cartier said, it was no time for any man to express a dissenting voice in this House; it was considered in the interests of the empire that a united proposition should go across the ocean, and so it went. We all know that the hon. members on the other side, many of them, did not approve of that resolution. We all know, because we were intimate with some of them, that many of them on the other side of the House to-day do not approve of the Naval Defence Bill. We know that one of them said at the beginning of this session that the whole matter would be reopened if they were allowed to do it. Yes, if they were allowed to do it; but they are not allowed to do it. Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, Canada has never contributed a dollar to strengthen the British navy; it has never promised to contribute a dollar to strengthen the British navy. In 1907 the Prime Minister of Canada absolutely refused to do anything to strengthen the British navy. In 1907 the Prime Minister of Canada absolutely refused to do anything to strengthen the British navy. What do they propose to do? They propose to build a little fleet of wasps and hornets, as the 'Globe' says. And what will the Prime Minister do should war occur. Why, he has already told us he would go out and stump the province of Quebec and try to persuade his compatriots to jump upon the wasps and hornets as they were sailing down the St. Lawrence, and run across the ocean to the rescue of the motherland. As well might he try to persuade his compatriots to jump into the river St. Lawrence and swim across as induce them to go into the little wasps and hornets that the 'Globe' has described here. Mr. Speaker, the position of the government is a proposition that means interminable expenditure. We know that the British navy costs about $165,000,000 a year. Do we want to enter upon a project of that kind without taking into our confidence the people of this country? I used to object to this government having entered into a contract to construct the Transcontinental railway without consulting the people of Canada, but the cost of building the Transcontinental railway is but a drop in the bucket compared with the cost of building and maintaining a navy for ten years. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that for the protection we have already had from England during the 150 years she has been protecting us, even if we determine to build a navy now, for the protection we will have to get from her during the next twenty years while our navy is being constructed, it would be the part of honour, the part of self-respect for us to say: Here is $20,000,000 to assist you in rebuilding the British navy at a cost of $1,000,000,000. This country became a part of the British empire 150 years ago, and when the inscription by slow dissipation from the monument guarding the height, shall have worn, Wolfe shall live in the hearts of a new generation, a watchword of freedom to ages unborn.

Mr. J. O. DUBEAU (Joliette). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in continuation of this debate, I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House for any length of time. No doubt I could abstain from expressing my opinion otherwise than by my vote on the important Bill which is now before us, but I do not wish to allow any one to think that, by my silence I attempted to shirk the responsibility of the task entrusted to me by my electors.

For that reason I desire to define and explain the position that I intend to take.

In the first place allow me to say that the effect of this Canadian Naval Service Bill will not be to commit our country to an exaggerated and ruinous militarism, but that it will only enable us to depend upon a reasonable protection. Let me also add that if we feel to-day that it is our duty to undertake the creation of a navy, just as we saw fit, fifty years ago to organize our militia, it is certainly not for offensive purposes, but altogether for defensive purposes, for I feel quite certain that no one in this House or in the country has any warlike desire. We all want peace and quietness such as we have enjoyed for several years back.

But although we are animated by these sentiments, I hold that it would be foolhardiness on our part to fall asleep with the thought that our safety is complete judging from past experience and from the lessons of history, rather than from the declarations of optimists who go about loudly proclaiming everywhere that we have no need of defence. I contend, with no less conviction, that the time has come when Canada must begin the organization of a naval service such as provided for in the Bill.

I need not repeat here that Canada occupies in the world a position of which we may well be proud. We have a trade superior to that of several European countries. Providence has endowed us with water-ways which foreigners envy us. Before many years, our harbours will be able to compete with the best harbours in America. We have thousands of miles of railways running through the country from one end to the other. We have splendid cities, a fertile soil, a thriving agriculture, with a population of seven millions boldly marching onward in the path of progress. And having obtained from England the right of making our treaties, we are enjoying the fullest autonomy. This means that we have laid the solid foundation of a nation in whose destinies we have faith.

But, as it has been said, the extension of a country is not its protection.

It is enough for us to have developed our country as we have done; we are also bound to protect Canada from any danger which a conflict of interests might suddenly give rise to.

With this end in view, it is most desirable that we should gradually improve our means of defence both on land and on sea. For never could a nation exist and maintain itself, without possessing the necessary means to protect its own territory, and its commerce, as well as the means of safeguarding its material power and its moral prestige.

Engrossed as we are with the development of the wealth and of the natural resources of our country, we should not try to elude the responsibilities and the duties which devolve upon us as a nation, for the defence and the protection of the rich patrimony we are enjoying.

So far we have incurred comparatively heavy expenditures in order to place the country in a state of defence. We have started the organization of a permanent militia. We have taken over the garrisoning of Esquimalt and Halifax. We have built armouries and drill sheds which are most useful to our militia. We have in the province of Quebec a first class small arm factory. We are instructing in the military art many citizens of this country and more particularly the youth of our country.

Therefore I may say without any hesitation that, on land Canada has generously discharged her duty.

But a country like ours, bounded by two oceans and with a double sea-shore thousands of miles long, needs not only a land force but also a navy to protect her coasts, her sea-ports and her trade.

It is with this end in view that the government are now proposing to begin in a wise and cautious manner the organization of our naval forces.

This measure which is essentially within the realm of the representatives of the people is but the natural complement of a policy formulated several years ago.

In fact, the question of the desirability of organizing our naval defence is by no means new or novel.

It has been dealt with on more than one occasion. When our ministers went over to London to take part in the imperial conference of 1902, in order to examine the issues of concern to the empire, they declared that the government had the intention of undertaking the organization of a navy. The report of that conference came before this House the following year, and the result of the conference, as well as the position taken by our delegates, seemed to give satisfaction to the House.

Last year, the House unanimously agreed to a resolution embodying the policy formulated at the conference in connection with our naval defence.

But scarcely had the session been closed when some members of the opposition began denouncing the policy unanimously agreed to by this House, on the 29th of March last. And now in this House they are still directing their criticism and their attacks against this Bill respecting the Canadian naval service, although that Bill only aims at carrying out a policy which they approved of last year and the fundamental principle of which is laid down in the British North America Act, as well as in the Militia Act revised in 1893, and included in our Revised Statutes of 1906.

Why this change of attitude, if not for this reason, that the opponents of the government, on this question as on many other issues, are loath to depart from their favourite tactics consisting in preaching a different policy in the several parts of the country.

So it is that in the province of Quebec, they oppose the Bill on naval defence, under the pretense that it leads us to imperialism; while in the west and in Ontario our opponents denounce this Bill as at variance with the suggestions of the British admiralty and with our duty to the empire.

In Toronto as in Winnipeg, they tell the people that the Laurier government is disloyal to the empire, while in the province of Quebec they denounce Sir Wilfrid Laurier as a traitor to his race and as ready to sacrifice that race in order to take part in the wars of the empire.

But in spite of those appeals to prejudice and to popular feelings, the electors of Canada know very well how to appreciate the attitude of both parties and they endorse the truly Canadian policy laid down by the government in that matter.

The organization of a Canadian naval service is a measure which is called for by the development of the country.

Fifty years ago, we laid down the foundations of our militia. Its beginnings were unpretending indeed; but it went on gradually developing itself and to-day its usefulness and efficaciousness are questioned by nobody.

Why should we not do for our navy what we did for our militia?

Other countries which are not considerable nor wealthier than Canada and whose population is not so large as ours, such as the South American republics, have their own navy. Why should we not also have a navy of our own?

In virtue of what law are we to be dispensed from taking the means resorted to by other countries for their protection on land and on sea?

Is it the Monroe doctrine which thus warrants us in derogating to the general rule?

Does that doctrine warrant us in relying upon an efficacious protection on the part of the United States? It would indeed be sheer nonsense or recklessness on our part to look exclusively for security and protection, in time of war, in that ill-defined and vague doctrine which might perhaps never apply to Canada.

But even were that doctrine to apply, national self-respect and our personal interest should warn us to beware of accepting that doctrine as our only protection, because that doctrine is incompatible with our national development and with our notions of autonomy.

In fact, not only would it be humiliating for Canada to have to appeal for aid to the United States, but the practical result might be still more disastrous.

At what cost to us would not the United States give us that protection, and might they not demand that we should abandon to them a portion of our territory or that we should concede to them certain exorbitant privileges.

If we cannot rely on the Munroe doctrine for the defence of our country, we cannot either rely solely upon the protection of England.

In many cases, England could not come to our assistance, were she anxious to do so; for, to give an instance, she might be called upon to meet an enemy attempting to attack her in the very heart of the empire. Besides, the great distance at which she is from Canada and the risks and perils of the sea are so many obstacles that England might be powerless to overcome, at a given moment.

Therefore, we cannot leave to England alone the task of protecting our territory, our sea ports, our trade, our institutions, our homes, in short, our country. We have to find, in a confederation like ours, the elements of our defence, on sea as well as on land.

Such was the opinion held by Sir George Etienne Cartier, at the time of confederation, and as early as 1864, he formulated his programme in these words:—

> Another consideration of the greatest importance is the defence of the country. As we are now, a province cannot ask another province for assistance, in case of attack; but with confederations, we shall have an army of 300,000 men and a navy of 60,000.

The words I have just quoted go to show that this project of a marine is by no means an innovation, as it was referred to as early as the beginning of the era of confederation, and we find moreover that Cartier himself was in favour of the creation of such a navy, as he declares that it was one of the considerations which induced him to ask for the establishment of confederation.

Therefore, by contributing the policy of the government on that question and in repeating everywhere the statement made by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier at Lachine, that Canada stands in no need of a navy, the opponents of the government in the province of Quebec abandon the traditions of that great statesman, Sir George Etienne Cartier, while professing on every occasion to be his disciples.

But while, in the province of Quebec, the opponents of the government attack the naval defence Bill as inopportune and contrary to our autonomy, in the other provinces, the policy of the government on that question is being denounced, because we keep the control of the fleet and refuse to place immediately at the disposal of England a sufficient sum for the purchase of two Dreadnoughts.

But all those so-called objections to the policy of the government are refuted by each other.

In fact, while in the province of Quebec, the adversaries of the government oppose the establishment of a naval service, because they pretend that we should not then have the control of our navy, which would be under the direction of the British Admiralty in the other provinces, they attack the Bill now under consideration, because it enables the Canadian government to prevent the naval forces of Canada from acting in concert with those of the empire, in time of war.

While in the province of Quebec, the adversaries of the government claim that we are in no need of naval defence, that there is no impending danger, in the other provinces, they pretend that war is on the eve of breaking out in England, and that we should immediately place at the disposal of the imperial authorities a sum of at least $20,000,000, for the purchase of two Dreadnoughts, in order to guarantee the supremacy of England.

In short, while the opponents of the government ask for a plebiscite and want the people to be consulted as to the expenditure of about $15,000,000 for the construction of a fleet they are disposed to pay immediately into the imperial exchequer, without any previous consultation of the people, a sum of from $20,000,000 to $25,000,000, and even a great deal more.

In face of the diametrically opposed attitude of the government and of the opposition, I need hardly adduce any further arguments to destroy that legend which they are endeavouring to spread throughout the province of Quebec, to the effect that this Bill is but the result of a compromise between the right hon. the prime minister and the hon. the leader of the opposition.

If both have approved, as did the whole House, the resolution of the 29th March, 1909, it is quite evident to-day that the hon. the leader of the opposition, is supporting to-day by the amendments he has submitted, a policy different from that of the government.

Having to make a choice under such circumstances, between the government's Naval Bill and the suggestions coming from the opposition, I have not the slightest hesitation in giving my support to the government measure. I feel satisfied that such a policy is an absolute safeguard to our autonomy, that it is in conformity with our national aspirations, and that it will be approved of entirely not only by the great majority of the people of the county which I have the honour to represent, but also by a majority of the voters in this country.

I may add and it is, I think, to the honour of the electors of the county of Joliette to whom I, as in duty bound, explained the principal points of the policy formulated in the resolution of the 29th March, 1909, which the government is now implementing, that these explanations were favourably received in the different parishes of the county where meetings were held.

In voting as I propose to do at the end of this debate, I feel secure in the continued confidence of my constituents and in the execution of a duty as a Canadian and a British citizen.

Mr. JAMES J. DONNELLY (South Bruce) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, House adjourned at 11.33 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, March 3, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

SALE OF LAND TO W. F. CROSBIE.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

In reference to the cancelling of the sale of the northeast ¼ section of section 11, township 1, range 9, which W. F. Crosbie bought at the school lands sale held at Manitou on the 30th May, 1907, has the $208 Mr. Crosbie paid on this land been refunded to him or any portion of the $208? If so, what amount and when?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER:

No, this money was not refunded. The sale was cancelled at Mr. Crosbie's own request as he did not wish to complete the purchase at the price paid; and under the regulations of the department the money could not be refunded.

TIMBER SALE, GIANT'S TOMB ISLAND.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR:

1. Were tenders called for the sale of the maple, beech, basswood, birch and hemlock timber of nine inches and upwards at the stump on Giant's Tomb island, Georgian bay, in the year 1908?

2. If so called, in what newspapers was the advertisement published?

3. What was the date of the issue of the advertisement, and what time was allowed for tendering?

4. Was an estimate of the above different kinds of timber on the said island made prior to sale? If so, what was the date of the report, and by whom was the same made?

5. If a report was made, what quantities of timber of the above different kinds respectively was it estimated there were on the said island, and the value per thousand of same?

6. How many tenders were received, if any, the names of tenderers, amounts tendered, and name of successful tenderer?

7. If sold under said sale, has any cutting yet been done thereunder or payments made therefor?

8. Is any time fixed under contract of sale for removal of timber?

9. Did any of the parties tendering receive reports from the department as to the estimate by the department of quantities of timber?

10. Did the Indians ask to have the sale effected? If so, when?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Yes.

2. The 'Globe,' Toronto, two insertions; the Collingwood 'Bulletin,' Collingwood, two insertions; the Hamilton 'Times,' Hamilton, two insertions; the Meaford 'Monitor,' Meaford, two insertions; the 'Free Press,' Midland, two insertions; the 'Era,' Newmarket, two insertions; the 'Sun,' Owen Sound, three insertions; the Penetanguishene 'Herald,' Penetanguishene, two insertions.

3. Date of advertisement, 4th September; tenders receivable up to 1st October, 1908, at noon.

4. Yes. The report was dated 1st of May, 1900, and was made by the timber inspector of the department.

5. Estimated quantities of timber, and value including dues—Beech, 2,457,000 feet board measure at $2, $4,915.20; Maple, 720,000 feet board measure at $3, $2,160; Basswood and birch, 259,200 feet board measure at $2, $518.40; Hemlock and other woods, 500,000 feet board measure at $2, $1,000. Total, $8,593.60.

6. Two tenders were received, namely—D. S. Pratt, $3,600 bonus; The C. Beck Manufacturing Company, $3,750 bonus. The tender of the Beck Company, being the higher, was accepted. In addition to the bonus of $3,750, the company is to pay dues on timber cut according to tariff, which, on estimated quantities referred to in answer No. 5, should amount to $6,014.30, making a total of $9,764.30.

7. The bonus was duly paid and the ground rent and renewal fee have been paid to 30th April, 1909, but no returns of cutting have been received. It is assumed that no cutting has been done.

8. No time has been fixed for the removal of the timber.

9. No.

10. The Indians surrendered this island, along with others, for sale, on the 5th of June, 1856.

EXPORTS OF PRODUCTS.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

In reference to the Weekly Report of February 28, 1910, in which it states that the agricultural products exported were as follows:

1906..	$57,586,509
1907..	45,298,791
1908..	43,217,374
1909..	44,908,119

What are the different products included in this, and the amount of each exported in the four years named?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The information as published in the Weekly Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce referred to, is misquoted in the question put by the hon. member for Lisgar. The figures given in the question are the exports of animal produce, and not of agricultural products. In any case the information is too voluminous to be given in the form of an answer; it should be asked for in a return.

NAVAL SERVICE OF CANADA.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier for the second reading of Bill (No. 95) respecting the naval service of Canada, the proposed amendment of Mr. Borden thereto, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Monk.

Mr. J. J. DONNELLY (South Bruce). Mr. Speaker, it is now one month since the First Minister moved the second reading of this Bill, and during a very considerable portion of that month the time of the House has been taken up by hon. members who have dwelt at great length upon subjects which had very little, if any connection with the question before the House.

Indeed, at times it appeared to descend to a contest between hon. members to see who could fill up the most space in 'Hansard'. There are 221 members in this House, and if each availed himself of the privilege of speaking at length upon every important subject submitted for our consideration, the result would be that little or no progress would be made in the transaction of public business. I quite realize that an hon. member who introduces a Bill, and perhaps three or four others who know something about it should go fully into the subject, but subsequent speakers might show some consideration for their fellow members and for the public. and make an effort to condense their remarks. If there is not some improvement in this respect, I believe, Sir, we will find it necessary to introduce a third chamber; a sort of hot air chamber where the two and three hour men may have an opportunity of giving vent to their pent up feelings without causing loss of time and great expense to the country. In order to be consistent I shall make my remarks very brief. If the Navy Bill that we are now considering, should become law it will entail an initial expenditure of some $15,000,000 for the purchase or construction of the proposed navy, and it will also entail an annual expenditure of some $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 for its upkeep and maintenance. We will also have a naval college and a Navy Department, which, while they add to the already long patronage list of the government, will also introduce a non-producing element in our population. I am not one of those who are at all times disposed to carp at every expenditure, but I believe that before entering into such an enormous project as this, which will require such a great outlay of public money we should carefully consider what results we are likely to obtain. As well as I can gather from the hon. members who have spoken in support of this Bill, when this proposed navy comes into existence we will have two vessels of the Bristol type and two destroyers on the Pacific ocean, and two vessels of the Bristol type and four destroyers and the 'Niobe' on the Atlantic ocean. The avowed object of these warships will be to give us some naval protection. Well, if the days of the buccaneers had not passed into history there might be some justification for such a navy to guard our shipping from the depredations of modern Captain Kidds, but as a fighting force intended to compete with any of the existing navies which may attack our merchantmen or ocean ports, these ships would be utterly useless. We are told by some of the leading Liberal organs that these vessels will be so constructed that they will have considerable speed and be capable of eluding pursuit. That is a very fortunate thing, because if the smoke of one hostile Dreadnought appeared on the horizon they would be obliged to exhibit their speed in beating a hasty retreat, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a run away navy of that kind is a poor return for our money and not much of a credit to Canada. We have heard a good deal about the 'Niobe' which we are told will head the Atlantic squadron, and perhaps it would be as well to let hon. gentlemen know what kind of ship the 'Niobe' is, as described in yesterday's Montreal 'Star' which says:

> H.M.S. 'Niobe' is Severely Criticised—Useless as a Fighting Ship, declares 'Pall Mall Gazette' To-day—Most of her class suffer badly from Boileritis, says same Authority.
> (By Special Cable from our own Correspondent.)
> London, March 2.—(Copyright.)—Some naval authorities speak with contempt of the cruiser 'Niobe,' which the Canadian government have purchased from the admiralty. The 'Pall Mall Gazette' says: 'The 'Niobe' is one of the Belleville-boilered protected cruisers of the Diadem class. As fighting ships they are useless, and always were, being inadequately armed and armoured. Most of these cruisers have suffered badly from boileritis at one time or another, and have cost much in repairs.
> She is now doing duty as the flagship of the third division of the home fleet at Devonport, but will shortly be sent to Canada, taking out with her officers and petty officers, who are to act as instructors to the Canadian navy.
> WINDERMERE.

We will, therefore, have at the head of our navy a vessel which on account of her defective boilers is unseaworthy, a vessel which was launched about eleven years ago and which is now of an obsolete type. Now, Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with those who feel that a proper consideration for the British taxpayer, as well as a proper sense of self-respect, should incite us to assist in some way in the maintenance and upkeep of the British navy. For the past 100 years our Canadian sea-borne commerce has depended for its protection entirely upon the British navy, and with all due respect to the proposed Canadian navy, I think Canadian shipping will, for many years to come, have to depend on the protection of the same historic navy. The argument is sometimes advanced that in the past our shipping has not required any protection; but, Mr. Speaker, the undoubted fact is that if no protection were needed, it is because the sea-going commerce of Canada had behind it at all times the support and prestige of British men-of-war. Canada is a comparatively young country, a country of vast undeveloped resources. If any hon. members of this House believe that without the security which we enjoy as part of the British empire, we would be permitted to go on and develop this young country, I, for my part, do not share in that belief. For my part, I am most anxious that we should continue as part of the British empire. In this country all classes, all races, and I might say all creeds, enjoy a freedom and liberty such as they would not get under any other conditions. Our continuation as a part of the British empire, the continuation of the British empire itself, depends upon the supremacy of the British navy being maintained. Of the 400,000,000 people who make up the British empire only about 40,000,000 reside within the shores of the British Isles. The different portions of the empire are divided by vast stretches of ocean, and without the protection of the British navy, the ocean routes connecting the different parts of the British empire would be under the control of the enemy, and if the oversea supply of food were cut off from Great Britain, she would be brought under subjection in a very short time.

In advocating the giving of assistance to the British navy, I am not doing so with the expectation that that navy will be used on the offensive. I do it rather in the belief that we cannot have a better guarantee for general peace than the supremacy of the British navy. During this debate a good deal of reference has been made to the rapid manner in which the German people are increasing their naval power. I do not see that we have very much ground for complaint on that score. So long as the present conditions exist and until that happy day arrives when the differences between nations will be settled by arbitration, I believe the German people are quite justified in increasing the strength of their navy as rapidly as their resources permit. But our interest lies in the maintenance of Great Britain in her present position of supremacy so far as naval power is concerned. We seek no war with Germany. Many of the residents of this country, particularly in western Ontario, are of German origin; and for my part, as one who has had many opportunities of mingling and dealing with the German people, I must say frankly that whether, as farmers or manufacturers, or in any other occupation, they are very desirable citizens. As a class in this country, they have no superior. As residents of Canada, I believe them to be loyal British subjects; and should Britain be attacked, no matter whence that attack may come, I believe they would be ready to do their share in the defence of the empire. They are an industrious and progressive people, possessed of keen business instincts, and these instincts, as nearly as I can gather, cause them to object to the expenditure of the resources of this country in the creation of such a hide and go seek navy as is provided for by this Bill. Briefly speaking, I do not consider that our present resources would enable us to build an efficient navy, and in my opinion a weak navy is still worse than none at all. Our resources, however, are rapidly increasing, and the time will come when we shall be in a position to build an effective navy; but until that financial condition is reached, which will enable us to place a complete fleet unit on the Pacific and another on the Atlantic, such as we might look to, with some assurance, for naval defence, and such as would be capable of giving some assistance to Great Britain in time of stress, and further, until such time as the people of this country have had an opportunity to consider this question, and give the government of the day some mandate with regard to it, I think we should not undertake to build the navy.

I have always found it good doctrine to trust in the people and they will trust you. I think the government should consult the people in some way before imposing on them the heavy burden of a navy. In the meantime I believe we should give such voluntary assistance to the motherland as will show that we are British citizens, not in name only, but in fact, and that, so long as we enjoy the privileges of British citizenship, we are willing to accept the responsibility which attaches to that citizenship.

Mr. G. A. TURCOTTE (Nicolet). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I would not venture to take up at this moment the valuable time of the House, of which others might make a better use, were it not for the constant feeling that I owe to my constituents, to my political associates, and to the country in general, some explanation as to the vote I intend to give on the question now engrossing to such a degree the Canadian public mind.

Last year, when the government submitted their resolution of March 29, as regards the part Canada should take towards the defence of the empire, I was well aware of the responsibility incurred by those who would openly state their outspoken opinion under the circumstances. I knew that the whole Canadian people were awaiting with anxiety the verdict of their representatives on this question of the navy, one of the most burning and momentous in its consequences. And above all, I knew that in opening my mouth in this House to express conscientiously and openly an opinion adverse to the resolution, at any rate as a matter of expediency, I was running the risk of being made a target for the protests and sharp criticisms of those whose minds are overheated by imperialism. However, being anxious of fulfilling my duty and relying on the unalienable right of the man who under such solemn circumstances hies to the voice of his conscience, I stood up for the first time in this Canadian parliament and stated that at the present juncture, in a young country such as ours, we should apply our energy to other purposes than the creation of a navy, that we had other struggles to enter into than those settled by means of powder and guns. For human activity, constantly developing, requires from civilized nations numerous and violent efforts towards higher destinies, great and further sacrifices towards attaining their full development.

Those statements have been construed as an expression of opinion adverse to the establishment of a war navy. Now, sir, I repudiate that charge, and I say that never have I expressed such an opinion, neither in my speech of March 29, neither in private conversation; I merely questioned the desirability of creating such a navy at a time when our national expansion was only in its incipient stage and when so many gigantic undertakings, which cannot be dispensed with, were awaiting for their carrying out strenuous efforts on the part of the Canadian people. I believed and still believe that the wave of feverish patriotism, swollen by chimerical fears within the empire, and which has swept over our peaceful country, would pass away and that very soon the minds of the people, having recovered their composure, we would be at liberty to resume the race towards progress and development, without the burden of militarism which is weighing so heavily on the nations of Europe, and I might say on the whole world.

The imperial conference has taken place, and two Canadian ministers, whose high ability and attainments I have pleasure in recognizing, represented our country and vindicated the rights of the Dominion with a talent and energy worthy of admiration under circumstances so difficult and ticklish. As a result of that conference it was decided that Canada would build a navy to help in the defence of our coasts and the protection of our fisheries, that such navy, while autonomous and exclusively Canadian in its creation, armament and object, would co-operate with the British fleet whenever the people of this country deemed it desirable.

Mr. Speaker, I am in no way receding from the position that it would have been of more advantage to the country, and, in my humble opinion, more in harmony with the great principles of the Liberal party, to defer for some time yet the building of such a navy. I say in all seriousness that I would have felt a patriotic joy at seeing the people's money used for some other purpose. I would have rejoiced at seeing the Liberal party continue favouring the marvellous power of expansion with which the Canadian nation is endowed, continue developing the immense resources of the country, continue guiding and helping on the people on the safe way to moral and material progress, and maintaining harmony, concord and peace, sure pledges of prosperity and happiness.

However, since the question is to-day on the point of taking a new turn, and the proposal of a navy on the point of being carried out, the issue assumes still greater importance, and it is incumbent on us, representatives of the people, to take a decided and firm attitude and give or refuse our consent to the measure. In certain quarters, and from motives of despicable party interests, it is loudly proclaimed that the province of Quebec is altogether opposed to the establishment of a navy, and our accusers even go so far as to charge us with disloyalty. I am bound to protest and to protest energetically against such vile and unfounded aspersions cast upon the French people of Canada. Do those who launch such charges ignore how deeply is rooted in the French heart those feelings of honour which manifest themselves when occasion requires by deeds of uprightness, bravery and loyalty? The loyalty of the French Canadians to the British Crown needs no further proof, and the heroic deeds which they accomplished in the service of the foster motherland fill the pages of our history. These words, I rest assured, will find an echo in the hearts of my fellow-citizens who occupy seats around me in this House, and those unfair and foolish clamours, intended as an insult to the French Canadian name, will be met with universal scorn.

I have then no hesitation in saying that the French Canadians are primarily loyal to the country they live in, to the land of their birth, and wherein they labour and earn their families' livelihood. More than anything else, they have at heart the interests and greatness of their country; and I believe I am the faithful interpreter of the feelings of my fellow-citizens at this juncture, and that I am stating an actual fact when I say that this question of the navy interests them almost wholly from the view-point of Canada's interests and future. In agreeing to the proposal now before the House, they are desirous of protecting their own homes, safeguarding our rights, and the honour of the Canadian flag. Who will say that is criminal? In loving and defending Canada, is it not a part of the empire that they are loving and defending?

I intend supporting the present policy of the government, because the more, in my humbe opinion, we assert our national existence, the more we approach the state of national perfection and the closer we get to the status of independence. And I trust that such a status will be conceded to us while we continue to enjoy the present political system, the most perfect to my mind.

Timorous or narrow-minded men, blinded by an unconquerable fanatacism will possibly take exception to such an expression of opinion; but to set their mind at ease, I beg of them to listen to a few words of explanation, and, in the first place, to remember that a rather small group of English-speaking people settled on this American continent one day wished to be free, gloriously shook off her yoke and broke by the force of arms the ties which united them to the mother country, England.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in one of his outpours of sarcasm, taunted the right hon. leader of the Liberal party for having in bygone days advocated independence for Canada. I fail to see there anything objectionable, anything which could justify the taunts of the deputy leader of the opposition. Is it not proper and fair to acknowledge that the Canadian people gravitates towards and aspires after a state of perfect development, complete maturity, which cannot be, after all, anything but independence, if not annexation. Has not that Dominion of Canada, with her great natural resources, her railways, her canals, her numerous manufactures and her traffic, her fine merchant navy, her intelligent population, sprung from the two finest races in the world, has not that Dominion, I say, enough reliance in the vitality, the energy of her people, in their intelligence and morality, in the strength of her judicial and parliamentary institutions, in her leaders to wish for and obtain a political status more perfect and more in harmony with the aspirations of her citizens?

Do we not read in the annals of the world that colonies of great nations, after attaining their perfect development have separated from the mother country, and become independent nations? Do we not see the same thing going on in the family, which is a complete social organism by itself. Nay, does not nature itself make it the law of being deprived of reason? The people of the United States, in an outburst of admirable philanthropy—a fact worthy of being inscribed in golden letters on the tablets of history—have given proof of their greatness and loftiness of mind, of their moral and intellectual progress, by conceding to the Spanish colonies their independence, thereby proclaming to the civilized world that independence is the supreme privilege of a nation.

Let me quote as regards that question of the independence of Canada, the opinion of men whose ability and experience in political matters compare favourably with those of the fiery tribune of the opposition, the hon. member or North Toronto:

The Montreal 'Post' on independence.—There is no use in disguising the matter. The time has come, if not for Canadian independence, at least for full and free discussion on a subject fraught with so much that is important to Canada. It cannot be frowned down; its advocates must be heard, and heard with the same amount of attention bestowed on the statesmen, who, in their generation, were instrumental in bringing about such changes as those involved in the abolition of the seigniorial tenure, secularization of the clergy reserves, confederation and the national policy.

If leading journals such as the 'London Times,' 'Daily News,' 'Standard,' and 'Pall Mall Gazette,' thought fit to discuss the question of Canadian independence, why should Canadian organs of public opinion who are much more interested in the matter—who are vitally interested in the matter—be debarred from following their example? And here may be the proper place to remark that while not one public man in Canad that we know of, and certainly not of any newspaper of any influence, has suggested the advisability of annexation to the United States—a great many of them favour independence. The late hon. Mr. Howe, of Nova Scotia, Sir A. T. Galt, the hon. Mr. Huntington, the hon. Wm. McDougall and many others of our most distinguished men have at different times pronounced themselves in favour of Canadian independence, but none of them ventured to pronounce the word annexation.

Canadian Emancipation 1880.

We know that Mr. Gladstone, in 1870, advocated the separation of the colonies from the empire, and at the same time the right hon. W. E. Foster said: 'The common belief is that Canada must some day become independent. This common idea will become one of those which realize themselves.' Now we do not believe that those men changed their sentiments since then.

Leading British statesmen favour Canadian independence.—Mr. Huskisson, colonial secretary, said: 'He thought the time had come for the separation of Canada from the mother country, and an assumption of an independent state.'

Lord Howick said: 'There could be no doubt that in time all our foreign colonies would become independent of the mother country. Such an event was certain, and we ought in time to prepare for the separation not by fortifying Canada, but by preparing her to become independent.'

Mr. Cobden said: 'There will be no repetition on our part of the policy of 1776 to prevent our North American colonies from pursuing interests in their own way. The Earl of Ellenborough said: 'He hoped the government would communicate with the North American colonies with the view to separation.'

Lord Brougham: 'He was one of those who desired a separation of Canada from the mother country. The idea was not novel; it had been entertained and pressed by many eminent men. It was an opinion shared in by Lord Ashburton and Lord St. Vincent.

A member of the House of Commons on a recent occasion declared: 'that the relation between Canada and Britain was rotten and mutually deceptive.' A cabinet minister said: 'He looked forward without apprehension and without regret to the separation of Canada from England.' In 1864 Lord Derby, a former leader of the great Conservative party in England, said: 'In British North America there is a strong movement in progress in favour of federation, or, rather, union of some shape. We know that these countries must before long, be independent states.'

Mr. Gladstone, when leader of the British government, in 1870, in advocating the separation of these colonies from the empire said that: 'The present government do not claim the credit of adopting or introducing any new policy, and persons of authority of every shade of politics have adopted it.'

Mr. Lowe in a recent speech in parliament said: 'We should represent to Canada that it is perfectly open to her to establish herself as an independent republic; it is our duty, too, to represent to her that if, after well-weighed consideration, she thinks it more to her interests to join the great American republic itself, it is the duty of Canada to deliberate for her own interests and happiness.

Lord Grey in the House of Lords in 1870, said: 'The principles laid down by succesive colonial secretaries must necessarily lead to a dissolution of the British empire.'

Lord Russell said: 'If the North American colonies felt themselves able to stand alone, and showed their anxiety either to form themselves into an independent country, or even to amalgamate with the United States, he did not think it would be wise to resist that desire.'

Hon. Joseph Howe, when in England, heard a noble marquis say: 'Those British Americans may go and set up for themselves to the United States, and no power will be used to prevent them.' 'Not a man rose to contradict this statement.'

Lord Monck, our late Governor General, said, from his place in the House of Lords: 'It is in the interests of the mother country that Canada should be taught to look forward to independence. He believed that the policy of the government tended towards such independence, and it was on that account that he gave the government his support.' He alleged that the tie which connects Canada with Britain was a mere sentimental one, that the connection had ceased its uses, and that the colonial relations to Britain were dissolved when the confederation was consummated, and that the true mission of Canada was to proclaim its independence.

Sir George Campbell said: 'Canada has grown to maturity. I would let it go free without more delay, and would relieve this country of the many embarrassments to which the connection may give rise. Canada, I believe to be, under present arrangements, a burden and a risk to us.'

The Right Hon. W. E. Foster said: 'The common belief is that Canada must some day become independent, and this common idea will become one of those which realize themselves.'

Surely, these are weighty opinions and quite favourable to the idea of independence; they were given expression to by Englishmen occuying positions of responsibility in the social and political world, and whose testimony should forestall the extravagant and flighty utterances of our fiery loyalists. The right hon. Prime Minister is, as a matter of fact, in complete harmony with representative and prominent men in the British empire, and that circumstance, to my mind, should make up for the great sorrow he might feel at finding himself differing on that question from the hon. member for North Toronto. The latter hid his face for shame in the course of his speech, and cried for scandal at thinking that a Canadian had been so bold as to express the hope that his country might some day become independent. He should now show a face reddening with anger, he should shrivel up with indignation at hearing or mediating over the propositions quoted above in connection with independence, and which have been advocated by the best men and the most brilliant statesmen of Great Britain.

Independence seems to be, in some quarters, a scarecrow, the nightmare of those in whose eyes the interests of Canada are of little account and who reserve their love and loyalty for the empire. But, I put the question to these hon. gentlemen: Will not Canada sooner or later have to choose between annexation and independence? Are we destined to remain a colony forever, and should not the true Canadian, who really loves his country above all, have the rightful ambition of seeing it one day free and independent? It ill becomes politicians of many years experience, who have witnessed the succession of great events and political changes which are today consigned in the annals of the country, who have seen the nation grow, and are cognizant of its vigour and immense resources, it is not patriotic nor loyal, I say, on the part of these men to set obstacles in the way of the full development of our political organization, and to contend that we must remain forever under the protection of the British flag. But, thank God, I am satisfied it will not be so, and the establishment of a war navy will in my humble opinion, be the last step towards independence.

That is the view I take more particularly, and I might say exclusively, when giving my support to the Liberal policy at this juncture. I speak from the Canadian point of view, and I think that my viewpoint is also that of the greater number of electors in my constituency, and I would even say of the majority of electors in the province of Quebec.

I mentioned a moment ago opinions which have been given expression to by representative Britishers, and it would be an easy matter to quote others in the same strain. Are these men all traitors to their country? They would be in the estimation of the hon. deputy chief of the opposition, who, in a spirit of excessive and noisy loyalism, has in sharp and even insulting words taunted the Prime Minister of this country for being so bold as to wish independence for his country.

Young as we are as a people, we Canadians have a part, and a most important part, to play on this continent of America. We have as neighbours a people who under the folds of the flag of independence has made giant strides towards the topmost goal of modern civilization, and we should, following in their footsteps, direct our activity and our national energies towards attaining the same object, and accordingly be ready to meet any emergency.

Fortunately, we shall not be confronted with such obstacles as slavery and the terrible conflict between the North and the South which confronted them on the way to the full development of their civilization. Besides, there are in this country only two strong races, whose great moral, religious and intellectual characteristics have admirably prepared them for reaping the benefits of civilization. While in the United States various ethnical groups are to be found whose conflicting interests cannot be easily conciliated, with the result that progress is impeded through lack of unity in matters language, religious beliefs, customs, manners and ideals.

My hon. friend from Beauce (Mr. Béland) in his eloquent and truly masterful speech which the whole House has admired and applauded, seems to think that independence is autopy, a dream never to be realized, and even more, making for a political status which would be directly inimical to the interests of the province of Quebec. I very much regret differing from my hon. friend on that point. He contended that independence was a danger for the province of Quebec, inasmuch as it might imperil the educational and religious previleges of its people. Now, has independence brought about such results in the United States? Is there a country in the world where religion and education are freer? Have ever any complaints in that respect been voiced by our co-religionists living there? A rather restricted French community settled in the south of the United States, have succeeded in maintaining their form of speech their manners and their religious beliefs though living under social and political conditions quite different from ours. The same may be said of the French Canadians in the eastern States. We French Canadians, compose a homogeneous and extensive provincial group, showing great zeal for and attachment to their church and institutions.

Besides, my hon. friend's contention might be taken as impugning the spirit of tolerance of our English speaking fellow-citizens, and that I cannot agree to. That status of independence which its opponents always consider as necessarily linked with violent separation from England, could to my mind be brought about in altogether different fashion, that is in a peaceable way and with the consent of the British authorities. There has existed in the mother country for several years past, a strong movement for the abandonment of Canada. The measure of independence which we have acquired up to date, we have secured without any clash or measures of violence, and I think we might succeed in attaining complete independence very peacefully and without any friction. Indeed, do we require much more than we have at present to be perfectly independent. All that is required is the consent of Great Britain. We are allowed to negotiate our own treaties, and the powers of the Governor General nowadays amount to very little. I shall quote from page 121 of a book entitled 'Canadian Emancipation,' wherein Sir A. Galt is made to speak as follows:

> Sir Alexander states that the relations of Canada to the empire have been put on a new basis of semi-independency; that we have entered on a new departure. The Governor General is no more a connecting link between Great Britain and the Dominion, he is simply the administrator of the confederation. Sir A. T. Galt has assumed, in his place, all the higher duties of representing the interests of Canada at the Court of St. James, of negotiating all arrangements between the two countries. In fact, our High Commissioner is the only person now authorized to address the imperial government, as well as to enter into relations with foreign nations, as the appointed representative of the Dominion of Canada. Our High Commissioner assumes at once the rank and duties of a diplomatic envoy, while the Governor General remains a simple employee of the colonial office, the official head of the government of Canada.

The various phases through which our political status has passed, leading providentially to independence, are, if I am not mistaken, as follows: The union of upper and lower Canada, confederation, the Militia Bill, the appointment of a high commissioner in London, the granting of the treaty-making privilege, and finally the Navy Bill.

The prospect of independence, is a matter of great rejoicing to me, as I perceive it will be for the happiness of my country, and I trust that in the near future England, whose generosity will expand with the progress of civilization and who will realize the desirability of lightening the task of watching over her immense dominions, will grant us our independence. The history of all great empires will repeat itself. Independence sums up the highest aspirations of a people who wishes to assert himself, to act untrammelled and take its place under the sun in company with its fellow people.

There are any number of cases which go to prove that independence is the natural destiny of colonies of great empire and powers ruling over great dominions outside the realm proper. At the close of the last century, the United States of America set the example of emancipation and proclaimed themselves independent on July 4, 1776. Then we have the emancipation of the Spanish colonies. Spain having been weakened through her wars with France, her colonies took occasion of it to proclaim themselves independent, Argentina in 1810, Bolivia in 1825, Chili in 1810, Columbia and Venezuela in 1819, Mexico and Peru in 1821, Uruguay in 1820. In the meantime, the small republics of Central America were constituting themselvss and the last emancipation was that of Cuba on December 10, 1898.

Turkey has lost the greater number of her dominions in Europe, and among others Greece in 1821, and Bulgaria in 1909, not to speak of the other Balkan states. Crete has broken away and joined Greece; Egypt has become a British protectorate. At the time of the revolution, France lost the island of Hayti, which now comprises two republics very badly governed. The great republic of Brazil was once a Portuguese colony, but it was constituted into an empire in the interest of a branch of the royal family of Portugal. About ten years ago, the last Emperor, Pedro II, was dethroned and the republic proclaimed.

In ancient times Greece had a great number of colonies which the downfall of Athens caused to dwindle. Some of those colonies were powerful, and notably Carthage, a Phoenician colony which defied the Roman power. Rome in its turn had numerous colonies, and at the time of the great invasions, these colonies became independent. Even Great Britain was at one time nothing but a Roman colony. True the populations of those ancient colonies did not speak the same language as the inhabitants of the metropolis. An exception should be made for Gaul. In America, the settlers which have drifted away from their mother country still speak the language of the European countries whence they are sprung.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the question is sufficiently important and interesting just now to warrant at least one member of the House to speak favourably of it, and I may assure my fellow members, and especially our staunch loyalists, that it is not through disrespect for or suspicions towards the English nation or its illustrious Sovereign, who plays such a brilliant part in the working out of its destinies, that I take this stand; it is solely through love of country and loyalty to Canada.

The fears haunting the minds of the opponents of independence were in evidence at the time confederation was being discussed, and the influence of statesmen, particularly that wielded by Sir George Etienne Cartier, had to be exerted in order to dispel those fears. The latter expressed himself in the following terms:

> As to the objection that we cannot form a great nation, because Lower Canada is mainly French and Catholic, while Upper Canada is English and Protestant, and the maritime provinces made up of both elements, it is to my mind most trifling. Then again: Let us take for example the United Kingdom peopled by three great races...

All that Sir George Etienne Cartier may have said on that chapter in favour of confederation, is applicable to independence bound with the same federal system which we are enjoying. It is not only because we are a colony within a kingdom ruled by a constitutional monarchy that our privileges are safeguarded; these privileges are linked with our very institutions, and these would be done away with under a status of independence.

Cartier in a speech to the people of Ottawa on May 25, 1867, spoke as follows:

> People in England are satisfied that, being acquainted with our needs better than any others, we should be left at liberty to govern ourselves and that the sanction of the British parliament should be a mere matter of form.

I was proud and happy to hear my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Wilson) though not entertaining the same views as myself in regard to independence, quote the remarkable utterances of his Grace Bishop Farthing, of Montreal, who solemnly asserts, and in no uncertain terms, the independence of the Anglican church of Canada. That illustrious prelate, speaking in the name of the churchmen of Canada stated that the Anglican church is and will remain independent of that of the United Kingdom. We are, he said, a daughter of the Church of England, but a daughter who wishes to be free in this Dominion and lead a separate existence; we are not to remain forever under the control and authority of the mother whose house we have left and for whom, nevertheless, we still have the greatest attachment. We are a national church, perfectly independent, and in the same way that the parliament of Canada speaks in the name of the nation, the general Synod of Canada speaks in the name and for the Anglican church of Canada, and I proclaim that church the most democratic in Christendom.

That statement has a great meaning in the mouth of an Englishman, endowed with a sacred mission. The inference is clearly that, if independence has become a matter of necessity in religious matters, it is or will soon be a necessity in matters of less exalted though just as important order, politics.

Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of being called a nationalist, after my speech of last year in reference to the navy. Well, I am a nationalist, though not in the narrow sense ascribed to that word even in connection with politics. I intend working in the interests of the whole Canadian people without distinction of nationality. It does not behove a good and loyal citizen, under circumstances as momentous as these, to stump one particular province, with the view of boosting certain exclusive views, of working on the prejudices of the people, and of appealing to their racial feelings. That is doing most dangerous work, which is of a nature to mislead the people and set up race against race. All good citizens must know that the intimate union of the various races inhabiting the country, the maintenance of the best of feelings between them, constitute one of the surest pledges of the greatness and prosperity in any nation. I may mention boundaries diverse races live in harmony, in close union, and wherein such absurd and revolutionary teachings as we sometimes hear are never given expression to. Belgium especially should be mentioned; it presents to the world the remarkable, I was going to say, unique case of a nation weak in numbers, but strong, and great through constant and intelligent labour, through its vitality and the high order of intelligence of its leaders, who in all channels of human activity safely direct national energy.

Before letting the heart dictate what we are to do, we should let reason and intelligence have their say. We owe love and devotion to our fine province, but above all we should be loyal to our country, Canada. Let us meet our English-speaking fellow-citizens on every ground, and let us work hand in hand with them, in all things which duty dictates and circumstances require.

If there ever was a time when we who belong to the fine French race should show ourselves in our true light, that is generous and conscious of the duties incumbent on us as citizens of this country, it is just now. I am quite willing to be a nationalist, that is, to champion the rights and privileges of our race at all times and in all places, if those rights are imperilled or denied; but I do not intend being narrow and mean in my views, and thereby detract from the dignity of the French name, especially under circumstances such as these. One of the most sacred of those duties is surely to defend efficiently the country which is dear to us, since the nation's vitality and the state of our finances inspire us with sufficient confidence in our own resources. I may add that from an exclusively Canadian standpoint the providing of a war navy has become of absolute necessity if we wish to give some evidence of our aptness for a status of independence. At this stage of national expansion and vigour which we have reached, provided with a merchant navy of great importance, I might say one of the largest in the world, and navigating all seas, we should take the means to protect that fleet. For, being a nation within the empire, a title which we are proud to claim, it is incumbent on us to take the responsibility and assume the burden of safeguarding the integrity and liberty of our trade, by having a sufficient number of warships.

I am of opinion that every Canadian who takes an interest in the welfare and future of his country, whatever his nationality may be, should support the government in the present juncture, and should endeavour to spread the idea that having reached maturity as a people, we should have a navy of battleships which will indirectly help the empire while defending Canada. It must be admitted that so long as we remain a British colony the most vital interest of our country as well as the most brilliant prospect in days to come, will, as it were, be dependent on the success, the greatness and the glory of the British empire. But the day will come, and my most earnest desire is to see it reached when relying solely on our own strength, our own energy and our own resources, we will be at liberty, like the sister nations of free America, to proudly fulfil our destiny under the flag of independence.

The deputy leader of the Conservative party, who has undertaken the burdensome task of taking his friends out of the cold shades of the oposition in to the Eldorado of power, has endeavoured to throw as much discredit as he possibly could on the province of Quebec, through insinuations, reservations, false and malignant imputations. In long and impetuous sentences, wherein sarcasm and irony oftentimes were substitutes for weighty reasons; he made a mighty endeavour to minimize the effect of the speech of the right hon. the Prime Minister, and palliate the prestige of his opinion and his name. He even tried to represent as a traitor to the British Crown the leader of this House, whose name is uttered with respect and admiration throughout the whole world, and whose talents, I might say, whose genius has impressed the most eminent men of Europe with its power of conception and its soundness of judgment.

The great warhorse of our friends on the other side is loyalty, and one after the other these gentlemen get on their feet, and more or less openly charge the Canadians of French origin with lacking more or less in loyalty. One might think that they are, forsooth, the vestals of that sacred fire, loyalty, devotion to the mother country. But when have the French Canadians ever shown disloyalty? Is it when my fellow-countrymen willingly and through pure zeal for the British cause went over to fight on the battlefields of Africa? I say pure zeal, and I have reason to say so, because in their French Canadian hearts, these soldiers had sympathy, to say the least, for that people of heroes, the Boers, who, like themselves in 1837-38, sacrificed the purest of their blood to vindicate their rights, their liberty and defend their homes and their families. History, in her finest pages, will have to judge these men, and I am satisfied that future generations will recall with enthusiasm and pride their dignity, their greatness and their heroic virtues. Inquire from the courageous Deputy Minister of Militia, that young French Canadian who has done honour not only to the French name, but to English citizenship, inquire from him how his fellow-countrymen behaved in the bloody battles of the Boer war.

Loyalty, which you extol so forcefully, is indeed a fine and noble disposition of the soul and of the heart, but whoever grasps the meaning and purport of the word is capable of being moved by it; that is not your exclusive privilege. On the contrary, you associate and confuse to such a degree, and on so many occasions, that noble sentiment with the low machinations of a mean political purpose, that you deprive it of its lustre and its beauty. We should, to begin with, be loyal to Canada by showing fairness and respect for the man whom the sovereign people of this country have placed at the head of the government, and who represents supreme authority in this parliament. You convert loyalty into a vile election machine, and when the elections come on you will be heard proclaiming loudly your love and your devotedness to your mother country in certain provinces, while in others you will make fun of your exaggerations. Without any definite policy or principles, you will then give the country an exhibition which you seem to have a taste for, that of a divided party preaching to-day some kind of policy which to-morrow will be discarded and replaced by one exactly of opposite aims, as you have done on that question of the navy. Continue to do as you have been doing. We are the calm and amused witnesses of your vain outpours of verbosity, we are greatly amused on this side of the House at your unsuccessful endeavours, at your differences and sudden changes of opinion. And above all, we admire your blind submission to the real leader of the opposition for the time being, the hon. Mr. Roblin, who under cover pulls the wires which command every move.

Alas, what would Macdonald and Cartier say if they could only be witnesses of what is going on to-day in the ranks of their erstwhile party? They had clear and clean cut principles of policy, and with a firm hand lead the ship confided to their care. The people of this country, with their characteristic keen and thorough insight into matters, will soon have sized up your policy and detected its narrow and shifting tendencies, in contrast to that of our party, which is broad, resolute, openly favourable to national autonomy, and at the same time safeguarding the rights and interests of the people.

I shall now bring my speech to a close, Mr. Speaker, but before doing so, I wish to thank my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clarke) for his flattering words of reference to the French Canadians in the course of the remarkable speech he delivered last week on this question. The sarcastic deputy leader of the opposition called him, in ironical and unfair fashion, a little Englander. The hon. member from Red Deer possesses a sound judgment, absolutely free from unworthy prejudices, and a soul noble enough and great enough to be fair towards his fellow countrymen of different origin, and it is with the help of men such as he that a country like ours may hope to succeed in attaining the high destiny of nations. Mean and uncompromising fanaticism is no longer tolerated.

The stand I am taking on this question, I realize it fully obliges me to sacrifice ideas which I have vindicated in all sincerity for almost forty years past, and that sacrifice I make for the sake of my country and not for the sake of my party, I say so with absolute frankness. I have perfect and implicit trust in the new stand taken by my party, and since circumstances and political exigencies have induced our leaders to adopt the present policy in regard to the establishment of a war navy, I bow willingly to their greater experience and wisdom and will vote for the measure. In public life, as in private life, if necessary at times to sacrifice personal opinions of long standing towards forwarding the general good.

(Rien n'est plus dur que le devoir en concurrence avec ce que l'on affectionne.) (Lacordaire.)

(Faites votre devoir, et laissez faire aux dieux.) (Corneille.)

I heard our great leader a few days ago, in a speech vibrating with eloquence and rich in great and noble thoughts, assert that our autonomy would be safeguarded, and indeed it is safeguarded by this Bill, as far as possible under the circumstances. I have implicit confidence in the utterances of my chief. And why not? Have not hon. gentlemen opposite the same trust in the utterances of their leader? The Militia Bill can be compared to this, and in spite of ill feeling, I might even say the terror it inspired to the French Canadian people, it became law. Its promoter, Sir G. E. Cartier, appealed at the time to his fellow-citizens of the province of Quebec, showed the absolute necessity of having an armed force and explained the tenor of that Bill, thus restoring confidence in regard to that policy of militarism. Yes, I repeat it, I have confidence in the policy of my leader.

One word more, besides a few quotations which I would like to make with a view to throwing some cold water on the sacred fire of overdone loyalism which is consuming the heart of my hon. friends opposite. I take the liberty of quoting some distinctly British views on Canada and its value from the British viewpoint.

The following is an extract from 'Canadian Emancipation,' vol. 2, page 39:

WOULD GREAT BRITAIN ATTEMPT TO DEFEND CANADA?

We are told that, being a dependency of Great Britain, in case of war, we would be supported by the army and navy of the British enpire. No sane man will entertain that proposition. Some time previous to confederation, Colonel Jarvis, an imperial officer, made a report on the defence of Canada. He recommended the construction of important military works in the province of Quebec, and said: unless these works are constructed it is more than useless to continue any British force in Canada.' The works recommended have not been constructed, and England has withdrawn her forces.

What are the sentiments of leading British statesmen on the question? 'Britain's annual expenditure in defence of Canada, 'said Mr. Gladstone,' is a very heavy charge, and it is our duty in every way to get rid of it.' Sir Chas. Adderley said: 'I believe the Canadians are much more likely to involve us in a war than we are to inflict one upon them, and that Great Britain cannot undertake to defend the colonies for the sake of the Canadians.' The Duke of Newcastle said: 'The cost of all war should be borne by those for whose benefit it is carried on.'

John Bright asserted, in his place in parliament, that 'there is no statesman in England who will venture to bring about the shedding of one drop of blood in defence of British North America.'

Mr. Aytoun said: 'He never had met with any man, not a member of the government, who considered that it was possible to defend Canada against an attack in force by the United States.'

Sir C. W. Dilke says: 'We defend the colonies only during peace; in war time they are ever left to shift for themselves.' Mr. Cardwell: 'it is an almost universally accepted principle of English policy that it is no longer desirable to maintain a standing army to defend our distant colonies.'

The 'London Times' says: 'We are quite aware that, in the event of war, we should not be able to render effectual aid to our Canadian Dominion, and that our fellow subjects out there would either have to fight at a terrible disadvantage, or mortify our pride by anticipating defeat and yielding to terms. In a national point of view that would be no loss to this country.'

Before closing this speech, Mr. Speaker, I am bound to refer to some utterances of the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes), who, in the course of an address very agressive in tone as regards my fellow countrymen, committed a grievous mistake by qualifying as rebels the patriots of 1837. Lord Strathcona is far from being of the same opinion, and here is what he says (I am quoting from the 'Memories of Robert Bouchette,' a book annotated by our learned and congenial librarian, Mr. A. D. Decelles, page 8):

The rebellion of 1837, directed not against England, but against colonial maladministration, was perfectly justifiable. (Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal).

These noble words fully avenge us, we of the French race in this country; they are a well deserved rebuke for the hon. member. While listening to the insults he deliberately flung at the French Canadian people when he characterized the patriots of 1837 as cowards and traitors, I was moved by a feeling, not so much of indignation as of pity, and I said to myself: the hon. member, though a soldier, does not know of the awful horrors of a battlefield; no, he is only a parade officer utterly ignorant of the grandeur, the beauty, the nobleness and the heroism implied in the deed of the brave soldier who falls under the enemy's bullets, martyr to the love of country, victim of his convictions. In order to cover, Mr. Speaker, if possible, the sound of those words of insult and obloquy aimed at the Canadian people, I wish I could impart to my voice a power which it does not possess, and cry out: Chénier, the great Chénier, and that phalanx of brave men who have fallen under the bullets of bureaucracy, were heroes, and history will speak of them as men of courage, who have died for a great principle and for a noble cause.

In concluding, I wish to state the reason which induces me to vote in favour of this measure. They are, in the first place, the great confidence I have in the policy so well defined by my right hon. leader; in the second place, the political status and relationship of our country to Great Britain; and in the third place and above all, the interest I take in my country and the conviction I have that the establishment of a war navy will be the last step towards a higher political status, and one in greater harmony with national aspirations, independence. However, that independence, I wish for it only inasmuch as it could be obtained through the good will of Great Britain and with her full agreement; for I am free to acknowledge that to Great Britain we owe all that we are to-day, and I am proud to proclaim myself her loyal and devoted subject.

Let us provide armaments, it is the duty of the hour, but I wish most ardently to see the day when the people will loudly call out to militarism: Stop, it is time to disarm. Long enough has our blood been spilt and our flesh been tortured to satisfy the ambitions and hatred of the governing classes and war mongers. The general trend of opinion is even now, though unperceived, working towards that goal, and when democratic ideas will have prevailed through universal sufferage, and organized labour will act in co-operation with those who have freed themselves of the fetters of plutocracy, then shall we see peace triumph, and then also will militarism be a thing of the past.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings). Mr. Speaker, I regret that my knowledge of the French language is so imperfect that I have not been able to follow with exactness the remarks of the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. G. A. Turcotte), still I hope I may be allowed to pay him the compliment of saying that his speech was very musical if nothing else. I was able to extract from his remarks sufficient to understand that he is, qualifiedly, in favour of the doctrine or principle of independence. In support of his advocacy of that principle, he was pleased to cite some authority, and with that and with his remarks I can only say that, while it is true that in Canada there are some men who advocate and believe in the doctrine of independence, I can say, thank God, that their numbers are few. It is not very encouraging to the hon. member for Nicolet to find that, whereas when he began his remarks on this most important question—important not only to Canada but to the empire—he had a pretty full house on the government side, yet his remarks have been so interesting and have been received so favourably by the members of that side that he has succeeded, in the hour during which he has addressed this House, in pretty nearly emptying the benches. In undertaking a discussion of the Bill now before the House, known as 'A Bill respecting the Naval Service of Canada', one is met at the very outset with the difficulty that the measure is clothed in such uncertain and indefinite language and is so imperfect in its arrangement that one is at a loss to understand just exactly what the intent and scope of the Bill is. And when one comes to compare the provisions of the Bill with the remarks upon it by hon. members on the government side of the House, he finds the maze all the more difficult, because these speeches differ in themselves and differ very materially from the provisions set forth in the Bill. And, Sir, the fact that the position of one undertaking to discuss this Bill is difficult is not at all remarkable when we recall the fact that, when the measure was introduced by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), he felt compelled to admit that he knew very little about it himself. With the exception of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) is the only minister who has seen fit to deliver a speech in this House on the Bill. And, in regard to the speech delivered by the hon. the Minister of Militia it is noteworthy that, like the premier, he was not able to speak, as is said in sporting parlance, off his own bat, but was forced to admit that he too was speaking from details and memoranda furnished by somebody else. So, it is not to be wondered at that one attempting to discuss this Bill finds himself in the difficulty to which I have made reference. But, disguised as the Bill is in its language and arrangement, I think that a careful consideration of its provisions will enable one to discover sufficient of its scope and intent to determine that there is something behind the Bill more than is expressed in it. I do not suppose that I shall be able to convince hon. members on the government side that there is a sinister motive behind it or that the Bill is not what it really professes to be, because from the speeches that have been made by these hon. gentlemen I should have to class them with those who > —convinced against their will,

> Are of the same opinion still.

I would direct your attention first to section 4 of the Bill which reads as follows:

> The Command in Chief of the Naval Forces is vested in the King, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty, or by the Governor General as his representative.

It will be observed that in the first part of this section the command in chief of the forces to be established under this Bill is declared to be in His Majesty the King. To that part of the provision I have no objection and with it I have no quarrel. The second part declares that this command shall be 'exercised and administered by His Majesty'. With that clause also, I have no quarrel. But to the concluding words, I do offer objection —that this command shall be administered by His Majesty 'or by the Governor General as his representative'. In enacting that clause it occurs to me that the government have made a disclosure, to a partial extent at least, of what the real object and intent of this Bill is. It would not have done to stop with the words 'be administered by His Majesty or by the Governor General', because that would have made a joint command, so to speak, it would have contradicted the very best authority and understanding of the whole British people in regard to the command of the naval forces. But they saw fit to add, 'as his representative'. In other words, it is provided that in the administration of the naval forces of this country, the Governor would be acting, as it were, under power of attorney from the King. I object, I say, to the addition of these words, for the reason that has already been very well and ably stated by the hon. member for Vancouver city (Mr. Cowan). He took occasion to show, and I I think succeeded in showing, that the clause as it is drafted and presented in this Bill, is ultra vires of this parliament, and is unconstitutional, inasmuch as it seeks to detract or take from His Majesty the King a portion of his authority in connection with the naval forces. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Cowan) was pleased to cite a section of the British North America Act which proved the contention he was making, that is section 15. And let me remark here that the British North America Act is the constitution of the Dominion of Canada, and within the limits of that Act the parliament of Canada must confine itself and confine its powers. Section 15 provides:

The command in chief of the land and naval militia, and of all naval and military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue to be vested in the Queen (or King).

Then the hon. gentleman cited the British statute of 13 Charles II, which provides that the sole command of the naval forces is vested in the King; and for that reason, by virtue of these two statutes, he concluded his argument that there was no power and no authority granted to this parliament or possessed by this parliament by which they could in any manner take from or detract from the King's authority over the naval forces. I think that not only is that the case, not only is no authority granted to this parliament, but I think the hon. gentleman could have carried his argument still further, and have shown that there is an absolute prohibition to this parliament from taking any such powers as they assume to take by this Bill. Had reference been made to section 18 of the British North America Act, where the powers of this parliament are defined, it would have been found to read as follows:

The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons and by the members thereof, respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by Act of the parliament of Canada——

Now, these are the important words:

—but so that the same shall never exceed those at the passing of this Act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the Commons House of parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.

Now, Sir, having read that section, the inquiry must be continued further to determine what the powers and authorities of the House of Commons of Great Britain were over that subject at the time of the passing of the British North America Act. The statute to which my hon. friend from Vancouver referred, 13 Charles II, has been carried down from that time in the different revisions of the statute until the reign of her late Majesty, when the last revision was passed, and the exact wording of that statute, giving the sole command and direction of the naval forces of the empire to the King, was preserved, and to-day the power is the same as it was at that time. It is only a recognition by statute of what the prerogative of the King always was under the common law of England. That being the authority and power of the King at that time, the House of Commons of Great Britain had no power or authority to detract or take from that power in any way whatever. But you will see, that being the position at common law, and having recognized that common law by statute, having declared by parliament that such should be the case, the only possible way in which the parliament of Great Britain could have any authority whatever over the matter would be by repealing that statute which recognized the King's prerogative, and passing a new Act of parliament which would have curtailed it or lessened it in some respect. But the parliament of Great Britain has never seen fit to do that; it remains to-day as it did at the time referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver.

But, Sir, the argument can be carried further. Admitting for the sake of argument that the parliament of Great Britain had, since the passing of the British North America Act, passed an Act of parliament giving them the right to curtail the powers of command of the King, granting that, I say that would not affect in any manner the position Canada occupies to-day upon that matter; because you will see that the statute I have already referred to, the British North America Act, declares that the power of this parliament, so far as this subject is concerned, is limited to the powers that were possessed by the House of Commons of England at the time this Act was passed in 1867. So you see that even if the House of Commons of Great Britain did pass an Act such as I have mentioned, it would not be an Act in force at the time the British North America Act was passed; and the only way in which this parliament could be possessed of the power to interfere with this command would be, either to repeal the British North America Act, or to amend that section I have referred to.

But, Sir, that objection is not the only one to which I wish to make reference in discussing this Bill. I desire to call attention to sections 17, 18 and 19 of the Bill, sections showing what is the real intention of this Bill, although it has been attempted to disguise it. Section 17 declares:

The Governor in Council may——

Mark you, not 'shall':

—may place the naval forces or any part thereof on active service during any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of an emergency.

You will observe that in section 4 of the Act the command is declared to be in the King to be administered by him or by the Governor General. In this section 17 the power and authority of the King are left out altogether. Section 17 says that:

The Governor in Council may place the naval forces——

And so on. The King has no authority whatever in regard to that.

—at any time that it appears advisable so to do.

In connection with that clause the right hon. leader of the government, when introducing this Bill, was pleased to refer frequently to the Militia Act, and to declare that this Bill had been framed as far as possible upon the lines of that Act. But a very important omission has been made in this section of the Naval Bill, when compared with the Militia Act. The Militia Act declares that:

The militia of Canada may be put on active service in Canada——

The provision is the same as contained in this Bill so far.

—or elsewhere.

The omission in this Bill, when compared with the Militia Act, is that the naval force may be placed on active service in Canada, whereas, under the Militia Act, the militia may be placed on active service either in Canada or outside of Canada. The words actually used are:

Anywhere in Canada and also beyond Canada.

There is another mistake, or another misinterpretation, of the language used in the Militia Act. It is perfectly plain and evident where, under the authority of that Act, the militia of Canada may be put into service, but this Bill is entirely different in regard to the navy.

The Governor in Council may place the naval forces, or any part thereof, on active service at any time.

It does not declare, as in the Militia Act, where. That is a very important omission and, I think, goes a long way to show the real object and intent of this Bill. Had these words in the Militia Act been inserted in this Bill, there would not have been any doubt about it. But, as the Bill is framed, it leaves it open to two constructions. First, it may be said by the government in one part of Canada that, according to the declaration of section 17 of this Bill, the naval force shall not be sent out of Canada. In another portion of Canada they may be able to declare that there is nothing in section 17 that limits the place or places to which the naval forces may be sent, and therefore, they may be sent on active service in Canada or anywhere else. It is left in such an uncertain position that it is possible for the government to argue in one portion of the Dominion that they may be only used in Canada, and to argue in another portion of the Dominion that they may be used anywhere the same as the militia forces. It might prove to be of very great advantage to the government, but it might likewise prove to be a very great detriment, and disadvantage to Canada and the empire. Some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have taken occasion to remark upon the use of the word 'may' in that section.

The Governor in Council may place——

And they have seemed to question the good faith of the government in always placing the force at the disposal of the empire when they should. The only answer that has been offered to that criticism from the other side of the House is: Well, there is no danger of that. You can trust the right hon. premier and his government that they will do the right thing at the right time. If that is so why use the word 'may' at all? Why not make it perfectly plain to every one? Why use a word that needs some particular construction or interpretation rather than a word that is perfectly plain, and can be understood by any one? Why not use the word 'shall' instead of the word 'may'? It would appear that that word is used in that section by the government, because they have not sufficient faith in His Majesty to believe that he would only place the forces on active service, when they ought to be placed on active service, and that the government are more to be trusted to deal with that matter than His Majesty himself. For my part I can only say I have more confidence in His Majesty refusing to place the forces of Canada when and where they ought not to be on active service than in the government always placing the forces when and where they ought to be. I think the people of Canada would be more willing in that respect to trust His Majesty as having absolute command of the forces than to put their trust in the government of the right hon. gentleman. But, Sir, there is still another objection that I wish to take to this Bill. I have called attention to clause 18 where it is recited that

> In case of an emergency the Governor in Council may place at the disposal of His Majesty, for general service in the Royal Navy, the naval service or any part thereof, any ships or vessels of the naval service, and the officers and seamen serving in such ships or vessels, or any officers or seamen belonging to the naval service.

That clause declares that they may, in case of emergency, place the forces at the disposal of His Majesty, and that must also necessarily carry with it the right to refuse. Therefore, two positions arise under that section. First, the Governor in Council may send them, and, by reservation, may refuse to place them at the disposal of His Majesty. If the Governor in Council sees fit to place the forces at the disposal of His Majesty what follows? Section 19 declares that if parliament is not then sitting or will not sit within ten days it shall be called together, and shall continue to sit, &c., as the section requires. That is all right. That provides for the case wherein the Governor in Council puts the force at the disposal of His Majesty. But, suppose the other position is taken by the Governor in Council, and he refuses to place the force at the disposal of His Majesty?

What provision is made in this Bill for a case of that kind? Parliament will not meet, there is no power to assemble parliament and, therefore, the people of the country cannot speak through their representatives in parliament. The people cannot themselves put the force at the disposal of His Majesty. Absolutely no provision is made for a case of refusal by the Governor in Council to place the naval force established by this Bill at the disposal of His Majesty, and before the people of this country, or their representatives, could make their wishes known, or the naval force of Canada, no matter how efficient it might be, could, under such circumstances, be placed at the disposal of His Majesty, the crisis might have arrived, in fact the British empire might be ruined and destroyed before Canada could render aid. That, to my mind, is a most serious matter. The naval force is to be placed at the disposal of His Majesty only after parliament has so decided. If parliament should refuse to send the naval force to the assistance of Great Britain, there should be a provision just as strong to enable the people to pronounce upon the question as to whether that refusal was right or wrong, but we find absolutely nothing in this section in regard to it. Another equally strong objection to the Bill is that section 4 and section 18 are inconsistent. The government declare, by section 4, that in all their acts in connection with the command of the naval forces of Canada, they will be acting, and undertake to act, as the representatives of His Majesty. The representatives of what? They must be the representatives of his authority, of his desire, of his instruction—in fact, willing at all times to carry out what the King would wish or desire, and if they are not so willing, they cannot be his representatives, they cannot act as his representatives. It is a well understood and unquestioned principle, that any person or corporation acting as the representative of another, of a principal is bound to conform to the instructions and to the wishes of the principal by whom he is authorized. If a breach should be made by an attorney or representative so employed, what would be the natural consequence? He would merit instant dismissal. In what position do the government place themselves by assuming the powers conferred on them under this Bill? They say, in clause 4, that they are acting as the representatives of His Majesty, with all the obligations that that term carries with it; then, in section 18, they declare that in case of emergency 'they may place at the disposal of His Majesty for service,' and so on, which carries with it the right, as I have already argued, to refuse to place the navy at the service of His Majesty—and there we have the two contradictory positions. In section 4 they declare that they are acting as the representatives of the King, and so are bound to carry out his instructions, and under section 18, if His Majesty should request that the forces of Canada be placed at his disposal in any part of the empire, or engage in any contest that Great Britain might be engaged in, it is within the power of the Governor in Council, of this government, to say: No. That is what they declare: No, we shall not place the forces at your disposal. If an attorney, or a representative bound by the instruction of his principal, were to say that he would do or not do that which he was instructed to do, according to his own judgment, in direct opposition to his instructions, such action would be the grossest possible breach of faith and confidence. A man or a government committing such a breach of instructions, a breach of confidence, an attorney or representative acting in his own interests rather than in the interests of his principal, as might well be done under this section, would deserve instant dismissal.

It may be that all has been said that can be said for and against this Bill and the amendment proposed by the opposition. There has been, it is true, a great variety of expression in dealing with the principles and the policies of the two parties, but the principles and the doctrines to which the two respective parties adhere have been made perfectly plain. I shall not repeat any of those arguments. I have endeavoured to extract from the speeches delivered in this House what I deemed to be the important and essential points of difference between the two parties upon this important question. I am sorry to say that an element has been introduced into the discussion of this question which I think it would have been better to have avoided, but the offence began with the right hon. gentleman himself and it has been followed up by a number of his supporters. It could not be expected that the opposition would allow the observations made by these gentlemen to go unchallenged or unanswered, and I can only say that if the hon. gentlemen opposite have been paid off in their own coin and with interest on their investment, the government have only themselves to blame for being placed in that position. I think it is unfortunate that any question of party politics should have been introduced into the discussion of this important subject. However, it has been done and it cannot be undone.

I propose to offer to the House what I conceive to be the differences existing between the two parties upon this all-important question.

The first difference to which I would call attention is that the government, by the introduction of this Bill at the present time and the provisions contained in it, tacitly admit the existence of an emergency and of danger to the empire, and the duty of Canada to assist in meeting it; yet, the Prime Minister and others of his following declare that there is no emergency or danger, and, therefore, no necessity of providing for it, totally ignoring expert opinion, and occupying that wholly inconsistent position. Now, in answer to that the opposition take this position: They are prepared to accept the opinions of the best naval experts and of the ablest statesmen of Great Britain, and of independent men of the highest excellence, who have given the subject the most profound thought, that the emergency and real danger to the empire does exist. The opposition are willing to accede to the wishes of the people of Canada and furnish immediate and effective aid to the empire's navy in meeting such a danger. A great deal of discussion has taken place upon that branch of the question, and many references have been made to show that a real danger does threaten the empire. I wish to add just one more reference in connection with that point. In 'Everybody's Magazine' for November, an article is published by Alexander Powell, F.R.G.S., who was specially commissioned to make an investigation in Germany as to the naval preparations that were being made in that country. I quote from the report which he made when he had finished that investigation:

> Everything considered, I think that England has good cause to lie awake o' nights. Twice has the Kaiser declared that the future of Germany lies upon the seas. Repeatedly has Germany refused to discuss her vast armaments or to give any reason for the frantic haste with which they are being increased; the whole of her ship-building yards are engaged in an unparalleled scheme of naval construction; scores of her leading writers make no secret of her intentions; history has shown that on previous occasions she has made unprovoked and sudden attacks on other nations, and, most significant of all, the coal-carying capacity of the ships she is building so hurriedly and which, she insists, are designed solely for the protection of her trade routes, limits their radius of action to the North Sea. There is the disquieting fact. To-day the ambitions of the Kaiser are boundless. He seeks to dominate the continent as the first step towards dominating the world. Look at it any way you will, there can be but one end to a race which is impoverishing both nations, and that end is war. If England wins, she will have secured herself for half a century to come. If Germany triumphs, her victory will give her the position that England holds now, it will make free trade in England one of the terms of peace; it will give her a free hand in the Balkans, in Mesopotamia and in Persia; will give her the pick of England's colonies oversea, and a billion dollars indemnity with which to build a navy to overawe the world.

That is an independent opinion, and one which seems to me to be enitled to the fullest consideration. The second difference that I have noted between the policy of the two parties is this: That the government declares that Canada now requires a navy of her own for her own defence, independent of the empire, and the opposition say: That Canada, independent of the empire, is not threatened from any source now, nor is she likely to be; her coast line and fisheries are now sufficiently protected, and that protection can be greatly increased as occasion arises, without burdensome expenditure. The opposition say further, that Canada's sea-going commerce is better safeguarded by the empire's navy than it could be by an independent navy; that Canada is threatened whenever Great Britain is threatened, that Canada does not now require an independent navy, but that our best interests lie in strengthening the empire's navy. Difference No. 3 between the policy of the government and the policy of the opposition is this: The government assumes it has the right to lay down and to engage in a permanent naval policy for Canada independent of its entire connection, and to make an initial expenditure varying from $15,000,000 to $18,000,000 for ships, and an annual outlay varying from $3,000,000 to $7,000,000 for maintenance—no one seems to be able to tell just exactly what either one or the other would cost—realizing that it must be a constantly increasing expenditure annually for ships not designed or intended to meet the emergency or strengthen the empire's defence on the sea, or capable or offering any substantial defence to Canada in the event of attack. Now, the position of the opposition as declared by them, I find to be: That whilst the government would have the right to meet the existing emergency and danger, it has not the right to enter upon a permanent policy of establishing an independent Canadian navy with the ever increasing expenditure and burden such a policy carries with it, without a mandate from the Canadian people; and that at all events any effort made in establishing a navy should be in conjunction and co-operation with the empire's navy. I find this further distinction between the policies of the two parties: That while the policy of the government ignores the recommendations of the admiralty as to the best means to be employed by Canada for strengthening the empire's navy and maintaining the supremacy and security of the nation, the opposition policy is to recognize the great value of the advice and recommendations of the admiralty in matters of naval defence, for which experience and special training have eminently qualified them, at the same time realizing our want of such experience and training, and our common interest in the safety of the empire, and that whilst the aid offered by the amendment to the Bill exceeds the best recommendation of the admiralty as to the share to be contributed by Canada, it does not exceed the duty, the obligation, or the willingness of Canada to maintain the unity of the empire and her security against the world. I find further that by the government Bill, an armed force—and what it declares for—is created in Canada an integral part of the empire, wearing the King's uniform, armed with the King's weapons, loyal men who would be willing to fight for the King and his empire, yet the clause of the Bill to which I have referred declares that such force shall not fight for the King and the empire until Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his cabinet (that is the Governor in Council) order they shall. The opposition reply that such a declaration makes for independence and separation from the empire, that it smacks of sedition, and, if not unconstitutional, is a gross breach of confidence and abuse of power. They also pretend that such an armed force should, in the event of war, pass automatically, if needed, under the King's command to the defence of the empire, and there should be no power to prevent that being done. That point of difference between the two parties in politics is one which, it seems to me, should be accentuated. Shall we, as Canadians, be soldiers of the King? Or shall we be soldiers of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his government? Evidently the goal which the Prime Minister desires to reach is independence. Independence has frequently been his declared ambition, and the Bill before us carefully avoids any provision which might serve to link Canada more closely to the empire and thus disappoint the premier's ambition, but on the contrary makes strongly in the opposite direction, although an attempt has been made to disguise its tendency. On the other hand, the policy of the opposition does not require any disguise or deception. It is clear cut. It makes straight for the solidarity and unification or federation of the empire, the security of Canada, and the sovereignty of the nation. That difference between the two policies, let me again point out, ought to be emphasized. Shall we continue to live under the old emblem of liberty, the Union Jack, shall we hoist it for ever and claim its protection, or shall we declare our independence and hoist a flag in accordance with that policy? I venture to think that the great majority of our people will have no hesitation whatever in declaring for the old Union Jack.

The scheme of the government, if carried out, will not afford immediate or any assistance to the empire's navy or the defence of the nation, because the crisis will have long passed before such a navy as is proposed in this government measure could be placed in the fighting line, if it could ever be so placed, and consequently would not discharge any part of the acknowledged obligation of Canada to the empire. Thus it is an absolute denial of the affirmations contained in the resolution of this House, adopted unanimously in March last, to defend the empire in time of peril. On the other hand, the resolution and the policy of the opposition, if adopted, will afford immediate and effective strength to the empire's navy, will meet the emergency and discharge Canada's obligation and duty to contribute to the defence of the empire and the peace of the world.

The professions of loyalty and willingness to assist in the defence of the empire, so loudly made by the government and its followers, are wholly inconsistent with and opposed to the policy laid down in this Bill. That is evidenced by the provision of this measure, whereby assistance to the mother country, if any be made, is to depend on the will of the government. Such provision is but another step towards independence. Contrast that with the policy of the opposition, who supplement their declarations of loyalty by offering immediately to provide two Dreadnoughts, or the equivalent, without any reservation whatever.

There is another important distinction between the policies of the two parties. The government is inclined to offer fightnoughts which dread everything, while the opposition desire to offer Dreadnoughts which are prepared to fight anything.

The government has failed to show that the adoption of its policy will have any moral effect on Briton's enemies or the world in general such as the immediate and effective offer advocated by the opposition could not fail to have. Such an offer would tend to lessen the possibilities of conflict and thus spare us the horrors of war.

The policy of the government largely consists in vain glorious boasting deception, useless and extravagant expenditure of public moneys, and cannot fail to provide exceptional opportunities for graft. Whereas, the policy of the opposition is one of action, prompt, generous and effective, by which many dollars will be saved for every dollar expended. The refusal of the government and its representatives to adopt or act upon any of the proposals of the several imperial conferences regarding naval defence compared with the promptness and generosity displayed by our sister dominions, Australia and New Zealand, in accepting such proposals and bearing their share of the burden, has placed Canada in a humiliating and unenviable position in the eyes of the empire and the rest of the world. The opposition feel that, considering the importance of Canada, considering her vast resources, considering her growing population and the loyalty of her people, considering the immensity of her growing commercial interests and the protection she has enjoyed under the British flag, she should be placed in the first rank of the overseas dominions instead of being put in the position of a voluntary outcast and laggard, as is done by the policy of the government.

The policy which the government submits to the House, is, by its nature, a permanent one, and yet is being entered upon without the authority of the people who have not had an opportunity of expressing their will and have not sufficient knowledge as to details as to enable them to judge as to its advisability or efficiency. This policy, once entered upon, cannot be discontinued, but must impose an ever increasing burden on the people, and that without giving any sufficient assurance that it will prove adequate even for the defence of Canada. On the other hand, the policy of the opposition is intended to afford immediate temporary relief in an emergency and discharge the immediate obligations of Canada to the empire, it is fixed in amount, certain in details, sufficient for the purpose intended, creates no continuous or increasing burden, secures a greater measure of security for Canada by strengthening the defence of the empire than could be secured by the creation of a Canadian navy. And, being an emergency policy, does not require to be submitted to the people.

We are told by hon. gentlemen opposite that our policy is an attack upon responsible government, an encroachment upon Canadian autonomy, and would impose taxation without representation, which is subversive of Canadian ideas. But it must be evident that the offer we advocate, being a voluntary contribution, has none of the elements of taxation which involve force, and in no sense can be called taxation without representation. And as responsible government means loyalty to the crown and respect for the will of the people and the right to control our own local affairs, while at the same time observing allegiance to the Crown, voluntary contribution to the defence of the empire to which we owe allegiance as well as the defence of Canada, is a declaration of the principles of responsible government and autonomy in their highest and noblest form. The government declares that the Canadian navy should be built now in Canada by Canadian workmen and with Canadian material as far as possible. The opposition agree that, when the time arrives and the Canadian people declare that Canada should have an independent navy, then it should be built by Canadian workmen in Canada with Canadian material as far as possible. But we cherish the hope that the day is far distant when Canada shall require an independent navy, but that her interest and determination will always be to maintain her position in the empire.

These appear to be the principal points of difference between the policies of the two parties in the House upon this question. Stripped of all political bias or party consideration, and viewed solely from the standpoint of loyal support of the empire, it occurs to me little difficulty will be experienced by the people of this country in choosing between the policies that I have endeavoured to outline in these fifteen articles. Occasion has been taken during the course of this debate to charge that Canadian interests have always suffered when those interests were dealt with by British diplomacy. That is a statement that has been made on many occasions before. It is made upon this occasion, no doubt, for the purpose of leading the House and the country to believe that in the matter of naval defence the people of Canada can better trust the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier than that they can trust the ablest experts of Great Britain. On one occasion in Ottawa, in 1907, the right hon. prime minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) said:

If we take all the treaties from the treaty of 1783 up to the treaty of 1903, we Canadians do not feel particularly cheerful over the way we have been treated by the British plenipotentaries. We have to realize that John Bull has not always done his duty to his Canadian sons.

Also, in September of the same year, at the manufacturers' banquet, the Prime Minister spoke as follows:

We take the record of the diplomacy of Great Britain in so far as Canada is concerned, and we find it is a repetition of sacrifice of Canadian interests. We have suffered on the Atlantic, we have suffered on the Pacific, we have suffered on the lakes, we have suffered wherever there has been a question to be discussed with British diplomats. We have come to the conclusion that we would do better by attending to the business ourselves rather than have it trusted to the best men that can be found in Great Britain.

Again, in Toronto, on another occasion, the Prime Minister said:

British diplomacy, in so far as Canadian interests are concerned, has been a succession of blunders.

This fault-finding with the British government in its dealing with Canadian affairs is perfectly consistent with the action of the government in preparing such a Bill as they now have before this House, and to some clauses of which I have made special reference. But, I venture to say, there is just as little evidence to prove the assertions made by the right hon. gentleman on the occasions of which I have spoken, as there is for the position they take now in regard to this Bill, that, so far as the naval force of Canada is concerned, it should be controlled by the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues, rather than as the British navy itself is controlled. I think that these references to a want of interest in Canada on the part of British diplomats, and to the interests of Canada having been sacrificed on these various occasions is entirely unwarranted and has resulted more from the desire of some gentlemen to have such a position brought about, and to increase the powers of Canada in that respect or to detract from the authority of Great Britain, than from what has actually taken place under British diplomatic treatment of Canadian affairs. I think these references are made from want of knowledge, or a refusal to acknowledge the real facts in connection with these matters. As this Bill is being viewed from almost every point of view, it perhaps would not be amiss—reference having been made to the effect of British diplomacy in sacrificing Canadian interests, and the necessary deduction from that having been made that Canadian interests would suffer if its necessary naval defence was left in the hands of Great Britain—if I were to ask the attention of the House for a short time to a consideration of some of these matters, and to the comparison I have suggested. The Prime Minister, in the remarks to which I have referred, went on to say that we had lost upon the Atlantic, we had lost upon the Pacific, we had lost upon the great lakes. I propose, during the short time that I shall occupy the attention of the House, to compare the treaties that have been negotiated and concluded by Great Britain with regard to what the Prime Minister has said is our loss upon the Atlantic, our loss upon the Pacific, with certain treaties that the right hon. gentlemen and his colleagues have been able to secure during the time they have occupied the treasury benches.

The first instance to which the Prime Minister referred was the one arising under the Ashburton treaty of 1842. The opinion that was expressed in regard to that matter, and that has been perpetuated in certain quarters, is, I feel sure, the result of want of knowledge of the true facts in connection with the matter. The general contention of those who make similar assertions to those made by the Prime Minister is that in this treaty Canada lost the states of Maine and New Hampshire, by reason of Webster, who negotiated the treaty on behalf of the United States, exhibiting a map to Lord Ashburton which showed the line between Canada and the United States to be very much further west than, as a matter of fact, it was, and that by showing this map to Lord Ashburton, Webster had fooled him into agreeing to the United States getting more territory than they were actually entitled to.

The story goes on to the effect that Webster, the negotiator for the United States, exhibited this map to the Senate of the United States, and thereby induced the Senate, which was previously opposed altogether to the treaty, to agree to it in the form in which it was afterwards assented to. Now, if it were a fact that Webster had in this manner tricked, if I may use the expression. Lord Ashburton, and obtained an advantage in that way, dishonourable as it would be upon the part of Webster, yet it would be a most unfortunate thing for Canada, and a matter upon which perhaps Lord Ashburton might be charged with dereliction of duty, or with not having sufficiently guarded the interests of Canada. But after these long years since 1842 and down to the last year, this story has been current, and it has been given credence to by the right hon. the Premier and many others. But only last year were the real facts in connection with the matter discovered by an officer of one of the departments of this government, Mr. White, who published an article in reference to his discovery, and giving the evidence, in the 'University Magazine'. It appears that the real facts are these: When the treaty of Paris was made, the line between Canada and the territory subsequently the United States, was definitely fixed and established. That line was fixed, according to the records, by a line known as the Oswald line, and that line was laid down and defined upon a map known as the King's map, in the possession of King George III. The map was marked with the King's own handwriting beneath, a broad red line, indicating 'This is Oswald's line', and at the time of the passing of the treaty of Paris, and on different occasions in the House of Commons, reference was made to this King's map, and to the settlement of the line by that treaty according to what is known as Oswald's line. Now, then, at the time of the Ashburton treaty, Webster procured from the archives in Paris a map which had been obtained from Franklin, and he produced this map. There is no evidence of any kind to show where it came from except a letter which was supposed to accompany this map, declaring that Franklin had himself made the red line that appeared upon this map. So that what Webster got was not the official map at all, nor was it a map that had been used in defining the boundary with Canada at the time of the treaty of Paris. But he used that map for the purpose of deceiving the Senate of the United States into the belief that they were getting a larger portion of territory than, according to the real line, they were entitled to. And the discovery of Mr. White proves that although at the time of the passing of this Ashburton treaty this map known as the King's map, having Oswald's line marked upon it and authenticated by the King's own handwriting, had been discovered, it turned out that under that line, what the United States got by the Ashburton treaty in regard to the boundary between the United States and New Brunswick, was exactly what the King's map, and what Oswald's line that was used in the treaty of Paris, gave to Great Britain; nothing more and nothing else to a certain point, that is, from the Atlantic ocean north to what is called the Northwest angle. But from that point the boundary line between the United States and Canada was deflected, and instead of following the Oswald line, which it would have been bound to follow had that map been produced, it was deflected to the west, so as to save to Canada, and it actually did save to Canada, a considerable portion of New Brunswick and of the province of Quebec; in fact the very land that today the Grand Trunk Pacific passes through was saved to Canada. There would have been no land there for Canada, only for the advantages that Canada gained by the deflection of that eastern line by this treaty. But that is not the most important point. Had the Oswald line been followed, as the United States had a right to insist upon, and had that map been produced at the time of the Ashburton treaty, but which evidently was not produced, or at any rate was ignored, the line limiting or defining the boundary line between the United States and Canada, east and west, would not have been deflected from the northwest angle south and west, which enabled Canada to secure, and by which she did secure, a valuable portion of the province of Quebec which would otherwise have gone to the United States. Now, I do not want to go through all the details of that transaction, but there are two other instances where Canada saved most valuable territory by reason of this Ashburton treaty which the right hon. premier is so ready to condemn.

Now let me refer briefly to the loss which he says we made upon the Pacific coast, with reference to that portion of the state of Oregon, which now belongs to the United States, and which I presume the Prime Minister would say ought rightly to belong to Canada. That treaty was made in 1846. Now the treaty was not in respect of what is now known as the state of Oregon by any means, but the negotiations covered an extent of territory of about 400,000 square miles, including not only the state of Oregon, but what is now our very valuable province of British Columbia. Discoveries had been made upon the Pacific coast by different nations, by Spain, by Russia, by the United States, and by France, and not one of these countries, excepting the United States, claimed to have absolute jurisdiction over that territory. The greatest claim that Great Britain ever made to that territory was that she had the right of joint occupation with the other nations that were interested in it. The United States, on the other hand, set up the contention, that, Spain having discovered that territory, and having given up her rights by treaty to the United States, the United States also having acquired the right of France by purchase, and having made discoveries by Cook and others they were entitled to the ownership of the territory. The strongest claim of all they made was that of the greatest possession, because it is a well recognized principle of international law that although discovery gives a right it is not the highest form of title, but that possession is the thing that determines the right of any nation to the ownership of the country.

The United States at this time had not only its own right of discovery, but it had the right which it had acquired from Spain, the right which it had acquired from France, and it also had the right of possession, because at this time, Great Britain only had in that country about 400 people, whereas the United States had nearly 8,000. That was the element that must determine which of these nations this country should belong to. Mark this important feature; Great Britain did not claim at any time to be the absolute owner of it, and the United States did. What was the position under these circumstances? The slave war was on in the United States at that time, and this territory offered the most favourable place that could possibly be discovered for the emigration of Americans, and they were filling up this territory very rapidly. Great Britain, on the other hand, was making no progress in the way of occupation. Had matters been allowed to drift along in that condition for a few years longer the result must necessarily have been that the population from the United States would overrun the greater portion of this territory, and the United States would therefore acquire it by occupation. The master stroke of British diplomacy was to see that at that time the only hope of Great Britain was to secure as much of the territory as she could absolutely rather than to occupy the position a few years later of losing it all. What did she do? Negotiations were undertaken, and these various claims were put forward. It cannot be contended that either one of two countries that enter into a controversy or discussion of this kind would make adverse claims without there being some merit in the claims of each. It cannot be said that Great Britain was all right, and that the United States was all wrong, that Great Britain was entitled to the whole of that country, because she only claimed a part of it, or that the United States was entitled to it all. So, they had to sit down, and make the best bargain they could. What was the result? Under this treaty Great Britain gave up seven degrees of territory that she only claimed the right to joint occupation of, and she acquired an absolute and indefeasible title to six degrees of territory that could never afterwards be in question. I would like to know, in view of these facts, how it could be said that in the negotiation of this treaty the interests of Canada were sacrificed. This fact must be remembered too, that at that time that territory was no part of the Dominion of Canada. That was a matter in which Great Britain alone was interested, and it does seem to me that in concluding that treaty Great Britain displayed, just as she did, in concluding the Ashburton treaty, the very highest elements of diplomacy, and the very greatest interest in safe-guarding what afterwards turned out to be the interest of the Dominion of Canada, because she secured, through Lord Ashburton, in the east, a large tract of territory that had been denied to Great Britain by another arbitrator. In connection with that it is well to remember that before the Ashburton treaty was concluded the matter had been referred to the King of the Netherlands, and what did he do? After investigating the whole matter he gave Great Britain 900 square miles less than she got under the Ashburton treaty. The United States was not pleased with that award, and it was on an appeal from the United States that Great Britain, through the Ashburton treaty, obtained far more territory than she did under the award that was given by the King of the Netherlands. So, in regard to the treaty of Oregon, Great Britain, by her diplomacy, secured for future Canada a greater extent of territory by absolute title than she actually made claim to before the treaty was undertaken. What she lost was that part of the territory lying between the Columbia river, and the Pacific ocean that she absolutely had to admit she had not the title to, that she did not discover, that she did not occupy, except in a very desultory way, and in regard to which the claim of the United States was absolutely unanswerable. Everything that Great Britain claimed under that treaty she got, and as one writer in connection with that matter has very well put it, Great Britain got, under that treaty, all she wanted, while many of the claims of the United States were left for future consideration. They never have been considered, and never will be.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PORTER. Before six o'clock I had been dealing with the disparaging remarks made by the premier and others in regard to British diplomacy in connection with Canadian interests, and I had shown that by the Ashburton treaty and the Oregon treaty, Canada had really gained enormously. By the Oregon treaty we gained the absolute title over a very large and valuable province, British Columbia. Although the line between the United States and Canada west as far as the Rocky mountains had been fixed at the 49th parallel, and Great Britain had offered on different occasions to fix the line west of the Rocky mountains upon the basis of the 49th parallel, yet the United States refused to accept that offer and contended that their territory extended up to 54·40; their slogan was 'fifty four forty or fight'. Great Britain at that time, even when she entered into this treaty, had not forsaken or abandoned the rights she had in that part of North America, but had been making very great preparations for war, and at the time the Oregon treaty was entered into it was apparent that something of this kind must be done or war would inevitably result. I may repeat that it was a master stroke of British diplomacy to secure so valuable a territory upon so slim a claim as she had at that time. She obtained more than she had ever claimed up to that time.

Let me compare British diplomacy in obtaining those two treaties with the diplomacy of this government as displayed in obtaining two other treaties in behalf of Canada since they have been in power. Let us take, if you will, the Japanese treaty. Treaties between Japan and Great Britain and Japan and the United States were made the same year. The Pacific coast had become a very desirable place for Japanese immigration, and the Japanese were immigrating to that country in considerable numbers. In the treaty made between the United States and Japan the Americans recognized this feature and provided that it should not in any way:

> Affect the laws, ordinances and regulations with regard to trade immigration of labourers' peace and public security which are in force or may hereafter be enacted in either of the two countries.

In that manner the United States preserved complete control over the immigration of those people to the Pacific coast. In the treaty made between Great Britain and Japan no such clause was inserted. It will be apparent to any one why that was not done. Great Britain did not afford any field for Japanese immigration, and there was therefore no necessity for such a clause being inserted in regard to that country. But, notwithstanding that, the British government took care to provide for the interests of Canada, and by section 19 of the treaty between Japan and Great Britain it was declared that the treaty was not binding upon the self-governing colonies until they acceded to it, they could take the benefit and responsibilities of it whenever they chose, they could when agreeing to it impose such other terms as to them might seem to be necessary or pertinent. Thus the matter stood in the year 1895 when the treaty was submitted to the Canadian government, at that time a Conservative government. An order in council was passed and transmitted to the proper authorities refusing to accede to the treaty unless it contained a stipulation similar to that to which I have referred between the United States and Japan. This was submitted to the Japanese government through the British ambassador, and shortly afterwards the Japanese government acceded to the request contained in the order in council that had been forwarded from the then Canadian government, and that assent was notified to the Canadian government, and subsequently this addition was made to apply to all the colonies as well as to Canada. In July, 1896, when the Conservative government had gone out of power, the Secretary of State for Great Britain made inquiry from Canada as to whether she would accept the treaty that had been made between Japan and Great Britain.

This government passed an order in council refusing to accede to the treaty, not upon the ground of control of immigration, but upon the ground that it might interfere with Canadian trade relations. The trade question, it will be observed, was not at all involved; that was reserved for action by the Canadian government. Two months after this, Great Britain warned Canada upon this question respecting immigration by advising that Queensland, Australia, had refused the treaty unless they retained control over the immigration into that country. Less than a month after the British ambassador reported that Japan had acceded to the request of Canada as made in regard to the immigration of workmen, including artisans. When the Conservative government passed their order in council, besides asking for control over immigration, they asked that the word 'workmen' be defined so as to include artisans. The Japanese government finally assented to that, and here was presented an opportunity of having the treaty between Great Britain and Japan apply to Canada with the full power to Canada to control her immigration affairs. The matter came before this government again in 1897, but they simply refused to accept the treaty, and they gave as their reason the same reason they had given before, namely, that it might interfere with trade relations. In the latter part of 1896, and early in 1897 the Japanese immigration into British Columbia began to increase very rapidly, and it became a very serious question with the people of that country; so much so that they made representations to this government, and in fact very largely signed petitions were sent in asking this government to move in the direction of staying the immigration of Japanese in such large numbers into British Columbia. These representations were repeated at different times. Then, the Minister of Agriculture paid a visit to Japan, and according to his own report as given to this House nothing was accomplished there by him. He reported simply that there was no danger of an excessive immigration from Japan, and that he had assurance from the Japanese government that immigration would be so restricted that it would not trouble Canadian interests to any extent. Then the matter stood in that way until 1905, when this government passed an order in council by which it was declared that all objections to the treaty heretofore made had been removed and Canada was willing to accept the treaty as it was originally proposed. By that order in council it will be seen that notwithstanding the interests of Canada were so paramount in the matter of retaining control over immigration into this country, yet this government as a master stroke of diplomacy, by that order in council removed the objection entirely and allowed immigrants to proceed to Canada from Japan just as rapidly as they pleased. The Colonial Secretary, however, when the order in council of this government was placed before him, had before him at the same time the order in council that had been passed by the Conservative government in 1895, and consequently he had before him the objection that was raised upon this question of immigration, and before he acted upon the order in council passed by this government he again gave notice to the Canadian government particularly calling their attention to this question of immigration, and he desired to know whether the Canadian government was willing to forego the right they had in that respect. A reply was made simply confirming the order in council that had been passed, but the Colonial Secretary refused to act upon that even; his answer was that he had sent a specific message, and had asked a specific question as to Canada retaining control of her immigration policy, and he desired an answer to that. After having their attention again called in that direct manner to the question, this government replied that they were willing to accept the Japanese treaty as it then stood absolutely without any reservation. Under those conditions a treaty was entered into. In addition to the warning, and the notice by the Colonial Secretary, as late as in 1903, the Consul General of Japan notified the Prime Minister of Canada by a letter that the Japanese government was willing to enter into an agreement to bind themselves to restrict Japanese immigration into Canada. So that it cannot be said or argued from any standpoint that this government did not have full notice of the willingness of the Japanese government to enter into a treaty allowing Canada to retain full control of immigration, and, in face of that notice, and that knowledge, this government, to the detriment of the province of British Columbia in particular, and to Canada as a whole, handed over as it were the control of our immigration policy to the Japanese government instead of retaining it in their own hands. The result of this was that as soon as that treaty was passed, as might naturally be expected, the immigration of Japanese into British Columbia again began, and increased very rapidly. The question became such an important one to the people of British Columbia that representations were again made, and repeated to this government, and it was urged upon the floor of this House that some action should be taken. Finally the Postmaster General was sent to Japan, and he came back with a great flourish of trumphets, and announced that he had righted the great mistake that his government had formerly made. He announced that assurances had been obtained from the Japanese government that objectionable immigration would not be allowed from that country to Canada. But, it appears, if reports are correct, that when the Postmaster General went to Japan he was received no doubt very courteously by the Japanese minister, but when the subject was mentioned the Foreign Minister recognizing the position that Japan had obtained by the treaty simply handed the Postmaster General over to a clerk in the office to do what he could, the Foreign Minister not having either time or the disposition to treat further on the matter with the Postmaster General. Well, Sir, things went on in that way for a little time, and the Postmaster General saw that he was not able to make any headway with the clerk of the department, and he again sought the attention of the Foreign Minister and what was he obliged to do? He was obliged to call in the British ambassador, and, if anything was accomplished at all, in the matter of Japanese immigration, it was through the British ambassador, and not through the efforts of the Postmaster General. And yet he comes back to Canada, and his party press, and friends, proclaiming that his efforts were a master stroke of diplomacy, and outshone entirely the diplomacy of Great Britain in any matter in which Canadian interests were concerned.

If you will take another comparison, let us compare the diplomatic action of Canada with regard to the Belgian and German treaties, with the diplomatic action of Great Britain in the other matters to which I have referred. When this government came into power, it declared that it would obtain preferential trade within the empire. That was one of the planks of its platform, and one of the things the party opposite promised to obtain within a very short time after they secured office. At that time, and for many years before, there had existed a commercial treaty between Great Britain and Belgium, and between Great Britain and Germany. Article 15 of the Belgian treaty provided:

> Articles the produce or manufacture of Belgium shall not be subject in the British colonies to other or higher duty than those which are or may be imposed upon similar articles of British origin.

And in the German treaty, article 2 provided:

That no other or higher duties shall be levied in the Zolverin on the exportation of any goods to the Dominion and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty, nor in the dominions and the possessions of Her Britannic Majesty in the exportation of any goods to the Zolverin than are or may be levied on the exportation of the like goods to any third country the most favoured in that respect.

Article 5 of the German treaty provides:

That in favour, privilege or reduction in the tariff of duties of importation or exportation which either of the contracting parties may concede to any third power shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to the other.

And article 7 provides:

That the stipulations of the preceding articles 1 to 6 shall also be applied to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty. In those colonies and possessions the produce of the states of the Zolverin shall not be subject to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or of any other country of a like kind, nor shall the exportation from the colonies or the possessions of the Zolverin be subject to any higher or other duties than the exportation to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

One would have thought that that language was so explicit there could not be any doubt as to its meaning. One would have thought that it clearly enough provided that no preference could be given by either of these countries to any other without that same preference being extended to the other contracting party. Such a meaning had in fact for a long time been attached to those treaties, and had been recognized on various occasions by the government preceding this one, notably in the joint address passed asking for denunciation of these treaties in 1891 in order that preferential trade within the empire might be obtained; also when the French treaty of 1894 was adopted, and again in 1895, when the Act respecting commerical treaties was passed. With these before this government, one would have thought it would have been wholly impossible for them to have misconstrued or misunderstood the full effect or meaning of those treaty provisions. But in the first year this government was in power, they placed Canada apparently in total ignorance of these restrictions, in a very peculiar position. By a resolution introduced in connection with the tariff, they attempted first to grant to Great Britain a preference that would not apply to Germany or Belgium. But when that resolution was discussed, the full intent and scope of those two treaties was pointed out. So forcibly was the matter brought to their attention at that time, that they finally brought in another resolution which I think it would be well to read:

Clause 16. When the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada in terms which on the whole are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country when imported direct thereform, may then be entered for duty or taken out of warehouse for consumption in Canada at the reduced rate of duty provided for in the reciprocal tariff set forth in schedule D.

(a) That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the reciprocal tariff shall be decided by the collector of customs subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

(b) That the Governor in Council may extend the benefits of such reciprocal tariff to any country which may be entitled thereto by virtue of any treaty with Her Majesty.

In order to get over the difficulty that no power existed in this government to extend such a privilege as they were prepared to extend to Great Britain without extending the same privilege to Belgium and Germany, they introduced this resolution. It was again pointed out that this resolution did not remove the objection made to the original one, but was every whit as objectionable. Notwithstanding that objection, however, they went on and passed that resolution. To be as brief as possible in the history of this matter, when that resolution was passed it granted to Great Britain a preference ranging, during the course of time, from 12½ to 33⅓ per cent. As soon as that preference was granted, Germany claimed an equal preference, and Canada denied that she was entitled to it. Canada then either had to get into trouble with Great Britain, to whom she had granted the preference, or Great Britain had to get into trouble with Germany, who was entitled to the same advantages. The difficulties increased, matters kept getting worse, and until finally to help this government out, Great Britain denounced the German and Belgian treaties, so far as Canada was concerned. What then was the position? Canada was outside the treaty, and having closed the custom house door in the face of Germany at a time when she should not have done so, naturally enough the German people retaliated and imposed the heaviest duties possible upon their imports from Canada. Then, that matter pressed so heavily upon Canadian interests that this government thought they would cure it in some other way, and, to meet the adverse taxation imposed upon them by Germany, they put on what is known as the surtax. The result of that was that Canadian trade was being reduced all the time, Canada was losing enormous sums, her interests were being more adversely affected every day. It became absolutely necessary, in order to correct the mistake they had made and to put the country on a fair basis of trade with Germany, to undo the wrong they had done. So they withdrew the surtax, and they have now entered into a temporary commercial arrangement with Germany. Now, in the face of the facts, if any hon. gentleman will say that the diplomacy exhibited by this government in the arrangement of the Japanese treaty, and in the dealings with Germany will compare favourably with the diplomacy exercised by Great Britain in the Ashburton treaty and in the Oregon treaty, I can only say that I believe he fails altogether to apprehend the action of either party in connection with these matters. The comparison, instead of being disparaging to Great Britain, shows, on the contrary, that Great Britain exercised the very greatest care and much greater diplomacy in guarding the interests of Canada than has been shown by the gentlemen now in power.

I might go on and refer to many other cases—there are others. But let me give one illustration—one which contrasts the action of the two authorities in relation to one matter. In 1854, the reciprocity treaty with the United States was negotiated by Lord Elgin on behalf of Canada. The effort was a successful one to obtain what Canada desired in regard to trade relations. I need not enter into the manner in which it was obtained; that, perhaps, is pretty well known. The fact is that the reciprocity treaty was obtained by British diplomacy for the benefit of Canada. And that it was for the practical benefit of Canada is shown by the trade returns of the eleven years during which the treaty was in force. The trade grew from $20,000,000 up to $80,000,000 in that period of eleven years. That treaty was revoked. And, although these gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches had promised that one of their first acts upon attaining to power would be to negotiate another reciprocity treaty with the United States, and though they have made attempt after attempt, though, time and again, they have journeyed to Washington on this mission, they have always come back empty-handed. At last they declared that there should be no more journeys to Washington, no more attempts to obtain a reciprocity treaty with the United States —they have abandoned the whole project which they once promised to carry into effect. Here we have, in this one instance, the diplomacy of Britain succeeding and succeeding admirably in the interests of Canada, yet the efforts of these hon. gentlemen in the same direction absolutely and entirely failing. I ask if, in view of this, one can, make a favourable comparison for Canada in diplomacy with that which has been exercised by the British government on behalf of Canada. I might also refer to the French treaty and to the Alaskan boundary. In each and every one of these cases, I venture to say, one cannot view the facts fairly without coming to the conclusion—however unwilling he may be as a Canadian to do so—that Great Brithas, on all occasions, shown the greatest concern for Canada and has secured the interest of Canada to a larger extent than have those who now control our affairs.

In conclusion, I am unalterably opposed to the Bill now under consideration for the establishment of a naval defence. I think I have shown—at any rate, I have satisfied myself from my investigation—that the Bill is not one in the interest of the Canadian people or in the interest of the empire as a whole. I have tried to show, and I think I have succeeded, that an attempt is being made in this Bill to wrest from His Majesty a part of his command and control over the armed forces of this empire. I think I have shown that the government, wrongfully, improperly, have endeavoured to secure the power to deny to His Majesty the assistance and benefit, even in time of necessity, of the forces that this Bill undertakes to raise. In fact, the right hon. Prime Minister in introducing this Bill, or subsequently, stated that there might be occasions when he would feel it his duty to withhold the services of this navy from Great Britain. Surely, in this day and age, such a condition of affairs will not be allowed to prevail in this Canada of ours. I think I have succeeded in showing that the government in supporting this Bill, or in leading hon. gentlemen in this House to support it, have not the information or data or knowledge concerning it which should convince this House, or any one, that it can ever be of material service to the empire, or to assure this House that it will be of real service to Canada. On the contrary, they have said enough to satisfy this House and the people, I think, that the efforts they are making will cost this country an enormous amount of money—they do not even know the amount—and that this expenditure will keep on increasing until it may become such a burden that the people of Canada can ill afford to bear it. I think I have shown that the reason put forth by the right hon. Prime Minister for retaining this control and for establishing the navy in this way—that interests having been sacrificed heretofore by British diplomacy—is a fallacy, there is no foundation in fact for it. And, for these many reasons, I shall feel it my duty, not only to my constituents, but to myself and to my country as a whole, to oppose this measure. I am a Canadian—I think I am a better Canadian because I am a British subject.

I represent a riding containing men who are as loyal as any man who ever wore a hat, men who are not only willing to pay, but are willing to fight for the maintenance of the British empire, men who are just as anxious as any one can be to retain Canada in the position she now occupies as part of the British empire, and who cherish the hope that she will always occupy the proud position she now holds as the brightest gem in the British crown.

Mr. ERNEST ROY (Dorchester) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the discusion on the Bill now submitted to the consideration of the House, it is rather a difficult matter to bring forth further arguments and even to find new forms for the expression of arguments already submitted. So, I shall be content with presenting a few considerations without entering into a thorough discussion of this measure.

I intend making only a brief reference to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Porter) who has just taken his seat. Let me, however, congratulate him on that part of his speech in which he pointed out the main difference between the policy of the government and that of the opposition in connection with this matter. Of course, I cannot agree that he has correctly pointed out what these differences are in every respect; but that part of his speech will help, I hope, in correcting the false impression which the friends of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, the leader of His Majesty's opposition No. 2, are trying to create in the province of Quebec. As a matter of fact, the friends of the latter's, hon. member for Jacques Cartier, without eliciting a single protest on his part, are creating the impression outside of parliament that it is a farce which is going on within the precincts of this House. I find that idea expressed in a resolution passed by the members of a farmers' club in one of the parishes of the county of Dorchester, and which reads as follows:

Considering that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister of Canada, has made an agreement with Mr. Borden leader of the Opposition with a view to putting through the Naval Bill No. 95, introduced on January 12 1910.

That idea is also given expression to in the petitions forwarded to this House from the province of Quebec against the passing of this Bill. The hon. member for Hastings, by pointing out to the House in what respects the policy of the Liberal party and that of the Conservatives who follow the lead of the hon. member for Halifax, differ essentially from one another, will have helped to correct the false notion to which I have just called attention.

Mr. PORTER.

It is to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, that there should be in Canada people having so little concern for our parliamentary institutions, and such a short-sighted view of patriotism, as to spread among the Canadian people the impression that their representatives in this House, are only comedians in disguise. It is to be hoped that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and his followers will realize that it is incumbent on them to set the public right by means of a public statement. The first duty of a member of parliament is to ensure public respect to the institution of which he forms part.

Mr. Speaker, before proceeding any further, I wish to correct as regards a misunderstanding in regard to the meaning of some remarks I made in this House last year concerning the resolution of March 29, 1909, a misunderstanding resulting from the erroneous construction put on those remarks by some hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman for Marquette, among others, contended a short time ago that, on March 29 last, I had condemned the proposal for the building of a Canadian navy. It will be sufficient for me to quote short extracts from the 'Hansard' of last year to set the House right in regard to the position I actually took at the time. Following on some general remarks as to the reasons which might be urged in favour of the immediate building of a Canadian navy, I spoke as follows:

(Hansard 1909, page 3550). What I have said does not imply that Canada should not adopt military measures for the defence of her coast and of her territory... Canada being a nation surrounded by other nations whose interests may conflict with her own, is bound to provide means of defence.

Page 3551. Let Canada organize a naval force to protect her coast line and her seaports both on the Atlantic and the Pacific; no one objects.

And I summed up my remarks in the following terms:

The House is no doubt unanimous in its opinion that Canada should get up a naval force which will enable her to make first among the nations, and thus command that respect which otherwise she would not command from those nations having hostile intentions against her.

The above extracts clearly show that last year I was in favour of the establishment of a Canadian navy, and that I then considered that undertaking an essentially patriotic one. I have not changed my mind in the meantime.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint Ann's, on February 24 last, delivered a speech which the opposition generously applauded. The hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Barnard) gave expression to the admiration and enthusiasm which that speech stirred up in the minds of his colleagues by challenging hon. members on the government side to find in their ranks any one who would dare analyse that speech not to say to attempt answering it. At the risk of being thought presumptuous. I intend taking up that challenge and answering briefly the few, though long winded arguments, set forth by the hon. member for St. Ann's. I shall do so with the same calmness of mind as when in the ordinary course of my professional practice. I appeal to a higher tribunal from the judgment of an inferior court which does not seem satisfactory.

The arguments brought forward by the hon. member for St. Ann's may be summed up as follows, and I shall take up first that which comes last in his speech. Canada, he says, without breaking the constitution is at liberty to grant to Great Britain a sum of money towards helping the mother country in maintaining her supremacy over the other nations of the world, or else towards relieving her of part of the burden which she has to bear in order to keep the world at peace, by having an argument superior to that of any other nation. I recognize the soundness of that proposition. The rightful owner is entitled to transfer his property rights to whomsoever he wishes. That legal proposition cannot be gainsaid, and Canada has the right to donate the people's money to England. So the Dominion can legally do what is provided for in the latter part of the amendment submitted by the hon. leader of the opposition.

The hon. member for St. Ann's, on the other hand, admits that Canada would be justified in granting such a gift to Great Britain only in case the latter was in such a position that the money would be needed to stave off an attack on the part of Germany. He admits that, if it were not for Germany, there would be no occasion for a gift of Dreadnoughts or money. That is a question of fact, and after going into the matter, he draws the conclusion that there actually exists a German danger, and that it is desirable that Canada should make a contribution to Great Britain either in money or in Dreadnoughts.

I have also on my own account gone into that question of fact. My authority is the English people, British opinion. I find it is divided on that point. Even in England, some contend that danger exists, while others deny it. However, I am assured that those who deny the existence of any danger, are not impelled by any feeling of disloyalty, are not lacking in patriotism. I must then come to the conclusion that the people most interested in finding out, discovering, detecting any danger, deny its existence. Will Canada and particularly will this House claim that we have a better insight into the matter than the British people and the British parliament themselves. I think it would be bad form on our part to assume that we are in a position to enlighten the British people and British parliament in matters of patriotism and political foresight.

Therefore I say that so long as the English people have not themselves clearly recognized that the danger exists, we should keep our money, and direct our efforts towards helping the mother country in another way, in the way that was recognized to be the best at the colonial conference of 1909, where all interested parties were represented.

The hon. member for St. Ann's contends in another proposition that the passing of the Bill would result in a restriction of Canada's autonomy, inasmuch as she would divest herself of all national sentiment. He further contends that a proposal entailing such consequences should be submitted to the people previous to its being adopted by this House.

Since the debate originated, I was always expecting from hon. gentlemen opposite some evidence that logic had been respected in the amendment submitted by their leader. Speeches ran their course and there was nothing forthcoming. Of course reference was made to the 'tin pot navy,' to the German scare, to the loyalty of the Canadian Prime Minister, to the disloyalty of French Canadians, to the lack of patriotism of the Liberals, but no satisfaction was given to the public mind, very naturally puzzled by this chaotic assemblage of disconnected ideas. The hon. member for St. Ann's, with his judicial mind, had observed that gap, and for three hours and a half applied himself to filling it.

It is no wonder that the opposition which until then had fought in a haphazard way, without any plan of campaign, with the sole idea of fighting the government, and could not find its way out of a debate wherein they had engaged without the help of logic, it is no wonder, I say, that the opposition should have greeted with utmost pleasure the member for St. Ann's who, they thought, had found a means of solving the difficulty. They applauded him, thinking that once more out of chaos light had come. But that way out which the hon. member for St. Ann was supposed to have discovered, did not exist in reality, it was an effect of mirage, a delusion of the senses, originating from a keen thirst for logic, which the hon. gentleman has been unable to satisfy.

The Bill now under consideration, would be a restriction on our national autonomy were it to become law, says the hon. member for St. Ann's. And why? Because, he says, a war navy is always destined for attack, and he states in support of that contention an utterance of the British admiralty at the colonial conference of 1907.

Since, he goes on to say, a war navy is a means of attack, Canada having no right to declare war, that means would be entirely for the use of Great Britain, who alone has authority to lead an attack on a foreign nation and declare war. If that be the case, the Canadian navy will necessarily be under the control of the only power within the empire in a position to make use of it. Now, he adds, as any declaration on the part of Great Britain can only be the outcome of her foreign policy, and as Canada has nothing to do with that, it will happen that the British authorities will declare war and utilize Canada's naval force, without Canada having been consulted as to the desirability or the fairness of such a decision. Thus, Canada sacrifices in part her national conscience.

That is a fallacy couched in pretty language, but which cannot be defended on any grounds. The whole force of this argument is dependent on the truth of the contention that a war navy is necessarily a means of attack, and cannot be looked upon as a means of defence. That is the statement the falsity of which I intend to show first.

At the colonial conference of 1907 the proposal was made to provide a single imperial navy under the immediate and exclusive control of the British admiralty. It was stated at the time that the British navy could not be considered a means of defence, and that was true in the case of Great Britain, seeing that her supremacy in that respect cannot for the time being be denied. Great Britain is a sovereign state having the power to declare war. She cannot let other nations whose strength is inferior provide themselves with navies to protect themselves one against the other; but as soon as any power tried to go further and build a navy which not only would ensure its superiority over neighbouring powers, but would put it on a par with Great Britain, that departure would be looked upon as an agression, since such an armament could be aimed only at the only power superior to it at the time. In that case, it would be a matter of elementary wisdom on the part of England not to wait until the enemy had completed his means of attack. She should take the lead and cripple the power thus threatening the world's peace.

Canada is not a sovereign country, and while enjoying complete liberty as regards her domestic administration, she is, as regards her foreign relations, under certain restrictions due to her status of dependency. Canada is free to repulse whomsoever invades her territory; but she has not the right of declaring war against a foreign country. Her militia is for purposes of defence, but she could not of her own accord lead an attack, because whenever Canada took such a step, she would be asserting her independence.

As a result, Great Britain's relative position among the nations of the world, her naval forces are destined to take the offensive, while Canada's political status requires that all our forces should be for purposes of defence. That statement cannot be contradicted. The forces of Canada can be used for purposes of attack only in co-operation with Great Britain should the latter engage in war.

It may be inquired when Canada is likely to be attacked. I am not a prophet, but Canada might be attacked as the outcome of a declaration of war on the part of several allied powers desirous of wrenching from England her supremacy. It might also occur as a diversion by the forces of a power attempting to repel an attack on the part of Great Britain by striking at her colonies. Canada might also be the object of an attack through a desire for conquest on the part of a foreign nation suffering from over-population, and which, not having at home sufficient resources to draw on, might deem itself justified in laying hands on a country such as Canada, provided with the very things that power would be in need of. Would the property rights held by Canada, her desire to reserve for her children the wealth within her borders, her repugnance to allow the introduction in the country of a civilization foreign to hers, would all that suffice to keep out those hungry foes? Certainly not.

Under all such conditions the Canadian war navy would undeniably have its usefulness. But the building of the navy will have its immediate and more certain usefulness in helping to maintain the supremacy of the British empire throughout the world, and thus ensuring for many years to come peace to Great Britain and her colonies.

When these colonies will, each and every one of them, have war navies severally owned by them, and will see to their own protection without any expense to the mother country, any power anxious to attack Great Britain or one of its colonies, will have to have at her command forces superior to those of Great Britain and her colonies. The expenditure which such an undertaking would necessitate and which that power would have to bear single-handed, would probably be considered too heavy. Its only recourse would then be in contracting alliance, and here it would be met with the wiles of British diplomacy, which would leave very little chance of success.

Alliances have always been the most efficient means for ensuring the world's peace. Very few countries are powerful enough to command respect by themselves, but an alliance may often result in securing the co-operation of three or four other powers, which altogether may be in a position to command respect for the rights of each and every one of them.

When England will be surrounded by colonies all provided with war navies, she will offer to the world the spectacle of an alliance of many nations, an alliance founded on interest and on sentiment, that is, on the most potent influences in human life. So then I say that the hon. member for St. Ann's has no grounds for saying that the navy which is to be provided under this Bill cannot possibly be for purposes of defence, and must necessarily be for purposes of attack.

Our constitution contained in the British North America Act allows us in clause 7 of section 91, to provide means of defence on land and on sea; it grants us the power to create a land force and a war navy for the defence of Canada. That navy, of course, remains under the control of the Dominion as well as the militia.

I say that the Canadian navy will remain under the control of Canada. However, that is questioned by the wing of the opposition which has the hon. member for Jacques Cartier as its leader. That section of the opposition party, together with those in the province of Quebec who are their exponents, contend that the control of the navy must ultimately rest with Great Britain, and that thereby our national autonomy will be restricted. Both the government and that wing of the Conservative party which follows the lead of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Borden), contend that the control of the Canadian navy will continue to be with the Dominion. The government and their followers take credit to themselves on that account, while the opposition taunts the government with having, under the Bill, retained that control for Canada. Of the 221 members making up the House, there are only seven or eight, under the guidance of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, who fail to construe the law in that manner. But as every one knows, the worst cases of blindness are those of people who refuse to open their eyes.

After thus disposing of the fallacy which the hon. member for St. Ann's has invoked in support of his contention, I am justified in saying that the Canadian navy will be a means of defence for staving off any attack directed against Canada. That navy will remain under our control. In building it, we are merely exercising a power which is granted to us by the constitution; in keeping it under our control, we are also exercising a power granted by the constitution, and the mere fact of exercising a power cannot logically restrict that power; on the contrary, it causes it to pass from the domain of theory into that of reality.

Will it be contended that by section 18, Canada relinquishes part of her autonomy? How is that section worded? It says that in a case of emergency the Canadian government will have the power to place the Canadian navy at the disposal of the British admiralty, which should be effected with the consent of the Canadian parliament, if it is in session; and should it be during recess, parliament will have to be summoned to meet within a fortnight of the action thus taken by the government.

The right of Canada to donate to Great Britain a sum of money in the shape of a contribution and without in any way restricting her autonomy, cannot be denied by any one. On the contrary, such action would go to show that Canada has the right to dispose of her property in the same way as any private owner. If instead of giving money to Great Britain, Canada were to give guns or rifles, she would still be acting within her powers and would not be relinquishing or restricting any of her powers. If instead of donating rifles or guns, Canada preferred loaning them, it would merely be depriving itself of certain of the privileges of ownership, usufruct, and such action would not in any way affect her powers. Then again, if instead of donating money or loaning rifles or guns, Canada, in a case of emergency, loaned to Great Britain another war machine, its navy, the same principle would apply, and Canada would not be losing anything of its autonomy. The right to give has never been restricted through its being exercised. Let me demonstrate that fact by means of a comparison. The interdict is deprived of the right of making any transaction in regard to his holdings. He is not permitted to sell, loan or give his property without being authorised to do so by some other person. Even should the interdict be a millionaire, he would not be allowed to dispose of his property any more than if he was a pauper. It is autonomy, it is liberty that is lacking. But, whoever retains his full rights and is left with a free hand in the administration of his property even, should he have only a few cents, would in giving them, be giving proof of the actual possession of his autonomy, of his liberty. To my mind, Canada would not be losing its autonomy if, in a case of emergency or which would be considered such as regards Great Britain, or herself she put the Canadian navy at the disposal of the British admiralty, any more than she lost her autonomy when she voted a grant for the sufferers in the Paris floods, or the sufferers in the earthquakes of San Francisco or Messina.

If Canada has the right, without impairing her autonomy to loan her navy to Great Britain whenever she thinks proper, she has the right to delegate that power to her trustees, the government, under definite circumstances, and the fact that in delegating that power she requires that her trustees, after fulfilling their trust, should give an account of their management does not in any way alter the principle. It is a mere matter of policy.

I think I have shown that Canada is free to exercise the power conferred by the constitution in regard to providing a war navy and loaning it as well to England, without losing anything of her power, liberty and autonomy.

The next question to be considered is whether it is desirable that we should exercise that power. The right of ownership implies that of safeguarding property rights; and whoever recognizes the right of ownership, must also recognize the right of the owner to defend his property and to take the necessary means to that effect. The right of defence is thereby recognized.

Nature is a great teacher in that regard. All living beings are provided with means of defence enabling them to protect their life against any attack. Man, she has endowed with intelligence and with the power to take hold of things and adapt them to his own usage, either for the preservation of life, or of property, or for purposes of defence.

Canada is a large holder; she has the right of utilizing her possessions, but she has also the duty, in order to maintain her property rights, to provide means for their defence against all comers. In the natural world, only those being who are destined to be food for other are unprovided with adequate means of defence, and have no thought of providing themselves with such means. In the realm of intelligent beings, the incapable, the improvident and the cowardly alone neglect providing themselves with means of defence However, incapables, that is to say, children and sick persons, are not always exposed to suffer on that account, for in the human heart there has been instilled a feeling, motherly love, filial love, friendship or humanity, feelings which lead the strong to protect and defend under certain circumstances those who are weak. Even nations have shown that they were endowed with feelings of humanity, since Great Britain is known to have provided out of her own resources for the defence of her colonies still too young to protect themselves, just as the father of a family looks after, protects and defends his child so long as the latter has not reached a sufficient age, or has not acquired sufficient strength to render that protection superfluous. The child should not wait until his parents give him to understand that he is in a position to look after himself or to provide part of his sustenance; he should realize what his parents have done for him, and without hesitation look out for himself as soon as he is capable of doing so.

British colonies have enjoyed heretofore and for the last century or more, in the case of Canada, a condition of perfect peace, whereby they have been enabled to make marvellous progress. And that era of peace, they owe to England, who, by making the required sacrifices towards acquiring supremacy among the nations, has rendered her colonies secure against any danger of attack. That era of peace will be maintained only inasmuch as England's power is upheld. Now that the colonies are in a position to lighten the burden of the mother country, they should do so willingly. They should do so, in the first place, by endeavouring to provide for their own wants, in the same way that the child should relieve his parents of part of the burden of becoming self-sustaining.

The measure which is now under consideration, does not provide from the start a defence service for Canada, but aims merely at completing the system already in existence, and there is nothing exceptional about it. It simply provides for a need in the ordinary course of things.

Is there a single Canadian engrossed with the welfare of his country who would have expected Canada to increase in national wealth, to treble in the space of a few years the volume of her trade, to increase her population in marvellous fashion, to make a reputation for her products in the greatest markets of the world, to reveal to all nations her resources, her great possibilities, and to develop in every way her assets, and that this same Canada would remain indifferent as regards any steps to be taken for the defence of her possessions.

Cities increase the police force and take fuller measures of safety as the value of property increases within their limits. The banker will spend more to protect his hundreds of thousands of dollars against the attacks of robbers than the common labourer will do to protect the small sums he keeps at home. Means taken for the safeguarding of wealth should bear a certain proportion to the value of that wealth. Property should be protected in due proportion to the volume of that wealth. Property should be protected in due proportion to its value for greed keeps pace with the value of the coveted objects.

We are told, Mr. Speaker, that we have not the right to complete the means of defence of the country without consulting the people. If I understand aright the theory of our constitution, Canada is governed by an executive council composed of ministers, presided over by the Governor General who represents the King. It is the duty of the government to see to the enforcement of the laws, and to provide means that will enable Canada to fulfil her destiny. It is incumbent on them to prepare the legislation under which the country will develop and its citizens be allowed to enjoy full liberty, exercise their rights, and hold property.

That government is responsible to parliament for its stewardship; the representatives of the people are its judges. On the other hand, these representatives are responsible to the people for the carrying out of their mandate. They should be courageous enough to realize fully what duties are incumbent upon them and live up to those duties. The mandate which we as members of parliament have received from the people is not specific but general. We are here to consider the questions which are submitted to us; we should look into them and not play the part of a shyster lawyer. The advocate who is anxious to fulfil his duty advises his client, studies his case and takes the responsibility of the opinion he gives, realizing that since his client has come to him, it is because he relies on his honesty and his special knowledge of the subject. The lawyer who is indifferent to the dictates of his conscience, who may be a smart practitioner with a difficult case, rather than probe it to the bottom, will confer with his client, present the matter to him in a more or less satisfactory light, and endeavour to get from him a clue, so that should he fail later on in winning the case, he may fall back on his client and say: I have done as you diretced me to do. Such an excuse is not valid.

Mr. Speaker, I love Canada as warmly as any Canadian. My ancestry in this land of Canada can be retraced as far back as 1663, and if the grim reaper spares my home, I shall leave a numerous progeny to continue the family name on this land of Canada. I love Canada and I love the Canadian people of whatever origin. I wish for my country a happy future, a future of greatness which will cause its name to be inscribed in golden letters in the annals of history. I am willing to work all my life, and put at its disposal the activity, the intelligence and the enthusiasm which I have inherited for promoting its intellectual, social and material progress. I am willing to work and accumulate for ourselves and for those who will come after us great riches of all kinds; but I wish also that after thus amassing wealth we should be far-seeing enough to conserve it; and on behalf of the hon. gentlemen occupying seats in this House, if they have the power of developing the resources of Canada, without having to consult the people in regard to each and every measure submitted for that purpose; if they have the power to modify the constitution of the country as they have done so, at the time of confederation, without first consulting the people; if they have the power to ensure the greatness, happiness and prosperity of Canada, in that way, I claim for them the right of conserving the benefits accruing from their labour without being obliged to consult the people. Not, Mr. Speaker, that I intend disparaging or showing disrespect for public opinion, or ignoring the sovereignty of the people; no, but in so doing, I would fear lest my constituents told me, and rightly so, that when they sent me here to get acquainted with the history of my country, study its resources, imbibe its ideals and aspirations, they expected that I would do my duty valiantly, conscientiously and patriotically. I would fear lest they told me, and rightly so, that it is useless to elect representatives, if as regards every measure of some importance, the farmer must leave the plough to make a study of politics, the merchant, the manufacturer, and banker turn away from their business, from their undertakings, to unravel the intricacies of constitutional law, or carry on an investigation regarding the general business of the country from the political standpoint, so as to be in a position to direct the government as to the course it should follow. In the meantime, members of parliament would be taking a rest.

No, let us take a serious view of the question. What the Canadian electorate wish for is a body of representatives who are capable of study and reflection, of appreciating and judging things. What the people want is a body of representatives showing patriotism, good will, activity and self reliance. What the people want is the maintenance of our constitution and our parliamentary traditions. What the people want is a body of men capable of developing Canada, of putting in store the results of each successive advance; not dreamers who live in the clouds, not firebrands of loyalism who would fain counteract the natural course of things, who would have water flow up hill, and the child play the part of the mother. What the people want, it is a body of representatives who take lessons from the past to prepare the future, but who are always mindful that man is master only of the present and that the true patriots are those who do things, and not those who are content with dreaming.

Mr. E. PAQUET (L'Islet). (Translation). Mr. Speaker, my first thought is to congratulate my congenial and eloquent friend the member for Dorchester (Mr. Roy), on his success, on the ability and zeal with which he has acquitted himself. I shall endeavour to do my best towards answering him in the course of the few remarks I am about to make.

The Bill relative to the building of a war navy is, to my mind, the most momentous of all those that have been brought to the attention of the government of parliament and of the Canadian people, since the day of confederation. I intend considering that social, economical and political problem from the standpoint of national interests, from the standpoint of the constitution, and lastly, from the standpoint of the rights of the electorate.

In considering that important subject, I intend taking as guide a principle inscribed in the works of the fathers of confederation: 'Canada for the Canadians, under the folds of the British flag.' I intend looking into that problem with a mind unbiased by party interest. I was elected after stating to the electors of the county of l'Islet that, on all national issues, I would place myself above party considerations. I have not as long a parliamentary experience as most of my colleagues of the province of Quebec who occupy seats on your right, Mr. Speaker. Accordingly, at this late stage of a memorable debate, the representative of the county of l'Islet craves the indulgence and courtesy which have always been extended to him when addressing the House to defend his opinions or expound his views.

Fortunately, we are not called upon just now to deal with a question of race or religion; we are endeavouring to find out a means of settlement of a social problem which is of interest to all the provinces. I am not going to consider that question from the standpoint of race, religion or language; but entirely from the national standpoint, the Canadian standpoint, and I am glad to be in sympathy with the workingmen and a large number of English speaking farmers, who are of opinion that the government should not decide to build a war navy before consulting the people.

Previous speakers have thought proper to question the loyalty of some distinguished men of my nationality.

I am not called upon to defend these gentlemen here; but I have suffered so much from these appeals to race prejudices at the hands of my opponents that I must repudiate with all the energy that is in me those malignant attacks, directed against the Conservative and the Liberal leaders of French Canadian origin.

This Bill is of the greatest moment from a financial standpoint, and I cannot undertake to vote such large sums without first consulting my constitutents. On the same grounds, I am bound to refuse to acquiesce in the policy of the leader of the Conservative party. Without a mandate from the people, I should think I was failing in my duty and betraying the interests of my constituents in denying my cordial support to the policy advocated by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier.

Mr. J. TURCOTTE (Quebec). My hon. friend is in favour of an appeal to the people. Should the people pronounce in favour of the building of a navy, would the hon. gentleman support such a measure?

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Should the people, as my hon. friend suggests, pronounce in favour of the building of that navy, let me tell him that I have too much respect for the will of the people not to bow to it, once it has spoken out. I would obey the people, or else I should respect my own convictions to the point of bidding adieu to public life and going back to my professional labours.

Besides, in the course of the remarks I am going to make, I shall have the opportunity of replying more fully to the questions he has just asked me. However, I wish it to be well understood that I have such a respect for the will of the Canadian people that I would not hesitate to bow to their decision, and as I said, to withdraw from public life, should it be necessary.

The Bill introduced by the government on the 12th of January provides for the creation of a naval force to be composed of a permanent corps, a reserve force and a volunteer force. Let us review the variations of the naval programme of the government.

The yearly cost, from $3,000,000 rises to $7,157,000, even before we have started building our navy.

In introducing his Bill on the 12th of January, the Prime Minister laid down the naval programme and stated that Canada was going to establish a navy which might cost $15,000,000 and which was to be composed of four Bristols, six destroyers and one Boadicea.

This involves an expenditure of $3,000,000 a year for maintenance.

On the 3rd of February, Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated that the expenditure involved in the maintenance of this new fleet would be $4,253,000 a year.

Still another variation. On the 10th of February, Sir Frederick Borden also addresses the House The scheme is extending; a naval college is now wanted.

Here is the third plan: Four Bristols, six destroyers, one Boadicea, one Niobe or Rainbow, one naval college.

Henceforth, we are going to have 12 ships, and according to Sir Frederick Borden the estimated cost is $11,730,000, or a little less than the cost of the seven ships first mentioned. In return the cost of the upkeep, according to Sir Frederick Borden, is only $3,680,000 now, or $600,000 less than the estimated cost of maintenance of the 11 ships of Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

This 'Niobe' which hooks on the last scheme, is a vessel thirteen years old, and out of date, which we have bought from the British Admiralty for the sum of $1,075,000.

Mr. Monk, the member for Jacques Cartier, prevailed upon Sir Frederick Borden to place on 'Hansard' a memorandum prepared by Admiral Kingsmill, who is in charge of our new navy, and this memorandum, which the minister tried to conceal from the House, shows the following figures, prepared by Admiral Kingsmill:—

1. Cost of ships.

(In England.)

4 Bristols at $1,885,000 each	$ 7,540,000
1 Boadicea	1,750,000
6 destroyers at $400,000	2,400,000
1 Niobe	1,075,000
	$12,765,000

Everybody admits that 25 per cent must be added for the additional cost of construction in Canada, except for the Niobe, which is already built:—

4 Bristols at $2,350,000	$ 9,400,000
1 Boadicea	2,180,000
6 destroyers at $500,000	3,000,000
1 Nibe	1,075,000
Total cost	$15,655,000

The interest at 3 per cent on that expenditure is $468,000 a year. The life or term of service of those ships is but ten years; one-tenth of their cost must be set aside yearly, to provide for their replacement. That sum amounts to $1,500,000.

Admiral Kingsmill, in his memorandum, gives the following approximate cost of the college, battery, barracks, dry docks, &c.:

1 naval college	$150,000
Furnishing same and workshops	50,000
Two houses, captain of college and director of studies	15,000
Barracks	200,000
Battery for heavy and light guns	20,000
Arming same	110,000
Admiralty house for officers of barracks	70,000
Dockyards	100,000
	$715,000

Just think of it. Building a college for $150,000 and constructing a dry dock for $100,000. Who ever heard the like?

Let us take those figures, $715,000, and add them to the total cost of the fleet, and that gives us a total of $16,405,000 for construction and maintenance.

COST OF MAINTENANCE ON LAND.

The following are the details given for the yearly maintenance of our naval establishment on land:

Upkeep of naval college	$ 80,000
" of barracks	75,000
" of dockyards	350,000
Headquarter staffs	80,000
Reserve stores	100,000
Ordnance stores	200,000
Contingencies	150,000
Total	$1,030,000

MAINTENANCE OF THE FLEET.

First, as to the annual cost of the training ships 'Niobe' and 'Rainbow,' according to the estimate of Admiral Kingsmill:

Cost of nucleous crew and training personal	$ 282,000
Victualling and medicines, &c.	60,000
Clothing gratuity	15,000
Upkeep of 'Niobe'	150,000
" of 'Rainbow'	115,000
Recruits: Pay, victualling and medicines	550,000
Clothing	70,000
Recruiting expenses	2,000
Total	$1,244,000

Let us now take the upkeep of the fleet, and here are the figures given by Admiral Kingsmill:

4 Bristols.

Pay, allowances and victualling	$ 886,000
Upkeep	530,000

1 Boadicea.

Pay, allowances and victualling, &c.	226,000
Upkeep	150,000

6 Destroyers.

Pay, allowances, victualling	335,000
Upkeep	428,000

Recruits.

Expenditure	200,000
Contingencies	100,000
Total	$2,855,000

It is worth noting down here that there is no estimate given for coal, repairs, &c.

Total cost of the navy, according to the latter plan.

General recapitulation.

Total cost of the navy, according to the latter plan	$ 715,000
College, barracks, &c.	715,000
Total	$16,370,000

Annual cost, from the estimate of Admiral Kingsmill himself.

Interest on the cost of the fleet	$ 468,000
10 per cent on the cost of the fleet, to provide for replacement, &c.	1,560,000
Upkeep of college, barracks, &c	1,030,000
Maintenance of training-ships	1,244,000
Upkeep of Bristols and destroyers	2,855,000
Total annual cost	$7,157,000

And mark that we are spending about $1,500,000 for agriculture. Is it to be wondered at that the people are clamouring for a plebiscite, in order to put a stop to such an extravagance.

But wait till next year and you will see worse things than that.

They talk of fifteen million dollars for the building of our navy. But those who examine closely the cost of our national public works know that a much heavier expenditure must be anticipated.

Let us now read carefully sections 5 and 6 of the Bill:

The minister shall have the control and management of all naval affairs, including the perchase, maintenance and repair of the ordnance, ammunition, arms, armouries, stores, munitions and habiliments of war intended for the use of the naval service.

The minister shall have the control and management, including the construction, purchase, maintenance and repair of naval establishments and of ships and other vessels for the naval service.

We cannot conceive to-day, how many million dollars will be spent for the purchase of the maintenance and repairs of the ordnance, ammunition, arms, armouries, munitions and stores.

I invite all those who are responsible to the taxpayers of Canada and are accountable for the taxes imposed on them, to read carefully the following extract from the report of the conference (page 27):

In any consideration of the question of providing new docking facilities the Admiralty suggested that the docks should be designed of sufficient size to accommodate the largest ships whether for war or commerce, as apart from the mercantile advantage such docks might be used in case of an emergency by armoured cruisers and battleships. Docks of this kind might be placed on the Pacific, the Atlantic and the River St. Lawrence.

The providing of such docking facilities if designed of sufficient size, would involve a very large expenditure. Try to figure out the cost of the fortifications necessary to insure the protection of our naval yards and of our dry docks; just figure out the cost of pensions and of the training schools. No money is to be found now for the construction of a dry dock at Lévis, to meet a long felt want of maritime commerce and accommodate sea-going ships.

It is impossible to forecast the enormous expenditure which will be saddled upon this country, and it is the ratepayers, the humble workingman, and the poor farmer who will have to foot the bill. And that expenditure will go on increasing by leaps and bounds, from year to year. The South African war did cost us $2,000,000; how much then is the ratepayer going to pay, when our brothers are called upon to shed their blood in a war carried on by England against a European power?

How much are we going to spend, when our navy will be drawn into some great war for the defence of England?

How much shall we spend, perhaps to drown the voice of, and defeat just claims? How much will it cost us, should that navy be destroyed?

To-morrow the government will be called upon or will think that they are called upon to adopt a more strenuous attitude. Our naval expenditure will not be estimated according to our population, our wealth and our commerce, but from the risks we shall incur. That navy which you are going to build, those fighting ships which you propose to construct will demand life, strength and power. Before the general elections are on, the government will perhaps crown their present policy, by having Dreadnoughts built.

Open our public accounts under the heading of our Canadian militia, and you will find that that expenditure has gone on increasing by leaps and bounds, since 1890.

In 1890, our expenditure on militia was, $1,287,000; in 1896, $2,136.54; in 1909, $6,115,-150.

The government is asking for a vote of $6,898,000 for the fiscal year 1910-1911. Let us speak honestly: our naval expenditure will increase in the same ratio and with the same rapidity.

Let us hearken to the words of Sir William White, who was for a long time director of the shipyards of the British government:

There is no find stand in the designing of new models of warships, and as the Dreadnought type has not received the approval of a great number of experts, it may safely be said that this class of ships will not long remain in vogue and will not be in use so long as claimed by its advocates.

Will not our history be a repetition of the history of those people thrown into the vortex of militarism formerly denounced by the right hon. Prime Minister? When our fleet is built, we shall inevitably be carried away and led into naval ventures. We shall have to increase our public debt which will soon reach $500,000,000, and do without public works and improvements of great urgency in the interest of the progress of agriculture and industry. Let us listen to the words fallen from the lips of one of the most distinguished members on the government side. Let us impress on our minds the words uttered on March 29, 1900, by the hon. member for the Yukon:

But if we start at present into any vast naval or military outlay, we shall so impede our growth that in the course of a very short time we shall be of much less assistance to the empire than if we permitted our country to advance and prosper as she is doing now.

Let us cast a glance at the ascensional progression of the military and naval outlay of some nations. After the wars of the French revolution and of the empire, the cost of the British army was 220,000,000 francs. The following statistics give us a slight insight into the future in store for us:

	Francs.
Outlay of England for her militia in 1828..	220,000,000
Outlay of England for her militia in 1870..	540,000,000
Naval outlay of England in 1828..	150,000,000
Naval outlay of England in 1870..	240,000,000

During the last decade, the yearly outlay of England for her navy was 820,000,000 francs.

Mr. J. TURCOTTE (Quebec). (Translation.) Francs, you say?

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation). Yes, francs.

Mr. BLONDIN. (Translation.) Would you rather have pounds sterling instead of francs?

Mr. TURCOTTE. (Translation). Is it 820,000,000 francs?

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation). Yes, we find in the other countries the same progression in the expenditure.

	Francs.
1899	649,496,036
1900	663,369,671
1909	798,327,606

Naval Expenditure in France.

	Francs.
1899	303,600,510
1903	332,902,510

Naval Expenditure in the United States.

1900	$ 55,000,000
1909	121,000,000

Let us glance at the yearly naval outlay in some European countries and in the United States:

Great Britain	$164,000,000
Germany	60,424,000
United States	99,102,210
France	63,665,916
Italy	26,585,699
Russia	53,519,842

Is it not a fact that the largest portion of the revenues of those countries is swallowed up by extraordinary armaments? I do not wish to frighten and alarm the Canadian people with these statistics, but I know that similar causes will produce here similar effects. The people will wake up, when they feel on their shoulders the crushing weight of militarism with its heavy yoke of taxation.

Canada has not yet reached a sufficient stage of development to allow her to embark into such a ruinous venture. On the 15th of April, 1902, the right hon. the Prime Minister said:

> The principal items in the budget of Canada are what? Public works, the development of the country, the construction of railways and harbours, the opening up of ways of transportation. This is the work to which we have to devote our energies, and I would look upon it as a crime to divert any part of that necessary expenditure to the supply of guns, cannons and military armaments generally.

In 1910, as in 1902, we should spend our energies, display our patriotism and our loyalty in creating and improving our means of transportation, in building the Georgian Bay canal, in developing and promoting agriculture, commerce and industry.

One duty is to develop the natural resources of this land of ours, an inheritance entrusted to our care by a kind Providence. This great task calls for our whole strength and for our energies. We should impede the growth of Canada by saddling our people with a ruinous war budget. Every year, the government asks parliament for a vote of one million dollars, in order to insure the efficaciousness of our immigration policy. Owing to the fertility of our lands, to the productive work of our intelligent and energetic people, to the superior qualities and the variety of our products, thanks also to the peace and privileges which we enjoy, we have succeeded in bringing about a very material change in the minds of the European peoples and now we are yearly welcoming to our shores thousands of immigrants, formerly crushed down under the burden of militarism.

We invite a sound immigration from Europe and the United States, to assist us in the development of our country. At a moment when our fondest hopes are being realized, at a moment when the stream of immigration we are in need of is pouring into the country, is it fair, is it proper, without consulting these new settlers, to adopt a policy which might result in leading the flower of our youth into naval battles on all the seas of the world? Are we then, Canadians, to be used as targets on the waves of the North sea and upon the billows of the different oceans?

Mr. BELAND. (Translation). My hon. friend has just referred to naval battles in which our youth might be decimated. Would he kindly tell us how many naval battles England has fought in the last hundred years?

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation). That is a matter of history, about which my hon. friend may enlighten himself. But let me tell him that the past is no guarantee of the future.

Mr. BELAND. (Translation). Then my friend agrees that England has not fought a single naval battle, for the last hundred years?

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation). I shall return to that subject later on, and then my hon. friend will get an answer to his question.

Mr. BELAND. (Translation). Does the hon. gentleman deny that England has not fought a single naval battle, for the last hundred years. He has just referred to the dangers which we shall have to face, if we take part in the naval battle of England.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation). Does my hon. friend affirm that, for a century, England has not fought a single naval battle? Does he affirm that she has had no naval engagement since 1800? Does he forget the Crimean war?

Mr. BELAND. (Translation). It was in 1805 that the battle of Trafalgar took place.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation). The battle of Trafalgar took place in the course of the nineteenth century.

Mr. BELAND. (Translation). That is over a hundred years ago.

Mr. BLONDIN. (Translation). A few years more or less is immaterial.

Mr. BELAND. (Transation). That battle took place a hundred and five years ago.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation). As I said, I shall return to that subject later on, and I hope I may now be permitted to go on with my speech.

Mr. BELAND. (Translation). My hon. friend knows very well that in asking that question, I had not the least intention of being discourteous to him.

It is then taken for granted that England has not had a single naval battle to fight, for over a hundred years.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation). The hon. gentlemen who do not share my views, who advocate an imperial policy, those who are in favour of building a navy in order to take part in the wars of the empire, those who want to place at the disposal of the imperial authorities contributions to the navy, should read carefully the following extract from the report of the last imperial conference:

> A simple contribution of money or material may be to one Dominion the most acceptable form in which to assist the imperial defence. Another, while ready to provide local naval forces, and to place them at the disposal of the Crown in the event of war, may wish to lay the foundations upon which the future navy of its own could be raised. A third may think the best manner in which it can assist in promoting the interests of the empire is in undertaking certain local services not directly of a naval character, but which may relieve the imperial government from expenses which would otherwise fall on the British exchequer.

I share the views expressed in the latter part of this quotation. From the very inception of confederation, we have given our adhesion to the suggestions of the admiralty. I wish to be understood when giving my opinion on the defence of Canada. Proud as I am of our autonomous institutions and of the privilegs which flow therefrom, I agree that certain duties and responsibilities devolve upon me, from a national standpoint. Let me review the question in the light of our national traditions. Our military tradition goes back not merely to the battles of Montmorency and Carillon, but it goes beyond the heroic period of Frontenac. This military tradition, like the 'Canadian soul' is traced back to the days of Champlain.

Under the shadow of the British flag as under the French flag, the Canadian people knew how to defend their territory at the cost of the greatest sacrifices. My most earnest wish is that the Canadian people should in the future show the same spirit of abnegation and the same devotedness to this land of ours.

I say, consult the Canadian people and I will submit to the verdict of that sovereign body. If the members of parliament are bound or deem themselves bound by the resolution of the 29th of March. The people remain absolutely free. The hon. gentlemen on the other side, in endeavouring to commit the people to a policy which, in my humble opinion, distorts the national soul, point out the sacrifices made by New Zealand and Australia in favour of England. The public knows very well that owing to their isolation in the Pacific ocean, these colonies are bound to make great sacrifices for their naval defence. Our position is altogether different from theirs and I cannot endorse a legislation which in defiance of our traditions, drags us into the world policy of England.

Alone, among all the governments of the American continent, the Canadian government is about to entangle itself in the foreign policy of the United Kingdom. Still, I am not opposed to any assistance that might be given to England in an emergency. No. But this policy problem involves the most serious consequences and the Canadian people, enlightened by their representatives, should have a voice in the discussion of such a momentous matter.

During the conference of 1907, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries showed that Canada had relieved England of important naval expenditures which she formerly bore. I am sorry I cannot but regret that certain causes should keep the hon. minister away from this House and I sympathize with his friends in their trial.

On the 29th of March, 1909, the hon. minister said: After the denunciation of the treaty of Washington, from 1886 until to-day Canada has assumed all the responsibility of protecting her fisheries, not only on the Atlantic coast, but also on the Pacific coast, and since that time, we have spent no less a sum than $5,186,700.16.

By taking over the stations of Esquimalt and Halifax, Canada is doing a very great service to the empire at large. Canada has been spending considerable sums for the aid of navigation in general and the maritime commerce of England has greatly benefited thereby. If our fishery protection service is not what is desired, if it is incomplete, let us vote the necessary sums to secure an efficacious service.

As stated by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, on the 29th of March. "If we had some of these small boats in order to protect our coasts, it is to be presumed that in a short time large warships could come to our rescue, and in the meantime our coasts could be defended by these destroyers and torpedo boats.' I concur in these words. I could even go further. I am in favour of taking the necessary means for the defence of our coasts for the protection of our fisheries, and for our national defence. But the vessels used for those purposes should be absolutely Canadian ships, employed for the defence of Canada. There would be no cause to bear militarism.

Why should we not act in accordance with our national traditions? The Canadian people has fully discharged its duty towards the British Crown. Let us listen to the noble words fallen from the lips of Sir Charles Tupper in 1892:—

For my part, I believe that no contribution to the maintenance of the British army and navy on the part of Canada would have done more for the defence of the empire than the means by which public expenditure has been carried on for that purpose, in Canada.

On the 11th of March, 1898, Sir Charles Tupper showed that Canada had discharged her duty. Here are his very words:

I for one believe that no contribution on the part of Canada to the maintenance of the British army and navy would have done any more for the defence of the empire than the manner in which public money has been applied for that purpose, in Canada.

On the 11th of March, 1898, Sir Charles Tupper showed that Canada had done her duty. These are his words:—

In 1863, there went over to England a delegation of Canadian statesmen composed of Mr. George Brown, Sir John Macdonald, Sir George E. Cartier and Sir Alexander Galt. These gentlemen were going to settle with the imperial government the measure of our mutual condition to the imperial service and upon that occasion, the British government solved the difficulty by writing. This despatch though it was considered that it should remain confidential, was published at full length. It mentioned that were Canada willing to agree to make a yearly expenditure of one million dollars in connection with her militia, England was ready on all occasions to put her power at the service of Canada for the maintenance of her interest and her security. Not only has Canada discharged the obligations assigned to her by that document, but she has done immensely more. After having created a militia for the maintenance of which she provides herself, she has built, without a single cent of contribution from the imperial funds, the Canadian Pacific Railway.

And what does Mr. Chamberlain say to you? He tells you that the construction of that great interoceanic road, by means of which England may equip her fleets on the Pacific, has enormously increased the importance of the mother country and that it is invaluable to her.

Yes, Canada has discharged her duty to the empire!

We are bound to provide for our own defence, in order to show to the world that we are a spirited people. In the future, as in the past, Canada shall discharge her duty and do what she owes to herself and to the empire. But I do not wish to commit myself, by legislation, to participate in the wars of the empire. Let us try to realize the dreadful position we should find ourselves in by taking part in all the wars of England. Let us hear the admiralty on the matter:

It has been recognized by the colonial government that in time of war the local naval forces should come under the general direction of the admiralty.

It is impossible to forecast the enormous expenditure which Canada will incur. The South African war has cost us two million dollars. The United Kingdom, with a population of 40 million people, was waging war against a population of 350,000 souls. Is it possible to foresee the enormous sacrifices that we shall be called upon to make should England go to war with one of the great powers?

From 1850 to 1900, England has carried on or been mixed up in twenty or twenty-five wars. Since 1814, in spite of the numerous wars of the British empire, never has the integrity of the Canadian territory been threatened. In the future, owing to a legislation diametrically opposed to all our national and constitutional traditions; in the future, I say owing to a legislation placed upon our statute-books, without the people having had a voice in the matter, we shall have only to defend our own territory, but to shed our blood upon all the battlefields of the empire.

As remarked by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier on the 3rd February:

We become parties to all British guarantees to foreign nations. Great Britain has undertaken very serious responsibilities, involving possibly very extensive wars, towards those foreign nations. I say that we in Canada, under pain of being branded as unfaithful to this agreement and worse than that, as cowards, should have to take part in those wars and in those terrific conflicts which may be occasioned by her guarantees.

This new policy might involve us in the troubles of militarism; it might deprive us of great public works and one day, we might send over to England those ships which will perhaps be destroyed. Are you not afraid of rousing the indignation of those thousands of immigrants who, in leaving Europe have shaken off the shackles of militarism? Would not England be represented with the features of the oppressor.

Let us now study this problem in the light of the constitution. Let us read sections 17 and 18.

The question then is not to create a fleet for the sole defence of Canada. In case of an emergency, the government may place that navy on active service, when it appears advisable to do so, for the defence of England and of the empire.

We become responsible for the foreign policy of England, without having a voice in her counsels as to the framing of that policy. This legislation changes our relations with the mother country and imposes a policy which is baneful to our best interests. This doctrine of participating in the wars of the empire is not a new doctrine; it is an imperialistic doctrine advocated in the interest of England.

Mr. J. TURCOTTE. (Translation.) This is not a new doctrine either.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) I shall later on revert to this subject, and I may tell my hon. friend that I shall give him an irrefutable answer. But can it be said that the proposal to create a new navy, to be incorporated into the royal, is a Canadian doctrine?

Mr. TURCOTTE. (Translation.) It is a doctrine which exists in our statutes.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) It is a doctrine advocated quite recently by the great imperialist, Chamberlain. It is not grounded on the expression of feelings voiced by the most enlightened portion of the Canadian people. The sons of the loyalists in Ontario and in the western provinces, deeply attached as they are to the land of their forefathers, devoted to agricultural and industrial progress, ever ready to defend the integrity of the territory, are anxious to form on this American continent a great nation, and they do not aspire to play a part in the imperial wars. The principle embodied in this legislation, our participation in the wars of the empire, is the sad offspring of an imperialistic doctrine, and it does not offer a national ideal to the Canadian people, anxious as it is to develop freely identifying itself more and more with the native land and reserving to that land the loftiest manifestations of its devotion.

Mr. TURCOTTE. (Translation.) Still it exists.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Mr. Chamberlain, the great British imperialist, turning towards the colonies, asked them to become the feeders of the British fleet. In his opinion, the colonies were to become a reservoir of men necessary to the empire in order to maintain its supremacy.

Mr. Achille Viallate, a professor in the School of Political Sciences, Paris, in a work on the 'British Crisis,' published in 1908, says:

> Can there be found any where else than in those autonomous dominions offering a shelter to a numerous rural population, the necessary sums to the defence of the empire, the military raw material needed to hold its own against the rival empires, a raw material which the metropolis no longer finds at home in sufficient quantity or quality.

We are on the way of imperialism. And should the hopes of imperialists materialize there will be formed a new nationality, an imperial race, and before long Canada will supply with men the army and navy of Great Britain.

Such views cannot tally with the aspirations of the Canadian people.

Our hon. friends opposite do not seem anxious to refer to the imperialistic role of our navy. On the 3rd February the hon. Postmaster General said:

> Those who say that this policy of a Canadian navy is a new one and that the people ought to be consulted regarding it, are singularly ignorant of the facts. Why the policy embodied in the bill we are now discussing, the very ideas expressed in that bill are to be found in the declaration made in the name of Canada during the imperial conference of 1902.

In that declaration, made in the name of the Canadian people, are found the following words:

> At present the Canadian expenditures for defence services are confined to the military side. The Canadian government are preparing to consider the naval side of defence as well.

In the same memorandum occurs the following statement which goes to show that the Canadian government, in 1902, was loath to sacrifice the principles of self-government, which are being infringed in 1910:

> The ministers desire to point out that their objections arise, not so much from the expense involved, as from a belief that the acceptance of the proposals would entail an important departure from the principle of colonial government.

Were those words calculated to induce the Canadian people to believe that Sir Wilfrid Laurier would create a navy in order to participate in the wars of the empire? I am not ignorant of the facts and I believe that the electoral body stated on good ground that the government are embodying in this Bill a policy unknown to the people in 1908.

On the 3rd of February, 1902, Lord Minto wrote to the Colonial Secretary:

With the exception of a few details of minor importance, my ministers consider that the political relations between the mother country and the great autonomous colonies, and especially with Canada, are for the present absolutely satisfactory.

This declaration is far from pointing out a new departure.

On the 15th of April, 1902, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

We are going to London simply to discuss the commercial question.

Let us listen to the eloquent words fallen from his lips in this House, on the 15th of April, 1902:

The basis upon which the British empire rests, the basis upon which it has grown, has been the local autonomy of all its constituent parts, and I do not see that anything can be done at the present time that would warrant a change in that basis in any way whatever.

The leader of the Liberal party further said:

It would be the most suicidal policy that could be devised for Canada to enter into, the vortex in which the nations of Europe, England included, are engaged at the present time, and which compels them to maintain great military armaments.

He continued:

We are going to London simply to discuss the commercial question.

Those words are far from betraying, on the part of the prime minister, any wish or a determination to build a navy, in order to participate in the wars of the empire:

At the imperial conference held in London in 1907, Dr. Smartt, representing Cape Colony, moved the following resolution:

That this conference, recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the Dominions beyond the seas to make such contribution towards the upkeep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services, in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the admiralty and as would best accord with their varying circumstances.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier strongly protested against that resolution and Dr. Smartt withdrew it.

Could the attitude taken by the prime minister in 1907 lead the Canadian people to believe that the government would bring down such a Bill?

If this policy respecting the creation of a navy is not an innovation, a new departure, it should have been embodied in the Liberal programme of 1908. Read again carefully the campaign pamphlet distributed to the electors by the Liberals in 1908; listen to the harangues delivered by the right hon. the prime minister, on the 15th of September, at Niagara Falls and on the 21st at Tilbury. Did he not say on the 19th of September, at Strathroy:

No large issues to place before the people.

Listen to the right hon. prime minister and to the hon. Postmaster General in the province of Quebec. Read the editorials published by the government organs. In vain should you try to find a single word, a single line concerning the building of a navy. Did any one, I ask, officially, lay down during the campaign of 1908, the policy which it is now sought to carry out? Let us be honest and frankly confess that for the first time in 1909, the government did give their adhesion to a policy they had refused to agree to in the past.

Our statesmen by their acts and by their legislation, have expressed the opinion that Canada should not participate in wars which do in no way concern Canada.

I subscribe to the opinion and approve the work of those legislators; but there are to be found in my province among newspapermen and members of parliament belonging to my race, men who seem to claim a monopoly of civic virtues; then as they are satisfied that their doctrine is sound, and not being able to bring themselves to believe in the patriotism of their opponents, they are charitable enough to call in question the sincerity of Mr. Monk and of those who share his views in claiming the rights of the electorate and the privileges of self-government.

I do not speak here in the name of the French Canadian Conservative party; but in view of such insinuations and malevolent attacks as have been directed against our patriotism, I exercise a legitimate right and discharge a duty in declaring here that I conscientiously fulfil my mandate.

Mr. TURCOTTE. (Translation.) Was it not the Conservative party that introduced the Militia Act of 1862?

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) For the defence of Canada.

Mr. TURCOTTE. (Translation.) A Bill which was introduced by the hon. John A. Macdonald and the hon. George E. Cartier.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Let my hon. friend hold his soul in patience for a few minutes, and I shall soon deal with that question. The students of history who are conversant with the past of that party, its principles, its traditions, its spirit, its policy as vast as confederation itself which was created and extended by that party, could hardly conceal their astonishment, should I take a different attitude in the solving of that problem. In subscribing to the policy formulated by Mr. Monk, I remain deeply attached to the traditions handed down to us by Cartier and Macdonald. I am happy to hear my hon. friends opposite render homage to the memory of Sir George E. Cartier, against whom the Liberals of the Province of Quebec formerly directed such bitter attacks.

Mr. TURCOTT. (Translation). It was not for the same motive.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Are the hon. gentlemen who seem to be surprised at Mr. Monk's attitude and at the position taken by myself ignorant of the fundamental principles of the memorable pact concluded in 1854 between the Quebec Liberals and the Conservatives of Ontario. Are they not aware that the essence of the principles professed by the Liberal-Conservative party were the following: Equal rights and mutual respect of the different ethnical elements, equality of representation, due regard for the rights of the minorities and Canadian autonomy? They know very well that those great principles courageously vindicated against the fanaticism of George Brown, Cartier, Macdonald, Angers, Bowell and Sir Charles Tupper fearlessly stool up for the rights of minorities.

In 1905, the Dominion parliament drew up the charter of the privileges and of the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. To my mind, the leader of the Liberal party and the leader of the Conservative party did not truly stand up for the rights of the minorities. I did remain true to Canadian traditions and to Conservative traditions, in lending my humble co-operation to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, when he stood up in this House and asked that such privileges as were claimed with respect to education and the use of the French language should be secured to the minority. The leaders of the Liberal-Conservative party, in coalition with George Brown safeguarded provincial self-government and Canadian autonomy in the British North America Act. To-day, as in 1905, I believe I am true to our best Canadian and Conservative traditions, in declaring that Canada, in the name of the principles of autonomy, should not introduce a new authority in our military and naval policy. In asking for an appeal to the people, and in declaring that our young people should not prticipate in the world policy of the empire and that Canada should organize its own defence, my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) remains true to Conservative traditions, to those traditions handed down to us by the fathers of confederation and also true to the teachings of that great English Liberal school which, in the last century, advocated the consolidation of the empire with free, independent self-governing colonies. The men to whom is entrusted the leadership in both political parties share other views in political economy, but I hope that they will acknowledge the necessity of consulting the people before embarking the country in a new policy the consequences of which affect our autonomy.

I am asked, in the name of the laws of evolution, to subscribe to the programme of participation in the wars of the empire. We have made satisfactory progress by remaining true to our traditions, and we may grow and prosper, without embodying in our statute-book the baneful section which violates our most sacred rights.

I bow to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, as to one of the conspicuous figures in Canadian history. Rising above mere party considerations, he personifies the aspirations of the native land. We all remember that never to be forgotten sitting of the 3rd February, when we saw the hon. member (Mr. Monk), with a voice shattered by physical pain, standing up with difficulty, but patriotically, and protesting against the statesmen who are parcelling out our autonomy, a sacred inheritance and the fruit of so many heroic sacrifices.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk), sticks by the traditions handed down to us by Cartier and Macdonald. Let us turn over a page of our history.

In 1885, General Laurie and Colonel Williams proposed to raise two regiments and asked that the government bear part of the expenditure. Sir John A. Macdonald, after being consulted by Lord Lansdowne, wrote that Canada could not contribute to the wars of the empire. Never did Sir. George E. Cartier recommend to the Canadian people to participate in the wars of the empire. Therefore, I want to remain true to the great British principle: 'No taxation without representation.' We cannot be taxed without being represented. The voting of money and the control of public expenditures constitute the essence of the parliamentary regime. We are going to participate in the wars of the empire, and we are denied the privilege of having a voice in the councils of the empire. We are not entitled to express our opinion on such matters as the treaties entered into by England, her alliances, her foreign policy, the justice or the opportunity of her wars; and yet, this legislation will make us responsible for her policy.

We have no voice in the councils of the empire, and to-morrow we may be called upon to pay, to shed our blood on the battle fields of the empire; to-morrow, I say, our fellow-countrymen may be sent to China, to Australia, to India. I cannot subscribe to such a policy.

The report of the last imperial conference is luminous, but it fills me with fear for the future. Read that report carefully; everything in it tends to deprive the colonies of their autonomy. They are trying to place our militia under the control of the imperial authorities. Let us read the following extract from that report (page 36):

Under the existing Militia and Defence Acts of the various Dominions their governments have no power to employ military forces outside their territories in furtherance of imperial interests.

Moreover, the forces raised over-seas are maintained on a militia basis. They have been so raised and organized in order to provide economically for the local defence of young nations whose development would be retarded by the much higher cost of maintaining regular forces. Citizen forces so constituted usually undertake responsibility for home defence only, but it is hoped that it may be within the power of the self-governing Dominions so to organize their forces as not only to provide for local defence, but also to be in a position to share to the extent of their will and resources in the defence of the empire as a whole.

It is confidently anticipated that co-operation will be forthcoming from all parts of the empire in the time of need. But, in order to utilize these resources from over-seas to the best advantage, it is urged that the arrangements for organizing, training, and mobilizing the troops of the over-sea Dominions, while primarily directed to local defence, should also include the possibility of the employment of a portion of such troops in a wider sphere.

That vast schemes of co-operation of the naval and military forces of the empire can hardly be acceptable to those who are anxious to safeguard our autonomy.

But it is claimed that the hon. member for Jacques Cartier and his friends are not the true expositors of the traditions of the French Canadian Conservatives of the province of Quebec. After listening to the speech of the hon. Postmaster General, I glanced at the monument raised to the memory of Sir George E. Cartier, at a stone's throw from these buildings. In his left hand, Cartier holds the constitution of our country; with his left hand he points out that constitution to the Canadian people. What does that constitution say? What does the British North America Act say? Let me read section 91: 'It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Further on, under subsection 7, it is enacted 'It shall be lawful for the Dominion parliament to make laws respecting militia, military and naval service and defence.'

I remain true to the great principle laid down by Sir George E. Cartier, in our Canadian charter.

We have power to create a naval service for the defence of Canada; but, unless we ask the British parliament to amend our constitution, we cannot create a navy, in order that Canada may participate in the wars of the empire. Moreover, Cartier took good care to embody the principle we advocate in the Militia Act of 1868.

In 1870, Lord Granville, the colonial secretary, informed the Canadian government that henceforth they would have to provide for the defence of the country, in time of peace.

On the 19th of May, 1870, Cartier laid before the Governor General in Council, a protest which was sent over to London.

Cartier's fundamental idea, the cardinal principle of his administration is embodied not only in the charter of 1867, but in the Militia and Defence Act of Canada.

The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof at any time when it appears advisable to do so by reason of emergency.

On the 1st of August, 1904, Sir Frederick Borden brought irrefutable arguments in favour of the Act respecting national defence. Here are his very words:

The very fundamental idea of a militia force always has been and is now home defence. In every portion of the British empire, without any exception, the same principle is laid down which is found in the bill before the House—that the militia of that particular part of the British empire, including the British islands themselves, shall be limited in their service to the particular part of the empire in which they live. I have taken the trouble to examine the old militia laws of the different provinces which made up the Dominion of Canada, and in every one of those provinces we find the same limitation. It has always existed. Under these circumstances it is absurd to talk about service abroad. The words 'for the defence of Canada have been added in order to show that our militia cannot be sent on active service outside Canada except for the defence of Canada.

According to the great leader of the Conservative party, Sir George E. Cartier, our militia, in time of need, or during an emergency can be called out on active service only for the defence of Canada.

According to the leader of the Liberal party, our navy, in time of need, may be placed at the disposal of His Majesty for general service in the Royal Navy. Sir George E. Cartier created our militia for the defence of the country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is going to build a fleet which may participate in the wars of the empire. And let us not forget these words of the British admiralty: 'It has been recognized by the colonial governments that in time of war the local naval forces should come under the general directions of the admiralty.' In time of war, Canada keeps the control of her land army; in time of war, our navy will be under the control of the British admiralty.

We cannot, without amending Cartier's Act, send our troops to fight in Europe, in Asia, in Africa and in Australia. Our navy may make war and fight battles on all the seas. It is essentially destined to take part in all the battles of the empire. We are taking the first step in a very dangerous direction. It is impossible to foretell the evils which will result from this legislation for our people.

Let war be declared between England and a foreign power or a colony like India, and then the Canadian government, under this legislation, will be bound to place its navy at the disposal of the British admiralty.

A proclamation shall immediately issue for the meeting of parliament, and our hon. friends opposite try to shelter themselves behind the intervention of parliament. Yet, parliament will have a very modest part to play. Will parliament be consulted as to the calling back of our ships? The ships might, perhaps, have begun action. They might, perhaps, have been destroyed. Shall we then ask His Majesty to send us back the ships placed at his disposal? Such a supposition is out of the question. Parliament will be summoned in order to vote the necessary money for the sending and the maintenance of the troops. But I am told that similar provisions are to be found in the Militia Act. Very well, but in that case parliament is not called upon to play the same part. Our militia is not under the control of the King of England· it is under the absolute control of parliament and the latter may give orders to the militia. There is no parity between the two cases.

I am ready, Sir, to assume the responsibility of our military and naval defence. I fully recognize all my obligations as a Canadian citizen and as a loyal subject of His Majesty; but, as Sir Wilfrid, in 1907, I am not ready to assume the responsibility of a legislation entailing the evils of militarism, and which encroaches on our autonomy without even consulting the people.

To quote the remark of a writer: 'Were England not sure of our readiness to approve of all her wars, she would be the first to insist on the statu quo.'

In case of an emergency, we lose the control of our navy. Before adopting a permanent policy, the government should inquire into the part we are going to play within the empire. We are not bound by the facts to take action definitively at such a short date. The right hon. the Prime Minister, owes it to his position in this country and in the empire to ground his statements upon well established facts. He delights us when he says that no danger is to be apprehended for Great Britain, and that he has no reason to suppose that Germany is organizing her fleet with any intention of attacking England, or that England is increasing her navy with the intention of taking the offensive On the 3rd of February, Sir Wilfrid said: 'What will be the position of things in 1912? The figures of comparison between the German and British navies will be as follows: the total tonnage of displacement of the British navy will be 20,000,000 tons, and that of the German navy 890,000 tons, a difference of 1,100.000 tons. Under such circumstances danger is not to be apprehended.'

A few weeks ago, Lloyd George said: 'Should ever the German fleet attack England, it would be sunk in a few hours, and lie at the bottom of the North Sea.'

Mr. Asquith said, during the electoral campaign: 'To-day there is no menace of an Anglo-German war; let no power ground its policy on the hypothesis of a war.'

There is no danger from Germany. But I may be told that all the South American republics have a navy, and then why should Canada not have a navy of her own? The South American states all are independent and we are a colony. Those countries have a navy in order to defend the integrity of their territory. They have a national navy, an independent navy. The government is very far from asking for the creation of a navy under similar conditions. Besides, I do not long for those wars that have stained with blood the South American republics, and we should be guilty of a national crime in walking in the footsteps of those nations. I cannot but protest when I see Canada entering into the lists with the nations of the old continent, crushed down under the burdens of militarism.

French Canadians are sometimes charged with giving expression to feelings at variance with loyalty and fidelity to the empire. I may perhaps be charged with being an enemy of the empire. It is allowed, even in this House, to insult the patriots of 1837. Besides, we are not ripe for independence. Mr. Edmond de Nevers, in his masterly work entitled, 'L'avenir du peuple canadien-français,' says: 'We cannot aspire to independence so long as a spirit liberal and broad enough to insure the respect of all our liberties, will not have taken root in the seven provinces.'

Personally, I desire to see Canadians, and especially French Canadians in the future as in the past, add to our history some more pages bearing the stamp of loyalty. Ever since the cession of Canada to England, the French Canadians have been, so to say, the champions of British domination on Canadian soil, whenever our neighbours attempted to take away Canada from England. Lower Canada proved the bulwark of the mother country. In the darkest hours of our history, the French Canadians, without being bound by any such legislation as the one now under discussion, did loyally and generously fight for the British Crown. They have shed their blood for the glory of the empire. During the war of independence of the United States our militia fell in under the orders of the British Governor and saved Canada to England.

From 1760 to 1840 the English bureaucrats, through their persecutions impeded the progress of agriculture, paralyzed trade and commerce in the province of Quebec. Still, the loyalty of our forefathers remained unalterable. And when the United States, in the second decade of the 19th century, tried to get hold of Canada, our troops, under the command of M. de Salaberry, repelled the invader. As soon as the empire is threatened by some danger on Canadian soil, the scattered energies of our peoples form into a solid block, in order to defend the integrity of the soil and of the empire.

The other day the hon. member for Haliburton and Victoria, made a disagreeable reference, to say the least, to the heroes of 1837. The fiery colonel justifies the revolt of the American colonists against England, but he finds nothing but reproaches and bitter words for the patriots of 1837. I do not wish to go into review of the conduct of the American colonists and of the patriots of 1837.

Let me, however, quote an extract from the 'Life of Papineau,' by Mr. A. D. DeCelles:

> Such a seizure, so to say, of the public domain of the province of Quebec, was in our opinion a most crying abuse of power and one against which the House should never have ceased protesting; the American colonies had risen in arms against the mother country for a much less serious encroachment upon their rights. What was lord North's claim to tax the colonists of New England without their consent, compared to that unheard of spoliation of the public domain, against the will of the representatives of the people?

On the 3rd of February, the hon. Postmaster General said:

> Sir, if we were to follow the advice of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier we would have the province of Quebec in the position in which my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), a few years ago, said the British empire was in; we would have the province of Quebec in this confederation, where the majority of all the English speaking provinces is a unit on this question; although differing in details, we would have the province of Quebec and the French Canadian race in a position of a splendid isolation.

Mr. Speaker, I am against the splendid isolation of the French Canadian race. I say to my hon. friend as regards his attitude on the question and as regards the attitude of his ally, the ex-member for Labelle, Mr. Bourassa, one of the most talented men that the French Canadian race ever produced, that in propounding this policy of splendid isolation for the French Canadian in this confederation of ours, they are not true to the traditions of their race.

Does the hon. Postmaster General really know the feeling, the opinion of the Canadian people on the Bill providing for the creation of a navy for the defence of Canada and of the empire? How can you speak of the isolation of the province of Quebec, when the electorate of the other provinces has had no opportunity to give their verdict on the question? Consult the people by way of a plebiscite and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, you will hear thousands and thousands of workingmen condemning the construction of a fleet for imperial purposes. I believe, in concert with the labouring classes, with the 'Grange' of Ontario, with the western 'grain growers,' that the policy of the government does not fall in with the aspirations of the Canadian people.

The hon. Postmaster General is naturally anxious to have that measure approved by the French Canadian element. Hence the efforts he has put forth to show how liberal, how generous England is to Canada. In return, the French Canadians, if we are to believe the minister should outdo the others in approving a Bill which aims at defending and protecting England.

The hon. gentleman has evoked the memory of the British parliamentarians who granted us the charter of 1774, when England was about to lose her American colonies. I am happy to pay a debt of gratitude to the British parliament of 1774, and I know how to appreciate the value of the liberties, the rights and privileges which they granted to us.

Those memorable struggles, those heroic battles were fought by the people, by its representatives, by the clergy, by a few seigneurs, at the cost of great sacrifices, at the cost of blood spilled on battlefields and even of death on the scaffold. God forbid that I should seek to diminish the respect of my fellow countrymen for England; but the eloquent page of history written on the 3rd of February, 1910, by the hon. minister would really be incomplete. He has done homage to the British parliamentarians of 1774, but he forgot to mention the famous charter granted to Canada in 1840 by British parliamentarians. That charter was the offspring of injustice and despotism; it stands to this very day in history as a monument of hatred and hostility towards our race.

The statements made by the hon. minister warrant my completing that page of history, in order to show that the French Canadians, under such painful circumstances, did really win their liberties at the cost of heroic struggles.

The British parliament of 1840 deprived us of the rightful number of our representatives and abolished, proscribed the use of the French language in the Canadian parliament. Then it was that began the memorable constitutional battle, under Lafontaine's enlightened, calm and energetic leadership. The moderation, the conciliatory spirit of that eminent statesman are referred to. In the eyes of the historian, he appears under the striking features of the uncompromising Canadian, when the rights of minorities are at stake, when the French language is to be saved from shipwreck. To quote Mr. DeCelles: 'Interested with the mission of claiming the rights of a people, Lafontaine repels any semi-measure of justice; he is satisfied with nothing but a full remedial measure, and the uplifting of his fellow countrymen so long relegated to the lowest rungs of the political leader.'

During the session of 1842, Lafontaine is seen violating the constitution granted by the British parliament; he is seen addressing the House in French, in order to affirm as emphatically as possible the right we had of using our own idiom and at the same time to protest against the clause of the constitution which deprived us of that right.

In 1905, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier proved true to the traditions of Lafontaine, when he stood up and moved for the restoration of the rights to the use of the French tongue in the legislatures of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I do not want the French Canadian people to be isolated. Still, I bless Lafontaine's memory; I owe him a debt of gratitude for declining to accept the position of Solicitor General, at the hands of those who wished to cover him with glory, instead of doing justice to his fellow-countrymen, Lafontaine denied his co-operation to Governor Thompson; he was loath to give his support to the policy of the Governor and of the British government, at a time when from the province of Quebec arose violent protests against the British authorities. Lafontaine declined to accept personal honours. As a Canadian he claimed equal rights for all races and creeds.

Let us be fair to England and to Canada. Let us give England due credit for her work in the history of civilization and for the liberties she granted us. But let us not forget the memorable strugles of our forefathers in order to secure to us the rights guaranteed by the treaties and by the constitution.

The hon. member for Jacques Cartier has also referred to Louisiana. He seemed to say to the French Canadians: 'The French in Louisiana have lost the official use of their language, under the star-bespangled banner; you have secured that right, under the British flag; it behooves you to make sacrifices in order to save the prestige of the empire.'

In 1803, the President of the United States negotiated, through Napoleon, the purchase of 'Louisiana.' The latter was to be provided with a constitution embodying the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty. The official use of the French tongue was maintained up to 1898. It was not abolished by congress, but by the legislature of the State of Louisiana, on May 12, 1898, without a protest in congress or in the state legislature. It was through their own fault that the French-speaking people of Louisiana were deprived of the official use of their tongue. Our countrymen in the west have lost the right to the official use of their tongue, in spite of our interference. Are they disposed to find fault with British institutions?

I shall wind up that page of history by asking this question: What would be the status of the French tongue in this Dominion parliament, had not Lafontaine protested with all his might against the constitution of 1840, granted to Canada by the British parliament? Should we feel thankful to Great Britain only for having obtained the official use of our tongue, or rather should we not bless the memory of our ancestors for having secured to us that privilege?

It is just possible that we are witnessing one of the most mournful pages of our history in the making. In my humble opinion, the government policy will lead Canada to militarism, conscription, and possibly the disruption of the colonial ties. Accordingly, I suggest that the government should consult the people through a plebiscite. Is not the right of the British subject to being consulted most generally recognized? I object to seeing violated one of the cardinal principles of our constitution, whereby parliament is not allowed to impose on the people a most serious departure from that constitution without having first obtained the consent of the people to such a change.

It is not that I wish to appeal to the feelings or prejudices of the electorate to bring about the rejection of such a measure; no, I have a loftier conception of my parliamentary duties; but it is of the very essence of British institutions that the will of the people should be consulted before effecting any fundamental change in the system of government. The members of the Labour Conference, held at Quebec on September 23, 1909, with my hon. friend from Maisonneuve as chairman, plainly stated their wish that the government should consult the people through a plebiscite before complying with the views expressed at the last imperial conference. A body of workingmen belonging to all races, to all churches, should command attention. I was glad to hear the hon. member for Jacques Cartier strongly vindicate the rights of workingmen who demand a plebiscite. The plebiscite idea has not yet commended itself to all classes of society in Great Britain, but the British Prime Minister has referred in a favourable way to the proposal of a referendum. The plebiscite idea which has been put into practice in Belgium and Switzerland should be resorted to more and more in our country. As a matter of fact, that system seems to work well as regards municipal matters. I quote the following from a newspaper:

The time is at hand when, for all civilized nations, the public undertakings, budgets, political, economical, social, and military questions which have to be solved, are of such importance, and of such a novel character, that governments will no longer be willing to take the responsibility of solving them, and must, from sheer necessity, resort to a consultation of the popular will.

In 1907, the Swiss authorities, previous to reorganizing the party, had recourse to a referendum. The outcome of the Canadian plebiscite of 1898, on the question of prohibition of the liquor traffic, has been satisfactory. In suggesting a plebiscite, I am in accord with the labouring classes, the independent press, the agricultural press of Ontario and the west, with prominent farmers of Ontario, the 'Weekly Sun' of Toronto 'The Farmer's Advocate,' and the most active agricultural societies. That plebiscite idea had its origin in the great sister province of Ontario and in western Canada.

I may be allowed to quote the following lines from the resolution pased by the farmers of Ontario:—

Your committee is of opinion that the whole influence of Canada should be exerted in favour of any movement making for peace. That is why they are suspicious of the proposal for the building of a Canadian navy, a departure which instead of favouring peace, might lead to war. Therefore, we pray respectfully, but earnestly, the Dominion government not to adopt that policy before the question has been thoroughly discussed by the Canadian people, and before the latter have expressly declared themselves favourable to the plan, at a poll held especially for that object.

These fellow-citizens of ours, who ask that the people be consulted, are the descendants in large numbers of the loyalists who sacrificed their all to maintain the supremacy of Great Britain. How can it be contended that the French people stand alone, when the most worthy offspring of the Anglo-Saxon race are taking the lead in this movement and opposing the policy of the government? I shall quote from the utterances of Dr. Goldwin Smith, the oracle of the Liberal party:—

No parliament elected at a time when the question of the building of a navy was not even mentioned, has the right to force on the country such a novel policy.

On the other hand the farmers of Alberta demand that the government should consult the people. And what were the views expressed by the hon. member from Digby (Mr. Jameson) on January 12th:

By their policy of to-day they propose to bind the people of this country, without asking leave or opinion. They propose to spend the money of men who must man the ships and pay the bills without deigning to consult them. They are denying the people their right to speak as to the government's action in disregarding the advice of naval experts; they are refusing to let their voice be heard as to the old policy of one empire, one navy. I do not think the administration or this House possess that right, and I submit, with all due deference, that this question should be referred to the people of Canada by means of a plebiscite before the adoption of a permanent naval policy upon the lines proposed by the government.

Let me quote the words of an Anglo-Saxon, Mr. Smith, editor of the 'Weekly Sun,' Toronto:

What then is our first duty?

Our first duty is to ask that before irremediably tying down the country to the building of a Canadian navy, the whole question be submitted to the verdict of the Canadian people. It is monstrous that two hundred stray men, elected at a time when the matter was not even mentioned, should attempt to bind us to such a policy. Then the people should be consulted, and I trust that from this constituency there will come a cry which will be heard in Ottawa demanding that the whole electorate be called upon to express its opinion.

Professor Marshall, of Queens, is opposed to the building of a war navy, and contends that as a result of a plebiscite, the naval policy of the government would be defeated. I have done my duty in asking for a plebiscite, the effect of which cannot be to bring about a change of government. If the government and parliament imperil or violate our autonomy, if we are thrown in the vortex of militarism and imperialism, I do not wish to be held responsible for this invasion and spoliation of the rights secured at the price of the blood of our progenitors.

Should that unhappy proposal become law, 'there shall be,' in accordance with section 40, ' an institution for the purpose of imparting a complete education in all branches of naval science and tactics, a naval college.' I trust the government will not forget to grant to the French language a fair and large place in the curriculum and examination papers.

Mr. TALBOT. (Translation.) Am I right in understanding the hon. gentleman to say when that naval college will be established, he wishes the French tongue and the French Canadians to have a show? One might have inferred from his speech that he was opposed to the building of a navy.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) I will say this to the hon. member for Bellechasse: If that unhappy proposal is to become law, as I have just said, if the unfortunate policy of the government carries, and if that college is opened, I wish that the French tongue should be given the fair and generous treatment to which it is entitled.

Mr. TURCOTTE. (Translation.) We are all agreed as to that.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Great Britain had adopted in regard to Canada a policy that was wise and in harmony with our aspirations. If the colonies are to take a hand in the wars of the empire, there may result some friction which may bring about the disruption of the colonial system. The enormous sums which will be spent towards helping Great Britain will be a heavy burden on the shoulders of the Canadian people. Those who to-day proclaim themselves friendly to Great Britain may prove to be very short-sighted in their love for her. For a goodly number of distinguished people, the real fatherland is not the land wherein we live and toil, but rather on the other side of the Atlantic. The aim is to develop an imperial feeling, instead of developing in our loving and patriotic hearts a national, a truly Canadian feeling. I am unable to agree with them in that respect. They fondly love England, I respect the British flag, but I fondly love my country. We French Canadians who were ceded to England 150 years ago, we have Canada as our country, our home. We wish to see it live, to see it prosper, to see it grow, and with a view to reaching that happy destiny, we are intent on accomplishing deeds of life, and not deeds of death.

M. LACHANCE (Quebec Centre) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LENNOX. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. The House will go into Committee of Supply, and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) will continue his estimates.

Mr. LENNOX. Before the House goes into Committee of Supply to-morrow I propose to call attention to some matters relating to the flooding of lands in connection with the dam at Hastings and payments made to certain parties in the township of Asphodel. I shall refer to the valuator and the solicitor mentioned in answer to a question at page 3827 of the Unrevised ' Hansard '.

Mr. FIELDING. Is that in connection with the Department of Railways and Canals?

Mr. LENNOX. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.35 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved that the House do, on Tuesday next, go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Fisheries Act, chapter 45 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by—

(a) Defining the standard size of the barrel in which oysters are sold, bartered or trafficked in;

(b) Prohibiting the taking, buying, selling, possessing or exporting of fish for the purpose of converting it into manure, guano or fertilizer, or for its manufacture or conversion into oil or manure or other fertilizing product, without a permit from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and

(c) Providing for the bringing into force, by proclamation, the regulations prepared by the International Fisheries Commission between Great Britain and the United States, now before the House, and to authorize the making of regulations to secure their enforcement, and fixing penalties for their violation.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN BUSINESS AGENT AT WASHINGTON.

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to ask a question of the government. I notice in the Toronto ' Daily Star ' an item headed:

Message to Canada from United States lost for ten Days—Tariff Experts at Washington had Trunks packed waiting for Reply from Ottawa that never came—Criticism of British Embassy, which mailed Message—Canadian Attaché needed.

Another paper contains the following item in reference to this despatch:

Where we Need a Man.

The Toronto 'Star' prints a despatch from a correspondent in Washington which lets a little light into the darkness of this difficulty which sprang up so suddenly ten days ago over the question of tariff relations between the two countries. It seems that the American authorities, when they entered on their work, issued a statement of their operations to the representatives of the countries that might be interested. Naturally, the British Embassy was the only place to serve notification respecting Canada. After waiting a while, not getting any answer, the Americans, with that courtesy which is bred of business training and the business man's allowance for unexplainable accidents, inquired again. Then it appeared that, in Mr. Bryce's absence in the West Indies, the best the British Embassy could do was to write over to the foreign office to see whether this was to be handled on the basis of four trips across the Atlantic between letter and answer, or whether it would be all right for Canadians to handle the business themselves. Fortunately, the foreign office very sensibly left it to Canada herself to settle with the States, and this answer came along about the time the Americans made their second inquiry. This time Canada was notified, but in the circumstances everybody was afraid to move, because on the one side it looked, from the newspapers, as if Canada was expected to dance to the Washington piping, and on the other side as if Mr. Fielding was on his high horse and wouldn't deign to notice the existence of our big neighbour. By dint of applying good humour and common sense the situation has now been straightened out. But—

If Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to make this week the speech he made one day before Christmas, he might not be quite so certain that the presence of a Canadian representative in Washington is wholly unnecessary in face of the efficiency of the British Embassy. It doesn't so much matter what his title might be, or in what order he would walk in to dinner, but if we had had one reasonably intelligent Canadian stationed in Washington this incident need never have occurred. As it is, apparently nothing but the civility of some democratic American officials saved us from having to argue the case with the maximum rates standing against us. The double crossing of the ocean as a route of communication between Washington and Ottawa is a very interesting survival, but really it isn't business, and it had better be eliminated in the interest of economy.

I also notice in another paper of an earlier date, referring to the Canadian office in Belgium, and the Canadian offices in Australia, and other places, an article. I ask the government if it is not about time that we should have a business agent in Washington, our nearest trade neighbour.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have to say in reply to my hon. friend that it may be perhaps opportune to discuss whether we should have an agent in Washington or not, but certainly not for the reasons mentioned in these extracts.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—SIR FREDERICK BORDEN.

Hon. MACKENZIE KING. At the request of my hon. colleague the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) I would ask permission of the House to make an explanation on his behalf as he is unfortunately unable through illness to be in the House this afternoon. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) in his speech on March 2, said:

Our minister of war (Sir Frederick Borden) delivered a speech here on February 10, and if hon. gentlemen will look it up, they will see that the hon. minister declared that the resolution that was presented by the Prime Minister last March was the one that was finally adopted by this House, and he puts in on 'Hansard' just as it appeared when first read by the Prime Minister. Let me read it to you:

The hon. member then read the first part of the resolution as introduced by the Prime Minister, and continued:

You will remember that that is the paragraph as it appeared in the resolution brought in by the Prime Minister, and the Minister of Militia has referred to that as the one finally adopted. But it was not so.

With reference to this passage I have received from Sir Frederick Borden the following communication:

My dear Mackenzie King,—Thanks for your kind letter directing my attention to Mr. Crother's reference to my speech. I had hoped to be able to bring the matter up in the House to-day and notified Mr. Crothers accordingly. Unfortunately after making the attempt, I have had a return of lumbago and must keep quiet. I am anxious to have the correction made in my speech, and it has occurred to me that you might bring the matter up for me to-day, so that the necessary instructions may be given to 'Hansard' to substitute the resolution which I read for the one published erroneously.

The speech itself carries with it the proof that I read the resolution finally adopted by the House.

As a matter of fact I had the resolution adopted March 29, 1909, and Mr. Borden's amendment to the motion for the second reading of the Navy Bill (February 3, 1910) respectively pasted on separate sheets of letter paper just like the duplicate I am sending herewith. At six o'clock recess I handed them to the 'Hansard' boy telling him he need not return them. They were not used by 'Hansard' in extending reporters' notes, but the resolution of 1909 was erroneously clipped from 'Hansard' of March 29, 1909, at the end of the premier's speech instead of at the end of the debate of that day.

I have a most distinct recollection of reading the resolution in which I had marked the words 'speedy' for special emphasis and remark.

The proof-reading was done by me but was limited to my own words. I did not think of proof-reading the extracts. When I took the proofs to the 'Hansard' room, I mentioned the fact that I had not read the extracts, &c., &c., and was told that it was not necessary as special care was taken to read and compare them.

Yours very truly,
F. W. BORDEN.

I wish also to read the following letter addressed to Sir Frederick Borden from the chief reporter of 'Hansard,' the letter speaks for itself:

Ottawa, March 4, 1910.

Dear Sir Frederick Borden,—In reply to your inquiry in regard to the resolution quoted by you in your speech of February 10 last as having been passed unanimously by the House on March 29, 1909, and referred to by Mr. Crothers in his speech of the 2nd instant, I would like to say that I find on inquiry, that, by mistake made in this office in copying the resolution from Hansard' of 1909, the resolution, as moved originally by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was erroneously inserted in the report of your speech instead of the resolution as finally adopted by the House, which was the one you did quote.

The erroneous substitution of the one resolution for the other appears not to have been detected in the revision of the report, and hence is continued in the revised edition of the debates.

While regretting the mistake, I beg to say that in these matters the chief reporter has no responsibility.

I am,
Very respectfully yours,
ALBERT HORTON,
Chief reporter.

Sir Frederick Borden, K.C.M.G.,
Minister of Militia and Defence.

I have to ask, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence, that you give instructions to 'Hansard,' to have the necessary corrections made in the report of his speech.

Mr. CROTHERS. The statement just made by the hon. Minister of Labour from the hon. the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden) does not of course challenge any remark which I made in my observations the other night, and therefore does not call for any reply from me. My observations were not based entirely on what the Minister of Militia said, but also upon a statement made, as reported in the Toronto 'Globe,' by the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) to the effect that we on this side had approved of the resolution passed last March, prohibiting in any event the granting of a naval contribution towards the maintenance or construction of the imperial navy, and it occurred to me that the Minister of Justice is labouring under the same misapprehension as was the Minister of Militia. However, I do not desire to add anything further than to express my very sincere regret that the absence of the hon. Minister of Militia, and express the hope that he will soon be fully restored to health, and resume his duties in this House.

PRESS GALLERY.

Mr. LEWIS. I notice in the 'Albertan,' a prominent newspaper published in Calgary these words:

It may be a question whether or not the members of parliament really earn their salary for attending the sessions of the Dominion parliament, but there can be no denying the fact that the reporters in the press gallery——

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman wish to put a question? The custom at this stage is to bring up only questions concerning the business of the House, or of an urgent character. Other questions are brought up by notice under the rules of the House. The matter may be brought up on the motion to go into Supply, but that motion is not yet made.

Mr. LEWIS. There is no one, Sir, more desirous of upholding your authority and the dignity of the House than I am, and I consequently bow to your ruling.

THE GERMAN SURTAX.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Has the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) been called to a rather curious error in the last memorandum brought down in respect of our trade relations with Germany? The minister will notice that in the statement he brought down it is declared that a kilogram is equivalent to 220·4 pounds.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING. That is a typographical error. My attention was not drawn to it, but I shall now see that it is corrected. It is in the punctuation.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No it is in the omission of the words 'one hundred' it should be one hundred kilograms.

Mr. FIELDING. I will have it corrected.

THE UNITED STATES TARIFF.

Mr. OWEN. I see by the papers that representatives of the American government are to interview our government re the tariff. Canada has entered into a treaty with France, and by a recent arrangement with Germany, the surtax has been removed wholly by Canada on all the articles we have to export, but only in part by Germany on what they have to export. Have we in any way forfeited our rights to the minimum tariff of the United States?

Mr. FIELDING. That is too large a proposition. In my judgment we have not, but that is a matter of opinion. When my hon. friend says that we have removed the whole of the surtax, and Germany only one-half, he is under a misapprehension. Germany had no surtax to remove.

SUPPLY—THE PRESS GALLERY.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. LEWIS. I notice in a prominent paper in the west, published at Calgary, called the 'Albertan,' these words:

> It may be a question whether or not the members of the parliament really earn their salaries for attending the sessions of the Dominion parliament, but there can be no denying the fact that the reporters in the press gallery should have their wages raised many times over.. . . A bold, brave young man who will risk his life and understanding by sitting day after day and night after night listening to the debates upon the Naval Bill, endeavouring to get the kernel out of the volume of chaff, is worthy of better things. It is possible that he does get good wages, but it is also certain that he does not get enough. . . . . So the 'Albertan' repeats that whatever may be the salary of the reporters who sit by and listen to this kind of thing from day to day, from week to week, that they are underpaid. A man who risks health and mind on a proposition like that should get some sort of bonus from the State.

Sir, there's many a true word spoken in jest. I have taken the precaution to look into this matter, according to 'Sells' World's Press, 1909, I find that we have in Canada 892 newspapers, divided among the provinces as follows:

	Newspapers.
Ontario..	525
Quebec..	117
New Brunswick..	39
Nova Scotia..	62
Prince Edward Island..	12
Manitoba..	79
Northwest Territories..	25
British Columbia..	33
Total..	892

There are forty press representatives in the gallery, representing probably eighty newspapers. Now, it is to the interest of Canada that what is done here should be published through the country. The 'unrevised 'Hansard' is sent out, it probably does not reach the persons addressed for a week or ten days after the speeches reported have been made, but what the men in the press gallery report is sent by telegraph. I submit that, if we have anything for the people of the country to know, the country as a whole and the newspapers as a whole should help to pay for making it known. We allow a certain sum for a newspaper editor in the city of London, England, in order to secure information from there. The city of Toronto pays $4,000 a year for what? For a bureau of publicity. I ask that similar steps be taken here. It may be an innovation; no other parliament in the world may have it, but why should we wait for another parliament to show us the way. If there is any way by which a certain amount could be set aside for publishing by telegraph the news which we desire to have published, I submit, the government should take some steps in the matter.

TRENT CANAL—FLOOD DAMAGES.

Mr. LENNOX. I mentioned, last night as the House was about to adjourn, that to-day I proposed to bring up the subject of certain payments for alleged flooding in portions of the county of Peterborough in connection with the Trent Valley water system. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) mentioned to me just now that the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) is out of the city, and he preferred that I should not proceed with the discussion now. The proposition is one which I think I should accede to, and therefore I will not bring up the matter to-day.

HALIFAX HARBOUR—BIG GUN PRACTICE AND THE FISHERMEN.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I desire to call the attention of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden) to a resolution which has been forwarded to me from the municipal council of the county of Halifax, pointing out the detriment and danger to the fishermen in the vicinity of Halifax harbour—that is, the entrance to the harbour—from the big gun practice which is carried on, and suggesting that this practice should be carried on if possible, between the 30th November and the 15th of June, instead of at the seasons which have been utilized for the purpose in the past. From the statements set forth in the resolution, which I will not read in full, it would seem that the fishermen sustain not only inconveniences but considerable detriment under the present system. If the practice could be carried on with equal efficiency—as seems to be the case—during the season which has been suggested, I would strongly urge upon the government that this request should be complied with.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) will kindly send me the resolution, I will call the attention of my colleague to it.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Public works—chargeable to income—harbours and rivers—British Columbia—Lockport—Queen Charlotte islands—wharf, $2,000.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). Most of the members of the committee know that the Queen Charlotte islands form a group in the Pacific at the mouth of the Skeena river. They are said to be very rich in minerals and are clothed with valuable timber. There is a good deal of development in the particular locality referred to. I believe that a wharf is quite urgently required. The amount here asked is expected to finish the work.

Mr. COWAN. What trade is anticipated over that wharf?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I believe that at this point quartz mining is being developed.

Mr. COWAN. Have any steps been taken to ascertain how many immigrants are entering British Columbia over these wharfs without calling at the port of entry?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have no information on that point.

Masset, Queen Charlotte islands—wharf, $3,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand that there is quite an important farming and lumbering district in the vicinity of Massett, and that this place is likely to become of considerable importance. The wharf is urgently asked for and it is expected that this $3,000 will complete it.

Nitinat Lake outlet—removal of obstructions—revote of lapsed amount, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to remove two large ledges at the outlet of Nitinat lake. One of these rocks is bare at low tide and the other is quite close to the surface. They form a menace to navigation and it is regarded as very desirable that they should be removed. This can only be done by blasting and we estimate that it will take about $5,000 to do the work. We shall have to remove from the large rock over 10,000 cubic feet and from the small rock 4,500 feet, representing a total of 540 cubic yards. We estimate the cost at about $10 per cubic yard, or a total of the amount we are asking.

Mr. BARNARD. Did the whole of that vote lapse last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BARNARD. Why was not the work done last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY The vote was not passed last session but in the session before that. We allowed it to lapse because we thought this was one of those works which, in view of the then condition of the revenue, might well be allowed to lie over, and we are restoring it to the estimates as we are restoring votes for a large number of other needed public improvements.

Nootka—west coast of Vancouver island—wharf, $3,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is for the purpose of building a small wharf at Nootka, where there is a large marble quarry, and machinery has been installed for manufacturing marble. The wharf is needed in connection with that business, and for general traffic purposes.

Porcher island—mouth of Skeena river—wharf, $2,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This amount, it is supposed, will be sufficient to build the wharf at the mouth of the Skeena river. There are some fifty farms located on Porcher island, and the wharf is required to assist the farmers in getting in their supplies and merchandise, and in getting out their produce.

Queen Charlotte city—wharf, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Queen Charlotte city is on one of the Queen Charlotte islands. It is supposed this amount will be sufficient to build the wharf. Queen Charlotte city is quite close to extensive coal and copper mines, and there are also extensive forests in the vicinity. I think there are about 100 men already employed there, and my information is that large developments are going on.

Mr. COWAN. I think these wharfs are quite necessary on Queen Charlotte island, but I wish to call the attention of the government to the fact that the building of these wharfs is really facilitating the entry into British Columbia of immigrants, not only under the Immigration Act, but under the Chinese Immigration Act, contrary to the rules and condition of those two Acts. I know that the matter is scarcely relevant to this item, but I wished to call the attention of the government to these facts.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Even though by possibility immigrants might arrive at British Columbia at other ports than Vancouver, I would not suppose my hon. friend would seriously object to public improvements being made in other places by reason of that possibility. Of course, if immigrants come into British Columbia at other points, there will be the necessary officials present to examine them, and turn them back if they are not entitled to come in. But it would not do to impede the development of other sections of British Columbia simply because some extra precautions might need to be taken to prevent the entry of undesirable immigrants.

Mr. COWAN. I am not objecting to these items, on the other hand I think they are quite proper. But I think that the construction of these wharfs should go hand in hand with some provision to prevent the violation of these Acts by the entry over these wharfs into British Columbia of immigrants who do not comply with the conditions of those Acts.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Explain how they violate the Act. My hon. friend seems to object to the building of a wharf on Queen Charlotte island, because thereby there might be a violation of an Act with regard to immigration. I want my hon. friend to explain how the building of a wharf at any point in British Columbia is going to permit or encourage the violation of any Act whatever.

Mr. COWAN. I have made two unsuccessful attempts to penetrate the intelligence of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue. I have already said that I am not objecting to these items, but I do say that the construction of wharfs on Queen Charlotte island should be accompanied by measures to prevent the violation of these Acts by the entry into British Columbia of immigrants who have not complied with the conditions of these Acts.

Mr. KING. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that these Acts have been violated?

Mr. COWAN. I mean to say that exactly.

Mr. KING. Can the hon. gentleman give an instance?

Mr. COWAN. The instances on Queen Charlotte island are numerous.

Mr. KING. Cite one.

Mr. COWAN. I cannot give the names of the Japanese who have come in.

Mr. PUGSLEY. How do they get there? Do they swim across the Pacific?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. A statement that Japanese are entering British Columbia by Queen Charlotte island without any restraint or restriction, should not be allowed to go uncontradicted. It is absolutely and wholly inaccurate; there is not a shadow of foundation for such statements. There is not a Japanese on the Queen Charlotte islands who has not gone there through either the city of Vancouver or from the city of Victoria. It is true that up to a recent period there was a Japanese company developing a mine at Ikeda bay, employing between fifty or one hundred Japanese. But I think that mine has been sold, and there are, I am told, very few Japanese on Queen Charlotte island to-day. No ships, large or small, ever land on Queen Charlotte island from across the Pacific ocean. Up to the last two or three years Queen Charlotte islands have been largely undeveloped, there were very few people on them. But now developments are taking place, and little communities are springing up, and we are trying to make provision for these places by the erection of wharfs. Just so soon as these communities become of sufficient importance to make it desirable to establish a port of entry there, the Minister of Customs will attend to them. But it is absolutely ridiculous, if my hon. friend will permit me to say so, to suggest that because we are endeavouring to meet the wants of the people at Queen Charlotte city by the erection of a wharf, we are thereby facilitating the violation of any customs regulations or any immigration law. It is unfair to say so, and it is not correct. I am sorry to see that my hon. friend from Vancouver is trying to throw obstacles in the way of a reasonable and moderate expenditure on Queen Charlotte island.

Mr. BURRELL. Do I understand the minister to say that Japanese no longer own mines in Queen Charlotte island?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I have been informed that the Ikeda mines have been sold to another company.

Mr. COWAN. I wish to point out that on Friday evening the Minister of Inland Revenue woke up to make the general statement that British Columbia had never proffered a request for public works that had not been granted, and that it was absolutely ridiculous for us to say otherwise. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) promptly went to work and pointed out request after request from various sections in British Columbia which had been refused, and of which the minister knew absolutely nothing. Again he gets up and says that there has never been a boat crossing the Pacific ocean and making its entry at the harbours of the Queen Charlotte islands instead of Vancouver or Victoria. I shall have the pleasure of putting exactly the facts and the proof before the Minister of Inland Revenue upon that. But, I am sorry that I cannot penetrate the intelligence of the Minister of Inland Revenue. I am not opposing these items; I think they are correct, but I do think that the government should take steps at once to make some of these ports, ports of entry, or subports to prevent violations of the law.

Spallumcheen river—repairs to and extension of bank protection works, $1,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to make necessary improvements to already existing protection works that were constructed by the former government a few years ago. There has been some damage by storms and it is necessary to make repairs.

Mr. GOODEVE. In reference to this item, I would like to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) to the request I made with regard to the repairing of the banks of the Columbia river. In that case also the minister will remember that he had knowledge that the government had already paid half the cost of the repairs to the shores of the Columbia river. The shores are being washed away. The ground then taken by the minister was that he had changed the policy of the government in that particular, and that the government were no longer doing any work of that nature, and that he felt that it was the duty of the province to do it. I am not objecting to this item. On the contrary, I am very glad to see this amount in the estimates, but I should have liked to have an amount placed in the estimates for other improvements to which I shall call the attention of the minister. I want to take this opportunity, because it is the only one I shall have in connection with the estimates of British Columbia, to call the attention of the minister and the government to the fact that we have made application both in connection with the Kootenay river and the Columbia river, for some needed improvements in the way of wharfs and dredging. I have here three petitions, not merely individual petitions, but the petitions of the Associated Boards of Trade of Southern British Columbia, and, therefore, of such a character as should carry some weight with this government. I am informed by letters that each of these petitions has been sent to the minister. One of them relates to dredging at Burton City on Arrow lake. I took a great deal of trouble to explain to the minister the circumstances with regard to this proposed improvement. This is a horticultural community which requires shipping facilities. On account of the nature of the bed of the lake, sand and gravel bars are washed up with the result that during the winter season at low water the boats cannot get in, and traffic has been actually compelled to go around by way of Nakusp, Slocan lake and Slocan City to get down there, with the result that a number of ranchers are cut off from communication with the outside. They have only received their mail once a week owing to that. To a large extent that would have been obviated if the minister had seen fit to put a small appropriation in these estimates to do the necessary dredging at this place. Then, I have also called his attention to the necessity of having some dredging done at Kootenay lake, where somewhat similar conditions exist, and also to the necessity of having buoys placed in Kootenay lake.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That would be under the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. GOODEVE. Yes, that would come under their department more particularly, so that I will leave it until we come to the estimates of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. However, in regard to this dredging, I endeavoured to put it very fairly before the minister. I explained the class of settlers coming in there, and I told him that we did not want large or expensive works, but that all we wanted was such wharfs as would enable settlers to get in their necessary merchandise and ship their fruit out. I considered this very fair, and I asked that he would place in the estimates an amount of $1,500 for wharfs in some places, and in others $2,500 or $3,000, which would be sufficient to build wharfs necessary to enable these settlers to carry on their business. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are building a large summer hotel on Kootenay lake and they have seen fit to put on extra boats on account of the increased traffic. Yet, none of these considerations have affected the Minister of Public Works. I was very much surprised, in watching the estimates for the maritime provinces, to see that we are making grants to places much smaller and less populous, and that very large sums of money are being expended. In one place $15,000 was voted at the instance of the minister, and I saw where we spent it on day labour between October and November, 1908, a portion of it on the main street of the village. This village is said to have a population of 600 or 700. They put six inches of sand down on the main street, built culverts, &c. While that money is being expended in that way, we find it impossible in the new district into which a splendid class of settlers is coming to get these much needed improvements made. I think that this government should take this matter into consideration, and that they should fairly consider the great needs of a new country such as this is. It should also be remembered that British Columbia contributes a very large revenue. I do not propose to go into that to-day, because it was very clearly placed before the minister a few days ago by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Cowan), and my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor). Every member of the government is familiar with the very large revenue that we pay in proportion to population—more than any other province of the Dominion of Canada—and, therefore, it is only fair that we should receive some consideration in regard to the matters to which I have drawn the attention of the minister. During the first year I was here, I had several interviews with the minister, and I was careful to lay all the details before him. I appealed to his reason and fairness. I did consider that, while he made no definite promise, he would take this matter into his consideration, and particularly in one or two cases, while perhaps I did not quite understand the position he took, I concluded that there would have been amounts in the estimates for the wharfs that we were asking for. I regret to see that they are not in the estimates at this time.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend has spoken of improvements on the Columbia river. If he will look at the estimates which we have already passed he will find a sum of $14,500 for improvements on the Columbia river. In regard to the wharfs to which he refers, they are under consideration, and in regard to the matter of dredging in Kootenay lake, it has been brought to my attention, not by my hon. friend (Mr. Goodeve) alone, but by others, by my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman), and also by the Canadian Pacific railway. I may say to my hon. friend that I have now under consideration the question of building a dredge for operation on Kootenay lake. We have no dredge there at the present time. It has been impossible to do dredging work, and until we can build a dredge we cannot engage upon this work. I just want to say to my hon. friend that I do not think he strengthens his case at all by complaining that British Columbia is being discriminated against. If my hon. friend thinks there is any work in his province that is worthy of attention let him put it upon the ground that this province is being discriminated against by the Department of Public Works. I assure my hon. friend that in that respect he is entirely in error. There is no foundation whatever for the statement, and the mere making of the statement and putting it forward so persistently, it does seem to me, is calculated to do his case more harm than good. If my hon. friend will take the main estimates he will see that we have provided for public buildings in British Columbia, $259,259. He speaks of the province of Nova Scotia, for instance, being more favoured than the province of British Columbia. If my hon. friend will turn to public buildings he will find that the total amount being appropriated in the main estimates for public buildings in Nova Scotia is $105,000. One hundred and five thousand dollars for Nova Scotia public buildings, as against $259,259 for public building in British Columbia—more than double the amount beng appropriated for public buildings than is being appropriated in Nova Scotia, and this notwithstanding the fact that we have just completed a public building in Vancouver which is one of the finest in the whole Dominion of Canada, and notwithstanding the fact that a large number of public buildings have recently been erected in other parts of British Columbia. I do not say that we are doing too much in British Columbia; I do not say that we are dealing generously with that province. All I say is that we are dealing justly, fairly and equitably with British Columbia, just as we seek to deal with all the other provinces of Canada. Wherever there is a public work meriting an appropriation we endeavour to meet the wants of the people as fairly and as quickly as we can; but we cannot do everything at once. There are no doubt a great many public works in British Columbia, as there are in all the provinces of Canada which are worthy of being attended to, and which no doubt will be attended to in due course; but we cannot go on and construct all these public works at once, because we must have regard to the revenues of the country and to the demands upon those revenues. I want also to point out to my hon. friend that we are engaged in a great work of improving the Fraser river. Our attention has been directed strongly to the necessity of improving the entrance to the harbour of Vancouver. In Burrard Inlet, Vancouver has one of the finest harbours in the world; but the entrance is not as good as it should be, in view of the rapidly developing traffic. Perhaps it can be truthfully said that it is dangerous. Well, we have an appropriation in these estimates, under capital account, for the improvement of that entrance, which shows that we recognize the importance of Vancouver as one of the national ports of the country. We propose widening the entrance to a width of 1,200 feet. This is going to cost, in addition to the cost of the dredge, about $350,000 or $400,000. We have also a provision in the estimates for making a great improvement in Victoria harbour—for continuing the dredging and blasting out of the rocks for the purpose of broadening the harbour and making it one of the best harbours in the country. At Nanaimo and many other places we are making improvements. My hon. friend will find in these estimates that we are appropriating $138,000 for wharfs and harbour improvements in British Columbia outside altogether of the expenditure for dredging and these great improvements in the Fraser river and in the harbours of Vancouver and Victoria. Therefore, if my hon. friend will look at matters as they are, I think he will conclude that if we are not able to do as much for British Columbia at present as we would like to do, we recognize and are meeting as rapidly as possible the great necessities of this rapidly developing and marvellously rich portion of our Dominion.

Mr. GOODEVE. I do not think the hon. minister has answered any of the complaints I have made. I quite agree with him that, in view of the rapid growth of the province, the government are not expending too much in and around the city of Vancouver, and the city of Victoria, on the coast or on the Queen Charlotte Islands. What I am speaking for is a place 500 miles from the place the minister has been discussing. He started out to discuss the amount to be expended on public works in the province; but as that item is not before us, I did not take up that question. When I spoke of the expenditures in the other provinces, I was not complaining of them; but I pointed out that when the government were expending these sums of money in other provinces, it was only reasonable that there should be some money expended in the district I represent. I took this matter up in connection with the estimates at the first session of this parliament, and I looked for something in the supplementary estimates of last year. As nothing was there, I took the matter up again, and the minister said that from the Minister of Inland Revenue and others from British Columbia applications had been made. Now, the resolution of the associated boards of trade of eastern British Columbia, to which I have referred, says:

Whereas, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company contemplates the discontinuance of steamship service on the Lower Arrow lake owing to difficulties in navigation arising from wash-gravel deposited near the mouth of Cariboo creek, and whereas, such discontinuance of daily steamship service completes an isolation of such settlers, who with their families have purchased holdings, with the understanding that they should continue to enjoy the convenience of a daily steamer service, and the isolation of this large settlement will retard the development and settlement of such large areas as are now offered for sale, and hamper a legitimate industry that bids now to become the most profitable in the interior of this province, viz., the growing of fruit, &c.

I need not weary the House by reading the whole of the resolution. The boards of trade have endeavoured to press this matter on its merits, and not in any contentious spirit, and I say again that in view of the revenue received by this government from the province of British Columbia, the development of the district to which I have referred, the number of immigrants going into it, and the fact that these are very large navigable waters, and that one of the greatest railway companies in the world is placing upon them a steamship service, I think they are entitled to some recognition on the part of the government. I went to the minister about this matter, having no desire to bring it before the House, believing that he would desire to deal fairly with it, and I am disappointed that nothing has been done. I am glad to hear the minister say that he has the matter under consideration, and I hope that he will still provide in the supplementary estimates, for the work I have mentioned, both the dredging of the Columbia river, and the improvements on the Arrow lakes. In view of its pressing necessity, I would ask him if he has in view any dredging at Kootenay lake?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have only one dredge on the Arrow lakes, and during the past season it was engaged in doing necessary work for improving the channel. We keep it at work wherever it appears to be most required. In these main estimates we are making provision for quite a number of works in British Columbia, and the fact that the others of which my hon. friend speaks are not provided for in these estimates is no proof that we have not given them either very careful consideration or even favourable consideration. Of course I cannot say to my hon. friend whether there will be supplementary estimates or not, I am not in a position to say that, and if it was understood there were to be supplementary estimates I could not say to my hon. friend what would be in them. All I can say is that the matter of doing work at Burton, Proctor and some other places as well as the dredging of Kootenay lake are all under careful consideration.

Mr. BURRELL. I think the minister's manner of replying to my hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) was hardly fair. I do not intend to discuss this very big question of better terms, but I do not think he should put the members from British Columbia into the position of condemning the size of the grants given to other portions of the country. I think if the minister were a British Columbian and had the history of British Columbia fairly well at heart he would take exactly the same attitude as any member from British Columbia. He would have to take it because it has been clearly recognized in many high quarters that British Columbia has special claims on the consideration of the government, in fact claims which have not been met from our point of view and the leaders of his party when this question was being thoroughly discussed some time ago pointed out that they would not ask financial readjustment at the hands of the government, but would press for a larger share of public works because that was the way in which the government of this country ought to deal justly with the province of British Columbia. It is not a matter to be dealt with in the way the Minister of Public Works dealt with it. If he referred to the expenditure on public works being greater in British Columbia than in Nova Scotia this year the only fair comparison would be a comparison over a number of years, and if he referred to the figures in the speech of my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Barnard) during the budget debate in reference to these things, particularly with reference to questions of dredging, etc., he will find that some of the figures in connection with British Columbia's position compared with the rest of the country are very startling. We have a perfect right, as members from British Columbia, if we think the numerous claims of British Columbia have not been met to ask the government that they shall be fairly met on their merits. I will take the minister's word and am glad to know that the government are becoming a little more aware of the requirements of the case in British Columbia.

Last year I mentioned to the minister an item in the estimates of the previous year of $10,000 for deepening the channel between Okanagan lake and Dog lake. The Minister replied:

Mr. PUGSLEY. Provision was made last year for improving the channel between Okanagan lake and Dog lake, but owing to the fact that Dog lake is about 14 feet lower than Okanagan lake, I, myself, after considering very carefully the report of the engineers, have very grave doubts as to the desirability of proceeding with the work. I am inclined to think that it will not be proceeded with at the present time and I will tell my hon. friend why. I am afraid that if the outlet of Okanagan lake is lowered so as to give a free run to the water the result will be to lower the level of Okanagan lake and that might necessitate dredging. . . . I am inclined to think that it might be better to delay proceeding with the work until a more careful study is made of the conditions. There is always the danger when you attempt to alter natural conditions with the idea of improving the navigation so as to give access to Dog lake that the result will be to materially injure the navigation of Okanagan lake which will be very much to be regretted.

I find in the report of the chief engineer for 1909, that $2,492 was expended. The report proceeds:

Some dredging in December done in Okanagan river about half a mile from where it leaves Okanagan lake. Work was resumed March 1. From March 1 to 14 the time was occupied in building a house-boat to be used as quarters for the crew of the 'Heron' (dredge), the actual cost of which was about $350. Dredging was then continued where left off at the end of December. Expenditure, $4,621.79.

I understand that the engineer in charge expects to be able to deepen the channel in such a way as to be able to make navigation possible without lowering the level of Okanagan lake and I shall be glad if the minister would explain the present position there and what the government propose to do, and are doing, because this work is regarded as of some importance in that country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I made the statement to the House which the hon. gentleman has quoted. Last summer when I was in British Columbia I visited the locality in company with Mr. Aylmer, the assistant resident engineer, and in discussing the matter with him I found that his opinion was that instead of carrying out the plan which had been originally in contemplation of dredging the whole channel between the two lakes; it would be desirable only to restore the natural conditions as they were some 15 years ago when there was navigation between the two lakes, that is to dredge out for some distance south of the main Okanagan lake, and he was authorized to proceed with this work. I found that if it were done in that way it would not lower Okanagan lake, while we would get reasonably good accommodation between the two lakes, navigation suitable for light draft vessels and equal to the navigation of 15 years ago before it was obstructed by gravel from a stream tributary to the river connecting the two lakes so that it would be a quite desirable public work. With my authority, which was communicated to the department at Ottawa, the engineer was instructed to proceed with the work along those lines. It has not yet been completed, but I should think it ought to be completed very early in the coming season.

Mr. BURRELL. The minister expects to complete it with the previous vote?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It can come out of the general dredging vote. We have our own dredge.

Mr. BURRELL. Then there is a reasonable expectation that the navigation can be made fairly satisfactory without lowering the lake?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I believe so, yes.

Stewart, head of Portland Canal wharf, $15,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to build a wharf at a very important place, where there are evidences of unusual activity and development in the way of mining. It is at the head of the Portland canal. Arrangements are already under way for the building of a railway fifteen miles in length into the country, and it is believed that the development there will be something unprecedented in British Columbia so far as quartz mining is concerned. The wharf is essential and we are asking $15,000 for it.

Mr. COWAN. Will this be sufficient?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is supposed this will be sufficient although it will be an expensive wharf, because the tide flats extend out a considerable distance from the shore; but we think by building a trestle and utilizing a head block which has been built by the provincial government this will suffice. If the head block is transferred to the federal government, as would seem reasonable, this would be sufficient.

Upper Fraser river—improvement of navigable channel at Fort George canyon, above Quesnel, $7,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is intended to give navagation up the Fraser river through the Fort George canyon to a point where the Grand Trunk Pacific will enter the valley of the Fraser, and pass on to Prince Rupert. The navigation is very fair now, but there is still some considerable danger, and this further amendment is required to make the canyon safe to navigate.

Mr. BURRELL. Will that be sufficient to put it into good shape?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, that will take about $10,000. We shall require $3,000 more.

Mr. BURRELL. I hope there will be no relaxation of effort to improve this navigation. It is an important stretch of water, especially in view of the country opening up round Fort George, and I should like very much to see that work expedited. Has anything been done in the way of an inspection by government engineers of the Fraser between Lytton and Quesnel? There are large stretches of water there on which navigation could be made perfectly effective with perhaps very little expenditure. I have been asked to urge strongly on the minister to have this done, and would ask him to have the government engineer report on the general condition of the Fraser to see if the water highway between Lytton and Quesnel could not be made more useful.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall give the matter my attention. No doubt the upper waters of the Fraser are just as important as those lower down. We have made very considerable improvements at the Cottonwood canyon, which have greatly facilitated navigation, and the importance of making an examination between Quesnel and Lytton is well worth considering.

Mr. BURRELL. I would like to ask a question with reference to some immense waterways still further north. As the minister knows, the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific to Fort George westerly is opening up enormous stretches of country and bringing in very heavy settlement, and transportation facilities would be much cheapened if the necessary dredging were done in the Nechaco river. If the minister could see his way to have dredging done on the Nechaco and Stuart rivers, he would be doing a great service to that section of the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend has referred to the Nechaco river. The navigation between Fort George and the mouth of the Nechaco is all right. To the Nechaco river itself, I will give consideration.

Yakoun river, Graham island, Queen Charlotte islands—removal of obstructions to navigation, $10,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It will require a powerful engine to remove the rocks.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. I would like to ask what has been done about the approach to the wharf at Port Moody?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Nothing has been done at present. To make a proper approach, which would be suitable at all times of tide would require a very large amount of dredging, and be very expensive. I have not seen my way clear to undertake that work.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Why did the hon. minister have the wharf left so that it cannot be approached by vessels except at high tide? When he was in British Columbia last year, I called his attention to this wharf at Port Moody, and he promised to go and see it. For some reason unknown to me, he did not keep his appointment, and did not see the wharf; but upon the day when he was to have been there and did not come, a photograph was taken to show the conditions which would have been revealed to him had he made his visit. There were 400 yards of dry land between the wharf and the water. Presumably that structure was built because the minister believed a wharf was needed there. Certainly a wharf is badly needed and the dredging would be comparatively simple, 400 yards through the mud. It is a work much more urgently needed than other works of that kind, discussed here lately, which were ordered by the minister the moment his attention was called to them, even by telegram, and without waiting for tenders or an estimate of cost. We have frequently to vote money for dredging offhand and in a hurry, and it is not fair to a place of the importance of Port Moody to be deprived of the facilities for steamboat traffic that an approachable wharf would give. All that is wanted is a little dredging to enable boats to get into that wharf at all stages of the tide. I would like to call the minister's attention to the fact that this wharf being built to salt water at high tide is just as much subject to decay, and is costing the country just as much as it would if the work were completed and in use for traffic. Is it proper to lay out so much money and have the work in a condition in which it cannot be used? Port Moody is entitled to this expenditure. We have been in confederation thirty-nine years, and in all that time the government has not built a wharf at Port Moody until this one, and this one was finished 400 yards away from where it can be used at all tides. Only at high tide can vessels get in and that is not sufficient for the regular traffic. What the people require is a wharf to which boats can get at all tides, and thus be able to give them regular communication with Vancouver by steamer, in place of having to depend upon the railway. At present there is great inconvenience, as the railway time tables are made to suit through traffic and not local traffic. But if the approach were improved by dredging so that vessels could get to the wharf at all times of the tide, we could have regular passenger and freight service to Vancouver all the year round. At present, however, the vessels cannot run on any schedule, and the people are deprived of the service they would like to have. Thirty-nine years is a very long time for any community to wait for a wharf, more especially when other communities have been served three or four times within that period, and we are still waiting for our first service.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I assure my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Taylor) that there was no intended discourtesy in my not visiting Port Moody with him as I had hoped to be able to do. But I was pretty busy when I was in British Columbia. There were a good many places I desired to visit, and I regretted I was not able to keep my appointment with my hon. friend. It was not a positive appointment, but I said I would let him know and if—well, it was pretty nearly an appointment, but not quite. But I did not fail to make inquiry at to the wharf at Port Moody. I satisfied myself that to dredge an approach to it would take a good deal of time, and we had no dredge available as all were engaged then in work that seemed to be more urgent and important from a traffic and business standpoint. Now, with regard to the wharf itself, my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Taylor) asks why it was built there.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. In that particular place.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Apparently, both governments allowed it to remain in its present position. It was built thirty years ago, and I suppose it was built because the people wanted it and thought that a wharf that would enable vessels to come there at high tide would be better than no wharf at all. My hon. friend should bear in mind that Port Moody is only seventeen miles from Vancouver. Also, the Canadian Pacific railway runs through Port Moody and gives accommodation, so far as a railway can give accommodation, to the people. There are hundreds, if not thousands, of places in Canada which have no railway, and many of which have no wharf accommodation at all. I know hundreds of places myself which have wharf accommodation, but vessels cannot reach them except at high tide, the ground at the face of the wharf being bare at low tide. If the hon. member goes through the province of Quebec, he will find many wharfs in that situation. In the city of St. John he will find a good many wharfs, the faces of which are absolutely bare at low tide. Of course, we are doing dredging work there now to give accommodation for large steamers. But that work was begun only some fifteen years ago. It is important work. I recognize that it would be desirable to have this work at Port Moody done, and regret I am not able to say just how soon it will be done. It will be quite an expensive work, as I have said, and one must have regard to the interest of other parts of the Dominion. I am not without hope that, some day in the not distant future, we may be able to meet the hopes of the people of Port Moody in that respect.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. Being naturally an optimist, I am disposed to believe from the minister's remarks that he intends to do something for Port Moody. I would ask also with regard to another work that is urgently needed—a wharf at Steveston. I think the hon. minister gave some attention to that matter last summer, and I shall be glad of any information as to the prospect of having the work undertaken.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If my hon. friend (Mr. J. D. Taylor) is enthusiastic enough to derive hope from my last remark regarding Port Moody, I can make him doubly enthusiastic as to the wharf at Steveston, because I have every reason to suppose that before very long we shall be able to build a wharf at that point.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR. This being my lucky day, I would ask the minister about a number of applications for wharfs on the Fraser river. I observe that there is no appropriation this year for any wharfs there. There are a large number of applications before the minister, and I would like him to say when we may hope to see a resumption of wharf-building on the Fraser.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The question of what amount we should ask for wharfs generally on the Fraser river is now under consideration. If there should be supplementary estimates in which public works of this nature are being looked after by my department, I have good reason to believe that further provision will be made for wharfs upon the Fraser river.

Yukon Territory—Lewes and Yukon rivers —improvements, $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is a vote similar to the one we had last year. It will be devoted to maintaining and keeping in repair works for the improvement of navigation.

Mr. BLAIN. What was spent last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. A total of $2,860.

Harbours, rivers and bridge work generally, $12,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is a vote similar to the one we are accustomed to take every year for general works of this kind throughout the Dominion. This is to meet small demands which may have been overlooked in the special votes.

Mr. BLAIN. How much was expended last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. $7,511.35.

Mr. LAKE. On Friday last, the minister promised to bring down information with regard to item 150—Last Mountain lake, improvements of navigable route. The minister was to make a statement as to the expenditure already made. I desire to know if he is ready to give that information, showing how much was spent on machinery and how much on labour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I must apologize to my hon. friend (Mr. Lake) for not having this information now. I overlooked it My deputy says that he will have it this evening.

Public works—chargeable to income—dredging—dredge vessel repairs, $160,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to make provision, according to estimates sent in by the superintendents of dredging, for the amount that will probably be required for repairs to hulls and machinery of dredges, tugs, barges, &c., owned by the government and being operated at various parts of the Dominion.

Mr. BLAIN. What is the general condition of this outfit? Is it good or bad?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We keep these vessels in good repair year after year. The vote last year was $125,000, and we expended $122,183 up to December 31.

Mr. BLAIN. Is this work of repairs done by public tender?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some of it. It depends upon the kind of work to be done. Some is done in our own yard here at Ottawa. Some is done at various machine shops and largely by day work, necessarily.

Mr. BLAIN. Where was the largest amount spent last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. BLAIN. At what points?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Particularly in Ottawa. We have a ship yard here. I could give my hon. friends, if they desire it, an estimate of the different barges, tugs and scows on which we propose making expenditures. These details cover a number of pages of my notes and would take some time to read. There is more or less work on all these dredges, scows and barges.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it would be interesting to have some of that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. As to the dredge 'Canada,' we will require to put her on the marine slip, paint the hull, repair the barge doors, and the engine room. That, with other improvements, is estimated to cost $8,000. The next is the 'Cape Breton.' We have to put her on the marine slip and generally overhaul and repair her.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the age of the dredge 'Canada?'

Mr. PUGSLEY. Probably thirty years old. We expect to spend $7,500 on the 'Cape Breton'; $7,500 on the 'George Mackenzie;' $8,000 on the 'Northumberland;' $6,000 on the 'St. Lawrence;' $7,000 on the 'New Dominion;' $3,000 on the 'Prince Edward Island;' $2,500 on the 'New Brunswick.' The 'New Brunswick,' will cost more than that, because we are changing it to a dipper dredge, and we have to widen the hull, and largely rebuild the hull. $8,000 on the 'W. S. Fielding.' But that will not be sufficient, because we are providing her with new buckets so as to have a spare set of buckets which we find is essential in order to keep the dredge constantly at work.

Mr. SPROULE. Where is the 'Fielding' working?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The 'Fielding' is working at the entrance to the harbour of St. John. At last report which I saw she had dredged about 500,000 cubic yards, and she has done considerable since then.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the 'Fielding' was a comparatively new dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The chief engineer says it is not over five years old.

Mr. SPROULE. What will a string of buckets cost?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Between $25,000 and $30,000. Unforeseen expenses $5,000; that is for Ontario and Quebec. Dredge 'Challenger,' $3,500, 'International,' $8,000, 'Mattawa,' $3,500, 'Nipissing,' $4,500, Dredge No. 1, $1,500, Dredge 'Ontario,' $3,500, 'Ottawa,' $5,000, 'Queen,' $3,500, 'Quebec,' $3,500. Repairs to shipyard at Ottawa, $10,000; repairs and plant on Lake St. John and River St. Maurice, $7,500.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the last dredge built in the shipyard at Sorel?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We do not build at Sorel, we build at Ottawa. If my hon. friend means the 'Fielding,' that was built some years ago at Sorel.

Mr. SPROULE. The one that went into service last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The dredge 'Ottawa,' and dredge No. 3 have both been built at Ottawa. The 'Ottawa' was working at Rimouski, and the dredge 'Industry' up on the lakes. Dredge No. 3 is on the St. Lawrence near Montreal.

Mr. SPROULE. Did the dredge on the St. Lawrence do much work on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not until quite late in the season. She had to have a new boiler put in.

Mr. SPROULE. I am speaking with reference to the dredge that was turned out last year, a new dredge turned out of the yard here, and I was asking what was the name of the last dredge turned out, and what it has been doing since, or if it has been working this summer, or last summer?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The last one was dredge No. 3, which was built in Ottawa, and it has been working in the St. Lawrence near Montreal.

Mr. SPROULE. Did it do much work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It did considerable work for the time it was engaged; but we did not get her to work until quite late in the season. We expect to expend $1,500 upon her for additional equipment.

Mr. SPROULE. I am told that the dredge turned out at Ottawa was practically of no use, and that although it was turned out as a new dredge, it has got to be either fixed over or reconstructed.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What dredge do you refer to?

Mr. SPROULE. I understood it was the last dredge turned out.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend is entirely in error as to the dredges turned out by the Department of Public Works. We have no information of anything of that kind.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister need not be too positive. If there is one characteristic of the minister it is that he is always very positive until he is confronted with evidence to the contrary and then he will admit his mistake. It may be that my information is correct and that he is wrong. I am not supposed to undervalue information sent me or to accept the statement of the minister in face of the fact that I have heard him frequently make statements quite as positive and which were afterwards proved not to be exactly correct. Notwithstanding the positiveness of the minister I am disposed to hold to my information until I have some other information which would justify me in changing my mind in regard to it. I will endeavour to get more information regarding it, but I have every reason to believe, from the information I have, that what I say is absolutely correct.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The difference between my hon. friend and myself is that he says a thing upon mere rumour or gossip and, until something to the contrary is proved, assumes that to be a fact. My training has rather taught me not to believe anything until I have some evidence of it. Another difference between my hon. friend and myself is that he is influenced by mere rumour while I have the positive statement of the chief engineer to me that nothing of the kind has taken place in regard to a dredge turned out by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. SPROULE. I heard the minister make a statement in regard to a wharf that was bought and owned by Canada and when the papers were brought down an agreement made, not to purchase, not to sell, or anything that could be construed into a sale, and not showing this property to belong to the country, was disclosed. Yet the minister was just as positive then as he is in the statement that he makes now. He says that the hon. member for Grey takes mere rumour. I had my information from men who I believe are in a position to know, and all the minister can do is to get his information from similar reliable sources because he does not know of his personal knowledge. He only knows what he gets from the chief engineer or some one else the same as I take my information from those who wish to furnish it to me. Therefore, we are both on the same plane in that regard, and the minister has no more warrant for his assurance than I have.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, for this reason that this could not take place without coming to the knowledge of the chief engineer and the deputy minister. If anything happens to a dredge they know it at once. It is the duty of the chief superintendent of dredging to immediately report, and they have told me there is no truth in the suggestion, that it is wholly based upon rumour and I have a right to believe their statement. Just one word in regard to another matter which the hon. gentleman dragged in. My. hon. friend did not do himself credit, did not show that desire to be courteous which ought to but does not always characterize him. He made the statement, which, if it were made by others, I would be disposed to resent, that I made an untruthful statement in regard to a certain wharf not long ago in this House. I would remind my hon. friend that gentlemen do not as a rule attribute to hon. members of this House a desire to state what is untrue, or suggest that they have stated what is untrue. My hon. friend has chosen to do that. I would say to my hon. friend that he is entirely in error. The statement I made in regard to the wharf to which he refers was absolutely correct in every particular. More than that, I read an extract from an agreement which has been made in respect to the property to which my hon. friend refers. I did not say, and no gentleman listening to me could believe I did state, that that property had been conveyed to the Crown. What I said was that the property had been built by a company at an expense of $8,000, that company had entered into an agreement, the substance of which was read here, in which they had given to the Crown and to the whole public a free right of way over this property which they agreed themselves to maintain at their own expense. They had also conveyed to the Crown the absolute right to control it as to wharfage, both side wharfage and top wharfage, simply reserving to themselves the right to have vessels consigned to them come to the wharf free of toll.

Mr. EMMERSON. And with a right of way.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, the right of way was conveyed to the Crown too. I said that the Crown had built upon its own property a wharf, which was an extension or continuation of the wharf there. I said that the Crown had not spent one dollar upon any property except the property it owned, that every bit of the expenditure was upon Crown property. That is what I said, that statement is absolutely true, and it is confirmed by the records which ought to have been in possession of my hon. friend because he had the opportunity of looking at them. I think that my hon. friend, in all fairness, ought not to make suggestions of this character. It would be unworthy of myself, or of any other hon. member of this House, to make statements which are not founded upon fact. It is my duty and my interest always to speak the truth in regard to public expenditures and in regard to public works. I endeavour to do it. Sometimes it may be that I make mistakes, because of the lack of information at my command, but I have endeavoured, since I have been a member of this House, to state everything truly and fully to the members of this committee. In regard to this dredge, I repeat to my hon. friend that the only dredge that has been turned out by the Department of Public Works, has been from the shipyards here at Ottawa, and we have never turned out a dredge of the character to which my hon. friend referred. I know that from the statement of the chief engineer, and the deputy minister, who would have immediate knowledge if anything of that kind were taking place. I challenge the hon. gentleman to investigate the source of his information; I challenge him to produce that information before this committee. My hon. friend ought to be able to do it before he makes any such statement in face of the denial of his statement made upon the authority of the chief engineer of the department.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, challenges are very easily made. Sometimes it is the part of the gambler to call the bluff, but I am not going to take the trouble to do it now. I want to say in reference to the observation the hon. minister makes regarding that celebrated wharf, that I am in the judgment of the members of this House who have heard the explanation which the minister gave to-night in regard to the ownership of the wharf, in regard to the statement that it was transferred to the Crown or that it was purchased by the Crown—

Mr. PUGSLEY—Mr Chairman, I rise to a point of order. I ask the hon. gentleman to accept my statement. I have made my statement and the hon. gentleman, as a member of this House, must accept it. That is the ruling which has been made by yourself, as well as by Mr. Speaker, upon other occasions, and I think it is the correct ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. There is no doubt of the correctness of the rule quoted that where the word of an hon. gentleman is questioned, his statement must be accepted. But I have not yet understood the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) to be contradicting the statement made by the minister. He has only uttered a few words, and I have not yet got that impression from his remarks.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He certainly gave me that impression.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister has followed his usual habit of breaking in at the wrong time. What I wish to say now is that I am quite content to leave it to the judgment of the members of the House who heard the minister's explanation with regard to the transfer and all that passed between him and the hon. member for York, New Brunswick (Mr. Crocket) and who are familiar with the papers which were laid upon the table. I am quite content to leave it to the members of this House to put whatever construction they desire to put upon it and to judge between the Minister of Public Works and myself as to which is correct.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is very fair, and I am quite willing to do that also.

Mr. SPROULE. In regard to the dredging business, I may say that I may be able to refer to it again, and if I am I think I can remind the minister of his positiveness under these circumstances, which does not mean correctness in this case any more than it does in some others.

Mr. DANIEL. Did I understand the minister to say that the ownership of the Pink rock wharf is in the Crown?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, the ownership of the Pink rock wharf, built by the government, is in the Crown. There is no question whatever about it, and every dollar of money which the Crown expended was expended upon its own property, a property which it owns to-day, and with regard to the property built by the Albert Manufacturing Company, at a cost of $8,000, the collection of tolls, both side wharfage and top wharfage, are vested in the Crown, except in respect to vessels which are consigned to the Albert Manufacturing Company. Further than that, by the agreement that is on file in the department, that company has undertaken at its own expense to keep in repair the portion of the roadway or approach which the company built. However, we are dealing now with the item of dredge vessel repairs.

Mr. SPROULE. There are a good many of these dredges that seem to require repairing, and it would be of value to us to know the age of these vessels, what repairs have been made to them in the last few years, and what grounds there are for incurring such a heavy outlay for repairs.

Mr. DANIEL. A few days ago I asked the minister what was to be his policy in the future with regard to dredging—whether it was to do the work by government dredging or by private contractors. The minister stated that he had a return in preparation giving the total number of government dredges in the Dominion and their location, and that he would be able to lay that return on the table of the House in a couple of days. So far as I know that return has not yet been brought down. I think the matter is an extremely important one. The statement as to the large amount of money expended in repairing these vessels and in dredging work makes this question a very live question, and I think the minister ought to have that information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The return was brought down some days ago by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in my absence. My hon. friend will agree that it is not my fault if he has not yet read it.

Mr. BLAIN. May I ask if there was a dredge recently built for the government at Sorel?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not for the Public Works Department. The last dredge built for this department at Sorel was the dredge 'Fielding,' which was built several years ago.

Mr. BLAIN. My information is that a dredge was built for the government at Sorel or some other point, and that when it was completed and machinery was being put into it, it began to sink and had to be grappled or it would have gone to the bottom, and that another bottom is being put in it. I am not vouching for this information, but it has been given to me.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have no knowledge of the matter to which my hon. friend refers. Any dredge built at Sorel for the government would be for the Department of Marine, and it would be quite easy for my hon. friend to put a question to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he desires to get information about it. I, of course, would have no more knowledge of that than my hon. friend would.

Mr. DANIEL. How many dredge vessels require repairing?

Mr. PUGSLEY. About 46.

Mr. DANIEL. Are the repairs made in government shops or just where the dredges happen to be?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Wherever they happen to be.

Mr. DANIEL. Where is the dredge 'W. S. Fielding' being repaired?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some of the repairs in the dry-dock at Halifax and such repairs as can be made at St. John will be made there.

Mr. DANIEL. How long is it expected that these repairs will take?

Mr. PUGSLEY. A very short time. The dredge will be returned to St. John within a month or two.

New dredging plant—maritime provinces, $180,000.

Mr. DANIEL. What does the minister propose to do with this item?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are only asking $180,000, but we ought to have for the department in the maritime provinces the following:

1. For plant operated in Nova Scotia, as per estimate submitted by Superintendent G. W. Graham, Aug. 10, 1909: dump scows and water-boat for dredge 'Geo. McKenzie,' $6,500.

2. For plant operated in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, as per estimate submitted by Superintendent C. C. Scovil, August 16, 1908, viz.:—

Dredge 'St. Lawrence'—

One tug, surface-condensing, to attend barges.. .. .. $ 25,000

Dredge 'New Dominion'—
New hull for this dredge..	$ 15,000
One tug, surface-condensing, to attend dredge and barges..	10,000
Two centre-dumping barges (wood).	3,500
Dredge 'Prince Edward'—
One tug, surface-condensing, to attend dredges and barges..	10,000
Two centre-dumping barges (wood).	4,000
Dredge 'New Brunswick'—
One centre-dumping scow (wood)..	2,000
Dredge 'W. S. Fielding'—
One barge, centre-dumping (wood).	35,000
One tug, surface-condensing, to attend dredge and barges..	35,000
New set buckets..	40,000
Dredge 'Montague'—
One tug, surface-condensing, to attend dredge and barges..	10,000
Two wood centre-dumping scows. ..	4,500
Tug 'Cricket'—
New hull..	1,500
Decked scow or barge provided with derrick, hoisting engine and 'clam-shell' or 'orange-peel' bucket for dredging boat harbours, &c., in Prince Edward Island, where services of ordinary dredging plant are unavailable, and for transportation of materials required for day labour works..	3,000
One hydraulic dredge with 15-inch. suction pipe, complete..	70,000
	$275,000

We have decided to put the 'New Dominion' on the scrap heap, as she has outlived her usefulness, so that $28,500 of this will not be spent, and should we not get the suction dredge it would take off $65,000, making $205,000, leaving just about what we are asking, $180,000. But we are in this position that, having decided to put the 'New Dominion' on the scrap heap, we will be left somewhat short of dredging plant in the maritime provinces, and we ought to obtain an additional dredge. However, we are asking $180,000. It may be that we can postpone the obtaining of some of the tugs and put the money into a dredge to take the place of the 'New Dominion.' That we have not decided, and will not without careful consideration with the superintendent of dredging and the other officers of the department who have given special attention to this subject.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand that the government loaned two or more of their scows to the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They hired them.

Mr. DANIEL. At what rate?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think $10 a day for each one.

Mr. DANIEL. Are they still under hire?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think so.

Mr. DANIEL. They have been under hire how long, two or three years?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Dredging Company had two at Gaspereau in the fall of 1908, and the chief engineer says they have two at St. John. These scows were not in use in connection with the government dredges, and I think they are still under hire at $10 a day.

Mr. DANIEL. Were not those the scows from the dredge 'W. S. Fielding'?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. I think not; I think they were brought from Nova Scotia. They had been used in connection with another dredge.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the new scows be built by contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Those built in our shipyard at Ottawa would be built by our own men and most if not all of the others by public tender.

Mr. BLAIN. Is it not a new departure for the government to hire out dredges?

Mr. PUGSLEY. These are not dredges; they are two scows.

Mr. BLAIN. I did not know that they were so plentiful that my hon. friend would go into the business of hiring them out. Where will we find the total revenue from these scows in the past year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I can easily get the figures for my hon. friend.

Mr. BLAIN. What will be the total cost of these dredges?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They are not dredges; they are scows. I shall get the value.

Mr. DANIEL. These are steel scows, and cost about $11,000 each.

Mr. BLAIN. For what were they originally used by the government?

Mr. PUGSLEY. In connection with a dredge in Nova Scotia, but we had no immediate use for them, and it was considered good business to keep them in use if we could get a good rental for them.

Mr. BLAIN. Have they been rented for two years?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They were rented in the fall of 1908, and used at Gaspereau. They are not large scows. Those used at Gaspereau have a capacity of only 210 cubic yards.

Mr. BLAIN. Are the company hiring them doing government work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Doing government dredging.

Mr. BLAIN. That is a remarkable condition of things.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why? Would the hon. gentleman suggest it is better to keep the scows idle than to hire them out at a good rental?

Mr. BLAIN. As I understand there is a good deal of work in different parts of this country for scows of that kind. If the government do not require the scows it would be better to sell them than to rent them. I do not believe the people desire the government to go into the construction of scows to be rented to contractors who are contracting for the government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The best policy would be to sell them if they were no longer required, provided a good price could be got for them, but pending that sale I think it would be thoroughly good business if, instead of keeping them lying up rusting, not earning any money, they should be hired out at a good, fair rental.

Mr. BLAIN. Has my hon. friend made any effort to sell them?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not yet.

Mr. BLAIN. That is the point. We say it is not good policy to lease them if they could be sold. My hon. friend's department has had them leased almost two years, and he now says it is better to sell them. I understand that these scows are not very long lived, they do not stand work any considerable length of time, and I am not quite sure whether even $10 a day for a portion of the year will be sufficient to pay the government, but whether or not, I must express my disapproval of the government having a considerable amount of money invested in scows, which they are leasing to contractors that are working for this government. That is a policy the people would not approve of, and I am sure my hon. friend himself would not approve of it. In fact, he has almost said so. If the department has decided that these are no longer of service to the government, they should sell them and put the money in the treasury, and not have this bartering with contractors. How many days did they work last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sorry I have no memorandum of the number of days, but would be glad to get the information and send a note to my hon. friend later, or lay it on the table.

Mr. DANIEL. I would ask the hon. minister if the Maritime Dredging and Construction Company has not, in addition to these two scows, the lease or hire of a large number of scows belonging to the 'Fielding,' including a scow that cost originally some $24,000? Is that under hire, and at what rate, and for how long?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall get the information. Does my hon. friend want to know about the hiring of any other scow?

Mr. DANIEL. The minister might bring down full information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the hon. minister not know whether the statement of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Daniel) is correct or not?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not.

Mr. BLAIN. He ought to know, if he has a large number of scows in his department, whether he is using them himself or leasing them to some one else.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Neither the deputy nor the chief engineer can tell me at present, but I shall get the information.

Mr. SPROULE. I would like a statement of the number of cubic yards dredged by each of these during the last season, and the places where the work was done, and also the cost.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A return which the right hon. the Prime Minister brought down the other day contains all that information for the last four years. I do not know that it contains the information of the year expiring, but it does for the four preceding years. I could get the information for the present year, but that would be quite a job. Does my hon. friend not think that if he looked at that return, that would satisfy him?

Mr. SPROULE. I think that would probably do.

Mr. BLAIN. At page 280 of the Auditor General's Report, I find, purchase price of dredge 'Industry' and plant, G. W. Phillips, $157,378.78; custom duty, 25 per cent on $157,379, $39,344.75. Was that purchased after public competition, or in what way?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was purchased after most careful examination and valuation by the superintendent of dredging. It was a comparatively new dredge which had cost a great deal more money, but owing to conditions, those who owned it had no immediate use for it, and it was purchased on very favourable terms.

Mr. BLAIN. How did they come to pay the duty?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Under the rule, every department has to contribute to the customs.

Mr. BLAIN. Was this item passed last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. The dredge 'Industry' is put down in the returns at $150,000, and the minister says she costs more.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There was some plant in addition and a duty of $39,000.

Mr. DANIEL. According to this return, the total cost of the dredge 'Industry' is $150,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then there were the spare parts which made up the difference. You will see it all in the account.

Mr. BLAIN. Did she require a new boiler after you purchased her?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. And I insisted on a reduction of $10,000 in the price.

Mr. BLAIN. But you said it was purchased after very careful inspection.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and we insisted on a reduction of $10,000 in the price owing to the necessity of putting in a new boiler.

Mr. BLAIN. Does that $10,000 appear in the purchase price in the Auditor General's Report?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the explanation of the discrepancy between what appears in the return and the facts? The return shows that the dredge cost $150,000, and the Auditor General's Report $196,734. The House must surely be misled in trying to reach an understanding of the actual cost.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Daniel) has kindly handed me the return. The amount shown here of $150,000 is a mistake, and the figure in the Auditor General's Report is correct. The price should have been shown as $157,000.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the duty part of the cost?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Part of the cost to the Public Works Department, but not to the country. The price of the dredge originally was $150,000, if I remember rightly. We had a special examination by experienced engineers, these gentlemen discovered a latent defect in the boiler. My recollection is that we then insisted that $10,000 should be taken off the price, and this was agreed to. Then we had to pay for the spares, of course, and for the actual cost of removing her from where she was to Cornwall.

Mr. BLAIN. What, then, was the total cost?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The total cost was $157,378.78, which included the spare parts and also the cost of bringing the vessel from where she was to Cornwall.

Mr. SPROULE. That does not include the duty?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then there was the duty of $39,344.75.

Mr. BLAIN. And the new boiler cost $4,650?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, $9,300; nearly the amount that we deducted—$10,000— for the defect in the boiler.

Mr. BLAIN. According to that she was purchased for $150,000, and after she was purchased——

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. This is what took place: The price agreed upon—I do not mean the binding price, but the price which the superintendent of dredging arrived at as fair—I think I am right in saying was $150,000. We decided to have a full examination made by experts. These experts discovered a latent defect in the boiler. The superintendent of dredging reported that there should be a deduction of $10,000 on this account.

Mr. BLAIN. Making $140,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. The rest would be made up of the cost of spare parts and the cost of bringing her into Canada.

Mr. BLAIN. What are spare parts?

Mr. PUGSLEY. An extra dipper and buckets, chains, and every thing of that kind.

Mr. BLAIN. Are these not included in the price of a dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, they figure the spare parts as separate. They are in duplicate.

Mr. DANIEL. What is her capacity?

Mr. PUGSLEY. She has a large capacity —carries an eight-yard dipper.

Mr. DANIEL. She is not as large as the 'Cynthia', or the 'Beaver', in St. John.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think so.

Mr. DANIEL. They have nine-yard dippers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The 'Industry' has the capacity to swing a ten-yard dipper.

Mr. DANIEL. What about the length of arm? How deep can she dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The chief engineer tells me, 48 feet.

Mr. BLAIN. What about $150 for legal expenses in this connection? Did the hon. minister have a lawsuit over the boiler?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was to get the title completed.

Mr. BLAIN. Title?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, of course—registration.

Mr. EMMERSON. Changing from United States register.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) will know that the $150 would be taxed by the Justice Department.

Mr. SPROULE. How much duty was paid?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We paid on $157,390.

Mr. SPROULE. And the dredge cost $140,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But the spares and everything went in on the cost and duty would be paid on the whole.

Mr. SPROULE. Was there not a reduction of $10,000 on account of the boiler?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, on the dredge itself. But, in making that reduction the cost of spare parts and every thing brought it up $157,378.78, on which we paid a duty of twenty-five per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know whether I understood correctly or not, but I think the minister said, that while this duty was chargeable to the Public Works Department the country did not pay it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Was the dredge brought into the country free of duty? It used to be the rule that goods brought into the country for the use of the government came in free of duty. Is that the case still?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, that rule has been done away with. If any department now imports for its own use goods that would be dutiable if imported by a private individual, the duty is paid to the Customs Department by the branch of government importing the article.

Mr. SPROULE. That is what I thought. But I understood the minister to say that while this was chargeable to the Public Works Department, it did not cost the country anything.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Exactly, because it is taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it not taken out of the consolidated revenue?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and it goes into the consolidated revenue.

Mr. SPROULE. How?

Mr. PUGSLEY. By the Finance Minister. It goes to the Finance Minister, it is drawn from the Finance Minister to pay the Minister of Customs, and the Minister of Customs puts it back into finance again.

Mr. DANIEL. It simply has the effect of making the income of the country appear much greater than it really is.

Mr. EMMERSON. And the expenditure of the country as well so much greater. It is as broad as it is long.

Mr. SPROULE. I would imagine that if one of us was to purchase that dredge for $150,000, and he paid 25 per cent duty on it, it would come out of his finances, it must have been paid for; and in case of the country, the country must pay for it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But where did the duty go to?

Mr. SPROULE. The duty must go to the Customs Department. But it is paid out all the same. When you come to give a statement to this House as to what that article costs, it seems to me that statement would not be correct unless you included in it the duty paid on that article. So the return brought down cannot be correct, financially speaking, when it only discloses the cost of the dredge without the duty.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There has evidently been a mistake of the clerk in making up that return, a mistake of $7,000.

Mr. DANIEL. May there not possibly be other mistakes in regard to other dredges mentioned?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It might be, of course. The returns never come under my notice at all. I do not suppose that, ordinarily, they come under the notice of the deputy as to details. The proper clerks are given directions to make up these returns from the papers on file; and I suppose that the clerk has seen the first report which put the price at $150,000 without the spare parts, and he has taken that without his attention being called to the reduction by reason of this latent defect in the boiler. That, I assume, is the way it has occurred. I will see how it has occurred, and if my hon. friend desires, I will get a memo of the exact cost, and how that item of $157,000 has been made up.

Mr. DANIEL. I think it is simply another typographical error.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, it would be an error of the clerk in making copies.

Mr. BLAIN. Should not the $9,000, the cost of the boiler, be added to it?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is not a part of the original cost. I do not know, I am inclined to think my hon. friend is right, I think it should be added.

Mr. BLAIN. I think the return is very wrong.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, I think the clerk has not added in the cost of the boiler, because that was obtained afterwards.

Mr. BLAIN. Therefore, the return is $16,000 wrong on the price.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. BLAIN. As I understand it, the return moved for—my hon. friend will correct me if I am in error—showed that this dredge cost $150,000; that is the return. Now, we turn up the Auditor General's Report and we find the first item is $157,000, that is $7,000 wrong. Then another item comes in afterwards of $9,000 for the boiler. These two items add $16,000 to the cost that were not added to the cost when the return was brought down to the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understand that my hon. friend is not reflecting on me at all, nor on my deputy; but it is a question of the clerk in copying. It is doubtful to my mind whether the clerk, in copying, should put in the duplicate equipment. A dredge is a dredge without that duplicate equipment, which is only procured as a matter of precaution. You have to keep that duplicate equipment on hand in case of a breakdown; it is like stores. It would have been erroneous if the clerk had put that in as part of the dredge.

Mr. BLAIN. Was it complete without that?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perfectly complete without it. It is like the dredge 'Fielding.' We are asking now, in this vote for dredging plant, an amount to procure a duplicate chain of buckets for the dredge 'Fielding.' Now, if you ask what the dredge cost, it would not be proper to add that in, because that is a duplicate equipment.

Mr. DANIEL. All the same, the minister will allow that there is never a dredge put to work in any part of the country that has not duplicate parts ready. As he knows well, dredges are always breaking down, something is giving away, the spuds break, or something happens to the dipper, and it is impossible to work an ordinary dredge without duplicating parts of it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, and in the same way no farmer works a farm without having on it horses and cattle, and ploughs, and harrows, and wagons; and yet if I wanted to buy his farm, and he said the price was $5,000, he would think it absurd for me to say: Why all your horses, and cattle, and ploughs, and harrows, and wagons have come in, because you could not use your farm without those.

Mr. DANIEL. I think the minister's illustration is not apropos. He might as well include coal for working a dredge as for a farmer to include all the stock on the farm, unless you are buying the stock.

Mr. PUGSLEY. All I can say is this: I would not necessarily blame the clerk, because in putting in the cost of the dredge he did not include the cost of the duplicate parts. Neither will I blame him because he did not add in the customs duty, or the cost of a boiler which was put in after the dredge was purchased. But my hon. friend can see there is nothing concealed, because here, on page B—280 of the report, is given the total cost of the boiler which was purchased afterwards, and the cost of duplicating the spare parts.

Mr. BLAIN. But the minister stated that the return brought down was correct. If it is not correct, how much should be added in order to make it a complete statement?

Mr. PUGSLEY. My view is that, strictly speaking, it is correct, that it gives the cost of the dredge correctly; but it does not include the cost of the boiler, which was obtained afterwards.

Mr. BLAIN. The boiler alone was $9,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. $9,300. That does not include the duty which went out of one pocket, and was paid into the other. It was paid by the Public Works Department into the Department of Customs. It is a matter of argument whether it ought to have been included or not.

Mr. BLAIN. And that does not include the $7,000 paid for parts?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, it does not include the duplicate parts.

Mr. BLAIN. Does my hon. friend say that when a return is asked for, and ordered by the House as to the cost of this dredge it is a correct return when it does not include the boilers, and parts of this dredge? Does my hon. friend suggest that the dredge would work without these parts costing $7,000?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Would it be complete?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAIN. Whether it is or is not, my hon. friend will not venture to say that the return as brought down stating that this dredge cost $150,000 was a correct return?

Mr. EMMERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIN. I do not think on reflection that my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) would say so.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would say so.

Mr. BLAIN. The fact of the matter is that these items, $9,300 and $7,000 were both paid in connection with this dredge, and are part of the cost of the dredge. This increase, a little over $16,000, and yet my hon. friend says that the return showing that the cost was $150,000 was a correct return.

Mr. EMMERSON. I know nothing about the matter. I was only giving my judgment. As I understand it a return was moved for the original cost of a dredge which was purchased at Massena, New York, and a certain amount was paid for the dredge as she then existed. What they paid for the dredge there is the cost of the dredge.

Mr. DANIEL. No.

Mr. EMMERSON. That is my view of it. Subsequently they also purchased spare parts.

Mr. DANIEL. From the original seller?

Mr. EMMERSON They may have purchased them from the original seller or anybody else; it does not make any difference. It is not part of the cost, and need not necessarily have come with the dredge.

Mr. DANIEL. Suppose the hon. member for Westmorland goes out and buys a dredge, he buys duplicate parts, and the whole costs him $150,000; if I asked him how much that dredge cost him, would he leave off the duplicate parts? Would he not include them with what he had paid for the dredge?

Mr. EMMERSON. If the duplicate parts were a portion of the dredge they would be included in the total cost of $150,000, as the cost price, and the very fact that these parts were purchased apart from the price of $150,000 shows that they are not a part of the dredge, and are not part of the original cost of the dredge. The fact that the dredge itself was deficient with respect to the boiler, and that subsequently a new boiler was placed therein does not prove that the cost of the new boiler would have to be considered as part of the original cost of the dredge at Massena, or wherever she was purchased. That is my judgment. It is the difference between tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum. It is like purchasing a house, there are certain fixtures that go with the house, and there are certain other items that do not.

Mr. DANIEL. What is the total cost of the house?

Mr. EMMERSON. The total cost of the house is, say $10,000. The fixtures do not go with it, and they are subsequently purchased, they are additional, and are not included in the original cost. I have in my mind an illustration in regard to myself where a certain fixed sum was paid for a house, and subseqeuntly I purchased certain other fixtures, incidental to the house, but not part of the original cost price. If parties asked me what that house had cost me, I would not include these other items.

Mr. DANIEL. Does this return ask for the original cost of this dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, the original cost.

Mr. BLAIN. It says the price paid for the dredge.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That makes it absolutely clear. Another reason is that the dredge was purchased at so much, these duplicate parts were separately invoiced, and the agreement was that they would sell them at the invoice price. Invoices were furnished showing that they were absolutely and entirely separate from the purchase of the dredge.

Mr. SPROULE. If the minister purchased a dredge would he not believe that he had purchased something that was complete, and ready for work? What would he regard as a complete dredge? Must it not include the equipment so that it can go on and dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. It would not be a dredge if there were some dippers absent?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, then must not the equipment of the dredge be part of the dredge?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.
