Mr. FIELDING. We have submitted to the House recently some estimates for the close of the fiscal year which ends on the 31st of this month. I am afraid that the House has been so busily occupied with other matters during the last few hours that hon. members, perhaps, have not had an opportunity to give much consideration to these estimates. I realize that if any hon. member desires that the consideration of these estimates should be deferred, I can offer no objection. On the other hand, I would point out that it would be a convenience if, in getting a special vote covering one quarter of the unvoted items for the new year we could take also the estimates which will wind up the affairs of the current year. I do not think there is much of a controversial nature in these estimates, and I am pretty sure that there is no discussion likely to arise from them which could not take place at a later stage on some item in other estimates. If there be no objection, I would suggest that we pass these supplementary estimates with the understanding that everything that is contained in them may be debated at a later stage. If there is no objection, I will proceed along that line.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. The leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) called me up by telephone a few minutes ago to say that he would not be here to-night, but that he and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) had made an arrangement to pass one-quarter of the estimates that had not been voted, in order that contractors, civil servants and others might get their pay. This, I understand, is because the Minister of Finance is anxious to get the Bill over to the Senate, as that body purposes adjourning to-morrow until April 6. But the leader of the opposition did not say anything about the supplementary estimates of which the minister has spoken. I do not know of anything controversial in them, but some hon. members on this side are not satisfied to let these supplementaries go en bloc, but they are quite willing that one-quarter of the main estimates should pass in that way.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend (Mr. Geo. Taylor) is quite right as to the understanding; it did not cover the supplementary estimates. I had a few words about it with the leader of the opposition, but that hon. gentleman told me that he had had no opportunity of looking over these estimates and could offer no opinion concerning them. They are supplementary estimates for the current year, not for the coming year, and they are necessary in order to make provision for the close of the year. I would prefer that we should have them voted, but if the hon. member presses his objection, I cannot say that it is unreasonable.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I assume that the minister would be willing to make an arrangement that if there is an item in them which any hon. member desires to discuss, he should have an opportunity to deal with the matter.

Mr. FIELDING. I give that assurance without qualification.

Mr. LENNOX. I understood the Minister of Finance went even further than that—that we could debate any of these items as a matter of course at a later time, because only one-quarter of each is being voted.

Mr. FIELDING. That is the case with regard to the estimates for the coming year. But, if the committee deals with the supplementary estimates, I would ask that they be voted in full. I quite appreciate the fact that if we are able to pass these estimates, it is done by general consent, and, if any hon. member desires to discuss any of these items, he should have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Would to-morrow at three o'clock be too late to pass these items? The leader of the opposition would be here then. I would hardly like to consent to their passing in his absence.

Mr. LENNOX. I was going to suggest that if we had something to occupy the time for a few minutes, the chief whip could probably ring up the leader of the opposition and consult with him.

Mr. FIELDING. For the moment we will not proceed with the supplementary estimates, but we will ask the committee to concur in one-fourth of the unvoted items for the next year, with that understanding. Let me explain that the House, in Committee of Supply, has dealt already with a number of the items of the estimates, and they are now ready, if the House sees fit to concur, to be put in the form of a Supply Bill. But there is a considerable portion of the estimates which the House has not dealt with at all, or if it has considered the matter, the items have been held over for further consideration. We propose now, in Committee of Supply, to vote one-fourth of the remaining items, and these, together with what the committee have already dealt with, shall be gathered into a Supply Bill and sent to the Senate as quickly as possible. That being the understanding, I would move that one-fourth of the items which this committee have not already voted in the estimates for the coming fiscal year, do now pass this committee.

Mr. CROSBY. Do these unvoted items cover the civil service for the current year?

Mr. FIELDING. A number of items, including those for the civil service.

Mr. CROSBY. I ask the question because, in the eastern end of the Dominion, we find that the salaries of civil servants are sometimes held up for a time, particularly the military salaries. When these supplies have been voted, will there be no delay in paying them?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The 25 per cent applies to every branch of the service.

Mr. FIELDING. I have here all the items in detail, but I suspect that the House will not wish me to read them. So we will rely upon the clerks of the House to see that they give effect to the motion that is now made, that one-fourth of these items shall be passed and put into the form of a Supply Bill. I move that the committee rise and report the resolution.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Some time ago the Minister of Railways and Canals promised to put a certain amount in the estimates for this year to start the building of the Hudson Bay railway. Has the government decided yet what amount to put in the estimates for that purpose?

Mr. FIELDING. That will be for the estimates for the coming year, not for the current year. It will have to come in the supplementary estimates for the coming year, and I am not in a position to make any statement concerning these until they are ready to be submitted to the House.

Motion agreed to, and resolution reported.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

House went into Committee on Bill (No. 102) respecting immigration.

On section 1.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior to define the meaning of his remark before six o'clock, when, in answer to a question I preferred to him with regard to the Doukhobors, he said that his Act covered the immigration of Doukhobors, as well as my other friends.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no explanation to make, the words, I think, are perfectly clear, and I cannot see that my hon. friend can take any objection to them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want to know what the hon. gentleman meant. I want him to explain to whom he refers as my other friends, in speaking of the Doukhobors.

Mr. OLIVER. I said the Act applied to all the friends of my hon. friend. I have no explanation to offer. The Act does apply to every person who comes under its operation whether they are friends of myself I want to know what he means.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The minister is begging the question. His words were that the intention was to introduce an Act to bring out Doukhobors as well as other friends of myself. I want to know what he means.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, I shall have to take issue with my hon. friend. I did not say that the Act contemplated the bringing out of Doukhobors, or that it had anything to do with Doukhobors, more than with anybody else.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I may have misquoted him as to bringing out Doukhobors, but that was the effect of the words, to bring out Doukhobors as well as other friends of his hon. friend, meaning myself. I wrote down the words when he used them, and I want to know what he means.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, he means exactly what he says, as he generally does.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I want the hon. gentleman to make himself clear. I understand the English language nearly as well as he does, and I understood from what he said that he meant to convey an imputation on me in some way. If he did, I throw it back in his teeth, absolutely and at all times.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg to apologize for the Doukhobors.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am surprised that an hon. gentleman who has, from time to time, got up in this House and decried people who are decent citizens of this country, as I pretend to be, Mr. Speaker, as I strive to be, and I take back water from no man, Grit or Tory, who ever lived in the aspiration to be a decent and honourable citizen of this country. When he makes a statement of that kind I hold it is an insult and if it were anywhere else than on the floor of this House I would tell him in very plain language—in that language that of all men in this House he is supposed to be a past master of—that there is no justification whatever for it. He is protected by the rules of this House when he throws an insult like that across the floor. There is no Liberal in this House, be he the smallest or the biggest man, that ever can say to me, with truth that I have done anything else towards him than show him the courtesy that one gentleman owes to another. That is my asipration and I want to tell you that evidently that is not the aspiration of the minister, or if it is his aspiration, he does not know in the slightest degree how to walk up to it. He does not know the courtesy that one gentleman should show to another, when he throws in my teeth such words as those which he uttered to-night. He says that he owes an apology to the Doukhobors. Does he owe an apology to the poor men, women and children, who paraded through Saskatchewan in the garb that God gave them when they were born, a most indecent horde of people? Yet, he apologized to them because I have brought up in this House something in regard to them. If ever I felt like apologizing for a Liberal or a Liberal minister for his want of courtesy in this House I feel like it now. I think it is shameful, and I think that if the minister will only pause to consider a moment he will realize that he has gone beyond the bounds of what is parliamentary and beyond the bounds of the courtesy which one hon. gentleman owes to another. He owes me a personal apology and I expect to get it—I do not care whether it is written or verbal.

Mr. LENNOX. There is such a thing as a person sacrificing too much for the sake of being smart, and if an illustration of that is wanted in this House we have a very apt one at this time. The minister had every opportunity of doing what was honourable and square by my hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Campbell). The hon. member repeated his question a great many times. He had a good right to repeat the question, because the remark made before we rose at six o'clock was open to a very uncomplimentary construction. Instead of making amends, as I anticipated, the hon. gentleman would and which was, I submit, what any hon. member of this House should have done, and particularly a minister of the Crown who ought to be an example of decorum and propriety, instead of availing himself of the opportunity of saying frankly that he did not intend to be discourteous or uncomplimentary and that he had no ground for saying anything discourteous or uncomplimentary about the hon. member for Dauphin, he plays upon words for some time and in the end becomes very clever and tells the hon. gentleman that he owes an apology to the Doukhobors. If he owes an apology to anybody he owes it to this House for his conduct as a minister of the Crown. If he owes an apology it is not to the Doukhobors but it is to the honest, respectable people of Canada for bringing in a horde such as he has brought at the expense of Canada and to the great detriment of the future of this country. As I have had a fair amount of respect for the Minister of the Interior, and as I never had any occasion to complain of him in reference to any former matter of this kind, I regret very much indeed that he has seen fit to so degrade the hon. position he occupies and has descended to this petty, miserable——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

An hon. MEMBER. Chair.

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if the hon. gentleman has any right to tell any minister of the Crown that he has degraded himself either in word or action.

Mr. LENNOX. A minister of the Crown has greater opportunities of degrading himself than an ordinary member.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) has the right to explain his words before I make a ruling. I hope the hon. gentleman will at this time confine himself to that explanation.

Mr. LENNOX. I say that a minister of the Crown can more readily degrade himself than an ordinary member, and if you rule that I have to modify the words, I will modify them or withdraw them, but I will not do so otherwise.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) he had not completed his sentence, but I think he used the words that the minister had so far degraded his position——

Mr. LENNOX. As a minister of the Crown.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. —as a minister of the Crown, and that he had proceeded a little farther. I regret the strength of the expression and I would ask the hon. gentleman to modify it.

Mr. LENNOX. I will be very pleased to withdraw the statement on the ruling of the Chair, although I would not otherwise have done so. I withdraw it absolutely and unreservedly by reason of the ruling of the Chair, but I would say that in so far as I can go in describing my very great regret that any person who occupies the distinguished position in the service of Canada, one to which we would like to look with pride, I regret very much that the hon. member has forgotten the fundamental duty he owes to this House and the people of Canada as he has forgotten and ignored it to-night.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall section 1 be adopted?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I asked some questions of the Minister of the Interior before six o'clock, and I was told that it would be much better to ask these questions when this Bill came up in Committee of the Whole House. The first question I asked was in regard to the cost of bringing the Doukhobors into this country. I would like to repeat the question now.

Mr. OLIVER. I am sorry that I have not had the opportunity of getting the information. My hon. friend will understand that it is not possible to carry in a person's mind a series of questions that might be asked across the floor, and it is usual, I think, to depend upon 'Hansard' for the question so that a proper answer may be secured. I can assure my hon. friend that the questions he asked will receive every attention, but I would ask to have the opportunity of getting them from 'Hansard' in order that I may be sure that I am giving the answer that is called for.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I asked another question, and I might say that in the answer that I got from the minister just now I was somewhat surprised to be termed the hon. member for Dauphin, remembering the remarks that proceeded from him a few minutes ago. I asked if this Bill applies to the Doukhobors and their immigration and importation into this country. I would like an answer to that.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, unquestionably.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Might I ask what is the intention of the government in regard to the numbers of Doukhobors that are to be imported? I have seen it stated in the papers to be in the neighbourhood of 8,000. What is the policy of the government with regard to the settlement of these people in view of the government's experience with them in the past? Do they mean to segregate them or do they mean to use them as they use every other class of immigrants—scatter them throughout the country?

Mr. OLIVER. There was a rumour some time ago in the papers that there was a possibility of further immigration of Doukhobors from Russia to the Northwest. On seeing that rumour, I made such inquiry as was possible, and found as far as I was able to find that there was no foundation for that rumour. I may say that the provisions of the Bill are intended to meet the need of excluding undesirable people, and should the Doukhobors come within the exclusion provisions of the Bill they would necessarily be excluded.

Mr. EDWARDS. Who is going to determine that?

Mr. OLIVER. The officers of the government, when the matter comes up for consideration.

Mr. EDWARDS. Under your direction?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is the minister in a position to say now whether he considers these Doukhobors a desirable class of people or not?

Mr. OLIVER. The government is in a position to know whether the Doukhobors who are now in Canada are a desirable class of people or not, and on that point I may say that some of them may fairly be considered desirable, and some of them may just as fairly be considered undesirable. I understand that there are differences of sect among the Doukhobors. Some of them hold more extreme views than others. As to those who are in Russia, I do not know whether they hold the views of those who are in Canada or not. I presume that they do not, otherwise they would have come to Canada along with those who are here now. The fact that they did not come indicates to me that they hold somewhat different views. What those views are I do not know, but if we had to decide we would get the information and would judge accordingly. If the views of any of those who are in Russia, if there are any there, are in accord with the views of a certain portion of the Doukhobors who are in Canada, they would certainly be excluded under the provisions of the Act as it is at present, and under the policy under which that Act is administered.

Mr. J. D. REID. What became of those Doukhobors who were at Port Arthur, and did the government pay $5 a head for bringing them into this country.

Mr. OLIVER. I believe that they are a part of the general immigration of Doukhobors, and in respect of those who were alive at the time there was a payment of $5 a head.

Mr. J. D. REID. Where are they now? They were all crazy the last time I saw them a Port Arthur.

Mr. OLIVER. Some of them are dead, some in jail, some are back at their original village, and some are scattered elsewhere.

Mr. J. D. REID. Then we paid $5 a head to bring them out here to keep them in jail? Is that what we are to understand?

Mr. OLIVER. I am giving the facts. The government did pay $5 a head, I understand, and some of these people either are or were in jail as a result of their escapade at Port Arthur.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. To what kind of an examination will the minister subject those Doukhobors that he intends importing into this country—a medical examination? Will that show what their views are on religious questions, or will he have to extract their brains, and put them under a microscopic examination? I do not see how he can ascertain by any examination what their views are so as to say whether they are desirable or not.

Mr. OLIVER. The Bill makes provision for the exclusion of people who are physically, mentally or morally unfit or undesirable. I think it would be fair to say that the party of Doukhobors who were at Port Arthur would come under one of these classifications, and if those who are in Russia are of the same mind, they would come under the same classification. I may, however, take exception to the words of my hon. friend when he speaks of Doukhobors that this government intends to bring from Russia. I can assure him that the government do not intend to bring Doukhobors from Russia or anybody from anywhere. If Doukhobors come from Russia or anybody comes from anywhere, they will have to pass the conditions of the immigration law before they are admitted to Canada.

Mr. CROSBY. As a junior member of this parliament I have been somewhat surprised, and for my future conduct, if I should remain in parliament, I want to understand where we are in regard to a discussion which took place to-night. The hon. Minister of the Interior, apologized to the Doukhobors for having mentioned the name of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) in connection with the Doukhobors, and when the hon. member for Dauphin addressed the House with regard to the matter, I understood the Minister of Finance to say to him, 'be careful.' But, when the Minister of Finance, who I understand to be leading this House, heard that statement from the Minister of the Interior, he did not ask him to be careful. I want to know whether or not that is parliamentary language, or whether it is to be taken as an example to the junfor members of this House as to how they are to govern themselves in addressing this House. I want to know if the hon. Minister of the Interior has not yet something to do or to explain so far as the hon. member for Dauphin is concerned. We on this side of the House have the highest regard and respect for the hon. member for Dauphin, and I am sure I am not going too far when I say that hon. members on the other side have the same regard for that hon. gentleman, and I feel confident that the hon. Minister of the Interior, knowing the hon. member for Dauphin perhaps much better than I do, has the same regard for him, even though they may not have the same political views. Therefore, before we go any further in discussing the matter before the committee, I would like this matter to be cleared up, because I feel, as a junior member of parliament that the impression made by it on my mind will have a great deal to do with my conduct in future in addressing this House, either in Committee of the Whole or with the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not understand that the hon. gentleman has raised a point of order, and it would be, of course, too late now to raise it on the point he has mentioned. I will say though, on the appeal of the hon. member, that I very much regret personal recrimination in the House. I was cognizant of the remark made by the Minister of the Interior. It will not do for me to comment on it. Had I felt that it distinctly contravened any rule of the House to which I could point, I would have called it to order. It was a class of expression that might convey perhaps an unkindly thought to the member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell), and yet I did not feel that it was of that class that I could call out of order.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. A western expression.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would say though, having been appealed to by the member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) that it is my desire to hold the debates in this House clear of personal recrimination. I hope that in any efforts I make in the future in that way I will get the support of the House, and if so, the debates will reach a higher standard than I feel they have recently been on.

Mr. CROSBY. I fear I misunderstood the minister, and if the minister will be good enough to set the matter right, I feel it will make us all feel happier and we can go on better. I ask this for my guidance. Like every other member, I have a tendency and desire to be courteous and fair to the ministers of the Crown, but at the same time I do look for strong lessons in courtesy and kindliness, and even sympathy, from ministers of the Crown to members of the House. I hope the minister will in a few words set this at rest and let us go on.

Mr. STAPLES. I think the member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) is taking good ground when he raises this question, and I was hoping the Minister of the Interior would retract the statement he threw across the House to the member for Dauphin. The minister is a westerner, and probably outside of this House he would be in the habit of using western expressions that would not be thought anything of in the west. I think as a member of this House, it was a dirty slur he cast when he made the statement that he apologized to the Doukhobors because he had classified the member for Dauphin with them. I have known the member for Dauphin for a great many years, and outside of his western spirit, which is very noticeable, he is the last man who would cast a slur that would in any way reflect on the character of an hon. member of this House. I do not believe it is yet too late to raise the point of order, and I ask the minister to retract the statement he made reflecting on the character and associates of the member for Dauphin. There is no doubt the Minister of the Interior had in his mind, he has admitted tonight when he made that statement before six o'clock, we who know the member for Dauphin, and he who knows him, knows what he had in his mind when he made the statement across the floor that his Bill, which is now before us for discussion, was wide enough for the member for Dauphin and all his relatives to come in on.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I did not say relatives.

Mr. STAPLES. Until the minister acts the man and withdraws what he said, I for one do not intend clause 1 to pass.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. STAPLES. If an hon. member on this side made the same statement as the Minister of the Interior made, you would rise to a man, and ask him to retract, but if an hon. member on this side had made that statement we as his colleagues would go to him, and ask him for the dignity of this House to retract it. Hon. gentlemen opposite when a minister casts a slur on a member on this side pound their desks. If the minister will say he did not mean anything more, if he will explain what he did mean or retract the words that in his opinion were offensive, we will proceed with the business of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend says he knows what was in my mind when I replied to the hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. STAPLES. I said I had an opinion of what was in your mind.

Mr. OLIVER. And wanted me to apologize for that which he thought was in my mind. Before I apologize I will ask him to tell the House what he thinks was in my mind so I will know what I am apologizing for.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no desire to be a football between my Liberal friends and my own partisans in a question of this kind. I feel that the Minister of the Interior was acting a part far beneath the dignity of his office when he threw the slur across at me which he did throw, but for that reason if he has not the manliness and the gentlemanliness to get up and withdraw the sentiment that he put into my mind, I have no desire, and I would ask my hon. friends on this side to take no further notice, because a man of that kind is absolutely beneath contempt.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I am afraid the closing words of the member for Dauphin are not in order, and I would prefer that he withdrew them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have no desire, as I think you know, at any time to contravene the rules of this House, but you must know, from what you said a few moments ago you must feel, that the provocation has been very great, and that while my words are not parliamentary they are absolutely just, but being unparliamentary I must withdraw them on your ruling.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to say that there seems to be some misunderstanding on the part of my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) as to what was in my mind when I answered my hon. friend from Dauphin. I cannot tell what he thinks was in my mind. I presume he thinks it was something that was very bad.

Mr. EDWARDS. Withdraw your words and never mind what was in your mind.

Mr. OLIVER. I will not withdraw any words at the call of any bully inside or outside the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. EDWARDS. As I was speaking before the Minister of the Interior got up I infer that his word 'bully,' refers to me, and I ask him to withdraw it unreservedly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the minister has referred to any member as a 'bully,' of course it would be unparliamentary, and I ask him to withdraw.

Mr. OLIVER. If my hon. friend from Frontenac considers that I applied the word to him——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I certainly will take it back.

Mr. J. D. REID. I object to the minister taking it back as applied to only one member——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. J. D. REID. I am surprised that you as Chairman of this committee will allow the minister to apply that word to any member on this side of the House.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have risen to order, and the hon. member must resume his seat. While I will endeavour to do justice to every member of the House I cannot allow the hon. member to discuss the ruling at the present time.

Mr. J. D. REID. Let me say that the hon. minister applied the word 'bully' to a member of this House, and so far as your ruling, Sir, is concerned, I have a right to appeal, and I shall do so.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman who used the term 'bully' has withdrawn it. The hon. member for Frontenac raised the point that he was the one to whom that epithet was intended to apply, and the epithet having been withdrawn in regard to him, I did not understand that any other member was referred to, and the rules of the House do not protect any one who is not a member.

Mr. EDWARDS. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) said that if I thought he applied the word to me, thereby leaving the inference that he meant it to apply to more than myself, he withdrew it. I took it up so far as I was concerned, and other gentlemen have the same right.

Mr. OLIVER. In order to ease the strain, I want to say that if any hon. gentleman considers that I applied the word to him, I beg to withdraw it and to say that I do not consider any of them bullies. I wish to say further that, so far as my attitude is concerned, I have always desired to be courteous to every hon. member and transact business with due regard to the dignity of the House and the respect due by one man to another, whether in the House or out of it. When the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) questioned me with regard to the Bill before six o'clock, I replied to him in the spirit in which, as I judged, he had asked the question. When he reverted to the matter after eight o'clock, he seemed to consider that I had attached some ill-meaning to the words, or intended to convey an insult to him, and I could not understand what was in his mind. As far as I can judge, there must have been something in his mind that was not in mine, judging by the remarks of the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples); and while I would like every one to understand that I wish to treat every one with all courtesy, I would like also every one to understand that they can always get their change when they come to me. But I do want the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) to understand that I had no intention of conveying any slur upon him, either as a man or member of the House, or in any way, shape or manner.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think that what the Minister of the Interior says, though at a late date, covers the question; and if I was perhaps somewhat bitter in some words I used since the inception of this debate, I do him the same courtesy as he has done me, and beg to withdraw them in so far as they hurt his feelings. To go on with this matter, before we pass clause 1, I think it would be desirable for the Minister of the Interior to tell us what proportion of good settlers there were among the Doukhobors. He has told us about some bad ones, those that are in asylums or in jail or dead, and I would like to have some idea what the proportion of good settlers was.

Mr. OLIVER. I have not the information at hand. There is, of course, a difference in degree even among the good settlers.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I might make it perhaps a little easier for the minister to reply if I put it in this way. How many Doukhobors who settled in Saskatchewan and other parts have proved upon their homesteads and become decent, civilized citizens and good settlers?

Mr. OLIVER. As the hon. gentleman now asks the question, it would amount to this: How many Doukhobors have left the community and become individual settlers? I cannot give the actual figures, but I think in the neighbourhood of one-quarter of the total number. Of those who remain in the community, while they are not to be classed as the most desirable settlers, I do not think that they are as good as those who work individually. They are industrious, thrifty, law-abiding and have added very considerable to the wealth of the country, and to that extent are good settlers, but I do not think that those who continue to live in community are as good as those who have gone out on their homesteads and proved up to them, as a certain proportion have done.

Mr. CAMPBELL. We have been told by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) that in the neighbourhood of $45,000 to $50,000 has been spent by the government in bringing these people out to this country, only one-quarter of whom, according to the minister, have proved good settlers. I realize, of course, that the minister is not perhaps altogether to blame for the bringing out of these people, but I would ask him what they cost this country since they came out? What has it cost Canada to send out the police and special trains and to take care of those people when on these famous pilgrimages of which my hon. friend knows, which were an insult to the decent Canadian men, women and children throughout the country through which they paraded. Those pets of the late Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), when they paraded in all their nakedness, were the most indecent exhibition we have ever seen in the Canadian west, not even excepting the poor ignorant aborigines. And these people were brought out as good settlers by this government, and the government took credit to themselves for bringing them to Canada. I would like to know approximately what it cost to semi-civilize these people and teach them some morality and semi-decency.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot give the information off-hand, but I shall use my endeavours to get it as nearly as possible. I hope to be able to place it before the House at a later date. As evidence that these people are not altogether undesirables, I may mention that a number have bought lands in British Columbia at very high prices and have formed colonies in two or three of the valleys there and are establishing fruit farms. I do not say that the fact that they have been able to accumulate wealth and that they have been large producers of wealth alone makes them desirable citizens. But I would not like the House to understand that they are without qualities that would entitle them to consideration. While I am speaking on this subject, I may say that it is quite a mistake to suppose that these people are of inferior mentality any more than they are inferior in physique to other people.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. To which class does the minister refer?

Mr. OLIVER. We speak of the people of Ontario as a very superior class as they are, but there are undesirable people in Ontario. So that, out of 8,000 Doukhobors, a very considerable portion of them are, I say, not inferior in either mentality or physique to other people. There is a minority of them who are certainly inferior, so much so as to be classed as entirely undesirable.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. The minister has time and again spoken of these people as being divided into two classes. Of course, we all admit that some of them are fairly good settlers. If we could be sure of getting only that kind, I do not think there are many in western Canada who would object to more of them coming. But what we do object to is the government bringing into our decent settlements such people as were described by my hon. friend from Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) a few minutes ago. Would it be possible, under this new Bill, to prevent this undesirable class from coming into Canada? If not, I would advise the minister to have these people settle in Ottawa in all their native glory and in all their nakedness. Then the members of parliament from one end of Canada to the other would see the kind of people who have been sent into western Canada. As showing the wide range from which our immigrants are drawn, I may say that there are 49 different languages spoken in Winnipeg alone. There is no doubt that this foreign immigration are not only filling our jails and asylums in western Canada, but, as shown by the returns brought down, the asylums and jails of Ontario as well. Will the minister tell me whether it is possible for these undesirables, such as he has described, to come into Canada under this new Bill?

Mr. TURRIFF. There has been a good deal of unfair criticism of the Doukhobors this evening. It is a good many years since these people came into Canada. They were brought in by the government and they were generally thought to be a good class of people. So far as my observation goes, the great majority of the Doukhobors are as good a class of settlers, almost, as you get from any other country. One great point against them, in my judgment, is that they wish to live in communities. But they are gradually breaking away from that. As the minister has pointed out, there is a minority who are practically insane.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. This government brought them in.

Mr. TURRIFF. There are people among other classes who go crazy and have to be put in asylums. I believe that you can easily find other classes who have entailed more expense from the Justice Department than has been spent in looking after the small proportion of Doukhobors who needed looking after, and who, in my judgment, are insane. It sometimes costs the government a great deal to punish a criminal. It may take $25,000 to capture, convict and punish a murderer. I have in mind one such case in which it cost the government $100,000 to execute justice. Will you say that the people who came from the same country as that murderer are an undesirable class because of this man's crime? Are the Doukhobors all to be classed as bad settlers because some of them have practically gone insane and acted in a reprehensible manner? There is much criticism of the government for bringing these people into the country, but when they were brought in hon. members opposite did not offer a word of criticism.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. If the hon. member will allow me, I recollect very distinctly when the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) and myself criticised that action very freely.

Mr. TURRIFF. I was going to remark —if my hon. friend had waited—that the chief criticism of that action came from my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, who was then a private member of the House, and not from hon. members opposite.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. We were not here.

Mr. TURRIFF. Further, the predecessors of this government were those who began bringing in the people who are now said to be so undesirable.

Mr. EDWARDS. What class?

Mr. TURRIFF. If the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) will remain quiet, he will get further ahead.

Mr. EDWARDS. Does the hon. member object to a question?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes, until I get through.

Mr. EDWARDS. I have no wish to interrupt.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is easy to criticise, because some of the people who come to Canada have not turned out well. But if you are going to condemn all the people from a given country because some of them turn out badly, where will you get your immigration?

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. I do not wish to be misunderstood. The hon. gentleman has interpreted my words as condemning the whole crowd of Doukhobors. A moment ago when the minister said that he put them into two classes, a good class and a class that was no good, I said distinctly that a part of them were all right.

Mr. TURRIFF. I accept the hon. gentleman's view of the matter, and I quite agree that a considerable part of them are all right, and a part of them are not right. But we have them in the country, and we must deal with them as we find them. Not many more Doukhobors will come in, and I think I have heard it stated that about all that class of people in Russia have now come into Canada. But if any more of them do come in, under our present law, and more especially under the law it is now proposed to amend, we would not only be able to stop them from coming in, but if they are found to be undesirable we can deport them at any time during three years after their arrival. I have seen a statement made by one of the ministers of the Ontario government that the jails and asylums of the province were being filled with undesirables from foreign countries, and that although it was within the power of any municipality in which one of those undesirables was found, to deport him, in a great many cases it had not been done. The municipality had only to notify the Department of the Interior and the individual would be deported, but in a great many cases no such step had been taken by the municipality. I am satisfied that the government do not wish to bring in any class of people who live in communities. We want the people who come into this country to adopt Canadian ways of living. Even English speaking people coming into Canada, if they live in communities, would not be the class that we desire. I think this Bill will go a long way towards making it possible to handle the immigration question better than we have handled it in the past, and it will better enable us to keep out undesirables.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Minister of Interior referred to these people as being not inferior in mentality or physique to other races who form the people of Canada, and he said that some 25 per cent of them had proved to be good settlers. But I hold that when he is bringing in a Bill with regard to immigration it is up to him to provide that no immigrant, no matter how good his physique or his mentality, shall be allowed to come into this country as a settler unless he is prepared to subscribe to the oath of allegiance and become a Canadian first as we all do who form the great Canadian people. The minister has had to admit that up to date only a small percentage of Doukhobors have subscribed to the oath of allegiance. For that reason alone. I say they are bad settlers, regardless of their physique or menality. I think we should pass a law that no man should be allowed to reside in this country unless he is prepared to become a Canadian citizen in the fullest meaning of the word, and unless he is prepared to take up arms in defence of the flag that waves over him. I would suggest that a clause be put in the Bill to that effect.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. The minister has divided the Doukhobors into two classes. Will it be possible, under the new Bill, to keep an undesirable Doukhobor out of the country?

Mr. OLIVER. If they were recognized as being of the class that my hon. friend mentions, of course they would be shut out under the Bill. But having come in without being recognized as undesirable, if they were found to be undesirable within three years afterwards, they could be deported to the country from whence they came. It might be difficult to distinguish between one who was mentally weak and one who was sound. But if their fanaticism broke out within three years after their coming into the country, under this Bill they could be deported. In regard to what the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) said, I quite agree with him that men who decline to take the oath of allegiance are undesirable. I am satisfied that had the government been aware, when they entered into negotiations for bringing these people out to Canada that such was their religion, certainly no such arrangement would have been entered into.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Could the minister tell us about what proportion of the Doukhobors have taken the oath?

Mr. TURRIFF.

Mr. OLIVER. I think about 25 per cent of the adult males.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I suppose that the reason why they left their homesteads in the west and removed into British Columbia was because they refused to take the oath of allegiance.

Mr. OLIVER. No, they were not on homesteads, they were living in a community, and refused to take their lands in severalty. We have no means of giving land to people except in severalty, and as they would not take their land on those conditions, they decided to remove to British Columbia where they would be allowed to retain their communal system.

Mr. ROCHE. In connection with their Port Arthur pilgrimage, I understand that the government of Saskatchewan took issue with the Dominion government in reference to the payment of the expenses of that pilgrimage, and that some correspondence passed between the two governments as to which government should bear the expenditure.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot give an absolutely sure answer, but my impression is that the whole of the expenditures, after the return of the Doukhobors to the province of Saskatchewan, was borne by the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. ROCHE. That was borne by the province.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. ROCHE. Who paid the expense in connection with Port Arthur?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know, but I suppose the Ontario government. I could not say.

Mr. HERRON. Have the government any requests from any other class of settlers to come in under the Act referred to by the hon. member for Dauphin; that is to avoid military service, and if so has the government any intention of making any such arrangement with any other classs of people? I hope not.

Mr. OLIVER. At the present time, in so far as I am entitled to speak on behalf of the government in declaring its policy on immigration, the government has consistently declined to enter into any proposition for admitting settlers to Canada during recent years on any terms other than those that are common to citizens of Canada. We never recognize any special privilege to any class of people from any part of the world.

Mr. HERRON. Are you still permitting settlers to settle in communities?

Mr. OLIVER. No, there was provision in the Dominion Lands Act to allow people to settle in hamlets. That provision was abolished by the new Act of 1908, and we have no arrangement now whereby people can occupy government lands except under the terms set down in the Homestead Act.

Mr. A. HAGGART. Since the discussion has arisen between the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Campbell) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Sharpe) on this side of the House, and the hon. the minister, and the hon. member for Assinaboia (Mr. Turriff) on the other side, as to the deportation of undesirables, I desire to say that I cannot agree with the construction placed upon the Act as it is before us in reference to those who are prohibited, and those who may be deported. The word, 'undesirable' would not be a proper term in an Act like this. The Act provides for a board of inquiry, but it would be a very serious matter to allow that board of inquiry to adjudicate upon a person, or a class of persons, and to determine as to whether they were undesirable or not. By referring to section 3 of the Act it will be seen that the following are placed among the prohibited classes:

(a) idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons, and persons who have been insane within five years previous.

I doubt very much if on a fair and proper construction of the Act, Doukhobors would come within that definition, and section 40, which provides for deportation, also specifically names a different class of persons who may be deported at the expiration of five years. When these clauses come up I have no doubt that with the assistance of the Minister of Justice we may be able to get some more suitable expression that would meet the views which were set forth by the hon. member for Lisgar, and the hon. member for Dauphin, and something which would also meet what appears to be the views of the majority of the members of this House. The whole subject matter can be properly discussed under these sections.

Mr. U. WILSON. I have a vivid recollection of the debates that took place in this House on several occasions in reference to the Doukhobors. I have always been opposed to giving any class of immigrants any special privileges. I recollect that when the Mormons wanted to settle in Canada, and when they applied to Sir John Macdonald's government to know if they could bring with them their peculiar institutions—for instance that with regard to their plurality of wives—Sir John said: If you want to come into our country you will have to abide by the laws of our country. When the Doukhobors were brought into this country it was under a special arrangement that was made by Mr. W. T. R. Preston. Mr. Sifton was Minister of the Interior. They had been trying for a good while to make a good showing with regard to immigration, and to get as large a number of people as possible to come into this country. I have no doubt that there were special inducements held out to the Doukhobors because when they had an interview with the present Minister of the Interior, they claimed that they had a right, under the agreement that was made with them, to live in communities, and that their special settlement duties could be performed in that way. They were also to be freed from the performance of military duty. I think all these things were a mistake. In addition to that instead of giving the immigration agents a commission on these people the government paid the amount directly to the Doukhobors, and they got $5 per head which amounted to something over $36,000. Then, when they arrived in this country we advanced them $20,000 to keep them from starving to death. We were told by the then deputy Minister of the Interior, who appeared before the Agricultural Committee many times that we had good security for the money that was loaned them, because we had a lien upon their land. But it turned out afterwards that they had no land, because they would not comply with the laws of the country. But, there were more serious objections than any of these. The head man of the Doukhobors, who was living in Russia, wrote to this country that any man who could not agree with his wife might put her away and take another wife to himself, but he must be careful not to marry her, because if he did they would put him in jail. We do not want any communities of that kind. We want people who will abide by our laws, or we do not want them at all. I am very strong on the point that we should insist upon any person being subject to our laws before he is allowed to put his foot on our soil.

Mr. EDWARDS. Do I understand that the first Doukhobors came here subsequent to 1896?

Mr. U. WILSON. Yes, when Mr. Sifton was Minister of the Interior, and Mr. W. T. R. Preston was commissioner or inspector of immigration in London.

Mr. OLIVER. In reply to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. A. Haggart), if he will turn to page 4, section 38, subsection (c). I think he will find a clause that will enable us to meet the case.

Mr. HERRON. Are the children and the descendents of the Doukhobors exempt from military service under that agreement? Does it extend from generation to generation?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, it does. It is not by a special agreement with the Doukhobors, however; it is, as I understand it, a law of Canada that a man who by reason of his religion objects to military service is not compelled to do military service. There was no exception made in the case of the Doukhobors, but they being a class of people who would be able to avail themselves of that privilege under our law we still arranged for them to be brought to this country. Everybody knows that the Quakers and the Mennonites are exempt from military service under the general law of Canada.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. There are a great many Mennonites in my constituency. I have about 1,000 voters of that class. We cannot adopt legislation at the present time for those who have come in the past, but we can take precautions in connection with those who are going to come in the future. I would like to ask the minister if there is anything in this Bill—I cannot see it—whereby these immigrants that come in future will have to take the oath of allegiance, and be required to take up arms and fight for our country. If they are going to receive the benefit why not make them take some of the responsibility? We give them all the cream and take up the burden ourselves. I do not think it is right. If they come to settle, and take part in the welfare of this country they should stand by the country from start to finish. In the time of prosperity they reap the benefit, while in the time of war and trouble they sit back in their chairs and say, fight your own battles. I do not think that is right. If they are to have a part in our inheritance, they should help us to defend it. I would like to ask the minister if there is anything in this Bill that will cover that point. Now, I wish to say a word in regard to the way in which immigrants are used when they arrive in Winnipeg. In that city we have a very fine immigrant shed, and when foreigners come there, it matters not where they come from, they are taken in hand by our immigrant agents, and are used, as the saying is like princes; but an Englishman, an Irishman, a Scotchman or a Canadian farmer who goes to Winnipeg is absolutely shut out of the immigrant shed, and is told to go and look after himself. I do not think this is right. I think it is our duty to look after our own first, and after the others afterwards. I have heard a great many complaints of this kind myself in western Canada.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot speak definitely upon the administration of the immigration hall in Winnipeg. I am glad to know that some of the immigrants who come are well treated, and I will credit that up to the department. As to the treatment accorded to British immigrants and Canadian immigrants, as far as Canadian immigrants are concerned, my belief is that very few of them would care to use the immigrant shed in Winnipeg or anywhere else.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. In some cases they do.

Mr. OLIVER. So far as British immigrants are concerned, I have been at some of the immigrant sheds in the northwest, and I have found British immigrants in them whenever I have gone, and my impression is that the advantage is given every time to the British immigrant.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE. Not in Winnipeg.

Mr. OLIVER. I think in Winnipeg, and I am sure in other places. In regard to the oath, my hon. friend is complaining of something that is a part of the general law of Canada. I am not undertaking to amend the general law of Canada in this Bill. It is not a matter which pertains to immigration; it is a matter which would be dealt with by an amendment to the general law, and my hon. friend would do well to bring his point to the attention of the Minister of Justice, in whose department the general law rests.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the Bill not govern all classes of immigrants? It it does there could be nothing simpler than to put a clause in this Bill saying that no man shall be allowed to come in and take part in Canadian citizenship unless he is prepared to take the oath of allegiance, and in case of necessity to perform service for the flag that protects him, just as the rest of us do.

Mr. OLIVER. So far as that is concerned, subsection (c) of section 38 gives ample authority to meet that or any other case that may arise. But unless and until it is the mind of the people of Canada, as expressed in their statutes, that every man who enjoys the benefits of citizenship in Canada should be required to fight for Canada when the occasion arises, I would feel rather doubtful about bringing it forward in an immigration Bill, which is of a subordinate character, undertaking as it were to dictate a policy in regard to a matter of general and vital interest to the country.

Mr. BRADBURY. I think that clause 38 gives the government all the powers that the government ought to have. I think that a man who comes in to take up land should be required to take the oath of allegiance, but I do not think that should be exacted from every man who comes to this country. I think it ought to be left entirely in the hands of the man himself. If you go to the United States or any other country in the world you can live there for fifty years and you do not need to take the oath of allegiance unless you want to, and I do not think it would be wise to put such a provision on our statute-books.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I quite agree with my hon. friend that every man who gets land in this country should take the oath of allegiance; but I would not go so far as to compel every man to fight for the country. I do not think that those who abstain for conscience sake should be compelled to fight. I think the minister would do well to inquire into the complaint made in regard to the different treatment of immigrants at Winnipeg. There are one or two points in the Bill that I would like to discuss. I think it is a very good Bill on the whole; but I think the inspection should be done on the other side instead of on this side.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. On both sides.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. On both sides if necessary. If gentlemen living in the west could see the heart-rending scenes that we in the east sometimes witness, when families are broken up on debarkation, they would feel as we do.

By section 2 clause (j) the cattle men are perhaps a little aggrieved. I would desire to insert the words: 'Not including a cattle man.' It now includes cattle men as immigrants. Most of them are Canadians and I do not think they should be brought under that section.

In clause 3 some of our friends ask that the words 'mentally' be added after the word 'otherwise.'

In clause 23 we claim passengers are deprived of the right of appealing to the courts until they are passed by the Canadian officials, unless they are Canadians. We claim there should be always some place to appeal to, that the judgment of the doctors should not be final. That clause might be amended especially in the case of British subjects of the Anglo-Saxon race. This depriving them of the right to apply for a writ of Habeas Corpus in a court is all wrong. In Great Britain a Canadian has the right to apply for a writ. I hope the minister will see his way clear to have the inspection made on the other side. It is pitiful to see the breaking up of a family. It may be that the youngest child is discovered to have trachoma, and the whole family is broken up and sent back. If the inspection were made in England or on the other side it would save all these heart rending scenes that we in the east are compelled to witness.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend has presented the views held by the steamship companies. When the Bill was first introduced it was first made public. We were then called upon by some of the steamship companies who made certain suggestions asking us to meet their views in certain particulars. I have certain amendments which I propose to offer at a later stage to meet some of the views of the shipping companies. There were some views that we did not feel able to meet, and these are the views my hon. friend has brought to the attention of the House.

While inspection at the other side would theoretically be the best as a matter of practice, so far we have found it impossible. First of all the government of Canada has no jurisdiction outside the boundaries of Canada, and an inspector stationed at the port of any other country would have no authority by which his inspection could be enforced. He would be standing on unsafe ground, and would not be in a position to do credit to the authority of the government to which he was responsible. Besides that, in a large majority of cases the immigrant family have left their homes far away from any port at which our inspector could be stationed. If the immigrant comes from Northern Europe, Scandinavia, for instance, he travels across the German ocean to a British port, then across England to an Atlantic port at which port we might station our inspector. But the family would already have been broken up, and if they are met by a Canadian inspector at a British port they are no better off than they would be at a Canadian port. The steamship company would be better off because they would save the transport to and from Canada, but the immigrant is no better off.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Americans have their officers in Montreal and inspect immigrants before going to the United States. Is that by private arrangement?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. LANCASTER. Why could not the same arrangement be made in Great Britain?

Mr. OLIVER. That would be no advantage to the immigrant.

Mr. U. WILSON. Would he not save his fare across the Atlantic?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. The inspection by United States officers at Montreal or Quebec is quite different from inspecting at the other side of the Atlantic. The United States do not inspect on the other side of the Atlantic. Their inspection at Montreal, or Quebec is by arrangement with our people for the advantage of the steamship companies, running to Canadian ports so that they shall not be at any disadvantage in the transaction of United States business. It is an arrangement of amity between the officials of the two countries in order to facilitate the business of Canadian steamships, and it does no injury to Canadian interests. It has no bearing on the question of inspection previous to the immigrants embarking on the other side of the Atlantic.

Mr. BRADBURY. Does it not seem to the hon. minister that if the government would put the onus on the shipping companies by compelling them to do the inspection and fining them whenever they bring in any undesirables, that would have a very strong preventative effect. I believe there is a law in the United States of that kind. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) mentioned that fact to-day.

Mr. OLIVER. That is exactly our policy. While we have not imposed an actual fine upon the steamship companies, our view is that if they know that their undesirables are subjected to a strict inspection at our ports, and that the company will be put to the double expense of taking them back again, they will take care not to bring out any. If that be not a sufficient deterrent, we will require to put on a fine. But what is absolutely wanted is a strict enforcement of the inspection law at the Canadian ports. By that means the responsibility is placed on the steamship companies, and these companies have been very much more careful during the past year or two than in previous years just because of that policy.

Mr. BRADBURY. If the penalty were made high enough, that would be a great safeguard. The mere fact of compelling the steamship companies to take these people back is not a sufficiently heavy penalty. There should be a heavy fine.

Mr. OLIVER. We find that the certainty that an undesirable immigrant will have to be taken back is a better deterrent than a heavy fine, because the company might be able to escape the fine. It is not the severity of the punishment, but the certainty, which is its best deterrent. If my hon. friend could only hear the roar which a steamship company puts up every time it has to take an immigrant back, he would think it was punished very severely.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. Will the hon. minister explain subsection 8 of clause 33?

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Might I suggest to the minister that he should take twelve or fifteen hours to look up that section and become thoroughly able to explain it. We have been here thirty hours continuously, and I arranged with the Minister of Finance that at 10 o'clock the committee would rise and report progress.

Mr. OLIVER. I am obliged to reply to the hon. member for Montreal, St. Lawrence division (Mr. Bickerdike) on the two or three points he mentioned.

Mr. CROSBY. I want to speak on the same line and the hon. minister can answer both at the same time. I was very pleased indeed that the hon. member for St. Lawrence (Mr. Bickerdike) brought up the matter regarding the deportation of undesirable immigrants. When an immigrant comes into Canada who is undesirable, the steamship company discover that they have the onus of deporting him, and they use all their influence to try and keep him in Canada. I know that in Halifax the companies have named a doctor to represent them and examine the immigrants with the doctor of the government, and the company's doctor will use all his influence in favour of his employer. Of course when two professional men get together and have a difference regarding an immigrant, it is reasonable to expect that they will give the benefit of the doubt to the stronger interest, and that would be in favour of keeping the immigrant in Canada and relieving the steamship companies of the cost of deporting him. In the past we had more cases of undesirables kept in the country than now, but still we have quite a number at present. When a large company, such as the Allan line or the Canadian Pacific railway, bring in a number of passengers, and these passengers come up for medical inspection, the government doctor passes along and sets a great many to one side. Then he goes over them a second time and finds there are a few he can allow to remain. He goes over them again and studies them some more and then, influenced by the doctor representing the steamship company, he goes over the lot a fourth time for the purpose of relieving as many as possible. I do not blame the government's officials, because they act conscientiously and always give the newcomer the benefit of the doubt. I followed very closely the argument of the hon. member for St. Lawrence division. I think it would be well if this inspection could be made on the other side so that when the immigrants arrive here, they would feel at home and we could keep them and take care of them. You can understand what a hardship it is when a family lands at Halifax and two or three do not pass the inspection and are sent back, and the others go on to the new land. When one portion of the family must go back to the old land and the other can take up homes in the new land, the division of that family is very sad. Therefore I would endorse the appeal made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence division, Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike).

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. It is now five minutes past ten o'clock. The Minister of the Interior will read in 'Hansard' what the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) and the hon. member for St. Lawrence division, Montreal (Mr. Bickerdike) has said, and he can reply when the Bill is next in committee.

Progress reported.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. What business to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. We shall continue our work of completing the Interim Supply Bill, and then the Minister of the Interior will resume his Bill.

Motion agreed to and House adjourned at 10.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 16, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 165) for the relief of Elmore Walker Scott.—Mr. Carvell.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER read a message from His Excellency the Governor General as follows:

Ottawa, March 16, 1910.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Mr. Justice Girouard, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-morrow at 3.30 o'clock, for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
C. J. JONES.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER TRANSMISSION COMPANY.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I beg to lay upon the table of the House an amended petition of the St. Lawrence Power Company, Limited, to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, for permission to erect the structures therein described in the town of Mille Roches, Ontario. This relates to the application for the development of power at the Long Sault rapids. Also, a description of the works proposed by the St. Lawrence Power Company, Limited at the Long Sault rapids in the St. Lawrence near the boundary line, which is the same thing. Also, the amended plans of the company; also, five plans connected with the original project; also, blue prints showing the contour along the north shore of the river; also, some additional plans. I think, Mr. Speaker, as I propose to present a copy of the report of the engineers, with your permission and that of the House, it might be well to read it, so that it may appear in the 'Hansard' for the information of hon. members:

No. 344395.

Ottawa, January 13, 1910.

Hon. William Pugsley,
Minister of Public Works,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—We have the honour to report in regard to the amended petition of the St. Lawrence Power Company, Limited, to His Excellency the Governor in Council, for permission to erect certain dams in the St. Lawrence river, as follows:—

On December 15, 1908, we reported on the facts as contained in the application of the company at that time. The objections found against the original plan have, in a large measure been remedied by the amended proposition. The integrity of the Cornwall canal has been preserved. No detail plans have been submitted showing the style of dam proposed to be erected; and this, of course, will have to be done before the project could be allowed to be entered upon. An approximate computation of the horse-power capable of being developed at the site of the proposed dams is about six hundred thousand. The creation of such an enormous quantity of power will be of the highest importance to the district in question. Experience has shown us that in the proximity of such a large development of power, great industries are created and that towns and cities grow up. We are convinced that the project is one worthy of the most serious consideration at the hands of the government.

The plans contemplate the construction of a lock in the American channel, and the objections which were taken against the former proposition apply with equal force to the present one, viz.: the approach channel to the lock, as it now exists, is a tortuous one, with the swift current, and is not, in our opinion, a satisfactory channel. It is our opinion, however, that a single lock about one thousand feet long between hollow quoins, eighty-five feet wide, with twenty-five feet of water on the sill, should be built on the Canadian side, so as to duplicate the Cornwall canal. We believe that if this lock is constructed on satisfactory lines, it will, to a considerable extent, eliminate any objections the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company might reasonably have in being interfered with in their descent of the Long Sault rapids. It is also necessary that there should be built a timber slide, and all necessary piers and booms for the protection of the lumber industry and the free use of the navigation of the river for that purpose.

The location and position of the power-house and dam on the Canadian side would have to be adjusted, when the plans are worked out in detail. We have satisfied ourselves that the objections which we formulated, with regard to the possible danger in having such a large dam in a river like the St. Lawrence, are obviated by the amended plan.

The effect of the board ice and frazil, upon which we laid considerable stress in our former report, we are convinced need not be seriously considered, for the reason that the company is willing to enter into an undertaking to not permit board ice to form at the head of the dam. They are willing to supply ice-breakers to prevent such a possibility.

The plans show a small percentage of development on the Canadian side, and the geographical conditions are such that it will be somewhat difficult to increase the power plant on the Canadian side to the fifty per cent which we feel should be preserved for the use of Canada. This difficulty, however, may be obviated by the company undertaking to hold in readiness fifty per cent of the total power developed in the river available for Canadian consumption. No doubt, if the project goes through and the working plans are submitted, a more equitable division of the power plants can be worked out.

We desire to reiterate the necessity of a complete agreement on behalf of the governments of Canada and the United States as to the supervision and control of the plans, specification, and every detail of the works in question. The subsequent operation in so far as the level of the water in the river is concerned, and the regulation of the flow, should in like manner be under the joint supervision of an officer from both governments.

A question has been propounded to us as to what effect the construction of such dams as are proposed would likely have upon the elevation of the water in the harbour of Montreal. We agree that they would have no effect whatever.

It must be understood that the present report does not attempt to deal with the sites selected for the several dams or power-houses, or other works connected with the scheme. All such matters are to be determined later should the general scheme be approved of by the government.

We are, Sir,
Your obedient servants,

(Sgd.) M. J. BUTLER,
Chief Engineer, Railways and Canals.
(Sgd.) EUGENE D. LAFLEUR,
Chief Engineer, Public Works.
(Sgd.) WM. P. ANDERSON,
Chief Engineer, Marine and Fisheries.

As these plans were in the possession of Mr. Stewart, secretary of the Canadian branch of the International Waterways Commission, I would like it understood that they are not placed in the custody of the House, but they will be returned to the department after hon. gentlemen have had full opportunity to examine them.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would like to ask the minister to furnish the original report of the engineers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will be glad to make inquiries for that, and will get it. I may say that one difficulty I had in getting the plans, or rather the report, was that they were left with Mr. Butler, the late deputy minister, and owing to his having resigned, and the Minister of Railways and Canals being away, I was not able to get all the papers. But I have no doubt I will be able to get the original report.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I thought they were all in the hands of the International Waterways Commission.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Only the last plans. The original report, I presume, would be in the Railway Department.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works what personal plan he has with regard to this Bill?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Minister of Public Works has no plans with regard to the Bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am glad to hear it, because, judging by what he said the other night, he has some plan which we would like to have divulged.

Mr. BRODER. Were those plans got up by the engineers of the department, or by some one else?

Mr. PUGSLEY. These were plans submitted by the company

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if these are blue prints? If they are, I cannot see why additional copies cannot be obtained by the secretary of the Waterways Commission, and these should remain in the custody of the House for discussion of this matter. If they are originals, we can get blue prints made of them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. These plans will remain here just as long as is necessary for discussion, probably until the close of the session. There is no objection, I think, to their remaining here.

QUESTIONS.

INDEMNITY TO CANADIAN VETERANS.

Mr. PAPINEAU:

Has the government received a request for indemnity on behalf of the Canadian veterans for services rendered in 1866 and 1870? If so, has the government arrived at any decision in the matter?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. There have been such requests, but no decision has been reached.

FRONTIER QUARANTINE INSPECTORS.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

Was there any correspondence when appointing the following frontier quarantine inspectors: Dr. Bradford, Dr. Carter, Dr. Duncan, Dr. Thornton, Dr. Wallace, Dr. Nay, Dr. McKenty, Dr. Little, Dr. Henderson and Dr. Scott? If so, how many letters were sent and how many received by the department?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER. Yes. Sent sixteen letters and seventeen telegrams; received, nine letters and seven telegrams.

These messages were dealing with the appointments and were not such as are usually brought down to the House.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—THE LUMSDEN COMMITTEE.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak to a question of privilege. On Friday last the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), the chairman of the Lumsden Committee, speaking in reply to a complaint made by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), as to the omission of certain words from the second report of the Lumsden Committee, said:

The report was prepared by the clerk of the committee, and was submitted to the committee, and nobody objected. I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by saying that the chairman omitted any words at all. I submitted the report which was prepared by the clerk, according to the order of the House, which says that the committee shall report to the House from time to time.

The printed minutes of the committee show that on the 22nd February last the following resolution was carried:

Mr. Lennox moved that committee recommend that their proceedings and the evidence taken by them be printed and reported to the House from day to day, which was agreed to.

The committee sat on the following day, the 23rd February, and at that meeting the minutes of the previous day were read, including the resolution I have just read. These minutes were duly confirmed, as appears by the printed evidence on page 41, and these minutes were accordingly attested as being correct by Walter Todd, clerk of the committee and marked 'approved' over the signature 'Victor Geoffrion, Chairman,' which will be found in the printed proceedings at page 8. I call to the attention of the House the fact that there was no chance for any misconception or mistake in this matter. I do so because it is important to know how this extraordinary omission occurred, an omission very embarrassing to some members, of the House. On the occasion when I moved this resolution the attention of the chairman was specifically directed to it. I mean by that, Mr. Speaker, that it was not one of those resolutions that go through without the attention of the chairman, but his attention was specifically directed to the resolution at the time of its going through, and that is evidenced by the fact that he says 'I shall have to be empowered by the House to have it done.' Dealing with this in a way which substantially amounts to practically the second reading of my resolution, although not, on the second occasion, in the exact words, I say in reply:

My motion is that the evidence be printed and reported day by day.

Not only was the attention of the chairman evidently directly challenged by the motion that was made, but the attention of the clerk was specifically directed to it. I say that, because, as the members of the committee were leaving, the clerk came to me and said: 'Do you really mean reported as well as printed from day to day'? To which I replied: 'I mean every word of it; I mean it very much; see that you get it just as I put it'. I may say that I did so far the reason that I had some little experience upon committees of this kind, and I had considerable experience as to the difficulties that confront us in the Public Accounts Committee where, when the ruling is, in the opinion of the minority, unjust, we are unable to bring the matter into the light of day in the House because the majority refuse to report to the House. Therefore, advisedly, and I think, wisely, I had taken the precaution of preparing a resolution which covered the whole ground that the proceedings should be printed from day to day, and that they should be reported to the House from day to day, so that we would have an opportunity of, to some extent, controlling the action of the committee. The result of it is this, as I submit to the House, that it was manifestly impossible for the clerk inadvertently to omit the important words: reported to the House,' and equally impossible, as I know the clerk, for him to be dishonest. We are, therefore, confronted by an important inquiry, a very exceptional inquiry, one that I am glad to say has not often presented itself to this House, that is how this peculiar blunder, if you call it a blunder, occurred, by whose command, or at whose instance, or instigation, this important provision, calculated to enable us to carry on our proceedings more satisfactorily, and calculated to enable the people to know just what was being done was left out, and how it is that our intention should have been so speedily, and for the time being, so effectively blocked. The public, Mr. Speaker, is interested in this. It goes to a question which has come up in this House very frequently during recent years, namely, the procedure for getting these matters before the public, and letting the people know what is being done. It is important to the public, and it is important to me personally, and to the other members of the minority of the committee, because, by reason of what was done our way is blocked for the time being and certain important incidents that have occurred in that committee, we have not been able to discuss because there is no report before the House. Our way is barred, but I trust to effectively urge on the Prime Minister that it shall be barred no longer, and that an opportunity shall be afforded to the minority to present certain matters to this House, and to the people. Resuming the thread of the incidents—in professed pursuance of the action of the committee which provided that the proceedings should be reported from day to day to the House, there was a report presented by the committee and passed by the House in these words:

Your committee recommend that their proceedings and any evidence taken by them be printed from day to day for use of the members of the committee and that rule 72 be suspended in reference thereto.

Two important changes are made in that report. First, it entirely omits the important provision that the proceedings are to be reported to the House from day to day, and next, they have incorporated in it this qualification: That the printing is to be done for the use of the members of the committee, and not for the use of the members of the House. And so, if this plan was carried out in the way suggested the effect would be that the resolution is absolutely useless, because the committee already had power to report from time to time as they saw fit. Of course, the report provided for the printing of the proceedings and evidence from day to day, but only for the use of the members of the committee, and that does not amount to anything, because we already had better than that in the typewritten copy of the proceedings to hand every morning of what took place the day before. It does, Mr. Speaker, suggest some puzzling thoughts as to why and how this thing was done. I shall not at the moment say what my idea of it is, because the chairman of the committee will no doubt make a statement which I hope will be more satisfactory than his statement of the other day. I shall feel it my duty to analyse his former statement. The chairman said:

The report was submitted to the committee and nobody objected.

Surely this experienced chairman, the chairman of the Hodgins committee as well, a gentleman whom I think I can say without offence, but rather in compliment, above all other of their supporters the government selected for offices of this kind; surely he has not so far lost his head as well as his candour as to say that such is the fact. The facts are: At one o'clock in the afternoon the resolution was moved and the committee dispersed. At three o'clock in the afternoon the report is presented to the House. Every hon. member of the House had the right to presume, I certainly presumed that once the report was brought in it was in harmony with the action of the committee. But that has not turned out to be so. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Geoffrion) seriously want to pro-pound to this House that the report was presented to the members of the committee and was not objected to? There is not one word of foundation in fact for that statement; it is absolutely incorrect. It was never submitted at any time to the members of the committee; but, of course, it is most important to establish that it was, because if it were it would to some extent estop us from complaining. Now, the second defence of the chairman of the committee is the statement that the report was prepared by the clerk. What does the hon. gentleman mean by saying that the report was prepared by the clerk? Of course, the report of the committee is always prepared by the clerk, but does he mean by that, that the clerk is responsible for the mutilation of this report? I venture to say that I refuse to believe it. Mr. Todd is an experienced, an efficient and painstaking official as everybody in this House knows. Could he make a mistake under the circumstances? Let us see. With the resolution before him, within probably half an hour after it was read in the committee, twice read in his presence, impressed upon him by the subsequent conversation, a mistake on the part of the clerk is wholly inconceivable, and treachery on his part is to my mind equally inconceivable. If the chairman of the committee wishes to put it otherwise I will give him an opportunity now. If he does not feel that he has to shoulder not only the theoretic responsibility for this improper report by which the House was misled, but the actual responsibility as well, I will challenge him to get up in his place now and say that he had no hand in guiding the wording of that report. The third defence of the chairman of the committee is—and this is very innocent in this gentleman who has had so little experience in matters of this kind—his third defence is to say:

> I do not know what the hon. gentleman means by saying that the chairman omitted any word at all.

He does not know—what marvellous innocence—he does not know what was meant by the leader of the opposition. I hope he has had time for reflection, and knows now. He does not know: I have endeavoured to make my meaning reasonably undisguised. What I mean to-day is that a most unprecedented omission has occurred in this report, and if the chairman made it accidentally he should have detected it the next day, when the wording of my resolution was read in his presence. What I mean is this: that when the matter was brought to the attention of the chairman, the other day it was time for him to get busy, and I mean that he shall get busy now. What I mean to say, just as emphatically, though I hope moderately, as I can, is that if this matter is not adjusted now the government will have to hear something more about it—we will have something more to say, and it will be said. One other point. I admit that the chairman had not much time for thought. The complaint was presented unexpectedly to him, and he wound up in this way:

> I submitted the report, which was prepared by the clerk according to the order of the House, which says that the committee shall report to the House from time to time.

Here is the clerk again. We have, I think, exonerated the clerk pretty effectually. I think the hon. gentleman has left it so that there is no loophole in that direction. The First Minister suggested the other day that there may have been a misprint in the report. I had examined the records, and I knew that there was no mistake in the printing, so that that avenue of escape is not open. The chairman says that the report was prepared by the clerk according to the order of the House. Mr. Speaker, I will ask you if in your experience you have ever known such an extraordinary statement as this. I thought the report was to be prepared according to the resolution which I submitted, and which was carried unanimously by the committee. Does the hon. gentleman mean that what he thought he was bringing into the House was an application of the House of Commons to authorize that which the House had authorized to be done?—because that is what he would have us understand if he thought he was presenting a report which was prepared according to the order of the House. I think he will hardly argue that that is a position which he can very successfully take. The only other alternative is that the chairman, a gentleman of distinguished ability, and of special training in matters of this kind, forgets within two hours all about the resolution which was passed in his presence, which he declared carried, to which he had his attention specifically called, and when he prepares the report absolutely omits practically all the provisions that were to have been covered by the report, all the ground practically that was to be covered by that report. Referring to the order of the House, the hon. gentleman says:

> Prepared by the clerk according to the order of the House, which says that the committee shall report to the House from time to time.

The order of the House does not say anything of the kind. My resolution was that the committee should report from day to day, but the order of the House is 'that the committee shall be appointed to investigate this matter, and that it shall have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses on oath, and report from time to time.' But the hon. gentleman, the other day, wanted us to understand that he thought it was not necessary to include the exact terms of my resolution, inasmuch as we were already ordered by the House to report from time to time; in other words, that the order of reference was mandatory that the committee should report from time to time. If the hon. gentleman means that he thought it was mandatory and obligatory, why has he not reported accordingly? That is a cogent and important question, particularly so in face of the fact that we have an event in that committee which is unprecedented in the annals of the Dominion parliament—an action by which three members of the committee have been practically compelled to retire from its deliberations; and yet there is absolute silence from that day to this, although the committee meet from day to day, and although I have reason to believe that the question has been considered. Yes, and I have reason to believe that the First Minister has been consulted as to whether there should be a report or not; and he can say I am wrong if he choses to say so. I have reason to believe that the First Minister has been consulted as to whether this committee should proceed practically in the dark with only members.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, in the dark practically—a committee which is not constituted according to the order of this House; a committee proceeding as it was never intended to do by the order of this House; and I ask the chairman of this committee if he thought that order of reference meant that we were to report from day to day, why is it that he has been contented with perambulating backwards and forwards to interview the First Minister instead of reporting to the House?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has brought up this question as a matter of privilege; but in my humble judgment he has not uttered a single word which has any reference to a matter of privilege. My hon. friend complains that the full orders of the committee have not been reported to the House. On the 22nd of last month Mr. Clarke, of Essex, for the chairman, brought in this report:

Mr. Clarke (Essex), from the special committee appointed to investigate the charges and allegations made by Hugh D. Lumsden regarding a portion of the engineering staff of the National Transcontinental Railway, presented the second report of the said committee, which is as follows:—

Your committee recommend that their proceedings and any evidence taken by them be printed from day to day, for the use of the committee, and that rule 72 be suspended in reference thereto.

Subsequently:

On motion of Mr. Clarke (Essex), the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate the charges and allegations made by Hugh D. Lumsden, presented this day, was concurred in.

I do not know whether my hon. friend was present in the House on that day, and heard the report. My impression is that he was. If he was in the House at that time, his attention was not called to the fact that the report did not, as he states now, contain a true statement of the proceedings of the committee. If that be so my hon. friend made a mistake in not giving to the report the attention which he might have done. If he is mistaken other members may have been mistaken also. My hon. friend charges the chairman of the committee by insinuation with having voluntarily deceived the committee. My hon. friend has no reason to make any such insinuation. If my hon. friend when the report was twice read to the House on Friday last did not perceive the mistake which he says was in the report, it is quite possible that the acting chairman, my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. A. H. Clarke) who brought in the report may also have overlooked the same mistake. I have only to appeal to the fairness of every member of this House. Everybody knows that the proceedings of the committee are prepared from day to day by the clerk of a committee and brought to the chairman, and as a rule the chairman signs simply on the statement of the officer that the report is correct without looking at it farther. If any one is guilty many of us are guilty, I cannot say that I have not been guilty as I have been chairman of a committee, and that is what I have done. I have taken the word of the clerk that it was all right, and presented the report accordingly. My hon. friend says the report is not a true statement of the proceedings that took place in the committee. That is possible. I do not say it is not so. I assume, since my hon. friend says so, that that was the case, but I have to say to my hon. friend if the report of the committee is not a true statement of the facts that took place in the committee on that day, then what is there before the House to-day, but that report of the committee? We must assume that this report is correct. It is no use for my hon. friend to say on the floor of this House that the report is not correct, and not a true statement of the proceedings of the committee on that day.

How can we change it or alter it, and if there has been a mistake how can we amend it? The remedy of my hon. friend is to go before the committee, there is the place where he should address himself, and if there has been, as I understand, a mistake made somewhere, there the mistake can be corrected. But I ask my hon. friend and every member of this House how will the House undertake to amend this report, which is now here, and which has been adopted? How will any member say the report is not correct, and ought to be amended accordingly? There is only one thing for my hon. friend to do, that is to go before the committee, and there have the statement corrected. My hon. friend has no confidence in the committee; I understand he has withdrawn from it, and I understand he says the committee is proceeding in the dark. If the committee is proceeding in the dark, according to common report, it is because my hon. friend refuses to give it the benefit of his light. The committee would have the full light upon it if my hon. friend would be present, but he has chosen for some reason or other to withdraw from the committee, if I am correctly informed. But even although he has chosen to withdraw from the committee, I see no reason why he should not go back into it. If he cannot go as a member of the committee he can as a member of the House, and he has only to call the attention of the chairman or members of the committee, and to show them that the report is incorrect to have it corrected, and he would have satisfaction. If the statement is correct that he made a certain motion which should have been reported, and has not been reported I would be the very first to say to my hon. friend that he ought to have his rights properly placed before the House. But I appeal to his sense of justice and fairness, and I am sure he will agree that at this moment this House is powerless to redress the grievance of which he complains. How can we change the report of the committee? What have we before us to do so? He will agree that the only thing for him to do is to go before the committee, and I am satisfied he will have every satisfaction there. Perhaps I have no right, no reason, no authority to offer any advice to my hon. friend, but I may say to him that I hope he will bear with me. I have a high idea of his sense of honour and justice, but is he the only man who has a right sense of honour and justice in this House? There are others besides him, and I believe that when such a clear fact is brought to the attention of the committee as he states, that is that he made a motion, that the motion should have been included in the report, and was not included in the report, he is entitled to have the correction made. In so saying I have no desire to throw blame on anybody. My hon. friend was altogether unwarranted not in the statement, because he made no statement, but in the insinuations which he made against the chairman of the committee. He stated that Mr. Todd, the clerk of the committee, is an experienced and faithful officer of this House. No one denies that, Mr. Todd is a faithful and experienced officer of this House. But by making that statement my hon. friend made an insinuation against the chairman, and I have only to say that the chairman of the committee is an experienced and faithful member of this House. My hon. friend may depend on his honour to do my hon. friend every justice, and all the justice to which he is entitled.

Mr. BARKER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER. I have no objection to a question of privilege being raised and an explanation given on the other side, but as there is nothing before the House, I am wondering where the debate will lead us. There is nothing before the House, and it is not customary to debate a question of privilege. The House will realize that there should be something before the Chair.

Mr. BARKER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. In view of what occurred the other day in the discussion of this question, I would like to know how far this debate is to be permitted to go. If my hon. friend is to be allowed to speak, and no one on this side is to be allowed later on I would like to know it.

Mr. SPEAKER. My idea at present is that it cannot be continued because there is nothing before the Chair.

Mr. J. D. REID. Are the government taking the stand that they will not allow——

Mr. SPEAKER. I am not consulting the government, I am consulting the practice of the House that there must be something before the Chair.

Mr. J. D. REID. Mr. Speaker——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

SUPPLY—THE LUMSDEN COMMITTEE.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. S. BARKER (East Hamilton). I intend to say but a very few words upon the subject which has just been engaging the attention of the House. I am awaiting and I hope before long to have an opportunity to deal with all the proceedings of the committee while I remained a member of it. The right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) takes two positions here. One is that it is the duty of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) to go before the committee, and get this report rectified; the other is that there is no question of privilege. I have very great respect for the opinion of the right hon. gentleman in a matter of that kind, but feeling inclined myself to rise to the question of privilege, I certainly think that my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) was within his rights in raising the question in that way, and I shall state why. The right hon. gentleman first says it was the duty of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to get this rectified. What did he do? He came here before the House, the House to which that report was made, and he complained. What was the result? Instead of any attention being paid to that complaint made properly here in the House, the committee have been going on for about twelve days conducting this investigation, and not making a single report. Why is that? There is no question about the facts. The resolution moved in committee was not a verbal one, and it is printed in the minutes of the committee exactly as my hon. friend from Simcoe has said.

Mr. LENNOX. And reported.

Mr. BARKER. And reported. Every member of the House has got it. There is no question whatever as to what the resolution was. But the chairman of the committee, instead of reporting, according to the resolution in his hand, and the evidence before the committee, reported otherwise. It seems to me that the proper place to bring that matter up is in the House, and when it was brought to the attention of the right hon. gentleman, it was his duty to tell the chairman of that committee to report properly. What did he do? Instead of instructing the chairman to report properly, he appears to have had conferences with him, the result of which is that no report has been made. There is my answer to the right hon. gentleman. He does not deny what my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) has said, he does not deny that he was in consultation with the chairman who made this erroneous report; and instead of telling the chairman to correct his report and present a report to the House in accord with the evidence, he apparently advised him to make no report.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I never saw the chairman until last evening, and the result of my conversation with him was that the matter was one for the committee to take up and not the House.

Mr. BARKER. Whether a conference or a consultation——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I said I had no conference with the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BARKER. Probably it was with somebody else, and I do not care so much about that. The other point made is that this is not a question of privilege. Why the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) and myself withdrew from that committee because we considered that we were rendered useless by the proceedings of the majority, and we were told at the time by the other members of that committee that we had no power to legally withdraw from it. And we have been waiting for twelve days to have a proper report brought in so that we might state to the House our true position and be relieved from our duties as members of that committee. That, it seems to me, is a question of privilege. It is a question affecting myself and my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr Lennox). We consider that we were fully justified in withdrawing from that committee, but we are not able to get a formal, legal, discharge because there is apparently a deliberate design not to report and thus prevent our bringing up the question. If that be not a question of privilege, I do not know what is. The committee have suddenly become very slow in making their reports. Prior to our withdrawal we had reports from that committee, some two or three of them; but since we retired, we have not had a word. The committee, I am told, have engaged another counsel After we left, they passed a resolution nominating a certain counsel to prosecute this inquiry against the government. These four supporters of the government, who were alone on that committee, carried a resolution to appoint a counsel to conduct the prosecution against their own friends. That gentleman refused and I am told they then appointed another counsel, and all this is done without a word to this House. I appeal, Mr. Speaker, to your sense of fair play whether that is treating the House properly. Does the right hon. gentleman think it is right or proper that these gentlemen, a section of the committee, should appoint counsel, and after the one they first called on refused to accept a retainer that then they should appoint another, and this House be given no opportunity to know anything about it for twelve days afterwards.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). Both my hon. friends opposite know very well that it is entirely out of order to discuss the proceedings of any committee before that committee has reported. I do not think it is necessary, for the purpose of this discussion, to go into the proceedings of that committee. Both my hon. friends have been in the unfortunate position, ever since this matter came up this year, of looking for a grievance and trying very hard to find one, and when they could not find a grievance, they invented one. They now complain because the committee sits every day and they do not attend its meetings. It is unfortunate that the committee should have to do its work without the assistance of these hon. gentlemen, but that is not the fault of the committee. The committee is bound to carry out the mandate of this House. This House directed it to proceed with an inquiry into this matter and the committee is endeavouring to do that—that is the members of it who are attempting to carry out their duties. But these hon. gentlemen opposite have refused to carry out the instructions of this House and they do this without the permission of this House. If they do not want to carry out the instructions of this House, they should have applied to the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, to be relieved of the task assigned to them. My hon. friends are aching for an opportunity to come before this House and have a debate but they have not taken the proper way. They know that they are in contempt of the House by their refusal to attend the meetings of the committee. They know that they should by resolution have asked the permission of the House to withdraw from the committee and be relieved of the duties which they had undertaken to do. As regards the motion of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), he knows that it was purely a catch motion. Unfortunately for him, he did not read it over himself. The proceedings of the committee, which are in his own possession, show that he has given three different versions of what he wanted the committee to do. First he moved that the proceedings of the committee and the evidence should be printed and reported to the House from day to day. As was pointed out, that could not, as a matter of fact be done. He knew very well, when he made the motion, that it could not be carried into effect. The chairman said that the committee would be required to be empowered by the House to have that done. Whereupon the hon. gentleman gave another and a different version of his motion. He said that his motion was not that the proceedings be reported to the House, but that the evidence be printed and reported from day to day. So that he gave a second version of what he meant and ultimately there appeared in the minutes a third statement. Then the clerk of the committee prepared the report, so that we have four versions of what the hon. gentleman wants to have done. Apparently the hon. gentleman did not know what he wanted.

Mr. STAPLES. Was the motion not in writing?

Mr. MACDONALD. He was careful not to read the motion, if it was in writing.

Mr. LENNOX. I did read it.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am reading from the stenographic report of the proceedings which is also in the hon. gentleman's hands. According to that report the hon. gentleman gave two different versions of his motion, and on being interrogated the second time, he narrowed his request down so as to mean simply that the evidence be reported to the House from day to day, which is always done, when it is printed. My hon. friend knows that up to date the committee had not been able to get from the printers a single piece of printed evidence.

Mr. LENNOX. There are five separate volumes of evidence actually printed, and I have them in my possession.

Mr. MACDONALD. If my hon. friend has got them, I have not got them, as a member of the committee. Here are my hon. friends lamenting about the great lack of opportunity they have had to do things, and they have got something which I, as a member of the committee, have not got. These gentlemen run away from their duty to attend the committee, and now they come here and give different versions of the proceedings. They refuse to perform their duties, and yet they come here and make complaints of this kind. I say my hon. friend has been playing the baby act in this business from the beginning, his attitude here is playing the baby again today. The evidence here to which he refers shows that. My hon. friend did not manfully and above-board stand up and make the motion that he is trying to show should be presented in this House. But the motion he did make was one which no one had any objection to, that is the one which was reported to the House, that the evidence should be printed and reported to the House day by day. Now my hon. friend from Hamilton alleges that some high principle is being subverted, and, therefore, his conscience would not permit him to attend this committee and take part in its deliberations. All I can say is that the hon. member for Hamilton will search in vain the history of this parliament, or of any colonial parliament, or the English parliament, for any precedent where the minority of a committee were given the control of the appointment of the counsel to control the proceedings. The assertion of this principle, which is made by my hon. friends for the first time in the history of this country, is simply put forward by them to enable them to find a grievance which did not exist, and to afford them an opportunity of making an exit from the committee for other reasons than the reasons they have given.

Mr. T. W. CROTHERS (West Elgin). I do not understand that this is the proper time to discuss our reasons for leaving that committee, as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) just now began to discuss them. The time will come when it will be proper to discuss our reasons, and then we shall be fully prepared to meet the statements made by that hon. gentleman, or any other member of that committee. Early last week the attention of this House was called to the fact that the report presented on the 22nd of February was not accurate, and on that occasion it was admitted by all parties concerned, that it was not accurate. Now the hon. member for Pictou, sitting as a member of that committee, knows full well that the motion made by my hon. friend from Simcoe was in writing.

Mr. MACDONALD. Not at all.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, it was.

Mr. MACDONALD. It may be he suppressed it; I never saw it.

Mr. CROTHERS. The member for Pictou was sitting at the table, the motion was put in in writing, it was read by the chairman of the committee, and carried in the presence of the member for Pictou.

Mr. MACDONALD. The records do not show it.

Mr. CROTHERS. I have the records here, and they do show it, on page 8 of this report. I may say, in passing, that a copy of this report as printed from day to day, is sent through the post office to each member of that committee, and it is remarkable that my hon. friend from Pictou has not received a copy of it from day to day, as the rest of us have. On page 8 of the report it is recorded that a motion was made by my hon. friend from Simcoe in these words:

Mr. Lennox moved that the committee recommend that their proceedings, and the evidence taken by them, be printed, and reported to the House from day to day, which was agreed to.

I repeat that the motion was in writing, it was read by the chairman of the committee, who declared it was carried, no one dissenting.

Mr. GEOFFRION. Allow me to interrupt the hon. member. He probably does not remember that the motion was not read by the chairman at all. There was a motion read by the chairman, but I cannot remember whether it was written or not. But I know a motion was made, and the chairman said simply: 'You have heard the motion; are you in favour of it?'

Mr. CROTHERS. My hon. friend, the chairman of the committee, having made a statement, of course it would be improper for me to contradict it; I am bound under the rules of the House to accept it. But I have stated what occurred. The House has heard his statement and it has heard mine, and I am in the judgment of the House. However, this matter was before this House early last week. My hon. friend, who is the chairman of that committee, and my hon. friend from Pictou, who is a member of it, have had an opportunity of ascertaining since whether that motion was in writing or not, and of examining the contents of it, if it was in writing. I have no doubt whatever that one of two things happened: If they have forgotten the contents of that motion, I have no doubt they have since examined it in the clerk's hands, and know what it contains; or else they did not find it necessary to examine it because they knew its contents without examining it. The question is as to whether the report made by the chairman of that committee was an accurate report; that is a very serious matter. It is admitted now that it was inaccurate. The Prime Minister says that because that report went through this House, as such reports generally do, without any opportunity of reading them, without half the members of the House hearing them, therefore we are bound by it for all time to come. My hon. friends, including the Prime Minister, knew early last week that the report presented to this House on the 22nd of February was an inaccurate report. Their attention was called to the fact that the motion of the committee required that the proceedings should be, not only printed, but reported to this House day by day, they found that out early last week, if they had overlooked it before. The question naturally arises why have they not, since their attention was called to it, since they admit that the motion carried in the committee required them to report from day to day — why have they not since reported from day to day? We have had the spectacle this afternoon of my hon. friend from Simcoe challenging the chairman of that committee to say whether or not he had had any hand in mutilating that report, and we find the chairman of the committee sitting tight. Further, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, when charged this afternoon with having been consulted by the chairman of that committee, said that he had not seen the chairman until last night, but he did not deny that he had seen other members of that committee. The Prime Minister knew early last week that the report brought into this House on the 22nd of February was an inaccurate one, because the charge was made here in his presence and admitted, all round. So the Prime Minister, since early last week, has known that it was the duty of this committee to report to this House from day to day.

Knowing that, we have the result that the report has not been made from day to day. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) told us yesterday that nobody controlled this House——

Mr. FIELDING. Hear, hear.

Mr. CROTHERS. That we were a free parliament. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have sat in this House long enough to know that such is not the case. I have seen the Prime Minister hold up his finger time after time, and his followers obey. Every member of this House knows that all the First Minister required to do, when he ascertained that the report presented to this House was inaccurate, admittedly so, was to say to the chairman of the committee: It is your duty, since your attention has been called to it, since it was the instruction of the committee, according to the resolution of the hon. member for Simcoe, to report from day to day, even though you misapprehended it, even though you were labouring under a mistake even though you did not realize at the time that the motion carried, that it required you not only to print, but report the proceedings from day to day, to report to the House from day to day as instructed by the resolution. It is clearly your duty not only to the members of the committee, but to parliament. But, notwithstanding what was said by the hon. Minister of Finance, it is evident that the Prime Minister does control this House, and the committees of this House when he desires to do so. He has been consulted by members of the committee. Why is it that we have not had reports presented, in order to give the three gentlemen who retired from that committee an opportunity of explaining why they retired? I want to ask the Prime Minister when we may expect to get an opportunity, on the report of this committee, for these three gentlemen to explain the reasons why they left that committee, and I will sit down to give the right hon. gentleman an opportunity to answer that question. The Prime Minister does not propose to answer that question. In the face of these facts, when I give him the opportunity to say whether or not this House is to have the resolution moved by my hon. friend from South Simcoe carried into effect, he sits tight to his seat. He knows that would permit us to bring the report into this House to-morrow, and if the report is brought to this House, and laid on the table, these three members of the committee who retired will have an opportunity in the face of this House, and country to make their statement as to why they retired. I ask the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) when that opportunity will be afforded?

Mr. MACDONALD. Why did you not take it before?

Mr. CROTHERS. We might have put a notice of motion on the order paper, but it would not have been reached until the end of the session, and my hon. friend knows that very well. Can he suggest any reason why this report is not brought down, if it be not to deprive us of the opportunity of giving the people of this country the reason why these three gentlemen left the committee? I repeat the time will come. We will take good care that the members of this House, and the people of this country know just why we retired from that committee, and I have no doubt whatever that when these reasons are given, they will meet with the approbation of every intelligent member of this House, and of the good citizens of this country.

Mr. GEOFFRION. The hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), a few minutes ago, quoted a statement of mine to the effect that the clerk had prepared the report. I want it understood that I do not wish to shield myself behind anybody. I take the responsibility of my acts as chairman of the committee, and I know that if the clerk made a mistake I should have to take the responsibility myself. He is an intelligent and efficient man, and it was my duty if an error was made to see that it was corrected. Some insinuations have been made with regard to myself, but if there is an hon. gentleman in this House who knows that these insinuations are false it is the hon. member for South Simcoe. He will remember, and he will not deny that when that motion was put by himself —perhaps some members of the committee may not recall it—it was at the very last minute when the committee was rising, and everybody was on his feet. Then, the hon. member for South Simcoe submitted the motion. I cannot remember whether it was in writing or not, but I know he read or recited it. Nobody paid any attention to it, but this dialogue passed between the chairman and the member for South Simcoe.

Mr. LENNOX. I move that our proceedings and the evidence be printed and reported to the House day by day.

The CHAIRMAN. Reported to the House day by day, that means at different times.

Perhaps it was not couched in very intelligible or elegant English, but everybody must know that when the chairman said that he evidently meant that it was almost impossible to report day by day, and that he must have meant that it should be reported from time to time.

Mr. LENNOX. As a matter of fact we cannot get it done, but that is the way the motion reads.

What does that mean? The hon. member for South Simcoe evidently meant that it was impossible for the committee to have that done because it would impose too much of a hardship on the reporters. We could not have the report made every day, and he simply said: Well, that is the motion as it reads, but we will not insist on it being acted upon. That must be the understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. I shall have to be empowered by the House to have it done.

Mr. LENNOX. My motion is that the evidence be printed and reported to the House day by day.

Mr. MACDONALD. The evidence only.

Mr. GEOFFRION. The evidence only. Evidently the hon. member for South Simcoe knew that it was impossible. The insinuation is made that I have been guilty of presenting a false report. It is not my habit to do anything false, and I am always prepared to take the responsibility for my actions. The report in fact, was not presented to myself. I am sorry to say that I was obliged to leave the city, I did not stay to present the report, and it was presented by my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Clarke). He evidently did not read the report. He presented it just as it had been written, and he knew nothing more about it than the hon. member for South Simcoe, or the hon. member for Hamilton. But, where is the great harm after all? I know that the House is jealous of its privileges. If a motion is carried directing that a certain course be taken I know that the House will insist upon its directions being carried out. But, where is the harm? My hon. friends had the report before we had it ourselves. They had the report of the committee printed before we had it, and the committee is open to everybody. What interest had I to make a false report, or to order the clerk, which he would not have done, to change the wording of the report? I think it is all nonsense to insinuate that we had an interest in withholding the evidence. The final report will be made, and it will contain the evidence, and other reports will be made before that time. But suppose we did not, when the final report comes the evidence will be put on the table and an opportunity will be given to every member of this House to study it. For instance, the Hodgins report was laid on the table to give an opportunity to every member to study it, and the motion to have it adopted was not made until a couple of weeks after the presentation of the report. I know that if the motion was properly put, and that it was understood it was to be acted upon, then it was the duty of the chairman to have the report made accordingly. I admit that. But, I did not think at the time—I was of the same mind as the hon. member for Simcoe—I did not think it could be done as he himself said, and then probably the clerk, after having heard that conversation, prepared the report which was not examined by me, and which was presented to the House, and accepted by the House. Of course we cannot do anything about it now until another report is made.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would ask my hon. friend where the difficulty would arise in carrying out the recommendation would it be in the printing of the evidence?

Mr. GEOFFRION. Before that report was made I communicated with the reporters and they said it would be very difficult for them even with two sessions a day, and now that we are trying to get through as quickly as possible and trying to have three sessions a day they said it would be very hard to have the report from day to day.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was that after the motion was passed?

Mr. GEOFFRION. It was before that when I had a conversation with the reporters.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How did that arise when the motion had not then been presented?

Mr. GEOFFRION. It was in the general course of the proceedings of the committee. When there was a question of having another session in the afternoon the reporters said it was very doubtful if they could manage to have the whole thing reported.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Printed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Prepared.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Geoffrion) whether he denies that there has been a change in the recommendation. I do not understand that my hon. friend denies that; I do not understand the Prime Minister denies it, because we have the papers here to show exactly what took place. The recommendation of the committee was in these words:

Mr. Lennox moved that the committee recommend that their proceedings and the evidence taken by them be printed and reported to the House from day to day.

That motion was agreed to, but the report which is made to the House omitted the important words:

'and reported to the House.'

There has obviously been a change. My hon. friend (Mr. Geoffrion) does not deny there has been a change. Was that change a mistake or was it intentional?

Mr. GEOFFRION. I have already said it could not be intentional. That is an insinuation that I had ordered the clerk to report differently from the motion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not making an insinuation. I am asking a very plain question.

Mr. GEOFFRION. There was no intention at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then it was not intentional and was a mistake?

Mr. GEOFFRION. It must be a mistake.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then if it was a mistake why is it that my hon. friend when he had his attention directed to that mistake on Friday last has not taken steps to correct it?

Mr. GEOFFRION. I have answered that. I said that I was obliged to leave the city, that I was absent, and that it was only last night I could look into the matter.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does my hon. friend say he will take the first opportunity of correcting it?

Mr. GEOFFRION. I will take the first opportunity to see what can be done, and if anything should be remedied, it will be remedied as it should be.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does my hon. friend take the position that knowing there was a mistake—because he has admitted that—and declaring that that change was not intentional, does he now take the position that he will not correct it?

Mr. GEOFFRION. I say that it is for the committee, and that my hon. friends on the other side, if they wish, can attend——

Mr. LENNOX. You know we cannot.

Mr. GEOFFRION. We will be very glad to see them, and we will discuss the matter and come to a conclusion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Geoffrion) places himself in a very unfortunate position by the way in which he evades a question which can only be answered in one way if there is good faith in this matter. And the very best evidence that there is not good faith in it is to be found in some of the statements which have been made in the House to-day. The right hon. the Prime Minister had this matter brought to his attention; he introduces a great many 'ifs' and qualifications—'if there was a mistake,' he said. Is he satisfied now that he has it out of the mouth of the chairman of the committee that there was a mistake? Will he put in any more 'ifs' in connection with the change in that report? The right hon. gentleman is responsible for fair dealing in this House, and for the decency and dignity of the proceedings of parliament, and does he think that it conduces to the decency and dignity of this parliament that there should be an intentional change of this kind? I am aware that any such intention has been denied. Well, Sir, does the right hon. gentleman think it conduces to the decency and dignity of this parliament that when a mistake has been pointed out—a mistake vitally affecting the rights of certain hon. gentlemen on this side of the House—that he should resort to the kind of argument which I was sorry to hear from his lips to-day. There was admittedly a mistake—

Mr. GEOFFRION. Will my hon. friend allow me. I did not admit there was a mistake; I said if there was a mistake, after discussing it in the committee I would act accordingly.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does my hon. friend assert that the recommendation which passed that committee was reported in its terms to this House? Did not the hon. gentleman, not ten minutes ago, admit to me that there had been a change made in that report from the recommendation of the committee?

Mr. GEOFFRION. No, I did not admit it. I could not make an admission that there was a change made in that report because I do not know of any change.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well, my hon. friends seem to be remarkably obtuse, but I will read again the recommendation as it passed the committee:

> Mr. Lennox moved that the committee recommend that their proceedings and the evidence taken by them be printed and reported to the House from day to day.

That was agreed to. That is found in the official report of that committee and it is borne out by the stenographic report, because at page 39 of the proceedings on the 22nd of February I find this:

> Mr. LENNOX. I move that our proceedings and the evidence be printed and reported to the House day by day.

Therefore the stenographic report and the report of the committee both agree. It is perfectly true that further down Mr. Lennox is reported as saying:

> My motion is that the evidence be printed and reported to the House from day to day.

Every hon. gentleman knows that the stenographic report of the proceedings in the committee bears the same relation to the record of the committee as signed by the clerk, that the 'Hansard' report bears to the record of this House as kept by the clerk of the House, and the records of the House as taken by the clerk of the House would always be taken of course as a true record of the proceedings. Well, that is the way in which the motion passed, and it was reported to this House in this way:

Your committee recommends that their proceedings and any evidence taken by them be printed from day to day.

Does my hon. friend deny that the omission of the words 'and reported to the House' is a change? Does he deny it, or does he affirm it?

Mr. GEOFFRION. What I said was that I did not know whether there was any mistake. I said that I had inquired and tried to find the original motion to see if it was as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) said. It may read 'that the evidence be printed and reported to the House from day to day,' or it may read 'that the evidence be printed from day to day.' I cannot tell until I see the original motion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am talking about the report, about which there is no doubt whatever, and I ask the hon. gentleman to state whether the omission of the important words to which I have alluded constitutes a change. My hon. friend places himself in a peculiar position before this House when he declines to answer. I would be inclined to think that if he is not capable of determining whether or not the omission of those words constitutes a change, it would be well for him to resign the chairmanship of that committee, because I think we should have some gentleman at the head of that committee who would know and be able to state in a straight-forward way in this House whether the omission of those important words constitutes a change. I think it is high time that we had as chairman of this committee an hon. gentleman who would be in a position to say yes or no, without equivocation or deliberation. There is no need of arguing it. I thought my hon. friend would have been manly enough to say at once that it was a change, and I intended to follow that up by asking him whether that change was due to a mistake or was intentional. I propose to ask him once more, if he takes the ground that it was a mistake, why he has not seen fit to correct that mistake during the week that has elapsed since it was brought to his attention? If he was too busy to devote the necessary time to redress that mistake, why did not the Prime Minister, or some other member of the committee, take it upon himself to redress that wrong and correct that mistake? I think, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most extraordinary instances that has ever occurred in the history of parliament, within my recollection. I cannot account for it. I do not see any occasion for it. Can this be due to a desire that three members of that committee on this side of the House should be silenced? If that is so, it seems to me that it is an extremely awkward and undignified method to adopt for that purpose. I would suppose there was not such party gain as to justify that method. My right hon. friend says he has told the chairman of the committee that this is a matter for the committee. It is not only a matter for the committee, but it is also a matter for him, as the guardian of the dignity of this House, and as one whose position demands that he shall see that such things are done in order, and that nothing that can be regarded as discreditable conduct on the part of any committee of the House shall be brought to the attention of the House without some effort being made to redress it. I am sorry that the Prime Minister has made no such effort. I repeat again that it must have been either a mistake or intentional. I am not charging that it was intentional, but I do say that it is beyond question that a change was made in that report. You have only to read the record of the committee and the record of this parliament to know that, and I say that it was the bounden duty of the chairman of that committee as an honest man, and it was also the bounden duty of the Prime Minister, as the guardian of the dignity of this parliament, to see that that mistake was corrected, and that it was made good at the earliest possible moment after it was brought to their attention.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I hope that my hon. friend will not shed any tears over my delinquencies in this matter or any other matter. I value very much the attention which he gives me. He wants to keep me right, which is his duty and privilege; but I may say that I am not the victim of the false heroics which he has directed to me this afternoon. What am I to do in this matter? My hon. friend the leader of the opposition and my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Crothers) do me too much honour when they say that I am the dictator of this House. I am but a humble member of this House. I do not claim to have any other power or right here than any other member of this House. It happens that I have responsible duties to perform, and I try to perform them. But in this matter, I ask my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, what am I to do?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. See that the mistake is corrected.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know what relations my hon. friend has with the members of the committee who represent the minority in this House. Perhaps he can dictate to them; but I cannot dictate to those members of the committee who represent the majority of this House. They would resent, and properly resent, any attempt of mine to dictate to them what they should do. When this matter was brought to my attention yesterday, I told them very plainly what my mind was—that it was a matter for the committee to look into, to find out whether or not there had been an incorrect report made to the House. This is the only thing to do. I am sorry that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has dealt with my hon. friend from Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), the chairman of the committee, in the way he has done. My hon. friend had no more to do, I am sure, with the preparation of that report than the leader of the opposition himself. He simply signed it as any other man would have done.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I made no statement to the contrary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Very well, then, if the mistake has not been made by the chairman of the committee, but by some one else, is not the natural course and the common sense course simply to bring it before the committee?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will my right hon. friend tell me what question there is about the report of the committee?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I look at this matter from an altogether different point of view from that of my hon. friend. He has discussed the report of the committee; I have carefully abstained from discussing it, because it is not before this House.

Mr. LENNOX. If the right hon. gentleman will look at page 5 of vol. I of the proceedings of the Lumsden Commission, he will find that not only was there a second report, on the 22nd of February of the proceedings issued down to that date, but a subsequent report, which brings us down to the 23rd of February; so that so far as these are concerned, we have the right today to discuss this matter. My right hon. friend was probably not aware of that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then I am sorry my hon. friend has not brought it in such a shape that we can discuss it, but has brought it up simply as a matter of privilege. I abstained from discussing what took place before the committee. I am right there, and whether the matter has been rectified by the committee or not, it will then be time for it to come here. If the alleged error in the report has not been rectified, it is by the fault of my hon. friend. Why did he give up his duties? And to crown all that, my hon. friend suggests that the chairman of the committee, my hon. friend from Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) should also resign. Resignation after resignation. If an injustice has been done to my hon. friend, I am sure the chairman will see it is corrected.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Prime Minister says he is not a dictator. He is a dictator whenever he wants to be, but whenever it suits him to pose as a——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister spoke twice.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman has spoken, he cannot speak again.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Prime Minister spoke again.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not on the motion to go into Committee of Supply, my hon. friend is all wrong.

Mr. LENNOX. I am very much pleased that we have got as much light on this matter as we have. If the government are satisfied to leave the matter in this way, I do not know that the opposition have from a party standpoint any great reason to complain. The leader of the government suggested to the House a little while ago that I had no right to bring this matter up as a matter of privilege. I have great respect for the views of the First Minister upon a question of this kind, a question of procedure, but I beg to assert that I have ample justification for bringing it up as a matter of privilege because the order of the committee, the solemn resolution of the committee passed on February 22 last, has not been carried out, and by reason of that, three members of the committee are prevented from exercising those rights which as members they have a right to exercise. That is one substantial ground of privilege, and the other ground is that when the hon. the chairman of the committee spoke the other day he made assertions which, as I have pointed out, were not justified; errors I admit, if you like, at all events, statements which were not justified, saying for instance, that the members of the committee had assented subsequently to the handing in of the report in the form in which it was presented to the House. We have a right to speak of this matter as a question of privilege, and I have said on that branch of it all I desire to say. I have given a concise unbroken record of what took place, and I am content to leave it there. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald), whose adroitness is marvellous—he is a good second to the Prime Minister in that regard—endeavoured to draw us away a little from the point in discussion, and he submitted that three members of this committee were guilty of contempt, were in contempt of the House, by reason of the action they had taken. I will admit that if you like, I am not particular. If the hon. gentleman thinks that way, he has his remedy, and I would like to have it fought out on the floor of the House. But I would rather be in contempt in this House than be in contempt before the people, and that is what the other members of this committee will be in if they persist in their refusal to comply with the order of that committee regularly passed. I am not going to follow the hon. gentleman in an argument which did not address itself to the point at issue, but I may say I am not daunted by the fact that he suggested that I am—I do not think he coupled my associates in that regard, so I exonerate them—but he says that I am playing the baby act. I would rather be playing the baby act than some acts I have known my hon. friend to play. He says that history affords no parallel for the action of the minority of the committee in demanding or asking to have the right to name the second counsel, the government already having one. I shall discuss that point and give our authority when the matter comes up properly in the House. But what is more important is that we should pay a moment's attention to the record. First, in reference to what has been read to the House on page 39. I referred to that in bringing the matter before the House a few moments ago. The stenographic report says:

I move that our proceedings and the evidence be printed and reported to the House day by day.

The CHAIRMAN. Reported to the House day by day. That means at different times.

I am reported to have said:

As a matter of fact we cannot get it done, but that is the way the motion reads.

This is almost correct, but not absolutely so. What I did say was: As a matter of fact it cannot get the printing done. But that does not affect the motion in any way. We were to have the report to the House from day to day and we have the evidence as rapidly as it can be printed, and so it was understood by the committee at that time. The only difference is that instead of putting the words 'the printing,' they put the word 'it.' Then I gave a summary of what I meant, wishing to impress on the committee, as I did at that time. that the material point was that it should be reported to the House from day to day. I went on:

My motion is that the evidence be printed and reported to the House day by day.

So that matter was impressed on the committee. What was the other record? I have pointed out to the Prime Minister that the proceedings are reported to us down to February 23. In other words, we have the reports of the committee that cover the matter that we have been discussing to-day, but we have not the report of the committee that covers the matter of the resignation of the three members, and that is what they do not want us to have. It is important, perhaps, that we should look again at the order of events. I moved the resolution that has already been read once or twice. At this point a very peculiar suggestion is made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) and also echoed by the chairman. It may have more significance than we think. If I understand the hon. member for Pictou, he suggests that my motion may not now be in the committee room. I do not know anything about that, perhaps my hon. friend knows more about it than I do. This is followed up by the chairman of the committee, and he hints that possibly my motion is not now on record in the committee. I do not know anything about that, but I do know this, that I presented it, that I read it, that I handed it to the chairman, and that I left it with the chairman and left it with the committee. That is the end of my responsibility there, and if the motion is not there now, as is pretty broadly suggested, it only means, Mr. Speaker, that there is another incident to be explained. But it is only right that I should point out that not only was my motion read in the form:

Mr. Lennox moved that the committee recommend that their proceedings and the evidence taken by them be printed and reported from day to day, which was agreed to.

Not only that, but in the next day's proceedings, which have also been reported to this House, we have this:

Wednesday, Feb. 3, 1910.

The committee met at 11 a.m. Present Messrs. Geoffrion, chairman; Macdonald, Clarke (Essex), Wilson (Laval), Barker, Lennox and Crothers. The committee appointed R. C. Smith, K.C., counsel for the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners. The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.

So that we had the resolution again in committee and again brought to the attention of the chairman that this resolution had been passed the day before, providing that its proceedings should be reported to the House from day to day. That being so, it does not come with very good grace from the right hon. the leader of this House to take the position he does. He is responsible for the conduct of this House and it is his duty to suggest to the committee he appoints that at least fair play should be meted out to all the members of that committee and the public. He must know that there can be no question whatever as to what took place in the committee. He cannot doubt that the committee did solemnly determine that its proceedings should be reported to the House from day to day. He must know, as an experienced parliamentarian, that the dearest right which the minority on a committee possesses is to have the proceedings reported from day to day, because that furnishes the only means for an appeal to the House against the majority. He does know that a serious injustice has been done to the minority of that committee. He does know that the public is waiting to hear whether or not the minority on that committee were justified in their action or whether a system has been pursued which made it impossible for that minority to continue on that committee. The minority were not on the committee for the purpose of whitewashing the administration. The right hon. gentleman knows all that, and he knows that the minority would be belittling themselves were they to go back and ask the majority to ratify this mistake. He knows that the proper place to ventilate this wrong is, not in that committee room, but in the open, before the public, in the House of Commons. I have brought the matter to his attention and make no apology for having done so. I have done simply what was my duty and I will continue to press this matter, let the Prime Minister take what attitude he likes. I make the demand that this mistake or wrong, which ever you like to call it, shall be rectified now; and if my demand be not granted, I will consider it my duty to bring the matter up again from time to time. What is the object of preventing a rectification of this error or wrong-doing? Is it because the Prime Minister and his following desire that the minority on that committee shall be gagged and shall not have the right to tell this House why they were compelled to leave that committee? Will the right hon. gentleman get up now and say that, regardless of the report of the committee, he will allow us to make our statement to the House to-morrow? If he will do that, I shall not argue any more; if he will do that, I venture to say it will not on his part be good politics or wise administration.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). I merely want to say a few words on this matter. We have heard from a lawyer and I wish simply to speak as a layman. This matter, particularly in so far as it concerns the National Transcontinental railway, is one in which the public take great interest, and I may not at all be surprised at the anxiety of the right hon. the leader of the government to prevent a discussion of it. When the question of privilege was raised, a little while ago, he objected to any further discussion at that particular time, and had the opportunity not been given on the motion to go into Supply, we would have been debarred from discussing it at all. The right hon. gentleman knows that the question of privilege applies to the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) as well as to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), yet he would not allow the hon. member for Hamilton to explain his position. The right hon. gentleman has told us that he does not control this House, but no sooner does he cry out 'order' than he is echoed by every hon. member at his back. If he had told the members behind him that they could vote as they wished on the Naval Bill, I believe the hon. gentleman would have found himself obliged to go into opposition. At the time when the right hon. the Prime Minister brought in his motion for a special committee, we on this side wanted to have an investigation into all the circumstances in order that we might ascertain whether the contractors had been paid solid rock prices for loose rock, but the right hon. gentleman carefully worded his motion so that it did not give the committee the right to investigate into this. His motion simply read that a special committee of five members, to be named hereafter, be appointed to investigate the charges made by Mr. Lumsden against a portion of the engineering staff. Mr. Lumsden, in his letters, made charges against parties on the railway, and claimed the contractors had been paid much more than they should have been. But the Prime Minister takes a similar course to that he took in reference to the steamer 'Arctic'. At that time he took very good care to limit the investigation so that we could not go into it as we desired. But fortunately, as we proceeded in the investigation, we were able to show that a great deal of wrong had been done, and the Prime Minister had to admit afterwards that we were absolutely right. Now I do not know what is going on in this committee. I have not been at the committee, and one reason is that if I had gone in there and asked a question, I would simply have been ruled out of order. But I read in the newspapers what is going on, I am only referring to what I have seen in the newspapers, and if I can get the correct meaning of what is reported, these four gentlemen who are members of that committee took good care that the gentleman appointed as counsel to represent the people, was practically an official of this government. Now, is that the right kind of a gentleman to appoint to look after the interests of the people? That gentleman is practically a paid official of this government, and he is going to do everything in his power to save this government from trouble. Why, Sir, the Prime Minister remembers when he sat in this House as leader of the opposition, and when charges were made against a member of the Conservative party who were in power, the opposition were allowed the privilege of appointing a solicitor to look after the interests of the public, and Sir John Thompson, who was then Prime Minister, allowed them to choose their own counsel and allowed the opposition to examine all the records.

Mr. MACDONALD. What case is the hon. gentleman referring to?

Mr. J. D. REID. I refer to the Connolly and McGreevy case.

Mr. MACDONALD. The records of the department show that nothing of the kind occurred. Mr. Tarte brought his own counsel, Mr. Geoffrion, who conducted the matter throughout. Mr. Tarte's lawyer was counsel for the prosecution.

Mr. J. D. REID. What about Mr. Osler?

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Osler and Mr. Henry represented the Public Works Department.

Mr. J. D. REID. They were appointed at the request of the opposition.

Mr. MACDONALD. Let the hon. gentleman go to the records and refresh his recollection.

Mr. J. D. REID. The records show that it was at the request of the member who made the charges, and that member was advised by the Prime Minister, and his party to do so. These are the facts, as I remember them, without looking them up. But an hon. gentleman tells me now that he has looked them up, and that my statement is correct. The Prime Minister knows at that time he was in conference all the time with the gentleman who made those charges, and was advising him what to do, and he knows that that gentleman was carrying out his wishes. He must also admit that Sir John Thompson was willing to give him all the assistance he wanted. Now I ask the Prime Minister if his course in this matter at all compares with the course of Sir John Thompson in the Connolly and McGreevy matter? I think there is no comparison whatever. The Prime Minister must admit that in every case where we bring something before the House, the whole object of the government and their supporters is to try and prevent us from getting at the facts. We frequently see the same thing occurring in the Public Accounts Committee. It is a strange thing that in the matter of these charges, some of the gravest that have ever come before the House, the Prime Minister appoints the hon. member for Verchères, one of his supporters, as chairman of that committee, and he remembers well that the chairman of this committee was the same gentleman whose conduct was complained of in the Public Accounts Committee. The whole thing, to my mind, is simply a put up job, or at least, is an effort to try to squelch the investigation so that we may not be able to get out the facts.

Now in regard to this National Transcontinental railway, I have been over a part of it myself, and when I went along the line I heard it said that part of this work had been put in as rock when, so far as I could judge, it was only sand. I do not know whether that was the case, but if we had a fair opportunity to investigate, we could find out whether that was the fact. Now when Mr. Lumsden's letters were made public, it was surely the duty of the Prime Minister to throw open the books and records, and give the opposition a chance to find out whether there was any truth in the charges. It is absolutely necessary, if the public interest is to be protected, that we should have that opportunity. In England, when investigations are being carried on by the Public Accounts Committee, and whenever any charge is made, the government offer to appoint a member of the opposition as chairman of the committee in order to insure a fair inquiry. I must say that when the Conservative party were in power every opportunity was given to the opposition to ascertain the facts in relation to any charge that was made, but since this government have come to power — the Prime Minister need not smile, because he knows that every word I am saying is true. He knows well enough that in the Public Accounts Committee he picked out four of the ablest lawyers on his side, and each one had his own part assigned to him to stand up and try and block proceedings and prevent anything from coming out. If I were allowed to state what some of his supporters sitting behind him have said about the rascality that is going on in some of these departments, it would shock, I think, even the Prime Minister, and I think he would have to admit that it is a pretty serious affair. But of course hon. gentlemen opposite say: We have got to vote these things through, and if we don't we shall be voting want of confidence in the Prime Minister, even though we were to lose our seats in consequence; so we will swallow the whole thing, even to a saw-dust wharf or something of that kind.

Now, as to the evidence before this committee, the Prime Minister must have read where, in one place, it shows a motion to have been made, and now the chairman makes a different report. When this discussion arose I thought that the right hon. Prime Minister would have stood up and said: If this thing is wrong I shall instruct the committee to at once look into the report and see that it is corrected. But the right hon. gentleman did not want to do that, because, if that report had come down, we could have discussed the whole thing, and it would have been shown why these three gentlemen had retired. The Prime Minister admits that is the reason why he does not want the report to come down. He nods his head. He wants the whole investigation to be complete before he will allow any discussion. The investigation is being carried on simply by four of his followers, who must do what he says, and by a solicitor from Montreal, a great supporter of the right hon. gentleman, and who will do anything to carry out his wishes, and prevent the government from getting into trouble. These four gentlemen have employed as the solicitor for the people practically another official of this government to look after their interests, and who knows that if he were instrumental in bringing in a report that would censure, or put the government out of power, he would lose his position. Under those circumstances, is it reasonable to expect that justice will be done in the interests of the people? I have just been informed that practically this public official has drawn about $30,000 from this government since they came into power. I would appeal to any man in this country, be he Liberal or Conservative, to say whether we can reasonably expect that man to do what is right in the interests of the people; or is it reasonable to expect that if there was any way that he could help this government he would not do so? I do not believe that the Prime Minister has done what is right and square in the interests of the people in allowing the committee to go on as he has done with four of his own followers, four lawvers, some of whom have been blockers in other investigations, or in other committees of this kind just as they have been on this committee. Therefore I say that justice has not been done on those other committees, and I believe that in this case justice will not be done in such a way as the people have a right to expect.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I think it will be acknowledged by every member of the House that the object in appointing this committee, or what should have been the object, was, in the first place, to investigate the charges that were made that there has been over-classification on the Grand Trunk Pacific, and I think we should keep that thoroughly in mind when we consider the result of the action that has been taken by some person in changing, or mutilating the report as presented, whether that change was made through inadvertance, or mistake, or otherwise. It is quite clear at any rate to the members on this side of the House that the motion made by my hon. friend from South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) was in writing, and it is quite clear that in that motion there was a provision that the proceedings and evidence should be printed by the committee, and reported to this House from day to day. That being the case, it was the bounden duty of the committee, and all those under the authority of the committee, to print and report the evidence from day to day. Then it would be only fair to assume that every member of this House would be expecting that the proceedings and the evidence would be reported from day to day. At once, upon a member finding that that was not being done it would be reasonable to expect him to go and ask how it was that the order of the committee was not being carried out. That is as the matter strikes me. Then, upon the matter being brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend from South Simcoe again only a week ago it would be natural to expect that the error would have been corrected, but that has not been done, and the matter has been allowed to go on from that time until the present day. That makes it all the more inexcusable, and one would be almost tempted to suggest that there was something of intention in regard to the error that was made in the report. I happened to be sitting in the room at the time my hon. friend from South Simcoe made his motion, and I certainly understood, as he did, that it was intended that the evidence and proceedings should be reported and printed day by day. It is true that the statement was made by somebody that it was quite impossible, but nevertheless that was the order of the committee, and I believe that it was a case in which we did not expect the evidence and proceedings to be actually brought to the House from day to day, but it was supposed to be done as soon as it possibly could be done by the officers whose duty it is to prepare the report. But there has been absolutely nothing done in that line, and the very fact that the matter was brought to the attention of the committee in such a way would leave it in the mind of the committee that it could be done would seem to make it all the more suggestive to them when the proceedings and evidence were not reported to the House from day to day.

I noticed by the press reports that it was suggested that Mr. Wallace Nesbitt be employed as counsel on behalf of the Dominion for the purpose of investigating the accuracy of the statements made by Mr. Lumsden. These newspaper reports said that the Conservative members of the committee objected to the selection of such an eminent counsel as Mr. Nesbitt, and also that they were very greatly surprised because of that objection by reason of the fact that he was alleged to be a Conservative. I do not know the politics of Mr. Nesbitt, but I will say that I have every confidence in his ability and integrity, and I have more confidence in his integrity than I had prior to the time when his name was first mentioned, because I find that Mr. Nesbitt has upheld the dignity of his profession by saying that he will not act as counsel for the people of Canada in this matter, because the government employed him as counsel not more than two years ago, and took his opinion, and that he gave an opinion directly contrary to the position of Mr. Lumsden.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Does the hon. gentleman say that he was consulted by the government of Canada?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. Perhaps not by the government of Canada, but he was employed by the contractors to give an opinion as to the interpretation of the specifications which are the subject matter of investigation before this committee. Mr. Wallace Nesbitt gave his opinion that Mr. Lumsden had made an improper interpretation of the specifications. How could you expect that Mr. Nesbitt would come forward now and endeavour to prove that the opinion which he had previously given was wrong? Therefore, I say it is to the credit of Mr. Nesbitt to say: I will not act as counsel and controvert an opinion which I have expressed, and for which I have been paid by the very contractors whose interests are adverse to those of the people and by whom I was retained as counsel. Then, the right hon. leader of the government, through his majority on that committee, and whose duty it is to protect the public interest, calls in a gentleman against whom I have not one word to say personally in any manner, shape or form, but a gentleman who has been employed by this government since 1896, and has received from the public treasury about $30,000.

He is brought here to prove that this government is guilty of the charges we have laid at their door. Is it human to expect that gentleman to come before that committee and to use the best of his endeavours and ability to prove that the very men from whom he got $30,000 have done anything wrong? I say the position is wholly inconsistent with the public interest, and I say that the three Conservative members of that committee were acting in the interests of the people of this country when they declared they would no longer sit on a committee which first proposed to employ as counsel, a gentleman who gave an opinion directly antagonistic to the interests of the country, and secondly a gentleman who has got $30,000 from the coffers of this country, and who they expect to prove that this government has been guilty of maladministration in connection with the Transatlantic railway.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the three members refuse to act on that committee on account of the employment of Mr. Chrysler?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If the chairman of the committee performed his duty and reported the proceedings to the House, I would be able to answer the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. That is not an answer to my question.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I cannot answer your question until I know what took place in the committee.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the three members of the committee were justified in quitting the committee on account of the appointment of Mr. Chrysler. I now ask him is that the reason?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. If the hon. member (Mr. Clarke) says that they retired before it was suggested that Mr. Nesbitt should be employed I accept his explanation because he knows better than I do. I started out by saying that the Reform press of this country stated that the three members of the committee were not justified in retiring because the committee proposed to appoint a Conservative counsel on behalf of the public and were therefore very magnanimous. I say the committee was doing nothing magnanimous because they were appointing a gentleman who they knew had given an opinion in favour of the contractors right in the Hodgins inquiry, which opinion was got through the medium of the office of the Minister of Justice, Messrs. Aylesworth, Wright & Moss, of the city of Toronto.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Was it on account of the appointment of Mr. Nesbitt they retired?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I am not a member of that committee and I cannot know what took place there, but if the report of that committee were allowed to come before the House these three gentlemen would have an opportunity to answer my hon. friend.

Mr. LENNOX. We will answer him.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. It looks to me very much as if the report of the committee was not brought down, in order to prevent the three Conservative members from answering that question. I now make an appeal to the right hon. gentleman: Having had this matter brought to his attention to-day, and putting the most charitable construction on what has taken place, beyond all doubt there was a mistake made in that report which, if not made, would have enabled these three hon. gentlemen to rise in their places and explain to the House and to the country the reasons why they resigned from the committee; I ask the right hon. gentleman now in his place will he not use his efforts and power as Prime Minister to rectify that mistake and allow the report of that committee to be presented to the House at the earliest possible moment, so that these gentlemen may explain their action in retiring from that committee.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. I beg leave to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I am not finished. I am waiting for the Prime Minister to reply.

Motion (Mr. Taylor) withdrawn.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no objection at all to answer the question of my hon. friend, though it is becoming a practice to interrogate members on this side of the House; a right which for my part I do not recognize. But, the hon. gentleman having put his question, my answer is to tell him that there is no necessity for my interference in this matter because I am sure that the members of the committee will do what is proper and see that the minority shall have all the rights to which they are entitled. I will be glad to hear my hon. friend on that point when this matter comes up again.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I might have thought that the majority of the members of that committee would have done what is right did I not know that nearly a week ago their attention was drawn to this mistake and they have not rectified it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This matter was brought to the attention of the House on last Friday, and the chairman of the committee was not here. At the time.——

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The right hon. gentleman has the right to answer a question, but he has no right to make a speech. He called me to order a moment ago, and I call him to order now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Well, really I have no objection—

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I insist on my point of order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If you rule me out of order, Mr. Speaker, I shall of course bow to your ruling.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am giving you a dose of your own medicine.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I wanted to answer my hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro), and it is no fault of mine if I cannot answer him.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. The hon. member for Pictou denied the statement that in the Tarte-McGreevy inquiry counsel for the people were appointed and paid by the government of the day.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I did not say that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What did the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I said, in answer to the hon. gentleman from Grenville, that the counsel which conducted the McGreevy inquiry was Mr. Geoffrion counsel for Mr. Tarte, who made the charges on his responsibility as a member of this House. I said that Mr. Osler and Mr. Henry were appointed expressly on motion of Sir John Thompson, to represent not the people but the Public Works Department, and I said that the burden of the investigation was carried by Mr. Geoffrion counsel for the complainant.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Is not the hon. gentleman aware that Mr. Osler and Mr. Henry were suggested to Sir John Thompson before he made the motion.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. I am speaking from the records of the committee, which speaks for itself.

Mr. J. HAGGART. You would not find that fact in the records of the committee. You would simply find that Sir John Thompson moved the appointment of counsel, but the truth is that the suggestion was made by the opposition of the day.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I will explain that because I read the debate a few days ago.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. So did I.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. In bringing in that report the chairman of the committee said that Mr. Tarte had appointed Mr. Geoffrion—the brother of the chairman of this committee—and he recommended that the government also pay, and the government did pay for the services of that counsel.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. And on the Lumsden committee the minority members are representing the public. You have the Transcontinental Railway Commission represented by Mr. R. C. Smith and the engineers represented by Mr. Moss, but there is nobody there representing the people of this country except Mr. Chrysler, who is a man who has drawn $30,000 from the coffers of the government since 1896.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Does the hon. gentleman make any imputation on the standing and good faith and credit of Mr. Chrysler?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I have already said that I did not and I think it is rather small politics for the hon. gentleman to ask that. But I say that human nature is the same in Mr. Chrysler as in every individual in the Dominion of Canada. And I am saying that the distinction between the action of this government and the action of the previous administration is that in the one case the plaintiffs the people of Canada appointed their own counsel, and in this case they are not allowed to. In the former case the representatives of the people had consultation with their own counsel, they produced their own evidence in accord with their own idea of the evidence, and these counsel were paid by the government of that day, but in this case we are not allowed to make the appointment of counsel and the appointment of counsel which has been made is of no benefit whatever to the minority members because they are not going to divulge to a paid advocate appointed by the government the evidence which is in their possession. I, therefore, say it is not a fair investigation, and I say that unless counsel is appointed who is nominated by the three minority members of that committee you will not have an impartial inquiry. I am not allowed to refer to the proceedings of the committee because no report has come before us, but any one who attends that committee can see what is going on. There is nobody there taking an active interest on behalf of the people of Canada; all the questions are leading questions put by the counsel for the commission and put by the counsel for the contractors, and they are endeavouring to obtain from Mr. Lumsden the very answer they require. Any one can see that Mr. Lumsden, had he proper counsel there, could prove the charges he has made, and even with all that the evidence so far has been very damaging to the government. It can easily be seen that Mr. Lumsden alone on the one side, and with an array of six K. C's. against him and badgered by experienced counsel, we could not expect that the evidence would come out as it would with counsel acting with the full confidence of the minority of committee and with the consciousness that he was doing his duty for the public and for the public alone.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the debate is adjourned, I wish to say that I do not know that it is a very usual form of tactics to call one to order under the circumstances under which I was called to order a little while ago. The Prime Minister frequently speaks two or three, or even four times on motions before this House. He does that by the courtesy of hon. members on this side of the House. But as he is so careful about points of order, he will have to meet them more frequently in the future than he has done in the past, because what is a good rule for one side of the House is an equally good rule for the other side.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not complain.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My right hon. friend has no reason to complain, and he ought always to be ready to take the medicine that he prescribes to others. He had spoken on a question of privilege in defiance of his own statement that there was no question of privilege before the House; and afterwards he took advantage of the Speaker's having brought that debate to a conclusion to refuse to permit me to reply to some personal observations which he had addressed to myself. It was perhaps not very good tactics, in view of the fact that at that very time the government were asking us by consent to give them a vote of twenty-five per cent on account. However, I have no advice to tender to my right hon. friend in that regard. He will, of course, take his own course in regard to that and other matters. So far as I am concerned, I propose to say now what I was debarred from saying a few moments ago. The right hon. gentleman can be a dictator when that is thoroughly in accord with party interest; it suits him also, when that course is not in accord with party interests, to pose as an independent member of this House, having no control whatever over hon. gentlemen who sit behind him. Every one understands how much reality there is in all that. There is just as much reality in it as there is in the pretense that they do not understand that this omission or 'mistake,' was made for a purpose. There need be no such pretense as that. If there was not some object in that mistake, then it would have been rectified. It has not been rectified, and the reason is very apparent. The investigation before this committee is a farce, it was intended to be a farce, and the hon. gentlemen who are members of that committee from this side of the House were perfectly justified in retiring from it, because no man in this House ought to be compelled against his will to take part in such a farce. That is all I have to say on the subject.

Mr. BRISTOL. Mr. Speaker, this matter seems to be one that is very simple if the right hon. the First Minister wants to do what is just. It is quite obvious that three hon. members of this House are having from day to day a great injustice done to them. They have rights and privileges which are affected by the alteration which has taken place in the report which has been presented to this House by the chairman of the committee. Now, it seems to me that the chairman of the committee, having been in this House to-day, and having had brought to his attention the fact that he had made an incorrect report to this House was in a position to have corrected that report, and to have said at once that he would have issued a correct report. There is no question as to the facts, and just for a moment I am going to bring them to the attention of the House. The first report on February 22, made by the clerk of the Commons, and approved by the chairman, contains these words:

Mr. Lennox moved that the committee recommend that their proceedings and the evidence taken by them be printed and reported to the House from day to day, which was agreed to.

The chairman does not deny that that was so. He quibbles as to whether he read the document out loud or whether it was read to him; but he does not deny the truth of that report which he and the clerk of the committee presented to the members. Nor does he deny any of the facts stated therein. Now, what confirmatory evidence have we that he knew the nature of the motion that was made? That appears at the conclusion of the evidence taken on that day, where it stated:

Mr. LENNOX. I move that our proceedings and the evidence be printed and reported to the House day by day.

The CHAIRMAN. Reported to the House day by day—that means at different times.

Mr. LENNOX. As a matter of fact we cannot get it done, but that is the way the motion reads.

The CHAIRMAN. I shall have to be empowered by the House to have it done.

Now, what does he ask the House to have done? Instead of asking the House for permission to report from day to day, he reports to the House in this fashion:

Your committee recommend that their proceedings and any evidence taken by them be printed from day to day, and that rule 72 be suspended in reference thereto.

After having had the written motion before him, after having read the motion, and after having discussed the matter in the committee with the member who made the motion, he carefully omits these words: 'and reported to the House.' Now, that report is before the House; the chairman who made that report is here to-day, and he is the man who should have stated at once, when the omission was brought to his attention, that he would correct the report, make it in accordance with the facts, and do justice to the three hon. members who for some time have been deprived of certain rights and privileges thereby. But is that all the evidence that he was aware of the nature of this report? We have this fact, that at the meeting of the committee following the meeting at which that motion was carried, it is stated: 'The minutes of the last meeting were read and confirmed.' So that you have the cumulative evidence of three statements, which put it beyond peradventure that the chairman of the committee knew of the motion, discussed the motion, and confirmed the motion; but when it came to doing his duty and reporting truthfully to this House, we have these important words, 'and reported to the House,' omitted. If it was a layman who did a thing of that kind you might say it was a mistake, but where it is a man of high standing in the legal profession he cannot shield himself before this House or the public on the plea of having made that mistake with the facts before him in writing. Is there any member on that side of the House who believes that was an innocent mistake? How can he believe it in the face of such evidence? Would any jury in this country, whether it be composed of Liberals or Conservatives, if they had these facts, the written motion, the discussion by the judge, as it were, with the witness, that is the person making the motion, the confirmation the following day of that motion, and then the report with the essential part of it left out presented afterwards. Would any jury believe that was done innocently when the effect of it is and continues to be that three hon. gentlemen are deprived of an opportunity of explaining to this House in respect of a matter vitally affecting their honour and their duty to the House and to the country, and so long as the report is permitted to stand in this shape they are debarred from and deprived of certain rights and privileges dear to every member. They are gagged and stand gagged, and the Prime Minister allows his chairman, who admits the mistake and who, when he found the box he had put himself in, presented the spectacle of suddenly saying: Oh, if it is so. Did any one ever see anything more ridiculous, a lawyer of his standing getting up and hedging with 'ifs' and 'ands' and shiftings. The thing is ridiculous, it is a spectacle I am sorry to see in this House, and I trust that the right hon. gentleman and the gentleman who is chairman of this committee will see that what is just and fair and right is done in this matter without delay.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Amendment of Mr. Taylor that the debate be now adjourned, negatived.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Trent canal—construction, $1,750,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I beg to move that this item, No. 113, for the Trent canal construction be reduced by the sum of $150,000, said amount being the intended expenditure upon the Newmarket canal. I move this in the absence of my hon. friend from Centre York (Mr. Wallace) who is unable to be present for a few minutes, but we hope to have him here before this debate is over. I object to this expenditure for various reasons In the first place, I believe that all the members of this House, with the exception, perhaps, of the hon. Minister of Justice, are strongly of the opinion that this expenditure is not advantageous to the people of Canada in any degree. I realize that the Minister of Justice may think that it has been advantageous to some people in Canada, because it is the general impression throughout the country and in this House that through the promises with regard to this Newmarket canal, and in consequence of the amount of work that was done, it was railroaded, or canalled, or boated, through this House, and gives him the position here that is so objectionable to this side of the House. I object to it also—I am pleased to see that the First Minister has arrived—I object to it very largely on account of what the First Minister said last year when this matter was under discussion. If I am correct, and if I am not, I want the right hon. gentleman to correct me, he gave as an excuse for the expenditure on this Newmarket ditch that a number of Tories, with a few Liberals, I presume, had come to him as a delegation and asked for the work. I think I am fairly representing what the First Minister said, and I would like to ask him if I am right?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think this time my hon. friend is about right.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am proud that for once, in the opinion of the First Minister, I am right. That was the excuse that he vouchsafed to this House last year—he granted the expenditure on this ditch because some Tories asked for it. But, Sir, he did not tell this House that all they asked for was $43,000, or $47,000 at the outside, which the engineer said the work would cost. He forgot also to tell the House that it was not for a canal, or a ditch, whether the Aylesworth or the Newmarket ditch, or anything else, that they asked for this expenditure, but it was to deepen the Holland river from Lake Simcoe up to Newmarket. That is what they asked for. I think that when it comes to expenditures of vast sums of money, hon. members on the government side ought to be able to get up and forget their politics and, vote as men, forget that they are partisans and vote for what they know is right. Every hon. gentleman on that side of the House who knows anything about this Newmarket ditch, knows that it is an absolute waste of money, and no reason other than a partisan reason can be given for it. I defy any man to get up and honestly say that I am wrong in what I am saying. The First Minister knows that I am right, and he is ashamed of the fact that I am right. I heard the argument used last year, when he whipped his followers into line, that they had already expended so much money on that canal that it would be a tower of folly, and that they must now go on and complete the work, even though it would be of no use. But they were whipped into line last year to vote for a continuance of the folly. I trust now that we have seen the last of partisanship in that connection, and that the First Minister will not use that little influence he has over his followers to induce them to vote for this item, knowing as he does, and as every one of them does, that it is against their conscience. Seldom have we seen a project criticised so adversely by the press of Canada. I think it is time for this House to forget partisanship and do the proper thing, and relegate this Newmarket ditch to the scrap heap. No hon. gentleman on the government side can get up and show by facts and figures that elevations, and quantities of water, and all the necessary requirements to a canal service are present in this case and will justify the House in voting this item. Even if the canal were built, and even if there was any need of a canal, no hon. gentleman can show that there is any boat service there at present, nor can they show in pounds and tonnage that there is ever likely to be navigation sufficient to justify the expenditure of this money.

I regret that he is not here because, were he here he would put before this House very much more clearly and more succinctly the various points in regard to this matter than I can do; but in his absence, I ask the House to forget that last year hon. gentlemen were whipped into line, and made to vote against honest sincere wishes in this regard. It may be said by some one who will follow me that that is not so, but I say it absolutely knowing that it is true, because I heard many of the members of this House say, before the vote came on that they would not vote for it because they did not believe it right. But, they voted for it because they had to. Surely it is time that we forgot this partyism, and that in matters that pertain to the public interest we should vote honestly and decently.

Amendment negatived and item agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Mr. Fielding, the House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That towards making good a supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1910, the sum of $70,000 be granted out of the consolidated funds of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1911, the sum of $42,333,023.58 be granted out of the consolidated fund of Canada.

He said: This is the sum which the committee has voted, as made up by the clerks of the House in the usual way.

Motion agreed to, resolutions reported, read the first and the second time, and agreed to.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and the second time.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Charges of management—removal of foreign and uncurrent coin from circulation, $2,500.

Mr. FIELDING. This is to carry out an arrangement for encouraging the exportation of foreign silver, both for the convenience and improvement of our own currency, and also because there is a profit involved in silver coinage which we might as well have in our treasury as to leave in the treasuries of other countries.

Post Office Department, contingencies—sundries—further amount required, $1,500.

Mr. LAKE. Would it not be possible to make the official post office guide more convenient for reference? A better system of indexing would facilitate matters greatly.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will see that we get a better index next year.

Saskatchewan and Alberta Buildings—
Moosejaw—immigration building.. ..	$ 3,500
Regina—immigration building..	3,900
Biggar—immigration building..	2,800
Phillips (Alberta) — immigration building..	2,700
Battleford—immigration building ..	2,700
Saskatoon—public building	300
	$15,900

Mr. U. WILSON. I would like to have an explanation about these immigration buildings.

Mr. OLIVER. Regina requires a new building. The old building was removed and a basement put in and other repairs. The building on the former site was merely a temporary matter without a basement. There is a new building erected at Regina, also at Phillips. At Battleford, the building was erected two years ago. At Saskatoon, repairs are required.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. How is it that it cost $3,000 to remove the building at Regina, when the old one only cost $2,800?

Mr. OLIVER. When we removed the old building, we put in a basement on the new site. There was no basement on the new site. There was no basement in the former one. We also improved the buildings generally, so that the cost of its removal and repairs amounted to more than the old temporary building cost.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. I have no objection that these items should pass provided that we may get information on the main estimates if required.

Mr. FIELDING. There will be no objection to discussion of these items on the main estimates.

Mr. FIELDING.

Sault Ste. Marie wharf — dredging approaches, $14,600.

Mr. BOYCE. With regard to the approach to the wharf at Sault Ste. Marie, of which I spoke some days ago, is the dredging of that included in this amount?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That remains to be done. This is to close up the work done during the current year.

British Columbia—Skeena river—improvements, $762.38.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have been engaged in removing snags, such as drift-wood, from the Skeena river. The work begins with the opening of navigation, and after the commencement of the fishing season, and will last till after it is closed. The river is a navigable river.

Dredging—maritime provinces, $150,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We are asking this sum to close up the accounts which are due for dredging, both by the operation of government dredges and for contract work in the maritime provinces. But there is a sum of $25,000 which has not yet been adjusted, and I move that the vote be reduced by $25,000.

Mr. J. D. REID. Would the minister state who this is due to?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There is an amount due to W. J. Poupore & Co., for dredging in the Miramichi bay, $19,083; to the Dominion Dredging Company, for work at Cheticamp, $19,610; to Beasley Bros., $1,478; to A. & R. Loggie, at Caraquet, $3,162; to the Cape Breton Company at Fourchu, $9,963; to A. & R. Loggie, at Dalhousie, $31,362; to the Maritime Dredging and Construction Com- $19,610; to Beazley Bros., $1,478; to A. & R. Loggie, at Bathurst, about $10,000. There is a further claim which has not yet been adjusted, and I only ask for about $10,000; to Peter England, $1,975. These make altogether about $121,000. The amounts for Bathurst and Loggieville require to be adjusted, and I am not asking for an amount to cover these at present.

Mr. J. D. REID. Did A. & R. Loggie receive these contracts by tender?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They received contracts for Dalhousie, Loggieville, and Caraquet by tender. Then they were allowed to do work at Bathurst at the same price as at Caraquet, forty-one cents.

Mr. J. D. REID. When we were discussing dredging last year we expected that all the dredging contracts would be let by tender, but it appears from what the minister says now that some of them were not let by tender. I suppose the minister knows that some contracts were practically let before the tenders were advertised for.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. There were some cases of urgent work where parties were put to work temporarily pending tenders.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister knows that this Maritime Dredging Company got contracts given them before tenders were advertised. They were to get the contract at whatever the lowest tender would be.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. That was at Gaspereau, and we are not asking for anything at Gaspereau. Let me refresh my hon. friend's memory. In that case the work was urgent, and their dredge was coming down from the St. Lawrence to the Bay of Fundy, and they were asked to stop there and go to work immediately, with the understanding that if they were the lowest tenderers they would get the work, but if they were not, they would be paid for the work they did in the meantime at the price of the lowest tender. My hon. friend will remember that I stated to the House last session that I should probably renew the contracts of the previous year. We did renew the contracts, because our experience of previous years had been that we lost money by putting them up to tender again. Our experience has rather been that where contractors have their plant upon the work, and where they are doing the work satisfactorily, at reasonable prices, it is better to let them continue, rather than call for new tenders. In the previous year, by calling for new tenders, we lost about $200,000, which we would have saved by extending the contracts. So last year, in most cases, we extended the contracts.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister's statement would be all right, if I understood it as he does. My understanding of the Gaspereau matter, as I read it in the newspapers——

Mr. PUGSLEY. In which newspapers?

Mr. J. D. REID. In the Toronto ' Globe ', the Montreal ' Herald ', and even in the St. John ' Sun '. The minister says that the Maritime Dredging Company had a dredge coming down from the St. Lawrence, and that this work was urgent. I understand there was practically no Maritime Dredging Company before that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, they had a dredge before that.

Mr. J. D. REID. They may have had a dredge a few weeks before. But the Maritime Dredging Company was made up hurriedly, consisting of a Mr. Moore, the gentleman who, I suppose in conjunction with the Minister of Public Works, owns the St. John ' Telegraph '.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, the hon. gentleman is misinformed.

Mr. J. D. REID. I am only stating what I read in the Toronto ' Globe ' and the Monreal ' Herald '.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am sorry to say that I do not own the St. John ' Telegraph ', I wish I did.

Mr. J. D. REID. Now, this Mr. Moore forms a company called the Maritime Dredging Company. He purchased this dredge at Montreal in July, knowing that the very minute he purchased the dredge, all he had to do was to get it to Gaspereau. He had in his possession the instructions to take it there, and practically to do the work at his own price. The minister told the department that they were to give this contract to Mr. Moore, and of course they did. That means the Maritime Dredging Company. We would not have known what the Maritime Dredging Company was had we not learned from the Toronto 'Globe' and the Montreal 'Herald' that it and Mr. Moore are one and the same. The minister knows that before the tenders were advertised for the contract was let to Mr. Moore at the price that the lowest tender would be. Work was being done long before the tenders were received.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Only a few days.

Mr. J. D. REID. The dredge went down there about the 1st of August, and of course it got to work. That makes me a little suspicious of these dredging matters. The minister had an engineer who, as far as I understand previous to this, was considered to be a pretty respectable man and his reputation was pretty fair. This man told the minister that 20 cents a yard was a good, fair price for the work. I take it for granted that he understood his business when he said that 20 cents a yard was a fair and reasonable price, but when the tender of Mr. Moore came in at 90 cents a yard the same engineer changed his mind in a day or a night. He went to bed one night with a contract at 20 cents a yard, and next morning he got up and said that he thought it was worth 90 cents, and got this price of 90 cents. There is a sample of the changes in dredging prices. I do not hesitate to say that at 20 cents a yard Mr. Moore made money and that the other 70 cents a yard went into the St. John 'Telegraph', that the people of the country paid 70 cents a yard in order to give the Liberal party a paper in St. John. That is what happened in that case, but that is not the only case. The work was given to Mr. Moore at Gaspereau because it was urgent. The minister knows that after the work has been done the harbour is in no better shape than it was before because this is only a part of the work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They could not work after the season closed.

Mr. J. D. REID. Has there been anything done since?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. J. D. REID. The work was stopped and the dredge taken away.

Mr. PUGSLEY. In the winter?

Mr. J. D. REID. But even then they stopped work and did not proceed.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Because they thought they could not afford to go on at that price, and we put the government dredge to work there the next year.

Mr. J. D. REID At 90 cents a yard?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr J. D. REID. I suppose they wanted more money to buy the St. John 'Sun'?

Mr. PUGSLEY. But they did not get it.

Mr. J. D. REID. But they were put in another place where they would probably make more money.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, the very same dredge went to work at 37½ cents at St. John, rather than continue at 90 cents at Gaspereau.

Mr. J. D. REID. At all events it gets back to the same point. I understood from the minister that the tenders that were being called for would be let in a fair, open manner.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. J. D. REID. When I wanted them opened in public, the minister assured me that they were to be opened in the presence of himself and one of his officers.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is right; that has always been done.

Mr. J. D. REID. If that has always been done, how is it that in this case the minister wrote to the deputy and told him that the contract was to be let at the lowest price in answer to this advertisement? I cannot see how the minister can explain that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was long after the tenders had been received and opened.

Mr. J. D. REID. Of course, as the minister knows, I have got the information out of these papers, but we will take it up on the report. As far as the interests of the people are concerned, I do not think it right that the minister should let a contract to any person unless every one tendering has a fair chance of bidding on the work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is right.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister knows that there was no use of any person else putting in a price for this work, because the dredge was already at work.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is entirely erroneous.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not think there is any doubt about that. I think that when this item of $150,000 was up instead of it being reduced by $25,000, as the minister states it ought to be, it ought to be almost wiped out, considering the way that these dredging matters have been carried on. The fact of my bringing the matter up here has saved the country $25,000, because it seems that it was the intention to put it through. We were led to believe that A. and R. Loggie got nothing at all, yet here are three contracts on which the following payments were made to them; one of $3,162, another of $31,362 and another of $11,000. It is no wonder that this man would travel all the way up here to give evidence in connection with saw-dust wharfs and such things as that.

Mr. CROSBY. Is that the man who bought the saw-dust wharf?

Mr. J. D. REID. That is the man who was willing to buy the saw-dust wharf and pay $500 more for it. We are voting him this session $45,000, and I would not hesitate, if I were making money like that, to buy a saw-dust wharf. He could afford to pay $10,000 for a saw-dust wharf and still be money ahead. This is the man who is giving evidence. We are paying him money to-night. We pay for this saw-dust wharf. He is buying a part of this wharf for $3,500. We are going to vote it right through because this man cannot wait.

Mr. CROSBY. Will you not give him the wharf?

Mr. J. D. REID. We give him the wharf, but in an indirect way. It is matters of this kind that make a person hesitate when he sees money going in this way, and I want to tell the minister that I am going to protest in the strongest terms against the way these contracts are being let. The minister stated a few minutes ago that he had had some experience, after we had brought this matter up, and that when the contracts were let they had cost the country $200,000 more. Of course, at that time it was very easy for these men to combine because they had got this work. They practically had it. The minister told them that they could have the work, and they combined and fixed the prices as they liked. I would hesitate if I were the minister to acknowledge that. The Dominion of Canada could be held up by a few dredge men. A great many of these works were not pressing, and as there was no work elsewhere for these dredges, they would not tie them up, and the minister could have said he would not give the contract unless the prices were fair. The minister might easily have saved $200,000 to the people of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does the hon. gentleman think that having called for tenders and the chief engineer having certified the price to be fair, I would have been justified in refusing to give the contract to the lowest tenderer?

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister is a business man, and if he were getting the work done for himself and knew the contractors were asking an enormous price he would not have accepted the tender, and he should not have allowed the country to be robbed in this case.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not think it was an enormous price.

Mr. J. D. REID. If you did not I would not hesitate to say you did not know your business. In the Gaspereau case the engineer certified 20 cents a yard a fair price, and it would seem as if the minister did not know his business when he let the contract at 90 cents a yard.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The engineer and two other experienced men said it was worth 90 cents.

Mr. J. D. REID. Certainly, because he knew if he did not certify he would be out of his job the next morning. The minister knows that all he has to do is to give these men a hint; of course, he would not say it openly; in this case he would say: John E. Moore is going to buy the St. John 'Telegraph,' and if you don't certify to that you will be out of a job the next day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would be sorry to say that to the engineer.

Mr. J. D. REID. I don't suppose you would say it, but you could give him a hint.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That would be as bad as saying it to him.

Mr. J. D. REID. Oh, no.

Mr. J. P. TURCOTTE. A Conservative might do that, but not a Liberal.

Mr. J. D. REID. I would be sorry to call myself a Liberal and support a minister who does that kind of thing. If the hon. member (Mr. Turcotte) thinks that right I hope he will always remain a Liberal and never come over to this side of the House. I must admit that the Minister of Public Works is a pretty good sinner, but he has some other confreres just as bad in the other departments. So far as these contracts are concerned, I will protest as hard as I can to prevent the public being robbed.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not complain of the hon. gentleman bringing the matter up to-night, but when the report of the Public Accounts Committee is submitted I shall welcome in the strongest way the very fullest discussion into these dredging matters. If there has been any remissness on the part of myself or any official of the department I shall be very glad to have it pointed out. I have endeavoured to do the very best possible in connection with all these contracts.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. If this item is going to be discussed let it stand.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not wish to discuss it now.

Mr. J. D. REID. I will not let any of these items through without proper discussion.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Then let it stand. We are anxious to get the money voted and the Supply Bill assented to before the Senate adjourns so that the Civil Servants may be paid.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let the item stand.

Telegraph lines, British Columbia, $9,000.

Mr. GOODEVE. Is there anything in this estimate for telephone lines on the Arrow lakes?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, this is for work already done.

Mr. BARNARD. What is the mileage of telephones in British Columbia?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will make a note of it and give the information on the main estimates.

Mr. BARNARD. Has the minister had an application for the extension of government telegraph lines to Stewart?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes. We are considering the question of either extending the line from Fort Simpson to Stewart or building a branch across from the mainland. There are difficulties in the way. It is possible we may establish one or two wireless stations, which would be considerably cheaper. I intend to ask my colleagues for an appropriation in the supplementary estimates for establishing that connection.

Mr. BARNARD. The work will be done in the coming season?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I hope so.

Telegraph lines, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $2,000.

Mr. J. D. REID. Are you going into the telegraph business in the other provinces?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The government owns a telegraph line in British Columbia, in Alberta and Saskatchewan, in Quebec, and in the lower provinces in portions of the country where a commercial system would not be established.

To pay for the services of administrator of the Yukon Territory for five months, $2,500.

Mr. J. D. REID. Who is getting that?

Mr. OLIVER. I think Arthur Wilson is the name. The governor was called out on business here, and this gentlemen administered while he was away.

Mr. J. D. REID. Who is Arthur Wilson?

Mr. OLIVER. He was in the employ of the local Yukon government for some time, but is not in that employ now.

Mr. J. D. REID. We were paying two salaries while the governor was here?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. J. D. REID. Was there not any other government official employed by the year who could have acted in that capacity while he was out?

Mr. OLIVER. There was no other person in the government employ whose position and responsibilities were such as to warrant his appointment as acting administrator.

Mr. PRICE. Why was the administrator called out?

Mr. OLIVER. For the purpose of consultation with the government. There are many intricate matters coming up that cannot be handled satisfactorily by letter or telegraph, and it is thought desirable that the commissioner should come to headquarters for consultation.

Mr. PRICE. Does it generally take five months for consultation?

Mr. OLIVER. No, but owing to climatic conditions, when the commissioner came out, it was not unreasonable that he should make a considerable stay.

Mr. PRICE. As a matter of fact, was he not after another job?

Mr. OLIVER. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. PRICE. Is he not likely to receive a position as collector of customs or something else at Vancouver?

Mr. OLIVER. Not to my knowledge. In fact, to my knowledge, it is quite the contrary.

Mr. J. D. REID. Perhaps the Minister of Inland Revenue can tell us whether or not there is to be a vacancy at Vancouver?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The report in the newspapers regarding the intended retirement of Mr. Bowell, at Vancouver, is absolutely untrue and unwarranted. Mr. Bowell has not the slightest intention of retiring, and, if he had, I am sure Mr. Henderson would not be an applicant for the position.

Allowance to the widow of the late John Gordon, labourer on repairs staff of the Sault Ste. Marie canal, who was killed while in the discharge of his duties, $1,000.

Mr. STANFIELD. I do not propose to object to this item, but I am sorry that the Minister of Railways is out of the city, because I wish to call his attention to an accident that happened on the Intercolonial a few days ago at Folleigh, in which three men were killed—an engineer, a fireman and a brakesman. The engineer leaves a family of five small children, and the brakesman a family of seven small children. These families, I believe, are left almost destitute outside of a few dollars which they receive from the insurance fund. I would ask the Minister of Finance to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the matter, and see if he cannot put something in the supplementary estimates for these people.

Mr. FIELDING. I shall be glad to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the remarks of the hon. gentleman.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FIELDING. I desire now to move concurrence to the items which the committee have passed this evening in order that the clerks may be able to prepare them for inclusion in a Supply Bill for to-morrow's house. I shall then ask you to allow me to drop the Supply Bill from the record in order that I may reintroduce it to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER. Shall these items be concurred in?

Mr. FIELDING. It is understood that we shall drop the Supply Bill previously introduced and that a more comprehensive Supply Bill will be brought in to-morrow.

Items concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. Immediately after the Supply Bill we shall take up the Bills of the Minister of Agriculture standing as items Nos. 19 and 20 on the order paper, and probably also the Bill of the Minister of Inland Revenue (No. 18) on the order paper, and the Bill of the hon. the Minister of public Works (No. 22) on the order paper. After that the House will be again moved into Committee of Supply and the Minister of Public Works will take up his estimates.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. The Immigration Bill will not go on to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. No, the Minister of the Interior will not be able to be present.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10 p.m.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER TRANSMISSION COMPANY.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (Minister of Public Works). I ask leave to lay on the table the report of the chief engineer of the Department of Public Works, the chief engineer of the Department of Railways and Canals, and the chief engineer of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, upon the original petitions and plans submitted by the St. Lawrence Power Company. This is dated Ottawa, December 15, 1908. I lay this on the table at the suggestion of the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) and, as there is great interest taken in this matter, and as the original report of the amended plans has been placed on record in 'Hansard', I will read the present report that it may appear in 'Hansard' also:

Department of Public Works of Canada,
Chief Engineer's Office,
Ottawa, December 15, 1908.

Sir,—We have the honour to report in regard to the petition of the St. Lawrence Power Company, Limited, to His Excellency the Governor General in Council, for permission to erect certain dams on the St. Lawrence river, as follows:—

No detail plans are before us and our report is predicated upon the information submitted.

First. A rough computation shows that it is possible to develop, approximately, 800,000 effective horse-power by the proposed dams; and that the creation of such an enormous quantity of power would be of great importance to the district in question, as experience has shown that in the proximity of such large developments of power, great industries are created; towns and cities grow up. The objections which arise, however, are somewhat serious.

First. The plans as submitted, contemplate interfering with the present Cornwall canal, and this, we take it, cannot be tolerated. The integrity of the Cornwall canal must be preserved, without any alteration whatever, and consequently, the plans submitted would have to be modified so as to preserve intact this most important navigation channel. It is true that the company contemplate the building of a separate lock above lock 20 to enter into the proposed new level, but such a lock requires navigation to pass along parallel with an over-flow weir dam which, necessarily, must take care of the great bulk of the discharge of the river; in consequence thereof, the side currents would be so great as to render navigation exceedingly dangerous. Furthermore, an accident to any of the dams would throw the whole system of navigation out of gear for a long time.

Second. The plans contemplate a single lift-lock on the American side, in the south channel, to take the place of the Cornwall canal. The channel from this proposed lock to the foot of Cornwall island has such a swift current and is so crooked as to render such a route dangerous; and it is not, therefore, in our opinion, a suitably located lock, having regard to the difficulties named. It does not seem needful at this stage to point out a more suitable site where a lock might be had, and where the difficulties of navigation would be lessened.

Third. The upper dam provided for in the proposed plans, running from the Long Sault island to the upper end of Barnhart island, is practically parallel with the thread of the stream, and is intended to be an over-flow weir, with ten stony sluices at each end of it. There can be no doubt whatever that this dam will, of necessity, have to take care of the regulation of the level of the river above it. The lower dam at the easterly end, which is in the form of a letter 'A,' connecting the mainland on the Ontario side with the lower end of Barnhart island, would not, in our opinion, be of material assistance for regulation.

Every advantage has been taken of the natural channels for the purpose of providing an economical development of the power, practically closing up the entire Canadian channel by this means and throwing the whole of the discharge into the American channel on the south of Barnhart island, the water to the north of Barnhart island being thrown into a pool.

The discharge over the upper dam in conjunction with the stony sluices would be of such volume, and the cross current so great, as to make it risky for a steamer to attempt to pass parallel with this dam, through the channel south of Sheik's island.

Fourth. The effect of ice and frazil on the up-stream end of the river is one upon which it would be most difficult to express any decided opinion. There is no doubt that frazil forms in the Galops rapids, and the Rapide du Plat; and that a large mass of more or less broken ice floats down the river continuously. The channel in the vicinity of Brockville is usually kept open for the ferry; but after the dam in question has been built, a field of board ice would be formed above its crest, and it will be difficult to say where the small cakes of ice, frazil, and anchor ice would go, if it did not fill up the space above the dam. The report of the Montreal Flood Commission of 1889, states that on the 8th of April two or three feet of board ice and from ten to twenty-four feet of frazil were found; that between the Lachine rapids and Varennes, in March, 1887, a distance of twenty miles, there were 99,216,000 cubic yards of field ice, and 252,601,000 cubic yards of frazil, and water amounting to 467,212,000 cubic yards, or a total of 819,029,000 cubic yards; which gives some little idea of the relative proportions.

The conditions for the creation of frazil were greater in the district just above described, than in the one we are considering. Nevertheless, there is ample opportunity for the creation of great quantities of frazil and broken fragments of solid ice at the points named, so that the up-stream effect likely to be created is something that no one could very well predict, but would, no doubt, be approximately similar to that found by the commission, with resulting damage at the foot of the Rapide du Plat and the Galops.

Fifth. The Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company run a daily line of steamers from Kingston to Montreal, and do a fairly large tourist business, which, we understand, is increasing. One of the features of the trip is running the Long Sault rapids, which, of course, would be destroyed by the proposed dam. Aside from this we question if a boat could make the trip from Kingston to Montreal, in a day, provided she had to be locked through the Cornwall canal or the proposed lock on the American side. Strenuous objections have been raised by the interests in question against the project.

Sixth. The possible destruction of the proposed dam by natural forces, or by the malice of any evil-intentioned person; (an earthquake might be the means of destroying the dam) certainly a very few pounds of dynamite in the hands of an intelligent man would be most disastrous. The volume of water which the dam would contain would be sufficiently great, if liberated in the form of a wave to at any rate destroy the greater portion of the town of Cornwall; certainly the canal, or that portion of it below the dam; and without doubt, the means of flooding Lake St. Francis and a large section of the land on the river bank protected by the Hungry bay dyke; besides unquestionably the Soulanges canal, as well as the villages fronting the river between Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis. Whether the effect of such a sudden break would be taken care of in Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis, is a question. Experience had on a very much smaller scale would lead one to expect that the damage would be continued on through the lower portion of Montreal, with the possible destruction of the Lachine canal as well.

Seventh. The plans show a very small percentage of development on the Canadian side; we should judge that over eighty per cent (80 per cent) is contemplated to be developed in the United States; and of course, this would be a very unfair distribution of the power in question. In any event, should the project receive consideration, considerable revision of the plans would have to be made, so as to secure a more equitable division of the power development.

Eighth. A vital point in connection with the whole scheme would be that all the plans of the dams, locks, &c., on the proposed works must be approved in advance by engineers responsible to Canada and to the United States, respectively, and upon which they must agree; the detail of the works in question should be passed upon by the joint approval of engineers from both countries. Whether this is a practical thing to secure we are unable to say, but it is obvious that the interest of Canada is such that no portion of the work in question could be allowed to be gone on with unless it received a most strict examination and inspection by engineers acting for this country. No doubt the United States authorities would take a similar attitude with regard to the question, although their interests are trivial compared with ours, on account of the fact that they have so little land on the St. Lawrence below the power in question.

Ninth. No private corporation should be permitted to have under its control the regulation of the height of water in such an important river as the St. Lawrence.

We are, sir,
Your obedient servants,
(Sgd.) EUGENE D. LAFLEUR,
Chief Engineer, Department of Public Works, Canada.
(Sgd.) M. J. BUTLER,
Chief Engineer, Department of Railways and Canals.
(Sgd.) WM. P. ANDERSON,
Chief Engineer, Department of Marine and Fisheries.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BEAUPARLANT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 175) to amend the Civil Service Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. BEAUPARLANT. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is to make liable to seizure a proportion of the wages earned by any person employed in any shape, manner or form by the government. There is something intolerable under the present system. A man earning a dollar and half a day as a labourer, doing sometimes the most painful work on the street or elsewhere, is liable to have his wages seized if he owes any person, while a public official earning a much larger salary in a much easier way may laugh at his creditors. A few days ago there was lying sick in the hospital a poor man to whom were due three small bills. These bills were presented to the three debtors employed in the public service and earning from $1,200 to $2,000 a year, and not one of them would give even a penny to this poor man. I contend that the law should prevent such a denial of justice. I am aware that there are some objections to this legislation, but notwithstanding those objections I believe that the principle of justice and equal rights to all should prevail. I have studied the question somewhat and I intend to speak more fully upon it at the second reading. I contend we ought to end the present system, and in my opinion the best way is to amend the Civil Service Act, chap. 15 of the statute of 1908 by adding section as 4a the following:

All moneys or salaries due or accruing due to any person employed by the government of Canada shall be liable to attachment in each and every province in the Dominion of Canada according to the laws and rules of procedure in force in such province.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 174) to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The House and the public are aware that the legislation of last session providing for the slowing down of trains at level crossings where accidents have occurred within the last ten years, has been a cause of great inconvenience not only to the railway people, but to the travelling public. The commercial travellers and others have objected to the delay caused, and those who are engaged in the receiving and despatching of freight are experiencing great difficulty by having their freight delayed a week or ten days because of this clause which was enacted last year, perhaps hurriedly. The section in the Act now reads:

No train shall pass over any highway crossing at rail level at a greater speed than ten miles an hour, if at such crossing an accident has happened subsequent to the first day of January, 1900, by a moving train causing bodily injury or death to a person using such crossing, unless and until such crossing is protected to the satisfaction of the board; and no train shall pass over any highway crossing at rail level at a greater speed than ten miles an hour in respect of which crossing an order of the board has been made to provide protection for the safety and convenience of the public and which order has not been complied with.

The Bill which I now move proposes to add in the first line of that clause the words:

If so ordered by the board.

The majority of those crossings where accidents have occurred are crossings at which the train can be seen half a mile both ways, but through carelessness of individuals, possibly through drunkenness, an accident has occurred, and automatically under this section the railway companies have to slow down their trains. The amendment which I propose would give the Railway Board authority to order the railway company to run at slow speed at certain crossings which have been pronounced dangerous, until such time as the crossings are protected. I think this provision will meet with the approval of the House, and my reason for presenting it now is that it may be considered when the Minister of Railways brings down his amendment to the Railway Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING moved that to-morrow the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council, may, from time to time, advance and pay to the harbour commissioners of Montreal, hereinafter called the corporation, in addition to the money, if any, heretofore authorized to be advanced to the corporation by the Governor in Council by any Act, and which has not at the date of the passing of any Act founded upon these resolutions been so advanced, such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of six million dollars, as are required:—

(a) to pay off and retire debentures of the corporation of the par value of one hundred thousand dollars, maturing in the year 1910, and,

(b) to enable the corporation to complete the construction of the terminal facilities of the port of Montreal, for which plans, specifications and estimates have been approved by the Governor in Council, and to construct such additional facilities as are necessary to properly equip the said port, and in respect of which plans, specifications and estimates have, previous to advances being made, been approved by the Governor in Council.

2. That during the period of construction of the terminal facilities mentioned in these resolutions the interest payable on the debentures receivable by the Minister of Finance in exchange for such advances shall be deemed to be money required to complete and to be part of the cost of construction thereof, and such interest may be paid out of the said sum of six million dollars.

3. That the corporation shall upon any advances being made deposit with the Minister of Finance, debentures of the corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue, and bearing interest payable half yearly, at the rate of three and one half per centum per annum.

4. That the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any Act founded on these resolutions shall be payable, subject to the second of these resolutions, out of the revenue of the corporation mentioned in section 8 of chapter 10 of the statutes of 1896, and shall be charged thereon as if the sums so advanced had been borrowed by the corporation under said chapter 10.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION OF GLASSWARE IN MILK TESTS.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER moved that to-morrow the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the testing, marking, sale and use of glassware used in connection with the testing of milk, and to authorize the Governor in Council to make regulations with respect thereto, and for the impostion of penalties for offences in contravention thereof.

Motion agreed to.

VACANCY ON MANITOBA BENCH.

Mr. A. HAGGART. Before the orders of the day are called I wish to question the government on a matter of some urgency. Some weeks ago, in answer to a question upon the order paper, the answer was given that representations had been made by the bar of Manitoba that there was urgency for the appointment of a judge, and that the arrears of litigation were increasing. Those who are suffering, the profession, and interested litigants, would now hear with respect, any further statement which the government has to make as to when they will take the necessary legislative, or executive action to fill the vacancy.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). This is not by any means the first experience I have had in the short time I have occupied the position of Minister of Justice, in which upon a provincial legislature providing for the appointment of another judge, a desire for great haste has developed on the part of people interested, that the appointment should be made without delay. This judgeship in Manitoba, to which the hon. gentleman alludes, was created, I think, more than fifteen months ago. I may not be exactly accurate as to the time, but certainly it is not of any recent date. It was created by a provincial statute which was to come into force upon its being proclaimed by the provincial government; and having been put on the statute-book of the province in that condition, it so remained without anybody hearing of any grievance or difficulty in regard to the litigation of the province until the 9th of February, of this year, when it was proclaimed, and on the same day I received a telegram from an official of the Manitoba government stating that the Act has been brought into force. Every one knows, I presume, that upon provincial legislation taking place establishing a judgeship, no appointment to that position can be made until the salary is provided. Such an appointment would be very liable to be nugatory if there were no salary assigned to the position by competent authority. The salary can be attached only by legislation of this parliament, and I would respectfully submit to the consideration of the hon. gentleman that there has not been any undue delay since the 9th of February last, on the part of this parliament in passing such legislation, which is a step necessary to be taken before it would even be a proper thing on the part of the government or the Minister of Justice to consider the selecting of an individual to fill this position. I have no doubt that in due course this parliament will take such legislative action in the premises as to it seems right, but I do think that if the Manitoba legislature, which created this judgeship, or the Manitoba government, which contains the Attorney General of the province who is responsible for the administration of justice in the province, could sit quietly for more than twelve months with this statute on the books inoperative before any action was taken to bring it into force, there should not be any particular outcry if this parliament waits two months before it passes the necessary legislation to make the provincial statute effective.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to ask when I may expect two returns to orders of this House, one of December 15, and one of November 24. One is in reference to the appointment of a government weigher in the port of Montreal, and the other, I imagine, is in the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. FIELDING. We will have the information looked up.

NEW YORK STATE CANALS.

Mr. GEORGE H. PERLEY. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the short debate which we had the other day on the New York State canals, I have received a letter from the deputy superintendent of public works at Albany, which I have shown to the Minister of Justice, and which he has suggested should be put on 'Hansard.' Therefore, with the permission of the House, I will read it:

FREDERICK C. STEVENS, Superintendent.
WINSLOW M. MEAD, Deputy.
State of New York,
Superintendent of Public Works,
Albany, March 15, 1910.

Discrimination against Canadian boats.

Mr. Geo. H. Perley,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

My dear sir,—I am in receipt of a copy of the House of Commons debate of Friday, March 11, and have noted the discussion which appears on page 5323, with reference to the subject of discrimination against Canadian craft by the New York State canals, and I note with pleasure that the communication which I sent you bearing on this subject under date of February 16, which I endeavoured to have clearly stated all the facts, was placed in the records by you.

As additional information I would state that there are no navigable canals in New York State which are not owned and controlled by the state. The Delaware and Hudson canal, which was formerly owned by the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, which later became the Delaware and Hudson Company, operating a system of railways, has passed out of the hands of the Delaware and Hudson Company, and is not at the present time operated as a canal. There are numerous other small canals in different parts of the State, but these are all power canals in which your government would be in no way interested.

If after your full statement as to the attitude which this department takes there is any question in any one's mind as to the fair treatment which would be accorded Canadian-owned craft I can only suggest that your Canadian interests put the matter to test by offering Canadian-owned craft for clearance upon the State canals. I can assure you that no discrimination would be shown, but that all that would be required would be compliance with the provisions of section 172, of chapter 13 of the laws of 1909, known as the Canal Law, and whose provisions apply to boats owned in other States of the Union as well as to Canadian craft. Certainly the provisions of the Act referred to are not difficult of compliance.

Yours very truly,
WINSLOW M. MEAD,
Deputy Supt. Public Works.

I understood that the Minister of Justice would have his department look into this question and report to the House concerning it. I therefore thought that, if agreeable to the minister, this letter should be considered by the department at the same time.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

The House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FIELDING. The House yesterday, in Committee of Ways and Means, made the necessary provision by two resolutions to cover the appropriations which had been voted in Committee of Supply, up to that time. Subsequently the Committee of Supply took up some further estimates, and these were dealt with late last night. It becomes necessary that we should, in Committee of Ways and Means, pass a resolution covering the appropriations so made. I beg to move:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1910, the sum of $630,767.27 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

This simply covers the items voted yesterday in Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to, resolution reported, read the first time and the second time and agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 173) for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively the 31st March, 1910, and the 31st March, 1911. He said: This Bill includes both the items dealt with previously. We did introduce a Supply Bill yesterday, but later withdrew it in order to introduce a Bill in a more comprehensive form this afternoon.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time, and passed.

INSECTS, PESTS AND DISEASES ACT.

Bill (No. 20) to prevent the introduction or spreading of insects, pests and diseases destructive to vegetation—Mr. Fisher—read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. FISHER. I gave some explanation of this measure at its introduction. On a former occasion, an Act known as the San José Scale Act was passed by this parliament for preventing the introduction of that particular pest. That Act has proved effective, but within the last year we have been menaced by some other pests, notably the brown tail moth, which was introduced into the United States from Europe, and has already created a great deal of damage to orchards and trees in that country. Fortunately, only a few have got into the Dominion. Last year we were threatened with an invasion of that pest, and I appealed to the importers of nursery stock to allow their stock to be inspected and any of it destroyed on which the eggs or nests of this moth were discovered. To the credit of our nursery men, they co-operated willingly with the experts of the department. At the same time I had no authority to proceed by Act of parliament, and we were not able to do what I think is right and fair, that is pay compensation to the men whose stock we destroyed. The same condition has obtained this winter. I have had several men out examining the importations of nursery stock, and again the importers showed their willingness to acquiesce in the necessary steps taken in their own interest and that of the country. I consider it necessary, however, that there should be power given the department by parliament to act in this matter, because at any moment any individual importer might refuse to take the steps necessary and we would be powerless to compel him. Such refusal might result in the introduction of the pests and thus render almost completely useless the sacrifices of other people. Under these circumstances, I had this Bill drawn up, after consultation with the law officers and the expert officers of the department on entomology and botany. I might add that by reason of the fact that we never can tell what form these insect menaces will assume, we cannot define in the Bill clearly and distinctly the steps necessary to be taken. Certain steps are required to protect us against the San José scale and certain others against the brown tail moth, and in the case of other insect pests, we would have again to take different steps. Therefore, I ask that power be given the Governor in Council to define what is necessary to be done and authorize the department to do it. In that respect we have followed very much the line of an Act which has become law in Great Britain recently, and which I believe has worked satisfactorily there.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will this necessitate the appointment of a number of officials at different ports, and if so, how many will be appointed? Will any of the government officials now at these ports be able to undertake the work without making new appointments?

Mr. FISHER. I do not anticipate the appointment of any officers at the ports of entry. We would have to frame regulations so that we would be notified of the arrival of packages of nursery stock and would then have to send some one to inspect the stock before it was forwarded through the country. We have now stations at which nursery stock is permitted to be imported and fumigated against the San José scale. We might have to take some steps, perhaps by proclamation, that in cases where there was danger of the importation or the invasion of an insect, nursery stock from an infected country could only come in at these ports, and then the officers who are now at these ports dealing with the San José scale would be able to deal with the nursery stock. Sometimes we might have to send an expert entomologist to a port when occasion arose, but there is no expectation or intention of appointing a large number of officers for this purpose.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I cannot help feeling that the Bill is a step in the right direction.

Mr. FIELDING. It will facilitate the passage of the Supply Bill if I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

INSECTS, PESTS AND DISEASES ACT.

House in committee on Bill (No. 20) to prevent the introduction or speading of insects, pests and diseases destructive to vegetation.—Mr. Fisher.

Mr. BURRELL. The object of this Bill, as I gather, is to give the Minister of Agriculture greater power to deal with insects and all pests and diseases destructive to vegetation. The Bill, by section 10, repeals the San José Scale Act of 1898. This Bill gives very much larger powers, is wider in its scope and it is possible that in the exercise of those powers there may be some clash with the provincial jurisdiction. I would, therefore, like rapidly to run over the considerations that one is anxious to put forward with regard to a measure of this kind. About the year 1895 the San José scale was first discovered on this continent, or rather in the eastern part of the continent, by Professor Howard, of Washington, and those of us who are interested in commercial horticulture are aware how rapidly this particular insect spread all over the United States and Canada. It was about 1897 or 1898 that the first case was discovered in Canada, not very far from where I lived in the province of Ontario. The second case happened to come under my personal notice about four miles from St. Catharines and it proved that this insect had become established in Ontario. After some discussion, which I do not want to go into now, and after all the information that Professor Howard and other authorities could give with regard to the danger involved in the establishment of an insect of this kind, the government introduced what was called the San José Scale Act of 1898. There have been some steps taken to try and control this insect pest by the provincial government of Ontario, and very vigorous measures were adopted which have cost the government of Ontario a great many thousands of dollars since. But the Bill introduced by the government in 1898 dealt only with this one insect, the San José scale, and the operations of the Bill were directed against it in only one way, that is to say, by the inspection of importations of nursery stock at certain points of entry designated by the minister. Therefore, as far as federal powers go, the only method under which they dealt with inspection or with any comprehensive system of inspection with regard to insect pests and diseases was that which I have outlined. This Bill, now before the committee, gives power to inspect and deal with all insects, pests and diseases destructive to vegetation, and it gives wide powers which, if exercised indiscriminately, may perhaps lead to unfortunate results. We have these powers given in sections 5, 6, 7 and 8. The minister may appoint inspectors and other persons to perform this work and may exercise certain other powers which are set out clearly in these four clauses. The minister, under this Bill, would have ample power to deal in a very comprehensive way with this matter in any province in the Dominion. I may add that I am aware that the jurisdiction is concurrent, that is to say that while the various provinces have power to deal with all these things, apparently the power lies also equally with the Dominion authorities. Of course, the minister will understand that I am not speaking in any spirit of hostility with reference to Dominion regulations or to the powers given under this or any other Bill, but I just want to make clear to the minister and to the committee what the position is in British Columbia in regard to these various matters. The minister himself is familiar with many of the conditions there. In British Columbia 21 years ago we established what is known as the Board of Horticulture. There was a special Act passed for that purpose and that Board of Horticulture was composed of three members representing the various portions of the province and also having as members the Minister of Agriculture and the deputy minister of agriculture. We have two statutory meetings a year, but during last year we held about five meetings. The members act in an advisory capacity to the government, that is they advise them on every kind of question and every piece of legislation with regard to horticultural matters. They formulate and alter regulations from time to time in the best interests of the horticultural industry. We have also established under the authority of the Act and under the authority of the board, fumigation stations, a central inspection office with a chief inspector and something like thirty sub-inspectors. I have been a member of that board for something like four years and I am fairly familiar with its operations and what was aimed at in its creation. We have been so careful and so rigid in our methods and in our control of the fruit industry under this Act and under this board that I think I am safe in saying that it has resulted in a cleanliness in our orchards and fruit production that places them second to none on the whole continent. We have followed the practice of systematically inspecting, examining and fumigating nursery stock from any part of the world or from eastern Canada, because, although it is true that the Dominion government has fumigating stations we do not take that as a sufficient safeguard of our own horticultural interests. Then, we also have a thorough system of inspecting every tree that comes in because the tree itself may be a medium of danger and infection either by fungus or insect pest. We, also, examine all the fruit which comes in from the Orient, the United States, Australasia, Eastern Canada, or any other point. We met with a great deal of opposition from the wholesale importers of fruit in the establishment of a thorough system of inspection, and that opposition was so strong at times as to be unpleasant. It is not uninteresting to our eastern friends to know that the result of our efforts has been the importation of a better class of fruit than formerly; the growers are not exposed to the same danger of infection, the dealers have been benefited by handling a superior class of fruit, and the consumers get a better quality. The horticultural Board Act has been recently amended so as to increase the membership of the board in recognition of the continually increasing development of the industry in our province. We have appointed several trained inspectors, entomologists and horticulturalists who have been trained in the eastern colleges, and in this way we have strengthened very much the machinery with which we are working. As a result of all this, the status of the British Columbia fruit industry is now so high that I do not believe there is another fruit area of equal extent—we have 100,000 acres now under orchard—in America or in the world that is so free from the leading fungus or insect pests. The Minister of Agriculture has been through our province, and he has had excellent opportunities for seeing our virtues, and perhaps our faults. I may say that it is a matter of very much regret to us that the minister was not able to visit one or two of our prominent districts, such as Kelowna, of which he only got a cursory glimpse, for reasons which he himself understands. I regret that all the more, because at Kelowna we have a large acreage under tobacco, and a very interesting tobacco industry there. I think the minister will admit, from his experience in British Columbia, that every word I have said is true, and that we are producing a remarkably fine commercial product which will hold its own in any market in the world. By the way, there is one little touch I would like to give to the Minister of Agriculture, and I do not think it will do any harm. I quote from a horticultural magazine which has been recently established, the following excerpt from a leading article:

The 'Star' of December 11, in its report of a meeting of the Pomological and Fruit Growing Society of the province of Quebec, held in the Macdonald College on the 10th ultimo, quotes the Hon. Sydney Fisher as saying that 'the prairies offered a great market for apples, and British Columbia was recognizing this. But the flavour of the British Columbia apple was not to be compared with that of the province of Quebec.'

Of course it is just possible that the Minister of Agriculture regards the British Columbia apple as so much superior to that of Quebec that it is not to be considered in the same class. But considering that it was a Quebec audience to whom the minister was speaking and that he referred to British Columbia in the negative sense we are forced to conclude that Mr. Fisher, if correctly reported, intended his audience to understand that in his opinion the British Columbia apple was very inferior to that of Quebec.

If one of Mr. Fisher's subordinates were to commit an indiscretion like that he would not only be promptly called to account by the press of the country who knew better, but in all probability he would be severely reprimanded for a breach of etiquette by the minister himself.

Of course, we have to make allowances for the Minister of Agriculture giving an ex parte utterance to an audience in his own province, but as a British Columbian, he cannot expect me to assent to any such heretical doctrine as he lays down there. As a matter of fact, the questions as to the superiority of fruit are in a sense rather dependent upon local conditions in every province, and these local conditions make enormous differences. I venture to think that I could go into one province and take certain samples of fruit and say they were superior to anything produced in another province, and similarly in another province, I could find the result reversed. This, of course, depends altogether on the conditions under which the fruit was grown. I am very certain, however, that the Minister of Agriculture had no ground for making such a sweeping statement as is attributed to him here.

Mr. BLAIN. Did he say anything about the Ontario apple?

Mr. BURRELL. That was probably too delicate a question for him to touch. I would like to call the attention of the minister, and of the committee, to what we have done in British Columbia in the matter of inspection and fumigation, because it will be of interest to the country as a whole. Under the provincial methods of inspection, from January until May of last year we inspected 660,000 seedlings and grafts, and 250,000 standard trees, and a large amount of mixed nursery stock. Out of this amount we condemned—and the committee will understand that except those which came from eastern Ontario, all were fumigated in the Dominion station—we condemned 12,500 standard fruit trees.

Mr. FISHER. What were they condemned for?

Mr. BURRELL. I have not the information here to answer that. No doubt some of them would be condemned because of fungus and insect diseases.

Mr. FISHER. It is only fair to say that the Dominion fumigation station only fumigates for the San José scale and does not pretend in any way to deal with any other disease.

Mr. BURRELL. I quite understand that, but there is a general feeling that the strength of the fumigation required for the San José scale would practically insure safety against all other insects except perhaps the brown-tailed moth.

Mr. FISHER. Unless the hon. gentleman can show that his organization found San José scale on the plants that went through the Dominion fumigation station, it is not fair to cast any reflection on the work of that station.

Mr. BURRELL. I will touch on that point in a moment. From the month of January to October we inspected 96,600 boxes of fruit and condemned 12,200 boxes, and in addition to that, we have also carried the work of inspection to rice, for the weevil, and out of 163,000 sacks of rice we fumigated 14,500. I hope the minister will understand that I am not particularly reflecting on the work of the Dominion fumigation station, except that I would point out that for other reasons (unless a change has been made within the last year) that station has never been satisfactory. To my mind, and to the mind of a great many of our leading fruit growers, the Dominion fumigating station has not been quite up to the mark in the past. We do not want to run any risks in the province of British Columbia, and when we established our fumigating station, we took care to get all the latest methods and improvements to effectually meet the evil, not only in regard to the actual fumigation itself, but also in regard to packing and unpacking, drying out, subjection to frosts, and things of that kind. The actual fumigating room in the Dominion station is 8 by 8, 16 by 8 by 6 by 4 high, and as I think the minister knows, a great part of the platform where the stock is unloaded from the railway cars is exposed and open, and there is comparatively little room to move along it. The consequence is that only a small quantity can be fumigated at a time in a chamber of that kind. The stock has to be put on the floor, generally in bundles, and fairly tightly packed, and it is pretty hard for the gas to penetrate, in a thoroughly effective way, all the nursery stock under these conditions. Then there is the further disadvantage of the stock being exposed to drying out, and the difficulty of handling it. The minister apparently did not want to trust us entirely with the duty of fumigating, probably he saw difficulties in the way. However, when we put up our fumigation station we consulted Dr. Willis Johnson the state entomologist of New Jersey. The fumigation station has four rooms. The actual fumigation room was 11 feet by 16 feet by 18 feet. The stock is put on racks, where the fumes penetrate it very freely. The rooms are all air-proof and frost-proof. So that we have a good many advantages in that way. I do not say whether or not we discovered the San José scale alive after the stock passed through the Dominion fumigating room, though I think we did. However, we did discover the borers, the aphis and other pests; so that we have had to make a very thorough and systematic inspection of the stock after it passed the Dominion fumigation station. I do not want to delay the discussion of the Bill now, as it will be taken up later clause by clause. I simply say that we have all this elaborate provincial machinery, and we hope for development on sound lines of our valuable and increasingly valuable fruit industry. I have endeavoured to get into as close touch as possible with the leading men connected with the fruit industry in the province, and there is a strong feeling among them that although the jurisdiction is concurrent, we should be very loath to relinquish any of our organization or our methods or our efforts, and we hope that under this Bill, which gives the minister much larger and wider powers, there will not be any clash between the federal and the provincial authorities. I desire to say here that I recognize that the minister, in bringing forward this Bill, is earnestly desirous of coping with anything injurious to the fruit industry of Canada. I frankly make that admission; but I thought it well at this stage to point out what our general attitude was, so that the minister might give a full explanation of the modus operandi of this measure in order that we should have a clear understanding of it before it went into actual effect.

Mr. FISHER. I appreciate fully the position which the hon. member takes, and I take no exception whatever to any of his statements. In fact, I rather welcome them, because I think that his description of what is being done in British Columbia is one of the best proofs of the advisability of a Bill of this kind being introduced and made applicable to the whole of Canada. I will not delay the House by any reference to my hon. friend's personal opinions of British Columbia fruit, and that of Quebec; but I do not hesitate here, in the face of my hon. friend and others, to maintain the character and quality of the fruit of the province from which I come. I consider the apples of Quebec, as far as quality and flavour are concerned, to be infinitely superior to anything produced not only in British Columbia, but in the whole world.

Mr. BURRELL. I cannot allow that.

Mr. RHODES. What about Nova Scotia?

Mr. FISHER. I am not going to make an exception of even Nova Scotia. My hon. friend must not accuse me of having made ad captandum statements to the people of Quebec, because when I was in British Columbia I told the people there that if they obtained great prizes abroad, for their apples, it was only because the fruit of Quebec had not been shown at the same exhibition. I appreciate the quality of the fruit of British Columbia, I recognize the great fruit-growing capabilities of that province, and I congratulate it not only on the quality and beauty of its fruit, but on the fact that in recent years especially the increase in fruit-growing in British Columbia has been enormous, and that its prospects in the near future are still brighter. Under these circumstances I do not hesitate, while standing up for my own province, as far as quality is concerned, to recognize the superior producing character of the great province of British Columbia in regard to actual production. My hon. friend twitted me with not having visited Kelowna. I could not visit every place in the province, and the connections were such that I could not make it convenient to visit Kelowna; but I can assure my hon. friend and the people of Kelowna that I have not forgotten them nor their hospitable intentions, nor their great interest in fruit-growing, and tobacco-growing, and I hope very soon to give an evidence of the value I place on their tobacco-growing work by aiding it in some substantial way. Having disposed of these extraneous matters, let me come to the Bill before the House. I accept my hon. friend's compliment in the spirit in which it is given; but I have introduced this Bill in the interest not only of fruit-growing, but of tree-growing in the Dominion of Canada. Insect pests attack other things than fruit trees and fruit, and it is just as important to protect our forests and shrubbery as our orchards, and our fruit trees. But I recognize also the good work being done in British Columbia, under the Provincial Act. If as good work were done all over Canada as has been done in British Columbia, under that Act, the necessity for this Bill would be to a large extent removed. I believe that the inspection under the British Columbia Act is as good as any on the continent of America, or perhaps, even better. I have watched it with great interest, and have sympathized with the efforts of the British Columbia people to legislate for the protection of their orchards and forests. I think the work done there has been excellent for the province, and has had excellent results. In that respect my hon. friend and I are absolutely at one.

I would like to remind my hon. friend that when the fumigating station at Vancouver was established, the importations of nursery stock into British Columbia were far less than to-day, and the station was then established on a scale which Dr. Fletcher considered sufficient. I am aware that its capacity and arrangements are to-day not quite what they might be, and had it not been for my expectation of passing this Bill this session, I would have taken steps last year to re-arrange and improve that station. I thought it possible however, that when this Bill came into force we might have to provide for other work besides fumigating the San José scale. In these fumigating stations we have not attempted to more than protect against the introduction of the San José scale and for that purpose there is just one kind of fumigation. But in dealing with other pests, we may have to use other methods, because that which might be effective in the one case might not necessarily be in others. I am not sufficiently familiar with the insect pests to say what these are, but it is quite possible that there are other pests which the fumigation would not destroy. It is therefore quite possible that the provincial government inspectors may have found in nursery stock that passed through our fumigating stations in Vancouver other insect pests. My hon. friend seems to think it possible that they have found the San José scale. I do not think so. Since the establishment of these stations, not only in British Columbia but in the other provinces, not one case of San José scale has been in any way traced to imported stock, and all imported stock goes through our fumigating stations.. Under these circumstances, I am justified in assuming that these stations have been effective and that my hon. friend's impression is not founded on fact. I can only regret extremely that if, on any occasion, the inspectors of the provincial government found anything of the kind, they did not take trouble to report to us, so that we might investigate and remedy any deficiency or carelessness which might have occured at any of our stations. We have no report that anything of the kind has occured, no complaint has been made to us, and I think that I am justified in assuming that the impression under which my hon. friend labours is absolutely unfounded.

The provisions of this Bill are very similar in a general way to those of the British Columbia Act which my hon. friend has praised. I did not take that Act particularly as my model although it was thoroughly studied by us. What we took was rather the Act of Great Britain which seemed to suit our purposes here. and we have drafted a Bill which we think will cover the same ground and accomplish the same purposes as the British Act.

The conflict which my hon. friend thinks possible between this parliament and the provincial legislature I trust will not arise. As far as I am concerned, wherever it can be shown that the provincial authorities are taking all the necessary steps, I shall be very loath to interfere. I am not at all anxious for unnecessary work, and I have no desire to assume any responsibility or labour which does not fall naturally to my lot. If a provincial legislature takes the necessary precautions and carries them out efficiently, as I think the British Columbia people are doing, I shall not interfere with its work or try to overlap or duplicate it. But at the same time I think that an Act of this kind should, in the interests of the whole country, be passed and applied to the Dominion at large and not merely to one province. Otherwise while British Columbia might be very well safeguarded, the rest of the Dominion might not, and the danger of spreading infection elsewhere is entirely outside the purview of the British Columbia authorities. By means of a general law we can protect the whole Dominion much better than it can be by any number of Provincial Acts. I do not understand that my hon. friend objects at all to the passage of this Bill. I am sure he recognizes that it is quite within the competence of this parliament. That opinion I do not presume to give on my own authority, but I have the assurance of the Department of Justice that this Bill is absolutely within our jurisdiction. British Columbia may have no doubt a similar jurisdiction within the limits of that province, but I understand that by the British North America Act, where jurisdiction is given to both provincial and federal parliaments, and a conflict arises, the federal authority must prevail. I can, however, assure my hon. friend that I shall not undertake to interfere in any way with the provincial work. It would be only when I found it necessary in the interests of the country at large, that anything should be done in any province, that I would take such steps as this Bill empowers me to take.

As the results of our work, done with the concurrence and assistance of the importers, willingly given to us—but possibly given to us because they anticipated a Bill of this kind and felt that the sacrifices they made this year would be followed up by continuous safety in the future—by reason of that work, we have been able to inspect 1,700,000,000 seedlings since the first of January, and found 293 nests of the brown tail moth. I have no doubt that each nest contained 200 to 300 caterpillars which would mean some 60,000 caterpillars or more, and if these had gone abroad throughout Canada and had been able to reproduce themselves in the way these insects do, we might easily have had this coming season a very severe and expensive visitation of this pest. That was done by volunteer work with only one official in addition to our regular staff, and I have no doubt we will be able to do our work more efficiently by having it legally recognized.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I have already said I am in favour of this measure, and since the minister has given us to understand it is not going to be interfered with in any way by the provincial governments, we can more readily acquiesce in it. I was sorry to hear the minister say that he has stated that the apples of the province of Quebec were very much superior to those of any other part of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FISHER. Of any other place in the world.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I consider that that statement is a very narrow statement for a minister of the Crown to make. I certainly feel justified in criticising and condemning it in the strongest kind of language.

Mr. FISHER. Go ahead.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Because while the minister may take the position that the apples of Quebec are superior, and may believe it, yet such a statement from a minister of the Crown sent broadcast throughout our land, and possibly through other lands, is not justified. It would be wise for him to retract that statement and place himself in a correct position before the people.

Mr. MILLER. Why should the minister be asked to retract it? I do not think there is anything narrow in it. If he believes it to be true that is the statement he ought to make.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the hon. gentleman believe it to be true?

Mr. MILLER. It does not make any difference whether I do or not. If the minister believes it to be true he had a right to say so. I have no doubt that if the minister had been speaking in the Northwest Territories, or in Quebec, or in Ontario, of the wheat of the west he would have said there is no wheat grown in Canada equal to the No. 1 hard.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The hon. gentleman forgets that the apples from the county which he represents bring the highest price in the English markets of any Canadian apples.

Mr. MILLER. I am not arguing that because I have not sufficient knowledge. If the Minister of Agriculture thought that the apples grown in Quebec were the best it was not narrow to express that opinion.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Miller) is in a different position from the Minister of Agriculture. It is quite right for the hon. gentleman to make a statement about fruit grown in his riding, but the Minister of Agriculture is a prominent man to whom the apple growers look for reasonable, and fair statements, and for him to make such a statement is narrow.

Mr. MILLER. An opinion expressed by the Minister of Agriculture has more weight than a statement by a private member, but I think the Minister of Agriculture has just as good a right to be frank and honest in the statements he makes as any private member, and it seems to me rather a sign of narrowness to criticise the statement than to make it.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The minister has said that the apples from Quebec are the best in Canada, or in the world. That is his individual opinion.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. He should get the English buyers, and the buyers of the world to agree with him on that point. The apples from the upland in Grey, over to the Georgian bay are known as Georgian bay fruit in the apple markets in England and Scotland, and bring the best price, except the hand-picked apples from British Columbia. These are facts that cannot be gainsaid, and it ill becomes the hon. member for Grey to speak as he did. I consider that comparisons of this kind are very odious, as we used to write at the head of our copy books, and I am surprised that the Minister of Agriculture would begin making comparisons as between the products of different sections of the country when they are not borne out by the facts. Does the minister not think it would be better, instead of bringing in a Bill providing for an inspection of, at the most, a casual kind, to stop the importation of seedlings or fruit trees, except those of a special kind that should be admitted by special instructions of the Department of Agriculture? We all know that some years ago the black knot was introduced in that way, and it has destroyed all the plum and cherry trees, and is to-day to be found in the wild trees along the roadside. Moths of various kinds, the San José scale, and other pests have been introduced, and the only way to prevent this is to prevent the importation of seedlings. We can produce plenty of them in this country, and if we keep out the foreign seedlings and grafts of trees of this kind we will be doing the farmers a great benefit. The fruit growers can buy Canadian trees as cheaply as American. The only reason they buy in the United States is because they get the trees cheaply, and to prohibit the importation of seedlings would encourage the nursery business, especially in the province of Quebec, where, I believe, they could grow better nursery stock than can be grown in New York state or any state where they produce this stock. Shut them out for a given time, five or ten years.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend is perhaps not familiar with the facts of the case. In the first place this stock came from France, not from the United States. Of the nursery trees grown in Canada, I am well within the mark when I say that not one-tenth of one per cent of them are not grafted on imported stock. Now, if my hon. friend's statement were to be carried out, it would absolutely put a stop, for a number of years, to the growing of nursery stock in Canada. My hon. friend is not aware, perhaps, that this stock is imported by the nurserymen of Canada in the form of little seedlings, and on these are grafted, when they arrive, the scions taken from Canadian trees. They have not got this stock in Canada.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Why?

Mr. FISHER. Because they do not grow it.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. That is, they can buy it abroad cheaper than they can grow it.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE But these seedlings can be grown here.

Mr. FISHER. But, if the nurserymen were debarred from bringing them in, it would stop the growth of Canadian nursery stock for several years. They might get back to it, but they could not do it at the present time. That is the first point. The second point is that the suggestion which my hon. friend makes was carried out with the introduction of the San José Scale Act. At that time, we absolutely prohibited the importation of any trees or stock from the countries infested with the San José scale. But the very men on whose behalf my hon. friend is now speaking petitioned this government and parliament to relax the law and make arrangements by which they could import nursery stock.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Who did that?

Mr. FISHER. The nurserymen, the farmers, the fruit growers—everybody concerned. And the result was that during the next year—I feel confident that it was within eighteen months of the passing of the Act—we had to amend the Act so as to provide stations at which this nursery stock could be imported. I sympathize with the view taken by my hon. friend, but if he will go to the people who are engaged in this business and make the proposition he makes here, I am sure he will find them unanimously against it.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. That may be so. But it is because it happens to enable them to make a few dollars. Many of these institutions are quite willing to sacrifice the fruit industry of the whole country to make a few dollars for themselves. But the minister should look at it from the point of view of the whole country, and not from the point of view of a special interest. Another point I would like to ask about is whether the minister has taken steps to prevent the importation of potatoes from Newfoundland? For I understand that, according to the report of his own department, the potatoes of Newfoundland are infected with a disease which would ruin the crops in Canada in a very few years.

Mr. FISHER. All the steps have been taken that I have power to take, and I am asking for this Bill to be enabled to take further steps. I have notified the customs authorities, and have asked them to inform my department immediately when entry is made of potatoes from Newfoundland. I do not think that any have been made, but if any should be made I will send my inspector there to destroy them. I have notified the people of the maritime provinces, who sometimes do get potatoes from Newfoundland—they are the only people in Canada who do—and have told them of the danger and warned them against using any such potatoes. So, I have taken every step that it is competent for me to take. I have not been able to forbid the entry of potatoes from Newfoundland, for the very reason that I have not an Act such as is here proposed. It is because I wish authority to go further that I am asking the House to pass this Bill.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. So far, so good.

Mr. FISHER. There are conditions when absolute prohibition may be necessary, but there are others when inspection is necessary, and still others when fumigation is sufficient. This proposed measure will enable me to take whichever of these steps seems necessary. I must trust to my expert advisers, the entomologist and the botanist of the experimental farm, who are men of eminence in their several domains, first for information as to the existence of a danger, and second, as to the means to be taken to meet it. Among other things, I ask authority to destroy any infected or infested stock or vegetable matter which may come in, and, when necessary, to destroy packages, and also to grant compensation, as is only fair and right, in some cases to the people who lose thereby. I repeat that if absolute prohibition were exercised to-morrow and the bringing in of these seedlings for the purpose of grafting were completely prohibited, it would paralyze the nursery trade of Canada for some years. I am sure my hon. friend would not wish to do that, and I have no doubt he has spoken without full consideration and without the intimate knowledge which, by reason of my connection with this work, I have necessarily acquired.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I would also ask whether the minister intends to cover grain under this Bill. He might as well take power in relation to seed grain as well. Medical men claim that the corn grown in certain of the states, especially in the southern states, is at present giving humanity a terrible disease known as pellagra. Also, I believe, a great many of the noxious weeds brought into Canada are brought in with foreign grain. The minister should be empowered under this Bill to stop this traffic, as a policeman on the corner stops the road traffic in order to prevent danger.

Mr. FISHER. The Bill covers that. It provides in relation to 'any vegetable matter.' As to weeds, the Seed Control Act applies pretty thoroughly to that, as it covers seeds imported as well as seeds grown in Canada.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I hope the minister (Mr. Fisher) will retract the statement made as to the province of Quebec and the apples grown there. It seems to me a narrow, provincial view for a minister of the Crown of this Dominion to take. The hon. minister represents the whole Dominion, and not one province or a part of a province only. On what authority does the hon. gentleman base his statement? Let the hon. minister come into the western part of Ontario, even into the district of Grey, represented by the hon. member (Mr. Miller) who took exception to the statement I made some time ago, and he will find that the apples grown there are being disposed of in the markets of the world at prices above even those that the apples of the province of Quebec can command. And, if he will look at the returns, he will see that a very small proportion of our apples are grown in the province of Quebec. I am really surprised that the minister should take the position he does. As an instance, take my own district. The men who are engaged in the fruit industry there have to take into consideration this fact, that the Minister of Agriculture says that the best apples that can be grown are grown in the province of Quebec, and I suppose he means to infer that the best place to engage in that industry is the province of Quebec. If that is not a narrow, provincial policy for the minister to take I do not know what a narrow, provincial policy is. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) would not dare to go up in his riding and confirm the statement made by the minister.

Mr. MILLER. I will dare to make any statement in my riding that I dare to make here, no matter what it is, and I say again that the hon. gentleman is not as wise on this question as he really thinks he is. I wish that the Minister of Agriculture would come into my riding and say anything that would spur up the agriculturists there to pay much more attention to their orchards than they do.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That has nothing to do with this statement.

Mr. MILLER. It has this to do with it, that it shows that the hon. member for East Lambton does not know the condition in my riding as well as I know it myself. I believe that in my riding they can grow apples to very good advantage, and I believe that if the Minister of Agriculture will come up there, as I trust he will, and say something that will spur the farmers there to greater activity and cause them to take a greater interest in their orchards, it would be very much better for them, and when he comes I want him to be as honest in my riding as he is in the province of Quebec, and if he tells them that while they can grow good apples in Ontario, they can perhaps grow apples of a somewhat better flavour in Quebec, I do not believe that any one will object.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. How many thousand barrels of apples were shipped out of your county?

Mr. MILLER. Not very many from my riding. In the northern part of the county there may have been a larger quantity shipped. I do not think that the farmers pay anything like the attention to their orchards, as a general thing—there may be exceptions—that they ought to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The statement made by the hon. member for South Grey is far from being in line with the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture. The statement made by the hon. member for South Grey is that he will ask the Minister of Agriculture to come up into his riding and tell them that they ought to get to work and improve their orchards and perhaps improve the quality of fruit. But what would he think if the minister came up into his riding and said: Gentlemen, though you can produce apples in a way, this place cannot compare with the province of Quebec, because we can produce much better fruit in the province of Quebec than you can here? I have asked the minister, and not the member for South Grey, to answer the question or take back the statement.

Mr. FISHER. I really do not know whether it is worth my while. I am amused by the hon. gentleman's reference to this matter. I cannot imagine that the hon. gentleman, although he looks so serious, is serious.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes, Sir, I am serious.

Mr. FISHER. Well, all I can say is that I am sorry for his narrow-mindedness and small comprehension. I have no hesitation in repeating what I said. I may be wrong, the hon. gentleman is welcome to think otherwise, and everybody else is welcome to think otherwise, but I still believe, as far as flavour and quality are concerned, some of the apples grown in the province of Quebec, and the apples generally in Quebec, are the best in the world. I am going to repeat it and repeat it to the hon. gentleman, and I do not care what he thinks about it, one way or the other. He and everybody else may think differently, but I repeat it, as I have repeated it everywhere. I have done it a thousand times, and I am going to do it a thousand times again, whether I am Minister of Agriculture or not, and whether the hon. member criticise me for it or not. I do not think it makes the slightest difference. Wherever I am, and whenever I am dealing with matters of this kind, I will say just what I think, I will give expression to my opinion to the farmers as to everybody else, and I will defend the interests of the people of Canada in regard to agricultural production to the fullest extent possible. I have my own opinions, and I have my own tastes in regard to things, and I am not going to deny them or withhold them.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that after listening to the statement of the Minister of Agriculture, I feel that the vigour of my own remarks was justified. A paper has been read here this afternoon condemning the minister in the strongest possible way, and I cannot help but think that not only will that paper condemn him, but that practically every paper interested in agriculture throughout the country will be strong of the condemnation of his action in this House. The hon. gentleman knows that he has adopted a narrow-minded policy. What authority has a minister of the Crown, who is supposed to represent the people of the Dominion and all of the provinces, to say on the floor of this House that as far as his opinion of the apple growing industry is concerned, the province of Quebec is the place to grow apples?

Mr. FISHER. I did not say that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is practically what it meant.

Mr FISHER. Confine yourself to what I say.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is all right, but the minister knows that that is practically the idea that the people in general will get out of the remarks he has made here this afternoon, and I myself emphatically wish to say that it ill-becomes a minister, who represents the different provinces of the Dominion, to get up and make such a narrow provincial statement as that.

Mr. MILLER. I think the farmers of my own riding, and even the farmers of the riding of my hon. friend from East Lambton, are sufficiently intelligent to want from the Minister of Agriculture, when he addresses them, either by going before them, or through the press, or from the floor of this House, not flattery but truth.

Mr. BLAIN. I rather agree with my hon. friend from East Lambton, and I must say that I am very much surprised at the cautious Minister of Agriculture in stating to us that the province of Quebec is the province in Canada that grows apples of the best flavour. I am not quite sure whether my hon. friend is discharging his duties as Minister of Agriculture in the best possible way when he makes a statement of that kind on the floor of this House. I am not going to offer any criticism as to whether he should hold that opinion or not; that is a matter for himself. Before the Agriculture Committee occasionally very pointed questions are put to the officials of the department who are there giving their evidence. When a pointed question is put—such as, which province grows the best wheat?—the official hesitates and says: I do not wish to make any comparisons; I am only here to make a statement of facts. Some of the lessons that my hon. friend has been giving to his officials in the department perhaps might be learned with advantage by himself, and while my hon. friend may say that it is his right to express an opinion, and while it may be endorsed by the hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller), who comes from a part of the province where, as he states himself, they do not pay any very special attention to apple growing, my hon. friend must remember that there are parts of Ontario where they are devoting a great deal of attention to apple raising, and where there are very large exporters, such as there are in one part of my own county, where men have a thousand trees, some a great many more, and where they sell the output of their orchards for $2,500 and $3,000. These men are very much interested in the apple export trade. I am not quite sure that my hon. friend is giving fair play to other parts of Canada when he allows it to go abroad from his high position in the government of this country that he has no hesitation to state on the floor of this House from which province the best apples come, which are being sent to the old country. I think my hon. friend has rather forgotten his usual caution. For myself, I agree with my hon. friend from East Lambton, and I do not agree with the hon. member for South Grey in this matter. It may be that my hon. friend's constituents require a little prodding up. I think they do in many ways. If the agricultural interests of his constituency are not taken care of, he must blame either himself or the Minister of Agriculture, and not the member for East Lambton, who is advocating the principle that the Minister of Agriculture, having a better opportunity than any other single man in Canada to protect agricultural interests, should not single out any one province and say that it produced the best apples for export trade and home consumption, thus instituting an invidious and injurious comparison. That is going a little beyond his duties, and I do not think it will be endorsed by the people. The hon. gentleman is used to having the commendation of the people of Canada.

Mr. FISHER. Hear hear.

Mr. BLAIN. But there were other days--

Mr. FISHER. Before they had the experience.

Mr. BLAIN. But there were other days coming, and perhaps the Minister of Agriculture will learn by experience later on.

Mr. GOODEVE. I certainly would not have spoken on this question were it not for the statement which the Minister of Agriculture has made on the floor of the House. I can quite understand that as a minister for the province of Quebec, and speaking to a Quebec audience, he might assume an optimistic tone as regards the conditions in that province, and I would not take exception to what he said then. But, when he speaks from his place in parliament as a minister of the Crown and when in cold blood he reiterates the statement that the province of Quebec does grow the best apples, thus making invidious comparisons between the provinces of the Dominion, I do think it is at least an error of judgment on the part of the minister. Naturally my people will see these reports in the press, and coming as I do from what I think to be the best fruit growing district in the best fruit country in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FISHER. Oh, you ought not to say that.

Mr. GOODEVE. Coming as I do from what I believe to be the best fruit growing district in Canada, my people would very properly want to know why I allowed an expression of that kind to pass without protest. I do not pretend to be an expert as is my friend from Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) but I would direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that within the last two years they have established in the city of Spokane what is claimed to be the largest exclusively apple show on the continent of America and perhaps in the world, and at that show at which apples from all parts of the continent competed, my particular district received a large number of the first prizes in many lines. The district of Kootenay, my own particular district, received the first award for apples at the Spokane apple exhibition. Again, the minister well knows, (for if I am not mistaken I have seen it in one of the government reports) that the province of British Columbia took the gold medal at the British show, and only last year that province was awarded a special medal for the best 50 boxes of the best fruit and the best packed fruit. I do not know if the province of Quebec was represented there, but if so I would be only too delighted to hear that it also received an award, because, I do not think that in a great country such as ours there is room for these small jealousies and invidious comparisons. I feel that the remarks made by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) were only fair and I was rather surprised at the attitude assumed by the Minister of Agriculture in replying to him. I like to hear a minister representing a province in this great Dominion giving words of encouragement to his own people, and I would not take very great exception to what was said by the hon. gentleman in his own province of Quebec, but when the minister reads in Hansard, the statement he has made on the floor of the House and which he does not withdraw, that there is no other province in which they grow apples on the whole equal in quality and flavour to the apples grown in the province of Quebec, I think the hon. gentleman will, on reflection, admit that from his own standpoint and the standpoint of the country, he has made a mistake.

Mr. FISHER. I would remind my hon. friend that although I am Minister of Agriculture I am still the representative of a county in Quebec; and if the hon. gentleman is permitted to say that his part of British Columbia grows the best fruit and is the best fruit growing district in Canada, I do not see why I should not be permitted to make the same claim for my own province.

Mr. BLAIN. There is a great difference and the minister knows it. It is one thing for a private member to say that in his opinion his district grows the best apples in Canada, but while the Minister of Agriculture represents a county in Quebec he has a wider field and is a minister of the Crown for the whole Dominion He can very well see that when the English importers of apples, having British Columbia fruit on hand, advertise the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture in parliament, it might be a serious detriment to the fruit coming from other provinces. Then, the minister has not attempted to support his statement by any documentary evidence.

Mr. FISHER. I simply gave my own opinion, my own taste.

Mr. LENNOX. Your taste may be vitiated.

Mr. BLAIN. If the minister could show that in competition with the fruit of other parts of Canada the apples of the province of Quebec had carried off all the awards, then he might have some foundation for the statement.

Mr. FISHER. I told the hon. gentleman over and over again that I gave my own opinion and my own taste and nothing more.

Mr. BLAIN. I have nothing to do with the hon. gentleman's taste, but I have something to do with his opinion as Minister of Agriculture. When my hon. friend repeats and re-repeats in this House that in his opinion the best apples produced in Canada are from the province of Quebec, he makes that statement as Minister of Agriculture, and in so doing I have no hesitation in saying that he is not giving fair play to every other province in Canada. I would have no hesitation myself in expressing my opinion that the best apples to be found in the world are to be found in the province of Ontario.

Mr. FISHER. Just the same as I have.

Mr. BLAIN. No, I occupy an entirely different position. I am merely a humble representative of a constituency in the province of Ontario, while my hon. friend is Minister of Agriculture. When the people of the world are looking for a statement in regard to the agricultural capabilities of this country, they are not looking for it from an ordinary member of this House; they look for it from a man in authority like the Minister of Agriculture. Time and again, in the Committee on Agriculture, when questions have been put to officers of his own department, as to which province produced the best of this or the best of that, my hon. friend has always said, you must not make comparisons, and the committee endorsed him; because it would not do for any official, who is an official of all Canada, to make a statement, even in the Committee on Agriculture, that one province produced better crops of fruit or potatoes or anything else than another province. My hon. friend recognized the propriety of that, and he would not go through the country and make statements of that kind. He is too good a politician for that. And if my hon. friend will not allow the ordinary officials of his department to single out one province as being superior to another in this respect, my hon. friend as Minister of Agriculture should not on the floor of this House single out one province, and say that it produces better apples than any other province in Canada.

Mr. CROSBY. In the absence of Sir Frederick Borden, representing Kings county, and in the absence of Dr. Black, representing the county of Hants, and in the absence of Mr. Pickup, representing the county of Annapolis, I am bound to stand up for the province of Nova Scotia; and the first thing I want to say is that the hon. Minister of Agriculture has no right to assume that he occupies the same position as the hon. member for Peel or any other member who represents a county in this House. The Minister of Agriculture represents the whole Dominion. I am sorry for him, but nevertheless he does.

Mr. FISHER. We cannot help it.

Mr. CROSBY. I cannot help it now, but I hope some day to help it. My hon. friend, however, need not feel so safe that he can come here and make any statement he likes. My hon. friend said a moment ago that he had as much right to say that the best apples were grown in Quebec as the hon. member from British Columbia had to say that the best apples were grown in that province. I say that neither has the right to say anything of the kind unless he has the facts to back up the statement.

Mr. FISHER. How about Nova Scotia?

Mr. CROSBY. My hon. friend knows enough about Nova Scotia to know that it is a straight statement that the best apples in the world come from Nova Scotia. Any man who knows anything about fruit knows that Nova Scotia apples do not take second place to any apples in the world.

If the hon. minister had said that the apples grown in Quebec, were as good as any grown anywhere else in the Dominion of Canada, no one would find fault with him; but to say that the best apples are grown in Quebec is I think, quite unfair and unreasonable, in view of the fact, which he knows himself, that apples from Nova Scotia are at least not second to any grown in Quebec or in the world. I am not an apple grower, but I am an apple eater, and I think I have a better taste than the Minister of Agriculture. I think his taste must have been interfered with when he was eating those apples.

Mr. LENNOX. What time of the evening was it?

Mr. CROSBY. I do not know what time of the evening it was, but I always eat apples in a reasonable hour. I have not had the pleasure of eating any apples grown in Quebec, but I have eaten apples grown in Nova Scotia, and I am quite sure that the province of Quebec cannot beat the province of Nova Scotia in the production of apples or in their quality.

Mr. FISHER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CROSBY. And the Minister of Agriculture agrees with me; so he has taken back what he said. I have no desire that Nova Scotia apples should be stated by the Minister of Agriculture or anybody else to be the best that are grown, but I say that they are equal to any that are grown, and anybody who watches the market knows that there are none that bring a higher price; and that is not a question of taste, but a question of ' money talks.'

Mr. PRICE. I am very sorry that I have to differ with members on this side of the House who have spoken. I quite agree with the Minister of Agriculture that the best apples are grown in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Crosby) talks about taste. I really thought he had better taste. But I must say that I think the Minister of Agriculture has better taste as regards apples than the hon. member for Halifax.

Mr. BURRELL. I ought almost to apologize to the House for throwing an apple of discord into this debate. Let me say that I do not feel called upon to indulge in any lofty panegyrics of British Columbia apples, although I hold my own opinion, as other gentlemen hold theirs. But as a matter of fact we who know the results recognize frankly that the Nova Scotia Gravenstein, the Ontario Spy, the Quebec Fameuse and the Cox's Orange or Jonathan of my own province—any of these apples, grown under the best conditions, will satisfy any taste, perhaps even that of the Minister of Agriculture. I think it is a mistake to make these comparisons. There is one common ground on which we can all stand, which interests those who are not apple growers, but apple consumers. By striving in the best way we can to give the consumer what he wants we shall hasten that millennium described by Oliver Wendell Holmes—and this may appeal to the lawyers in the House—a millennium which will arrive:

> When legislators keep the law,
> And banks dispense with bolts and locks,
> And berries, whortle, rasp and straw,
> Grow bigger downwards through the box.

Whatever else we dispute about, I think we in British Columbia, not only so far as flavour goes, but by the excellence of our packing, have the satisfaction of getting our fruit to the consumers in such shape that we can give pointers in this respect to most of the other provinces. I regret these sectional differences, because in my opinion we should all join together in making this industry a national one, and give it predominance in the markets of the world, and I credit the hon. minister with having the like intention.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. This discussion has been a revelation to me because I thought it was thoroughly and generally understood that the best apples in the country were produced in the county of North Grey and that it was one of these which caused the mischief between Adam and Eve, but I must admit that the British Columbia members have the best of us because I understand that the apple which Eve ate was B. C.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I have here a photograph which I want to show the Minister of Agriculture of apples shipped to my constituency this year. I think this photograph is really worth being presented to this House. This photograph was taken not by myself, but under my direction, of apples packed in Ontario and sent out to the northwest.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I really think the hon. minister should withdraw the statement he has just made. There is no reason in the world why a minister of the Crown, representing the whole Dominion, should make a statement of that kind. Such a statement will be used in the markets of the world as an advertisement. Is it statesmanlike on the part of the hon. gentleman to advertise certain districts where apples are grown in this country, and have it go out to the world on his authority that Quebec is the place where the best apples are grown in the Dominion?

Mr. EMMERSON. That was the apple of discord, apparently.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Apple sauce as far as the Minister of Agriculture is concerned. I hope that he will have the decency to withdraw that statement. He is well aware that in Ontario we raised some 15,000,000 barrels last year, which is the largest amount of apples grown by any province; but if the Quebec shippers can put a stamp on the apples they send to Great Britain to the effect that the Minister of Agriculture of this country stated emphatically on the floor of parliament that the apples grown in that province are the best in the Dominion, you may depend upon it the Quebec apples will thereby gain an advantage over those of the other provinces. I would like the hon. minister to at least state whether he is going to withdraw that statement.

Mr. FISHER. Carried.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would ask him what authority he has for making it?

Mr. FISHER. Carried.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I have asked a reasonable and fair question, and I think the minister ought at least to give an answer.

Mr. FISHER. I have answered the hon. gentleman and am not going to answer him any more on that subject.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is certainly a very strange position to take. We are well aware that the hon. gentleman has made some statements ill becoming a minister of the Crown. I am sure that when he sees those statements in print to-morrow, he will regret having made them. I represent a large agricultural district where quantities of the very best apples in the Dominion are grown, and I feel it my duty to point out to the minister that he has been making statements contrary to the best interests of the apple growing industry. I sincerely hope that during recess he will take the opportunity to reflect and that when we resume at 8 o'clock he will have come to the conclusion that he had better admit he has made a mistake and is willing to show fair play to the whole of the Dominion.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I hope since the minister has had his dinner he will be in a little better humour, and will withdraw the remark he made in reference to the apple industry, and also the insulting remarks he made about myself. I did not know until after the House had risen that he had made use of the words that I was narrow-minded, and of small comprehension. If he thinks that is becoming to a minister of the Crown, it is high time we placed him where he belongs. He considers that he is at liberty to come into this House and bulldoze, and browbeat members as he would perhaps some of his own constituents in the province of Quebec. It is high time he realized the position he holds in the House. I will ask the minister if he will be good enough to withdraw that statement.

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Then I say his words ill become a minister of the Crown in the House of Commons. In referring to the hon. gentleman I took care not to make a personal reference, I said that his policy on this question was a narrow and provincial policy. In the face of that the hon. gentleman says: Your remarks are narrow-minded, and of small comprehension. Will he say the same about the Montreal 'Star' or this 'Fruit Journal', or the dozens of fruit journals or agricultural papers that will attack the statement of the minister, and criticise it in its proper light. Are they narrow-minded and small of comprehension? If the hon. gentleman will look over his record he will see what a narrow-minded policy he has been carrying on ever since he took office. Let him go back to his position as manufacturing squirt guns to feed chickens and scissors to cut peaches off the trees, and his primitive cold storage apparatus. Follow him all down through his career, and you cannot come to any other conclusion than that it ill becomes him to make such statements of an hon. member. Has the hon. gentleman seen this statement in this paper referring to his statement in Quebec, and in British Columbia?

> That certain varieties of the apple are more successful in certain parts of the fruit-growing area of the Dominion than in others is true, but to make the broad statement that 'the flavour of the British Columbia apple was not to be compared with that of the province of Quebec,' or vice versa, is certainly taking a rash plunge into the deep and chilly waters of odious comparisons.

The hon. gentleman made use of these words this afternoon:

> I consider the apples of Quebec, as far as flavour and quality are concerned, to be better than anything produced not only in British Columbia but in the whole world.

If the hon. gentleman was a private member of the House it would be a very different question, but he is a minister of the Crown, and has to deal with the different districts throughout the Dominion. Let us carry that to its legitimate conclusion, let him, if he dares, pick out certain qualities of agricultural products produced on the farms of Canada, and say that they are adapted altogether to one certain province. He knows he would not dare to take any such position as that, but he thinks it proper to take that position in reference to the great apple industry. Only a few years ago we produced 20,000,000 barrels of apples and 15,000,000 of these were produced in Ontario, and the minister would place a stigma on the apples of that province by stating that those of Quebec are superior; he is simply as it were, advertising, or booming the products of one province in direct opposition to the products of another province. If the minister has not the manliness or backbone, or good judgment to withdraw the words he used, I leave it to the judgment of the House as to who is the man of narrow mind and little comprehension. I am satisfied they will leave it not very far from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. JAMESON. I was, I must confess, a little surprised this afternoon to near the statement of the Minister of Agriculture in respect to the apples of Quebec. While I have a very high admiration for the various farming communities and horticultural communities of this Dominion, at the same time I do not think it is wise or seemly, or fair, that a gentleman occupying the position of Minister of Agriculture of Canada should single out any particular province for his commendation. His statement was: 'I consider the apples of Quebec, as far as flavour and quality are concerned, to be infinitely superior to anything produced, not only in British Columbia, but in the whole world.' So long as this difference was only between the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Burrell) and the hon. minister, and affected only the provinces of British Columbia and Quebec, I felt it no duty of mine to make any comment with respect to it; but when the minister made so broad and sweeping a statement as he finally did, it seemed that in justice to the province of Nova Scotia, which has an enviable record with respect to the fruits produced there, I should enter a protest. I do not know whether the minister has visited that province of recent years, and has seen the fruit which is grown there?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. JAMESON. If the minister has, I fear that his observations of the Annapolis valley, and other sections, must have been of a very cursory nature, or else he has done an injustice to that province with his eyes open, because the Annapolis valley, as a fruit growing district, is not excelled by any part of Canada. I feel it is only right, on behalf of the fruit growers of the Annapolis valley, and other sections, that I should enter a protest against the statement of the minister, and say that I do not think that their fruit is excelled in any part of the Dominion.

I make that statement, of course, as a private member. I have not had the same opportunity as the minister to visit all parts of the Dominion where fruit is grown, but I make the statement as the result of reading such reports as have been available, and after such investigation as it has been within my power to make. I think it would be well if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who represents that province, the hon. member for Hants, (Mr. Black), the Minister of Militia (Sir Frederick Borden), representing, as he does, the county of Kings, and the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Pickup), were to rise and endorse the statement I make that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has, possibly all unwittingly, done the province of Nova Scotia, and particularly the Annapolis valley, and other fruit growing sections a grave and serious injustice in the sweeping statement which I have just recited. Such a statement, coming from the Minister of Agriculture, comes as an authoritative statement; and it goes out not only to the people of Canada, but to the people of the whole world as the statement of one who might well be said to be in the position of an expert, and to make the statement as a result of investigation, and inquiry, and with the very fullest knowledge that it is possible for any man in Canada to possess. And because of that, it becomes my duty to challenge, and I do challenge the statement which the Minister of Agriculture has made, so far at least as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned. The fruit-growers of the Annapolis valley and adjoining sections about which I am specially concerned, and about which I know most, have been doing a splendid work during the past few years. They have been raising an excellent variety of fruit, and placing that fruit on the market in the best of condition, gaining thereby a most enviable reputation. I do not think it fair or just—yes, I agree with the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) in saying that I think it is not seemly—for the Minister of Agriculture to discriminate in his remarks against the fruit-growers of Nova Scotia, as he did. I am sure the Minister of Agriculture will not misunderstand me in making that statement. He will understand that I am merely doing what I believe to be my duty to the people of Nova Scotia, and the fruit growers of the districts I have mentioned. It may not be a very agreeable task for one to gainsay a statement of an hon. minister who should have full knowledge of the subject on which he speaks, but I only regard it as a duty, and I trust that other hon. members from the apple-growing districts of Nova Scotia will endorse my statement and will join with me in asking the Minister of Agriculture to modify at least, if he will not withdraw, the statement he has made in view of the fact that it is undoubtedly a discrimination against the province of Nova Scotia, and an unfair discrimination, and that it will prove a detriment to these apple-growers when they seek to place their fruit on the market.

Mr. BLACK. This appears to be a little worse than a tempest in a tea-pot. When I came in, and heard the excited and exciting declamation of the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong), I thought that surely the Minister of Agriculture had been guilty at least of high treason. Surely, for a man to praise the fruit of his own county is no crime. I myself represent the county that grows the best fruit in the world, yet I do not imagine for a moment that the Minister of Agriculture or the member for East Lambton is going to take offence at my saying so. I think it is a very loyal thing for a man to believe that his own country is the best, and that the apples grown near his own door are better than any others.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the hon. member (Mr. Black) think that the influence his statement will exert will be as widespread as that exerted by the statement of the Minister of Agriculture?

Mr. BLACK. Some of the members on the other side are cultivating a very bad habit. The moment a man gets up on this side to speak, they immediately ask questions. Now I like to make my speech in my own way. I do not speak very often, and I think I set a very good example to some of the newer and younger members on the other side who rise on every question. I would not take part in this discussion were it not that—I say it truthfully and without boasting—I represent one of the best fruit counties in Canada. Indeed, as a pastime, I have been a fruit grower myself. It is a very profitable business in my county. I would as soon own a good fruit orchard in the county of Hants as own stock in the Bank of Nova Scotia. I am sorry I was out for a few minutes this afternoon, so that the apple industry had to be defended by that eminent fruit grower the hon. member for the city of Halifax (Mr. Crosby). I am sorry also that this duty of defence had to be assumed by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson). If it had been a question of Digby chickens, or smoked herring, or dried fish, the hon. member for Digby would certainly be in a good position to speak. But I have always noticed, as soon as I crossed the line of Annapolis county going west, that the apple blossoms cease and the apple trees were nowhere to be found in the county of Digby.

Mr. JAMESON. The hon. gentleman must have had his eyes closed.

Mr. BLACK. No, I have gone there many times, and I have not seen much farming land there. They have a splendid summer resort, they have the magnificent Annapolis basin to look at, and many other fine things, but they do not grow fruit, and it is not a farming county. The Annapolis valley would seem to be the fruit growing district of Nova Scotia according to the hon. member for Digby. But the Annapolis valley is a little strip of Nova Scotia about twenty-five or thirty miles long; the great fruit-growing belt takes in the county of Hants and the county of Kings, neither of which have anything to do with the Annapolis valley. Indeed, there are four or five great apple growing valleys in Nova Scotia. There are the Annapolis valley, the Cornwallis valley, which, perhaps, produces the greatest quantity of any part of Nova Scotia, and which is in the county of Kings, the Gaspereau valley, which is noted for its beauty and its apple growing all over eastern Canada; the Avon valley in my own county, and many others where fruit is grown. I will not take up time now; this is a trifling discussion, and almost unworthy the members taking part in it. I take no offence at what the Minister of Agriculture has said concerning the apples of his province. He deserves credit for standing by his own. I say as much for the apples of my own province, and I do not think that anybody would take offence at that. I am glad that so many parts of Canada can show to the world such splendid results in apple-growing. We export from Nova Scotia 750,000 barrels to London alone, and we are increasing that year by year, and are capable of growing at least twenty times the quantity we now grow. Orchards are increasing and new orchards are being set out. Men come in to buy the apples, in fact, they will advance you money on your fruit. They tumble over one another in trying to get your apples.

Mr. SCHELL. I do not propose to discuss this question at any great length. Of course, in Ontario, we think we grow the best apples that are grown in the Dominion, especially in the county of Oxford. I know that in Nova Scotia they grow very fine apples. I think their Gravensteins will compare favourably with some of our best apples. They have very beautiful looking apples in British Columbia. I think they beat us as far as appearance goes; I will not say as far as flavour goes, because I never tasted many of their apples, but certainly they grow nice looking apples. I know that they grow exceptionally fine apples on the island of Montreal, and especially the Fameuse, which is perhaps equal to anything grown in Canada in more ways than one. I was not here this afternoon, and I am not very well posted on what has been said, but evidently there is some feeling regarding a statement that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has made with respect to the quality of apples grown in the province of Quebec. I think the question is viewed entirely from the wrong standpoint, and that is the point I wish to make. If the province of Quebec is growing the very best apples in the Dominion of Canada so much the better for the rest of the Dominion. If the province of British Columbia has better apples than any other part of the Dominion so much the better for Ontario, Nova Scotia and Quebec. If we have the best apples in Ontario it is better for every other province that we have the best or at least good apples. The better the apples we produce the better it will be for every province in the Dominion. If the minister says that the apples grown in the province of Quebec are the best, he has not done us any injury in Ontario, but he has done us good. Place 100,000 barrels of apples on the market in Liverpool and if they are all good you can get rid of them at a good, big price, and follow them with another 100,000 barrels and get another big price for those. But if half of them are poor all the good apples the following week will bring less money, because there were poor apples placed on the market the previous week. If we can give the impression abroad that any other province is producing better apples than we are it will only be an incentive for us to do better and to try and produce good apples in every province of the Dominion. Instead of the minister being open to criticism he has a perfect right to say that apples in one province, for some reasons, suit his taste or idea better than the apples of another province. I would not hesitate to express an opinion myself regarding the apples of any province if I thought they were the best, whether it was in Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Ontario, or Quebec.

Mr. CROSBY. It is not the question of which province grows the best apples that we are here to discuss. The Minister of Agriculture is not the Minister of Agriculture of Nova Scotia, Quebec, or Ontario or any other province, but of this Dominion, has made a statement without producing anything to back it up or to show that it is a statement of fact, and that is the question that we are discussing at the present moment. The hon. member for Hants (Mr. Black) has said that he was sorry that the defence of the fruit-growing industry of Nova Scotia had been left in the hands of the hon. member for Halifax. I can only tell him that there was no member from that part of the province on that side of the House to look after the matter when it came up. I confess that I am not an apple grower, but I am an apple eater. If the hon. member for Hants had the facts before him as had the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) he would have understood distinctly what the hon. gentleman had said.

Mr. BLACK. I heard the Minister of Agriculture, because I was here when he made the statement.

Mr. CROSBY. Then you should have been here to defend your province.

Mr. BLACK. I was glad I was out when some of the speeches were made.

Mr. CROSBY. The hon. member for Hants was born and brought up in a county that is noted for raising peaches. The Minister of Agriculture makes himself a judge for this whole Dominion and undertakes to declare that the best apples are raised in Quebec. I am not here to say a word against the apples in Quebec. I have no doubt they raise as good apples in Quebec as they raise any place else, but the minister has no right to make that statement in this House. If he were to make that statement in the province of Quebec we might forgive him, because he is given to saying one thing in one province and another in another. But we cannot forgive him when he comes into this House, and, in cold blood, makes a statement such as he did make and which is without foundation. I believe that if the Minister of Agriculture made a slip he should not be so stubborn as not to stand up and say: Well, boys, from all the other provinces, forgive me; I did not know what I was saying and I will take it all back. One of two things he must do; he must take that statement back or prove it by some facts, because he is not supposed to be a judge of apples. He may be constituted as Minister of Agriculture, through no fault of mine, but he has never been appointed by anybody as a judge of apples, and he must either take the statement back or produce evidence to show that it is a statement of fact. They do have fish in the county I come from, and I would advise some hon. members on the other side of the House to eat a little fish. If what they say about fish is true, they need a little. We raise apples in Halifax county, but we have so many other things that we pride ourselves on that we do not particularly worry about our apples. It is unfair that the statement which the minister has made should go abroad. We forgive the minister when he goes to Quebec and makes a statement of that kind, and I believe that they will forgive him there for it, he might make it when he goes to Ontario, but I do not think he has any right to make it in this House.

Mr. M. MARTIN. (Translation.) Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that many members of the opposition who have discussed this matter should ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture to withdraw the statement he made last fall at the pomologicial convention, that the best apples in Canada and even in the whole world, are raised in the province of Quebec.

Everybody knows that the 'Fameuse,' an apple grown in the neighbourhood of Montreal, has the preference on the English market and that it is the English consumers themselves who have styled it 'Beauty of Montreal' and looked upon it as the best apple in the world.

If the best apple be raised in the province of Quebec, that is no reason to find fault with Quebec.

I regret, however, that the hon. member from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) is not in his seat, because these apples are largely grown in his constituency; I am certain that for once he would have given credit to the minister on account of that statement.

On section 4, scope of regulations.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What kind of inspection will be given to these articles when they are brought in?

Mr. FISHER. I would certainly consider that for the purposes of this Act any inspection to prevent disease of insect pests must be made by a qualified entomologist or botanist. I would not like to trust to anybody who had not these qualifications to decide as to whether an insect pest or disease existed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The minister gave us to understand this afternoon that he did not expect to have any new employees in connection with this matter.

Mr. FISHER. Hardly that; but still I may say to my hon. friend that I already have in the service of the department several officers who have the necessary qualifications.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the minister has sufficient employees to undertake this work, what is the need of clauses 5 and 6? Why not wipe them out altogether?

Mr. FISHER. There might at any time occur an outbreak, which would be a very dangerous menace to the country, and in that case I would have to employ additional officers to be in a position to carry out the purposes of the Act. I would only do so, of course, in case the staff in the employ of the department were not sufficient to cope with the situation.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Could not the minister employ them in the department or use the employees he has? It seems to me that if this is left in the Act, it only gives the minister the opportunity to use his handiwork and give places to his own pets.

Mr. FISHER. Additional officers will be appointed only in case the situation demands them, and they will be appointed only because of their qualifications for the work.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Then why not appoint them in the department instead of under this Bill?

Mr. FISHER. Because they may not be needed all the time. I propose to employ men only when it is necessary, and only so long as it is necessary.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Has the minister any officers such as he has suggested at the ports of entry at the present time?

Mr. FISHER. Not at the present time. I have not power to have them.

Mr. JAMESON. The minister, in introducing this Bill to-day, referred to an insect known as the brown-tail moth. This insect has been in some way introduced into the western part of the province of Nova Scotia within the last three or four years, and has been giving a good deal of trouble there. I do not know just how it was introduced. I do not think that it was traced to any fruit trees that were brought in. The statement was made to me by some people who had made very careful investigation of the matter that so far as they could learn it was brought in by some steamer trading between some United States port, I think Boston, and one of the ports in western Nova Scotia. It secured quite a foothold there before it was recognized, and thereafter some efforts were put forward by the provincial authorities, which although they were fairly vigorous, do not seem to have altogether checked its spread and development. The question suggests itself to my mind that as there is a danger of the introduction of this pest in some other way than by bringing in of fruit trees, possibly the minister may have some information in regard to the matter generally which would be useful if it were placed on 'Hansard' at this point.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend is quite correct. I am not able to say offhand just when the pest was introduced into Nova Scotia, and I do not think I have had any knowledge of how it was introduced. But I think the cause suggested by my hon. friend is quite probable, because this moth has been known to obtain a foothold in the New England states some years before it was known in Nova Scotia. The Nova Scotia government has, I think, now three men employed in trying to stamp out the pest. The entomologist of the department here is in constant touch with them, and is giving them advice, and the late Dr. Fletcher, the late entomologist of the department, visited Nova Scotia, and described the moth and its habits and helped the people there by advice, information and instruction to combat it; but up to the present time there has been no law under which we could take any steps to stamp it out. This law will provide the necessary machinery for that work. I wish, without in any way interfering with or depreciating the effort of the provincial government, to help them in every possible way, and as soon as this Bill passes into law, I think we shall be able to work very effectively. Such a case as that mentioned might be one in which I might have to appoint an officer to aid the local authorities, or to carry out the provisions of this law, which might be more effective, especially in a case of the introduction from abroad of an insect pest, than a provincial or local law would be.

Mr. JAMESON. I am pleased to hear that statement of the minister. I think it will be of very great assistance if he does make a move along that line. The pest was not very much known in this country until it was introduced into Nova Scotia three or four years ago, and the seriousness of it was not realized until a year or two had elapsed. It is a very serious pest, and any measures that would tend to stamp it out should be taken. In the county of Digby, although my hon. friend from Hants does not seem to have remembered it, we raise a good many apples, and I may say that the fruit is of a very excellent quality, particularly in the districts of Bear river, Hill Grove, Acaciaville, and other places. In these districts specimens of this moth have been found; and so far as I have been able to learn it has not only been spreading amongst the fruit trees, but is believed to have taken hold of the general forest growth. I do not know whether that is really the case or not, as I am not sufficiently well informed respecting the habits of this moth; but at all events there is a very suspicious looking insect, which bears a close resemblance in many particulars to the brown-tail moth. I would like to ask the minister whether this moth has been discovered in any of the other provinces of Canada, and if so, what measure of success has been met with in the endeavour to stamp it out?

Mr. FISHER. I would say to my hon. friend, in the first place, that this moth does not attack only fruit trees. It attacks all forest trees and shade trees just as much as it attacks fruit trees, except that it does not attack conifers; but deciduous trees it does attack. The moth is not known to exist anywhere except in that region. Nests have been discovered in some nursery stock, and this has been destroyed. I think my hon. friend was not here this afternoon when I explained that this year and last year we have been fighting this pest without any law. We have been aided, and very handsomely aided, by the importers of nursery stock, who have been willing to have our inspectors inspect their importations, although we had no authority to do so, and they consented to the destruction of such stock as was affected. It was stated that this winter, during the importing season of nursery stock, we have inspected 1,700,000 seedling trees, and that 293 nests were found, in each of which there might have been from 200 to 300 caterpillars. These were all destroyed. Similar work was done last year. If they had been allowed to come in, there is no doubt that by this time the moth would have been thoroughly established in different parts of Canada. The permission of the people to allow us to do that work was purely voluntary. It is in consequence of that experience that I am introducing this Bill. I have here the last farm report for 1909, and it says:

In 1902, Mr. William McIntosh, of St. John, New Brunswick, took a single male specimen of the brown-tail moth (euproctis chrysorrhœa, L.) about 20 miles from St. John, New Brunswick. About the same time another specimen was taken by Mr. Gordon Leavitt, at St. John; and in July of 1905, Mr. John Russell took a third specimen at Digby, Nova Scotia. Up to the present time these have been the only authentic records of this much-to-be-dreaded insect having been taken in Canada. Recently, however, I have received from Mr. C. Perry Foote, of Lakeville, Nova Scotia, one of the winter nests of the brown-tail moth, filled with the living caterpillars, thus proving that this insect has established itself at one place at least in Canada.

Dr. Saunders, in his report, says:

With the exception of the San José scale, there are no two insects which have attracted so much public attention, nor with regard to which so much money has been spent in America by the state and federal governments of the United States, as the Gypsy moth and the brown-tail moth. Both of these are pests introduced into America from Europe—the Gypsy moth about 1869, and the brown-tail moth somewhere about 1890. Millions of dollars have now been spent on fighting the Gypsy moth and the brown-tail moth in Massachusetts and the adjoining states. Dr. Howard, when treating of this insect and of an effort which is being made to introduce European parasites says, in the Year-book of the Department of Agriculture for 1905: 'The brown-tail moth has become even more abundant and injurious than the Gypsy moth, and, owing to the fact that the female flies readily, whereas the female of the Gypsy moth does not fly at all, the brown-tail moth has far exceeded the Gypsy moth in its spread.'

It is this we are trying to fight against, and it is necessary to give us the power to do this effectively. I again give credit to the importers of nursery stock for the manner in which they have co-operated with us in keeping the moth out, but at the same time in case of objection, we must take power to do this authoritatively.

Mr. JAMESON. I am glad the Minister of Agriculture has read that statement from the report. If the seriousness of this pest were fully understood by the nurserymen and orchardists of this country generally, as we are beginning to understand it in Nova Scotia, I feel sure that their assistance would be given to the department and to the minister in every effort he makes to stamp it out. If it got a foothold in this country, it would mean that the work of years, I might say the work of generations, would in a measure go for naught, so far as fruit raising is concerned. I am glad to know that an energetic effort will now be made to destroy this pest in the country. I understood the minister to say that when he gets the legislative authority he thought it likely he would appoint an officer who would act in Nova Scotia, either in conjunction with or independently of the provincial authorities. I trust the minister will appoint that officer, and appoint him as soon as possible, so that the most vigorous measures will be taken to aid the provincial authorities in reducing, in numbers, if not altogether exterminating this pest.

Mr. FISHER. I may be able to do the work with my present staff, but if the present staff is not sufficient, I will consider it to be my duty to appoint an officer. Last year, and again this year, circulars were sent to a list of about 25,000 orchardists, which we keep in the department, drawing attention to the dangers of this moth and how to detect it. In the agricultural press, and in the press generally throughout the country, information of a similar kind was published, and I believe it is largely due to our efforts that during the last few years, so far as we know, the moth has not become established in Canada.

On subsection (d),

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Why does the minister propose to give compensation to those who are sending in nursery stock from the other side, which is not fit to come into the country?

Mr. FISHER. The loss would generally fall upon our own people. We believe that the cases and the packing in which the nursery stock comes will be pretty sure to contain moths, and consequently we think it necessary to destroy them. The owners complain that they would have been able to use this packing again and that its destruction was a serious loss to them. If these things are destroyed in the interests of the public at large the owners ought to be compensated in the same way as we compensate owners of animals when we order their destruction. If we did not give compensation, it is not likely that our efforts would be very enthusiastically seconded.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would not the granting of this compensation be just as likely to make them careless about the goods they pack? If it is only the boxes and casings that are involved, they would only amount to about $2.

Mr. FISHER. It would include compensation for the stock also if that were destroyed.

Mr. BURRELL. In our province we have never given any compensation but of course I am not referring to exceptional cases such as the brown-tail moth. Where we destroy, as we do sometimes, quite a heavy percentage of nursery stock importation, we give no compensation, and the importers usually insist on the goods being sold under a guarantee to pass inspection.

Mr. FISHER. The brown-tail moth has been discovered in shipments which come almost altogether from France, and the practice in the French trade is that the goods must be paid for before shipment. The importers have these two seasons suffered very considerable loss, which they have voluntarily undergone, although they protested very strongly that it was very unfair that they should not only lose the stock itself but the packages as well. But we found it absolutely necessary to destroy the packages as well as the stock because the eggs might just as well come in the packages. If no compensation be given, the temptation would be great to avoid the law, and it would be impossible to indentify these packages when used in enveloping other goods.

Mr. BURRELL. Is the minister applying compensation only to this particular case of the brown tail moth?

Mr. FISHER. I would not like to say that. That would depend on the conditions and circumstances. I might find similar reasons for compensation in other cases.

Mr. BURRELL. The hon. gentleman will see that if the Dominion is going to compensate for all the nursery stock destroyed, that would make it rather embarassing for our province which gives no compensation, but of course, I admit that in certain circumstances it would be only fair to compensate.

Mr. FISHER. Suppose, for instance, a certain potato disease, which has been discovered in Newfoundland, should find its way to Canada, it would be my duty to destroy any crop of potatoes infected in order to prevent that disease from spreading; and it would be rather hard to enter on a man's farm and destroy his crop without giving him some compensation.

Mr. BURRELL. I am not opposing the principle because I admit that in certain special cases, it would be only just to compensate, but I would like to know whether that compensation is to be general. In the case of the San José scale, for example, the hon. gentleman would not compensate. What other particular cases are there in which he would?

Mr. FISHER. I would not undertake to say what cases absolutely should be compensated and what not. That will have to be decided by order in council.

Mr. WRIGHT. Why should not the inspection take place in the country from which the importation comes? How would it do to have a regulation requiring a certificate from a qualified inspector in the country where the goods were bought? That certificate could be forwarded with the goods.

Mr. FISHER. We would then be at the mercy of inspectors over whom we have no control. When the San José Scale Act was introduced, it was suggested that we might accept the certificate of United States inspectors, but I was not quite prepared to do that. I prefer to have our own inspection than accept certificates from a class of men of whose appointments and qualifications we knew nothing.

Mr. WRIGHT. Suppose you had your own inspection in addition when the goods arrive?

Mr. FISHER. I have just been informed that in seeding stock imported from France, in which were found a large number of nests of the brown-tail moth, every case was stamped with the official statement that the brown-tail moth had no existence in the region from which that nursery stock was shipped.

Mr. WRIGHT. Was the certificate by some qualified appointee of the France government?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, it is the certificate of the Minister of Agriculture for the arrondisement from which the shipment came.

Mr. SEXSMITH. Is it not a little out of the usual to compensate importers who bring in diseased stock? I would suggest that the importer should be responsible and that any fruit trees imported from France or the United States, which did not pass government inspection, should be destroyed and no compensation paid. Then the exporters of these fruit trees would be more particular. If we are going to compensate to the extent of two-thirds of the value, these people would send over any amount of diseased stuff which they could not sell in their own country and get two-thirds of its value. I think the importer should be held responsible and should look to the man from whom he is buying to sell to him an article that would pass government inspection here, making that a condition of payment. Then, if no compensation for stock destroyed was granted, a better quality would be sent to Canada.

Mr. FISHER. We do not destroy the stock but only the packages and packing.

Mr. SEXSMITH. Is there no danger of this brown-tail moth escaping from the packages before the shrubs are inspected?

Mr. FISHER. They could not get out of the packages.

Mr. SEXSMITH. They should be inspected immediately on arrival here to avoid that.

Mr. FISHER. They are inspected as soon as possible.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I move that no compensation be received for the boxes in which they are packed or the packings. It seems folly to attempt to pay foreigners for boxes and packing which amount to only $2 or $3.

Mr. SEXSMITH. If this moth is as dangerous as the minister has represented, would it not be better to entirely prohibit the importation of trees or shrubbery from infected countries altogether? That would not only keep out the moth but would give employment to a large number of people and encourage a new branch of industry.

Mr. FISHER. This Bill gives me that power which I have not at present. That stock is raised by the million in France and exported to the United States and Canada, and as I have said the prohibition of its importation would put a stop to the nursery business for some years. We tried the prohibition of importation when first combatting the San José scale, but as I have explained the fruit interests made such strong representations that we were obliged to establish stations where stock could be imported and fumigated.

Mr. GOODEVE. If the exporter were required to make good to the customer in Canada stock destroyed on account of this moth, the exporter would be very careful in the stock he sent to Canada. But, if the importer were allowed compensation and the exporter were thus freed from the loss, he would not take the same care. I think it would be worth the minister's while to consider whether it would not give better results if no compensation were allowed. I think this was a little different from the Diseases of Animals Act cited by the Minister of Agriculture, for in such cases the disease develops through no fault of the exporter, and yet may affect the whole country. But, in the case of this stock, the exporter is directly responsible. There is competition among the exporters whether in France or in any other country, and, if a man sends out stock that has to be destroyed on reaching Canada, knowing that the importer will probably try to find some other sources of supply, he will be more likely to grant compensation to the importer. Looking at it purely as a commercial transaction, I think it would be a mistake for the country to decide to give compensation as a general thing. It would probably encourage rather than discourage carelessness in the shipping of stock into the country. I may be wrong, but that is the way it appeals to me.

Mr. FISHER. Some of the older members of this House will remember Mr. E. D. Smith, of Winona, who was a member of the last parliament and, I think, of some parliaments before that. I have his letter applying for compensation for the cases which he burnt last year. I felt a good deal of sympathy with Mr. Smith who, in this public-spirited way, destroyed these cases without hesitation. I have the invoices and statements and find that the loss from these importations came to $92. Of that, under this proposal we should pay about $60. When this application came in, Dr. Saunders, director of the experimental farm, wrote to the chief of the bureau of Horticulture of the State of New York, and found that under their old law they could not pay nursery men for cases burned, but they found so many instances of hardship and such a movement in regard to the matter that they were amending their old law so as to authorize the Commissioner of Agriculture to pay for such losses. I believe that the amendment has since been made. I am perfectly satisfied, from my experience both with the San José Scale Act and the Contagious Diseases of Animals Act that we are likely to secure the much more hearty co-operation of nurserymen and importers in our work by giving compensation. The small cost that is likely to be involved will be amply repaid by the greater willingness on the part of these people to give us information. My hon. friend (Mr. Goodeve) speaks of the effect of the commercial system. I dare say that works in some ways, but I am informed by those importers that, as a matter of fact, they have to send the money before they get the goods. These are perishable goods, and the people who ship them, I suppose, do not want to run the risk of the voyage and handling. There may be cases where compensation can properly be given —I mean a general class of cases, not individual cases—and others in which it would not be necessary or proper. It is for that reason that we take the power to do this by order in council. That order in council, of course, will not provide that John Jones shall get compensation, and Peter Smith shall not get it, but will declare what line of occurrences would call for the payment of compensation. I considered this matter very carefully before deciding to put it into the Bill, and, for the reasons I have given, I think it in the interests of the efficient carrying out of the Bill that we should have power, under certain circumstances, to pay compensation.

Mr. GOODEVE. I can see why exporters should sometimes demand payment in advance. Fruit stock is perishable and the handling may easily cause loss. But, from my own experience of the commercial side extending over a good many years, I should think that if a man were importing from a house, doing business with them from time to time, and wrote back making a claim, pointing out that through their own fault the loss had occurred, he could secure payment for the damage. Where the fault was their own in sending diseased stock any reputable exporting firm would make an allowance. In the cases cited by the minister, where the importer voluntarily destroys cases, I agree that there should be compensation. But what I contend is that the general order allowing compensation would work along the lines I have indicated. If the importer has the government's own certificate that the stock has been destroyed because of disease, he has final evidence that his claim for compensation is just. I am not sure that an absolute legal claim could not be made, though that would depend upon the conditions of the bargain. But, on general principles, I believe compensation could be had from the importer. I can see that granting government compensation might give rise to difficulties on the lines I have suggested.

Mr. SEXSMITH. It seems to me we are running great risk in allowing this to go on. A gentleman who had raised some of this stock, speaking to me a year or two ago, said that if it were not for the competition from European countries, we could create quite an industry in this country. But, owing to the cheapness of labour in Germany and France, they could produce this stock at very low rates and our nurserymen insisted on buying it there. I do not see why we should run the risk of importing any further tests into our country when we can produce this stock equally as good if not better at home. If something were done to encourage the nurserymen or to compel them to raise in Canada the natural stock of the country we would not be taking any chances of importing the brown-tail moth or any other pest.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend knows that there is a duty on these things which gives the home producer an advantage.

Mr. SEXSMITH. Not so much as the difference in labour.

Mr. FISHER. It is twenty-five per cent, if I remember rightly.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I cannot help but feel justified in taking the position that I have. It would be a good thing if this clause could be amended so that people in Canada would receive a payment of two-thirds of the value of that which was destroyed.

Mr. FISHER. Nobody but Canadians would receive it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Yes, the minister said that he would like to have the privilege of paying the Canadian for his potato crop.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is all right, but if we pay the foreigner two-thirds of what his goods cost, I think we are going a little beyond what we should do. I feel that we would be justified in amending this clause so that the foreigners sending his goods into this country would lose the boxes, and the packing, which would only amount to a few dollars in each case, but which would make him more careful.

Mr. FISHER. I am afraid that the foreigners will not lose anything at all. The Canadian importer will have to pay the foreigner the full value, and he will not get anything back from him. He, and not the foreigner, will lose it. If the goods are destroyed in Canada in consequence of the existence of disease under this clause, the Canadian importer will lose the full value of them, and by this clause he may be compensated to the value of two-thirds.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. He will be more careful.

Mr. BURRELL. This Bill gives the government the power that they never possessed before, not only of dealing with trees, and vegetables, and of entering upon any man's premises, but of destroying his crop, or orchard. This provision is followed by power to appoint inspectors, and by penalty clauses. While I am not personally familiar with the legislation in the various provinces, I know that Ontario is doing a very great deal of good work of this kind, and that Nova Scotia is doing something. With Quebec horticultural methods I am not at all familiar, but I am thoroughly familiar with what we are doing in British Columbia. I recognize that it is in the interests of horticulture that if any province is not carrying on work of this kind, and if there are serious inroads being made by fungus diseases, and insect pests, it will be helpful to have power to do these very things; but where, as in British Columbia, we are doing these things with thoroughness and have a large body of officials, and knowing also, as I have reason to know, the difficulty in getting qualified men always to ascertain what is the real source of injury, the question arises as to the advisability of duplicating these services. When in 1898, 1899, and 1901, the province of Ontario appointed a large corps of inspectors under the San José Scale Act I do not suppose that there were half a dozen in the whole body who knew the difference between an armoured, and an unarmoured scale. There is the difficulty. If the minister should appoint a lot of inspectors to carry out this Act there may be the same natural difficulty from their want of technical knowledge. But where we have, as in British Columbia, a large body of inspectors, while we are anxious to co-operate with the Dominion, I think we want some reasonable assurance that this clause will not be put into effect in our case, as long as we are carrying on that work. I would like to see any possible clash of jurisdiction avoided.

Mr. FISHER. I quite sympathize with my hon. friend. I tried to say this afternoon that where a properly constituted provincial authority is doing work of this kind, I should shrink from entering upon the field. I should only do so where I felt it was absolutely necessary in the interests of the whole country. As far as British Columbia is concerned I do not wish either to relieve the provincial government from the responsibility of this work, or to interfere with it. I would take great pains to see that we do not overlap where it can possibly be avoided. I take the words of the hon. gentleman as being almost authoritative, because I know the influence that he would have with the British Columbia government, and I am quite sure that his influence would be in the direction of procuring thorough co-operation betweeen the officers, and authorities in British Columbia, and my own officers, and myself. I would welcome that not only from that province, but from all other provinces. I said to the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) that I knew what the provincial government of Nova Scotia were doing in connection with the brown-tail moth. If we can aid them in any way I shall see to it that we do so, but I shall not think of interfering with, or trying to override any action that they have taken. I think, however, without absolute knowledge, that this Act gives a little greater authority than any of the provincial Acts do, except that of British Columbia, and that the machinery created, or to be created, by this Act, and the regulations under it will give me a little better facility for carrying out certain things than is in existence in any of the provinces, with the possible exception of British Columbia. The Ontario government has passed several Acts covering somewhat the same ground, but I do not think any one of them is quite so complete, and I am not speaking with the idea of imputing any blame, or censure in the matter. I am simply speaking from having examined these Acts, while drawing this up, and I think perhaps this Act is a little more complete than theirs. From the fact that the regulations under this Act will apply to the whole country it gives a greater safeguard than could possibly accrue from the Act of any one province.

Mr. BLAIN. Did the minister consult the different local governments when he was preparing this Bill? There is a feeling in Canada that there is too much overlapping legislation between the Dominion and the provinces, and that a great deal of expense and much trouble would be saved if there was more concurrent action on matters of this kind.

Mr. FISHER. We sent to Mr. C. C. James of the Department of Agriculture, Ontario, a copy of this Act, and communications have passed between us on the subject.

Mr. BLAIN. I commend the minister for that, and I trust that the example will be followed in the future under similar circumstances.

Mr. FISHER. I recognize the assistance such interchange of views has always been to me in my departmental work.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

ELECTRICAL MEASURE.

On the order being called for the second reading of Bill (No. 7) respecting units of electrical measure.

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN. Since this Bill has been introduced, the department has ascertained that the provision with regard to electrical units does not meet with the unanimous approval of the international committee, and it has been suggested that it should be deferred for another year. I move that the order be discharged.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What are the reasons?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I have stated them briefly. At the congress of electrical experts held in London, representing nearly all countries in the world using electricity, a sub-committee was appointed to prepare a description of electrical units which should be uniform throughout the world, and that description is contained in the Bill before the House. Later, the sub-committee disagreed in respect to one or two of the measures of electrical units and they have recommended that this Bill shall not be proceeded with until after a meeting which within a few months will be held in Washington. In all probability the Bill will be introduced next session.

Motion agreed to, and order discharged.

MANITOBA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT.

On the order being called for the second reading of Bill (No. 49) to amend the Manitoba Grain Act.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER. After this Bill was introduced, further representations on the subject came to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he has asked me to move that the order be discharged.

Motion agreed to, and order discharged.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 103) to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act. He said: This Bill repeals sections 4 and 5 of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, chapter 115 of the Revised Statutes, and substitutes the following:

No bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau, wharf, dock, pier, or other structure of any kind, shall be built or placed in or across any navigable water, unless the site thereof has been approved by the Governor in Council, nor unless such bridge, boom, dam, aboiteau, wharf, dock, pier, or other structure is built and maintained in accordance with plans approved by the Governor in Council.

Section 5 is as follows:

Any work to which this part applies, which is built upon a site not approved by the Governor in Council, or which is not built in accordance with plans so approved, or which, having been so built, is not maintained in accordance with such plans, may be removed and destroyed under the authority of the Governor in Council.

I will read the sections of the present Act so that hon. gentlemen will see in what particulars the changes are made. Section 4 of chapter 115 is as follows:

No bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau shall be constructed so as to interfere with navigation, unless the site thereof has been approved of by the Governor in Council, nor unless such bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau is built and maintained in accordance with plans approved by the Governor in Council.

It will be seen that that is limited to bridge, boom, dam or aboiteau. It makes no reference to a wharf, dock, pier or other structure. Then, strange to say, section 5 of the present Act simply refers to a bridge. It says:

> Any bridge to which this part applies, which is built upon a site not approved by the Governor in Council, or which is not built in accordance with plans so approved, or which, having been so built, is not maintained in accordance with such plans, in so far as the same interferes with navigation, may be lawfully removed and destroyed under the authority of the Governor in Council.

It will be seen that the object of this Bill is to give a larger measure of control to the Governor in Council over navigable waters. Section 4 of the present Act, while limited to a bridge, a boom, a dam, or an aboiteau, simply provides that it shall be constructed so as not to interfere with navigation. That leaves it doubtful as to what authority is to determine whether or not any structure of this kind does interfere with navigation. I have had a number of cases brought to my attention where bridges have been erected across navigable waters. This has been so particularly in our western provinces, where, as would naturally be the case in the early development of the country, there would not be steamers operating on the navigable rivers, or where, by reason of the necessity of certain improvements, navigation, while good in some parts, would not, on the whole, be suitable for the larger steamers; and some of the provincial governments have built bridges without coming to the Department of Public Works for approval. I have in my mind a notable instance of a bridge being erected by a provincial government across the South Saskatchewan river. That was erected without any provision for navigation and evidently on the theory that as there was no navigation of the river by steamers at present, it could not be said that the bridge interfered with navigation.

Mr. BLAIN. Near what point is that?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Near Saskatoon, and a very unfortunate accident happened about two years ago. After the bridge was built, telegraph and telephone companies stretched wires across the river, which interfered with navigation to the same extent as the bridge; and a gentleman who owned a small vessel—I think he had built it further up the river—came down the river, and his vessel was caught in the wires and wrecked, and he sustained a loss of $11,000 or $12,000, for which he has not been able to obtain any redress. He could not obtain it from the Department of Public Works, because we had given no authority for the construction of the bridge or the stringing of the telegraph or telephone wires across the river. It seems to me that in view of the great importance to this country of preserving navigation as far as possible, it is very desirable that there should be no works of any kind constructed in navigable waters without the plans being first submitted to the Department of Public Works, and approved by the minister and the Governor in Council. It is also rather extraordinary that section 4 of the Act at present makes no provision for wharfs, yet in most cases it has been recognized that the Department of Public Works has control over wharfs, and over and over again we are asked to approve of the location of wharfs in navigable waters. This is, I think, as it should be. As the Dominion government is invested by the British North America Act with the control of navigation, it is most desirable, in the interests of the whole country, that when any person or company purposes to construct a work in a navigable water, that person or company should be compelled to come to the Department of Public Works and submit plans, and have those plans approved of before proceeding with the erection of the structure, whether it be a bridge, a wharf, a pier or any other structure that might interfere with navigation. I think the department and the Governor in Council ought to be the judge whether or not the work as proposed to be constructed would interfere with navigation or not. Of course, if it will not interfere with navigation it will be the duty of the department to grant its approval of the proposed work. The Bill contains only the two sections which are to be in substitution of sections 4 and 5 of the present Act.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. minister refers to docks and wharfs in addition to the structures mentioned in the old Act. I would like to ask him whether he is quite sure that in adding these words he will not interfere with private rights. The words are not confined to public docks or public wharfs, but refer to all wharfs and all docks. It may be difficult at times to know whether the property of a private individual alongside of a navigable water might or might not come under the Bill. If this parliament is undertaking to interfere with private property in that respect, it may be a somewhat serious question in some cases. The department might undertake to dictate to the owner of valuable property alongside of a navigable stream what he should or should not do with his own property. Does the hon. gentleman think that this government should control the property of individuals alongside such waters, if in its opinion the structures might interfere with navigation? If they were public docks or wharfs which he intends to deal with, that might be another question, but the language of the Bill, as the hon. gentleman has explained it, would seem to cover everything in the nature of a dock or wharf adjoining navigable waters.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not see how we could properly safeguard navigation and make provision for the proper control over navigable waters unless we made the law general in its application. The present section provides that no bridge, dam or aboiteau shall be constructed so as to interfere with navigation. That gives the government control over work of that character, even although they might project from a shore belonging to a private individual. Of course the owner of a foreshore has no right to interfere with navigation because that is under control of the Dominion government, and therefore it is not unreasonable that before a private individual be allowed to build out into a navigable water a wharf or pier, he should come to the department and submit his plans. Let me give a case in point. A short time ago application was made to the department for approval of a wharf which the Grand Trunk Pacific proposed to construct in front of its property in the harbour of Victoria. That is just such a case as my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. BARKER. That goes outside the Grand Trunk Pacific property as I understand it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not any more than if a private owner proposed to build a wharf out into a navigable stream, and that is the only case to which this Bill would apply. That is what the Grand Trunk Pacific proposed to do. That company recognized that if the department had no control, it ought to have. They therefore took their plans to the Public Works Department for approval. I directed that their application should be referred to the resident engineer, and he conferred with the other wharf owners, more especially with the Canadian Pacific railway and the harbour association of Victoria, and I think also with members of the board of trade. The objection was taken that if this wharf were allowed to be built as the Grand Trunk Pacific proposed, it would narrow the harbour and make it exceedingly difficult for steamers coming to the Canadian Pacific railway wharf to be handled with safety. The resident engineer then recommended that the dimensions of the proposed wharf should be cut down somewhat. The Grand Trunk Pacific agreed to this, the Canadian Pacific railway was satisfied, and so was the inner harbour association of Victoria, and the wharf, instead of being an injury to navigation, will be an aid to it. I only mention this as an illustration of a case where it is very desirable in the public interest that a plan of that wharf to be constructed in front of the property, owned by a private individual or a company, should be submitted to the department. Take the case of an individual owning property abutting upon navigable water and alongside of whom there was another individual also owning property. Each might propose to build a wharf out into the navigable water and the result might be a very serious interference with navigation; but if application had to be made to the department, our engineer would have to examine and report and the wharfs would have to be so constructed as to be an advantage instead of a hindrance to navigation. I think, therefore, that if the Dominion government is to properly discharge the duty it owes the public in this connection under the British North America Act, it is necessary to have the law amended as proposed. No public difficulty would be created and no private injury would be done because we must assume that the department would be reasonable and only exercise its power to prevent navigation being injuriously affected.

Mr. BARKER. The case to which the hon. minister has referred is not one of those to which I alluded. He refers to a case in which the Grand Trunk Pacific propose to extend a wharf into navigable waters, not building upon its own property solely, but going beyond that into the property of the Crown. That was not the case I was putting. I asked whether the language of the Bill would enable the government to dictate to the proprietor of land adjoining a stream and prevent him constructing a pier or wharf on his own property without the approval of the government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the structure were not to project into navigable water, this section of the Bill would not affect it because it says: 'Shall be built or placed in or across any navigable water'.

Mr. BARKER. There are a great many crown patents which extend to navigable waters and where a person building a wharf will build it on the margin of a navigable stream. It would be an infringement on civil rights if the government should say to him: 'You must not build your wharf except under our approval, you must build a particular class of wharf, we propose to build a wharf along there, and you must build yours in accordance with that.' If the government wish to interfere with civil rights, with the property of individuals, with the right of an individual to build a wharf or dock on his own property adjoining a navigable stream, almost in the stream, but on his own water line, however much that may be in the interests of the public, it seems to me such interference should not be allowed against rights already acquired without expropriation and compensation. I do not say that the Bill goes that far, I merely call attention to the matter which I would like to have discussed before the Bill passes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think the words are such as will not raise this difficulty.

No bridge, boom, dam, &c., shall be built or placed in or across any navigable water.

If a man was building just upon the line of the navigable water, he would not come under the provisions of that section, but where he builds out into the navigable water, he would come within the section.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not extremely difficult to determine in any navigable stream where the navigability begins? I take it that every drop of the St. Lawrence river is navigable water from bank to bank. No private ownership of the bed of a navigable river is recognized. Any ownership in the bed of a river is subject to the superior control of navigation, and it cannot be used however inconvenient it may be to the private owner, and however much it may interfere with his private rights. The whole of the water is navigable, and I do not think it is wise to say that to a depth of perhaps three feet it is not navigable and at ten feet it is. You have to recognize that in any navigable harbour or stream every drop of water is navigable water, and all private rights are subject to the superior control of navigation. The argument of the hon. member for Hamilton strikes the harbour of North Sydney, where we have a string of wharfs along the shore, and I realize this Bill will be putting people building wharfs along the water to inconvenience. However, I recognize that the bottom of that harbour is subject to navigation, and that private rights, as far as these private rights can be exercised, must not interfere with the higher right of navigation.

Mr. BARKER. On the Detroit river, for example, there are most valuable properties where the freehold runs out into much more than two or three feet of water. There are properties at Windsor and Sandwich, and all along the river, where I fancy the owners would be very much surprised to hear they had no private rights although there were only two or three or even more feet of water. It is only that point I am guarding against. I think we must have a little regard to rights that have been acquired and perhaps enjoyed for a century.

Mr. BARKER.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When we get into committee, I will be very glad to receive any suggestions as to amendments.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

GAS INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved the second reading of Bill (No. 132) to amend the Gas Inspection Act. He said: The only important amendment in this Bill is the taking power to test for the calorific quality of gas. Another amendment is to substitute the word 'district' instead of 'city, town or place,' to conform with the districts of the Inland Revenue Department. Another amendment is to decrease the permissible limit of error in the testing of gas meters. At present the permissible limit of error is three per cent in favour of the producer and four per cent in favour of the consumer. That is being narrowed down to two per cent and three per cent, thus giving us better meters. The other amendments are merely substituting the word 'district' and repealing the clause respecting inspection, which will hereafter be by regulation.

Mr. STEWART. In Hamilton we have believed that there was no provision to protect the users of gas, that they could furnish us with any quality of gas, and that there was no provision whereby the city could have the gas tested.

Mr. BEATTIE. Every city has a proper protection for its gas supply, and it is tested for quality frequently. In London the gas is tested regularly.

Mr. STEWART. Are you speaking of artificial gas?

Mr. BEATTIE. Yes, that is artificial gas.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Under the present Gas Inspection Act all artificial gas is inspected as to its quality, and its illuminating power. One of the best inspectors we have in Canada is in Hamilton, and I have never heard any complaint from there as to the inspection of artificial gas. Natural gas is not inspected as regards its illuminating qualities as, under the law, it is not supposed to be used as an illuminant, although it is so used. It is inspected for the purpose of determining that it does not contain sulphuretted hydrogen, which is a deadly noxious gas. The gas Act now on the statute-book was passed long before natural gas was in use in Ontario, and it does not recognize the use of natural gas as an illuminant. Under this Bill, we seek authority to test natural gas for its heating power, which authority we do not now possess. I think it is a fact gas is less and less used as an illuminant, unless it is used with mantles, and when it is used with mantles, the quality it requires to possess is heating rather than illuminating power, as the mantle is made incandescent by the calorific power of the gas, and it is this calorific power which should be the basis of the test of natural gas.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I desire to ask the Minister of Inland Revenue an explanation with regard to certain matters. For instance, the law provides that there shall be no sulphuretted hydrogen or ammonia in gas. Then, the section here proposed provides that something must be added to the gas to give it an odour. I ask the minister to explain what authority he has for stating that sulphuretted hydrogen in gas is more deadly than ordinary gas itself or methane?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I did not say sulphuretted hydrogen is more deadly than other gas; I am not enough of a chemist to know that. But I said that under the law sulphuretted hydrogen was not allowed to form part of gas used as an illuminant. It does not appear in artificial gas anywhere in Canada that I am aware of.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The advantage of the presence of sulphuretted hydrogen in natural gas is that it gives the peculiar odour that enables people using it to detect a leak.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I do not know that it gives its peculiar odour to natural gas altogether. But I say that, under the law, it must not appear in gas used as an illuminant.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I am taking issue with the minister. That clause was put into the previous Act to prevent, so far as possible, the use of natural gas.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I happen to be a little acquainted with this matter. What I want to know is why there is an objection to sulphuretted hydrogen?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. My information is that sulphuretted hydrogen is a deadly poison. If used in illuminating gas, and there is any escape into the room, it is extremely dangerous. The object of the provision of the law which has been on the statute-book for thirty or forty years is to prohibit the use of gas characterized by this dangerous quality. That is entirely different from the department having power to make an odorless gas odorous. I do not know that gas is made in Canada which is inodorous. I would suppose that the object of making gas odorous is that you can smell it, because inodorous gas escaping into a room would be an extremely dangerous thing. It could not be detected. Death might result, but, as a matter of fact, I think all gas is odorous more or less. My deputy says that he has not been required to compel any manufacturer to put anything into the gas to make it odorous.

Mr. BEATTIE. Of course natural gas is inodorous. You cannot detect it when it escapes.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What makes the gas odorous is the sulphuretted hydrogen, and that sulphuretted hydrogen is not a particle more deadly than the natural gas itself. It does not form a new combination different from that which already exists?

Mr. BEATTIE. How is it put in?

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. It comes there naturally. It is born in the gas the same as sulphur is in petroleum. There is a certain amount of sulphur in petroleum. There is a certain amount of sulphur in natural gas which is merely a higher fraction than petroleum. This provision was inserted in the Bill a number of years ago to prevent the people from using natural gas. Some artificial gas makers said that natural gas was dangerous, and for that reason they compelled the producers of natural gas, when the gas was to be used for illuminating purposes, to put it through a process. I cannot understand why if natural gas is deadly when it escapes into a room, it is any more deadly than sulphuretted hydrogen.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I do not know enough about the peculiar properties of gases to debate the question with my hon. friend. My understanding is that if sulphuretted hydrogen in artificial or natural gas escapes into a room or is burned in a room it is an extremely dangerous thing; in fact, fatal. There is not a particle of sulphuretted hydrogen permitted in any artificial gas made in Canada. If one of our inspectors found its presence there he would immediately notify the manufacturers, and a change would be made, or the manufacturers would be fined if they allowed such gas to go into consumption. It is a fact that in many natural gases sulphuretted hydrogen is present. As a matter of fact, some of the wells had to be closed down because of it. We do not recognize the use of natural gas as an illuminant. There has been a continuous contest between the department, and some of the owners of wells in western Ontario, but we have not recognized it. The owners of wells do not undertake to sell their gas as an illuminant. They sell it for heating purposes, and the parties who buy the gas light their houses with it. Recently we have been endeavouring to get the owners of some of the gas wells, particularly around the city of Chatham, to use a small purifier, which I think is working satisfactorily. I have not caught the point of my hon. friend. We do not permit sulphuretted hydrogen in gas. The law has not permitted it before, and it is not proposed to permit it now. My hon. friend says that this is put in the Act for the purpose of preventing the use of natural gas. I do not think that is so. My deputy assures me it is not so. The Act is older than the use of natural gas as an illuminant, which is of recent date. Therefore, it could not have been put in for that purpose. The amendments that we are making now are for the purpose of still further strengthening the Act. We are going to take power and that is the principal amendment—to test the heating, or calorific power of all gases. As gas is coming into universal use for heating purposes, and as it is disappearing as an illuminant it is very necessary that we should have that power. It is not absolutely disappearing as an illuminant, but where it is still used it is used with a mantle, and you very seldom see an open flame now. Where the mantle is used it is the calorific power, and not the illuminating power that is important, because heat has to be produced to make the mantle incandescent.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The original idea of preventing sulphuretted hydrogen in gas was to prevent gas makers from selling water gas. Now the world is going largely into the manufacture of water gas, and producers are able to sell Mond gas at a very low figure, and it will continue to be sold as heating gas. I do not think that this sulphuretted hydrogen, which is contained in the gas is any more deadly than the gas itself, any more than fusil oil is more deadly than whisky. Either one will kill a man if he takes enough. I cannot understand why this clause is put into the Canadian Act, except to compel the sellers of natural gas to put the gas through an expensive cleaning process. You have to use iron filings to take the sulphur out of it, and it must go through a purifier. This gas is just as safe as the gas that is used in a gas engine. The producer gas used in a gas engine has that sulphuretted hydrogen in it, and if you are going to have it taken out of illuminating gas you might as well say that a factory should have it taken out of the gas that it uses for industrial purposes. With what little knowledge I have of the practical use of gas in engines and of the use of natural gas, I am led to the conclusion that this is a fool provision. It is a fool provision that was put into the Act away back fifty years ago, and is still held on to.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. What does my hon. friend want changed?

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The objection I have to this Bill is the provision in paragraph (d) of section 31. We have not reached that yet, but you are dealing with it in clause (b) of the first section. You compel them to take the nasty smell out of the gas by clause 31 by removing sulphuretted hydrogen, and in clause 3 you compel them to put something else in the gas to give it a smell.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Subsection 3 has been the law for many years, and I am advised that none of the gas made in Canada is inodorous, and every one knows that inodorous gas would be very dangerous if it leaked. In subsection 3 we have added 'for testing the calorific power of gas,' which is a very necessary provision. There is no inspection now for testing the calorific power of gas, and it is coming into general use for heating purposes.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Do you fix a standard?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We will fix a standard by regulation.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. You have power to test and inspect in the Act, but so far as I see, you have no power to fix a standard.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I have no objection to add the words 'for testing the calorific power of gas and establishing standards therefor.'

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. That is right.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. In subclause (d), I add a new section: 'for testing the illuminating power of gas,' and to that I will add the words suggested by the hon. member (Mr. J. A. Currie), 'and establishing standards therefor.' Then, in subsection (e), to the words 'or testing the purity of gas,' we will also add the words 'and establishing standards therefor.'

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. That appears to be all right.

On section 3, meters to comply with true standard measure.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This is one of the important amendments. It limits the percentage of errors in the meter. The old law allowed 3 per cent in favour of the seller and 4 per cent in favour of the consumer. We are now narrowing the limit down to 2 per cent and 3 per cent, respectively, thus making the meter more perfect.

On section 4, undertaking of gas makers as to supply and quality of gas.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The complaint is made that sometimes natural gas is supplied at far too great a pressure. Has the minister taken into consideration an amendment to provide that it shall not be delivered to the consumer above a certain pressure?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am advised that gas from a natural well could not be taken into a house at the natural pressure of the well, and that as a matter of fact it is always reduced to a very small pressure.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Sometimes it is not reduced enough, and, therefore, causes leaks in the joints of the pipes, which in turn cause explosions in houses.

Mr. BARKER. I would suggest that the minister use the words, 'proper and sufficient pressure.'

Amendment as proposed agreed to.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I have already taken exception to paragraph (d), which says that the gas 'shall exhibit no trace of sulphuretted hydrogen or any excess of sulphur and ammonia.' I think the department has sufficient power to make regulations without the necessity of a statutory enactment of this kind, and, moreover, this is not necessary, because I do not think that it can be shown that sulphuretted hydrogen is poisonous.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This clause is regarded by the department as most important. The very reason why we inspect gas is that no trace of sulphuretted hydrogen is permitted in it. These provisions, I am advised by the experts of the department, are essential to the proper inspection of gas. Its purity and its illuminating quality are the two great points. My hon. friend says that we can make regulations covering these provisions. If so, there can be no objection to having them in the Act.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I say that neither the hon. gentleman nor any chemist can show me that sulphuretted hydrogen is poisonous.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am advised that no chemist in the world will agree with my hon. friend. A year ago, when we tried to legalize the use of natural gas as an illuminant, the chemist of our department would not permit natural gas, with 1 per cent of sulphuretted hydrogen in it, to be used as an illuminant.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I take issue with the chemist of the department. I say that sulphuretted hydrogen is neither poisonous nor does it form an element in the compound when burned. It happens to be a component of two very cheap gases which the public want to use: one is natural gas, and the other is Mond gas; and this clause is kept in the Act to compel these gases to be put through very expensive processes in order to remove the smell of sulphuretted hydrogen, which is not dangerous and thereby to make the gas more expensive to the consumer. I say again that, from my knowledge of chemistry, which is not very great and should not be any greater than the minister's, who is a doctor, sulphuretted hydrogen is not poison, and I do not think he can find anybody who can show that it is.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am not a chemist but nothing has been impressed upon me so much in the administration of this Act by the experts of the department as the fact that sulphuretted hydrogen is poisonous. The chief inspector gives me this memo:

> Sulphuretted hydrogen is the one poison in gas which is not destroyed by combustion, but escapes into the room as sulphurous acid gas. The other poisonous constituents are destroyed by combustion.

The whole inspection of manufactured gas in Canada during all these years has been with the view of eliminating the very last particle of sulphuretted hydrogen.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. An ordinary coal stove will produce more sulphuretted hydrogen in a room than half a dozen gas jets, there is no question but that it is an expensive process to take the sulphuretted hydrogen out of natural gas, more especially out of the cheaper gas called Mond gas. The regulations are already sufficient. Clause 3 permits the department to take steps to protect the public so that it is not necessary to have clause 4. If at any time the department wishes to relax their regulations they can do so, but under this clause they cannot.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. In accordance with the hon. gentleman's suggestion, I would move that after the words 'by regulation made by the minister,' in the fourth line, the words 'or not in accordance with the standard' be substituted.

Section, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I also desire to add the general penalty clause which we have in all our Inland Revenue Acts as subsection 3 of section 8:

> Every person who violates any of the provisions of this Act, or any of the regulations established under this Act, or who neglects any duty imposed on him by this Act, or by any such regulation for which violation or neglect no penalty is specially herein provided, shall incur a penalty of not less than $25 and not more than $100.

Subsection, as amended, agreed to.

On section 9,

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I move to substitute for this section:

Sections 35, 36, 37 and 38, and the schedule of the said Act are hereby repealed.

We have made certain changes in the Act that make these clauses unnecessary.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. The House will be moved into Committee of Supply. We will take up first the remaining items of the supplementary estimates, and after that the Minister of Public Works will continue with his estimates.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.18 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 18, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 176) to incorporate the Laurentian Insurance Company of Canada.—Mr. Talbot.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES.

Mr. FISHER moved:

That the House go into Committee of the Whole on Monday next to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the payment to members of the Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources of their actual reasonable disbursements incurred in travelling to, returning from and remaining at meetings of the committees of the commission or attending to the business thereof.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I hope that when the minister takes up this motion, as he proposes at an early date, he will make a statement to the House as to what the relation of the commission is to parliament in the way of the committees of parliament asking its advice in regard to certain questions. We have had such questions up in the Railway Committee at times in connection with Bills that seriously interfered with the conservation of our natural resources and I hope the minister and the government will be able to let us know how the committees of this House may avail themselves of the advice, if we are entitled to have the advice, of the commission, and what ought to be the means of communication between the House and the commission.

Motion agreed to.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday, the 23rd inst., it stand adjourned to Tuesday the 29th inst.

Mr. WARBURTON. Before the motion is carried, may I call the attention of the right hon. First Minister to the fact that, owing to the position in which some of the maritime province members are placed, an adjournment from Wednesday until Tuesday is rather awkward. For myself, going to Prince Edward Island, it means that I have either to lose some days from the House or spend two nights on the road to get into Charlottetown on Saturday at midnight and leave Monday morning. I would like to ask the First Minster if he could not see his way clear to amend the motion so that instead of having the adjournment to Tuesday, it be to the Wednesday following, which would be conferring a great favour upon us, and be most convenient for us.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is a matter as to which the government are quite willing to place themselves in the judgment of the House. If it is preferred that we should reconvene on Wednesday, the 30th, instead of Tuesday the 29th, we are quite willing.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Several hon. members from the west have spoken to me on the same subject, and they would prefer Wednesday to Tuesday.

Mr. M. CLARK. Personally, I am nearing the end of the second session in which I have lost one day. I have not been able to go home at any time except upon the occasion of the last Christmas holidays. I represent in that respect a number of western members who come long distances to serve their country, at a great deal of inconvenience, and if the views of the Prince Edward Islanders are to be met they will be met by keeping other gentlemen here, who cannot go home at all, in absolute idleness.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In order to accommodate both the east and the west we will say Wednesday the 30th.

Motion as amended, agreed to.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. EDWARDS. On the 2nd of December last, I put a question with regard to armouries and drill halls which in the form of a notice of motion was issued as an order on the 15th of December. When may I expect the return to be brought down?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I will inquire about the matter, and have it brought down. I might say to the hon. gentleman that there is no objection to it.

Mr. EDWARDS. I just thought it had escaped the attention of the minister. On the 13th of January last, I asked a question with regard to certain work done by contractors Sullivan and Langdon of Kingston, and an order was issued on the 19th of January, but the papers have not yet been brought down.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will make inquiry as to the cause of the delay.

Mr. BRODER. When may we expect the report of the commission appointed to look into the swine industry in Ireland and Denmark?

Mr. FISHER. The report has been in the hands of the printer for some time, and when we get it, which I hope will be soon, it will be distributed.

Mr. BRADBURY. On the 14th of February last, an order of the House was passed for:

Copy of all papers and instructions given to A. S. Williams, law clerk of the Department of Indian Affairs, and to S. Swinford, inspector of Indians, Winnipeg, in connection with their work among the St. Peter's Indians in Manitoba; also a copy of the report of these gentlemen in connection with the work they have been engaged in during the last few weeks among the St. Peter's Indians.

I would like to have this return as soon as possible.

SUPPLY—LACHUTE POST OFFICE.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. GEORGE H. PERLEY. Six weeks ago, I questioned the government as to why the new public building in Lachute was not being used as a post office, and on my visit to Lachute a short time ago, I was much surprised to find that the post office was closed yet, so far as the transaction of business is concerned. The building was practically completed many months ago, the caretaker has been living in it all winter, and it is being heated and lighted at the public expense while the public have not the use of it. The Lachute post office is a distributing centre for many of the smaller post offices, and it is very much needed. Why has it not been opened for the transaction of business?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am glad the hon. member has brought this matter to my attention. It may be that the Public Works Department has not yet given the Post Office Department possession, but if it has I will see that the post office is opened at once.

Mr. PERLEY. The Minister of Public Works informed me yesterday that the building had been transferred to the Post Office Department.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If that is so the postmaster will be installed immediately.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The building has been placed at the disposal of the Post Office Department, and the postmaster has recently been asking for certain equipment which no doubt will be supplied as soon as possible. I think my department has done all that is necessary.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will see to it immediately.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I ask the Minister of Finance whether it is the intention of the government to make any statement before the adjournment next Wednesday in connection with the tariff issue between the United States and Canada?

Mr. FIELDING. For the present I should not care to make any definite announcement. It will depend upon the state of affairs at that particular time whether an announcement will be made or not. I do not think it would be in the public interest to say anything on the matter at present.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Further amount required for steam service between Canada and Mexico, upon the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, $16,666.66.

Mr. FIELDING. This vote is intended for the service on the Atlantic and the Pacific. Originally the Mexican government paid $50,000 in gold, and Canada a similar amount. The Mexican government ceased paying anything, and the Canadian government, rather than see the service abandoned, granted an additional $25,000 per annum, making $75,000 in all. This amount of $16,666 is to cover that portion of the fiscal year 1909-10, since the Mexican government ceased paying their share of the subsidy.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What business is being done by this line and what are the prospects?

Mr. FIELDING. There is a considerable trade outward, but not very much coming back. That is the reason the Mexican government did not seem disposed to continue their share of the subsidy. From the Canadian point of view, however, the traffic is very encouraging.

Mr. J. HAGGART. We ought to have a specific statement, giving the exact amount of the trade. Will the minister at the same time give us a statement of how it is divided between the Atlantic and the Pacific?

Mr. FIELDING. The vote is a general one for both the Atlantic and the Pacific, but this increase is entirely for the Pacific side. The full details of the traffic are contained in a departmental report which is now in the printer's hands and will reach hon. members shortly. The tonnage carried outward during the recent months has been as follows: September, 766 tons weight and measurement; October, 2,228 tons weight, and measurement, November, no sailing, December, 3,133 tons weight, and measurement, January, the figures are not yet available.

Mr. WRIGHT. How frequent is the service on the Atlantic and on the Pacific?

Mr. FIELDING. Monthly on both oceans.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What portion of this belongs to the mail service?

Mr. FIELDING. The mails are carried on all subsidized steamers as a condition of the contract, but there is no specific allotment for mail purposes.

Mr. JAMESON. Can the minister state what the amount of subsidy per ton of freight is?

Mr. FIELDING. No, we haven't it worked out in that form.

Mr. SPROULE. Perhaps the minister would give us some idea of what the aggregate trade is between Canada and Mexico.

Mr. FIELDING. The department report, which has already been presented to the House, contains information of that character. If on examination anything more is required, we shall be happy to supplement it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Can the minister give us the total increase in the steamship subsidies and subventions this year as compared with last year?

Mr. FIELDING. I haven't it at hand, but I shall be very glad to get it or any other information desired, and endeavour to supply it at another stage of the trade and commerce estimates.

Mr. JOHN HAGGART.

Steam service between Canada and Cuba, $15,000.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Why is this increase, and why did it arise?

Mr. FIELDING. This is a new service. The contract was entered into with Messrs. William Thomson & Company, of St. John, at the rate of $25,000 per annum, one sailing per month. This amount of $15,000 is intended to cover the service performed since November last, but all of it may not be required.

Mr. J. HAGGART. How is it a new service? The government has not power to enter into a contract without the consent of this House. There must have been an amount voted for it.

Mr. FIELDING. Services of this character are placed under contract with the qualifying condition that no money can be paid until it is appropriated by parliament. It is not an unusual proceeding.

Mr. J. HAGGART. It has been done, but it is rather unusual, and it is not the correct principle of carrying on the business of the country.

Mr FIELDING. Perhaps in the main my hon. friend is right. Before a dollar is expended, we should have an appropriation by parliament; but sometimes that is found to interfere with efficient business, and if the parties to a contract are willing to enter into the arrangement on the condition that I have mentioned, I cannot see any objection to it. The failure to do it might prevent the doing of something which parliament would wish to have done as promptly as possible.

Mr. CROSBY. I understand that this matter came up last autumn, a demand having been made by the people of St. John for a line between that city and Cuba. While I have not anything to say against St. John, I wish to point out that the only port in the maritime provinces to which steamers plying between Canada and Cuba will come is the port of Halifax, and they afford sufficient accommodation for all the trade that is carried without any subsidy at all.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What line is that?

Mr. CROSBY. The Pickford & Black Company put on boats whenever they are required.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They get large subsidies for the West India service.

Mr. CROSBY. They do not get any for Cuba. I do not know whether the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) was communicated with, but there must have been some communication from the port of Halifax in regard to this matter. On account of this subsidy being granted, this steamer was brought to St. John and loaded largely with potatoes which she carried to the port of Havana and flooded that market to such an extent that shippers in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick lost a great deal of money. I understand from the statement of the Minister of Finance that all the money will not be required. That means no doubt that the steamship is not going to continue the monthly trip. Is that the case? I have no desire to interfere with the port of St. John or any other port. I desire that every port should be given all the accommodation possible, but I do not think it wise to subsidize one line to compete against others. I shall be glad when the time comes when we shall be able to dispense with subsidies, but am satisfied in the meantime that such subsidies as are necessary to encourage trade and commerce should be given. I might refer to the Mexican trade as an instance in which a subsidy is very advantageous. But if any fair minded man will consult with the merchants of St. John, he will be told that the subsidy to the line in question was not conducive to their best interests.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This service established between St. John and Cuba has been of the very greatest possible benefit. If my hon. friend were to communicate with the board of trade and the merchants and shippers of St. John, he would find that the service has been very successful in the way of developing trade, and has given satisfaction to the shippers, not only from St. John, but from up the valley of the St. John river, more especially in the counties of Carleton, Victoria, and other sections. My hon. friend says that the steamship lines from Halifax to Cuba will afford all the accommodation necessary. I am always glad to see trade developed from the port of Halifax, but the difficulty with that port is that it is too far away from the point of production in New Brunswick to be of any advantage to the people producing hay and potatoes and other agricultural products in the valley of the St. John river, one of the best sections in the whole of Canada for the production of potatoes. The only difficulty was the want of a market, but by reason of the establishment of this line, these people have been able to market their potatoes in large quantities. These potatoes are a great favourite in the Cuban market, and the result has been an enormous benefit to the farmers of the St. John river valley. As to the line which the Department of Trade and Commerce agreed to subsidize, it was bound to give one sailing per month. As a matter of fact, in the two months, during which its steamers have been running, it has given seven sailings instead of one per month. In one month it gave three sailings instead of one. It did that because of the development of trade and because it was reasonably necessary for the accommodation of the public.

Mr. CROSBY. How many sailings in February and March?

Mr. PUGSLEY. March is not much more than half through, but in February, I think they had two sailings.

Mr. CROSBY. Does the minister know whether they had any sailings at all or not?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, I am quite sure they had one, and I think they had two.

Mr. CROSBY. Is this steamship service, to which we are paying a subsidy of $25,000 a year, to continue every month in the year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is the expectation.

Mr. CROSBY. I am not asking what is the expectation, but what the contract is.

Mr. FIELDING. This contract requires a monthly service. My hon. friend is mistaken when he says that the service from Halifax is performed without a subsidy. There is a service subsidized from Halifax to Cuba.

Mr. CROSBY. There is only the Mexican line which calls at Cuba.

Mr. FIELDING. That is a subsidized service.

Mr. CROSBY. But here you have a line subsidized from St. John direct to Cuba and back. The line from Montreal in the summer, and Halifax in the winter, touching at Havana, calls at the Bahama islands and Cuba, and goes down to Mexico. We get all the boats we want in Halifax in the season when freights are offering; and if very little freight offers, it is difficult to get boats to carry on the service until next November. Before the government entered into a contract to pay a subsidy of $25,000 to a steamship line between St. John and Cuba, they should have been able to show whether there was any necessity for it or whether that service could not be had without a subsidy. I have no desire to oppose the granting of a subsidy where necessary for the general benefit of Canada, but I am opposed to the granting of subsidies where they are not required. That is why I take exception to this subsidy. People in Halifax were very much disappointed when it was granted, and from the information I have, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) must have had some communication from the merchants in the export trade, indicating that all the accommodation necessary for the trade with Cuba could be had at Halifax without charge to this country.

Mr. FIELDING. According to my hon. friend, all the accommodation which Halifax desires must be given even with the assistance of subsidies. But the province of New Brunswick is largely engaged in the production of potatoes, and if the trade there wishes to export them to Cuba, I do not see why they should not have the right to do so; and as St. John is more convenient for the shipment of New Brunswick produce, I do not see why the St. John people should not have a line subsidized to Cuba.

Mr. CROSBY. If the Halifax merchants can get all the freight accommodation they want, the St. John people ought to be able to get the same. The boats chartered from Halifax come to that port at a season when freight is offered, so that the trade can get all the accommodation they require. These boats to Cuba will not carry the mails, the mails go by way of New York. They are subsidized from St. John simply for the purpose of carrying freight and nothing else, and are not suitable for carrying the mails any way. I am not asking that Halifax be put on a different footing from St. John, but that it be on an equal basis.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have always thought that Halifax was treated better than St. John.

Mr. CROSBY. It is easy to prove that the hon. minister is wrong, and when the time comes, I shall be able to do that. When we take up the railway question I shall be able to show that St. John has a great advantage of one per cent per 100 pounds over Halifax. All we want is to be on a fair and equal basis with St. John, but I do say it is unfair to grant a subsidy to St. John to a boat running in competition with boats that run on their own bottoms from Halifax, and so put the merchants and exporters of Halifax in a different position from those in St. John. I want them to be on an even basis, and on an even basis we are able to play our part in exporting, or importing at all times. But I do not want to have Halifax placed at a disadvantage by giving $2,000 a month to a boat to run from St. John or any other part of Canada. The Minister of Finance must know this better than I do because he is more familiar with these things. He refers to the steamship company that trades between Montreal in summer via Halifax, and the Bahama Islands, and Cuba, and then to Mexico, but he should know that that service has nothing to do with the direct trade with Cuba.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not understand my hon. friend. A vessel sailing from Halifax to Cuba, and landing goods there is in direct trade with Cuba. There is that steamer running direct to Cuba, and enjoying a government subsidy. It is true that Halifax has occasional other steamers that do not enjoy a subsidy, but it is also true that both Halifax and St. John have subsidized lines to Cuba.

Mr. CROSBY. The Minister of Finance surely does not want us to believe that a boat sailing from Montreal, calling at Halifax, and then going to the Bahamas, and calling at Cuba, and on to Mexico, is a direct subsized boat from Halifax to Cuba.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why not?

Mr. CROSBY. The New Brunswick people have the same right, and opportunity that the people of Halifax, and Nova Scotia have on this line subsized from Montreal in the summer, and from Halifax in the winter to Cuba and Mexico, but here we have a steamship line subsidized last November, a contract made by the government last November, yet no intimation was given to the House last session that such a thing was intended. Now we are asked to vote the money. I think it is quite unfair. The understanding was that nothing was to be paid unless we granted it. It should not be granted because I do not think they are entitled to anything. If it was necessary that this should be given in order to facilitate the trade of Canada, and Cuba I would be quite satisfied, but that is not the case, and no one has shown or attempted to show that we have not now all the accommodation required for our trade with Cuba, which is chiefly the fish and potato trade. We have a lumber trade which is carried by sailing vessels, and we have all the accommodation required for that trade. No one in St. John or in Nova Scotia has any desire to have the lumber trade diverted from sailing boats to steamers. The fish and potato trade is all that requires accommodation. I protest against this $25,000 subsidy to a service that is not required.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will this line running to Cuba also run to Mexico?

Mr. FIELDING. This line to which this item refers does not go to Mexico, but the other line to which I referred, after serving the trade between Halifax and Cuba, proceeds on to Mexico.

Mr. EDWARDS. I notice that the total amount in the main and supplementary estimates granted to these two lines is something like $65,000 more this year than last year. That is the subsidy to the line running to Mexico is increased this year by $25,000, and the main estimates contain $25,000 for the line to Cuba, which I presume is the same line towards which you are giving the additional $15,000 in the supplementary estimates, making $40,000 of subsidy to that line where last year there was nothing.

Mr. FIELDING. There seems to be a misconception. There is an additional subsidy of $25,000 for a line from St. John to Cuba. That is a new vote, an addition to the subsidies of last year. The other item shows an increase of $16,000 for the current year on the Pacific side towards Mexico. That is not the Atlantic service at all. On the Pacific we are taking up to some extent the burden which the Mexican government had to lay down.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I may inform the minister that the potato business, which looms so largely in his mind, last year amounted to $57,000, and he is giving $25,000 to improve that service. The exports to the British West Indies were $2,549,000, whilst the imports were over $7,000,000. Thus the West Indies are getting the benefit of our market through our subsidy. Have the West Indies expressed any desire to add to these subsidies as they benefit by them three times as much as we do?

Mr. FIELDING. That is rather a broad question. The subject of trade relations with the West Indies is at this moment engaging the attention of a Royal Commission on which the Minister of Customs has been sitting. I was also a member, but unfortunately was not able to go to the West Indies. The West Indies have not felt able to contribute to these subsidies in the past. The arrangement has hitherto been one sided, both with respect to subsidies, and to the preference. We are trying to bring about a better understanding, how successfully remains to be seen. The West Indies are not too prosperous, and not as well able as Canada to assist commercial enterprise. While it is an undoubted fact that they get advantage of the trade coming this way. it is of considerable advantage to Canada that we should encourage our export trade to the West Indies. That has been a large trade in bygone years for the lower provinces, and we still hope that it will be a trade that will command the encouragement of parliament.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) should be able to show some reason other than those he has given for the extraordinary contract he has entered into. A contract for which there is no vote of parliament should be justified by some extraordinary reason, something in the nature of an emergency. No such cause as that is alleged. Surely, the New Brunswick trade in potatoes was as great in preceding years as it is now. When such a contract is entered into, for which there is no vote of parliament, there should be some other justification than such a statement as that of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) of the extraordinary quantity of potatoes coming down the St. John river for shipment to Cuba. If there was an extraordinary crop last year, are the conditions likely to bring about a repetition of that crop next year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Then, it is now probably about what it has been for fifty years past, and so the question is one which ought to have been considered by the government before now and ought to have been brought to the attention of the House. What I protest against is this manner of doing business, the government entering into a contract for so important a matter as a subsidy with an ocean steamship company without any authority of parliament and for no better reasons than the carrying of the surplus stock of potatoes from the St. John river to Cuba. The very fact that a commission is sitting for the purpose of inquiring into this matter of West Indian trade is the reason why no such arrangement should have been made without consideration of the matter by parliament, unless there was some stronger and more urgent reason than those that have already been stated to us. I enter my protest against such a manner of carrying on the business of the country.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. J. Haggart) says that there must have been the same surplus of potatoes at any time during the last fifty years as last year. I assure my hon. friend that he is entirely mistaken. In the valley of the St. John river, and more especially in the county of Carleton, as my hon. friend from that county (Mr. Carvell) well knows, a great deal more attention has been paid to the cultivation of potatoes in recent years than in the past. People have been going into the business scientifically, and it is not unusual for a farmer to raise $4,000 or $5,000 worth of potatoes in a season. Therefore, this is a matter of enormous importance to a great many farmers. About a year ago the Department of Trade and Commerce very wisely sent a trade commissioner to Cuba. That gentleman made a very careful investigation of the Cuban market, and the possibilities of a large business in potatoes and other products of Canada. His reports gave great encouragement as to the possibilities of doing business in potatoes in that market. The farmers of Carleton and other parts of the St. John valley had been finding a market for potatoes in Montreal and Ottawa—they had even sent them as far west as Toronto, but, owing to the freight rates, there was very little profit in the business for the farmer, and some years no profit at all. Therefore, they began to turn their attention to the Cuban market, and especially view of the report of the trade commissioner appointed by this government.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What about the American market from which they were shut out about a year ago?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was also an important fact which necessarily had its influence. Under the former tariff of the United States the duty upon potatoes was 25 cents per bushel, but by the recent tariff legislation it was increased to 40 cents, a prohibitory rate. Therefore, the farmers were obliged to turn to Cuba for a market, and it did seem as if there were vast possibilities of creating a profitable business there. So strongly did the people feel upon this subject that, last season, the provincial government undertook to assist in the work by renting a warehouse in Cuba and also a warehouse in the city of St. John to facilitate the storage of potatoes until they could be sent forward. My hon. friend from Carleton came to Ottawa in the interest of the people, and as the result of large meetings that had been held in various sections of the county of Carleton, and urged in the strongest possible manner that this government should take steps to procure a regular service between St. John and Cuba, so that the producer might know that there would be an opportunity of sending potatoes forward regularly, and that the Cuban market could be cultivated with a greater degree of certainty. The government, after very careful consideration, yielded to the representations made on behalf of the people who had met to discuss the matter altogether irrespective of politics, and in such large numbers that it was evident that the feeling was universal that here was an opportunity to develop trade which ought not to be missed. The government agreed to give the aid, and, while the company was bound to give a sailing once a month, it has, up to the present time, given two or three sailings a month. The business has developed greatly. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. J. A. Currie) speaks of the total value of potatoes sent to Cuba as having been $57,000——

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. That was the amount sent to all the West Indies.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I can tell my hon. friend that, as the result of the regular steamship communication which has been established, and the efforts of the trade commissioner in Cuba appointed by this government, and of the co-operation of the farmers of New Brunswick in developing the trade, the farmers of the province of New Brunswick will export to Cuba alone during the present year fully three times as much in value of potatoes as the amount given by my hon. friend as representing our trade with the whole of the West Indies.

Mr. CARVELL. Six times as much.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, probably six times as my hon. friend states. There will be sent there this year probably six times the total quantity of potatoes sent from the whole of Canada to the West Indies, including Cuba, up to the 31st March last.

Mr. CROSBY. The estimate given by my hon. friend was of potatoes sent to the British West Indies, not to Cuba.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I understood my hon. friend to give the total exports. In my judgment this government cannot be performing a better service to the public than by giving the farmers of any section of Canada a new outlet for their products.

Mr. J. HAGGART. It is the government doing it that we object to. It is parliament that has the authority.

Mr. FIELDING. Parliament is going to vote it, I hope.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I know of nothing that will be of more benefit to an important section of Canada than the establishment of this service between St. John and Cuba. In regard to parliament voting the money, I may say that it was a matter of great urgency last fall that this service should be established, at the very time that these potatoes were being harvested. That was the time that the market was ready, and it was necessary to provide this service. The company was willing to take the assurance of the government that parliament would be asked to vote this subsidy, but the whole matter is subject, of course, to the approval of parliament. The matter was one of very great urgency as far as it affected a very large number of the people of New Brunswick.

Mr. EDWARDS I think I am quite right in saying that as far as the potato crop is concerned, last year was one of the most prolific years that we have ever seen for that crop in the Dominion of Canada. As regards the trade of Canada with Cuba, I find that there was a larger amount of potatoes exported from Canada to Cuba last year than for several years previously. In the year 1908 the amount was 468,438 bushels, valued at $357,824; and in 1906, 486,893 bushels, valued at $377,140. If you take the total exports and imports, you find that the total exports to Cuba in 1906 amounted to $1,221,766; in 1908, $1,366,319, and in 1909, $1,403,442. There was an increase in our export trade with Cuba last year over the previous year of $37,123. It appears to me that to increase subsidies to the extent of $40,000 is a little out of proportion to the increase in the trade as shown by the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce. When we take up the matter of our imports from Cuba we find the following figures:

1906	445,000
1907	475,000
1908	515,163
1909	496,485

There has been an actual falling off in our imports from Cuba, a lessening in the trade, and if we compare our total trade in 1909 with our total trade in 1908, including exports and imports, we find that the increase is only $18,000. We are hardly warranted in giving so large a subsidy by the result as shown in the report of the Department of Trade and Commerce. We are anxious to do anything we can to increase the trade of Canada, but I think we should keep within reasonable bounds in this matter, and when a commission has been appointed to inquire into this question, it would be well to have a little more information to warrant so large an appropriation as that which is being asked for by the minister in this regard.

Mr. FIELDING. The commission referred to does not cover trade with Cuba. The commission in question has relation entirely to trade with the British West Indies, and perhaps it would be well to understand that the Cuban trade is not in any way affected by the operations of that commission.

Mr. EDWARDS. I gave the figures of Canada's trade with Cuba.

Mr. FIELDING. I merely wanted to have it understood that the commission is not inquiring into anything beyond the British West Indies.

Mr. EDWARDS. That might give us an indication of trade with the islands in the vicinity of British West Indies.

Mr. CARVELL. I am sorry I was not here at the beginning of this discussion, because this is a matter of very great importance to my own constituency and the whole western part of New Brunswick, as well as to other portions of the maritime provinces. The figures quoted by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) I have no doubt are correct as to the year ended March 31, 1909, but he will be surprised when he learns the totals of this year's trade with Cuba. I have not the figures at my hand, but my recollection is that last year alone something like 300,000 or 400,000 barrels of potatoes were imported into Cuba from the United States. I had a letter only a few days ago from the Canadian Trade Commissioner in Cuba, and he informed me that no potatoes whatever had been inported into Cuba from the United States during the past year. The maritime provinces to-day are controlling the entire potato trade of Cuba. We know that the development of that country is only commencing. I can tell my hon. friends here that in the St. John valley alone we are producing seven or eight times the quantity of potatoes that we were producing six or seven years ago, and we could multiply that three or four times yet without any difficulty if we only had a market. There is practically no limit within reason to the possibilities all up and down the St. John river in respect to potatoes providing we have a market. Formerly we used to send them to the United States. The duty is now 62½ cents a barred of 160 pounds. For a number of years we were able to sell quite a quantity of potatoes to Ontario, but we found last year, on looking into the crop returns, that there would be an export from Ontario rather than an import. My recollection is that the United States tariff is not only 62½ cents a barrel, but that they proposed to make it 40 cents a bushel. It may be 40 cents a bushel now.

Mr. CROSBY. It is 40 cents a bushel now.

Mr.CARVELL. That is how much a barrel?—and if the surtax is put on that means probably $1.25 or $1.50, which absolutely precludes trade with the United States. We saw that if we could not sell our potatoes to the upper Canadian provinces or to the United States, with a crop variously estimated at from 400,000 to 600,000 bushels in New Brunswick alone, it would mean almost ruination to the very farmers in that province. I make no apology in stating that I did everything I could to get the government to inaugurate this service. I take my full share of the responsibility, and I can assure my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Haggart) that regardless of politics or of any political feeling in the province of New Brunswick, both parties are agreed that this is one of the best moves that was ever made. To such an extent are they agreed that the local government, whose rights are not so great as are those of this government, are co-operating in this business. This year our farmers have been able to dispose of their products, but without this encouragement I do not know what they would have done, and this applies to Nova Scotia to some extent as well as to New Brunswick. The service is from St. John, and I hope the House will not hesitate for a moment to vote this because so much good has it done in my own constituency alone that up to the present time we have shipped about 300,000 bushels of potatoes to Cuba.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Have we sent from Canada to Cuba any more potatoes than last?

Mr. CARVELL. Yes.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Very little.

Mr. CARVELL. Oh yes, the export this year has been more than doubled from the maritime provinces. The returns my hon. friend has are only brought down to March, 1909, but he will be surprised when he sees the returns down to March, 1910. A year ago the people of the United States were supplying the people of Cuba with potatoes, but with proper transportation facilities there is no reason why New Brunswck and Nova Scotia cannot control the whole potato trade of Cuba.

Mr. J. HAGGART. There is a monthly statement issued by the department down to March, 1910.

Mr. CARVELL. I was not aware of that, but I am positive these returns will show an enormous increase in the export trade to Cuba from the maritime provinces and from Canada as a whole. From my own constituency 250,000 bushels of potatoes have been sent to Cuba since October; from the whole province of New Brunswick 350,000 bushels, and there will be half a million bushels sent before the first of May. There is a great chance for business with Cuba, not only in potatoes, but in hay, grain, fish, and lumber, and every steamer shows a largely increased cargo.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is this subsidy confined to one steamship line, and has the government control over the freight rates?

Mr. CARVELL. The contract is with a very responsible firm, that of Wm. Thomson & Co., of St. John, who are large ship owners. The department has absolute control over freight rates and as a result of the subsidy the freight rates on potatoes to Cuba are to-day 30 per cent less than they were a year ago.

Mr. CROSBY. What is the rate?

Mr. CARVELL. Forty cents a barrel from St. John to Havana, and this time last year it was 65 cents. The subsidy has more than doubled the business between the maritime provinces and Cuba, and it promises to be even more beneficial in the future.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not dispute the wisdom of subsidizing a line between Cuba and Canada, but I do object to the principle of the government making a contract before it informs parliament, and then asking parliament to approve of it so that no matter whether it is a bad contract or not the friends of the government have to support it or vote non-confidence in the government. Parliament has the right to be consulted before contracts of this kind are entered into. The people of New Brunswick must have been raising potatoes before there was any subsidy, and if they wanted to get into the Cuban market the government could very well have submitted the proposition to parliament before committing themselves to a contract.

Mr. CARVELL.

Mr. MICHAUD. I beg to state that I concur in the statement made by the Minister of Public Works and my hon. friend from Carleton county in reference to potato growing in New Brunswick. The potato growing industry is one of the largest agricultural industries in the state of Maine, and there is no reason in the world why it should not be an equally important industry in New Brunswick, if we had transportation facilities for the crop. What has happened in the past is that the potato buyers of the state of Maine have been buying our New Brunswick potatoes for from 60 to 70 cents per barrel, paying the duty, taking them to Boston and New York, and very often sending the same potatoes to Cuba. We want the same facilities for getting into the markets as our American friends have, and the present subsidy is one way of enabling us to obtain these facilities. I am informed that the state of Maine produces as much potatoes as all the rest of the United States put together, and every Maine farmer who goes into the industry is making money. We have the same soil in New Brunswick, and there is no reason why we should not supply the Cuban market as well as the market in the British West India Islands. I approve of the subsidy to be granted by the government in this case to help transportation between St. John and the West Indies, and I believe it will be productive of the best results.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Have you any starch factories in New Brunswick?

Mr. MICHAUD. No. The farmers of Maine send their best potatoes to the market and keep their small potatoes for making starch, but we have not as yet developed in New Brunswick a starch industry to any extent.

Mr. WRIGHT. It does not seem to me that the best method is to give a subsidy to one particular steamship company. I should think that if a subsidy of so much per ton were given to any steamer which carried the goods from St. John or any other port, that such a system would leave it open for all steamship companies to compete. But if you give full control of the business to one company they can charge up to the limit of the arrangement they have with the government and all other companies are shut out.

Mr. CARVELL. The actual conditions existing would make the suggestion of the hon. member (Mr. Wright) impracticable. The potatoes have to be shipped in the winter, and they have to be kept free from frost in heated cars, and warehouses, and unless there was a regular steamer leaving at a fixed date the potato grower up in the country 150 miles away would not know when to send his potatoes to the sea-board. With the subsidies confined to a regular line sailing on a given day in each month, the merchant has a month in which to get his shipment ready and send it to the sea-board. If we gave the subsidy to any steamer that came along, we might be subsidizing half a dozen steamers in one week, and none in the next month or two. I think the only way to arrange the matter is the way the government has adopted. With regard to the manufacture of starch, I may say that that question has been gone into carefully by the business men of New Brunswick, and it has been found impossible. The amount of potato starch consumed in Canada is so small, that even of the amount produced in the province of Prince Edward Island two years ago one-half was left over. We cannot send it to the United States because there is a prohibitive duty against it, and we cannot send it to England because there they use sago starch.

Mr. J. HAGGART. A good deal of starch is exported from Canada to England, is it not?

Mr. CARVELL. Not potato starch. I went into the question with other gentlemen with the view of establishing a starch industry, but we found that we could not make it pay

Mr FRASER. I am not against the passing of this item, but I think the government should have a settled policy in regard to these subsidies to steamers, so that the different provinces, and the different cities would be able to derive some benefit from them. In the province from which I come we labour under a great disadvantage in the matter of transportation, especially in regard to potatoes. We grow more potatoes per acre in Prince Edward Island, I think, than any other province of Canada. I am well aware that the valley of the St. John river and that part of New Brunswick adjacent to the state of Maine, are becoming very productive in potatoes. But we in Prince Edward Island have not the advantage of having a winter port, like St. John, open all the year round. We have to ship our potatoes in the fall, in a month or two before the close of navigation. Our whole potato crop must then be thrown on the market. The consequence is that the market is glutted, and the farmers do not receive the price they should receive if they could put their product on the market gradually. As to starch factories, we have some in Prince Edward Island. In Kings county alone, we have four which manufacture potato starch during the fall of the year, and to as late a time as they can. One thing this government could do to foster the potato trade would be to give us a better freight rate on the Intercolonial railway, and better conditions for shipment. We cannot ship potatoes in the winter season, because there is no provision made on the Intercolonial railway for keeping the cars warm, and the potatoes in a marketable state until they arrive at Montreal. I have known merchants to inquire whether they could send potatoes to Montreal, and the answer was that if they sent them they would have to send them at their own risk, and send a man along to keep a fire going in the car to prevent them from freezing. As hon. gentlemen know, we have shipped a great many potatoes for years. It is not a new industry, but a very old one, and the government would be justified in providing better transportation facilities for our potatoes, and other products. In this connection I wish to call the attention of the government to another matter which would greatly increase the value of the potato in Prince Edward Island. We want this government to allow us to go into the manufacture of denatured alcohol, for which the potato has been found to be very suitable material. A company has received a charter from the provincial government for that purpose, but for some reason we cannot get permission from this government to manufacture it. If the government would allow the manufacture of denatured alcohol to be carried on, it would greatly reduce the price of gasoline and other products of alcohol, and also increase the value of the potato.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend complains of the difficulty of shipping potatoes from the island, and we realize that there are difficulties, particularly on account of the inclemency of the weather in the winter time. I think the Cuban and Mexican service calls at Charlottetown until the close of navigation, so that potatoes can be shipped from September to the close of navigation. He speaks of the difficulty of transportation over the Intercolonial railway. I can assure him that we have the same difficulty in shipping over the Canadian Pacific railway. There have been thousands of ordinary box cars lined in my constituency in the last ten years. A merchant gets a box car, lines it up, puts a stove in it and a man to look after it and keep the fire going, and pays all the expense. Once in a while he may get hold of a car that is lined and will not have to pay the expense of lining it. The Intercolanial railway is not the only railway in Canada which does not provide heated cars for the transportation of potatoes.

Mr. FRASER. Do you not think that ought to be remedied?

Mr. CARVELL. I am only pointing out that the Intercolonial railway is not worse than the others.

Mr. FRASER. That does not make the case any better. I am informed that this line does not call at Charlottetown.

Mr. FIELDING. I understand that upon being notified that freight is waiting there for shipment, the line will call at Charlottetown. No complaint has yet been made of any difficulty on that score.

Mr. J. HAGGART. There is an item for this in the main estimates for the present fiscal year?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. CROSBY. This item, I understand, is for the months which have passed.

Mr. FIELDING. That is correct.

Mr. CROSBY. So far as I am concerned, I am not here to protest against any facility being given any port in Canada, but to say that what we want is fair play. We do not want a line subsidized in St. John which is going to handicap the shipping trade of Halifax or any other port. The Cuban market has been open to us for many years and we have been supplying it. Every port in Europe which has potatoes to ship, sends its surplus to the Cuban market. There all the shippers meet on even terms, and I want to see that one Canadian port is not given an advantage in that market over another. No doubt it is quite proper for the member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) to do everything he can to protect his own people, but we have every facility for this trade to Cuba from the Bay of Fundy side of Nova Scotia. Forty cents a barrel is a low rate, but if a steamer gets $2,000 a trip, she can easily afford to carry freight very low. Potatoes are carried from the Bay of Fundy side in sailing vessels at 50 cents per barrel. One of the largest shippers of potatoes in the maritime provinces is Mr. R. C. Tait, of Shediac, who ships from Halifax to the Cuban market. I am glad to be able to give the name of a shipper in New Brunswick, and if the Finance Minister will communicate with Mr. Tait, and ask him what conditions prevailed in Cuba this last year, Mr. Tait will tell him that it was the worst year the maritime provinces shippers ever had. Probably they lost more money this last year than they ever made in any other, and in my opinion that was largely due to the fact that steamers, which were chartered to load without subsidy from Halifax, had to compete with steamers subsidized from St. John. It was not the case of Nova Scotia against New Brunswick, but of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick contending against New Brunswick, in a sense.

Mr. CARVELL. The combine tried to drive New Brunswick potatoes out of the market and failed.

Mr. CROSBY. A combine could not drive the government out of the market.

Mr. FIELDING. No one can do that.

Mr. CARVELL. I refer to the Cuban combine.

Mr. CROSBY. I do not know anything about a combine. There cannot be any combine in Cuba.

Mr. CARVELL. Go down there with a car-load and you will find out.

Mr. CROSBY. Nova Scotia has been shipping to Cuba right along without any assistance from the government. But if the government is giving $2,000 a trip for a steamer from St. John to Cuba, I ask the same subsidy for the province of Nova Scotia. However, as this matter will come up again in the main estimates, we shall be able to discuss it more fully. But I am much surprised that the Minister of Finance, who is the representative of Nova Scotia in the cabinet, seems to be particularly anxious that this subsidy should continue, although he must know that it is nothing less than competition against Nova Scotia.

Mr. FIELDING. There are various ways of assisting the port of Halifax, and I am always anxious to do it, but I have no idea that I can assist that city by trying to prevent fair play to any other port. The best way to help Halifax, is to try to do justice to it and equal justice to all other ports.

Mr. CROSBY. As regards the subsidizing of a steamer direct to Cuba, we have no such subsidy.

Mr. FIELDING. There is a steamer running direct from Halifax to Cuba, which afterwards goes on to Mexico. If that steamer went on to the Sandwich Islands, or any other place, afterwards, that would not alter the fact that it gives the people of Halifax direct freight to Cuba.

Mr. CROSBY. That statement is hardly correct. The steamer goes from Montreal with the understanding that she will call at Prince Edward Island or anywhere else she is asked to call. I would not call that a direct route.

Mr. FIELDING. When she leaves Halifax, she goes direct to Cuba, but she has the option, when business offers, to make a call at the Bahama Islands. She leaves Halifax, takes what goods are offered her there, and lands them at Cuba.

Mr. CROSBY. She may be loaded when she leaves Montreal.

Mr. FIELDING. If my hon. firend will say that freight is offered at Halifax for Cuba, which that steamer cannot take, he will then have a grievance.

Mr. CROSBY. We will allow the matter to stand over until the other estimates come up. By that time the Minister of Finance will have had more opportunity to look into the conditions we have to contend with as regards this subsidized steamer from St. John.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. The suggestion regarding the making of alcohol from potatoes, is of the highest importance to this country. It comes well within the scope of a national policy. The Minister of Inland Revenue should take up this question of making spirits out of potatoes without putting on a tax. There is a way of doing that so that it will not come into competition with spirits that pay excise duty. Germany has found a way of doing it and that has contributed very largely to her industrial progress. The Germans make spirits out of potatoes which do not come into competition with the spirit that pays excise duty, and as a result Germany has the cheapest alcohol in the world for manufacturing purposes. Germany does not need to import great quantities of gasoline; she is quite independent of the oil combine that exists in the United States and that fixes the price of gasoline the world over. We may have the same condition in Canada if, as these hon. members tell us, the maritime provinces can produce potatoes in such enormous quantities. The need of some kind of spirit in competition with gasoline for industrial purposes is constantly growing. I venture the prediction that within five years all the agricultural machinery of the northwest will be run either by gasoline or by alcohol. If by gasoline, we shall have to import from the United States; if by alcohol used in engines based on the principle of explosion, we can produce that alcohol in enormous quantities. In France and Germany every encouragement is given to the cheap production of spirit of this kind. All we have to do is to follow their example. The maritime province members could not do a better thing than to urge the government to appoint a commission to inquire how this industry may be encouraged. Once it is done, it will be easy to carry it on, seeing that it has been made a success elsewhere.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I do not know that the manufacture of alcohol for power purposes has much to do with the transportation of potatoes to Cuba—

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Yes, it is a question of a market for potatoes.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. It is the easiest thing in the world to manufacture alcohol from potatoes. If the farmers can grow potatoes cheaply enough, the thing is done. If the farmers of Prince Edward Island would prefer to grow potatoes that would net them, probably, 8 cents to 10 cents a bushel instead of the 40 cents to 50 cents which they now get, it will be possible to manufacture in Canada alcohol for power purposes. When I say 10 cents a bushel, I am speaking approximately and from what I remember of the figures of two or three years ago when this question was before the House. I have all the data in my office. To get denatured alcohol down in price to compete with gasoline means potatoes at from 10 to 12 cents per bushel. I am aware that a poor class of potatoes produce even a larger quantity of alcohol than potatoes which are better for food. I suppose that is the kind from which alcohol for industrial purposes is made in Germany. But there is no use of comparing Canada with Germany—and Germany is the only place where alcohol for power purposes is made on a large scale from potatoes, for I do not think the manufacture in France is very large. Germany encourages this manufacture by a bounty. In the first place, the government there controls the manufacture of alcohol—I do not understand the system but they control it. And there is a higher tax on alcohol intended to be used as a drink than upon crude alcohol used as an illuminant or for fuel. On the other hand they put a tax upon petroleum, thereby increasing the price when imported into Germany. If we are prepared to do all this in Canada, we may solve the problem of getting the cost of alcohol down to something like 15 or 20 cents per gallon. Two or three years ago, a wave of interest in the question of denatured alcohol arose in the United States and passed into Canada. The United States congress enacted a law giving permission to remove alcohol from bonded warehouses to be denatured and put upon the market for this purpose, and also took power to authorize the establishment of small distilleries on the farms to produce alcohol from cornstalks and other rough or waste vegetable matter. To-day, I believe, there is not one of these distilleries in the United States. Even in the corn belt of Illinois, where the cheapest alcohol on this continent can be manufactured, alcohol is taken out of bond and denatured and is put on the market as a fuel and illuminant, if I mistake not, at about 40 cents per wine gallon, which would be at the rate of about 48 or 50 cents per imperial gallon. It is utter nonsense to talk about manufacturing alcohol in Canada out of potatoes grown for that purpose by the high-priced labour of the farms of this country to compete against the alcohol of the great corn belt. There is no question of duty at all; we could remit the duty if the alcohol were used for industrial purposes, and we do so now. If the farmers of Prince Edward Island can demonstrate that they can produce potatoes at a price that will permit the manufactured alcohol to be sold at a less price than gasoline, we will arrange very quickly that they shall have permission for the manufacture. A distillery license costs $250, but that could be removed in the case of industrial alcohol. But from our investigation, we are convinced that alcohol cannot under existing conditions be made in Canada at a rate to compete with gasoline or petroleum. If my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) or anybody else can demonstrate to the Department of Inland Revenue that it can be done, I give my promise that the legislation will be introduced to enable the manufacture of alcohol for industrial purposes to be carried on. It is not a question of legislation but of manufacture.

Mr. BARNARD. Can the minister tell me anything of the subsidy for the steamship line between San Francisco and Victoria?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The subsidy is the same as usual—$3,000, I think. It is in the main estimates, but is not yet voted.

Winter steamship service between Rivière du Loup and Tadousac and other points, $4,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is a new item in the estimates. The north and south shores of the River St. Lawrence below Rivière Ouelle have been practically closed during the winter season. The company which obtained this contract from the government undertook to have winter navigation, and I must say to their credit that they succeeded this winter. They have a steamer between Tadousac and Fraserville or Rivière du Loup—I wish they would adhere to the old name—They have also established a service between Tadousac and St. Catherines bay in Chicoutimi. That is why $1,000 has been added. I would move the following addition:

And St. Catherines bay and Tadousac.

There is an amount of $2,500 in the main estimates for that service. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Price) knows that service. I think Price Bros. performed the service in years gone by, but last year they had not a boat, and we subsidized this boat. Instead of going as they do in the summer, when there is a steamship service between Quebec and Chicoutimi stopping at different ports on both sides of the river, in order to facilitate delivery down the St. Lawrence, even to Labrador, the mails, cross from Tadousac to St. Catherines bay, and thus avoid the long detour by Chicoutimi, at the head of the river. The steamer is the 'Mahone', not a large boat, but one thoroughly adapted for that winter service.

Mr. J. HAGGART. However commendable the service, this vote is open to the same objection as the last, that a contract is entered into without money having first been voted by parliament.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The hon. gentleman will be quite right, but he must remember that in the contract there is a clause making payment to the contractor conditional upon the voting of the money by parliament.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What about the winter service to the Magdalen islands?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I presume the hon. gentleman refers to the special winter service for the mails. I think that next year I can provide a winter service to the Magdalen islands for the mails, owing to the experience we had this year. This year the cable was destroyed, and it was impossible to repair it during the winter. I applied to the Department of Marine and Fisheries for the use of the steamer 'Minto' in order to enable the people of Halifax, Newfoundland and Pictou, who deal with the Magdalen islands, to carry on their correspondence. After some difficulty I succeeded in having the 'Minto' sent to the Magdalen islands. She brought back the answers to the mail, and the trade of the Magdalen islands has profited thereby.

Mr. SPROULE. How long has this subsidized line been operating.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is the first year.

Mr. SPROULE. How many months have the company been performing the service this year?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Since the first of January. Of course they have a contract for the summer service between Fraserville and Tadousac.

Mr. SPROULE. Have they a subsidy from the federal government for the summer work?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, I think it is $6,000.

Mr. SPROULE. And this is the winter work?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Have they been paid anything on this contract?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. CROSBY. I am very glad to hear that the Postmaster General has been able to make some arrangement for a winter mail service with the Magdalen Islands, and I hope he will be able to continue to do that. It is very essential in the interest of the trade between the Magdalen Islands and the province of Nova Scotia that proper facilities should be provided.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, there are about 7,000 people on the Magdalen Islands.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. From the Postmaster General's remarks it appears that he hopes to establish a winter mail service in the Lower St. Lawrence in future. I should think it would be advisable to take into consideration the giving of a substantial subsidy in order to place a vessel in the service that would be capable of breaking the ice at any stage. Does this contract extend over a period of years or is it just a new contract?

Mr. LEMIEUX. In this case the steamer need not be a regular ice-breaker, because the distances are not great and the circumstances are rather favourable. But, my hon. friend will find in the main estimates a vote of $8,000, or $10,000, for a service in that very portion of the St. Lawrence to give special communication between the north and south shores including Seven Islands, where there is a large business at Clark city. Then, I expect that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will stipulate with the contractors that they shall put on a substantial boat that will not only afford the facilities, but will give all protection possible to passengers and freight.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is not this amount of $4,500 for winter steamship service between Rivière du Loup and Tadousac and other points in the supplementary estimates connected with the services mentioned in the main estimates, items 199, 201, and which total $8,500.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No.

Mr. FISHER. The one is a summer service and the other a winter service.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Chairman, if you will permit me, my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Crosby) spoke a moment ago about winter communications with the Magdalen Islands. I wish to state, in order to let the public know, because I have received a great many inquiries, that it is the intention of the government to erect a wireless station on the Magdalen Islands in case an accident should happen, as it did happen this year when the cable was broken. But, besides that, I think we should endeavour to give them a mail service in the winter. We have succeeded this winter and I do not see why we could not succeed another year.

Mr. CROSBY. I am very glad to hear it from the Postmaster General. It is very essential that a service should be maintained during the winter between the Magdalen Islands and the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island who are dealing with them.

Trade and commerce—further amount required for salaries of chief inspectors, deputy inspectors, and other employees, rents, wages and contingencies, under the Inspection and Sales and Manitoba Acts, $35,000.

Mr. CROSBY. Is this in payment of services already performed?

Mr. FISHER. The service was more expensive than it was last year, and this is required to carry it on to the end of the current fiscal year. In the main estimates there is $155,000, but for the ensuing year we will have to ask for $175,000.

Mr. J. HAGGART. $48,000 seems an enormous increase. What was the original estimate—about $130,000?

Mr. FISHER. There are three different parts of this estimate.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I see there is an increase of $35,000 for wages. What was the original estimate?

Mr. FISHER. The original item, 109 in the main estimates of last year, was $155,000, but the department has found that the increase in the work has been so great that for the ensuing year it has asked for $175,000. A great deal of this comes back in fees. The increased expenditure is largely due to the increased production of grain and consequently the increased expense of inspection.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is there anything provided in this amount for sending trade representatives to Germany?

Mr. FISHER. No, this is for the Grain Inspection Board. It has nothing to do with trade commissioners.

Mr. CROSBY. I notice that rent is mentioned in this item. Why should there be any discrepancy in the item of rent? I presume, when the estimates were made up last year they knew what the rent was going to be?

Mr. FISHER. The business has increased enormously this year on account of the very large crop and the great movement of grain early in the season. The result has been an increased staff and increased expenses. I am told that there has been an increase in the rent of the offices to accommodate the staff.

Further amount required for trade commissioners and commercial agencies, including expenses in connection with negotiation of treaties, or in extension of commercial relations; miscellaneous advertising and printing, or other expenditure connected with the extension of Canadian trade, $10,000.

Mr. FISHER. The amount in the main estimates was $85,000, and if my hon. friend will look at the main estimates for 1910-11 he will see that $95,000 is asked. The increase has been going on this year and this amount is asked to meet it. In reply to my hon. friend from East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) I would say that at present arrangements are under way to send a trade commissioner to Germany.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is it the intention only to send one commissioner to Germany?

The minister will find there are large numbers of travellers and men engaged in pushing the trade of Germany in Canada according to the press reports, and that they are doing their utmost to extend their trade here, while we have no agent in Germany, and apparently no definite arrangements have been made to send one. Do I understand that this vote is sufficient to send a trade representative to Germany?

Mr. FISHER. It is the intention of the government to send a trade representative to Germany very soon, and if it is found necessary we shall send more than one agent to Germany in view of the new trade conditions between us and that country. It is true that Germany is sending agents to Canada, but I understand these are agents for private firms, and it is to be hoped that Canadian firms will send their agents to Germany as well. The government does intend to establish in Germany a commercial agency which will discharge much the same duties as the German consuls in Canada perform.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Where will these trade representatives be located in Germany?

Mr. FISHER. It is not yet decided, but probably in Hamburg and other chief commercial centres.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What portion of this vote has been expended in the negotiation of the German treaty?

Mr. FISHER. About $1,700 was expended in connection with all foreign treaties, including the German treaty.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What is the total amount it cost this country to negotiate the treaty with France?

Mr. FISHER. I have not that information at hand; I think there was a special vote for that.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. In what way does this vote refer to the Manitoba Grain Act?

Mr. FISHER. We have a staff who inspect and look after the grain elevators and warehouses, headed by Mr. Castle. There is also the staff of inspectors under the Inspection and Sale Act headed by Mr. Horn.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does this vote include all the salaries of Mr. Horn and his staff and of Mr. Castle and his staff?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does it include Port Arthur?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, Port Arthur and Fort William as well.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does it include the payment of the supplementary men who were appointed when the change was made in the Act?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What proportion of the whole amount, approximately, is for grain inspection?

Mr. FISHER. I cannot say that exactly. There were $140,000 spent on grain inspection for the calendar year 1909, which would be up to the 1st of January last.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does this vote include the total amount at Port Arthur and Fort William for inspection under what is called the Manitoba Grain Act?

Mr. FISHER. Not only at Port Arthur and Winnipeg, but the whole grain inspection of Canada.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Will the minister explain why he takes a vote for the current year of $15,000 more than he thinks necessary for next year?

Mr. FISHER. I am informed that there will have to be a supplementary vote for this year. The increased cost of grain inspection is due to the increasing commerce of Canada in grain; but I may point out that most of this money is returned in fees, so that as the expenditure increases the fees increase accordingly.

Dredging — maritime provinces, $125,000; dredge vessel repairs, $95,000.

Mr. CROSBY. I cannot understand why this item of dredge vessel repairs is not itemized so as to give us some idea of what it is for.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is the way the vote is always taken, but I can give the details: In New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, $27,200; in Nova Scotia, $12,250; in Manitoba, $650; in British Columbia, $12,000; for labour and materials generally, $19,500; and further amount for labour and materials, $23,200. These are the total requirements for the year ending the 31st of March instant.

Mr. J. HAGGART. To take a vote for labour and materials seems to be a way of getting rid of contracts. That allows you to employ men by the day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A good deal of that is expended in our shipyard at Ottawa.

Mr. J. HAGGART. You should specify where it is expended, and how.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It has never been put in detail.

Mr. CROSBY. I would like to ask what amount of money out of that is paid in the province of Nova Scotia, to whom it is paid, and for what.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It will take some little time to get this information, but if my hon.

friend will be good enough to send me a memorandum of what he wants, I will get the information from the accountant of the department, giving the names, and the amounts, and where the money is expended.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What was the total amount got last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The total amount for the maritime provinces for the current year was $380,000.

Mr. J. HAGGART. You increased your estimated expenditure nearly 50 per cent?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Something over 25 per cent. One reason was that the vote last year was only about one-half what we required if the dredges were all kept actively in operation, but owing to the condition of the revenue we reduced the estimates. Some $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 were taken off from what we estimated would be required for public works, and the dredging was reduced one-half. But later on in the season, the revenue became better, and where the dredging work was urgent, the time was extended and the work continued.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What is the total expended on the repairs of dredges?

Mr. PUGSLEY. $220,000.

Mr. J. HAGGART. How is it that the repairs cost 100 per cent more than the estimates?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is impossible to judge with accuracy, or even approaching accuracy, what the repairs of a dredge will cost. They are very expensive machines to keep up. Hulls have to be rebuilt, buckets replaced, and machinery generally put in order. Boilers have to be repaired or rebuilt. I could give the details if required. The work is all done under the direction of the superintendent of dredges, a very efficient man, Captain Howden, who has been long in the department, and he has very good superintendents under him.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Does it not strike the minister as extraordinary that the repairs for these dredges for doing about $400,000 worth of work cost about $200,000?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The great expense of dredges is the keeping in repair. They are working under water, they are likely to strike boulders at any time, the buckets are liable to be destroyed and the machinery put out of order. You can never tell with certainty what the expenditure is going to be. While the amount seems large, we have a very large plant. We have from 30 to 40 vessels altogether employed in dredging in the different provinces—dredges belonging to the government.

Mr. JAMESON. Are they all in fairly good working order?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not all. There is one which requires very considerable repairs. Possibly we may have to put it into the scrap-heap. There is another we have decided to abandon. We propose selling the hull, as she is no longer in a sound condition to be operated. With these two exceptions, the plant generally is in pretty good condition.

Mr. JAMESON. When we were discussing the item for dredging a few evenings ago, I drew attention to the need of dredging the port of Weymouth. On that occasion I was informed by the minister that the quantity necessary to be removed, according to the plan of the department's engineer, was in the neighbourhood of 500,000 cubic yards. I have been urging the hon. minister to make a beginning at least during this year on this work. I have since had communications from the commercial interests of Weymouth, particularly those engaged in the shipping interests. They tell me that while they would like the work to be done up to the plans of the department, they recognize the very large demands on the department for the use of their dredges, and the fact that the vote must necessarily be limited in amount. They, therefore, would not ask that the entire work proposed by this plan be done in one year, but they are very anxious indeed that a beginning should be made. At the entrance to the port there is a bar which has been made in the course of many years, and is a serious obstruction to the shipping. I am informed by vessel owners and vessel charterers that by a very reasonable amount of dredging, that bar can be cut down sufficiently to admit vessels of a tonnage now unable to get over it, and which the needs of shipping in that locality call for. I am requested to urge on the minister that, in view of the fact that he has increased his vote, enlarged his dredging plant, and that, with the exception of two dredges, it is in very fair condition, he should make a beginning this coming season.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like to go on with the dredging at Weymouth, but my hon. friend will see himself that where there are 500,000 cubic yards to be removed, to really do effective work, work which would be satisfactory and which probably would cost 50 cents per cubic yard—that was the tender price—it is a question for grave consideration as to whether the department would be justified in spending one-quarter of a million dollars to improve the harbour. I have already given the matter consideration, and am not without hope that we may be able in the near future to do some work which may result in improvement, but I cannot say when the work will commence.

Mr. JAMESON. I am not asking, nor are the people of Weymouth asking, that this entire 500,000 cubic yards should be removed at this time, but that only a reasonable amount of dredging be done at the entrance to the harbour. The dredging which requires to be done above the bar in the way of straightening the channel might stand for the present. And that, for the time being, can stand. I can assure the minister that, if he will make a beginning, that beginning need not entail a very serious outlay. A comparatively small outlay will improve conditions there wonderfully, and I trust he will not allow the plans which have been made, and the estimates of the amount of material to be moved, to frighten him, for we are not asking for that. These plans are very elaborate, and it may be they were made for effect rather than with a view of ever being worked up to, but that they should be held up as a reason why some work should not be undertaken. I do not think that is reasonable or right. We are not asking that the entire plans be worked out, but that a beginning be made, and that the bar at the entrance of the harbour be cut down a reasonable degree so as to allow shipping to pass. I do not think it is fair of the minister to hold up this estimate of 500,000 cubic yards of material to be moved, and a quarter of million dollars spent, when we ask for some dredging. I hope he will not allow that to alarm him out of spending a reasonable amount of money on the entrance to the harbour.

Mr. J. HAGGART. In the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), I desire to support the observations of my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson). We are spending large sums of money for such works as the Transcontinental railway, the Hudson Bay railway and others of that kind. But the people of Weymouth, unfortunately, are not reached by any of these large works.

And, my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in such cases, has used the argument that the people cannot be expected to pay taxes for works from which they benefit only very indirectly unless they receive a quid pro quo. It is the duty of the government, according to the argument of the Minister of Finance, to see to it that these parties in the maritime provinces, and especially in the port of Weymouth, are recouped for the expenditures they are making in other parts of the country by an expenditure for works in which they are locally interested and which they demand as a right from the government.

Public works—chargeable to income—miscellaneous—surveys and inspections, $23,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to supplement an appropriation of $60,000 made last session for surveys and inspections in connection with rivers and harbours, slides and booms, roads and bridges, and other services. There was expended up to 31st December last, as follows: In the maritime provinces, $16,086.11; in Quebec, $21,768.97; in Ontario, $13,283.00; Manitoba, $1,654.42; in Saskatchewan and Alberta, $4,075.63; in British Columbia, $7,452.80; and other expenditures making a total of $74,440.02. This leaves to be provided for, $14,440.02. The estimated additional outlay to cover engagements for the months of January, February and March, 1910, is $8,551.98, making a total of practically the amount of this vote, $23,000, to square the accounts of the year.

Engineering branch—salaries of engineers, inspectors, superintendents, draughtsmen, clerks and messengers of outside service, $12,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to supplement votes of $145,000 and to make provision for a balance of salaries of engineers and others in the engineering branch of the Public Works Department in connection with the construction and maintenance of harbours and rivers, slides and booms, roads and bridges. The total expenditure to December 31, 1909, was $116,593. On the same basis, there will be required to the end of the fiscal year $40,200, making a total of $156,793. This gives a balance over the appropriation of $11,793 and we are asking $12,000, thus leaving a small margin.

Surveys of Richelieu and Yamaska rivers and their affluents to determine the cost of improved waterways between the river St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain — further amount, $4,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The appropriation for this service was $20,000. The actual expenditure was as follows: Salaries of survey party No. 1 to 28th February, 1910, $11,895.11; survey party No. 2 $7,447.75; survey party No. 3, $4,333.76; sundries, $147.11; total, $23,623.69.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What is the object of the survey?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The object is better water connection between the St. Lawrence and Lake Champlain, and also Lake Champlain and the River Yamaska and some other rivers near the lake.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I thought there might be in view the bigger object of making a connection in the future for the improved St. Lawrence canals or the Georgian Bay canal looking to a deep waterway connection with New York. Unless the service contemplates something of that kind, I do not see the object. We may have, certainly we ought to have, a survey of a 22 foot to a 25 foot canal from the St. Lawrence down, probably by way of the route that Young used to advocate from Montreal by way of Lake Champlain.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There has been no such survey of recent years; it may have been made a long time ago.

Mr. J. HAGGART. But this one is going on at the present time?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it is a very desirable expenditure in the public interest to ascertain the feasibility of getting a deep waterway and the cost.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I want to know if that is what the money is being expended for?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. CROSBY. Is this for the purpose of carrying the course of the water from the St. Lawrence to Lake Champlain or from Lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Lake Champlain runs to the St. Lawrence. We do not propose to alter the course of the flow of the river; this is only to get a better navigable channel to connect Lake Champlain with the St. Lawrence. There is in connection with that another proposition to cut a channel through from near Montreal across to the Richelieu river which would shorten the distance by about 100 miles, and make the water route from Montreal to New York a little shorter than the railway haul.

Mr. CROSBY. That is the difficulty. Who are going to benefit by that, ourselves or the Americans? The whole thing it seems to me would tend towards diverting the trade of the St. Lawrence to New York. Practically all of Lake Champlain is in the United States, so we would facilitate the diversion of trade into the United States, and that seems to me to be a very risky thing for us to do. We have evidence that some of the great steamship lines plying between the old country and New York have been compelled to give up the St. Lawrence, and possibly if they can get the trade diverted, and have it go by Lake Champlain to New York they will not come up the St. Lawrence.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think the committee will be very much alarmed at any project which may result in giving opportunities for the farmers and producers generally to get their produce to a great city like New York for sale, but we are not proposing anything of that kind, because we are making a survey to see the feasibility of the channel.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does not my hon. friend see that there is an objection to improving a waterway from Canada to New York? On general principles that would seem to be objectionable whether for the benefit of the farmers or of anybody else. I should think our farmers would be patriotic enough to want to improve our waterways for the benefit of Canadian cities, not of the United States cities. The very statement of my hon. friend seems to me to put this item out of consideration by this committee instead of leading us to approve it. He said it would improve the water communication from that part of the country to New York. We have not yet annexed New York. I hope we will do so, I hope the Union Jack will be flying over New York some day, but until we do annex it, I do not think we should spend the money of the people in improving such a waterway.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

PRIVATE BILLS.

ST. LAWRENCE POWER TRANSMISSION COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 115) to incorporate the St. Lawrence Power Transmission Company, Limited.—Mr. Pardee.

Mr. LENNOX. I presume there is no object in taking up time to-night with this Bill.

Mr. FISHER. Let it stand.

NORTHERN QUEBEC COLONIZATION RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 152) to incorporate the Northern Quebec Colonization Railway Company.—Mr. J. P. Turcotte.

On section 11—agreements with other companies,

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. In the 21st line the words 'commissioners of the' are struck out. Shall the section as amended be carried?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is that not a mistake? What power would the company have to enter into an agreement with the commissioners of the National Transcontinental Railway? It would be the government of Canada, which would enter into an agreement with respect to the National Transcontinental railway.

Mr. FISHER. It would be the lessees—the Grand Trunk Pacific Company.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The purposes of section 361 are those of amalgamation, and I think we had better make it read that they may enter into an agreement with the government in respect to the National Transcontinental railway.

Mr. LENNOX. They had it at first ' with the commissioners of the National Transcontinental railway ' and then they struck out the words ' commissioners of the ' and left it ' with the National Transcontinental railway '. I venture to say that they could not make a contract with the railway, and that it should be made to read ' with the government of Canada ' as the minister says.

Mr. PUGSLEY. With the government of Canada in respect to the National Transcontinental railway.

Mr. LENNOX. I move that we add the words ' with the government of Canada in respect to the National Transcontinental railway '.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it would be better to leave it out altogether. The section provides for two companies amalgamating and that is not applicable to the government road at all.

Mr. LENNOX. It would be better to leave it out.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It is a Bill from the Senate and an amendment to that extent might be irregular.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Better let the Bill stand.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply.

Mr. PUGSLEY. At the recess we were discussing a small amount required to pay for surveys of the Richelieu and Yamaska rivers. An appropriation was voted last session, and there is a small amount now due the surveyors.

Mr. SPROULE. Was that by the resident engineers?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There was a special survey party made up for this work. It was the work of surveying the Richelieu from its mouth up to its outlet from lake Champlain. And also the Yamaska and tributaries with the view of ascertaining the possibility of connecting those rivers and what it would cost.

Experimental farms and additional branch stations—further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. I understand that these items are duplicated in the main estimates not passed. A great many members want to speak on these, and I presume they can do that on the main estimates.

Mr. FISHER. In the main estimates for the ensuing year there will be similar items and ample opportunity for discussion.

Mr. SPROULE. Why do you require this additional amount?

Mr. FISHER. With regard to the experimental farm we found that nearly $10,000 had lapsed in last year's vote, and we had to pay out of this year's appropriations. In consequence of the death of Dr. Fletcher, I was obliged to appoint two men, an entymologist and a botanist. They asked for a considerable amount of apparatus, and books, amounting to nearly $5,000. After careful consideration by Dr. Saunders, he recommended that the equipment should be supplied. The result of these two is a deficiency of $15,000. There was an expenditure of $2,000 or $3,000 in preparation for the purpose of some additional branch farms in the west. The money was spent in obtaining information and inspecting sites. Again, I have been doing extra work in connection with tobacco growing which, in the aggregate, has cost $5,000. This accounts for about $23,000, and the balance of $2,000 is for small amounts to close up the business of the year.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister says he had to take out of this year's vote to make up for last year's accounts. There is no justification for that. The money voted for this year should not be used for last year's accounts.

Mr. FISHER. Sometimes accounts incurred in one year do not come in in time to be paid out of the appropriation of that year. In this case, the delay was in the case of some large accounts. The Auditor General always permits a regular vote of this kind to be used to close up the accounts of the past year. But these accounts are so large that we could not deal with them in that manner. Had I known during last session, I could have had a revote of the amount. But, as I did not know, it has to be provided for in this way.

Mr. SPROULE. The fact that the Auditor General allows this does not make it right.

Mr. FISHER. But it shows that it is a practice that is followed.

Mr. SPROULE. A great many practices have been begun by this government that we think are very wrong, and this is one of them. I do not think there is any justification for paying money after the vote has lapsed. Money is voted by parliament for a given year, and it is certainly not proper to use the money of one year for the purpose of another.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How many additional experimental farms have been established this year?

Mr. FISHER. One in Prince Edward Island, and one in Rosthern, Saskatchewan. I have had an officer investigating sites that have been suggested in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Quebec and Nova Scotia.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Did the minister establish a farm in any part of western Ontario as he promised last year?

Mr. FISHER. No, and I have none yet in view. I think I said that I hoped to see an experimental farm established in new Ontario. But we have not yet reached the point where it seemed well to establish such a farm. I think there ought to be one, perhaps two, experimental farms in the northern part of New Ontario, but it seems better to wait until the construction of the Transcontinental is further advanced, and the course of settlement is more clearly decided.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The minister gave us to understand that he would establish an experimental station in western Ontario, not only to assist the tobacco growers——

Mr. FISHER. That is established.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I asked the minister about that.

Mr. FISHER. I did not understand that that was what was referred to. I established a station for experimental tobacco work in Essex county, and also a similar station in Quebec. These account for about $5,000 of expenditure.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I understood that the establishment of a fruit station in western Ontario would be taken up seriously, and I would urge the minister to investigate with that view. I think he is hardly justified in waiting until the Transcontinental line is located before he locates an experimental farm in the northern part of New Ontario. I hope he will look into the matter.

Mr. FISHER. I will do so gladly.

Mr. BURRELL. What steps has the minister taken in regard to an experimental station in the semi-arid belt of British Columbia? The statement made by the minister on a previous occasion led the people to hope that a station would be established there this year. Many requests have been made for the establishment of such a station. I should like very much to have a statement from the minister, and of a favourable character.

Mr. FISHER. I am pushing that as rapidly as possible. I have been waiting for some little information, which I would not like to announce at present, as to a particular site. I have had careful examination made of a number of sites, and have gone over the report of the officer who examined them. In view of this, and some information that I acquired when in that country, I hope before the end of this year that the matter will be settled. I had not intended to go into it on this item; perhaps it would be better to leave a fuller explanation until the main estimates are before the committee.

Mr. T. CHISHOLM. Injustice is often done to inland constituencies in our part of Ontario. A great deal of money is spent by the Dominion for harbour improvements to the benefit of certain ridings, while inland ridings get nothing at all. I have been many years in this House, and have asked for several things, and have failed to get any grant that I ever asked for. East Huron is as good a riding as there is in Canada, and an experimental farm there would yield as good results as in any other place I know of. A great many hundreds of millions of dollars have been voted away since I came into this House. I have asked once or twice for little things that I wished to have done for East Huron, but no request that I have ever made has been granted. Now I would ask for an experimental fruit farm in East Huron. Because of the peculiar position we occupy—elevation, the proximity of the lake, and the nature of the soil—we have, I believe, the finest apple-growing section in Canada. I have heard others claim something of that kind for their localities, but, for a particular kind of apple, the Northern Spy, I think we have the best condition to be found in the country. The Northern Spy ripens in East Huron exactly at the season when nature provides it with all the benefits which in other localities have to be procured by means of artificial cold storage. The farmers there, however, do not know what to do. They do not understand spraying their orchards or how to get rid of the codling moth, and other pests. I am sure that if a small experimental fruit farm were established there—if it were only a farm of ten or fifteen acres—and handled properly, it would mean a great deal to the people of that part of the country. I know that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) would like to do what is fair and right, and I would ask him to remember that an inland riding like mine, that has been paying and paying for years, ought as a matter of the barest justice, to get something. I would ask the minister to kindly remember that there is an old man up in East Huron, and that he would like to get something for East Huron before he dies.

Mr. FISHER. I want to assure my hon. friend that I never forget, I shall not say the old man, but my hon. friend, who is so vigorous and young notwithstanding his grey hairs, the representative of East Huron (Mr. T. Chisholm). When the main estimate for the experimental farms for next year comes up, I will be glad to have a very thorough discussion of this whole question of branch farms. I look forward to it with interest, and will be glad to have suggestions such as my hon. friend has made in reference to what I consider a very important branch of the service.

Mr. FRASER. In what position is the farm which the government is establishing in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. FISHER. The farm is in our possession, the buildings are fairly towards completion, and I think the house will be ready for the farm manager before spring. A good deal of fencing was done last fall, the arrangement of the farm is completed, the plots, &c., have been laid out, and a good deal of ploughing has been done, so that I think a large part of the farm will be under cultivation this spring. The farm consists of between 50 and 75 acres just outside of Charlottetown.

Exhibitions—further amount required (including Governor General's warrant for $25,000), $75,000.

Mr. SPROULE. How do you come to have a Governor General's warrant?

Mr. FISHER. The decision to exhibit at the Brussels exhibition was not arrived at until after the last session, and in order to move our exhibit from Seattle to Brussels we had to take a Governor General's warrant. Then an additional $50,000 is required because we had expected at the time we took the warrant that parliament would have voted money for this purpose before this, and as the work had to go on we have been obliged to do a good deal of it on credit.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. What exhibitions will be participated in this year?

Mr. FISHER. Last summer we were at Seattle. This coming spring the International Exhibition in Brussels opens, and we have arranged for a Canadian pavilion there. Lately we have been invited and strongly urged by a very influential committee in London to take part in what is known as the Festival of Empire at the Crystal Palace, and the government has decided that it would be very unfortunate if at such a celebration as that, Canada was not represented. We are just now taking the steps necessary to be represented, and that and the Brussels exhibition are the only two I know of in the ensuing year.

Immigration—further amount required for contingencies in Canadian, British and foreign agencies, and general immigration expenses, $60,000.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the total amount of the vote for immigration, and of what is it made up?

Mr. FISHER. There is one item:

Salaries of agents and employees in Canada, Great Britain and foreign countries, $200,000.

Then there is:

Contingencies in Canadian, British and foreign agencies and general immigration expenses, $700,000.

Making a total of $900,000. This addition of $60,000 will make $960,000. That is for the current fiscal year ending March 31.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. What are you asking for next year?

Mr. FISHER. We are asking $900,000 for next year.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would ask if it is the intention of the government to send immigration agents to Germany during this coming year?

Mr. FISHER. I have not inquired of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), but I think, speaking subject to correction, that I heard him make a reference to it the other day. I will not be positive.

Public works—capital—harbours and rivers —Port Arthur and Fort William—harbour and river improvements, $425,000.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the explanation of that very large amount?

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to cover the following progress estimates, certified to by the chief engineer, for works performed under contracts in force at Port Arthur and Fort William during the fiscal year in excess of those covered by the appropriation of $600,000 which was made by parliament at the session of the year 1908-9; also drawbacks which have been retained on the works and which, of course, have to be paid. First, I will give the different contracts showing the amounts which are due to the different companies. There was a contract dated June 27, 1906, with the Great Lakes Dredging Company for dredging in the Kaministiquia and Mission rivers. For the September account there is $8,964.93; October account, $592.20; November, $1,464. which with a ten per cent drawback amounting to $4,526.17, makes $15,490. 94. Then, there is another contract, dated June 4, 1909, with the same company for dredging on the Kaministiquia and Mission rivers. That was a contract for additional depth. Hon. gentlemen will remember that at the last session I stated that it was proposed to increase the depth of water there from 22 feet, as had been originally designed, to 25 feet, which seemed to be regarded as necessary to accommodate the larger lake steamers which had recently been built for traffic on the lakes. The September account amounted to $32,714.37; October, $5,925.44; November, $959.42, ten per cent drawback, $16,326.39, making a total of $55,925.63. There was another contract, dated the 27th of February, 1909, for dredging out the terminal basin in connection with the terminals of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. The September account was $48,127.22; October, $116,267.71; November, $102,495.58; December, $26,743.98; ten per cent drawback, $14,049.40, making a total of $307,783.89. There was a contract with Mr. W. J. Hogan for the Port Arthur breakwater. There is a balance due to the 30th September of $31,760. Adding that to the previous amount makes the total $410,960.46. Then, there is a contract, dated June 28, with Mr. W. H. Phinn, of Welland, for dredging at Port Arthur. That was dredging that was regarded as urgent in order to give the requisite accommodation at Port Arthur. There is an amount due to Mr. Phinn of $10,263.82 for work done from the 1st October to the 22nd October. That makes the total amount due contractors for works performed in excess of those covered by the appropriation of $600,000 of $421,224.28. In addition to this, there is a progress estimate up to October 30, 1909, of $16,168 for timber supplied for Fort William harbour improvements; that is for revetment wall, which is being constructed along the face of the harbour on the Mission river. This estimate was only received by the accountant on the 16th February, 1910. If I had received that item, I would have had that added to the supplementaries. However, that can be paid out of the main estimates next year. We will still be short about $12,000 for the closing up of these accounts. We have only asked for $425,000, while the total amount is a little over $437,000. We had on hand on the 17th February, to make further payment for timber, land expropriated, engineering expenses and contingencies, $15,335.69. Hon. gentlemen may ask how it was that so much was allowed to be done in excess of the appropriation. The reason is this: At the last session of parliament we cut down the appropriation to the smallest possible figure. I had myself thought that with the appropriation which we had it would be impossible to have the work proceed throughout the season as vigorously as it ought to proceed, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance thought we should curtail, as far as possible, and we did so. Later on in the season, we were pressed very earnestly by the Grand Trunk Pacific Company to complete the work of dredging up to the very large elevator which the Grand Trunk Pacific is erecting, and after discussing the matter in council, it was decided that it would be wise to allow the contractors to push the work with all possible expedition. The contractors had contracts for the whole work, and it did not make very much difference to the country whether the work was done this year or next year, while the Grand Trunk Pacific represented to us the enormous importance of having a channel dredged through from the Mission river to the pier forming part of the elevator system, either by the 1st of October or very early in October. It was hoped by the Grad Trunk Pacific that they would be able to handle the grain of the western country tributary to their railway through the outlet at Fort William.

Mr. SPROULE. How much did they handle—one small train load only?

Mr. PUGSLEY. They did not, as it happened, but I felt that as far as my Department was concerned, we ought not to be behind. I gave the assurance to the Grand Trunk Pacific that as far as we were concerned we would do our part.

Mr. GEO. TAYLOR. Are they carrying grain there now?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not know. I am bound to say that we did our part, we dredged out the channel so that by the middle of October steamers could go right in through the Mission river and up to the Grand Trunk Pacific elevator.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Was the dredging done by tender?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, the contracts were all given by tender.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. At how much?

Mr. PUGSLEY. There were different prices. The contract for the terminal basin was let at sixteen cents. Then, a large portion of the work is being done at eleven cents, and a portion at nine cents. They put on one powerful hydraulic dredge to expedite the work, but most of the dredges are of the ordinary dipper type. We did not contemplate last session that we would have to do any great additional dredging at Port Arthur, but it was brought to our attention that a company was erecting a large grain elevator, and unless dredging was done the lake vessels would not be able to reach it. In view of the fact that at Port Arthur, and Fort William there converges all the grain trade of the west during the season of navigation, and that there was likely to be a large crop, we thought we should provide the necessary facilities. Tenders were invited, and Mr. Phinn, at thirteen cents per cubic yard, was the lowest tenderer. Mr. Hogan has had for some time a contract for the building of the breakwater at Port Arthur which will form part of the larger harbour improvements which were strongly recommended by the Transportation Commission, and which are essential for the protection of the harbour. We entered into a contract for the building of a revetment wall or system of wharfage along the Mission river in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific terminals, and we required the Grand Trunk Pacific to convey to the Crown the title to a thirty foot strip along the harbour front so that it may be open to shipping generally at rates to be controlled by the government. We think it desirable to close up those accounts before the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. WRIGHT. The vote in the main estimates last year was $600,000, and with this vote the expenditure will be considerably over $1,000,000 which seems a large sum of money for one particular place.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There are two places, Port Arthur and Fort William.

Mr. WRIGHT. The vote is under the same head, and it is practically the one city. This expenditure at the one place makes it very difficult to get grants for necessary public works at other places in the province of Ontario. What will be the total cost of these works?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The total estimated cost, so far as the government is concerned, is in the vicinity of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000.

Mr. WRIGHT. How much has been already spent?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I should think something over one-half. It must be borne in mind that Port Arthur and Fort William are at the gateway of our great western country which is developing with marvellous rapidity. These two cities are growing at an equally marvellous rate, and the business which has developed there is simply enormous. It is a national port. The improvements at Mission river will extend for six miles along the front and there are industries springing up everywhere. The Grand Trunk Pacific elevator now under construction is to have an initial capacity of 3,000,000 bushels, and their plans contemplate an elevator capacity of 30,000,000 bushels. At Fort William and Port Arthur there is an elevator capacity in the vicinity of 40,000,000 bushels. I believe the Grand Trunk Pacific terminals will be the finest in the world. I do not believe that anywhere in the world will there be a better layout of terminals than in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific, unless it be the terminals of the Canadian Pacific railway, which are also at Fort William. The Canadian Pacific railway have bought considerable property to enlarge their terminals, and they are taking means to accommodate this vast traffic expeditiously and cheaply.

Mr. GEORGE TAYLOR. Enlarging the spout?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, enlarging the spout.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister is giving us in this another exhibition of a procedure which is wholly unjustifiable. Last year he submitted to parliament an estimate of $600,000 for the Port Arthur and Fort William works, and he told us that having had a comprehensive survey made he could cut down the original estimate. But during the recess of parliament he undertook nearly half a million dollars worth of works, for not one dollar of which he had the authority of parliament. These were not works that could not have been foreseen; it was well known that the Grand Trunk Pacific would have their terminals there and would require certain work done to enable them to ship grain, therefore parliament should have been consulted so as to discuss the matter and decide whether or not it was wise to make the expenditure. The minister now says that the dredging was badly needed to enable the Grand Trunk Pacific to handle the grain, but our information is that only one small train load was shipped by that company during last season, and there was not much dredging required for that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It would require as much dredging as if they handled 50,000,000 bushels.

Mr. SPROULE. Not at all. There was no necessity for bringing in the largest boat for that small amount of grain, and as a matter of fact millions of bushels have been shipped from Port Arthur by vessels drawing less than 18 feet. Could it not have been foreseen that it would be required and submitted to this House? Then the House could have considered it, and would doubtless, if it were needed, have voted the money. But not a word of it was mentioned to the House or the country. We were told that $600,000 was all that would be required for the year, and that was granted without any dissent; and later the government commenced dredging and working on the breakwater and the revetment wall at Port Arthur, all of which the engineer who visited the locality and made his survey must have known and foreseen last year, because the works there were laid out years ago, and it was well known what improvements would be required from year to year for several years. But in undertaking new work amounting to nearly half a million dollars, and in going on with the expenditure when there was not a dollar voted by parliament for it, the Minister of Public Works has introduced a very pernicious and improper principle, which parliament should not tolerate. If there had been a storm or an accident that necessitated the work being done in a hurry, I could understand the hon. minister resorting to a Governor General's warrant. But these works are not of that character; they were known beforehand, and under these circumstances to expend $425,000 without the consent of parliament is unjustifiable. The minister might just as well have expended as many millions; the principle is the same. I think this is the first Minister of Public Works I have ever known to make such a proposal in this House, and parliament will be doing a very improper thing if it consents to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend assumes that this work has been paid for. It has not been paid for, and that is the reason we are asking for this vote.

Mr. SPROULE. Even if it is not paid for, you have committed the country, and it must be paid for.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am only correcting a mistake the hon. gentleman made. My hon. friend also says that we have entered on the construction of this breakwater without the consent of parliament. This breakwater has been under construction for three years, and there have been votes for it each year. The contractor is to build the breakwater, and he could go on and finish it in one year if he chose, but he would have to wait for his money until parliament voted it. If a contractor for any work carried it on more rapidly than we anticipated we could force him to wait until parliament voted the necessary money to pay him for the work done. But we thought that was not desirable. As these contractors, in order to give these much-needed facilities, went on much faster than we had anticipated, we have thought it only right and desirable in the interest of the country that the work of the year should be closed up, and that we should ask parliament for an amount sufficient to close up these accounts before the end of the present month.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. How much of this $425,000 represents new contracts entered into by the minister?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The $15,490.94 was under an old contract of June 27, 1906. There is $307,783.89 due under a contract dated February 27, 1909. That was before we had taken our appropriation from parliament. This is practically a part of the original contract. The only difference is that we are digging to a depth of three feet beyond what we had originally intended. But it is all part of the original scheme.

Mr. SPROULE. How was it that the minister could not have provided for that last year when he let the contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I have already explained that we thought $600,000 would be all we could afford last year; but if the contractors chose to go on and do more than the appropriation called for, they could do so under the contract.

Mr. SPROULE. What was that contract for?

Mr. PUGSLEY. For dredging. There was another contract on the 4th of June last. They had a right under the contract, if they chose to employ dredges enough, to do the whole work this year.

Mr. EDWARDS. About how much would that have amounted to?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Probably two or three million dollars. This work, proceeding with ordinary rapidity, would run over three or four years Then there is an amount of $31,000 to pay Mr. Hogan. That is under an old contract made in 1906.

Mr. SPROULE. How much was voted last year on the Hogan contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. The vote was a lump sum of $600,000 for improvements at Port Arthur, which included dredging and the breakwater. I say frankly to the committee that when, during last summer, our revenues began to improve, I felt that I would not be doing my duty to the country, in view of the rapid development of the country and the necessity of providing as soon as possible the requisite accommodation, if I had said to these people, who had contracts and who were entitled to go on and do the work, though they might have to wait until parliament had voted the money to pay for it, 'You must stop work.' On the other hand, I allowed them to go on, and I believe parliament will ratify what was done and provide the money this year, instead of compelling the contractors to wait until next year. Of course, there is the question of interest, but it was much better we allowed them to go ahead with the work and now pay them, and so close up the account for the year.

Mr. FRASER. I think that the principle laid down by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is perfectly correct. Parliament is called once a year to vote money to be expended on public works and other necessities of administration. Parliament granted $600,000 for this work and the minister spent $425,000 more than we voted. That over expenditure was an open violation of the first principles of responsible government. Why this farce of our coming here to vote these expenditures at all if the ministers can afterwards spend as much money as they like regardless of our vote. This is a matter which should engage the attention of every member of parliament, because it strikes at the very root of parliamentary authority. Let the minister of any department go on spending 80 or 90 per cent more than the amount we authorized him to spend, and what becomes of parliamentary control? If we go through the different items, I have no doubt that we will find many millions of dollars spent without any parliamentary vote. It seems to me that we ought not for a moment to sanction anything of the kind. We ought at least to stick to first principles and see that no money is expended unless authorized by parliament except in some very extreme and unforeseen emergencies.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I was not here when this discussion began, but as I understand something about the work done up there, perhaps a word from me, as an independent outsider, will show that there are certain mitigating circumstances in this case. Fort William and Port Arthur are two great harbours of Ontario, and certain works were planned to be done at these harbours extending over many years. Parliament votes a certain amount for these works every year, and, as I understand, the work has been anticipated. But if the minister can have the work done in two years instead of four, I think the country will gain by having that much earlier the use of the harbours and those improvements. If these works could all be done in one year, that would be still a greater benefit. The trade has grown so enormously that the facilities at Fort William and Port Arthur are altogether inadequate, and if the business continues to grow, any delay in the prosecution of the government works will cause great injury to shippers at the head of the lake.

Mr. SPROULE. What would the observations of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) lead to if they were made generally applicable? Last year we voted altogether $100,000,000. Out of that amount we voted for Port Arthur and Fort William $600,000, but we spent during the year $1,025,000, or we spent nearly $2 for every one that parliament voted. Surely that extra expenditure was not expenditure which could not have been foreseen with the exercise of a little good judgment and foresight. Surely parliament should have been asked to vote that money before it was expended. Suppose the same principle were carried out all along the line and that our revenue had fallen off, and suppose we found ourselves at the end of the year with an expenditure of $200,000,000 when we had only voted $100,000,000, what would then be the financial condition of the country. I am not objecting to any reasonable expenditure, but I am objecting to such excessive expenditure not authorized by parliament. When we find a minister spending two dollars for every one we voted, it is time that parliament should express in no doubtful terms its condemnation of such conduct. It is a violation of the principle of constitutional government.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If that be so, how is it that every year since confederation we have voted supplementary estimates for the current year?

Mr. SPROULE. We vote them before the money is expended.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, we vote them to pay the debts due on the 31st March, which were not provided for by parliamentary sanction.

Mr. SPROULE. In some cases that is done, but only in exceptional cases. It is done to meet expenditures which could not have been anticipated at the time the estimates were brought down, but which had to be incurred owing to urgent need. But that is not the case here. In this case parliament voted the money which the government asked for, parliament in so doing exercised its judgment and understood that the vote should not be exceeded, but here we have the minister spending two dollars for every one voted, and then asking parliament to condone his conduct by voting money to meet the deficiency. This is not a case of a sudden and unforeseen emergency. Such a case as that would justify the expenditure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. For such cases you get a Governor General's warrant.

Mr. SPROULE. They may be provided for by Governor General's warrant or otherwise, and parliament will overlook a great deal in consideration of the circumstances; but in such a case as this, any intelligent engineer should have known what amount would be required and have furnished an estimate for that amount. How many more dredges did they put on during the year than they expected to put on at the beginning?

Mr. PUGSLEY. One very powerful suction dredge which they bought for that purpose.

Mr. SPROULE. How many more have they?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Five more.

Mr. SPROULE. Where a contract has been made, and it is expected that certain amount of work will be done during the year, and parliament has voted the money, if the amount were over-run a little, parliament would not object to that. But it is carrying it too far, and is defying the fundamental principles of parliamentary government when very large expenditures are made, and then the minister comes in an unconcerned, commonplace way, and says: The money is spent, and it will have to be voted. Suppose every minister did the same thing, is it not easy to see to what abuses it would lead? The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) has acquired the reputation of being very strong-willed, and of taking his own way, whether right or wrong, doing what he feels disposed to do regardless of parliament. Both the House, and the country are taking note of this. The hon. minister may carry this out to a limited extent, but a day of retribution will come when the public disapproval will be visited upon him and his colleagues, for an abuse that ought not to be tolerated by parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I quite agree that the government ought not to engage in any work not authorized by parliament. But parliament has over and over again sanctioned this great work at Port Arthur and Fort William; parliament has been fully informed of the expenditure from year to year. The work has been carried on according to a design prepared by the engineers in conjunction with the railway companies which are making their termini at Fort William and Port Arthur. Parliament has been informed, substantially, what this is going to cost. Therefore, this puts the present case entirely aside from the cases to which the hon. member (Mr. Sproule) has referred, of the government engaging in new work without the sanction of parliament.

Mr. SPROULE. Is not the dredging of the Grand Trunk Pacific harbour new work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No. How in the world can you develop a harbour on Mission river unless you have a turning basin?

Mr. SPROULE. Why did not the minister ask for the money for that if he knew it was to be done?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Let me tell the hon. member what occurred. Early in the year, Mr. Chamberlin, of the Grand Trunk Pacific, said to me: 'We expect to take part in moving the crops this year'.

Mr. SPROULE. About what time was this?

Mr. PUGSLEY. May or June. He said they expected to move the crops over their road by October 1. The line was to be finished from Edmonton to Winnipeg, and also the branch from Lake Superior Junction to Fort William, and they were informed by the commissioners of the Transcontinental that their part of the work necessary for this purpose would be finished. He represented that it would be most unfortunate if the Grand Trunk Pacific could not utilize its elevator at Fort William, and the only way by which it could be utilized would be by dredging the channel—I think about half a mile—between the Mission river and the elevator. I told Mr. Chamberlin that I did not know that I could do this, as it might cost more money than the government could afford to spend that year. He urged upon me that it would be a most deplorable thing if, by reason of the delay of the government in this dredging work, the Grand Trunk Pacific was not able to handle the crop of 1909. I brought the matter before my colleagues, especially Sir Richard Cartwright, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who keeps in touch more especially with the trade of the country. I found he was strongly impressed with the rapidity with which the trade there was developing, and with the importance of doing everything we reasonably could to give the requisite facilities at Port Arthur and Fort William. I sent for the contractor, and was informed by one of the gentlemen in charge of the contracting work that it would be utterly impossible for them to make the connection between Mission river and the elevator by dredging the channel—because it was an entirely new channel—unless they purchased a very powerful suction dredge, and they could only get such a dredge in the United States. I conferred again with my colleagues, presenting the whole matter to them, and they concurred in the view that in these pressing and urgent circumstances, if the contractor could, by bringing in an additional dredge, accomplish what the Grand Trunk Pacific desired, and what seemed to be in the interest of the whole country, and especially of the west, should be accomplished of having this route opened for traffic by the 1st of October, it was desirable to allow the dredging contractors to put another dredge upon the work. With that encouragement they went to the United States, bought a powerful suction dredge, brought it in, paid the duties on it, and put it at work. And, with this dredge and the others they have a very large plant of six different dredges. They were able to dredge out the channel, and make a connection with the elevator so that steamers could go from the Mission river to the elevator. We did our work, and did it in anticipation of it being necessary for the companies to handle the grain in time for that season, and I am proud that our department did this work on time, and accomplished what we assured the Grand Trunk Pacific would be done. But it was only by the contractor putting forth additional effort, and buying this extra plant that the work was accomplished. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), says: Suppose the revenues had declined? In that case I doubt very much if we should have allowed the work to go on as we did. We should probably have said to the contractors: 'You will have to stop work on the Grand Trunk Pacific elevator channel, for, much as we desire to give connection to that elevator this season yet, in the state of the revenues, we do not think it desirable in the public interest to go ahead. But the revenues began to improve and remained buoyant, so I took the responsibility of ordering this work, in connection with my colleagues, and particularly with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir Richard Cartwright, than whom there is no more prudent man in the country. I think parliament should say we have done the right thing. It makes no difference whether we provide for the work now or next year, or last year. For it must be borne in mind that these contractors had a contract for an area—not for a season, but for the entire work—and they were entitled to proceed with it as rapidly as they chose, but always subject to their being allowed to wait until parliament should appropriate the money to make the payment. It is, as the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. J. A. Currie) has said to the committee. If a public work involved an expenditure of $1,000,000, if it were in the hands of a contractor who was expected to finish $500,000 of the work in a season would there be any quarrel with him because he does building to the extent of $750,000? The contractor puts on a large force of men, employs the best of machinery, and gets along with the building to the extent of $750,000. Is there any violation of the principle of responsible government in allowing him to do that? Is there any encroachment on the law of parliament? It would be my duty as minister to say to parliament that the contractor had gone on more rapidly than we expected, and I am sure parliament would cheerfully grant the necessary money to pay him. It is exactly the same in this case. Parliament had given its sanction to the full performance of these contracts.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. The member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is perfectly correct in what he said. The Minister of Public Works has gone the wrong way about getting his money. If he had had this statement in the main estimates for next year it could have been included in the Supply Bill which was passed the other day and the money would have been available sooner than it will be in this way because it will now be impossible to include this in a Supply Bill before the first of April. If he had asked for this money in that way there would have been no question about it.

Mr. EDWARDS. I agree with the principle advanced by the members for Grey and Kings, Prince Edward Island. We are here to decide on how we shall spend so many millions of dollars. We have so many millions at our disposal and according to the judgment of the House the money is divided and expended in different parts of the country for necessary public works. If going over these estimates means anything it means that they are submitted to the judgment of the House and the money is divided according to the best judgment of the majority of the members. The principle laid down by the minister to-night is in effect that if after the supplies are granted the revenues increase, he as Minister of Public Works has a perfect right to expend the increased revenue without applying to or getting the sanction of parliament for the expenditure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I did not say that, I said that I might be justified in allowing a contractor to proceed with his work more rapidly.

Mr. EDWARDS. It is not a question of whether this work is necessary at Fort William and Port Arthur; we will grant that it is, and that much more money should be expended there. The question is whether a minister should take it upon himself after the money of the country has been divided, to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars without receiving the sanction of parliament. For instance, last year I asked the minister to spend a few hundred dollars in my riding, but he told me the money had been expended and that there was no money available for that particular work. He did not say it was unnecessary or not in the interests of the people. I contend that in the expenditure of this money I have the right, as any member has, to lay the claims of my county for a fair share of this money before this House, and to let the judgment of the House say whether or not that money should be expended. I object to the principle of a minister of the Crown taking it upon himself to expend several hundred thousand dollars for a work no matter how necessary it may be without having received the sanction of parliament. The minister has referred to the erecting of a public building to cost $2,000,000 and argues that he would be justified in going beyond the appropriation for a certain year if the contractor had gone beyond the amount voted. I do not think that could be done without infringing on the rights of other parts of the country to a fair share of the money. While I believe it is very necessary to have this work done, I wish to put myself on record as being opposed on principle to a minister expending some $400,000 more than the amount to which this House gave its sanction.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The minister has neglected to state that a commission sat on this harbour and decided to make it a national harbour and that plans for that purpose were adopted. The Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Pacific railway and the Canadian Northern railway adjusted their plans to the plans adopted by the government. That report was presented to the House and is to be found among our sessional papers. The government is carrying on that work and the Grand Trunk Pacific has certainly opened up a large extent of territory which must be served. That road reached completion at Fort William much more rapidly than the government anticipated. I was there a year ago last fall and I concluded that the Grand Trunk Pacific would have to wait with their elevator at least a year before they could get a boat to it. I am pleased that the government has rushed the work. Private money to the extent of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 is invested in the elevator, and it would not be fair to have a couple of millions stand idle for a year or two years owing to the slowness of the government work. I am pleased that the minister has decided to rush the work, because there is a great deal more work necessary to complete the harbour. If the minister had directed the contractor last year to stop the work owing to lack of money voted by parliament so that the elevator would have had to stand idle, I am afraid that the whole northwest would have been here tearing his head off for causing that delay. If this money were being expended on a worthless or political job, then I would say that the member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) was quite right and that it should not be done, but this is a national work, one of our greatest national works in transportation. I cannot see that the minister has done very much wrong in doing what he has done.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) can become as much of an apologist as he likes for the minister's conduct, but that will not influence my action in this House one iota. The hon. member gives the very strongest reason why parliament should have been asked for this expenditure last year when he says that the commission visited that harbour and decided to make a certain report and that that report was made and presented to parliament last year. Therefore, they must have been in possession of that report, they must have known what was required to be done, and they should have submitted the estimate to parliament.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I did not say that the report was presented last year. The report was presented two years ago, and the work has been carried on by this government for three years in accordance with that report.

Mr. SPROULE. That makes it so much the worse, and it makes my argument stronger because it was known the longer beforehand. I am not objecting to any expenditure at Port Arthur, per se, because it is a very important harbour, and if twice as large an expenditure had been proposed last session as was proposed, I have not the slightest doubt that this House would have voted it. But, I object to the principle. I say it is unparliamentary and wrong notwithstanding anything that has been said by the Minister of Public Works or the hon. member for North Simcoe. I am not very much concerned in either case. The hon. member for North Simcoe has asked: What would the Northwest have said if they could not have got their grain down there and through the elevator if it had been ready to receive it? We were told last session that the Grand Trunk Pacific would be hauling the crop of 1909 down to Port Arthur. Then, if they were going to haul grain, if it were known beforehand and we had that information given to this House by the ministers of the Crown, what kind of business men must they be, knowing that, that they did not prepare for it in proper time? If there had been provision in the proper time, this House could have authorized the expenditure and the harbour could have been made ready for navigation in time to permit the Grand Trunk Pacific to handle that grain. The minister said that the president of the railway company came to him last May or June. Does he not remember that this House only adjourned on the 19th or 20th of May? If it were in May surely he could have told this House what was needed, and this House would have willingly voted it. But they came to the minister a few weeks after parliament rose. How did it happen that it was known a few weeks after parliament rose and it was not known a few weeks before? All these plans are not the result of a moment's excitement. They are all worked out beforehand. They have to look over the ground, provide and prepare months beforehand. Therefore, it was known, the company had their consultations with the government, no doubt, and the government engineers had gone into the question and determined the amount of work which was required to be done, and the depth of dredging necessary to enable them to ship through these elevators. That was all known beforehand, and therefore I think that this expenditure ought to have been provided for by parliament. I am not objecting to the expenditure. If it had been ten times as much I would not object because I know the importance of that harbour, but I am objecting to the unparliamentary principle that has been adopted and has been introduced by the Minister of Public Works, one which parliament should not condone and one which parliament should not allow to pass.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was not introduced by me. I am following what has been done for forty years.

Mr. SPROULE. Not by any means. A few thousand dollars here and there—

Mr. PUGSLEY. But on the same principle.

Mr. SPROULE. For every dollar that parliament has voted you spend $1.75 during the year on this work. We voted $600,000 and you spend $1,025,000. Yet, we are told that such a principle is defensible. No such principle that I have any knowledge of in parliamentary life is defensible. I have said all I intend to say about it, but I say that the government and the Minister of Public Works ought to be held responsible and called to account for it by the people of this country.

Mr. FRASER. I have no objection to the item as far as this harbour is concerned. I know very little about the merits of the question, but there is a principle recognized by the people of this country. One thing that we are assembled in parliament for is to look after the expenditure of public money. The principle of the appropriation of public money is one which is recognized by every banking or financial institution to-day in Canada. It is a well recognized principle that all moneys that are to be expended shall be voted by a Board of Directors, or, as in the case of public money, by this parliament. The principle is the same. Last year the Minister of Public Works asked for $600,000 to expend on this public work. It was granted. A few months afterwards a man by the name of Chamberlin, a contractor up there, the president of some company, comes to the minister—

Mr. PUGSLEY. He is the manager of the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. FRASER. Well, he comes to the minister and tells him that he wants more money to be granted. This is shortly after parliament closed, or perhaps before parliament closed. The minister says: Yes, we will get at the thing and we will spend $400,000 more. For what purpose? So that we may be able to get the grain out. What do the Grand Trunk Pacific do? They take out one train load of grain. The minister has departed from a fundamental principle of constitutional government.

Although this may be, as the hon. member for North Simcoe says, a necessary work, surely this parliament will try and govern itself in accordance with fundamental principles. If we are going to get away from them why come and ask for any more money for this work? Let them go on and spend the money, and at the end of the year come and tell us how much they have expended. Why do they go through the farce of coming and asking parliament for $600,000 when at the end of the year they will come back and tell us that they have spent over a million dollars? I feel sure that if we go over the different items in the accounts for the year we will find expenditures without the authorization of parliament amounting to thousands and even millions of dollars a year. What business has the minister or any department of the government to spend a million dollars without the authorization of parliament? Surely it is the duty of parliament to authorize public expenditures, and I think every hon. member will concede that it is a principle and a duty that should be adhered to.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to ask the minister whether the place that is being dredged by the suction dredge is not likely to fill in again with material washed from the lake or the river. I want to call his attention to what I think is the most serious part of this whole question. I think my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) is perfectly right in criticising the minister for this large expenditure of money without the consent of parliament. The minister quoted to us the amount of the expenditure on each of the contracts let previous to the present year, and these contracts, as I added them up, amount to only $350,000, which leaves $75,000 of new contracts that the minister has let on his own responsibility. To my mind that is the most serious part of the whole transaction.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Did my hon. friend take the $55,000 paid to the Great Lakes Dredging Company for the deepening of the river from 22 to 25 feet?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I took $307,000, $15,000 and $31,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Add the $55,000, $31,000 and $15,000.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I understood the minister to make the statement that there was a contract for $55,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, that was for deepening the channel from 22 to 25 feet. That is part of the same work.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is that not a new contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is new instructions, but still that would be included in the work originally designed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Did it cost the same?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It cost a little more to go to the greater depth.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Well, it must be a new contract.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was not a new work. It is all part of the one harbour.

Mr. SPROULE. How much more per yard is paid to the Great Lakes Dredging Company for this deeper work than for the other?

Mr. PUGSLEY. A part of it had already been dredged to 22 feet, and then we had to provide for the extra 3 feet, and where it had not been dredged at all, we dredged down to 25 feet, and the whole thing was figured out with very great care by the engineers. I cannot give the figures exactly, but I think we raised it from 9 cents for the 22 feet to 11¼ cents for the 25 feet, which is a very reasonable figure.

Mr. SPROULE. How much was earned by the Great Lakes Dredging Company last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I will get the information on the main estimates.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. New work for at least $75,000, including the deepening of the harbour, was let last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The only really new work was the $10,000 worth done by Mr. Phinn.

Tiffin harbour improvements, $23,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to provide for amount due contractors for drilling and dredging operations at Tiffin to a depth of 25 feet at low water in connection with the terminals of the Grand Trunk. The important harbour at Tiffin is part of the national system of transportation, and we have decided to dredge there to 25 feet.

Mr. SPROULE. How much was voted last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY. $125,000, and we have expended $147,377.88.

Mr. SPROULE. Does that complete the work?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, we will continue work this year.

Mr. SPROULE. How much has been spent on this harbour, and how much is yet to be expended?

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have already expended $384,000 at Tiffin, and the engineer tells me the total estimated cost will be $600,000.

Victoria harbour improvements, $36,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We had an appropriation last year of $150,000, and we have expended $185,526.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Will the minister have sufficient depth of water for the Canadian Pacific railway at these elevators?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes; the Canadian Pacific railway is entirely satisfied with the way in which the work is proceeding.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. You should take enough money this year, so that we may not have the same complication we have had over Fort William. There is a lot of work to be done at Victoria harbour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think we are taking enough money.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that work let by contract?

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is under contract, let after public advertisement for tenders; rock, $2.25 a yard; other materials, 12½ cents when towed; boulders, $1.75; all other materials, 11 cents per cubic yard when cast over.

Mr. SPROULE. The whole contract is let to one company?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. SEXSMITH. What is the total estimated cost?

Mr. PUGSLEY. $600,000.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I think it will be more.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perhaps a little more. In reply to my hon. friend (Mr. Armstrong) I may say we have the usual slope, and it is rather hard material there, so that it is not likely to fill in to any extent.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The banks and the bottom of the river are heavy red clay.

Mr. SPROULE. Then why have you to pay for rock cutting?

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. There is some hard granite rock there.

Further amount required towards the encouragement of better transportation and conservation of fresh fish, $20,000.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The reason for this supplementary vote is that this service has proved itself so effective in the development of the fresh fish trade that it was decided to continue it through the fiscal year. The whole explanation of the arrangement covers two and a half pages of the last report of the Fisheries Department, beginning at page 17. The policy of the department has been to guarantee one-third of the ordinary express rates to Quebec and Ontario in order to encourage the direct shipment of fresh fish. Formerly it came to Montreal via Boston.

Mr. SPROULE. How much was voted for this purpose last year?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. $25,000. That was to carry on the work to November last, but it has proven so successful that the department decided to continue it, and the additional $20,000 is required to meet the additional expense. The ordinary express rates from Port Mulgrave or Halifax to Montreal is $1.50 per hundred pounds. Of that we pay fifty cents, so that it costs $1 per hundred pounds to cover the shipment to Montreal.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not want to be understood as opposing this, because I think that anything that will tend to stimulate trade between the various provinces is very desirable, but I am afraid that the minister would get into trouble if he attempted to apply the same rule to all other commodities.

Mr. FISHER. We have been doing that for a long time for butter, cheese and fruit.

Mr. SPROULE. Not paying one-third of the express rates.

Mr. FISHER. We have been doing it in a different form. We have been guaranteeing to the railway companies that they would earn two-thirds of the ordinary freight rates per car. If they do not get enough freight in the car to earn two-thirds, we make up the difference. If they get more than two-thirds, they give us a credit for the extra, and at the end of the season a balance is struck, and we make up the loss. We spend about $10,000 a year on that.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I think there is a great constitutional principle at stake here. I quite agree that it is a good thing to encourage the shipment of fresh fish from the maritime provinces as far as Montreal, and to pay part of the freight on it, to the province of Ontario, where it may compete with the fish caught by our fishermen on the great lakes; but I notice that when there is any expenditure for the province of Ontario every one seems to want to jump on it with both feet. I do not believe in being provincial in this matter; but the mistake made in this case is the same as in the case of the Minister of Public Works, that the money was expended without the consent of parliament.

Mr. G. TAYLOR. I understand that this is a sort of bonus given for the purpose of driving the American fish out of our market. This market was formerly supplied by the Boston dealers, and it was to enable our Canadians to compete with the Boston men that this money is given.

I think the object very commendable and I presume the increase is due to the development of the trade. In place of voting the $30,000 in the estimate last year, that vote ought to be increased.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. There is a great constitutional principle at stake right here again and, as representing an Ontario constituency, I say we ought to come right back to that principle. The minister has violated a constitutional principle by overrunning this estimate, what would he do if he had to spend a million dollars? No doubt he would overrun it by $500,000.

Mr. CONMEE. Why should not the fishermen on the north shore of Lake Superior have some of the benefits of this? They are nearly as far from the Montreal market as the deep sea fishermen and they have to express their fish.

Mr. BLACK. They do not compete with the American fish.

Mr. CONMEE. Yes, they do. They ship white trout and pickerel.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. And the fishermen of Lake Manitoba, represented by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury), catch two million to three million dollars worth of fish every year and ship them to the United States. Why should they not have a share in this money? But again I would remind the House that there is a great constitutional principle at stake, and I hope my hon. friend from Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) will support me in opposing this vote.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The policy has been to give assistance to salt water fishermen only.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Why?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The policy was only inaugurated one or two years ago and the idea was to bring the Atlantic fisheries into Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. They have Spain and Cuba and other countries to ship to.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I frankly admit that if the principle is sound in one case, it ought to be in another, and I would advise the department to consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Rainy River (Mr. Conmee). Just to show the effect of this, take the imports from the United States into the port of Montreal, the greatest Canadian fish market. The importation of such fish as cod and haddock from the United States fell in 1898 to the end of October from 753,000 pounds to 75,000 pounds in the case of cod and from 75,000 of haddock to 9,000 pounds. This shows that the American fish had been displaced by direct importation from the Atlantic.

Mr. SPROULE. I might reply to the observations of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) that this is not a matter to turn into a jest. The principle in the present instance is entirely different from that in the case we discussed some time ago. Some years ago we passed a law to give certain consideration to those who shipped butter, cheese or other perishable produce in cold storage, and we voted $75,000 for that purpose, but it was distinctly understood that if the trade called for more we would give more in the same proportion. In the case before us the principle is just the same. It it were decided to give for this article of produce one-third of the cost of transportation and it was assumed so many tons would be shipped, and the shipments happened to exceed that amount, there is no violation of principle in paying the extra percentage. That is not the same at all as an over expenditure on a public work. In the latter case, the engineers have every opportunity of drawing plans and making estimates and submitting everything to parliament, and there can be no excuse for the minister doubling the expenditure voted.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Does the Minister of Agriculture provide cold storage facilities for shipment of butter in the winter?

Mr. FISHER. No.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Cold storage was supplied for the fish business in the summer, but now the minister asks an additional appropriation during the winter. Again there is a great constitutional principle at stake.

Mr. FISHER. On butter in winter we do not need cold storage.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Nor do we need it on fish.

Mr. FISHER. The fish is expressed and not sent in cold storage at all.

Fish breeding establishments—amount required to pay W. S. Young for special service collecting whitefish eggs for hatchery at Selkirk and Berens river, $100.

Mr. SPROULE. I have thought for a good many years that the government are not doing all they should with regard to the establishment of these fish hatcheries. The rivers and lakes of our country are being depleted very rapidly. In the Georgian bay we have one of the very finest fishing grounds in Canada, but it is being rapidly depleted. Every year immense quantities of fish and fish ova are brought to the shore and the fish ova destroyed, in some places in tons, and yet we require them. The Americans take them and use them for hatching out fish on their side. Instead of having those fish ova destroyed, as they are in some cases in tons, we would be doing the proper thing if more fish breeding establishments were erected on the Georgian bay and Lake Huron, and have the fish hatched out there. They send to Georgian bay and collect the ova there right along the shore of the riding I represent. They bring them to Ottawa and hatch them out, and afterwards the fresh fry are taken back at considerable expense and put into the lake. The hatching might as well be done there at the edge of the lake, in the streams that are in every way suitable for the purpose. Many of the fry are destroyed in carriage, and it costs a good deal more while yielding nothing like the beneficial results that would follow having hatcheries near the water in which the fry are to be placed. I have again and again drawn attention to this improper and short-sighted policy. For some time I thought I had the promise of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that he would establish a hatchery on the river leading into Thornbury down through a portion of my riding, where there are opportunities for a dozen fish hatcheries close to the lake. Though I thought I had his promise, I found that the minister was only jollying the thing along, and I was forced to the conclusion that he had no intention of carrying out the idea. I understand that one hatchery was established at Wiarton. That is right. I would like to see a dozen along the Georgian bay including one at Southampton. Tons of fish ova are destroyed there every year, and the waters are being depleted and the public are complaining. We are talking of conserving our forests and of replanting. That is what we should do with our fisheries; we should make the best use of all that nature has given us.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am inclined to agree with the observations of my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule). Not many hatcheries have been built in very recent years. I am informed that it is proposed to build one on Lake Superior, and two or three applications for hatcheries on Georgian bay, and other points along that lake shore are under consideration at present.

Mr. SPROULE. Is one on the Beaver river?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am informed that that is not one of those under consideration. I believe that the view expressed by my hon. friend has the concurrence of the department which has always been anxious to establish fish hatcheries. There are thirty-seven hatcheries in Canada, and, of these fully two-thirds have been established within the last ten years. In my own province there are nine, eight of which have been built within the last ten or twelve years. We are well supplied in British Columbia for the hatching of salmon. The policy of the department has always been to build hatcheries, and keep up the fisheries by this artificial propagation. If I can influence the department, I will try to have others built on the great lakes.

Mr. BLACK. Is it the intention to hatch shad at the Windsor hatchery?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am advised that that is being provided for, that provision is being made in the main estimates in relation to that matter.

Fisheries protection service—further amount required, $30,000.

Mr. CROSBY. What protection service is this?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This is to provide for expenditures of last year. This vote is necessary largely because of additional fisheries protection on the Pacific ocean. The protection of the sea fisheries there is a very serious question. The government has had only one cruiser, the 'Kestrel.' It was felt that another vessel was needed, and the steamer 'Joliffe,' a large and powerful tug was engaged in the service at an expense of $9,000 or $10,000. Another large item covered by this vote is repairs to the government cruiser 'Kestrel.' No repairs of any account had been made to this vessel since she was built in 1903. An examination showed serious defects and she was put on the ways and thoroughly repaired at a cost of $13,000.

Post Office Department, outside service—further amount required, $300,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Of this $300,000, the sum of $60,000 is for the increases that were made statutory last year for the humbler employees in the Post Office Department, outside service. Then $40,000 must be applied for the payment of better railway facilities for the British mails between Montreal and Rimouski. That is paid to the Intercolonial railway. As to the balance of $200,000, last year when the estimates were made up we were still under the influence of reduced revenues, and I thought I could imitate some of my colleagues and practice the policy of economy and retrenchment. We, therefore, cut off this amount, but we found that with the expansion of business in the country, with the establishment of the rural mail delivery and the continuation of our policy of multiplying the varous postal services from weekly to semi-weekly, from semi-weekly to tri-weekly and daily we could not do without the amount by which we had attempted to retrench.

Mr. SPROULE. What has been the cost of the rural mail delivery system and to what extent has it been put in force?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have here a table which will give all the information desired by the hon. member.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the minister be good enough to tell us where the bulk of this money is expended?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is chiefly in the western provinces, on the new railway systems, the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific. I know of forty or fifty post offices on these lines that were established two or three years ago. At the beginning the receipts were $25, or $30, or $40. I remember that the best revenue producing office was Wainwright, one of the divisional points on the Grand Trunk Pacific. The revenue was then about $175; now it has increased to nearly $1,000. It shows the progress of the country in these new sections. New settlements grow up and new offices are opened. That is where the great bulk of the business is done now, but in the older sections of the country we are establishing post offices, reducing the distances between offices and giving better postal facilities.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I see the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Congdon) sitting behind the minister, and I was wondering whether he was asking for an expenditure for increased postal facilities in that part of the country. I see that last year there was an expenditure of $135,000 in the Yukon.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We have to contend with special circumstances in the Yukon. It is not a profitable business on account of the prives that have to be paid for the services, and the distances covered to reach the mining camps that are dispersed throughout that land. It is not a profitable business, but still we have to maintain the service. We have to be in a position to send a letter from north to south or east to west at two cents. We take pride in the Post Office Department in the fact that persons at the remotest points in this country can send and receive letters. As an instance of the development of postal facilities in the west. I may say that since 1908 we have established in the district of Medicine Hat alone, something like 60 offices. It shows the rapid development that is taking place in the west, and how difficult it is to predict in advance the amount that will be spent in a year. That is why I am obliged to come now and ask for an additional vote of $200,000.

Mr. FRASER. What are the conditions and requirements necessary to secure the establishment of a rural mail delivery?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I will give my hon. friend a little booklet in which he will find the instructions and directions necessary for the establishment of a rural mail delivery.

To provide for the appointment of R. G. Mercer as superintendent of the railway mail service at London, at a salary of $1,500 a year from the 1st April, 1909, $1,500.

Mr. SPROULE. Is that a new appointment?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, he succeeds another gentleman. Mr. Mercer has been employed since 1872, first in the inspector's office, and then in the office of the Superintendent of Railway Mail Service. On the death of the late superintendent, in July, 1905, Mr. Mercer was placed in charge of the district, and has given very good satisfaction. He is known as a first-class clerk, and he is now in receipt of the maximum salary of $1,500. Under the statute, however, no person can be appointed as superintendent unless he has actually been employed as a railway mail clerk for two and a half years. Mr. Mercer has never been employed in that capacity, and, therefore, his appointment has to be made by a vote in the estimates.

Mr. SPROULE. Then you are deliberately and flagrantly defying the Civil Service Act?

Mr. LEMIEUX. He is now at his maximum, and we simply propose to change his title, he continuing to receive the same salary. He has been acting since 1905.

Mr. SPROULE. In that capacity?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, but he had not the title.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the minister to say that the law provides that a man occupying the position of superintendent must be employed two and a half years. If he was there since 1905, he must have been employed more than two and a half years. The minister must be wrong in his explanation. I take it that the salary is being voted because he has not complied with the Act.

Mr. FISHER. I do not know the details of the situation enough to be able to explain them, but under the new Civil Service Act a salary of this kind cannot be voted unless a man's name is put into the item, and I think that is the reason of this particular item. The amount may have been provided and paid otherwise, but the item must contain the name according to the provision of the Civil Service Act.

Mr. LENNOX. I want to call the attention of the minister for a moment to some communications I have received in reference to 'Cotton's Weekly,' published at Cowansville.

Mr. LEMIEUX.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is my hon. friend a socialist?

Mr. LENNOX. That is not to the point.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Not at all.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not need to be a socialist in order to wish to do justice. I know not whether injustice has been done in this matter, but I am requested by some of my constituents to call the attention of the Postmaster General to what is alleged to be a grievance. I have a letter from Mr. McQuarrie, a gentleman in the town of Barrie who is an avowed socialist, but a man whom I hold in the very highest esteem. I have also a petition from some people who live very close to me in the little hamlet where I reside, and they represent that an injustice has been done. I shall send that petition to the Postmaster General. Now, I do not know whether this is a good publication or not, but my correspondents allege that discrimination has been practised against them. I see in a copy which has been addressed to me as well as other members, a letter addressed to the Postmaster General complaining that by a recent order the postmaster at Cowansville has charged sixteen times the amount formerly charged as postage on this publication. If this is an improper publication which should not have the privilege to go through the mails it should be shut out altogether, but if it is entitled to postal privileges it ought not to be charged more than the rates charged other publications. As a public man representing these people who have communicated with me, I want to bring the matter squarely before the Postmaster General, and to ask him for an explanation.

Mr. CROSBY. I have had communications similar to those received by my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) and I endorse the statements made by him. If this publication is not such as should pass through the post office, it should be stopped altogether, but if it is entitled to postal privileges it should be treated the same as any other newspaper. I ask, for those interested in this paper, fair and reasonable and impartial treatment.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When I made a remark to my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) a moment ago, of course, he understood it was a joke.

Mr. LENNOX. Oh, certainly, I did not resent it at all.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is quite proper that my hon. friend should ask the reason for the complaints made by Mr. Cotton, the editor of 'Cotton's Weekly'. I have been deluged with letters from all parts of the country, not only from those who believe in socialistic doctrines, but from other citizens, who want to see fair play done to every section of the community. I must say at once that there has been no discrimination, whatever, against 'Cotton's Weekly'. If there was anything published in that paper of a scurrilous character it would be prevented altogether from passing through the mails, as has been done in other cases, but 'Cotton's Weekly' is not a paper of that class. Through an error of the postmaster as Cowansville, where the paper is published, it was allowed to pass through the mails in bundles, paying the same rate as if the paper had been addressed to bona fide subscribers. There is a postal rate for bona fide subscribers, and there is a certain other rate charged for papers sent in bundles. As soon as the attention of the department was called to that fact the proper legal rate was exacted from the publishers, and hence all the trouble. I repeat that there is no discrimination, whatever. Mr. Cotton is under the impression that we are discriminating against his paper, because it is a socialistic paper, but the department has no idea of the kind in mind. The fact is that Mr. Cotton is sending his paper in bundles to certain individuals, who then distribute them to other parties.

Mr. LENNOX. They are not individually addressed?

Mr. LEMIEUX. They are not individually addressed. My hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) is a distinguished member of the bar, and he knows the legal definition of 'bona fide subscribers' used in this sense. The whole thing in a nut-shell is that Mr. Cotton addresses his papers in bundles to one individual, who then distributes, or sells, them to others, and that does not mean a 'bona fide subscriber' as set out in the Postal Act. There have been hundreds of complaints sent to me that there is an attempt by the Post Office Department to crush this paper because of its socialistic character, and I have answered every one of these correspondents, explaining the matter very fully. There is no discrimination in the Post Office Department against any respectable opinion which may be advanced by any citizens. I respect the views of the socialists, I respect the views of the labour people as I respect the views of all classes of the community, and I would not be a party to lending the authority of the post office to suppress any respectable opinion. Mr. Cotton is completely in error about this. He has written to his friends throughout the country telling them to write to the Post Office Department to state that we are trying to destroy his paper. Such is not the case. We are simply charging him the rate which is charged in every other similar case. The other day I gave more, in reply to a question, the legal aspect of the matter, which will be found in 'Hansard'.

Mr. LENNOX. Do I understand the Postmaster General to say that the rate imposed upon 'Cotton's Weekly' at Cowansville, in bundles without individual addresses, is exactly the same rate that would be charged to any other weekly paper issuing from the same place, whatever its opinions might be?

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is correct.

Mr. LENNOX. Then, if they were addressed to bona fide subscribers and put into a bundle, they would be allowed to go at a lower rate?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. And it was because this was detected, and they had been allowed to go at a rate which they should not have gone that the change was made?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. The Postmaster General says that he has answered a great many letters. Has he answered Mr. Cotton?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Cotton wrote me yesterday a personal letter, in which I am sorry to say he abused me terribly; but I ignored the abuse and answered the facts. I signed the letter this afternoon. He labours under the delusion that he is discriminated against, whereas the department is simply treating him as it does any other editor in the country.

Mr. ARTHURS. While this item is under discussion I would like to call the Postmaster General's attention to the mail service in the Parry Sound district. We have certain new lines of railway in that district, and yet in a great many cases the people continue to get their mails by the old routes, perhaps by a vehicle carrying it fifteen miles when there is a railroad within a mile or two. I think it would be advisable for the Postmaster General to have the inspector make an inquiry into the service and report.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I shall be pleased to give the railroads the preference in every case, and I may say to my hon. friend that when a railroad is completed, the company does not lose any time in coming to the department and asking for the privilege of transporting His Majesty's mail. However, if my hon. friend will call my attention to any railway company which has no transportation of the mails, I will have the matter looked into.

Mr. ARTHURS. I may cite a case in point. There is a town in my county called Byng Inlet to which there is a mail service north by the Canadian Pacific railway, I think, on alternate days. There is no return service south, and a letter from Byng Inlet to Parry Sound goes north to Sudbury, from there to North Bay, from there to Toronto, and back again to Parry Sound. In that way it takes six or seven days for the letter to reach its destination, whereas a man could walk down the track and deliver the letter in a few hours. That is one case, but there are a great many others, and I think it would be well for the minister to have the inspector look into the whole mail service of that district.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Upon the orders of the day:

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I wish to read an item in the 'Citizen' of to-day, and found a question upon it which I will ask the hon. the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Fielding) to answer. It reads as follows:

> Hon. W. S. Fielding Returns—Tariff Conference at Albany ends in most Friendly Manner—Reported that probability of Tariff War has receded and a Settlement regarded as likely—Conference occupied Whole of Yesterday but no Conclusion was reached, says President Taft. Canadian Minister has left for Ottawa and may go to Washington the end of month.
> (Special to the 'Citizen.')
> Albany, N.Y., March 20.—There will probably be no tariff war between the United States and Canada. The prospect for commercial peace with the Dominion is more favourable to-night than it has been at any time since the president caused it to be understood that the situation was critical.
> By joint agreement between President Taft and Hon. W. S. Fielding, the Canadian Minister of Finance, the following statement was given out from the state executive mansion this evening for publication:—
> 'The President and Mr. Fielding were in conference in respect to the tariff to-day for several hours. No conclusion was reached, but the situation remains that of friendly negotiations.'
> Despite the late hour at which the University Club dinner ended Mr. Fielding and Mr. Charles M. Pepper, who is here from Washington as the representative of the state department, were at the executive mansion at half past nine o'clock this morning. They immediately went into private conference with Mr. Taft and remained closeted with him until he had to leave them to keep his engagement to attend church with Governor Hughes. The Canadian minister and Mr. Pepper returned together to the Ten Eyck hotel, chatting in a manner that indicated amicable relations, but they returned to the governor's official residence in time to resume the conference with the president after luncheon, to which Earl Grey and Mr. Fielding as well as the president had been invited as the guests of Governor and Mrs. Hughes.
> After luncheon the conference was resumed, and it continued until four o'clock in the afternoon, when the president, by reason of an appointment of long standing, kept an afternoon tea engagement at the house of his friends, Mr. and Mrs. Ward. Mr. Fielding and Mr. Pepper again returned to the hotel. They repaired to the apartments occupied by the Dominion Minister of Finance and busied themselves in going over certain of the tariff schedules with a view of reaching some basis agreeable to both sides whereby the president would be justified in withholding the operation against Canadian imports of the maximum tariff as prescribed by the Payne-Aldrich law after March 31.

I wish to ask the Minister of Finance whether that statement is substantially correct and whether there was a conference between the President of the United States and our Finance Minister in Albany yesterday (Sunday) re tariff matters, as alleged in the despatch read? Was the invitation of the president, which was accepted by the government, for a Sunday conference?

Mr. FIELDING. At the invitation of the President of the United States, I visited Albany and had the honour and the pleasure of meeting that gentleman on both Saturday and Sunday. We discussed matters which I trust will work for the peace, order and good government of these two nations; there could be no better Sunday work.

JAPAN-UNITED STATES TREATY.

Mr. S. HUGHES. In the New York 'World' of Friday, March 18, I see a dispatch speaking of the proposed treaty between Japan and the United States, part of which is:

England wishes to get away from her treaty with Japan, and Japan, it is said here to-day, is ready to let her go at the expiration of the Lansdowne-Hayashi agreement. Japan is desirous, however, of having a government support her in the Orient without committing her against any nation.

The reason for this is that Japan does not feel capable of taking care of the commercial and industrial feature of China, but she also has her doubts as to the motives behind offers of certain European governments. With the United States ready to develop the far east in accordance with every provision of American 'commercial equality' and without ulterior motives of aggrandisement, Japan feels that China's future and freedom from contention are assured.

POINTS IN NEW PROPOSAL.

The points to be added on the new proposal, not included in the Root-Takahira agreement, and which could not be embraced by the latter, even in its vague wording, are these:

1. Consolidation in Asia, especially along the Pacific shores.

2. To include Great Britain if she desires to become a party, through her alliance with the empire, by a triangulation of interests, or dissociate England entirely without in any way jeopardizing British interests.

3. Further definition of fisheries rights.

4. That the jeopardy of the rights of either nation requiring safeguarding of common and mutual interests and rights is not to be construed as open belligerents but a bid for either arbitration or other outlet.

5. That the powers signatory to the Hay note do not figure in any way in the motives behind this new pact other than to share all the benefits to be derived by a direct understanding between two nations politically, diplomatically and commercially identified with the Pacific basin, namely, Japan and the United States.

6. Japan will agree to maintain peace so long as her own sovereignty is not menaced.

7. Japan, in the event that the United States will concede the moral right to guide and control Chinese Manchuria and the Pacific basin in general, does not oppose Russia, nor does she seek any right other than that of mutual friend to all those interested; in the event of difficulties, the matter will then be referred to the participating governments for settlement.

In courtesy to the powers they will be acquainted with the fact that Japan wishes to come to a more settled and definite amicable understanding with the United States.

Might I ask the government, in view of the fact that in this despatch the Pacific ocean is regarded as practically a sea concerning which the United States, Japan and Great Britain (Great Britain, I presume, being more especially interested through Canada, Australia and New Zealand) shall have control, if the government have the intention of taking any steps towards safeguarding the rights of Canada, through the empire, in this proposed treaty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have to inform my hon. friend that we have received no invitation at all from the imperial authorities upon this subject.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SPROULE. Is the Finance Minister in a position to give any information as to what progress, if any, he and the government have made in their negotiations with President Taft over tariff matters?

Mr. FIELDING. I can only say to my hon. friend that I do not think the good purpose that he has in view, and that we all must have in view, would be advanced by making any statement at the present time. The matters in dispute remain as matters for friendly negotiations, and beyond that it would not be expedient to make a statement at this moment. At an early date I hope to give the House fuller and better information.

WAR VESSELS ON THE GREAT LAKES.

Mr. BOYCE. I have read an item in at least one newspaper to the effect that there has been some correspondence with this government looking to the modification if not the entire abrogation of the Rush-Bagot treaty so as to permit of training ships or armed cruisers going up the great lakes, which is prohibited at the present time by that treaty. Has there been any such correspondence, and if so, has any conclusion been reached?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that an invitation has come from the United States with a view of having this Rush-Bagot treaty revised, but nothing more than that has been done so far as I know.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. BRADBURY. I would renew my inquiry regarding a return ordered about a month ago for papers with reference to a report made by Mr. Williams in connection with the St. Peter's Indian reserve.

Mr. OLIVER. The return in question is being prepared, and I hope to be able to lay it on the table within a day or two.

PRIVATE BILLS.

JAMES BAY AND EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 128) to incorporate the James Bay and Eastern Railway Company—Mr. Girard.

On section 11,

Mr. LENNOX. We had a good deal of discussion over this clause in the committee. I understand that the hon. minister was present when the Bill went through. From recollection the clause provided that the company might acquire electric power and energy and sell surplus power but had not the right to build dams or generate electric power. I am at a loss to understand why they should require the right to dispose of surplus power if they are only to get such as they need for their own purposes.

Mr. GRAHAM. This condition might arise. They might need 10,000 horse-power for the purposes of their undertaking. They might have to buy from some one who had 11,000 horse-power to sell and they would have to buy the whole 11,000. This Bill would give them the right to sell the surplus 1,000.

Mr. LANCASTER. The words 'not by expropriation' are to go in.

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. That is rather a weak argument. If the railway required a quantity of power and got one horse-power more than it required, it would not be a great hardship on the company if it were not able to dispose of that. It looks very much as if something was lurking behind this apparently innocent language. It looks like an attempt to get control of water-powers which will not be used necessarily for the operation of the railway as it should be.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does the clause read now 'in the municipalities through which the railway is authorized to be built' or 'in the municipalities through which the railway is built'?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The clause reads as follows:

11. For the purposes of its undertaking and subject to the provisions of section 247 of the Railway Act the company may acquire but not by expropriation, electric or other power, or energy, which may be transmitted and delivered to any place in the municipalities through which the railway is authorized to be built, and may receive, transform, transmit, distribute and supply such power or energy in any form, and may dispose of the surplus thereof, and may collect rates and charges therefor; but no such rate or charge shall be demanded or taken until it has been approved of by the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, who may also revise such rates and charges from time to time.

Mr. EMMERSON. In other Bills of a similar character we have confined them to the municipalities through which the road is built and not through which it is authorized to be built, the reason being that the railway must first build its road before engaging in the business of distributing electric power. Otherwise the company might never build its railway and simply become a transmission and distributing power company. I would think that we should follow the practice adopted with respect to other Bills and strike out the words 'authorized to build'.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought that was the amendment made in committee. We had quite a discussion there. Attention was drawn to the fact that the railway might build two miles only, though authorized to build a line a thousand miles long. Under the power given by this Bill, it would have the right to distribute electricity along the whole of its authorized line through all the municipalities. There was evidently some mistake, for the Bill has not been reported as the committee intended.

Mr. J. D. REID. According to that amendment, this company would have the right to enter into any municipality and distribute electricity in competition with a municipal plant and perhaps destroy it, or the municipality might have to sell out its plant to this company. I understood that it was the intention to have these Bills amended in such a way that a company such as this could not enter a municipality and interfere with a municipal plant.

Mr. BLAIN. Do I understand the hon. member for Westmorland has moved to strike out these words?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I did not understand him to make a motion.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not wish to make a motion, but if the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill would act upon the suggestion I have made, he would be conforming to the practice allowed by the committee.

Mr. LENNOX. Before the Bill was passed in the committee, we had several Bills in which these words 'authorized to be built' appeared, and in every case we changed them. In the Rainy River Bill we had this clause again, and we changed the wording so that this Bill stands alone in that respect. It will be advisable, I think, for the promoter of this Bill to consent to this change. This must have got in merely by inadvertance. We have adopted a definite practice in that matter, and it is the duty of this committee, I submit, to insist that in some way it be made right. I am disposed to press the objection, and, if the promoter of the Bill will not consent to what has been the uniform practice, then to ask that the committee rise and report progress, so that notice may be given.

Mr. GRAHAM. The hon. member (Mr. Girard), who is in charge of the Bill, is not present. Of course, if there are amendments to be made, it would be better to move that the committee rise and report progress, that the usual notice may be given. I know that there is a difference of opinion about the point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox). The other point of view may be worthy of consideration, and it is this: A railway line—say this railway line—is to be built. If you confine it to the power on which the line is built, you might make the rule so rigid that they could not use it to run the road. It will be better, however, to leave the Bill over, so I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

RAINY RIVER RADIAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 108) to incorporate the Rainy River Radial Railway Company.—Mr. Conmee.

On section 9—power to operate telegraph and telephone lines.

Mr. BOYCE. Is that amended, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. It does not appear so in the copy before me.

Mr. BOYCE. I think that after the word 'may' were to be inserted the words 'for the purposes of its undertaking, and,' making it read: 'The company may, for the purposes of its undertaking, and subject to the provisions of the Railway Act, construct and operate telegraph and telephone lines,' and so on. I move that these words be inserted. I do not think it is usual to give a railway company the right to do a telephone and telegraph business. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Conmee) desires more than that they should have power to carry on a telephone business in connection with and for the purposes of their railway.

Mr. CONMEE. I think that is correct.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 10—express business.

Mr. SPROULE. I think that the railway companies, when they have the express business entirely under their own control sometimes act in a not very generous way with the public. They often compel shippers to send goods by express and pay a much higher figure if they want them taken proper care of and sent through rapidly. There are many advantages in combining the ownership of railway and express services, but there are some disadvantages to the public which are very considerable. Take the case of a line passing through our section of the country; when it was in its original ownership, there was an express company different from the railway company. The railway company was obliged to haul the express cars, but the express company could make its own contract. The public had much better service then than they have had since the express company was bought up by the railway company. The railway and express are now controlled by the Canadian Pacific railway. The people have to pay much higher figures for their express, and they have less advantages than they had under the old system. For instance, the company will not deliver express in the villages. The express matter is dumped at the station, and the individuals for whom it is intended may not receive notice before several days. And then they have to go down to the station for it. The charge is made much higher. For instance, where they carried express, it was 60 cents a hundred to Toronto, now it is 75 cents. These are all exactions from the public, and I thought it was due to the fact that when the railway company took over the express business and were carrying freight and express, they could charge whatever they pleased.

On section 12,

Mr. BOYCE. I would ask the Minister of Railways if this is the usual clause. I was not able to attend the committee in which the change was made.

Mr. GRAHAM. I think this clause is somewhat new, in that it introduces the words 'not by expropriation.' We did not have that in the old clause. We have for some years gone on the understanding that the provisions of the Railway Act, as the particular clauses were drawn, did not apply to these Bills with regard to expropriation. But to make sure we put in these words 'not by expropriation.'

Mr. CONMEE. My understanding of that clause in the Railway Committee was this: There is in another subsection a further amendment to that clause, which stipulates that they shall not build such works on the Rainy river, which is the only navigable river in the vicinity. I did not understand that the words 'not by expropriation' were going to be inserted in that subsection 2. I think that is going a little too far. I think that subsection ought to be satisfactory, and such powers of expropriation as the Railway Act confers ought to be allowed.

Mr. BOYCE. Wasn't that agreed to in the Railway Committee?

Mr. CONMEE. That is the way I understood it. What good purpose is to be served by using the words, when the clause itself excludes them from the only navigable stream that could be dealt with under their charter?

Mr. SPROULE. There may be other water-powers that they could expropriate.

Mr. CONMEE. They are given authority to use a water-power and sell the surplus, but they can only do it subject to the Railway Act. What good purpose could be served? It is only depriving the public of the use of that power. It is not injuring the companies to any great extent, but it is depriving the public of the opportunity of utilizing the power. Every one knows that a railway does not use all its power every day. In the winter season when it has to contend with snow and ice, it has to use nearly double the force it would at other times. Now why leave that force idle? The public interest is absolutely protected. The company cannot deal with it except under the control of the board, and they are excluded by Act from dealing with the important stream in the district where navigation might be affected. Surely the public interest is amply protected without putting in that restriction.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman asks what good purpose was to be served. In the Railway Committee we thought that there might be other water-powers than the one specifically mentioned, and that the same rule should apply to all. There must be a principle, there must not be any picking, and choosing between different powers. We thought that both these amendments were necessary. The committee thought that this company was to be subject to the Railway Act, and that they should not go into the water-power business, but only into the business of developing electricity for the railway and that they should not have the right to expropriate any water-power. Then because the Rainy river is a navigable stream, and the Dominion government might have some control over it, to be consistent, the committee said that 'not by expropriation,' would not necessarily cover the Rainy river, because the Rainy river is navigable. And so, to carry out the principle entirely, and protect the public both as regards the Dominion authority and provincial authority, the committee almost unanimously came to the conclusion that both these amendments should be adopted as they now stand.

Mr. GRAHAM. My own opinion is that none of these Railway Bills should be given any right to expropriate the water-powers of anybody. If I owned a water-power, if I got on the ground first, I don't think any other person ought to have a right to come in and expropriate it, and use it for the same purpose I was going to use it for. They ought to make some arrangement with me. I do not think they ought to have the right to expropriate water-powers on the right of way for the railway. If they expropriate sufficient for the right of way, I do not think it should include the water-power. It is not needed for the right of way of the railway. It is supposed to be outside of it altogether. I think that is a pretty safe ground to take.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I am glad to hear that expression of opinion from the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) in reference to this question. It is not necessary at all for the construction of a railway to give the company the power to expropriate water-falls. We should not declare a railway to be a work for the benefit of Canada and grant the extraordinary power that accompanies that declaration unless it is absolutely necessary. There is no necessity, in connection with the construction of a railway, to give the company the power to expropriate water-falls. All the powers you may put in this Act do not give the right to a corporation to take from the Crown what is vested in it. You must get the consent of the Crown. Powers of expropriation, given under the Act of parliament, have no effect, certainly against the Crown in the Dominion and, I believe, in the province. Notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell), the other day when he quoted a decision of the Privy Council, I do not believe that the judgment goes as far as the hon. gentleman indicated, and I do not believe that any power that we may put in the Act of parliament gives a right to the exercise of eminent domain as against the Crown in a province.

Mr. TURRIFF. I was very glad to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham) make the statement that he did. I believe the time has come when we should curtail the powers that we give under these different railway charters, and I hope that next session when these different railway companies come before this House for incorporation the Minister of Railways and Canals will lay down the principle that we will grant them railway charters but we will not grant them water-power rights in connection with the railway in any particular whatever, and that if they want water-powers let the same people, if they choose, form a water-power company and let us deal with them as a water-power company simply. There is no doubt in my mind that there has been a large number of charters put through this House with these water-power privileges attached in which we have been incorporating water-power companies and giving them privileges because they came before us as railway companies, that we would not have given if we had known clearly what their intents were. By these charters they may be enabled to secure water-powers and build only a minimum amount of the railway. The feeling generally throughout the country and on both sides of this House, I believe, is that the time has come when no more of these natural resources of the country should be given to railway corporations. I have supported some of them in the House this session simply because I did not feel that it was advisable or good policy at the end of the session to refuse one company what we have already granted to other companies during the present session, but as far as I am concerned, at the coming session I will oppose the granting of these privileges to any of the railway companies that come to us seeking incorporation.

Mr. CONMEE. I do not quarrel with the general principle that has been enunciated by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Graham), but there is a good deal of suspicion in the minds of hon. members of this House that because you say in a railway charter that the company may acquire and utilize a water-power thereby you give them the right to take or expropriate that water-power. I deny that. You do not give them any such right, and no hon. member of this House can point to a single case in this country where a water-power has been developed or utilized by virtue of any such right given by a railway charter. You are giving companies the right to operate water-powers in connection with their system, and under the restrictions imposed in the public interest by the Railway Act instead of compelling them to carry on two sets of business, keep two sets of books and have two different organizations. That is all you do accomplish by making this condition. I am not going to contend that the amendments should be changed because an hon. gentleman has stated that he understood them a little different from what I did. I do not think it makes any difference whatever to this company. I do not think they are prejudiced by that clause going in, but this suspicion that you are and have been giving railway companies powers that are inimical to the public interest, and that you are creating a monopoly with regard to the acquisition and operation of water-powers is all a mistake. I do not want to use a stronger expression.

Mr. LANCASTER. It depends on the view point.

Mr. CONMEE. It does not depend on the view point. It is impossible for a railway company under the powers of the Railway Act to take these water-powers. They cannot do it, and all you are doing is to compel them to maintain two separate organizations. I do not think that it is in the public interest that such should be done.

Mr. SPROULE. If the water-power is on the right of way do they not acquire it? They expropriate the right of way, and the water-power goes with it. Take such a case as that of the Lake of the Woods where the stream crosses right underneath the railway, and where the water-power is within the limits of the right of way. Surely the railway company becomes the possessor of it?

Mr. CONMEE. No, I have in a previous debate answered that point. There are several places where the Canadian Pacific railway, and the Canadian Northern railway cross important water-powers, but neither of these companies can develop these water-powers. At Eagle river and at Wabigoon river the Canadian Pacific railway cross right over the head of the falls. The line of railway could not have been located better for the purpose of controlling the water-power on the Wabigoon river, as far as a railway line can control it, yet the company have no control over that water-power. It is developed by another company altogether. The railway company never developed it, and never pretended to have any rights in the water-power. They did not secure their right of way under such conditions as to give them that right. They got their right of way from the province of Ontario, and in all the patents that are issued these water-powers are reserved. There is no case of conveying to a railway company in the deed for the right of way any right or title to the water-powers on such right of way. It has not been done in any case that I know of, and if it were done the railway company could not develop the water-power, because you would require the right to raise the water, to build dams, intakes, and outlets, which would extend beyond the limits of any right of way. At the Lake of the Woods the railway crosses three different branches of the Winnipeg river as it discharges from the lake, and it crosses over the head of the falls in each case. Yet these powers are developed by other people. The Lake of the Woods Milling Company controls one, the Mather Milling Company another, and Kenora another. The railway company have never pretended to have any claim on those water-powers.

Mr. SPROULE. Why do you want this power in the Bill?

Mr. CONMEE. There is no good purpose compelling any set of men to keep double books, a double staff, and a double organization. I do not see any sense in it.

Mr. PORTER. All of these difficulties were advanced in the committee, and considered there. In my judgment too much care cannot be taken in the granting of these railway charters as far as the granting of water-powers is concerned. I believe that all conflict of authority between the province and the Dominion in regard to these powers has been very carefully guarded against in the wording of this Bill, and fully considered. It seems to me it ought not to be interfered with now.

On subclause 2,

Mr. BOYCE. I wish to express the gratification I have at hearing the changed views of the hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Conmee) with regard to the acquisition under a Railway Bill of the use of Dominion water-powers. I only hope he will continue to be a convert to that view and will not take up the time of the House by introducing such Bills as this which apparently have as their object not the building of railways but the acquisition of the most valuable water-powers in Ontario. This Bill as originally introduced transgressed every doctrine that the hon. gentleman has advanced because it gave the promoters the absolute right to build dams in the Rainy river to obstruct navigation, to put in locks and operate them to the exclusion of public use. I am glad the hon. gentleman has at last become a convert to the doctrine that water-powers should he held for the people and used for the people.

Mr. CONMEE.

Mr. CONMEE. I am pleased indeed if I have been able to satisfy my hon. friend. This Bill, however, was not introduced by me; my name was put on it and I have done my best to make it a perfect Bill. The clauses which the chairman has just read which are guarding the public interest were moved not by the hon. gentleman but by myself.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DOMINION MILLERS' ASSOCIATION.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 111) respecting the Dominion Millers' Association.—Mr. Harris.

On section 2, membership.

Mr. J. HAGGART. We are giving great powers, practically creating a trust, and it should be open to any one in the business under certain conditions to join the association.

Mr. HARRIS. Any man engaged in the business of milling is entitled to join.

Mr. J. HAGGART. That would be all right if it was in the Bill, but the wording of the clause is that he is eligible.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman if he was a member of an association would want every one to come into it unless he had some say as to who should join. As I understand every miller in the country is eligible.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand it is the same as in the old Bill and the difficulty then was to get them to join.

Mr. S. SHARPE. It seems that there are some 180 members, small millers, &c., and the idea that a man wishing to become a member should put in his application recommended by two other members of the association, so that no disreputable person should become a member. The executive passes on the membership the same as in any other company.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Could there not be some means by which a party introduced by two or three members would have a right to become a member?

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The law clerk has pointed out that sections 6 and 7 ought to be consolidated, that there is a little repetition. He suggests, and I move, that in clause 7, subclause 2, after the word 'consist' in the first line the word 'only' should be inserted, and in clause 6 all except the first two lines should be struck out, and then as subclause 3 we should insert:

Ordinary members shall consist of such persons only as are—

That does not change the purpose of the Bill, it simply puts the two paragraphs into one with a sub-paragraph defining who are participating members and who are ordinary members.

Mr. S. SHARPE. I do not think there should be any objection to such a clause as the hon. member (Mr. J. Haggart) has suggested, providing that no application was refused when it was confirmed by two members of the association.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. The only objection I see to that is that it seems to be contrary to the usual usage of associations and joint stock companies. In this way the company would have no voice as to who should become members.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I am not pressing the point, but we are really creating a trust.

Mr. S. SHARPE. Would it not be a greater trust if you admitted all the owners?

Mr. J. HAGGART. No, because it would be open to every person in the business. Of course, it would be a greater trust as against the public, but as against the mill owners it would not be.

Mr. S. SHARPE. By the terms of the by-law the executive committee must pass upon a man's application, they have power to reject a man. This Bill was carefully considered, and the trust aspect was greatly eliminated in clause 11. I suggested that they should not have power to purchase mills.

Mr. PORTER. The clause is not framed so as to meet the wishes of the promoter. As I understand his desire is that all millers should be admitted, but the wording is only such persons as according to by-laws hereafter to be adopted are declared eligible. If the company passed a by-law declaring that no one is eligible, then you would have a close corporation.

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend does not quite seize the meaning of the section. If he will read section 7, and the wording is not changed under the amendment of the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Clarke), he will see that such persons only as are the owners or lessees of a mill, farmers and grain growers shall be eligible. And in addition such other persons as are by by-law hereinafter provided. But the by-law has nothing to do with the classes I have mentioned. They are eligible by the Act. The others are to be eligible by by-law.

Mr. PORTER. Does the hon. minister interpret the Bill to mean that all persons of the classes enumerated are eligible to become members?

Mr. FISHER. They are not shut out by the statute. Their entrance might be made so difficult that it would be hard for them to get in, but by the statute they are not shut out. The hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe) was quite correct in saying that the arrangement for entering the association is that two members must endorse the application. Then it is submitted to the executive committee and they pass upon it, and the impression is that they are only too glad to get everybody in they can.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. This goes further than the section in the present Act. Under the present Act only millers are entitled to become members. This extends to farmers as well. We are not limiting what they have but rather extending it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The motion of the hon. member for Essex is that clauses 6 and 7 be consolidated to read as follows:

Section 7 of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted:—

The members of the association shall consist of two classes: (a) Participating members, (b) Ordinary members.

2. The participating members shall consist of such members of the association as subscribe for and are allotted one or more shares of the capital stock of the association, the issue of which is provided for by section 3 of this Act, and such shares shall be entitled to preferred cumulative dividends to an amount not exceeding ten per cent per annum.

Ordinary members shall consist of such persons only as are owners of a mill for the manufacture of flour, meal or other similar commodities, or lessees of such a mill actually carrying on the business of milling therein, farmers and grain-growers and such other persons as are by by-law hereafter provided for.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I want clearly to understand the distinction between ordinary members and the others. An ordinary member, I understand, receives no dividends and pays nothing for the stock. The others are stock-holders and receive dividends.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. That is right.

Mr. BLAIN. When this matter was up for discussion last, it was referred back to the committee. May I ask the Minister of Agriculture, who is taking care of the farmers in particular, if their interests have been well guarded. When it was discussed in the House on a former occasion, the suggestion was made that possibly a further combine—if it may be called a combine—of the smaller millers of Canada would be detrimental to the interests of the farming community in the purchase of offal and the products of the ordinary mill. I am not offering criticism or objection further than to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) if, in his opinion, the farmers' interests are well taken care of, and it is clear that this will not be a combine of the millers against the farmers' interests.

Mr. FISHER. I am a member of the Private Bills Committee to which this Bill was referred back. The committee referred to a special subcommittee. I was not a member of that subcommittee, but I know what discussions went on there and was present at some of them. The question of the possibility of a combine, I think, is the most important question in connection with this Bill. The other provisions affect the future stock-holders or the present members of the Millers' Association, and I shall not give an opinion upon these because I think they are largely the concern of these people themselves. The possibility of a combine, however, has been attempted to be guarded against by an addition to clause 11 of the Bill providing as follows:

—if the association in any way fixes the prices at which its members shall buy or sell grain or other commodities in such a way as would have made the members of the association liable to the provisions of the Criminal Code or any other Act had they individually agreed together to the like effect, such members as acquiesce therein shall be liable under the provisions of the said Code or other Act, notwithstanding that such fixing of the price of grain or other commodities is the act of the association in the same way as if they had individually agreed together to do such acts.

I do not give a legal opinion, not being a lawyer, but this amendment seems to provide that if this association should take any action in the way of making a combine, each member of the association will be liable under the ordinary law.

Mr. PORTER. Is not that what the law now provides, even without this clause?

Mr. FISHER. I understand that the Criminal Code applies to individuals making what is considered by the law to be a combine. If the association, as an association, were to make such an arrangement, it is thought possible the criminal law might not apply—I do not say that it would or that it would not. But this makes it apply. Under these circumstances, it seems to me, without presuming to give a legal opinion, that the public will be in no worse position by reason of the passing of this Act. If that be the case, the danger of a combine is provided against.

Mr. SPROULE. I opposed this Bill before, and cited a case, but, I am free to admit, on information given me which was not correct. I believe the railway company was involved, not the Millers' Association. I understand that the rate given in the case I referred to was exactly the same rate that the Miller's Association was paying, and that they encountered the same difficulty as I did—that the railway company would not guarantee to put the freight through in any given time, not even in six weeks or three months. I was told of an instance of grain ordered from the west to be delivered in Ontario, which was not received for about three months. I would regard the Bill as distinctly beneficial to the agriculturists of Ontario to-day. And for this reason: The more western grain is purchased to be ground in mills in Ontario, the larger the amount of offal will be available for the Ontario farmers, and our farmers are principally feeders whose great requirement is more feed, more grain for their stock. To-day, feed can be got only in Ontario, or in the west, but principally in the west. Sometimes, you can get only a portion of a carload. If, instead of a few millions of bushels of grain brought down in the year, that was increased to twenty times as many, there would be twenty times the amount of feed to be had here. And the feed we get from the mills here is a better quality for feeding purposes—at least we think so—than what we get from the west.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SENATE AMENDMENTS TO PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to call the attention of the House to rule 113, which refers to amendments made by the Senate to private Bills. The rule is as follows:

When any private Bill is returned from the Senate with amendments the same not being merely verbal or unimportant such amendments are previous to the second reading referred to the standing committee to which such Bill was originally referred.

I fear that this rule has not been as rigidly adhered to as it is desirable, very frequently amendments which are in reality important being treated as 'verbal or unimportant.' Lengthy reference is made to this rule by Bourinot, pp. 794-5, to which I would call the attention of the hon. members. I shall be obliged in future to insist that this rule be more carefully observed than has recently been the custom. Bills Nos. 107, 61, 46, and 114 respectively, now before the House, should be referred to the proper committees before being concurred in. These four Bills contain important amendments, and under the rule I have read they should now be referred to the committee.

Mr. TALBOT. Does not this rule apply only to Bills having important amendments? We do not yet know what the amendments are.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am informed that in the present case the amendments are important.

Mr. LANCASTER. I think the question is one entirely for the Speaker to decide.

Mr. GRAHAM. I ask for information. When these Bills come back are they, as reported, referred to the Committee of the Whole House with certain instructions, or can they be again revived?

Mr. SPEAKER. I am informed that the committee can only consider amendments made by the Senate.

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 165) for the relief of Elmore Walker Scott.—Mr. Tolmie.

BOAR'S BACK POST OFFICE.

Mr. JAMESON:

Adverting to question as to Boar's Back post office, and the reply of the honourable Postmaster General to the effect that since the receipt of the petition of the 7th September, 1901, asking for the opening of an office there, an office had been opened within a short distance of Boar's Back, and that there would be even less need of a post office at

Boar's Back than there was in 1901—

1. What is the name of the new office referred to?

2. How far is it distant from Boar's Back?

3. When was it opened, and on whose recommendation?

4. Has no petition been received asking for the opening of a new post office at Boar's Back since 7th September, 1901?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX:

1 and 2. On inquiry it is found the department was in error in its statement that an office had been opened within a short distance of Boar's Back, the facts being that the office recently opened at Mayflower is west, not northwest, of Hectanooga, and therefore about seven and one half miles from Boar's Back, instead of one and one-half miles as supposed.

3. It was opened on the 1st August, 1907, on the recommendation of Mr. A. J. Copp.

4. There is no record of any petition subsequent to the one received at the department on the 7th September, 1901.

Further inquiry will now be made as to whether there has been any change in the circumstances which might render an office at this point more necessary.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ARMSTRONG:

1. How many post offices are located in federal owned buildings, and how many are housed in leased quarters?

2. Has the Post Office Department any system for rating post office employees in cities, towns and villages, as to their efficiency, faithfulness, general conduct, quantity of work employees perform, accuracy in doing it, and their general conpliance with postal regulations?

3. Has the government any knowledge of the salaries paid clerks and assistants in post offices in smaller cities, towns and villages of Canada? If not, when may we expect regulations dealing with their salaries and duties?

4. How many rural free mail delivery boxes has the government purchased, what are the names of the firms from whom they were purchased, the price of each, including the original cost, the date when purchased, amount of freight, express and duty paid, when delivered, number now on hand and the amount of storage?

5. How many routes on which rural free mail delivery has been established, did the government change from weekly to semi-weekly, and from semi-weekly to tri-weekly delivery?

6. Why does the government refuse to furnish locks for rural free mail delivery boxes, when the pamphlet issued advises all patrons that locks will be furnished at cost?

7. What amount of second-class mail matter was carried for the Post Office Department in 1909, and the amount of money collected for same?

8. What was the weight of government matter for departments other than post office, carried and charged to Post Office Department in the year 1909?

9. What was the total weight of franked mail matter in the year 1909?

10. What was the total amount paid railroads for carrying mail in 1896 and the total amount paid for the same purpose in 1909?

11. What was the total amount paid in subsidies and subventions to steamships in 1909?

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. In federal buildings, 174; In leased buildings, 10.

2. Yes, in city offices and semi-staff offices.

3. Not unless the office is on the city or semi-staff basis. Postmasters other than the above are paid by percentage on revenue, and are required to furnish whatever clerical assistance is necessary for the proper performance of the duties of their offices out of the emoluments they receive. The department does not purpose altering its policy in this regard.

4. (a) Number of boxes purchased, 10,000 boxes and fittings. (b) From whom purchased, International Mail Equipment Company, New York. (c) Price including cost, $3 per each box, and fittings complete. (d) Date when purchased 6,000 on August 14, 1908; 4,000 on September 18, 1909. (e) Amount paid for freight, express and duty, $10,028.32. (f) When delivered, first 6,000 between September, 1908 and January, 1909; second, 4,000, December, 1909. (g) Number now on hand and amount of storage, 3,486 boxes and fittings being stored without cost (257 at Ottawa, and 3,229 at Toronto).

5. (a) Weekly to semi-weekly 2. (b) Semi-weekly to tri-weekly 3.

6. In deciding not to furnish locks for these boxes, the department has been guided by the experience of the United States post office, where it was found that the use of locks and keys was a fruitful source of trouble, the locks becoming damaged, out of repair, &c., occasioning very much delay to the couriers in delivery, and adding materially to the cost of the service.

During the winter season, moreover, the danger of trouble with these locks from frost would be considerable, and the couriers would lose much time in locking and unlocking the boxes, several of the couriers employed by this department having signified their intention of discontinuing their contracts provided locks and keys were brought into use. Since deciding to discontinue the use of locks and keys on these boxes, the clause contained in the pamphlet issued to patrons by the department, advising that locks and keys would be furnished at cost if desired, has been eliminated.

7. The sum paid in cash for postage on newspapers during the year ended 31st March, 1909, was $133,773.23, but, having regard to free newspaper area, and the different rates chargeable on various classes of second-class matter, no information is available as to the quantity of second-class matter carried.

8. The department has no statistics on the subject.

9. The department has no statistics on the subject.

10. $1,285,353.18 in the year 1896; $1,750,017.76 in the year 1909.

11. $1,684,683.44.

ACCOUNT OF MR. L. F. CLARRY.

Mr. LENNOX asked:

Referring to the answer of the Minister of Railways given on the 17th February last, what is the total amount of the account of L. F. Clarry approved by the Department of Justice and standing for payment?

Mr. GRAHAM:

The whole amount of the account of Mr. L. F. Clarry for services rendered the Department of Railways and Canals, as approved by the Department of Justice, and standing for payment is $597.12. This amount includes $249.17 in respect of the eight claims mentioned in the answer of February 17, 1910, referred to in the question.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE—SERVANTS QUARTERS.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. Is it the intention of the government to tear down the stone cottages formerly occupied as servants' quarters at the R.M.C.?

2. Has any proposition been made or offer received by the government to remove the said cottages? If so, from what person or persons and on what terms?

3. Has the government received any request from any person for the stone in said cottages? If so, from whom and for what purpose?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

It is the intention to sell these buildings by public auction, at the market square, Kingston, at noon on Saturday, April 2, proximo, the purchaser to undertake to tear down and remove the buildings and to level the ground upon which they stand, to the satisfaction of the Commandant of the Royal Military College, by not later than June 1 next.

LEASE OF BUILDING FOR ORDNANCE STORES.

Mr. EDWARDS:

1. For what purpose has the government leased the building in Kingston formerly occupied by the Clarified Milk Company?

2. From whom was it leased, for how long and what is the annual rent to be paid?

3. Is the building being renovated at the expense of the owner or of the government?

4. Were tenders asked for the heating of the building? If so, to whom was the contract awarded and at what price?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

So far as question 1 is concerned, the building is required for ordnance store purposes.

The other three questions appertain to the Department of Public Works, as that Department leases the building and has carried out the repairs.

Mr. GRAHAM:

1. For additional ordnance stores.

2. (a) T. J. Polley; (b) five years, renewable for a further term of five years, with option to purchase at $10,000 within term of lease; (c) $1,000.

3. At the expense of the owner.

4. The heating apparatus was installed by the owner.

NAVAL SERVICE FOR CANADA.

Mr. MONK:

1. Have any petitions praying for the creation of a Canadian navy been received by the government? If so, from whom?

2. Have any petitions praying for the creation of a Canadian navy been received by the House of Commons? If so, from where?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER:

No petitions praying for the creation of a Canadian navy have been received by the government, nor by parliament, as neither the government nor parliament had to be reminded of such an obvious duty, as both the government and parliament have already expressed their determination to attend to it.

COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE THE PORK INDUSTRY.

Mr. S. SHARPE:

1. Did the government appoint a commission to investigate the pork industry in Europe or elsewhere?

2. If so, who composed the commission and what points have they visited?

3. What were the expenses of this commission?

4. Has the commission reported? If not, when may the House expect the report?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER:

1. Yes.

2. The commission consisted of W. W. Ballantyne, Stratford, Ontario; Wm. Jones, Zenda, Ontario; Gedeon Garceau, Three Rivers, Quebec; Joseph Rye, Edmonton, Alberta; J. E. Sinclair, Emerald, Prince Edward Island, and J. B. Spencer, of the Live Stock Branch, as secretary.

The commission visited England, Scotland, Ireland, Denmark and Holland.

3. $6,125.40.

4. The commission has reported. The report is now being printed and may be expected by the House during the first week in April.

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE ACT AMENDMENT.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Royal Military College Act, chapter 43 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by repealing section 7 and substituting therefor the following:—

7. The salaries, pay and allowances of the commandant and of the superior and subordinate staffs of the college shall be as fixed from time to time by the Governor in Council.—Sir Frederick Borden.

Hon. Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. (Minister of Militia and Defence). Mr. Chairman, this resolution is introduced for the purpose of founding upon it a Bill to amend the Royal Military College Act. The object, as indicated, is to leave to the Governor General in Council the fixing of the salaries. To-day, as a matter of fact, the salaries paid to the professors in the Royal Military College are all fixed by order in council, excepting that of commandant. It is proposed also by this Bill to withdraw the limitations as to the total amount of money to be expended in the college. There have been several amendments from time to time increasing the amount, which was limited in the first place by the Act, and later on increased as the college has grown and the expenses have increased, and it seemed to me that instead of having to come to parliament every few years, it would be better to leave the adjustment of the amount of salaries and of the expenses to the Governor General in Council. Each year after parliament assembles, a statement is laid before parliament under the law, and it is proposed to continue this part of the Act.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Would the minister kindly read the section?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN:

The details of such salaries shall appear in the annual report laid before parliament by the minister.

That part of the clause is continued. I will read the proposed Bill.

Mr. U. WILSON. Would the minister read what the law is now?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I will read the law as it is, and then I will read the proposed amendment. The existing law is:

The salary of the commandant shall not exceed $3,200 a year, and the salaries of the staff-adjutant, professors, instructors, assistant instructors and staff shall be fixed and may be readjusted from time to time by the Governor in Council, and shall not exceed the total sum of $30,000.

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. LANCASTER. It is now proposed to give the Governor in Council unlimited power as to the salary of the commandant.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes, just as with regard to other professors. The Auditor General has pointed out that in the last two or three sessions the amounts voted have been in excess of the amounts authorized by the Act, but of course this has been done with the consent of parliament.

Mr. BLAIN. Does the minister consider increasing the salaries?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. No, except in the case of the commandant. In connection with the general staff, which has been arranged in conjunction with the war office as part of the military scheme, it has been found desirable that an officer of a higher grade and standing should be at the head of the college. We must have a first-class officer, who has passed the staff college in England with a first-class certificate, and must pay him what he would be paid in the army.

Mr. LANCASTER. What is the total amount of salaries now paid?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. With allowances, about $51,000.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is it wise to give the Governor in Council unlimited power in regard to salaries? Would it not be well to place a limit, say of $60,000.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I accept the suggestion, although I thought there were sufficient safeguards through the voting of estimates by parliament each year. I am content to put the amount at $55,000 or $60,000 but I think it would be better at $60,000.

Mr. LANCASTER. What is the pay of the staff adjutant?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. $2,000.

Mr. LANCASTER. I would impress on the minister that it is important to have a staff adjutant of high qualifications and great tact. He has to act as the intermediary between the commandant and the cadets, to make the orders of the commandant effective, and should be a man of very high qualifications. I know that Staff Adjutant Lafferty was such a man and did more work than he was paid for, and the minister should always have a first-class man as staff adjutant.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I quite agree with my hon. friend. Captain Kaulbach, the present staff adjutant, is a son of the late Senator Kaulbach, a graduate of the Royal Military College, and well suited to perform those difficult duties.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I see that in the school that is being founded in Australia a condition is imposed that the cadets shall be at the absolute disposition of the country which gives them their education. Would it not be well to make it obligatory on these cadets to place themselves at the disposal of the country when their services are wanted for military purposes?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It is now. Graduates of the Royal Military College pass immediately into the active militia and within two years have to become connected with some corps of the active militia in Canada. Immediately their names pass into the Militia List and are there recorded for service if required. That has always been the case. Recently we have added a regulation that within two years these cadets must connect themselves with some definite corps and we also require them to attend two camps.

Mr. LANCASTER. Young men are a little retarded in doing that, as they sometimes cannot get lieutenancies because the positions are occupied by other gentlemen. I am not saying that these lieutenants should be removed, but if you want to get the services of your graduates you must devise some scheme of making vacancies without insulting somebody. My own son graduated last year. He has a good record for artillery and he wants to become lieutenant, but he cannot do so without asking for the resignation of some one else and that is something which no manly young man wants to do.

Mr. HUGHES. Under the rules to-day they can add a supernumerary to any battery.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Then, too, to-day we are giving a preference to graduates of the Royal Military College in our permanent force. Every month almost we are taking them on. Where there were two graduates of the Royal Military College in the permanent force of Canada fifteen years ago, I think there are seventy-five to-day, certainly seventy, in the employ of the Militia Department.

Mr. LENNOX. Does this resolution cover anything more than was covered by section 7?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It is an amendment of section 7 by eliminating the first part.

Mr. LENNOX. It does not say so.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It should.

Mr. LENNOX. (reading):

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Royal Military College Act, chapter 43 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by repealing section 7 and submitting therefor the following:—

7. The salaries, pay and allowances of the commandent and of the superior and subordinate staffs of the college shall be as fixed from time to time by the Governor in Council.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It is intended to leave the second part of that section.

Mr. LENNOX. The second part only provides that the detail of such salaries shall appear in the annual report laid before parliament. That is not what I was directing my attention to more particularly. As far as the range of officers is concerned, it is intended to provide for the payment of the same class of persons.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Not necessarily the same. As the college grows, more professors are necessary. It is the same class, but not limited as to numbers.

Mr. LENNOX. Under the Act, the salary of the commandant shall not exceed $3,200 a year, and the others $30,000, so that, under section 7 of the Act, we have a limitation of the amount to $32,200. Now the minister suggests that we should make the limitation $60,000.

Mr. LANCASTER. I understood the minister to say that he was already expending $51,000.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. $51,500 is what we shall require this year.

Mr. LENNOX. That is a pretty big jump from $33,200. We have a statute in force which provides that the salaries shall not exceed $33,200, and yet we are spending actually $51,500. We have been voting this larger expenditure, but our attention was not called to the statute in any way. Although I quite recognize the necessity for a change, and do not want to limit the salaries to an unfair amount, still we have been exceeding the statutory limit.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I stated frankly that we had, as we supposed, obtained the authority of parliament for our expenditure, and no attempt was made to conceal the fact that the Act in question was on our statutes.

Mr. HUGHES. The minister's wording of this is incorrect.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes, whoever drafted the Bill made a mistake. There was no intention to repeal the second part. I quite agree to the limitation suggested. Perhaps on the whole it is desirable for the department, as well as parliament, that there should be a limitation, and I think that the amount of $60,000 will be satisfactory for many years to come.

Mr. LANCASTER. The minister will still come down every year, and give the specific amounts.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Certainly.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The resolution is to be amended by inserting after the word 'repealing' the words 'of section 1 of'.

Mr. HUGHES. In case the Royal Military College were to be extended you would require a larger staff.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. We would have to come back to parliament.

Mr. HUGHES. I think it should be made much more serviceable than it has been. In place of having the small number of men who are there now, there should be a great deal many more.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. We have over 100 now. The examination to enter has become competitive. We have about thirty places each year, and fifty or more applications, so that the College is in a very sound condition, indeed.

Mr. LENNOX. You have only vacant room for thirty.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The number of each class is about thirty-three, and the course is three years. Thirty-three go out this year. We open the examinations to the whole country under certain conditions. Of the fifty or sixty who apply, we can only take thirty-three, and we take them in order of merit, so that the examination is competitive.

Mr. LENNOX. Would it not be better to take all who apply, and who can pass a fair examination?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. We have only places for 100.

Mr. LENNOX. If it is a good institution, I do not see why any young man who passes his examination, and is in a position to enter, should be denied that opportunity. The country cannot afford any extravagances, but can afford everything necessary for the education of its sons, and we ought not to limit the opportunities for education by the want of space, or teaching staff.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I agree in that view, but we are limited as to space.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the minister propose to amend this resolution by adding something to make the limitation $60,000?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The motion is to add the following words: Such salaries, pay and allowances as shall not exceed the total sum of $60,000.

Mr. J. HAGGART. You have the assent of His Excellency to the unlimited amount?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to draw attention to this aspect of the case. These cadets have on various occasions given exhibitions of their skill in drill, &c., in Toronto and Montreal. I am sure it would only be a trifling expense, heartily endorsed by parliament to bring them to Ottawa, so that the members and senators, the people's representatives, could see what these young men are capable of in the way of physical training. I would be pleased if the minister would give the House the details of the studies and exercises of these cadets. He owes that to the country, and it would be a good advertisement of the institution.

Mr. LANCASTER. The object of my hon. friend is all right, but it would be better attained by the members of parliament going to Kingston. I do not think it would be wise to bring a lot of cadets from their studies to exihibit themselves more or less as a circus for the benefit of members of parliament. The members of parliament ought to know how they live and what they are doing, and they could learn that a good deal better by going to Kingston. I would suggest that an arrangement should be made to take the members of parliament to Kingston on some Saturday, or several Saturdays, and there make themselves acquainted with the workings of the college. I believe that it would be better that the members should go to the college, and learn there the work that is being done. I think that we ought to encourage members of parliament to see the college. Many members, I believe, have a wrong impression of the benefits resulting from that institution, and if they went there, I think they would be agreeably surprised at the good work done.

Mr. EDWARDS. Are officers brought out from England given a preference in appointments over graduates in the Royal Military College? I understand that to be the case. It may be thought right to bring English officers out here to give our young men sound ideas, but, if the college is doing its work properly, I do not see why we should not have in this country young men who are qualified to take their places alongside of any in the world. If there is to be a preference, I think the preference should be given to Canadians.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Before answering my hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Edwards), I would like to say there is a great deal of merit in the suggestions made by both the hon. members who preceded him. I think it would be an excellent thing to have a visit from the Royal Military College cadets here, and I think it would be a better thing for hon. members to go to Kingston, and see the college. So far as I am concerned, I shall do everything in my power to further either of these ends. At this moment we are considering the question of having a visit from the college cadets in a short time. Something is going on here, and I believe it is rather desirable that the cadets should come. As to the other suggestion, I shall be glad to do what I can to arrange to have an excursion to visit the college, if any considerable number of members will make known their desire or their willingness to go.

Now, as to the selection of British officers, I am sure that my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) has no personal feelings against British officers.

Mr. EDWARDS. None whatever.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I may tell the hon. member that the former commandant was a Royal Military College graduate. And, while I am not going to discuss his regime, I will say that we have had more successful commandants. At the present time there are two officers of the staff who are Royal Military College graduates. True, they are British officers, but it seems to me that in supplying teachers for the college, men are required who have had experience in military matters of the highest character, and that is the kind of men we try to get. The present commandant is a man of first-rate qualifications. I hope the day will come when, through a process of exchange which is now being carried on, between the permanent force officers of Canada and the British army, and the officers of the permanent forces of Australia and India, and other parts of the empire, we shall have in our own college our own officers who have had experience of service abroad to a sufficient extent to make them efficient teachers. At the present moment, I think the course we are following is decidedly the best one.

Mr. EDWARDS. I was not referring—though I admit that there was nothing in my words to make that clear—to the higher officers such as the commandant, but to such officers as instructors. As an instance to illustrate what I mean, I may mention a gentleman by the name of Phillips, who, I am told, was brought out in 1909, as instructor of gunnery in Halifax. I understand that he took his qualifying course twelve years ago, and three years is supposed to be the period after which a man gets behind the times—I am not much of a military man, but that is what I am informed. Again, the officers who come here from England are granted two months leave of absence, while our own Canadians are granted only one month's leave. Yet these Canadians have passed the qualifying examinations of the Royal Military College, and I think we have a right to assume that those examinations are of a high enough standard to prove that the men have the qualifications to fill vacancies that occur from time to time. I am told that two of the graduating class wished to take commissions in the artillery——

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. This of which the hon. member is speaking, does not relate to the Royal Military College, I think.

Mr. EDWARDS. These were graduates of the Royal Military College, and, in that respect, I think this pertains to the subject. I am told that two of the graduating class wished to take commissions in the artillery, and though there were, according to the militia list, five vacancies, only one position was given to a graduate of the college. If that sort of thing be true, it may be all right. I confess I am not a military man, but looking at it from the standpoint of a non-military man, I think it is not right.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Were these vacancies all filled?

Mr. EDWARDS. I do not know.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. They were not.

Mr. EDWARDS. How many of them were filled?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I cannot say exactly; but I can say that, owing to not having sufficient and, perhaps, not really requiring officers at that particular time, these vacancies were not all filled. There are always vacancies in the permanent force—sometimes as many as fifteen. But I will look into the case to which the hon. member has referred. I am glad that he has brought it up. But, meantime, I may tell the hon. member that we give preference to graduates of the Royal Military College, if they are recommended by the commandant over and above every other person and regardless of any consideration except that of merit.

Mr. EDWARDS. I think that is very fair. I would ask the minister to look into the case of T. F. Grant. I believe he stood at the head of his class in the Royal Military College at Kingston, he came out at the top of the graduating class; and I am informed that he resigned as a protest against the advancement of an Englishman by the name of Ellison, who was brought out in 1906.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I remember the case. Ellison was an English officer, who was stationed at Esquimalt, who had had considerable experience, and he was appointed because we thought it was more in the interest of the public that he should be appointed. It is sometimes necessary for us to ask for the loan of an imperial officer, because at the moment we have not qualified officers of our own. We borrow these officers for a period, and if, at the end of that time, we have a Canadian officer who is fit for the position, he gets it. I remember the case of a young Grant, and we are very sorry to lose him. I think he made a great mistake in going out.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 180) to amend the Royal Military College Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SALE OF BABY FARM.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to authorize the Governor in Council: (a) To sell and dispose of the Baby farm, situate in the township of York, in the county of York, and province of Ontario, the acquisition of which was ratified by chapter 51 of the statutes of 1908. The purchase moneys received from the purchaser of the said land to be appropriated and used for the purchase of a site and the construction of barracks and buildings thereon for the housing of the militia and other military purposes in, or in the vicinity of, the city of Toronto. (b) To sell and dispose of that parcel of land situate in the municipality of Assiniboia, in the province of Manitoba, and now used and known as the Winnipeg rifle range. The purchase moneys received from the purchaser of the said range to be appropriated and used for the purchase of land for a rifle range in, or in the vicinity of, the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Two years ago a Bill was passed by this House of a similar character, by which the government was enabled to sell certain properties, one in the city of Montreal and one in the city of Toronto, and utilize the proceeds for military purposes as stated in that Bill. This resolution proposes the sale of a property owned by the Militia Department, in or near the city of Toronto, known as the Baby farm. There are several reasons why we wish to sell this property. One is that it is not quite large enough. We are establishing in Toronto a new depot for the permanent force, and we want to have that depot advantageously situated. This farm was purchased for $20,000, it contains 160 acres, and we can sell it to-day for $160,000. So the country will have a very fair profit. I do not think it wise to state exactly where the property is situated which we propose to purchase, but it is situated near the city of Toronto, and in a position even more favourable than that of the Baby farm. It is very accessible, and in every way advantageous. It is proposed to acquire that property by expropriation, and steps will be taken to do that as soon as this legislation is assented to.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN.

Mr. WALLACE. Where will it be?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I would rather not state that, because I am afraid the price of land might go up in that locality. But I have had the country examined all around adjacent to Toronto, and a very suitable place has been found.

Mr. JAMESON. What is the estimated cost?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. It is expected that we can buy the property we want for about one-third the price that we will get for this property. It will contain from 300 to 600 acres.

Mr. J. HAGGART. If you are going to expropriate it, why do you decline to tell us where it is?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. I think it is undesirable, even in that case.

Mr. LANCASTER. I suppose the government will sell this property privately, for any price they choose?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. No, we will ask for bids. We will advertise it for sale, but probably we will not sell it by public auction.

Mr. LANCASTER. Has the minister had any valuations made of it? Because $1,000 an acre is not a very large price for land in the suburbs of Toronto.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. We bought this property less than four years ago for $20,000. There are no buildings very near it.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will the hon. gentleman have a valuation made, and fix a reserve bid?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Certainly, we propose to sell it openly.

Mr. WALLACE. Do I understand the minister to say that all the moneys received from the sale of these lands will be used in building?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes, every dollar.

On paragraph (b),

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The same thing is true of the second part. The rifle range at Winnipeg is rather near the city, and we have not land enough there. With the strength of the modern up to date cartridges, the danger area is very much greater than it used to be, and we have been notified that it will be necessary to buy more land. We find that to buy land adjacent to the rifle range would cost as much as it will cost if we sell this land, go a little farther out of the city and buy about three times the amount of land, which will enable us to have a rifle range there and to move our depot if we choose, from the city of Winnipeg, which we will have to do in the near future. It will not cost the country a dollar, and it will be as convenient as the present range is to-day, because it is on the same line of electric railway.

Mr. WALLACE. Have you a new site for the rifle range?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. Yes, we have selected the land. I do not know that it has been made public yet.

Mr. JAMESON. Is it the policy of the department to sell or lease lands of the department which are not used?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. If the military authorities report that these lands are never likely to be required, and a reasonable price can be secured, the policy would be to sell them, but the policy since I came into office has been to lease them on condition that the department can take them over at short notice.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the minister had under consideration the removal of the troops from St. Johns, Quebec, and the selling of some public buildings there?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. No, that has been reported in the newspapers, but it has not been under consideration.

Mr. WALLACE. What will be done with the present Stanley barracks site?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The barracks have been sold to the city.

Mr. JAMESON. In regard to the leasing of the lands of the department, is that done openly after tender, or is there any competition for them, or does it just happen that any person who makes application and is esteemed satisfactory by the officers of the department is allowed to lease these lands?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. That would depend. A good many leases have been given without competition because the lands were not believed to be valuable. I usually leave that to the officer commanding. I believe there are some lands at Digby. I think the officer at Halifax would require to go there and make a report, and we would be guided very much by his report. We always put into the leases a provision that the department can take possession, without having to pay for buildings or improvements, at any time it sees fit, for military purposes.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 181) to authorize the sale or other disposal of certain public lands, and the acquisition of certain other lands in or in the vicinity of the cities of Toronto and Winnipeg, respectively.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

SMELTING OF ZINC ORES.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to enable the Governor in Council to authorize the expenditure of a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars for investigating the processes used in the production of zinc, for making experiments, and for any other purpose that may be deemed advisable for the promotion of the production and manufacture in Canada of zinc and zinc products from Canadian ores.—Mr. Templeman.

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN. The Bill which will be introduced on the passage of this resolution will provide for the diversion of $50,000 from the fund for present lead-bounty fund, for the purposes stated in the resolution. About $2,500,000 was voted several years ago for a bounty on lead and about $1,000,000 of that is still in the treasury. Lead and zinc are so closely allied, particularly in the ores in British Columbia, that the lead miners are deeply interested in the handling of the zinc product, and this proposal has the approval of all the lead mining interests. Upon a petition presented to the government and backed up by the lead mining interests, this step has been deemed advisable. The money is to be expended under the control of the Department of Mines. There are numerous metallurgical difficulties connected with the smelting of zinc. The presence of zinc is a detriment to the lead ores, and in this country the zinc product is absolutely lost under the present system of smelting, although zinc is the more valuable mineral of the two, quantity for quantity. It is proposed to investigate all known methods of electrical smelting of zinc. There are at present in Europe some new processes, one has been in use for years and the others are comparatively new, so that it is not known whether these are commercially successful or not. There have been two attempts at zinc smelting in British Columbia, one the well known process of smelting in retorts, and the other an electric process whereby it was hoped by the one operation to separate the lead and zinc in smelting, getting from the smelter the lead bullion and zinc bullion. That smelter was carried on experimentally for several years, but only with measurable success. The desire of the mining men of the Kootenay is that the Department of Mines should carry to completion the experimentation that has gone on thus far in the zinc smelter at Nelson. After a thorough investigation of all well known processes, the one which is best adapted to the condition of Canadian ores will be adopted. I believe the object to be a very laudable one.

Mr. SPROULE. How will these investigations be carried on?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We hope that the investigations in Europe will be carried on by Mr. Harbord, a mining engineer of the city of London, who was on the commission which this government sent to Europe some years ago, and who is now employed investigating for the British government in South Africa. We have been in communication with this gentleman, and we hope to secure his services. The investigations in this country will be under Dr. Haanel, who will no doubt obtain the services of the best metallurgists he can in this country or elsewhere.

Mr. SPROULE. Where will the experiments be carried on?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. If we come to the conclusion that the electrical process may be applied to the refractory low grade ores of British Columbia, the further experiments will in all probability be carried out at Nelson, British Columbia, where an electric smelter with all the necessary equipment, as well as the electrical power, has been offered to us free of charge, for the purpose of experimentation. I assume that these experiments will be carried on at Nelson, although we want to have a free hand to carry them on in the city of Ottawa, or at any well equipped laboratory of a university, if we deem it wise to do so.

Mr. SPROULE. Has Dr. Haanel made any success of the experiments in smelting iron by electricity?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The smelting of iron by electricity is an accomplished fact.

Mr. SPROULE. But there has been no practical application of it?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Oh yes, it is carried on in Europe to a considerable extent, and to some extent in the United States, but its application is more to the manufacture of steel than of iron. The chief problem in electric smelting in this country is to get cheap electricity. If electricity can be produced cheaper than heat can be generated by the ordinary process there is no question at all but that electricity will quickly supersede the ordinary process of smelting iron.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN.

Mr. SPROULE. In view of the extensive water-powers in British Columbia you ought to have the cheapest electricity in the world.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We have also large deposits of coal in British Columbia, but strange to say electrical power is not quite so cheap in British Columbia at present as it is in Ontario. British Columbia is an enormous country in extent, and some of the water-powers are not contiguous to the iron. Progress has been made in the electrical smelting of iron, but I do not think Canada has taken advantage of the knowledge obtained along that line. Of course, the development of iron mines and the smelting of iron involves the expenditure of millions of capital.

Mr. BLAIN. Will any portion of this grant be used to send a commission to the old country to make an examination of conditions there?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. This matter has been under consideration for some considerable time, but it is not the intention of the department to send any one to Europe. There are metallurgical engineers fully conversant with the industry whose services can be obtained at comparatively little cost. We will obtain the latest information as to the development that has taken place in the smelting of zinc ore, but it will not be necessary to send a commission to Europe. The necessity is more apparent now than it was a few years ago. Formerly, zinc ores went to the United States from Canada at a comparatively low duty, but under the Payne-Aldrich tariff the duty was made prohibitive. Hence the necessity to provide some method of handling in this country these zinc products. This money is being diverted from the lead bounty. The beneficiaries of the lead bounty are practically the beneficiaries of this, as lead and zinc go hand in hand, zinc being a great detriment to the lead men, and absolute waste at present, so that all those who profit by the lead bounty have virtually asked the government to take $50,000 off it and carry on the work of experimenting in zinc production and manufacture.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. As I understand the ore formerly went to the United States and was smelted there, with every satisfaction to the producers of zinc ore in British Columbia, this $50,000 is practically a bonus to a smelter in that western country. Is not that the situation?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Of course it is not, as my hon. friend will see if he reads the resolution. Only a comparatively small quantity of zinc ore ever went from British Columbia to the United States. There is a vast quantity of low grade ore which cannot be concentrated sufficiently to pay the cost of transportation, and we propose to devote this money to the purpose mentioned in the resolution, and no other. We could not possibly give one dollar of it to subsidize a smelter in British Columbia. It will take several years to expend the money, and the entire amount will be spent by the Department of Mines in carrying out the objects of the resolution.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The last clause distinctly says 'and for any other purpose that may be deemed advisable for the promotion of the production and manufacture in Canada of zinc and zinc products from Canadian ores.' Would not that justify the inference I have made?

Mr. LENNOX. What does the minister aim at in using the language my hon. friend has just quoted?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We aim, in the first place, at a full investigation of the known electrical processes of smelting zinc. We aim at a full examination into the zinc and zinc products in Canada. We aim also at a full examination of the known deposits in Canada to ascertain what tonnage we could have to keep a smelter running. In addition, we aim at carrying on experiments by the department, under properly qualified men, if we can get them—and there are not so many—who have a knowledge of the electrical processes of smelting zinc, and we expect to carry on that experimentation in Nelson, where a smelter already exists, the use of which has been offered the department for that purpose. It may be necessary to ask some of the metallurgists of the School of Mines in Kingston or at other places to carry on certain experimentations in order to ascertain whether it is possible for them to separate lead and zinc at one process, and it may be necessary for them to call in the assistance of other experts.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. minister should then have no objection to strike out the words 'and for any other purpose.'

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I do not know what effect that would have. I want to have the fullest liberty and authority to spend the money for the purposes I have named. There is no intention to bonus any zinc smelter, and you could not possibly bonus one with this sum. We have no objection to prohibiting the use of any of this money for bonuses for any zinc industry, for that is not contemplated.

Mr. BEATTIE. Has the hon. minister received any intimation of a discovery of zinc ore in the counties of Grey and Bruce, Ontario? I have had some letters on that subject, and I understand they have a very good sample of zinc, but they want some assistance in working the prospect out. Is it the intention of the minister to give any such assistance?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The very thing that the Department of Mines is trying to do is to afford assistance to the mining industry, but not financial assistance. We attempt work of research, experimentation and publication; we try to show the way in which things are to be done, that the mining interests may take advantage of the information placed at their disposal to develop our mineral resources. I am aware that there are considerable zinc deposits in Ontario, and have had some letters on the subject since this resolution was placed on the order paper; but in the case of the zinc industry in Ontario, as well as in British Columbia, we can only assist by showing the way—that is, if we can manage to solve the questions ourselves. But the problem is one in which we cannot be sure of success altogether. When you take up the question of electric smelting, you are up against considerable difficulties. I think it most likely that we shall require all this money for the purpose contemplated. I can assure the House, and my hon. friends opposite, that I do not desire to change the wording. The Bill which will be submitted to the House on the passage of this resolution, was prepared by the Deputy Minister of Justice, and the notice on the order paper was prepared by the law clerk, The notice practically follows the wording of the Bill. But, not being a lawyer, I am rather chary of giving consent to striking out words when such a change, though apparently, innocent enough, may have the effect of rendering the Bill nugatory.

Mr. BEATTIE. But the point is that the minister is going to place his smelter in British Columbia, where it can hardly be expected to treat the ores of Ontario. And I have understood that it is too expensive to send this ore for treatment to the United States. If the smelter had been more centrally placed, I think the minister's position in this matter would be much stronger.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Of course, the question of where the smelter is to be placed is purely an economic problem. A smelter for zinc ores, or for any other ores, must be so placed that power will cost as little as possible. It may be possible to haul the ore a long distance where you get cheap power. One of our serious problems, in western Canada at all events, is to combine all the conditions. One of the great difficulties in British Columbia was that the cost of operating the Frank smelter was too great, although there were other defects. That may be found to be the case with electric smelting also. But the conditions must be learned. In the smelting of iron, it is sometimes cheaper to take the iron to the coal than the coal to the iron.

Mr. BEATTIE. I am glad the minister mentioned the subject of cheap power, for, that being so important, I think he will find that the city of London is the best place for the smelter. We have excellent conditions there, and we expect to have the Niagara power at very cheap rates. Of course, I cannot vouch for that. But I do not know of a better place thon London for such an industry, and I trust he will take it into his careful consideration.

Mr. LENNOX. We do not wish to embarrass the minister by urging him to strike out words, for I can well understand that sometimes it is difficult to know just what the effect of striking out words will be. However, the minister can probably obviate that by giving us information which we are entitled to have, and which he has no doubt at his fingers' ends. I understood him to say that he would require the whole of this $50,000 for the purposes indicated.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The hon. member (Mr. Lennox) is pausing for an answer. That means 'yes' or 'no.' I said I had no doubt that this money would be needed. If we are going into experiments in electrical smelting, it is very difficult to estimate how much money may be expended. Frankly, I admit that this whole $50,000 may be expended, and no positive results in regard to electric smelting may be obtained. The House ought to understand that. But, on the other hand, we might hit upon a plan of smelting before we had exhausted the $50,000. So, I do not say absolutely that we shall require all this money, but I believe the probabilities are that we shall require it, and more.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister, I think, has hardly treated us fairly. When he comes to ask for $50,000, he does not ask it for pocket money, to spend or not to spend as may happen; he is asking for something which he knows he will want, in other words, he has some plan, some estimate, showing how the money is expected to be applied. He says he wants $50,000 for experimental purposes. Well, we have the right to know, and, of course, he wants to tell us, to what purposes he proposes to apply the money. If he does not know, even in a general way, to what purposes he intends to apply it, he has no right to ask for it, and we have no right to grant it. What I ask the minister to do is to give us the various items of this proposed expenditure. We shall then be in a position to judge whether it is our duty to join with him in the appropriation of this money, or whether we should oppose him in it. I have stated this in support of his plea against striking out words in this resolution.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. There is an estimate, but I did not suppose it would be required at this stage, and did not bring it with me. This is merely the introductory resolution. If my hon. friend will accept the explanation he asks for on the second reading of the Bill, I shall be glad to give it then.

Mr. LENNOX. I take the minister's word, and am quite willing that the course he proposes should be taken.

Mr. GOODEVE. I am aware of the difficulties that have been met in finding methods for the treatment of zinc ores. I feel inclined to agree with the minister, particularly as I understand that a portion of this money will be taken from the grant already passed by parliament for treating lead ores. That grant has proved very beneficial not only to this particular industry but to the Dominion as a whole. Heretofore all the lead for paints ground in oil were imported from the United States; but, I am glad to say, that we have very large works of this kind established in Montreal, so that a large portion of the lead used in Canada is mined, smelted, ground and manufactured in the Dominion. As to zinc ores, I can speak with some little knowledge, because our own government has expended a good deal of money trying to discover an electric process of treating these ores. One of our difficulties is that, owing to the action of the United States, we have found it difficult to market the lead ores containing zinc. Particular ores containing a certain percentage of zinc are practically prohibited by the duties, so we are unable to take out the slocan ore which contains a large percentage of zinc. The result is that many of the mines have been closed down, and many others have large dumps of second-class ore containing zinc in their composition, but as they cannot be treated in any way they are now comparatively a waste product. If by assistance from the government we can devise a process whereby these ores can be treated, it would be of great benefit to the whole Dominion, and a great stimulus to the production of zinc in our own country. On that ground I will support the proposition of the minister. I may add from my experience of this question that it is difficult to say just how much experiments of that kind would cost. We have spent large sums of money, many of us have lost money in trying to discover successful processes; and the feeling is that as the project is a benefit to the whole people of Canada, it is a subject of fair consideration by the government. It is on that ground that representations were made to the minister asking a grant of this nature. These experiments cost a lot of money, and sometimes produce little results, but we have to do these things if we are going to develop mining in our country. We were the first country to adopt the electroclytic process in the refining of lead, and the result is that we are now doubling the capacity of one of the largest smelters on the American continent, and we are turning out the purest lead produced on the American continent. I have thought it well to give these few facts to the House in order to induce the House to support the minister in the object he has in view.

Mr. LENNOX. I sympathize with the view presented by the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve). But what I desire to say to the minister is that when he comes and asks us for money he should be able to set forth a method by which he proposes to spend the money. I will be prepared to join in expending far more than $50,000 for the development of mining. But when the minister asks us for money I ask him to tell us how he proposes to spend it. I do not know anything about this particular grant of money, but I regard $50,000 for the purpose of developing any useful industry as a very small sum of money. I will be glad to assist the minister in getting a larger sum of money so long as the plan he outlines to parliament seems calculated to benefit the country. I could apply in this case that hackneyed expression so often used in railroading Bills through this House, that the development of mining in British Columbia, or anywhere else in Canada, is a work for the general advantage of Canada. I am heartily in accord with any proposition for the development of mining, and I hope the minister will bring down information to show us that this money is going to be wisely expended.

Mr. HERRON. I desire to ask the minister if the government has done anything towards investigating the zinc smelter enterprise in the town of Frank. It was to some extent a failure when first established. It is a very extensive plant.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The government has not investigated the zinc smelting industry in the town of Frank, but I think that mining men of the country generally have investigated it. It was a failure, probably built on the wrong lines to smelt the zinc ores of the Kootenay country. At all events, it was a metallurgical and financial failure, and if I am not mistaken the plant has been dismantled.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 182) respecting the payment of bounties on lead contained in lead-bearing ores mined in Canada, and to promote the production in Canada of zinc.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

House in committee on Bill (No. 102) respecting immigration—Mr. Oliver.

On paragraph (k): stowaway.

Mr. OLIVER moved:

That the word 'conveyance' in the 20th and 21st lines of paragraph (k) be struck out and the word 'vehicle' substituted.

Mr. U. WILSON. This clause is about the same as one in the American Act, is it not?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not answer that question as to its being exactly the same, but it is very much the same as in the Bill of last year. The principle is the same.

Section as amended, agreed to.

On section 3, prohibited classes of immigrants.

Mr. OLIVER moved:

That after the word 'citizen' in the 2nd line there be inserted the words 'or has Canadian domicile.'

He said: We have established a meaning for the word 'domicile,' for the purpose of permitting British subjects who have established their residence in Canada to claim the same rights as Canadian citizens on their return, and it is proper that these words should be inserted here carrying out that idea. Canadian domicile is acquired by a three years' residence in Canada.

Mr. BARKER. Do I understand the minister to mean that a British subject acquires the right of domicile by residence?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. U. WILSON. Are you going to stick to the three years' qualification?

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to.

Mr. U. WILSON. I am sorry for that. In Great Britain it takes five years to become a citizen of Great Britain. In the United States it is five years, and they wish to make it longer.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Can the minister by this Act make a foreigner a British subject?

Mr. OLIVER. All we do in this is to give the privilege of Canadian citizenship to a man, who although not born in Canada has resided here for three years.

Mr. BARKER. And who had already been a British subject?

Mr. OLIVER. He need not have been a British subject. If he has lived in Canada for three years he has thereby established Canadian domicile.

Mr. BARKER. He is not naturalized by that?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. BLACK. What do you mean by the words 'loathsome disease'?

Mr. OLIVER. The disease which is most frequently met with is trachoma, which is rather loathsome than dangerous.

Mr. BLACK. The word 'loathsome' as used there simply expresses the condition of the nervous system of the person who is looking at the disease. A medical man would not consider any disease loathsome.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. What word would the hon. gentleman suggest in lieu of 'loathsome'?

Mr. BLACK. It is not necessary at all; the words contagious and infectious are sufficient.

Mr. OLIVER. While there may be no scientific warrant for the use of the word I think it will be found very desirable to retain it for the purpose of administering the Act.

Mr. SPROULE. There are diseases which are neither contagious nor infectious, but which are loathsome, such as cancer and ulcers. I do not think you could select a better word.

Mr. BLACK. I do not think trachoma would be loathsome in the eyes of a medical man. From a medical point of view there is not any such thing as disgusting or loathsome disease.

Mr. OLIVER. In connection with this section I might say that it has been urged that it is too restrictive in that it purports to restrict the landing of persons to whom money has been loaned. If the restriction were confined to loans by charitable organizations, it would probably meet all necessary requirements. Loans advanced by a friend should not come under this prohibition.

Mr. BARKER. What is the distinction?

Mr. OLIVER. A loan that is given by one friend to another is a different thing from a loan given by a charitable organization in carrying out the purposes of the organization.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. I do not think that persons should be excluded simply because they borrow money. It is quite sufficient to restrict those who are sent out here by charitable organizations who may wish to get rid of them.

Mr. SPROULE. Recently a number of Scotchmen landed in Canada who had not sufficient money to comply with the requirements of the Act, and the money was furnished by a Scottish society. What position would these men be in under this Act?

Mr. OLIVER. That was not a loan by a charitable organization for the purpose of sending out these immigrants.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. And it was given after they landed in Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think it would be right to make a restriction that would shut out such persons who were aided by their compatriots in this country.

Mr. CROSBY. As a matter of fact quite a number of immigrants secure passage from the steamship companies to the ocean port in Canada, and they may want to go to Toronto or Winnipeg, or some western point, but have not sufficient money, although they may be otherwise desirable immigrants. The steamship agent will say to them, you have plenty of money to go to Halifax or St. John, and we will give you passage, and these people assume that once they land in Canada, they will have no difficulty in reaching any place to which they intend going. Frequently families of that kind, good people, have come to Canada, and have been assisted by our national societies. We have in Halifax three such societies, the Charitable Irish Society, the North British Society, and the St. George's Society, organized principally for the purpose of assisting such needy immigrants, their own compatriots. There was a case the other day to which my hon. friend from Grey (Mr. Sproule) has just referred. The North British Society took that case up and furnished those people with sufficient money to get to their destination. There is no doubt that they were people of very creditable character as immigrants, and it would have been a great hardship had they been turned back, and, under the strict letter of the law, they would have had to be deported. I think that the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia interested himself in their behalf. There should be some provision to enable such immigrants to get to their destination. I think there is a case of the kind now in St. John, of a man who has been there some eight or ten days. His brother-in-law, who is a well-to-do citizen in Toronto, wired sufficient money to qualify him, but there is this difficulty. that, according to the strict letter of the law, he should be deported. I am sure that the minister must have had many demands made on him in regard to the character of immigrants. When a man is of good character, and shows cause why he should not be deported, and has friends, as sometimes happens, who are prepared to help him there should be some way of preventing his being deported as an undesirable immigrant.

Mr. OLIVER. This section, as it stands, represents the position which the government take to-day, and which it enforces under orders in council, which are authorized by the present Act. It was with the desire to place upon the statute the policy of the government, so that whatever might be done would be done in the light of day, that we proposed this section. I quite appreciate the fact that many a good man is poor, and that, if poverty were a bar to admission into this country, many of us would have been excluded, but this provision was rendered necessary by the conditions which arose in the fall of 1907, and which would very likely arise again if it were not enforced. Everybody will remember that in the winter of 1907, there was a great deal of distress in many cities of Canada among newly arrived immigrants, and the Immigration Department was subjected to a great deal of very severe criticism in consequence. We found that the large majority of these cases arose as the result of the efforts of charitable organizations operating on the other side. There had been a good demand for labour in Canada during the summer, and there was considerable dearth of employment in the old country. The charitable organizations there spent in consequence considerable money in sending out their unemployed to Canada, where employment was found for them during the summer months; but as soon as employment began to slacken in the fall of 1907, we had this large number of people on our hands, and had nothing for them to do. A great deal of distress resulted, and a great deal of harsh criticism on the Immigration Department, and the cause of legitimate immigration to Canada was seriously injured in England by the reports that went back of this distress. An order in council was then passed prohibiting people, who had been assisted by charitable organizations, from landing in this country, unless before sailing they had passed inspection, and been approved by our immigration officers. I am quite aware that cases of hardship arise, and would be very glad if we could find some means of avoiding these cases, but that does not seem possible. We found the provision we made by order in council not only necessary, but useful. I believe it absolutely saved the situation in Canada, and I would like to see that provision embodied in this Act so that all the world would see exactly what our policy is.

Mr. JAMESON. Would this provision interfere in any way with the measures which the Salvation army has been taking lately in the way of aiding immigration to this country?

Mr. OLIVER. The Salvation army complies with this requirement. They always have the people in whom they are interesting themselves pass inspection in the old country before our immigration officers; and of course, once they pass that inspection, we become responsible for the character, and standing of these immigrants, and they are allowed to enter at our ports. Some other charitable organizations comply with that provision also. We do not forbid the bringing in of people by charitable organizations, but they must first pass an inspection on the other side by our officers.

Mr. JAMESON. I think that is very proper.

Mr. CROSBY. We have in Halifax three incorporated societies, not exclusively charitable, but national as well, which assist people of their nationality who come to this country. Very often when a family of such people land in Halifax or St. John, they imagine that they are close to every place in Canada. Take the case of a family of Irish people coming to this country, intending to go to Toronto or Winnipeg to join friends, but without the necessary money. We have frequently supplied the funds to take these people to their destination, and in many cases have afterwards received the money back from them. None of these incorporated societies would take hold of a family, and forward them to their destination without being reasonably sure that they were suitable immigrants for this country. The Charitable Irish Society, and the North British Society were established a hundred and fifty years ago to help immigrants coming to this side—sometimes they have received people who were shipwrecked on the coast of Nova Scotia, and sent them forward to their destinations. I think that these societies would be perfectly willing to give any reasonable guarantee in the case of the people they assist. But some regulation should be incorporated in the Bill to provide for cases of this kind so that desirable immigrants may not be deported.

Mr. STRATTON. I think there is something in what the hon. member for Halifax has just stated. I have known of cases of hardship in my own riding It sometimes happens that people having a father or brother coming from the old country are not in a position to supply the $25 referred to, but they were ready to put up bonds that, if these people should ever become a public burden, they would undertake to send them back. Yet, in the face of that, these immigrants have been deported to the great regret of their friends. Such cases are certainly cases of hardship. It seems to me, however, that the only way in which we can meet them is by the appointment of intelligent agents, and giving these agents some little latitude to discriminate between the desirable and undesirable.

Mr. BARKER. We are getting a little ahead of the Bill. I think that under section 13, providing for a board of inquiry where an immigrant has been rejected, the minister has made provision to meet such cases. We can discuss the matter more understandingly on that section.

Mr. T. CHISHOLM. If this section be amended by making it refer to assistance by a charitable organization, should it not be made clear that it applies to charitable organizations in Canada?

Mr. OLIVER. This section applies only to organizations outside of Canada. It provides that, in the case of parties aided by charitable organizations, they must be inspected and approved by our officers on the other side of the water, or we do not allow them to land here. We assume that a charity-aided immigrant is an undesirable immigrant, and the burden of proof of the contrary is on him. We provide means for trying out cases on the other side of the water. With regard to what my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Crosby) has said, I may explain that if the people are of the class and character suitable for farm work, we do not require them to have any money in possession, we only require that they should be able to reach their work.

Mr. SPROULE. How about domestic servants?

Mr. OLIVER. They are in the same position as farm help. Everybody recognizes that there is need of farm labour and domestic service, and we impose no restriction as to money qualifications in these cases. But there is a clear distinction between these and other classes who come, and we think that when people come in to engage in other callings it is right that there should be a proper safeguard that they will not become a public burden.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. What classes does the government bonus now?

Mr. OLIVER. Farmers, farm labour, and domestic service.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. Have you dropped the railway navies?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, over a year ago.

Mr. SPROULE. Would fraternal or national societies come under this clause?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly, if they are on the other side of the water.

Mr. SPROULE. I know some such societies on this side that contemplate bringing out immigrants, selecting desirable ones.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no objection whatever, provided their efforts are directed to securing farmers, farm assistants or domestic help.

Mr. SPROULE. And people of these classes are not required to have the $25 on landing?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. SPROULE. Nor do you take a bond from the society that they shall not become a public burden?

Mr. OLIVER. No. We know that there is such a demand for this class of people, that, if they are sound physically and of reasonably good disposition, there is no question as to their getting employment.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. The clause as amended should be acceptable to the House. We have been trying for years to have only a desirable class of immigrants come into this country, and I think we might reasonably go a little too far in that direction rather than stop short. It is most desirable to keep up the standards of our people.

Mr. GOODEVE. A case arose in the town of Trail, which is next to my own town. Some Italians communicated with me with regard to some of their friends coming out from Italy. These people landed in New York. Some had bought their tickets through to British Columbia, while others had bought only to New York. They were held by the agent there. A number of telegrams passed between myself and Mr. Scott, the commissioner of immigration. I learned that all these immigrants got through except one, and as to that one I did not get any definite answer. I may say that one of the men who communicated with me on the subject was an expert metallurgist, a man in good position. I desire to ask the minister on what ground people would be refused admission under the circumstances to which I have referred?

Mr. OLIVER. That was under a short amendment of the Immigration Act that was passed in the session before last, what is called the indirect passage provision. It provides that we may exclude immigrants who come otherwise than by direct passage, or on a through ticket purchased in the country of which they are citizens. I suppose I may mention the reasons for this somewhat peculiar provision. The necessity arises from the exigencies of deportation. If an undesirable arrives and is rejected after he has been in the country for some time, we then call upon the transportation company which brought him here to take him back to the country to which he belongs. But, if the transportation company which brought him into Canada did not bring him from the country to which he belongs, then we cannot compel them to take him back to that country. We can only compel them to take him back to the country they brought him from, and if he was an undesirable in our country he may be just as undesirable in that country. So in order to secure ourselves we had this amendment passed, which gave us a right to exclude passengers who arrive otherwise than by direct passage or on through tickets purchased in the country in which they were citizens. That is the general statement. The particular condition was that there was a prospect, in fact a certainty, of a large movement of Japanese from Honolulu to British Columbia, and there was also the prospect of a large movement of Hindus from Hong Kong. We had an arrangement with Japan whereby Japan prohibited emigration direct from that country to Canada, but Japan had no authority to prohibit emigration from the Sandwich Islands to Canada, they being part of the United States. There were a good many thousands of Japanese in those islands, where times were dull, and prospects were good in British Columbia. There was every prospect of a large movement, and we successfully adopted this means of preventing that movement. The same provision applied to the movement that we apprehended from Hong Kong, and it also had the same effect. Of course it is a general provision, and is just as necessary and suitable in the case of undesirables coming through the United States as in any other case.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I wish to bring to the attention of the minister the case of immigrants who enter our ports with through tickets to the United States. They are carried through the Dominion as far as Sarnia, we will say, to the port of entry into the United States. I have knowledge of a case of that kind, where some 30 immigrants, who apparently had tickets to the United States, were turned back at the port of entry at Port Huron. Those men were placed on the Grand Trunk train and brought back to London, Ontario. So far as I could gather they were employed in London by the agents of the Grand Trunk railway, and in some other districts where they wished to make use of them; they were sent up into those districts to work. Now, if these immigrants were not fit for entrance into the United States, why should we be burdened with them in Canada?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not understand how that occurrence could take place if there was fair play on the part of all parties concerned. Every immigrant who lands at a Canadian port destined for the United States is examined at the Canadian port of landing by a United States officer, under a tacit arrangement between the two departments. When the United States officer at the Canadian ocean port has examined an immigrant and approved him, the immigrant is then free to enter the United States when he reaches the border. If the examination made by the United States officer at the port of Halifax, St. John or Quebec, is not effective in allowing the immigrant to pass into the United States when he reaches the border, I shall be glad to be informed of the circumstances, and we will have the situation readjusted.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I hope the minister will investigate that circumstance, because hundreds are turned back in the same manner. Personally I made inquiries about these people, having noticed them in Sarnia, and riding back to London in another car. They were taken off there, and I made some inquiries as to what was going to be done with them, and I received the information I have given to the minister. I am satisfied from what I can learn from the residents in our western country, that not only at the port of entry of Port Huron, but at other ports, many immigrants who have passages paid through to the United States are turned back at the border.

Mr. OLIVER. If my hon. friend has the particulars in regard to this case I would be glad to get them from him, or of any similar case hereafter that comes to his notice. Such a proceeding as he mentions is entirely contrary to our arrangement and understanding. I may say that our requirements in regard to the standard of immigrants are somewhat higher than the requirements of the United States, consequently there is a possibility of immigrants taking advantage of the more lenient laws of the United States in order to get into Canada; that is to say, ostensibly they are going through, but really they never intend to go through, and take advantage of the examination of the United States officers at the Canadian port in order to get into Canada. That is a very difficult situation, and one of the purposes of the Bill is to meet it as well as it can be met. We have certain provisions further on in the Bill which will go as far as we think it is possible to go in meeting that condition.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the minister certain officers in England for the purpose of bringing out immigrants to the province of Ontario?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. HUGHES. Has he not a gentleman by the name of Burnett in his department, and what is he doing?

Mr. OLIVER. He is a salaried agent resident in York. We have no agents in England or on the continent who are conducting parties of immigrants to Canada.

Mr. HUGHES. Are his functions to send immigrants to Ontario or to the Northwest?

Mr. OLIVER. To any part of Canada that the immigrant desires to go. He is not to give anybody advice, but to give all the information he possesses.

Mr. HUGHES. This officer has been receiving letters from people who desired to come to this country. A man and his sons were sought to be induced to come to Canada to go to work as hired men. I think these people should be told that hired men only get employment for a few months in the year. To my mind that is one of the most serious things in connection with this business, that these men are rushed into the country under great inducements to work as harvesters when the work only lasts a short time. There should be some settled policy on the part of the government in this matter, whereby the immigration officers should show these people plainly and frankly when they come out as hired men what they have to expect. Whether they come out as labourers or as homesteaders, they should have all the facts placed before them; this family comes from near Carlisle. A young man who wrote me in Africa; I knew him very well. Burnett recommended this man with his family to come out here and hire on a farm in Ontario. I do not think there is any future for an ordinary man coming out here with a family to depend on a few months work only in each year.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not altogether agree with my hon. friend. The business of our agent there is to give information in regard to all parts of Canada, and the immigrant then makes his own choice as to where he wishes to go. It might not suit some men to go to the Northwest to take up farms, and it might suit them, if they so please, to seek employment at farm labour in Ontario. I am aware that there is at the present time a very strong demand for farm labour in Ontario.

Mr. HUGHES. For the summer.

Mr. OLIVER. And in the dairying districts for the winter as well.

Mr. HUGHES. And then these fellows hang around the towns in the winter.

Mr. OLIVER. Very true.

Mr. HUGHES. Oshawa is an instance of it.

Mr. OLIVER. I am well aware of that. I do not think it would be taken very kindly by the people of Ontario if we made a business of advising men who might be desirous of entering upon farm labour not to go to Ontario. There are, I think, every year cheap excursions from Ontario to the west for the harvest season, and it seems to me that the fact that a man goes to Ontario to take employment there is no guarantee that he is not going west to take a free farm in due course. I do not find any fault with our agent in giving this man and his son such information as they desired, and which led them to go to Ontario.

Mr. HUGHES. They have not gone; I am sending them to Alberta.

Mr. OLIVER. I hope they will do well in Alberta.

Mr. JAMESON. I intend to move a couple of amendments to this section and I think that probably the minister will find that he will be able to adopt them, but before I do so I wish to say that I have no desire to be understood as obstructing this measure. There is an editorial in the Ottawa 'Free Press', of to-day, the last paragraph of which reads as follows:

> Should the obstruction continue the opposition must not complain if the suspicion gains ground that they are influenced by the shipping interests who are known to oppose the proposed new immigration regulations.

I presume this alludes to the discussion which took place when the hon. Minister of the Interior moved the second reading of this measure some days ago. Upon that occasion I was one of those who spoke. I spoke very briefly as did other members interested in this measure, and we did not take up any great amount of time. I do not think that three hours discussion on the second reading of an important measure of this character should be construed as obstruction, and I sincerely hope that this editorial paragraph which I have read was not in any way inspired by any member of the government. It would seem to me that when an important measure of this character is brought down it is not only the privilege of every member of this House to offer such suggestions as he believes to be in the public interest, but it is the duty of every man who is interested in the Bill to make such suggestions as in his opinion will advance the well being of the country, and the observations that were offered by myself, and other hon. gentlemen on that occasion were entirely along that line. I wish to say a word with regard to paragraph (a) of section 3, which has reference to prohibited classes. It reads:

> (a) Idiots, imbeciles, feeble-minded persons, epileptics, insane persons and persons who have been insane within five years previous.

Shall be excluded. I wish to move an amendment that:

The word 'previous' be stricken out and that in lieu thereof there shall be inserted the words 'who had two or more attacks of insanity previously.'

I find that the American Act is very much along the lines, so far as prohibited classes are concerned, of this Act, and it seems to me that that would be a very proper addition to make to that section. There can be nothing objectionable in it. At a later stage I wish to move another amendment to section (d).

Mr. OLIVER. I would very much prefer that my hon. friend would not press his amendment. I am quite aware that it is contained in the United States Act, and while we have taken advantage of a good deal of the work that has been done in the drafting of the United States Act we have not found it advantageous to follow it in all particulars. The reason we do not follow it in this particular is that we desire to have the Act as clear as possible, so that it can be administered fairly to all parties. We think that if the prohibition with regard to insanity is fixed at a period of five years it is within a period that is capable of demonstration and proof on one side, or the other, whereas, if we accept the amendment that my hon. friend has suggested, and which speaks of two periods of insanity at any time in a person's life, there arises a difficulty in regard to the evidence on one side or the other that renders very difficult the administration of the law. I do not think it is really necessary that the provision should be such as my hon. friend has suggested, and I know that it would render the provision very much more difficult of fair administration. The great purpose we have in bringing in this Act before the House, and the country is that we may have something which will appeal to everybody as setting out a certain policy and as providing for a fair administration of that policy, an administration that everybody will understand, and that everybody will have a fair chance under, leaving as little as possible to the uncertainty of the law. For that reason I ask my hon. friend not to press his amendment.

Mr. BARKER. I do not see the difficulty of the minister. What the mover of the amendment asks is that a man who has been insane within five years of his attempt to enter into this Dominion shall be excluded. The word 'previous' is absolutely needless. It cannot refer to the future; it must be in the past. A man who within five years from the time of his coming to this country has been insane should be excluded. The minister admits that, and therefore it is unnecessary to put in the word 'previous'. The proposed amendment is this: 'or who had two or more attacks of insanity previously'. My hon. friend from Digby does not limit himself to a man who within five years has been insane, but if at any time during that man's life he can be proved to have been twice insane he shall be excluded. I cannot understand the objection to it.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. JAMESON. I would propose an amendment to subsection (d) which reads:

Persons who have been convicted of any crime involving moral turpitude.

I hope the minister will adopt this suggestion because I think it is along the lines he had in mind when drafting this Bill, although it seems to have been overlooked in this instance. Again, I have borrowed somewhat from the American Act and I propose, in substitution of this section, as follows:

Persons who have been convicted of a felony or other crime or misdemeanour involving moral turpitude, polygamists, anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain, of Canada, or other British colony, possession, or dependency, or any foreign government.

We have no need for such persons in this country, and they ought to be excluded. In section 41 the Bill provides for the removal or deportation from Canada of certain persons of this class, and it seems to me that if we are going to deport people who exhibit tendencies of that character, it would be but the part of prudence to prevent them from entering Canada. My amendment is drawn with that idea in view. I can see good reasons why this amendment should carry, and I cannot see any reason why it should not. I move it, seconded by Mr. Barker.

Mr. OLIVER. The law already in force in Canada is practically in the words of the present Bill, and I believe that the provisions are satisfactory and sufficient. That provision of the United States Act has not had the slightest effect in preventing the entrance into the United States of any of these persons, because knowledge of the fact with regard to them in this respect can only be obtained by the confession of the person himself, and if he wants to come into the country he is not likely to make that admission.

Mr. HUGHES. Can you exclude a polygamist under the present Canadian law?

Mr. OLIVER. He can be deported.

Mr. HUGHES. Who pays the cost of the deportation?

Mr. OLIVER. The transportation company who brought the person here. At present we can deport him any time within two years, but the Bill makes it three years, and the transportation company which carried him here must take him back.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. But the government has expended money for deportations.

Mr. OLIVER. That was in cases where it was not possible to establish that the person arrived by a certain transportation company.

Mr. HUGHES. If the undesirable immigrant were bagged at the port without being allowed to land, you would get over that difficulty.

Mr. OLIVER. That is true.

Mr. BARKER. The minister uses the somewhat extraordinary argument that if an anarchist is admitted they will deport him, but if they know he is coming in they will let him in and deport him afterwards.

Amendment (Mr. Jameson) negatived.

Mr. OLIVER. I move that the following be added as paragraph 'I.'

Persons who do not fulfil or comply with the conditions or requirements of any regulations which for the time being are in force and applicable to such persons under sections 37 or 38 of this Act.

The section provides that regulations shall be passed by the Governor in Council with respect to persons mentioned in sections 37 and 38 as among the prohibited classes, and this puts it in the statute. I wish to put as much as we can on the face of the Act.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. I think the regulations would be just as effective without this, but I believe in the principle of incorporating it in the statute.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 4,

Mr. OLIVER. This is a provision of the Australian Act. I need not enlarge on the difficulties of administering an immigrant exclusion provision. These provisons must be strong if they are to be of any value at all, and if we make them strong there necessarily will arise from time to time exceptional cases, so that without such a provision as this the law might work contrary to what is considered to be in the public interest. In Australia they found it desirable to give authority to the minister, who is responsible, to make an exception, and we have thought it would tend to perhaps do away with instances of difficulties which would seem to discredit the drastic provisions of the Act if he had this power.

Mr. HUGHES. There will be a record of all such cases?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

On section 5,

The Governor in Council may appoint a superintendent of immigration, commissioners of immigration, and such other officers as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Is there any stipulated salary attached to each of these positions?

Mr. OLIVER. We have a general scale of salaries, but no statutory provision.

Mr. SPROULE. Do these agents, who are employed at Ottawa, come under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

On section 10,

Every officer appointed under this Act shall have the authority and power of a special constable to enforce any of the provisions of this Act relating to the arrest, detention or deportation of immigrants, aliens or other persons.

Mr. U. WILSON. Why should a constable have the power to deport?

Mr. OLIVER. He has not the power to deport, but has authority to use force in restraining or compelling detention or the movements of people under deportation.

On section 12,

For the preservation of the peace, and in order that arrests may be made for offences against the laws of Canada, or of any province or municipality thereof, wherein the various immigrant stations are located, the officers in charge of such immigrant stations, as occasion may require, shall admit therein any constables or other peace officers charged with the enforcement of such laws; and for the purposes of this section the authority of such officers and the jurisdiction of the local courts shall extend over such immigrant stations.

Mr. BARKER. Why do you want the word 'peace' in line 6?

Mr. OLIVER. We borrowed this section from the United States Act, and have followed the very wording of it.

Mr. BARKER. I think it would be stronger without the word 'peace.'

On section 13,

The minister may appoint three or more officers, of whom the immigration officer in charge shall be one, at any port of entry, to act as a permanent Board of Inquiry for the summary determination of all cases of immigrants or passengers seeking to enter Canada or detained for any cause under this Act.

Mr. U. WILSON. Where are the board of inquiry now established?

Mr. OLIVER. We have power to establish them, and we propose to do so, and the object is to do away with the arbitrary methods of dealing with detention or deportation cases which prevails now. At present any action depends directly on the action of the superintendent, and we wish to have, as it were, courts of inquiry, the proceedings of which shall be of record.

Mr. U. WILSON. How many do you intend establishing?

Mr. OLIVER. We intend to have boards of inquiry at Halifax, St. John, Quebec and possibly at Montreal, and the principal ports on the Pacific coast.

Mr. HUGHES. What about the border points?

Mr. OLIVER. By the following section we have the same provision with regard to border points. Where there are not sufficient officers to constitute a board, we give authority to the one officer there who shall keep a record.

Mr. HERRON. I would like to know if the powers are to extend merely to investigation into the character of the immigrant and the mode of deportation and matters of the kind, or is it intended that the board is to have broader powers extending to the details of immigration generally? I think it would be worthy of consideration whether the board would be able to handle this matter better than having the work all in the hands of the minister, who is already overworked.

Mr. BARKER. I am not sure, but that, under section 13, the minister is encumbering the procedure unnecessarily. He has an officer at the port of landing, and all these proceedings are taken only in the event of a dispute as to that officer's action. If the minister sends two officers, in case of a protest against the port officers' ruling there may be a further dispute. If he were to send down one competent officer, and that officer agreed with the port officer, that should settle the matter. But, in case of difference, there could be such appeal as the minister provides.

Mr. OLIVER. Our object is to give the person who is the subject of detention an opportunity to present his case, to give him, so to speak, a fair trial, rather than, as at present, the department takes the responsibility of an arbitrary action without a form of trial.

Mr. BARKER. It is clear that the minister is trying to afford the immigrant—an appeal. But, in the case of a difference between the port officer, and the special officer of the department, why not have an appeal at once to the minister. You do not add anything to the advantage of the immigrant by sending two men. If you send one officer, and there is a difference of opinion between him, and the port officer the immigrant would have an appeal to the department.

Mr. OLIVER. That is true. Still, I should think that if there were a board of three, and two decided against the immigrant, he would be more apt to accept the decision of the two against one, than if it were a decision upon which the two differed.

Mr. BARKER. Still more, if you made it four against five.

Mr. HERRON. I would ask the minister to answer the question I mentioned a moment ago. Under the clause the operation of this board would extend merely to detention and deporting of immigrants. But has the minister taken into consideration the extension of the power of this board to the whole system, so that a board whose members shall devote their whole time to the work may deal with the whole range of immigration, thus relieving the minister of a great deal of work?

Mr. OLIVER. The provision of this Bill only looks to dealing with the administration of the Act at the port of landing. The suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Herron), goes very much further than that. We have not made any provision in the Act looking to that end.

Mr. OLIVER. For the reasons I gave in a previous case I ask that the words 'and persons who have Canadian domicile' be inserted after the word 'citizen' in the second to the last line.

Mr. BARKER. You mean, I suppose, a British subject having domicile?

Mr. OLIVER. Any person who has acquired Canadian domicile by residing in Canada for three years would have the right to come back if he once went away.

Mr. JAMESON. What is a Canadian citizen as distinguished from a British subject?

Mr. OLIVER. We want a definition that will show the distinction between a Canadian and a British subject who is not a Canadian, and we use the words 'Canadian citizen' for that purpose.

Mr. JAMESON. Then British subjects are not permitted to land in Canada as a matter of right?

Mr. OLIVER. No, not because he is a British subject. He has to be either a Canadian citizen or he must have Canadian domicile before he can land in Canada as a matter of right.

On section 23, jurisdiction of courts in cases of rejection and deportation restricted.

Mr. OLIVER. This is a new provision. It has been considered by the Justice Department so far as its form is concerned, but the policy of the section is a matter for the consideration of parliament. The Justice Department says that we have a legal right to pass such a section.

On section 25, passengers to be landed only at places designated by officer in charge—penalty for infraction,

Mr. BARKER. Who imposes that fine?

Mr. OLIVER. There is a provision in the latter part of the Bill.

Mr. JAMESON. Why is the very great latitude between the fine of $20 and $1,000 allowed?

Mr. OLIVER. It would depend on whether the Act was done with intent or with malice aforethought. There are possibilities in the case of steamers deliberately allowing prohibited passengers to get off at points where they would avoid detection and exclusion by our officers, and it is very necessary that there should be the power of a very drastic procedure in such cases. There are people who are prohibited from coming into Canada except on payment of a very high fee, and there is a great deal of money involved in the landing of such people free of charge. It is, therefore necessary that the punishment should be severe. If two Chinamen were landed outside the regular port of entry the saving would amount to this fine.

Mr. JAMESON. I am not objecting to the maximum, but I think the minimum is too low. It might be that it would be to the advantage of some transportation companies to be a little lax in their supervision of the landing of passengers because the passage money might exceed the amount of the possible penalty. My own observation in cases of this sort has been that as a rule the minimum and not the maximum penalty is applied. I do not know how the minister intends to have these new sections carried out. I suppose it will largely depend upon the instructions as to what the fines exacted shall be, but in my own experience I have found that the minimum fine is usually collected, and I think that $20 is too small.

Mr. LENNOX. This is intended to be the penalty with respect to each individual that shall be landed?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. It should be applied to each individual who is landed.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, I would think it would be in each individual case, but this is not absolutely clear.

Mr. OLIVER.

Mr. LENNOX. I would move that after the word 'dollars' in line 32 the words 'in respect of each such passenger or person' be inserted, and that the words 'in each case' in line 31 be struck out.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. SPROULE. As we have made considerable progress, would it not be proper to rise and report progress and then let us adjourn?

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPROULE. What will we take up to-morrow?

Mr. FIELDING. We will take up several of the minor Bills on the order paper that are likely to occupy the whole day.

Mr. U. WILSON. Will we go on with this Bill?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, and then we will take up some of the minor Bills.

Mr. U. WILSON. This will be taken up first?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 22, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

THE LUMSDEN CHARGES.

Mr. LENNOX moved:

That the fourth report of the Special Committee appointed to investigate the charges and allegations made by Hugh D. Lumsden against a portion of the engineering staff of the National Transcontinental railway be taken into consideration on the 31st instant.

He said: I would suggest this date if it is convenient to the leader of the government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Quite so.

Motion agreed to.

ST. CLAIR RIVER SAND.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called, I wish to bring to the attention of the government, especially the Minister of Public Works, a complaint made by the people in the western part of the province of Ontario in regard to the lease by the government of Ontario of the privilege of taking sand and gravel from the Detroit river, or rather the River St. Clair, which is an international stream. That privilege has been granted for five years to a Detroit concern over a district running from the Indian reserve to the head of Point Edward, and comprising some 2,025 acres. Heretofore it has been the custom of the people of Sarnia, Wallaceburg, Dresden and other places desiring sand, to go to the neighbourhood and take it. They find now that before they can get any sand they have to pay a royalty to this Detroit concern, without whose consent they are not able to avail themselves of this public property. A great deal of feeling amounting to indignation has been aroused over the matter, and it seems to me that by reason of the interest which the Dominion has in a stream of this character, some action might be taken by this government to protect the rights of the people of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am glad that my hon. friend has brought up this very important matter. I may say that my attention has been already called to it by persons who complain of this exclusive right being granted by the government of Ontario to the company to which my hon. friend refers. Of course, if the sole right to the bed of the river is vested in the Ontario government, it would be impossible for the Department of Public Works to take action unless the operations of the company might be injurious to navigation. I am rather inclined to think that is the case, because a company dredging simply for the purpose of taking out sand would not be likely to have very much regard to navigation, and the result would be that deep holes would be left in certain parts of the river, which would prevent proper anchorage, and in other respects might be injurious to navigation. I may say to my hon. friend that I will have the matter looked into, and will see whether it is possible or desirable that action should be taken by the Department of Public Works in the matter.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

House in committee, on Bill (No. 102), respecting immigration—Mr. Oliver.

On section 26, bill of health,

Mr. JAMESON. If the minister will permit me to refer back to section 3, I would like to ask him if he thinks that the words 'persons afflicted with loathsome diseases, or with disease that is contagious, or infectious, or which may become dangerous to the public health,' would cover tuberculosis? I see, by the amended immigration regulations of the United States, adopted in 1907, that while they have made provision practically along the lines which the minister has followed in this Bill, they have expressly included tuberculosis. If the hon. minister thinks this clause will cover that point, I suppose there is no necessity to make an amendment, but otherwise, it would be well to consider the matter.

Mr. OLIVER. I may say that the matter was considered when we were drafting the Bill. Our view was that tuberculosis is such an insidious disease that if we mentioned it by name, and specifically included tuberculous people among the prohibited classes, the provision might be used to work unnecessary hardship, whereas the section, in its present shape, is sufficiently operative in cases where the disease is so developed that there can be no question about its existence. In such cases, the immigrant may be excluded under it. But if we were to include the word 'tuberculosis' in the section, it would cover cases which might show a tubercular tendency or a tubercular condition which it would not be right to exclude on that account. By leaving the section as it is, if the disease has reached such a stage as to be a danger to public health, the patient can be excluded.

Mr. JAMESON. As long as the minister thinks the section sufficiently broad to cover cases of tuberculosis, and the officers of his department are so instructed, I shall be perfectly satisfied, but I hope that the minister's view will be understood, because it is very important that we should guard against the introduction of that loathsome, and most deadly disease.

Mr. OLIVER. This provision is practically identical with that in the Act to-day, and which is operated under the interpretation I have given. We employ the section for the purpose of excluding patients who are evidently tubercular and whose condition is such as to constitute a public danger.

On section 28,

Medical officers appointed under this Act shall make a physical and mental examination of all immigrants and passengers seeking to land in Canada from any ship or vessel, except in the case of Canadian citizens. Such examination shall be made in accordance with and subject to regulations prescribed by the superintendent of immigration under the direction or with the approval of the minister.

Mr. JAMESON. Does the hon. minister contemplate having any examination of intended immigrants at the port of embarkation? I have alluded several times to the United States regulations, and I do not wish to unduly bring them into this discussion, but it does seem to me that, with their very long experience, they ought to be in a position to know what is required. I find that, according to the provisions of their Act of March 3, 1893, they require the shipmasters to furnish a list of all passengers, and that the passengers shall be examined by the master of the ship or its surgeon at the port of embarkation. If that be not done, they are liable to heavy punishment—both the master and the ship owners. When the Bill before us was under discussion on its second reading, my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) made a suggestion along this line, and I do not know whether the minister said that any regulations of that character would be enforced. But it seems to me such a regulation would relieve in a large measure the pressure on the officers on this side. I should like to have the minister's views.

Mr. OLIVER. Section 26 might be utilized to require the information which my hon. friend has suggested, but our view is that we cannot accept any inspection by any person who is not responsible directly to us, and therefore we have not provided for any examination. Section 26, however, would enable us to require the master to give us the information on the manifest. That, however, is a question of detail, and not of principle. Our principle is that the examination made by the officers responsible to us is the only one we can recognize. In that way we place the responsibility absolutely on the steamship company. If the company take passengers who do not meet the requirements of our law, they have to take them back, and the responsibility is theirs, not ours.

Mr. PAQUET. This section concerning inspection is perhaps the most important of all. What we should insist on is moral, physical and mental inspection.

Persons who have been convicted of any crime should not be permitted to land in Canada. In that connection, I express the opinion, founded on the statement of Mr. Scott, that we should provide for the moral examination of the immigrants on the other side. Whoever intends to settle in our country should be the holder of a certificate stating that he has committed no crime. This certificate might be issued by a magistrate, by the clerk of a court of justice, or by a clergyman. Let us insert a similar test in our legislation, and we shall have at our disposal a further means of keeping away undesirable immigrants. On the twenty-first of April, 1909, in the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. Monk put this question to Mr. Scott: 'What objections do you see to it if the immigrant should hand to the examining authority on the other side that document which would show that the immigrant is not a criminal?'

Mr. JAMESON.

And Mr. Scott said: 'I would have no objections.'

I desire to make another suggestion. The ideal system would consist in a medical examination performed on board ship by a Canadian physician, appointed and paid by the Department of the Interior. He would be permitted to take the necessary time to make an inspection of a very scientific character.

You will allow me to make a few remarks concerning the medical inspection of immigrants at Quebec. Dr. Pagé has thoroughly organized the system of medical inspectors at that place. Those having any experience in the practice of medicine know how difficult it sometimes is, to discover mental disease. The physician is obliged to make long and repeated examinations. I think Dr. Burgess, medical superintendent of Verdun Asylum, is right when he says:

But, apart from the question of heredity, there is another and more remediable cause for the rapid increase in our asylum population, namely, the defective class of immigrants being dumped upon our shores. That a country so vast as ours should be more densely peopled is 'a consummation devoutly to be wished,' but the question of number should be secondary to that of character, and quite a large proportion of the immigrants brought in are of a low standard of mentality, some of them even having been inmates of asylums before coming to this country. In our own establishment, of the admissions since its opening, over forty per cent have been of foreign birth, and there are in residence at the present time not a few patients, who, if subjected to any proper examination, would never have been allowed to set foot in the country. The new Immigration Act, assented to in July, 1906, by which an immigrant probationary period in this country was extended to two years, has certainly been a great help toward reducing the number of undesirables foisted upon us, and by its aid we were able last year to bring about the deportation of some fourteen patients. There are, however, still resident no less than eleven persons whom we are morally certain come within the provisions of the Act, but in regard to whom we have been able to get no positive proof that such is the case. Insane, they are unable or unwilling to give any reliable information about themselves, and friendless, we have no one to whom to apply for it. This fact alone proves the crying need for a much stricter examination of every alien seeking our shores. All persons wishing to emigrate to Canada should be rigidly examined by liberally salaried medical officers appointed by the Dominion government, before being allowed to embark, and should furnish proof that they have never been insane or epileptic, and that their parents have never been affected with such diseases. The examining medical officer should be held strictly accountable for the mental calibre of the applicants for emigration passed by him.

I hope the minister will be able to go along these lines. I believe this Bill is a step in advance. I would like a perfect Bill, and I believe that there is room for great improvement, even upon the present legislation. The government would be accomplishing a progressive work should they appoint a commissioner with power to investigate in order to enlighten the legislators of this country with regard to this great question of immigration.

Mr. OLIVER. In reply to the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. Paquet) that there should be a moral examination of the immigrant before he leaves his own country, I would point out that, while that would be possible in the case of immigrants from the continent of Europe, it seems to me it would be either difficult or ineffective in the case of immigrants coming from the British islands. On the continent there is a general system of supervision of the people; a record is kept of every individual. Consequently, as I have suggested, it would be possible, in the case of immigrants from the continent of Europe to arrive at a very fair idea as to their conduct by such a scheme of investigation as my hon. friend suggests without unduly and unreasonably hampering the immigration movement. But I fear that, in the case of British immigrants who come from a country where there is no such system of keeping records of individuals, the result would be to hamper desirable immigration to a degree that would be beyond the benefit that we should derive. The deportation provisions of our Act are, I think, reasonably effective in getting rid of the morally unfit. That is the purpose, at any rate. And I think that the purpose is fairly served. So that, when an immigrant arrives in Canada, if we find within a reasonable time that he is morally unfit, we can, under the Act, return him to the country from whence he came at a minimum of expense to Canada. This fact —that they can be returned and that the expense of return has to be borne by the transportation company, and the effect of failure by the unfortunate person who is deported—seems to me to be a fair deterrent. I think the House will find, as we work along the lines of our present Immigration Act, that the effect will be to restrict the coming of the undesirables through the knowledge that if they come they can and will be sent back.

As to the suggestion that there should be a medical examination on board the ship on the way out, I quite appreciate the great advantage there would be in adopting such a plan. Certainly, it would give an opportunity for physical examination which does not exist in the rush and hurry that occurs in the landing at the ocean port. But, on the other hand, there would have to be considered the very large expense that would be involved in making such an examination as is proposed. But, if the matter is fairly examined, and if the immigrants who came last year and those who are coming this year be considered rather than those who came years ago before we put in force the restrictive and selective provisions of the Act under a selective and restrictive policy, I think it will be found that the conditions are not such as would reasonably require the additional expense that would be involved in my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not quite understand what rule the minister follows. At many of these points where immigrants arrive, he has physicians to examine them, and I suppose they also see at the same time that the immigrants fulfil the law in other respects. At many other important points his officials are not medical men, and therefore are not in a position to judge whether the immigrants are proper persons to allow into this country. As long as they have the necessary funds, which I think is $25 each, the immigration officers allow them to come into this country. They may be persons who are not altogether mentally right, and yet these officers are not qualified to judge, and therefore undesirables are allowed in. As an instance, take Sault Ste. Marie, where the minister stations medical men to examine immigrants coming in. But opposite my own town there is no medical officer. There are men there acting as immigration agents, and I am not saying anything against them, they are all good men. But how are they to decide whether a person is fit to come into this country? As long as they have the funds they are allowed to come in. There are other cases where I think this immigration law is violated, and the minister knows it; it is violated on account of the kind of officers he appoints. We all know that it is not very long ago when thousands of Japanese were allowed to come in at Vancouver. After one immigrant was allowed in with $25, he handed that money over to another one who is also allowed in, and so they kept the thing going on, and the official allowed immigrants in who were not able to comply with the law. We had another case at Halifax or St. John, where one of the minister's officers was letting in immigrants that were diseased, and that were certainly not the proper kind of citizens to allow into this country. But he was allowing them to come in and getting a rake-off for doing so. In that case all the minister did was to dismiss this official—at least I think he did, but he did not prosecute him for violating the law; and the result is that the next man he appoints is probably doing the same thing. But that is not the only case. There is a case before the public at Quebec to-day where an official appointed by the minister himself has been,

I understand, allowing these people to come in, though they have violated the law; he allowed a lot of them to come in that had not the necessary funds. The way they do it is a contractor will go down and hand the men the $25, and then they are allowed in and remain here as citizens. Yet the minister pays no attention to that. People can get into this country, no matter whether they have $25, or whether they are filled with tuberculosis, or anything else, because of the class of men the minister has acting as inspectors. When I read of these things taking place at Vancouver, at St. John, and at Quebec, and the minister paying no attention to them, I think it is time the people should rise and rebel against the kind of officials he puts there to carry out the inspection law.

Mr. OLIVER. I have not in mind all the instances my hon. friend has mentioned, and cannot reply as exactly as I would wish. He mentioned one case where thousands of Japanese, he says, were allowed to come in at Vancouver; and he placed the responsibility upon the immigration official at that place. My hon. friend is entirely in error. At that time the law did not permit the agent at Vancouver to prevent these people from coming in, nor was he able to prevent them until, as I mentioned last night in reply to the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), we got legislation which enabled us to put up a barrier against undesirables, then no more of them came in, and I think we have the same agent.

Mr. J. D. REID. Did not each one have to have $25?

Mr. OLIVER. Not at that time. In regard to general incompetence or improprieties on the part of the immigration agents, I may say to the hon. gentleman that we have to guard a frontier of 3,000 miles, with ports on both oceans, and it is not reasonable to suppose that we can always get a perfect or entirely satisfactory agent. When the people of Canada all become angels, then that will be possible, but not before. I am glad to know, however, that those officials my hon. friend is most acquainted with, those whom he sees most frequently he has no fault to find with. Now, I beg to say to my hon. friend that the minister is sitting in his place in the House, and no one in the House I am sure would find fault with him more quickly than my hon. friend if the minister were not in his place. The minister is in his place in the House. I beg to assure my hon. friend that complaints in regard to the conduct of any particular officers in any part of the country receive prompt attention, and justice is done as we understand justice in the matter. We do not claim perfection for the head of the Immigration Department or for any of its officers or officials, but we do claim that both officers and officials average up fairly with the rest of the community.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not think the minister deals out justice to his officials as he says. I remember a case in the minister's department up in his own city of Edmonton, where one of his officials was found guilty of stealing money from immigrants, and he was put in jail. The minister paid his salary while he was in jail, and after he got out he increased his salary, and still keeps him as an official in his department. That is the way he deals out justice to his officials. He still has that official in Vancouver. I was surprised to hear him state that he had kept on this official at St. John. Then there has been a complaint against an agent at Quebec that he allows a contractor to go down and pay all the men $25 so that they can put it in their pockets and walk past the inspectors and then hand the money back to him again. That is how the minister deals out justice, a man who commits an offence is promoted and that is the kind of officials he has in many of these places along the frontier. Of course in my county they are good officials because you cannot get any but good men there, but when you go to Edmonton, and some of these places you get men of the class I have mentioned. I do not find fault with the minister, there are other departments where the same thing is done. At Sorel an official robbed the country by padding the pay-lists, and the Prime Minister had him removed to his county with a larger salary, that was a man named Roy.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No.

Mr. J. D. REID. If the Prime Minister has forgotten——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. They are all good in my constituency.

Mr. J. D. REID. —if he looks it up he will find that what I say is true. Another immigration agent of the Minister of the Interior, is Jackson, who was guilty of all the election frauds in South Oxford. He was sent to England as an immigration agent. It is with the class of immigration agents I find fault. I hope that when the minister is appointing any more agents, if he cannot get good ones in the constituencies where they are to be employed, he will come to my constituency where he will find good men who will do what is right if they are given the opportunity.

Mr. OLIVER. I was not able to follow all the hon. gentleman's statements but if they are all as incorrect as two I happened to catch, his criticism is not very damaging. He mentioned an instance of an official of the Immigration Department in the west who was sent to jail for stealing from immigrants, and said that the minister paid his salary while he was in jail, and promoted him on his release. If the man mentioned is Wagner, whose case was up before this House on several occasions, I was not the minister at the time Mr. Wagner got into jail, and I have every reason to believe that he did not get any salary while in jail, nor was he promoted while in jail, nor was he employed by the department when he came out of jail, nor for a considerable time afterwards.

Mr. J. D. REID. Is he employed now?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, and giving every satisfaction. The man Jackson, whom my hon. friend has mentioned, is not in the employ of the Department of the Interior in any capacity whatever. As to the other statements my hon. friend has made, if he will become definite rather than incoherent, and will give us the instances by name and date, and place, I will guarantee him that every means will be taken to see that justice is done.

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not think it is well to do that any further than I have. I have mentioned the agent at Quebec. The trouble is that if the minister investigates that case the result will be that the offender will get a better position, and the country will have to pay more. The best thing we can do is to let him stay there until this party gets into power, when we can put a good man in his place.

Mr. BLAIN. The minister would not say that Jackson is not in the employ of the government. It is true he is not in the employ of the Department of the Interior, but it is well known that Jackson, who took an active part in the election trial in South Oxford, was appointed to an important position by the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce defended his appointment in this House in a general discussion some years ago.

Mr. U. WILSON. I would again call attention to the desirability of having a doctor on board each ship that brings immigrants to Canada so as to thoroughly examine them on the voyage. I think that is particularly desirable because while we cannot prevent them getting on the ship, as the minister has no authority in a foreign country, the doctor would certainly have plenty of time on the voyage across the ocean to make investigation and report, and then permission to land might be refused to undesirables. We are passing a stringent law and ought to do everything we can to enforce it.

Mr. OLIVER. I have already spoken on that point. There is no doubt the method suggested would give opportunities for medical examination that we have not now, but it would also greatly increase the expenditure, and if we are to judge of the efficiency of the present law, and administration by the immigration of the present as compared with that of past years, it will be generally agreed that it is not necessary in the interests of a proper selective policy to make that expenditure. If it should appear from the experience of this year that it is necessary, I will be very glad to consider the proposition favourably, but it is my desire to keep the necessarily heavy expense of administering the immigration law as low as possible consistent with efficiency. I believe that with the campaign we are now making, with the warnings that we give, and with the attitude we have assumed towards the transportation companies, placing the responsibility on them, that we are in a very good position in regard to the exclusion of undesirables from Canada.

Mr. U. WILSON. I suggested the other day a method of furnishing the money without largely increasing the expenditure. I have been opposed for some years to the bonusing system, giving agents one pound for every man or woman that they send to this country. I think that is altogether unnecessary. In a recent speech the president of the New York Central railway told the people of the United States that unless they greatly increased the productiveness of their farms they would within five years be importing breadstuffs to feed their own people, and he added that it was desirable that experimental farms should be established in every county and every state of the union. If that be true, then the American people will shortly have to come to us for their foodstuffs, and in that light the giving of 160 acres of land free is quite an inducement to immigrants to come to Canada, without donating a bonus to some smooth-tongued agent who often induces undesirables to come to this country.

Mr. OLIVER. The bonus is only paid in respect of immigrants who will settle on the land—and to female domestic servants —whose presence in Canada may reasonably be expected to increase the production and productiveness of our land. It is true that the offer of 160 acres of free land is a wonderfully good offer, but it is no use unless people know about it, and we pay the $5 bonus to the booking agent on the ticket he sells to the farmer or farm labourer in order to advertise to them the offer that Canada makes. Our bonus policy is part of our advertising policy, and I believe we get more direct and indirect value from it than from any other part of our immigration expenditure. It is not correct to say that the bonus is paid in any way to induce the immigration of people of Canada other than those who will go on the land or go into domestic service.

Mr. U. WILSON. I have been somewhat interested in this question, and I had supposed that from the number of immigrants of the farming class upon whom we are paying a bonus, that fully two-thirds of the population of the new provinces would be foreigners. I was surprised, however, to find by a recent report that of 808,000 people there in 1906, 444,000 were Canadian born. About one-half the population of Winnipeg are foreigners, and where are all these men gone to that you would expect to find in the rural districts. I believe that everything possible should be done not only to induce foreigners, but to induce our own people to settle on the land, and I do not think the bonus is doing very much good. We expect to get immigrants from Great Britain, but out of the 44,000,000 population I find that less than 2,750,000 are settled on the land, and in view of that I do not see how we can expect to get farmers from Great Britain. I think the probability is that a large number of the settlers on whom we pay a bonus are taken from the cities rather than from the agricultural communities.

Mr. OLIVER. The very fact that the proportion of farm occupants in the old country is small and that the number of occupants of the cities is large, is the very reason why we give the bonus in order that the advantages of Canada may be brought to the attention of the agricultural population. The report of the homestead entries in the west shows that we have been successful in some measure. The number of people of British birth who have taken homestead entries in the northwest in the past ten years is ample evidence that whether the agricultural population of the British isles is large or small, we under our present policy, secure a very considerable share of them for Canada.

Mr. U. WILSON. They do not have to be farmers to take a homestead.

Mr. OLIVER. I know, but if they take homesteads and retain them they must become farmers. The evidence is plain in the northwest that our administration in that regard has not been by any means unsuccessful.

Mr. EDWARDS. Can the minister say what proportion of the immigrants come because of the solicitations of immigrant agents, and what proportion come voluntarily?

Mr. OLIVER. It would be impossible to answer that question. It is impossible, of course, to draw the line between the immigrant who has been personally met by the immigrant agent and solicited or the man who has come to Canada through the medium of the advertisements published by the agents, and the man who may have come without any of these inducements. But it will be plain to any one that at the present day, when all the world is open to the immigrant, the man from Great Britain who comes to Canada in preference to going to the United States, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa or any of the other British colonies, must have made his choice because of information received and very likely because of information contained in the various forms of advertising in Great Britain, for which the Immigration Department is more or less responsible.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will draw the minister's attention to the fact that when this matter was investigated a few years ago the statement was made in evidence that these steamship companies had formed a pool under which a certain percentage of all the immigrants was set apart for each steamship company, so that, without regard to the agents fixing the destination of the immigrants, so many were assigned to Canada, so many to New Zealand and so many to each of the other countries that were absorbing immigration, and the booking agents simply sold tickets and took toll for the steamship companies, and did not add to or take from the total volume of immigrants coming to this country. If that is true, the companies will have a certain interest in trying to school immigrants coming to this country, who pass through their hands, to become farmers. The only test given by the minister was the number of those who homesteaded in the west. He gives no information in regard to the number in eastern Canada. Many of these people who go out west and take up homesteads simply stay long enough to prove them up, and then sell out to some man from Ontario, the maritime provinces or Quebec, and drift into the cities, as they are not farmers and do not like farming. A number of years ago the same kind of people were attracted to the northern part of the province of Ontario by promises of free grants of land; but they did not stay long, the great bulk of them drifting into the cities. I think that much the same thing has happened in the west.

Mr. OLIVER. There is always in every country a movement from the country to the towns and cities. That is how the cities exist; it is because of that natural flow of population to them. Population never goes from the town to the country; it always goes from the country to the town. It is not only the British or continental immigrants, but it is the Canadian-born, the British-born, the continental-born and the United States-born on the farms who ultimately build up the towns. It would be nonsense to suggest that because British immigrants come to Canada and take up land, therefore, neither they nor their children, nor their children's children would ever become residents of a town; but there is no difference whatever between the British immigrant and the Canadian-born citizen in that respect. If there is, it is rather in favour of the British immigrant and his children staying on the land rather than going to the town.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would point out that the settlers from Ontario and Quebec, as a rule are people from the rural portions of the country, farmers and farmers' sons. The people who come from the old land are city people. Under such conditions, there would certainly be a smaller proportion of young men from Ontario who would drift off to the cities than these city people who come from the motherland and who are not farmers.

Mr. OLIVER. I have lived in the northwest for a long time and have followed the trend of immigration, and so far as my knowledge and experience go, the British immigrant to the northwest stays on the land as well, or better, than the Canadian settler, one reason being that the towns in the west are Canadian, whereas the country districts are of mixed population. In regard to a steamship combine, there is no doubt one, but it operates in exactly the opposite way to which my hon. friend supposes. Instead of the companies dividing the actual transportation of the immigrants among themselves, they each get their share of the total proceeds of the passage money, no matter to what country the immigrant goes. So that it becomes a matter of indifference to the steamship company where the immigrant goes so long as he goes somewhere. Under these circumstances, it is all the more necessary, if Canada is to get immigrants of a desirable class, that we should take means to place the advantages of this country before them.

Mr. WRIGHT. According to the minister's own admission, it is not likely that any steamship company will exert itself to bring immigrants to Canada when it has to turn over a portion of the profits to some steamship company that does not carry them at all.

Mr. BLAIN. When the hon. gentleman introduced this Bill, I put this question to him:

> Is there a demand from any part of Canada to abolish altogether assisted immigration?
> Mr. OLIVER. There is no assisted immigration into Canada so far as this government is concerned. I know of no demand to abolish that which in this case does not exist.

I think that was hardly an answer to my question, and I find from the discussion now, as I knew at the time, that there is a great deal of money expended by this government, which in reality is for assisted immigration. My hon. friend has pointed out that they paid bonuses upon farm labourers, and domestic servants, so that I do not quite see how he came to make the statement he did.

Mr. OLIVER. Apparently my hon. friend and myself hold different views as to the meaning of the term 'assisted immigration.' I understand it to mean assistance given to the immigrant personally to come to Canada. I replied that we gave no such assistance. I believe that at one time there was some assistance given to immigrants. There was a money payment made to them after they had taken up homesteads in the west.

Mr. U. WILSON. Do you remember the date?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot. It was a long time ago, and it did not last very long.

Mr. BLAIN. More than twenty years ago?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not recollect the date, but there was a time when there was a direct payment to the immigrants. That, however, has not been the policy of this government. It is absolutely contrary to our policy that any part of the passage money or expenses of an immigrant should be paid in order to enable him to come to Canada.

Mr. HUGHES. The assistance is given the steamship companies.

Mr. OLIVER. No. There was a time when assistance was given these companies, but that time has gone by, and now our money is spent entirely in advertising the advantages of Canada. If that be assisting immigration, then of course this government does assist immigration.

Mr. SPROULE. What is the bonus or assistance?

Mr. OLIVER. We do not assist the immigrant. There is a payment to the agent to recoup him for advertising in order to induce immigrants to buy their tickets from him. I draw a distinction between assisting, and inducing immigration. Our policy is to induce immigration by advertising the advantages of Canada. There is a distinction between that, and the policy of advancing money to enable immigrants to come to Canada. The latter is a policy which is now in vogue in Ontario, and I think British Columbia, as well. The governments of these provinces have seen fit to inaugurate a policy of what I would call 'assisted immigration.' We have not done anything of the kind. We spend many thousands of dollars in advertising the advantages of Canada, but not one dollar is paid to any immigrant to bring him out.

Mr. WRIGHT. What proportion of the total immigration, and what classes are bonuses paid on?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not give the information. I am not sure that our returns are in such a shape that I could give it.

Mr. WRIGHT. As the department has spent a lot of money trying to reach these particular classes in Great Britain, and other countries, one would naturally suppose that these efforts would bear some fruit independent of any effort that might be put forth by the steamship booking agent; but I cannot help feeling that these agents take no other part than stand at the toll gate where people come to buy tickets, and get $5 in each case. I do not believe they are instrumental in bringing any immigrants to this country.

Mr. OLIVER. I believe my hon. friend's remark applies to some booking agents, but they are the agents who do very little booking. The booking agency business in the British Islands, and continental Europe is a special business, carried on the same as the grocery business, or any other. Every immigrant to Canada has to buy his ticket at a booking office. Just as in the case of other callings, some are enterprising, and some are not, and the booking agent who does a large business, makes money while the one who does a small business makes very little. The booking agent who is energetic and ambitious advertises to the public that he is a booking agent, and in addition the advantages of some country to which immigrants are likely to go, in order to induce them to buy their tickets from him instead of from his competitors. So that when Canada offers a bonus of $5 to these agents for bringing certain classes of immigrants to Canada, they advertise in the newspapers, and give lectures with the idea of getting the business. In that way we get ample returns in publicity for the money we spend, and in interesting the men to whom the immigrants must go to purchase their tickets. They are booking agents for every part of the world, and sell tickets to every part of the world. Everybody has heard of Cook's, for instance, who have booking agents everywhere, and sell tickets to everywhere. The result of our offering a bonus of $5 to the booking agents on tickets sold to agricultural people coming to Canada is that the booking agent advertises Canada, and particularly the agricultural advantages of Canada, because that is where the money is made. That is where we get some of our best advertising results. The Australian colonies are now waking up, and, I am sorry to say, are adopting our methods. But imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. Besides, I do not think that anybody will suggest that our Australian cousins are lacking in enterprise or in good sense. They see what we have been successful in doing by this policy, and they have decided to follow it. It is true they are adding to it by a system of what I call assisted immigration. We are not doing that; we do not believe it is the best policy. We believe that the advantages which Canada offers are such that if they are brought to the attention of the people who are able to use these advantages, that is sufficient; and if we cannot get the people that way, we are content that they should go somewhere else.

Mr. WRIGHT. In criticising the minister in the efforts to promote immigration, I was merely pointing out that these booking agents seem to be not so much promoting immigration as taking toll from the immigrants who come to Canada. As to their advertising Canada and promoting the emigration of the class we desire, it is clear that the large population from which they can most easily draw is that of the towns. As the minister has pointed out, only a small proportion are those who are really on land. I am somewhat of the opinion that the booking agents convert a lot of those who pass through their hands into agriculturists—they have an interest in doing that. While I am on my feet, I would ask the minister if there is any person who looks after these booking agents to see if they are actually doing something to bring immigrants of the right class to Canada?

Mr. OLIVER. We have five salaried agents in England, two in Ireland and two in Scotland. Each of these agents has supervision of the booking agencies in a certain number of counties, and is expected to make visits to these booking agencies from time to time to see how they are carrying on their business. If we find that a booking agency is not doing our business in what we think a right and proper manner—if they are giving out improper advertising, misrepresenting the conditions in Canada or otherwise acting discreditably—we put them off the bonus list. Then, no matter to whom they sell tickets, we pay them no bonus. I think my hon. friend will agree that that has a fairly salutary effect.

Mr. WRIGHT. Do the salaried agents of the department make a proper report to the minister with regard to these booking agents? If so, I suppose that is included in the minister's report?

Mr. OLIVER. No, they are under the control of the Assistant Superintendent of Immigration in London. They receive their orders direct from him, and make reports to him. These reports are not part of the records of the government on this side, so that I should not be able to bring them down. But the supervision of the booking agents is a part of their business, and I am satisfied that they attend to it. My hon. friend is entirely in error in thinking that the booking agents—the enterprising ones, I mean—do not spend money, and a great deal of money in directly advertising the advantages of Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is there an age limit in regard to the immigrants for whom a bonus is paid to the booking agents?

Mr. OLIVER. My recollection is that the bonus on immigrants of 18 years or over is $5, and half the bonus is paid on those under 18. I do not give that as an absolutely definite answer. I can speak with greater definiteness on administrative matters when the estimates for immigration are under discussion, when I shall have the assistance of the immigration officer.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. If the committee desire to discuss immigration questions generally, I am ready to accommodate myself to that desire. But, I may remind hon. members that the clause before the committee is that relating to medical examination of immigrants. I think that after this long general discussion, it would be better to come back to the clause before the committee.

Mr. S. SHARPE. On this subject of examination, what system of checking has the minister with regard to these immigrants? What is to prevent the booking agents making fraudulent returns as to the classes they book?

Mr. OLIVER. An account is kept between the booking agent and the London office on the basis of information received from this side. The booking agent claims a bonus on such-and-such a person. If the records here show that that person arrived and was of the agricultural class according to our information, authority is given to pay the bonus to the booking agent.

Mr. S. SHARPE. With such a good system, why does the minister restrict this bonus to a few agents? Why not offer it to any booking agent who will earn it, and so give Canada the benefit of the widest advertising?

Mr. OLIVER. This is open to any booking agents in Great Britain and Ireland except agents who may have shown by their actions that it is not desirable that we should do business with them. Prima facie every booking agent in the British Islands who has received a license to sell transportation in the British Islands is entitled to claim this bonus on fulfilling the conditions on which it is paid.

Mr. S. SHARPE. They are licensed by the imperial government?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Where is the inspection of the immigrants made?

Mr. OLIVER. At the port of landing.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. At no other place?

Mr. OLIVER. At no other place.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. That is the system we have always had?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. The minister has no doubt noted in late American papers that about 4,000 have been deported from New York. Has he any idea of what their means of inspection is?

Mr. OLIVER. It is the same as ours, but it is much more elaborate.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Would it not be far more satisfactory to have an officer inspect these immigrants on their way over? He could certainly make a far more thorough inspection. The minister will agree that it is impossible to make a thorough inspection of these immigrants as they are passing out of the boat, as I have seen it done at Halifax. I think they come out at the rate of five or six a minute. Why could not we have an officer on the boat all the way over who could make a thorough examination?

Mr. OLIVER. The only reason is the large expense. As I have already said, I think if we take the condition of the immigrants arriving this year since we have had our administration fairly tightened up, so to speak, and compare it with the condition last year, it will be found that our present system of inspection is fairly satisfactory. I think it would be generally agreed that really we do not require to go to the very large additional expense that would be involved in making the still more thorough medical inspection of immigrants that the hon. gentleman suggests. We have impressed the steamship companies very strongly that they cannot get undesirables through, and therefore they do not try to bring over undesirables as they have done in former years. Once they get that idea thoroughly grounded in their minds, we will have very little difficulty with undesirables. I may say that in some cases, in order to facilitate the work, we put a medical inspector on board the winter boat that calls at Halifax, and he inspects on that boat on its way to St. John. In the summer also, in the case of one of the steamship lines, we put on an inspector at Rimouski, and he inspects all the way to Quebec. That is not done on all the lines, but we do it in connection with one of them. The system has its advantages, although it adds somewhat to the expense because it takes up more time of the medical officer, and it adds also to the expense of the steamship company, because we make them bear the cost of transportation.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Could the hon. gentleman say off-hand how much the medical inspection cost last year?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not. The committee will understand that questions of administration come up more pertinently when we are dealing with the estimates, at which time I would have the advantage of an officer of the department at hand to furnish me with facts and figures. But if it is desired, I can secure the information and present it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. One more question. I think all these ships bringing over immigrants have a medical inspector of their own on board, have they not?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Why could not some arrangement be made with the ship's medical officer to inspect immigrants for the government?

Mr. OLIVER. I think I have had already occasion to say that we do not feel warranted in accepting the examination of the ship's physician when he would be responsible to the transportation company and not to us.

Mr. THOS. CHISHOLM. I think the minister might try the experiment of putting a medical officer on one or two of those boats next summer, and let him report, not only in regard to the physical condition of these immigrants, but also obtain some idea of their object in coming over, whether they intend to become farmers, or farm labourers, or what they intend to do. I think the same medical officer who inspects them in regard to health could also ascertain a great many things about them in other respects, and make a report to the government that would be useful. I am satisfied it is impossible to make a proper examination of patients coming off the boats as they do at the present time, any medical man understands that. Take a case where the physician examines a man in the morning for tuberculosis, he examines him with a thermometer and perhaps finds the temperature normal, while in the evening that same patient might have a temperature of 102. I understand that the way the immigrants are examined is simply by looking at them. That certainly is not satisfactory, because it is quality and not quantity that we are looking for. I think the minister has improved the conditions a great deal, and I am sure he would like to improve them still further, but not being a medical man, he does not understand the difficulties. I am sure we are allowing in a great many diseased persons from abroad that could be kept out if we had an officer on board the vessel coming over. I agree that he should be responsible to this government. More than that, his report should be published in a blue-book so that members of parliament could read it. But it is utterly impossible properly to examine immigrants in the short time allowed the inspector. I have spent myself a whole day, from daylight to dark, examining eight or ten or fifteen patients, and been very busy. But here we find an officer putting through perhaps 500 persons in the same time. The thing is utterly absurd. I think the minister should try the experiment of putting a medical officer on one or two of those boats, it would not cost a great deal. I am sure if he did so the result would be so satisfactory that, notwithstanding the extra cost, he would continue the practice, and would also insist in getting other information about these immigrants. The physician could ascertain in regard to their moral standing by keeping his eyes and ears open, and he could learn a great deal about them which would enable him to judge whether they should be allowed in or not. I think he could be very busy the whole four or five days during the passage in examining the incoming immigrants.

Mr. EDWARDS. I certainly agree with the Minister of the Interior when he says that the physician who makes the medical examination on board should be under the authority of this government. The expense, of course, must be considered, but I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) is an excellent one, which could be carried out without very great expense. While I agree with the minister that it would not do to accept the examination of the ship's doctor, because he is not responsible to the government, and abandon the inspection by a medical officer on this side, it should be possible to have an arrangement for a comparatively small sum, with the ship's doctor, so that he could make a general inspection and give to our medical inspector a note of certain cases which would attract his attention, as calling for special examination.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not like to oppose my view to medical opinion, I do not take up that view of the matter. I do not often have to disagree with my own side of the House, but I do not think it wise to have the medical officer of the ship either take upon himself to decide or to assist in deciding whether these people are fit immigrants. No man can serve two masters. A ship's doctor is employed by the shipping company and he cannot hold that office if he serves Canada in the capacity suggested.

Mr. BLACK. He would lose his job in 24 hours.

Mr. LENNOX. The shipping company is interested in forcing as many people into Canada as possible.

Mr. EDWARDS. But they are interested also in bringing in healthy ones, inasmuch as they are put to the expense of taking them back if they are not healthy.

Mr. LENNOX. That is true, but you are dealing not with people coming to the ship, but with people in the ship, and the question is whether they shall be allowed to enter Canada. It is to the interest of the ship's medical officer to sustain the company he is working for.

Mr. OLIVER. By section 26 of this Act we require that the master of the ship shall furnish the immigration officers a bill of health, certified by the ship's medical officer, giving particulars of the state of health of the people on the ship. That report is in the hands of our medical officer, as something to be taken into consideration.

Mr. PORTER. Are many immigrants who have been passed by the ship's doctor rejected by our officers and returned?

Mr. OLIVER. Hitherto we have really not had such a report from the ship's doctor.

Mr. SPROULE. Does not the report of the ship's doctor refer more to contagious or infectious diseases?

Mr. OLIVER. This section will call upon him to give a statement as to the health of every passenger who is ill.

Mr. SPROULE. The ship's surgeon would only have cases of illness come under his notice when the patients applied to him for treatment. If we had a medical officer of our own on each of those vessels he could employ the time of the voyaye in going over all the passengers booked for Canada and examining them. Of course, with 800 or 900 passengers, he could not make a thorough examination, but he could make a better examination than is possible at the port of landing, where the inspection, in my judgment, is of a most cursory character. It is easy for many cases of disease, contagious or otherwise, to escape the observation of a medical officer who simply watches these people as they pass before him.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a good deal to be said in favour of that argument, but it is a matter of expense, and I am hopeful that under present methods it will be found not to be absolutely necessary.

Mr. SPROULE. The present methods are such that it is utterly impossible for any medical man, no matter how high in his profession, to acquire anything like an intelligent knowledge of the passengers. It may be dignified by calling it an examination, but that is about all.

Mr. JAMESON. In order to meet the point raised by the minister last night, he should add after the word 'citizen' in line 14, the words: 'and persons who have a Canadian domicile.'

Mr. OLIVER. I think that is all right.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 31, obligations of transportation companies,

Mr. SPROULE. How can you compel a railway company to build immigrant sheds?

Mr. OLIVER. In the United States they take the position that the transportation company is responsible for having brought an undesirable to the boundary and that the company should provide the accommodation necessary during the detention of that person at that point. I think that is a proper view of the matter. The transportation company should thoroughly understand the responsibility that rests upon it for the carriage of undesirable immigrants.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that this section would compel them to provide accommodation for desirable immigrants as well as undesirable immigrants.

Mr. OLIVER. The intention of the provision in this clause is to require the company to provide accommodation for the detention only of persons held for examination as undesirables.

On section 33—landing of passengers,

Mr. JAMESON. In section 25 of the Bill, in case of a passenger leaving a vessel under certain circumstances contrary to the intention of the Act, the penalty is put at a maximum of $1,000 and a minimum of $20. In this section the penalty is put at a maximum of $500, and a minimum of $50. In the first instance it appears that the penalty applies merely to those who without any fault of their own perhaps allow passengers to escape or to land contrary to the law, while in the other case the penalty applies to those who knowingly violate the law or permit it to be violated. It seems to me that there is a discrimination against the person who unwittingly allows passengers to land. Can the minister explain why this distinction is made?

Mr. OLIVER. I am afraid that when we amended section 25 we rather destroyed the symmetry of the Bill. I fancy that provision was intended to apply to the vessel; but we amended it to make it apply to the individual, which made the maximum penalty rather high. I would not be willing to make the maximum in that case the same as in this case.

Section 25 amended accordingly.

On subsection 9 of section 33,

9. Any transportation company or person interfering with an immigration officer in the performance of his duty under this Act, or knowingly and wilfully assisting in the escape of any person detained by an officer, or at an immigrant station, for any purpose under this Act, or giving false information to an officer, whereby such officer is induced to land or permit the landing of any person in Canada who otherwise would be refused landing for any cause under this Act or would be detained for examination, shall be guilty of an offence, and shall be liable to a fine of not more than five hundred dollars and not less than twenty dollars for each such offence.

Mr. JAMESON. Should not the minimum be raised to $50?

Mr. OLIVER. I think not. This is a case in which greater latitude might be allowed than in the preceding one. In subsection 8 it is desirable that the minimum should be fairly high.

Mr. JAMESON. I submit with all deference that no allowance should be made in favour of a person or company who interferes with an immigration officer in the performance of his duty. That is a serious offence and the penalty should be correspondingly serious. My observation has been that where there is a minimum, it is that which is imposed and not the maximum, and very often the fine is remitted or suspended pending good behaviour.

Mr. OLIVER. There are three offences included in this section. One is interfering, the other is assisting in the escape, and the third is giving wrong information. It seems to me that a penalty of $20 is sufficiently high in some instances of false information. When we try to cover three different classes in the one section, we should see that the penalty is fair in each case.

Mr. SPROULE. In clause 25 the failure of a company to comply with the regulation to prevent any passenger leaving the vessel at any time or place other than designated by the immigration officer 'shall be an offence against this Act and shall be punishable by a fine.' But in this subsection 9 we say 'shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a fine.' You make the one imperative and leave no chance whatever to escape, which would indicate that there must be some one who must prosecute, but in the other case it is optional.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am inclined to think that my hon. friend from Digby (Mr. Jameson) is right in his contention. The case provided against in this subsection is similar to that of a man interfering with a constable or policeman who was trying to make an arrest. Persons who so interfere are treated as bad breakers of the law, and I do not see that those covered by this subsection should be treated with less strictness. You might have a mob who would be guilty of this offence, and they might say: It is only a matter of $20 in any event, let us teach this fellow a lesson not to interfere with our friends. There is no jail, and if no one identifies the parties, they pay nothing.

Mr. OLIVER. The imposition of the penalty is a matter for the discretion of the court. If we provide a fair minimum and maximum, we do all we can. We cannot convict and punish a man by legislation. All we can do is give the authority to the judge to do what he considers just.

Mr. LANCASTER. The first offence might be a very serious one, yet no magistrate will be likely to impose anything more than the minimum penalty for a first offence. Law breaking people know that. The average law breaker is as well posted in criminal law as the average lawyer. They do not expect to be mulcted more than the $20, and can raise that amount among themselves if so unlucky as to be identified.

I should be inclined to think that if any one interferes with an officer in the performance of his duty he ought not have the option of a fine. If an Ottawa policeman, having a prisoner in custody, or taking him under due warrant, and thus preserving the peace of the city was interfered with in thus discharging his duty, the judge would not let off with a fine the person who thus interfered. But in this case, the judge would be obliged to do so. I think it should be a jailing matter for a man to interfere with an immigration officer in the discharge of his duty.

Mr. MADDIN. It seems to me not wise to add confusion to the law as it stands. The Criminal Code provides for the punishment of parties interfering with public officers in the discharge of their duties. This section 9 adds confusion to the law. There is no good reason why a person guilty of the offence of interfering with an immigration officer should not come under the provisions of the Criminal Code. Subsection 29 of the interpretation clauses of the code defines a public officer as follows.

'Public officer' includes any inland revenue or customs officer, officer of the army, navy, marine, military, R.N.W.M.P., or other officer engaged in enforcing the laws relating to the revenue, custom, trade or navigation of Canada.

This definition does not cover an immigration officer. But there is no reason why it should not. Is not the proper way, instead of enacting this subsection 9, to enlarge the definition in this subsection of the Criminal Code which I have just read. Under section 168 of the Criminal Code:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to ten years' imprisonment who resists or wilfully obstructs any public officer in the execution of his duty or any person acting in aid of such officer.

I do not think it will be suggested that an immigration officer is less a public officer than one of the Inland Revenue or the Northwest Mounted Police, or of any other administrative department of the government. Section 169 of the code enacts that:

Every one who resists or wilfully obstructs—

(a) any peace officer in the execution of his duty, or any person acting in aid of such officer . . . . is guilty of an offence punishable on indictment or on summary conviction, and liable, if convicted on indictment, to two years' imprisonment, and, on summary conviction before two justices, to six months' imprisonment with hard labour or to a fine of $100.

With regard to assault, section 296 enacts that every one is guilty of an indictable offence, and liable to two years' imprisonment who Assaults any public or peace officer engaged in the execution of his duty, or any person acting in aid of such officer.

The very latest decision on the subject of interference with a public officer has been handed down by the King's Bench in Great Britain. The judges have gone so far as this: A local by-law was passed forbidding the operation of street cars beyond a certain speed limit. Constables were sent out to take observations of the running of these cars. Two of them took up positions at a measured mile apart with telephone communication between them. Some one who knew what they were doing sent word to the company, and the company instructed its motormen to run their cars between these points at a lower rate of speed than usual. This was held by the court to be obstructing an officer in the discharge of his duty. Why should we encumber our statute with a clause of this kind when we might bring these cases under the Criminal Code? If the present definition is not wide enough to cover officers of the Immigration Department let us amend it and keep our law uniform, and in proper shape.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Has the minister any idea how many immigrants are sent to the Winnipeg hospital?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not that information at hand, but I could get it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would like to have it. I understand that this government gives no assistance to that hospital.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a considerable vote every year for the Winnipeg hospital on that account. We think it is better to aid the Winnipeg hospital directly than to maintain a hospital of our own.

On section 37, immigrants may be required to possess prescribed amount of money.

Mr. OLIVER. I have a couple of amendments I would like to add to this section, so as to require that persons who claim to be tourists will have to have the same money qualification as immigrants. I think if a person claims to be a tourist he should have some money with him. I would ask that the words 'and tourists' be inserted after the word 'immigrants' in the third line; and again that the words 'or tourists' be inserted after the word 'immigrants' in the third line from the end. This will provide that in case a person claims to be a tourist and claims exemption from the restrictions of the law under that name, he shall at least have an amount of money with him equal to that required of an immigrant.

Mr. BURRELL. Is there any amount specified as a minimum under the Act?

Mr. OLIVER. Not under the Act. But under the Act an order in council has been passed which provides that the minimum is $25. But the money may be dispensed with provided the person is coming to work on a farm or is coming to the relatives who are mentioned in the order in council, who are willing and able to support him.

Mr. BURRELL. Is that the order in council passed two years ago?

Mr. OLIVER. No, that was not found altogether efficient, and we passed an order a few days ago which we think covers the ground better.

Mr. BURRELL. The first order was passed two years ago, was it not, that which prescribes a minimum amount?

Mr. OLIVER. That order was dated 11th September, 1908, and it prescribed a minimum amount of $25.

Mr. BURRELL. Was there not one in March or February of that year, when the first order in council was passed dealing with this question?

Mr. OLIVER. No, I think the first order in council was put through in the fall of 1907. At any rate, the order in council that is now in force was passed within the last two or three weeks.

Mr. HERRON. Before the section passes I would like to read to the House an article, and ask the minister for an explanation. It is the statement of Mr. Bruce Walker, who I understand is the commissioner of immigration of Canada, who is in the United States at the present time. The statement was made in Chicago, and I am reading it from the 'Standard', of Strathmore, Alberta:

J. Bruce Walker, commissioner of immigration of Canada, made this statement recently at the Great Northern hotel in a discussion regarding modern methods of handling immigration. He said his country was benefiting by the mistakes of other nations, that it took care of all immigrants for one year and considered that heart, brain and brawn could be better interpreted than laws.

'The boundary line between Canada and the United States,' said Mr. Walker, 'is little more than a line between two states or two provinces. Our immigration laws are so similar that there is really a mere exchange of courtesies at the boundary, but once with our nation an immigrant becomes a ward of the government for a year. Once a newcomer enters the immigration area—that is Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—we care for him in sickness or distress, pay his doctor's bill, nurse him, rebuild his house if it burns and are responsible for his welfare. Why do we do it?—because it pays. We have found that the nearer the government comes to the immigrant the nearer the immigrant comes to the government. It makes him a better citizen. He feels that he has something better to depend on than even neighbours and friends. And from that feeling springs a regard for his adopted country that can be only likened to a man who adopts religion; he believes in it.'

The words 'drawing nearer' are familiar to most of us, but not in the context where they are found here. I would like to ask the minister if this statement of Mr. Bruce Walker is correct?

Mr. J. D. REID. When did he make this statement?

Mr. HERRON. I have not the date, it is only a piece of the paper that I have before me. I have brought this question to the attention of the government before, though perhaps not before the present minister. I have stated in this House that agents of the government have told me that they had instructions of this nature, and it has been denied by the minister. But I am still of the opinion that there is something in this statement, and I would like to hear what the minister has to say. At least, if the statement of Mr. Bruce Walker is not true, then I do not think he should be employed as representing this government in a foreign country; and if it is true, then I think it is very strange that foreign immigrants coming into this country should be treated in this manner. I do not see why an immigrant coming to this country should be treated in this way, nursed and protected as stated here, any more than a Canadian citizen or a man who would leave the eastern part of Canada, and go to one of the western provinces.

Mr. OLIVER. If Mr. Walker made the statements attributed to him he was, to put it mildly, mistaken. I cannot think he did make such statements, I believe he has been misreported or misrepresented in some way.

Mr. HERRON. This interview is apparently from Chicago.

Mr. OLIVER. If that is the authority for the statement I wish to say that the statement read is not true, and I will risk something in saying that Mr. Walker never made the statement.

Mr. J. D. REID. How do you know?

Mr. OLIVER. Because I know Mr. Walker, and I know he is not a man who would make a statement that is not true.

Mr. U. WILSON. An unfortunate circumstance occurred in London when Mr. Walker was assistant superintendent of immigration there. It will be remembered that we then got a lot of immigrants who were assisted by charitable organizations, and after it was all over Mr. Walker issued a circular criticising what had been done instead of finding it out at the time, and stopping it.

Mr. J. D. REID. Mr. Walker would be entitled to an increase in his salary for the good work he is doing on this line. How is it that immigrants from foreign countries are treated better than Canadians from the eastern provinces? I am inclined to think that Mr. Walker's statement must be true. Is it not a fact that the minister or his department looked after some Doukhobors when they were sick, and clothed them, and fed them, and is doing so at the present time?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know what the department did in times past, but it is not doing so to-day.

Mr. J. D. REID. Did the minister not say that some of the Doukhobors whom I saw at Port Arthur are now in the insane asylum in his district?

Mr. OLIVER. I did not say so, I gave the House to understand that this government had nothing to do with these Doukhobors, the putting them in the insane asylum in jail or anywhere, that the matter was attended to by the provincial government.

Mr. J. D. REID. This carries out what Mr. Walker states, that the government brought these Doukhobors here, that they are looked after, clothed, and fed, and physicians provided to attend them. The only difference is that the provincial governments are looking after them, that the minister shunts the expense on the local governments. Is it that the government want to keep close to the immigrants coming into this country, that the immigrants have no politics, and the government want them to start out right? Young men from the eastern provinces have their politics fixed before they go there. I suppose that when the government want votes they take these Doukhobors out of the asylum as they did in my county when they wanted a few votes, they brought out the lunatics, and voted them. Just in the same way they can bring these fellows out, and vote them, and it pays the government to keep them in these ayslums for that purpose.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. This is a burning question with many people who have come to Canada, especially from the mother country. It is rumoured, and understood all over this country that if an immigrant comes here from a foreign country, a Doukhobor, or a Galician, or an American, he is taken hold of by this government, and treated in the most royal manner, quite in line with the article read. But, if the unfortunate immigrant happens to come from England, Scotland or Ireland, as soon as he lands here, all he gets is a swift kick and he is told to go about his business. He is not taken out west and furnished with beautiful farms and seed wheat free. The result is that a great many of these young men who have come from England to Canada are disillusioned, and to my mind, badly treated. Considering that the whole of the northwest was purchased and paid for by our fathers and grandfathers, the first people who should have a privilege are the sons of eastern Canada, and if there is any further favour to offer, it should be offered to people of our own flesh and blood. There is no use denying the fact that immigrants who have come from Great Britain have not been treated as well as those from foreign countries, such as the Galicians and Doukhobors. The reason for that must be that the government have some control over these foreigners when it came to election times, and that they know the people from the motherland can read and think for themselves. The article strikes at the root of a very serious question and implies a very serious charge, and the minister should see in future that so far as his department is concerned, even-handed justice should be dealt out to the people from all countries, and no special favours shown to the people who are not of our own blood.

Mr. OLIVER. I say most emphatically that it is, and always has been, the policy of the Immigration Department, so far as my knowledge of it is concerned, to deal fairly and equitably by all men It is true that there is no ban put upon a man by the Immigration Department because of his nationality, but it is not the less true that in the administration of the work of immigration, there is a preference shown, and properly shown, to the people of our own race. So far from my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) having justification for the statements he has given to the House, I will ask him or any other member of the House, or any person either in or out of the House, to produce any evidence that would in any way indicate the facts to be as he has stated. It is the policy of this government to secure the settlement of our vacant lands, and the improvement of our cultivated lands, by adding to our population those who will add to our citizenship, as well as to our labour. That is our policy, and in carrying out that policy we use due endeavour to secure the additions to our population from the people of our own blood, and when they come we treat them as they should be treated, and they are not the people who are complaining.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill (No. 102) respecting immigration.—Mr. Oliver.

On section 37,

Regulations made by the Governor in Council under this Act may provide as a condition to permission to land in Canada that immigrants shall possess in their own right money to a prescribed minimum amount, which amount may vary according to the race, occupation or destination of such immigrant, and otherwise according to the circumstances; and may also provide that all persons coming to Canada directly or indirectly from countries which issue passports to persons leaving such countries shall produce such passport on demand of the immigration officer in charge before being allowed to land in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER. I move that in line 44 after the word 'immigrants' there be added the words 'and tourists,' and after the word 'immigrants' in line 46 there be added the words 'or tourists.'

Mr. U. WILSON. What is the object?

Mr. OLIVER. There may be people who will claim to be tourists as a means of avoiding some of the restrictions placed on immigrants. It is only right, if a person represents himself as a tourist, that he should have at least as much money as is required of an immigrant.

Mr. U. WILSON. I am willing to support any restriction which will lessen the possibilty of undesirables being admitted.

Mr. OLIVER. I move in amendment that after the word 'passports' in the first line on page 14 be inserted the words 'or penal certificates.' In Italy a certificate is issued to an emigrant, which is called a penal certificate. It does not follow that the person has been subjected to a penalty, but it is a certificate as to whether he has been or not; and we think that where such documents are issued by other countries, it is not unreasonable that we should require the immigrants to produce them. If an immigrant has not such a certificate, he will not be illegible. I move in amendment also that the same words be inserted after the word 'passports' in the second line, as well as in the first, on page 14.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 38,

The Governor in Council may, by proclamation or order whenever he deems it necessary or expedient—

(a) prohibit the landing in Canada or at any specified port of entry in Canada of any immigrant who has come to Canada otherwise than by continuous journey from the country of which he is a native or naturalized citizen, and upon a through ticket purchased in that country.

Mr. OLIVER. It is suggested by the transportation companies that the words 'prepaid or partially prepaid in Canada' be added to the word 'country.' I do not think that the effect of the section will be injured in any way by the introduction of these words, and it is a provision which the transportation companies ask for.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. U. WILSON. I do not understand what is meant by 'partly prepaid.' How would that affect a person coming with a through ticket? I do not see how they could 'partly prepay' a ticket, and have a through ticket from the country in which they reside to their destination.

Mr. OLIVER. Take the case of the Canadian Pacific railway. They have a transportation route of their own from Liverpool or Antwerp to any point in Canada. They have arrangements for ticketing which take effect at interior points, both in the British islands and on the continent. Under their arrangements, a person in Canada who wishes to bring a friend from the continent or Great Britain, may buy a ticket from the Canadian Pacific railway office in Canada. The company is afraid that, unless these words are added, a person who came on such a ticket would be excluded.

Mr. U. WILSON. But what does 'partly prepaid' mean?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not clear on that point. I think that, in order to facilitate the business of the committee, and leave everything perfectly clear, it would be fair to simply make the amendment read 'or prepaid in Canada.'

Mr. SPROULE. But if the ticket is, let us say $20, and the Canadian Pacific railway reduce their portion by half, there is half practically prepaid in Canada. I do not see any difference between 'prepaid' and 'partly prepaid.'

Mr. U. WILSON. The difficulty I see is that the section requires the immigrant to have a through ticket from the place of starting to his destination. And a ticket bought in Canada would have to be a ticket of that kind. I do not see that 'partly prepaid' can do anything but cause confusion.

Mr. OLIVER. I move that the words 'or prepaid in Canada' be added after the word 'country' in subsection (a).

Amendment agreed to.

On section 38, subsection (c).

(c) prohibit for a stated period, or permanently, the landing in Canada, or the landing at any specified port of entry in Canada, of immigrants belonging to any race deemed unsuited to the climate or requirements of Canada, or of immigrants of any specified class, occupation or character.

Mr. U. WILSON. Perhaps the minister will tell us what he had in mind when he drew this clause. There must be some class to which it applies specially.

Mr. OLIVER. We have not, at the moment, any class particularly in mind, but we want to be in such a position that, should occasion arise, when public policy seems to demand it, we may have the power, on our responsibility as a government, to exclude people whom we consider undesirable. If this power is given to the government, then the government can be held responsible should there be a sudden influx of an undesirable class of people. We cannot tell at what time or under what circumstances there may be a sudden movement of people from one part of the world or another, and we want to be in a position to check it, should public policy demand such action.

Mr. U. WILSON. I thought this would refer probably to Japanese or some of these people with whom we had so much trouble before, and when the through ticket was the cause of it being made. Under this section, parties must come direct from their own country.

Mr. OLIVER. That is provided for under subsection (a). I understood the hon. member to ask with regard to subsection (c). Subsection (a) is exactly as my hon. friend has stated.

Mr. U. WILSON. And the other is the same.

Mr. OLIVER. No, subsection (c) is to give the government arbitrary power to prohibit the landing of any class of people. Suppose there was a sudden influx of people from some undesirable Asiatic or African country, we could, without ceremony, simply say: You cannot land.

Mr. BURRELL. Under section 38 the government is given wide powers, but I must say that I personally favour giving those wide powers. Of course, the minister sees that there are two broad aspects to this question of immigration—to encourage desirable settlers, and also to prohibit those who would be undesirable. We have to steer carefully—I suppose the minister is endeavouring to do it in this Bill—to avoid undue encouragement to those who would never make desirable citizens, and yet not to prohibit too harshly those who may desire to add to our population. We seem to be framing our laws a good deal along the lines of those of the United States. We know that in the earlier years immigration to the United States was practically unchecked. The civilization of the eastern states was strong enough to impose its character upon the larger part of the west. But the western states are filling up. They have received population from every part of the world, and they are experiencing difficulties and imposing checks. But their problems are not exactly the same as ours. Their lands are practically filled up, and they have not to tout for immigration. But we have our waste spaces which it is desirable to fill up with the right class of people. I offer apologies to the minister for speaking in this general way now. It would have been better to deal with these matters on the second reading of the Bill, but, unfortunately, I had no opportunity to do so. This Act on the whole certainly makes for progress along the right line. But I may say that in so far as it succeeds in prohibiting undesirable immigration, it depends entirely for its success on its administration by the executive officials. I would like to say a word as to that bonus question. I think that on the whole it is not wise to continue the bonus system. I quite appreciate the reasons the minister put up, namely, that it was in reality an advertising proposition, whereby the booking agents, although they got a bonus, really gave the country a quid pro quo in the shape of advertisements. In looking at these things in Great Britain, where I spent five months two years ago, in connection with the immigration of certain types into our own province, I had some occasion to come into contact with those people, and my own feeling is that these booking agents, who after all derive tremendous benefits from the government advertising and the government literature, can very well afford to dispense with the bonus, and that money could be put into a more direct method of advertising on the part of the government. The mere fact that they get a commission in transmitting people to this country is an inducement to the booking agents to work up their business, and it may also be said that the fact that they get a bonus would certainly stimulate them perhaps to hold out encouragements of a misleading character to people. I had occasion to see a good deal of this when I was in the old country. Of course, I admit it was in the winter time, when there was a great depression, which favoured the efforts of these booking agents, and even of some of the government's own agents, and when they sent large numbers of people to this country when it was not in the interest of those people that they should come.

Now, I think that the success of the minister's general scheme of immigration, and the success of this Act, will be dependent in a large measure on the type of men that he puts on in Great Britain and other countries as official agents over immigration matters. My own feeling is that it requires an exceptional man to be a good agent, a broad-minded, fair-minded type of man, and not merely a man who has rendered some political service to the government, or even to the country at large, unless he is specially fitted for that sort of work. I have seen again and again many loose statements made by officials of the department who were not, I should think, qualified to speak of the general conditions in Canada in a way that would give a fair impression to people who desired to emigrate to Canada. I will give one or two instances to show the care that should be exercised in the selection of these agents. We know there is a tendency to paint everything in rosy colours before the eyes of intending immigrants, and never to show them any of the difficulties with which they are likely to be confronted. I have seen again and again statements made, in answer to inquiries, that would lead a man to come out to this country with the expectation that practically he had nothing to do but to go on to 160 acres of land, and in some mysterions way acquire a fortune without doing much of anything to earn it. There is another point. I believe that these agents should have a thorough knowledge of the whole of Canada. I was much surprised to hear a remark made by an hon. gentleman sitting in front of me, that of that enormous population in the northwest something like 440,000 were from eastern Canada. Well, if that is so, it shows a depletion going on from eastern Canada. Now, I say that the kind of immigration agent the minister should try to secure—because I take it for granted that his aim is to control the movement of immigration into all parts of Canada—is a man broad in his knowledge of facts, and with a fairly familiar acquaintance with the conditions in all parts of Canada. I know that these men have great power in their hands; and while it might be suitable and the best thing to do to direct some classes of immigrants into Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and other eastern provinces, it might be better in a great many cases to direct them to the western provinces. For instance, if a man wishes to go to British Columbia and seeks information regarding that province from the agent, the agent may know nothing about British Columbia. I came across a case in which one of the leading agents of the government admitted that his knowledge of Canada stopped short of the Rocky mountains, he had absolutely no knowledge except by hearsay of any of the conditions beyond the Rocky mountains. Although many inquiries were made along that line, he could not answer them, he could not give these people satisfaction, and to that extent we in British Columbia were deprived of getting good settlers. Now, I am free to admit that the minister has changed his policy somewhat within the last two years. Let me quote now a remark made two or three years ago by a strong Liberal and supporter of my hon. friend's government, speaking in this House:

> The federal government spent thousands of dollars in encouraging immigrants to the Northwest, but not one dollar in getting immigrants for British Columbia. Arrangements were made with transportation companies for cheap rates to the Northwest, and the self-same companies were allowed to compensate themeslves for these reductions by soaking those who had the courage to venture to British Columbia. So far as British Columbia was concerned, its chief function as a part of confederation was to produce revenue to be expended elsewhere in making this a great country.

I think the minister will admit that that policy was the one in force about two years ago. I am glad to say that in some directions the minister has recognized the fact that there is a considerable proportion of the population of Canada on the other side of the Rocky mountains, a region which he is endeavouring to bring to the notice of people in the old country who are suitable for its needs. Now, I think it should be clearly understood that the building up of the western country is better done at that end, and the money expended for that purpose is best spent on men who will frankly set before the public the exact conditions as they exist. Again and again I have seen men make failures in this country because they have been absolutely misled and induced to come out here with false expectations. I have always been under the impression that so far as Canada goes the facts are good enough. The potentialities of our country are all right in themselves, if they are put before the people in the right way. Let me give another illustration of a type of immigrant that we do not want. I remember a short time ago there was a case that excited a good deal of interest at the time, a criminal case, in which a man who had committed some crime was being testified against by his wife, and she had made a statement in court that he was in such a deplorable state of mind that he would threaten either to drown himself or to leave Canada. I frankly admitted, after speaking of these things, that if any man there was putting Canada just about the drowning point, he should not be encouraged to come to Canada, but should stay where he was. I have had young fellows come to me, and I have no doubt the government officials have had the same experience, with the most vague ideas of what coming to Canada meant. I could give one illustration where a young fellow who had been working on the stock exchange as a clerk for 12 years had a fixed desire to come to Canada, and wished particularly to come to British Columbia. When I questioned him as to what his ideas were, I found they were somewhat vague. He had read the literature, he had seen some agents, and had an idea that all he had to do was to come here to change his life to something infinitely better. When I asked him if he had any money and what his prospects were, it was so hopeless a prospect that I fankly took my courage in my hands and told him to stay where he was. I believe there is as much wisdom in agents advising people not to come to Canada in some instances as in holding out false inducements to them to come. I do not say that all the men the government have in Great Britain are men of this kind, because some of them are very good agents and are doing the best they can to give us good settlers.

We must look at the whole question of immigration in a broad way. We have an immense problem which is just hinted at by the very section which the minister has been dealing with. Those of us who are familiar with the facts know what is in the minister's mind, we know that in connection with this clause we want as far as we can to build up a type of civilization in the far west, and in Canada generally that will be the same civilization that exists in, and has built up the east. That is what we are all aiming at, and therefore, although I thoroughly agree with the minister as to the wisdom of this clause, there should be great care in prohibiting undesirable immigrants, I certainly should like to see a generous interpretation of those clauses which permit or encourage immigration from Great Britain, because while it is desirable to prevent the settling of the west by a people unsuited for the country, and undesirable it is at the same time our duty to give every encouragement to, and not to partially prohibit or check the immigration of those people who although at first they may not fall on their feet, and succeed in their new surroundings, would, with their children, eventually build up the right kind of citizenship.

I am glad personally to see that in some respects the government's efforts are meeting with success. But let me refer to what occurred at the seventh conference of the Chambers of Commerce of the empire in Australia last year. That is a body of enormous importance not only in building up the various portions of the empire including Canada, but also in diverting capital to this country in greater amounts every year. Two or three representatives of Canada attended that conference. In the closing days the question of immigration was discussed, and the following resolution was proposed by Sir Alfred Spicer, president of the London Chamber of Commerce:

That the settlement in adequate volume of the Anglo-Saxon race in the British dominions is deserving of the constant solicitude of the home and colonial governments, who are hereby urged to consider what further or better steps than those at present exists should be taken to elaborate a general state-aided scheme at reduced rates to encourage emigration of suitable settlers under well-considered conditions.

I may remind the House that the imperial Chambers of Commerce with which various Canadian bodies are affiliated, have been working along this line for many years, from 1896 on, and they have been drawing attention not only to the need of building up Canada, Australia, and South Africa with the best types of British immigrants, but have also striven to show their own people the necessity of directing the flow of British capital to these various portions of the empire in connection with the immigration movement so as to build it up along concomitant lines. I think I will be pardoned for putting on 'Hansard' these figures of Sir Alfred Spicer's to show the striking changes that have taken place in this direction:

In 1894, out of a total departure from the shores of the United Kingdom of 156,030 British emigrants, only 47,636 were bound for parts of the British empire, while 103,394 were destined for foreign countries—of whom 104,001 went to the United States. Fifteen years later, Sir Albert continued, in 1907, the total of British emigrants reached 395,680, of whom no fewer than 212,672 chose another part of the British empire as their destination, while 183,008 left for foreign countries—the United States claiming 170,264. So that, whereas only 30·5 per cent of the British emigrants in 1894 were retained within the empire's borders and 69·5 per cent strayed to foreign climes, in 1907 the proportions had turned round to 53·8 per cent in favour of the British empire against 46·2 per cent for all other parts of the world, an improvement in the empire's power of absorption of Britain's surplus population of no less than 23·3 per cent. Finally, the number of emigrants to places within the empire in 1907 was nearly five-fold the number that went there in 1894, whilst the number going to foreign countries had not doubled —the actual increases between the two years being for the British empire 165,035 and for all other countries 74,614.

In that connection Sir Alfred Spicer's final remarks were:

The London chamber, therefore, considers that on imperial grounds, on commercial and financial considerations, the home and the colonial governments should do all in their power to stimulate and assist in the more rapid peopling of imperial areas, by evolving some plan in conference, encouraging, as the resolution suggests, 'emigration of suitable settlers under well-considered conditions.'

Some discussion took place on the question of aid to immigration from Great Britain. I do think personally that there should be a generous interpretation of these clauses by the minister when he comes to deal with the type of a settler to whom Sir Alfred Spicer has been alluding. As I understand, a clause has been passed providing that no immigrant would be allowed to land here if he had been aided by money given to him or by charitable organizations. It is true we are doing some work of that kind in Great Britain, and I believe they are also in Ontario, but after all I think the minister will admit that a man who is healthy and strong, and whom there is nothing to reproach with mentally or bodily, although he might not have been able in the crowded centres of Great Britain to make his way, and save money, should be the subject of generous interpretation of our Canadian laws so as to give him a chance. After all, although he may not have the money, and although some one may have helped him, he may make the most valuable type of citizen we can get. So I suggest in closing that while we all hope for the success of this Act which I cordially say I believe is making for better things in our immigration policy, I feel there should be an exercise of wisdom in the selection of our immigration agents, and in their methods, and a broad, sane, and generous interpretation of those clauses both of encouragement, and prohibition. Without such an interpretation, and without that wisdom of appointment I do not think the Act can be a success. If it is administered in that spirit the minister can confidently expect to do a great deal more on the right lines.

Mr. OLIVER. As to the character of the immigration officers, I may say that we can only work with the material available, and I think it is a fair statement that our immigration officers are fairly representative of the intelligence and honesty of the people of Canada. We hope to improve the condition as it seems necessary and becomes possible. Because we have a certain condition to-day it does not follow that we should rest easy and pay no attention to the possibilities of improvement. My hon. friend may depend upon it that we recognize very thoroughly the absolute necessity of working through officials of honesty and intelligence, and that from time to time we shall take such measures as will secure us officials of that character. My hon. friend suggested that there was a good deal of misrepresentation on the part of our agents in Great Britain, as to the conditions in Canada. I do not think he is warranted in that belief. The literature that we publish for circulation in the old country is very carefully prepared, and with a special view to the necessity of not raising any unreasonable or unwarranted expectations in the mind of the intending immigrant. Our principal piece of literature is the 'Atlas' upon which I think I may say a large majority of the members of the House have complimented the department. That is the standard of the literature we circulate and on the fly leaf of all the literature we issue, except the 'Atlas', we give notice that the only people we advise to come to Canada are the people who are going to engage in farm work or domestic service, and we warn all others to only come on such information as they may secure outside of our literature. With regard to the question of assisted immigration I have only to say that while finding no fault with any other government which sees fit to adopt a policy of assisted immigration, our conclusion is that in Canada, and for Canada the best results are to be achieved by simple advertisement of the advantages of the country, depending upon the attraction of those advantages to bring here the people we want. It is the spirit in the man that is more important than the frame of his person. The spirit of enterprise and determination which makes him willing to take the risks involved in coming and to raise the money for that purpose, is the most valuable asset of the immigrant—more valuable even than his physical strength. It is that part of the immigrant's character that we are not so well assured of getting when we undertake to assist him in coming to this country. We are content to find ourselves with a smaller number if we get the men of a better quality. My hon. friend has suggested that we should be lenient in the interpretation of our regulations as respects our kinsmen from the British islands. His suggestion is right and proper, and it is a part of our policy and administration. Let it be distinctly understood by each member of the committee upon whom rests the responsibility of legislation, that if he deems it necessary to pass a law restricting immigration the fact of that law being upon the statute-book places upon the government of the day the responsibility of enforcing its provisions. The restrictive provisions of our immigration law which are now in force, and which will be in force under this Act, mean hardship in many cases. There are heart-breaking instances, hundreds of them under its administration. But, it is the law, not of the government, but of the parliament of Canada, and it expresses the mind of our people in regard to these questions. The responsibility of the government is to carry out the will of the people thus expressed. It is impossible to enforce a harsh statute in a soft way. I would wish that every member of the House should appreciate the full measure of his responsibility in endorsing the drastic exclusion provisions of this immigration law; he must share with the government the responsibility for the hardship which occurs under it. It would not be acting fairly by the country, and the government would stand to be condemned, if having been authorized by parliament to enforce certain exclusion provisions, the government did not give effect to those provisions. I do not think there is any member of the House who appreciates more than I do the terrible hardships that arise under the administration of this immigration law; but under the responsibility which I hold from this House, and from the country, I have a duty to perform, and I wish to perform it, while as leniently as possible, yet as honestly and as fairly as possible, and as much in accord with the instructions of parliament as possible.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. One way in which the minister can avoid these hardships of immigrants when they arrive in this country is by having the inspection made as far as possible on the other side of the water. My hon. friend says that it is difficult to do that. It is difficult; if it were not, any one could do it, but we expect him to find a way in which it can be done. If my hon. friend saw the heart-rending scenes that take place when families are broken up on the landing of the immigrants, I think he would endeavour to find a way by which this would be done. It is a big task, but there is nothing too big for the Canadian government when it is right.

Mr. T. CHISHOLM. I wish to suggest that there is a certain kind of literature which the department might use with great advantage much more than it does. I hold in my hand a book which I believe has been got up under the direction of the Minister of Agriculture. A copy of this book should be put into the hands of every booking agent on the other side of the ocean. Complaint has been made that certain parts of Canada have not been properly looked after in seeking for immigrants. Here is a book which gives full information in regard to the resources and productions of every province. With regard to British Columbia, it gives all particulars about minerals, the fisheries and the lumber of the province. The book is published in German, French and English. I have read it in the three languages, and I must say that if it had a greater circulation, it would do a great deal of good. Such a book is not thrown into the waste basket, but it is put into a library where it can be taken down any time. If 200,000 copies of this book were sent abroad, I believe they would do a great deal more good than some of our agents. I have recommended it a great many times, and a great many copies have been sent through my influence to countries where it can be read. I think this book is much better than the atlas to which the minister has referred. Another thing I must say for it is that it is thoroughly accurate. It gives full particulars about our homestead regulations and about every part of Canada. I hope it will be put into much more extensive circulation than it has been in the past.

Mr. OLIVER. I shall be glad to take notice of what my hon. friend has said, and to see what we can do in the way of circulating the book in question; but I may say to my hon. friend that whereas the atlas which we circulate very freely costs some seven cents, I fancy that the book to which he refers, in the binding such as he has, would not cost less than 75 cents or $1; so that to circulate it in very large numbers would cost very much in comparison with what we do at present in the way of circulating literature. In regard to the inspection of immigrants on the other side of the Atlantic, I cannot change the view which I have already expressed, that it does not seem to me to be practicable. It has been suggested here to-day that an inspection might be had by a medical officer responsible to this government who would be on the ship and who would make the inspection on the way out. That would give us a better inspection, but would not altogether relieve the situation of which my hon. friend has spoken, and I will admit that I do not know of any way of absolutely relieving it. We come nearest to doing so, I think, by impressing thoroughly on the steamship companies that undesirables will not be accepted. Then, in their own interest, they check them on the other side. This is a case in which too great leniency is not mercy, but cruelty, because if we exercise leniency to-day, advantage is attempted to be taken of that to-morrow, and where we let one undesirable in to-day, a dozen will have to be turned back to-morrow because of that one having been let in. I think it is more merciful to have a strict and impartial administration of the law than it would be to show leniency in special cases.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. I quite agree with the hon. minister, and that is what we are trying to assist him in guarding against. If this doctor whom it is proposed to put on board the ship were put on the dock at Liverpool, he could turn back the undesirables there, and this would avoid the breaking up of families when they arrive on this side. If the minister made up his mind, I think he could find a means of having the inspection done on the other side.

Section 38 agreed to.

Mr. JAMESON. With the consent of the committee, I would move for a reconsideration of section 37.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. JAMESON. Just before Mr. Speaker left the chair at six o'clock, the hon. minister moved an amendment to clause 37 requiring tourists landing at any port in Canada to show the same amount of money as an immigrant may be required to produce. I was not in the House at the moment, and I understand that this amendment went through without discussion. As representing a part of Canada very largely interested in the tourist business, I feel impelled to lay before the minister the facts, as they present themselves to me, in connection with the amendment. I do not know whether it has been the minister's privilege to visit of late the maritime provinces, but if so, he must have noticed, particularly if his visit were made during the summer months, that a very large tourist business has developed there of recent years. The business is not only very large, but very profitable, and engaged in by a very large number of people. In almost every county of the maritime provinces are a number of summer resorts where thousands of American visitors spend the summer months. To insist on such a provision as that proposed by the minister, would likely bring about a condition of things which will not be conducive to the well-being of this very profitable business, the development of which is the outcome of a great deal of time and energetic work I may say that some years ago there was a similar provision—in fact I believe it exists to-day—in the immigration laws of the United States, and I know that people from Nova Scotia going to Boston—well-to-do people who were merely going there on a visit—were held up on the docks, perhaps on a stormy day, amidst crowds of people, and compelled to declare the amount of money they carried with them. The experience was most disagreeable, many protests were made, and as a result of this, many people refrained from travelling by the lines where they were subjected to such indignity. The fact, I think, was also brought up in this House last session that some very distinguished people entering the United States from Mexico last year, or the year before, and also people entering Buffalo from Canada were held up in this way, and some were actually turned back. They were put to a great deal of trouble and inconvenience simply because they had not the necessary amount of money in coin of the realm about their persons. These people were not immigrants in any sense of the word, but well-to-do travellers who were simply visiting the country for a short time. If there were an existing evil in this connection in Canada, if immigrants were endeavouring to pass themselves off as tourists, I can understand that this amendment might be necessary; but unless that condition actually exists and has become a source of evil, I do not think it advisable to place a restriction of this kind in the Act. We have been told by the hon. minister that every member of parliament must share with the government the responsibility of these restrictive measures, and that is what gives me the warrant to say here, on behalf of the maritime provinces, that it would very prejudiciously affect the tourist business in those provinces, by creating a prejudice in the minds of American tourists against this country. Suppose, for instance, that some officious officer is stationed on the dock when a steamship arrives from an American port. This man may consider it his duty to hold up every passenger, even ladies travelling with their children and without the protection of their husbands. One can easily understand how irritating it would be and how inconvenient to a lady to have to show what money she may have in her possession. Ladies travelling, as a rule, are very careful lest their money be lost or stolen, and consequently they frequently only carry in their pockets the smallest amount required. For that reason, if for no other, they ought not to be subjected to this serious inconvenience and indignity. Similar experiences have happened to our own people on visiting American ports and created in them much indignation and a very unfavourable impression. One can easily understand how prejudicially the enforcement of such a position would affect in particular our tourist traffic. I strongly urge that the hon. minister would reconsider this amendment and have it struck out.

Mr. OLIVER. When I explained the amendment to the committee, it seemed to be well received. I thought it reasonable that while tourists are exempt from the immigration restriction, still there was no reason why they should not show at least the amount of money which the mere immigrant would be required to have as the condition of his entering the country. Our difficulty in administering the law is that if a man says he is a tourist we cannot produce any evidence that he is not, and in such a case our restriction as to the possession of money would become of no effect. It was not with a desire to in any way hamper the tourist traffic or interfere with legitimate tourists that I proposed this amendment, but in order to prevent the existence of a loop hole by which the purposes of the Act might be avoided. Let me point out also that this provision does not say that the tourist must have a certain amount of money. All that it does is to authorize the Governor in Council to pass regulations in that regard. It is not required that the regulation shall be of any character which would tend to interfere with tourist traffic. All we ask is that power be granted the Governor in Council by regulation rather than by statute, so that the regulations may be varied from time to time to suit the varying conditions. I can assure my hon. friend that, under this section with the amendment as proposed, there is no danger such as he anticipates, but every care will be taken in framing regulations that the ordinary travel, including the tourist travel, shall not be unduly interfered with.

Mr. BARKER. I agree entirely with what my hon. friend (Mr. Jameson) has said. I myself know the inconvenience, the excessive annoyance, created by American regulations of very much the same purport as those the minister proposes to make under this Bill. Some two years ago, two respectable men employed in Hamilton, started on a trip to Buffalo. They were stopped at Niagara Falls bridge by a couple of gentlemen with stars on their shoulders, who asked them where they were going, and whether they were going to find employment in Buffalo. They said they were going to visit their friends in Buffalo—they were merely going on a trip for the day, intending to return that evening. But the officers chose to say that they did not believe these men, and in the presence of the whole trainload of people, put them off the train. Naturally, they were indignant. Of course they could have gone before an official of the United States and proved their case—as if they had been before a police magistrate—and, perhaps, might have been allowed to proceed. But they preferred to come home. They spoke to me about the matter, and I called the attention of the government to it. The government corresponded with Washington, and there were all sorts of expressions of regret, but these were of no value to these two men. They were as decent, respectable men as the minister or any member of this House. And I can only say that, if I know the minister, and he had been treated as these men were, the atmosphere would have been blue for several acres round. It was simply an outrage. No person, except under the greatest necessity, should have been exposed to such an insult. I recollect also the case of a couple of English gentlemen who sought to pass from Mexico into the United States, but were stopped and turned back because they had not the evidence to satisfy a government official. Now if the minister (Mr. Oliver) can point out that there has been any real grievance or trouble about immigrants posing as tourists, and so getting into the country, this might be a subject for consideration. But I doubt if he can mention one case of an immigrant having tried to pass himself off as a tourist. Such a provision as is here proposed should not be on the statute-book and should not be in regulations passed by the government under which visitors coming into the country may be subjected to such insults, unless there is the gravest necessity on grounds of the public welfare. There is not a word about tourists in the Bill as he drew it. Why does he drag it in now? He should be slow to bring in such a proposal. It is an insult to tourists and visitors to say that a man may be called upon, on a public wharf or in a public railway station, to show how much money he has. You could not ask much more of a suspected pickpocket. I should be quite willing to see every regulation that is reasonable authorized, but nothing of this kind should be placed on the statute-book except under the direst necessity.

Mr. SPROULE. I take it that regulations would be made under this provision of the law to provide for the admission of tourists. Otherwise, this might work hardship.

Mr. OLIVER. That is why we do not make provision in the statute—because a measure of elasticity is required in dealing with this question. Therefore, we provide for it under regulation. We ask authority to make regulations that will be effective, that is all.

Mr. WRIGHT. Has the hon. minister had any complaints of difficulties arising at any of the main points at which tourists enter Canada—of immigrants smuggling themselves in under the guise of tourists? I happen to represent a riding that is visited every year by many tourists, nearly all from the United States. I should be sorry to see an enactment either in this statute, or by regulation, to interfere with those coming in the summer time to enjoy our northern country. These people would feel it very keenly if they were stopped at the border and made to show that they had a certain sum of money in their pockets. Very few immigrants enter Canada by way of Niagara, I suppose. I trust that this regulation will be so made and administered that officers should not assume an arrogant air with tourists.

Mr. OLIVER. I think my hon. friend may be perfectly satisfied that there will be no such regulation or administration as would have the effect he fears. The fact that there have been arbitrary actions on the part of United States officials does not at all indicate that the same action will be taken by officials on our side of the line. We handle our business in a somewhat different way. The fact that we have had exclusion officers at work for nearly two years, with very little complaint, although they have turned back many people, is, I think, evidence that we have officers fairly competent, and not a discredit to either Canada or the government. It is not a question of administration under the Act, but a question of the Act giving sufficient power to the government to enable it to frame regulations that will be effective for the purpose desired. Our difficulty is that under this new Act, if a man claims to be a tourist, he is free of the country and can come and go as he pleases. Having given him that right by the terms of the Act, which he did not have before, I think it is only reasonable that we should have authority by regulation to see that he did not have any advantage over the ordinary immigrant.

Mr. JAMESON. I do not understand how the minister hopes to avoid trouble and friction over this matter. He says it does not follow that because there has been trouble occasioned by officious officials at the United States border, the same thing is going to occur in Canada, because our officials may conduct themselves differently. Now, I believe it is true that Canadian officials are more courteous to the travelling public, and particularly to ladies, than are American officials; at the same time, I think there is a good deal of truth in the remark of David Harum that 'there is as much human nature in some people as there is in others,' and if you happen to have appointed an officious official at any place he will cause a good deal of friction and dissatisfaction before you have got rid of him. The minister says this provision is placed in the Act merely to give him authority to make certain regulations. Well, if regulations are going to be made they will have to be carried out. We do not want to place on the statute-book any law which we are not going to live up to. If an evil exists along this line, then it may perhaps be the duty of parliament to frame this section so as to give the minister that power. But we have yet to learn from him that this evil does exist, we have yet to learn that immigrants come in to our country styling themselves as tourists. But if such a thing should occur, we have in subsection 10 of section 33 a provision which would meet that case, and which reads:

Every person who enters Canada as a tourist, or traveller, or other non-immigrant, but who ceases to be such and remains in Canada, shall forthwith report such facts to the nearest immigration officer, and shall present himself before an officer for examination under this Act, and in default of so doing he shall be liable to a fine of not more than one hundred dollars, and shall also be liable to deportation by order of a board of inquiry or officer acting as such.

Mr. OLIVER.

Surely that provides a remedy in case any of these immigrants class themselves as tourists, and under that guise get into the country. Another difficulty arises. Supposing a man presents himself at any port and says: I am a tourist, and the official says: No, you are an immigrant. In such a case, I presume, it would be for the individual to prove that he was a bona fide tourist. But I may say for the information of the minister, that as regards tourists coming to the maritime provinces, they would not have any difficulty in proving that they were not immigrants; at the same time it would be distasteful for them to be held up by some official, and perhaps be required to remain for a few hours or a day until they could communicate with their friends at home. I do not think it is well that we in Canada should place such obstructions in the way of friendly intercourse between the peoples of Canada and of the United States. The class of people who come to the maritime provinces and present themselves as tourists come from the United States. If they were immigrants actually seeking entry into Canada, they would not be likely to come to the maritime provinces, I presume the west would be their goal. As regards people coming from European ports and presenting themselves at the maritime provinces port, I think the minister may rest assured that no person disembarking from a steamship and presenting himself as a tourist, would do so if, as a matter of fact, he was only an immigrant. It would be well known by the officials of the ship that he was an immigrant and not a tourist. For all these reasons I do not think the minister should press this amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend and others who have spoken have asked what instances there were of the necessity of this provision. There are no instances, because the necessity for it has not yet arisen, and will not arise until this Act comes into force. Under the Act we are operating under now, a tourist is a person who is passing through Canada, and such person would be free to pass without the production of the money qualifications. But under this Bill we propose to give the tourist who comes to tour in Canada the privilege of coming in as a non-immigrant, a privilege which he has not under the present Act. Under the present Act and under the present regulations every man, whether he be a tourist or an immigrant, may be required to produce the $25. Now we propose by the new Act to relieve the tourist in Canada from the disabilities of an immigrant; but in doing so it seems to me that it is not unfair that while relieving him from disability in some particulars we should protect ourselves by regulations in the case of the money qualification.

Mr. BARKER. If the hon. gentleman were going to England and passed through Niagara Falls, and were held up there to show how much money he had in his pocket, I think he wolud be very angry and indignant.

Mr. JAMESON. Will the minister give his reasons for inserting that provision in the Act and yet declining an amendment moved last evening to prevent the coming into Canada of that very class of immigrants? That is to say of any person who advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada or any part of the British dominions.

Mr. OLIVER. The reason is the same as the one I gave last night, that the question whether the applicant for entrance to Canada is of this class or not in the large majority of cases cannot by any possibility be settled at the port of entry. The only way we can decide that is on evidence secured, and we secure that evidence after the man has come into Canada and on the establishment of the facts we are entitled to take certain action. Although the provision is in the United States statute it is not effective, it does not protect the United States from the entrance of all these classes of people and I do not think there is any object in burdening the statute with a provision that is on the face of it absolutely ineffective.

Mr. BARKER. The minister's ideas of an Act of parliament then is that it may be capable of proof, and he may know that a man is of the character and class that will justify his expulsion from the country, but although he knows that he will let him enter.

Mr. JAMESON. The minister said last night that although this provision to exclude anarchists and those who favour the overthrow of government from the United States was on the American statute-book it did not prevent the entry into that country of that undesirable class of immigrants. I have looked the matter up and so far as I can ascertain that provision was enacted in the United States in 1903; it may have been in a previous year, but so far as I can ascertain it was then first embodied in the statute. The United States have had much more experience than we have in immigration and if we fail to profit by the mistakes which they made in the earlier days of their immigration we are open to censure. They found in time that an undesirable class of immigrants were entering the country and they put on their statute-book a regulation stopping at the very gateway of their country that undesirable class of immigrants. The minister says that the Act has not excluded these people. I am willing to accept his statement up to a certain point, I am willing to say it will not always be possible to prove that a man is an anarchist, but I say that according to the Bill now before us a man may be an avowed anarchist, he may come to Canada and there will be no possibility of excluding him. He will have the right of entry into this country, and after he has entered, then, forsooth, the minister turns around and, under section 41, the machinery of the Act is set in motion, an investigation is had, learned gentlemen sit on the case and perhaps an order is made to deport this undesirable person from the country. I say that is locking the stable door after the horse is stolen, and it is not profiting as we should do by the early mistakes of the United States. There are several classes of undesirables whom the minister desires to exclude, but it is not always easy to prove that immigrants are of the classes mentioned, for instance persons with a loathsome disease or a disease dangerous to the public health or persons convicted of any crime involving moral turpitude. These provisions are in the Act, but the minister does not say that we can prove that immigrants are of these classes. To leave the Act in such shape that it is not possible to refuse admission to an avowed anarchist, although we have the machinery to deport him afterwards, is contrary to all rules of reason and every principle of common sense.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot agree with my hon. friend. When we undertake to interfere with the right of expression of opinion, the right of personal liberty, to question the right of men to say what they please, we should only take action when we have it within our power to establish the facts. I do not think it is right or reasonable that we should declare a man to be of these classes until we are in a position to know and to prove it, and we can only do that, in the large majority of cases, after he comes inside our country.

On section 42, deportation of head of family.

Mr. JAMESON. Subsection 5 says that where the head of a family is ordered to be deported all dependent members of the family may be deported at the same time. It seems to me that, if the intention is that all the members of the family shall be deported with the head of the family, that may be a very severe and harsh regulation. It of course might turn out that if the other members of the family were permitted to remain in the country they would be able to provide for themselves. I have not examined the section very closely, but it seems to me there may be a little confusion in that sentence and the next following one in the same section.

Mr. OLIVER. The intention is, as I believe it is expressed here, that if the head of a family has to be deported, those who are dependent upon him should go with him. It is not said that they shall go, but that they may go. The next sentence deals with the case of the head of a family who has failed to support a dependent member of that family. We consider such a person an undesirable citizen, and we provide that if the dependent requires to be deported, the head of the family upon whom that individual is dependent should go out with him.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the minister will allow me to refer to section 39, it seems to me that should be left out altogether. It provides that if an immigrant comes from a foreign country through another foreign country to Canada—say an immigrant comes from Italy through the United States to this country—the minister can compel the steamship company that brought that immigrant from Italy to New York to deport him from Canada. Surely the minister would have no control over steamships that bring immigrants from one foreign country to another foreign country. Therefore I would think it better to leave the clause out altogether.

Mr. OLIVER. It is quite true that if a company had no Canadian connection, nothing could be done; but the purpose is to compel the company to make the deportation when it has a Canadian connection.

Mr. WRIGHT. Has the minister ever had an instance that could be brought under this clause?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, many instances. Although there are many cases which for the reasons stated by my hon. friend this provision will not cover, there are other cases which it will cover, and it is very desirable from our point of view that we should have this provision.

On section 43—detention of certain prisoners for deportation.

Mr. U. WILSON. Is the minister particularly anxious to make the limit three years? I observe that Dr. C. K. Clark, who is the head of the insane hospital at Toronto, suggests four years, which he says will afford better opportunity for thorough investigation, and make the provision more efficient.

Mr. OLIVER. At present the term is two years. We wish to extend that to three years, for obvious reasons, and partly because that is the term in the United States; and it is convenient, in the interchange of undesirables, that our regulations should, when it is right and proper, be the same. I would very much prefer that the term might be allowed to remain as it is in the Act for the persent. The extension we are making is an improvement to that extent from my hon. friend's point of view.

Mr. U. WILSON. I think, from reading the American report, that the American officials are not satisfied with three years, and would like the term lengthened. I cannot see why there should be any limit of time in regard to getting rid of an undesirable. There is an insane hospital in Montreal where 39 per cent of the inmates are foreign-born, and in the Toronto insane hospital in 1906, 1907 and 1908, out of 424 inmates, 210 were foreign-born. If the term were longer, many of these might be deported, and I think we should have a right to deport undesirables at any time we see fit.

Mr. OLIVER. We have provided elsewhere in the Act that Canadian domicile shall be acquired by residence of three years. I think it reasonable that if a man lives in the country for a certain length of time he should have certain recognized rights.

On section 45,

Every person ordered to be deported under this Act who has been brought to Canada by ship, shall be reconveyed free of charge by the same transportation company which brought him to Canada, from the place in Canada where he is being detained or held for deportation to the port of embarkation whence he came to Canada, and in the same manner as to passage accommodation by which he was brought to Canada; and similarly every such person brought to Canada by a railway train or other vehicle shall, subject to the regulations under sections 31 and 32 of this Act, be reconveyed free of charge by the transportation company which carried him to the place in Canada where he is rejected or where he is being detained for deportation to the place in the country whence he was brought or to the country of his birth or citizenship.

Mr. OLIVER. The intention is that the company which brought the undesirable out shall have to take him back free of charge to the man himself as well as to the government. As the section stands, it requires that the steamship company shall take him from the place in Canada where he may be detained to the ocean port where he landed, and thence to the original port of embarkation. The steamship companies object to this. They say they are willing to take the deport back to the port at which they embarked him, but that the railway company which carried him to the place where he is detained should bring him back to the port. In accordance with that view I beg to move that section 45 be amended by striking out all the words after 'the' in the sixth line to, and including the word 'Canada,' in the tenth line, and substituting the following: The railway company or companies which brought him to the place in Canada where he is being detained for deportation to the ocean port where he was landed, or the nearest available winter ocean port, as may be directed by the board of inquiry, and thence he shall be conveyed free of charge to the port of embarkation whence he came, and in such manner as to passage, and condition as may be directed by the officer in charge.

Mr. JAMESON. It will be very difficult to show what railway company carried him from the port of landing. When an immigrant lands on the dock, a record is kept of him, and it is known by what ship he arrived; but once released, he is free to chose any railway he pleases by which to leave that port.

Mr. OLIVER. The point is well taken. I see the difficulty, but on the other hand the steamship companies hold that they should not be required to pay the expense of inland transportation for which they were not responsible, and for which they received no benefit. I do not wish that any interest in the country should be harshly dealt with, and I propose this amendment in deference to the contention of the steamship companies, although there is the difficulty my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. JAMESON. I am bound to say that I approve of the section as it is. A steamship company, which has the right of inspection, and selection of these people, should take the responsibility. It is unfair to a railway company, which takes a man in perfect good faith, to be compelled to pay the expense of bringing him back. That man is as free to come, and go as anybody else, and the innocent railway company, which is not required to have an inspection of him, has to transport him back to the place where the steamship company can take him up. It is the duty of the steamship company to see that the immigrants they bring out are the right class. They have been making a lot of money out of this business, and if reports are true, and if the stringent measures in this Bill are warranted, these companies are not very careful in their selection. If they will bring undesirables to this country who have to be deported, they should bear all the expense.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a great deal of force in what my hon. friend says. If I might withdraw for the moment my amendment, I wish to move another amendment to the wording which will make the section more effective, and we might have an opportunity of discussing the amendment I am asking to withdraw before the Bill comes out of committee. I wish to give due consideration to all the interests concerned. Yet I feel very strongly the force of the arguments my hon. friend has presented. I ask for leave, therefore, to withdraw the motion, and to move that the words 'the same,' be struck out, and that 'such,' be substituted, and that the words 'by which he was brought to Canada,' be struck out, and 'as may be directed by the officer in charge,' be substituted. As the Bill is printed, the deport must be taken back with the same accommodation as that with which he was brought. Sometimes, this is not desirable. So, instead of making it mandatory that the steamship shall take him back in the same class as that in which he came out, the matter is left to the discretion of the superintendent of immigration.

Mr. JAMESON. That is better than the other amendment that the minister has suggested, but this may be a little tough on the deport.

Mr. OLIVER. Sometimes a man who has come out first-class falls on evil days and is not a proper subject for first-class transportation going back. I think it is fair to leave the matter to the discretion of the superintendent.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to have the section as amended stand until the end of the Bill, so that we may consider it further.

On section 48—penalty on transportation company permitting escape of persons ordered to be deported; duty to notify immigration officer when such person escapes.

Mr. JAMESON. Failure to notify renders one liable to a penalty of not more than $20, and not less than $10 for each offence. But for negligence, or connivance leading to escape, the penalty is not more than $500 and not less than $50. Should there be this difference in the penalties for practically the same offence?

Mr. OLIVER. They are hardly the same offence. One is negligence in allowing escape, and the other is negligence in notifying.

Mr. JAMESON. But the person who allows a deport to escape is likely to fail to report the fact of that escape. It seems to me that it would be better to stiffen up the penalty.

Mr. OLIVER. The party who is guilty of both negligence in allowing to escape and failure to report is guilty of both offences and liable to both penalties.

Mr. JAMESON. But, in order to impose the larger penalty, it would be necessary to prove both offences, and that is not contemplated under the section.

Mr. OLIVER. The man who has knowledge of the escape may not be the man who is responsible for it. The man who is responsible is liable to the large penalty, while the man who has knowledge but is not responsible, yet fails to report, is subject to the smaller penalty.

Mr. JAMESON. Has the minister considered in what form this manifest is to be, that is, whether the manifest which has to be presented will contain the names and description of all the passengers, or whether there will be a number of manifests? According to the regulations in the United States, these manifests are so arranged that they do not include more than thirty names, and in that way it is possible to arrange the passengers into classes. How does the minister propose to carry out that section?

Mr. OLIVER. The provisions of this section are practically in effect under the existing Act. I am not familiar with the form of manifest, but there is a form which complies with the requirements of the section.

On section 51, manifest of outbound passengers.

Mr. OLIVER. The steamship companies complain in regard to this provision that the manifest is not complete until the vessel has actually sailed, and to require the completion of the manifest so as to hand it to the immigration officer before the vessel sails, would unduly delay the sailing. This is merely a provision to keep tally of the people who are going out of the country with a view to checking them as they come back, and it is proposed that the manifest shall be produced on the return voyage. In order to meet the case, I would move that the words 'before clearance has been given to such vessel' in subsection 1, be struck out, and the words 'on the return voyage of such vessel to Canada' be substituted therefor.

Mr. JAMESON. Does this relate to vessels which ply between maritime province ports and United States ports, or does it mean vessels of the transatlantic lines?

Mr. OLIVER. As it reads, it would be applicable to both, but it is not intended to apply to both. The principle purpose is not in regard to Atlantic passengers, but to Pacific passengers. There is a difficulty about the identification of Asiatics, who claim entrance as returning passengers, and we want to have a tally of the outgoing Asiatics, so that we may have better opportunities of checking the incoming ones who claim to be returning to Canada. It is really with a view to that traffic that we desire this provision.

Mr. JAMESON. At the same time, does not the minister think that while he may be intending to erect this section against that class of steamship lines, it will also apply to steamship lines on the Atlantic waters as well? Now, although perhaps this is not the occasion or the proper time, I want to say something with respect to the passenger traffic which is carried on between the maritime ports and American ports. At the present time, ships which ply between these ports are overloaded to such a degree that I think they are positively unsafe; they are overloaded to such an extent that the people cannot get proper accommodation, and some day there will be a serious accident attended with great loss of life. I think these companies require to have a license which limits the number of passengers they are entitled to carry. But they do not declare the number of passengers which they carry, and after they leave the dock, it is reported next day in the papers after sailing that such and such a steamer left such and such a port in Canada for such and such a port in the United States, with say 500 cases of lobsters and about 600 passengers. I am told that when they get near the limited number of passengers they are entitled to carry, then only about one in five of the passengers is counted as they go on board. In that way the ships are overloaded to such an extent as not only to produce discomfort to the passengers, but to involve great danger of accident, in which some of the passengers, in all likelihood, would be lost. Perhaps this is a matter that comes under the purview of the Marine Department, but whichever department it belongs to should see that when the vessel receives the number of passengers she is entitled to carry, no more should be allowed to go on. At present the officers wink at that provision of the law, and there is a great deal of dissatisfaction and fear in the minds of the travelling public that serious accidents will occur.

On section 51, manifest of outbound passengers, proviso, re exemption of vessels between Canada and Newfoundland, or the United States.

Mr. JAMESON. That section should properly be aimed at the very condition I spoke of, and yet I have no doubt that the steamship companies will apply for and obtain such an exemption from the requirements of the section that the safety of the travelling public will not be conserved. I think the minister should consider that, and I would be glad to have the section stand in order that he may look into it further, and he may then see as I do that there is necessity to protect the lives of people travelling by these lines.

Mr. OLIVER. This Bill is to deal with immigration, not with navigation. Necessarily the two questions overlap at times. It is because the trade between the maritime provinces and the New England states is not an immigration trade that the vessels engaged in that trade are expressly exempted from the provisions of the section which, as I have said, was intended to apply particularly to Asiatic trade. The condition to which my hon. friend objects is a matter for the consideration of the Department of Marine, and he would find his remedy there for the condition he mentions and not in connection with the Bill regarding immigration.

On section 59—proportionate number of passengers to area of decks.

Mr. JAMESON. Is there at present any inspection of vessels coming to Canadian ports, in reference to the accommodation provided for immigrants? Not very long ago there was a rumour in the United States that all was not well on these steamships, and a lady who represented either a protection society or was correspondent of a newspaper crossed and recrossed the Atlantic in the steerage. She reported that the conditions were positively revolting, and that although for years there had been a law which was supposed to be carried out for the protection of steerage passengers, the people were herded like cattle, there was insufficient provision for cleanliness, the ventilation was deficient, and the general conditions surrounding steerage travel degrading. Is there a thorough inspection of steamships arriving at Canadian ports to ensure protection for the immigrants? I do not mean a casual supervision which might take place after the ship is cleaned up, but have any of the officials of the department actually experienced the conditions prevailing during a voyage across the ocean in the steerage? Is it the duty of the department to see that all the comfort and protection that is contemplated by this Act shall be extended to steerage passengers?

Mr. OLIVER. Our agents at Liverpool, London, and Glasgow are instructed to inspect every immigrant vessel leaving these ports, and to report upon its condition. In the voyages I have made myself across the Atlantic I have taken occasion to inspect the steerage accommodation, and I have found the conditions very good. Our effort is to secure the best conditions possible under all the circumstances, and the evidence is that the conditions have materially improved within recent years upon all vessels, and while the accommodation on the older ships may not be all that is desirable, on the more recently built vessels the most fastidious could not complain of the accommodation which is given at the price at which it is given. It is really a credit to the companies and a credit to civilization.

Mr. JAMESON. I can understand that when the minister is on board one of these ships the officers would have everything in first-class shape. But the fact that the minister found everything right would not convey to me any assurance that at other times there may not be undesirable surroundings for the immigrants. I would suggest to the minister that he should have some trustworthy person make an actual steerage trip across the Atlantic and back without the knowledge of the steamship companies so that he might experience the actual conditions which prevail. That would be a practical way of testing whether the steamship companies are living up to the laws. There have been complaints made by immigrants from time to time that the accommodation afforded them was not what they were led to expect when they purchased their tickets. I know instances of that sort, and I dare say we all know of such instances. Of course, these complaints may not have been well founded; but Canada is now doing a large business in this way, and it seems to me only right and proper, if he can, that the minister should make an effort, by some person on whom he can rely, and whom the steamship companies will not suspect, to ascertain what conditions actually prevail under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. member for Digby has evidently given this matter a great deal of consideration judging by the amount of time he has consumed in the last three or four days in discussing it. But I would like to ask him to state, as a result of the minute examination he has made, how the minister is going to control a shipping company that has its head office in London or Berlin, and that makes a contract to bring out several hundred people to Canada. These people pay their money and take the choice of the line on which they come out. Will he tell me how the Minister of the Interior or his officials are going to control such a company?

Mr. JAMESON. The committee is now considering clause 59 which prescribes just what the conditions of these ships shall be. If the government of Canada or the minister has no control over the matter, and any Act of the parliament of Canada relating to it is not workable and cannot be enforced, why does the minister include that section in this Bill?

Mr. CARVELL. The minister may make regulations and employ inspectors, and the department might go to one of these companies and say, unless you comply with certain requirements that we set up, we will use our influence to allot the next batch of immigrants who come out to another steamship line; but I would like to know how he can control a contract made by a company controlled in Great Britain or in Germany.

Mr. JAMESON. I think the question which the hon. gentleman is struggling with will be made clear to his mind if he will read this section a little carefully. He knows, as every other hon. gentleman in this House knows, that if there is an evil existing, if as a matter of fact these steamship companies are not giving accommodation or the treatment they should give, and nothing is known of the fact, it is going to continue, and there will be no end to it; but if it becomes public, if the newspapers take it up, as they would, and if the minister sends one of his officers to inspect the voyage and report on the facts as they exist, I have not the slightest doubt that with the penalties provided by the Act and the publicity, that steamship company would bring about a reformation.

Mr. CARVELL. Suppose they do not, what then?

Mr. JAMESON. If they do that, they will be debarred by public opinion from receiving any considerable amount of traffic. My hon. friend knows that where there are competing lines, as there are across the Atlantic to-day, if one line is held up as not giving a satisfactory service, while another is doing so, the evil will largely correct itself, and the penalties should complete the cure.

Mr. CARVELL. It is just as I thought. The hon. gentleman is admitting that the minister has no jurisdiction at all over these companies. He thinks that publicity will cure the evil. I only interfered to show that the hon. gentleman has taken up an enormous amount of time and has accomplished nothing. I would like to see some business done in this House to-night.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to ask the minister if he accedes to the view of the hon. gentleman sitting beside him, that he has no jurisdiction whatever over these companies?

Mr. OLIVER. What I said, when the question was raised first, was that we had made an inspection of the immigrant vessels when they were leaving the port of embarkation, and that we used such endeavours as were within our power to bring about improvements in the conditions of the immigrant passengers. That is what we have been doing constantly during several years past, and we think we have achieved some beneficial results. So far as my knowledge goes, the conditions are certainly more favourable on the steamships recently built over what prevailed a few years ago.

Mr. EDWARDS. If the steamship company does not comply with the regulations, what step will the minister take?

Mr. CARVELL.

Mr. OLIVER. The provisions are laid down in the Act. We presume by the Act to impose certain penalties.

Mr. EDWARDS. The hon. gentleman at the minister's right says he has no jurisdiction at all.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not able to answer the question, because, so far as I know, we have not undertaken to enforce these penalties. So I do not know whether our law in that respect is defective or not.

Mr. U. WILSON. Would you not try if you had a case of that kind occur?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. U. WILSON. Then you think you have the power?

Mr. OLIVER. We are assuming that we have the power. This section is a legacy coming down from time immemorial in the legislation of parliament. It was adopted in the Immigration Act now in force and transferred from that to the present Bill, simply because it was in the old statute.

Mr. U. WILSON. I do not think any company will try to evade these things if the minister tells them that if they do he will enforce the law. They are very anxious to do the business, and they know well that if they interefere with the immigration department they will get into serious trouble.

Mr. OLIVER. We have ways and means outside the letter of this statute, but as to what the effect of this statute may be, I am not prepared to give an opinion.

On section 75, officers to wear uniform when on duty.

Mr. JAMESON. Is this the same as under the existing law?

Mr. OLIVER. No, neither this section nor section 74, providing how uniforms shall be provided for the immigration officers, is in the present Act.

Mr. JAMESON. Are these uniforms furnished by the department or by the officials? Also will the minister tell us something of their appearance?

Mr. OLIVER. These provisions are not yet in force.

Mr. U. WILSON. I think it has been the custom of the immigration department for years to furnish uniforms for its officers. At Halifax, Quebec, and other places that has been done, and done to a very extravagant extent. These officers have had as much as two or three suits a year sometimes. I remember that, some time ago, I took the trouble to look into this matter. The minister should be able to state offhand whether he intends to furnish uniforms or not.

Mr. OLIVER. I did not say that we did not provide them, but I said there was no provision in the present law on that subject. We think it better to have it in the statute, and in providing that the officer shall be required to pay one-third, we think we have arrived at an arrangement which will tend to check undue extravagance in uniforms. I think we all agree that it is right that these officers should be in uniforms, that the public may know who they are, and what their authority is.

Mr. U. WILSON. I understood the minister to say he did not know whether he was furnishing uniforms or whether that was the intention.

Mr. OLIVER. What I meant in that connection was that I did not know whether we would furnish the uniforms or whether the men would get them on their order. But the provision as to paying will be governed by section 74—that one-third of the cost shall be charged to the officer.

Mr. WRIGHT. The minister can tell us how it has been the custom to furnish these uniforms. Would the officer go to some tailor, and simply pay what the tailor charged?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot answer that definitely. I could explain more definitely if it were a question on the estimates of the Immigration Department, and I had the officer of the department here to advise me. I think the uniforms used now are ordered at each place where they are required—that is, uniforms for the officers in Halifax are ordered at Halifax, and so on. I do not think there is a general contract.

Mr. U. WILSON. The prices heretofore paid have been different in different places.

Mr. EDWARDS. Why is it specified that one-third of the cost be charged to these men? In the penitentiaries, for instance, are the guards charged one-third of the cost of their uniforms? Why not have uniformity in regard to your uniforms?

Mr. OLIVER. We desire to have uniformity in the department. The reason why we have adopted this idea of requiring the official to pay for a portion of the cost is to check his asking for too many uniforms. It may be an innovation so far as the government service is concerned, but we think it a proper innovation, and ask the committee to adopt it.

Mr. EDWARDS. If it is a good principle in this case, why not adopt it in other branches of the service?

Mr. OLIVER. There is a difference between an immigration officer, and, say, a penitentiary guard.

Mr. EDWARDS. Or a customs or excise officer?

Mr. OLIVER. There is a greater resemblance there. I do not know what arrangement is made in the Customs Department, but I think the committee should sanction this proposal in regard to the immigration service.

Mr. WRIGHT. Does not the minister think that fifty per cent would be a more effective check?

Mr. OLIVER. It would, but I think that one-third is not an unfair proposition. I think it is an improvement over the present condition. I believe it is based on some arrangement existing to-day between the railway companies and certain of their employees. I think it is fair to the government and not too severe upon the employee, and gives the government a certain measure of protection that seems desirable.

Mr. EDWARDS. It is quite proper that the immigration officers should be in uniform. But why adopt the principle in this department of paying two-thirds of the cost of the uniform and in another department paying the whole cost? If you are maintaining a principle in one case, it seems to me that you are stultifying yourself in another. If, for instance, the government says that customs officers must wear a uniform of a certain kind and quality which has to be paid for by the officers themselves, then I see no reason why the same thing should not apply here. If the government fix the quality and character of the uniform for officers in one branch of the service, let them do the same thing in other branches of the service.

On the schedules,

Mr. BICKERDIKE. If the minister would permit me, I would like to offer an amendment to section 2. I may be out of order, and if any one raises the question of order, I will not be able to do so. But I feel it my duty to suggest the following amendment to clause (j), and to insert after the word 'transport' in the thirteenth line, the words 'not including cattlemen'. My reason for doing so is that the Bill as now framed constitutes a cattleman, an immigrant. The steamship companies feel that it would oblige them perhaps to hold their vessel on some occasions ten or twelve hours in the city of Quebec. That delay might cause them to miss the tide, and if they missed the tide they might be detained 24 hours or 48 hours, and all that merely because there happened to be one cattleman on that steamer. The steamship companies have sent a petition in asking the government not to make immigrants of cattlemen. The cattlemen themselves claim that they have a right to the privileges of Canadian citizenship, and should not be classed as immigrants. The Dominion Live Stock Association have passed resolutions asking that the government should not hamper their trade any more than is absolutely necessary. Unless the minister has some good reason that I do not know of, surely he will accept the amendment I am proposing. The fact of a man being a cattleman should not deprive him of his rights as a citizen. This does. The minister's Bill last session especially mentioned cattlemen but the present Bill does not. He gets over it ably by inserting the word 'transport'. The live stock trade is of such importance that it deserves the attention of the government and I hope the minister will agree to amend the Bill by inserting in the thirteenth line of section 2 after the word 'transport' the words 'including cattlemen'.

Mr. MILLER. I do not see any special reason for that amendment to carry.

Mr. OLIVER. Last year we inserted the word 'cattlemen' in the section, and my hon. friend (Mr. Bickerdike) took very strong exception to this word being inserted, as placing the cattlemen in a class by themselves. This year we carefully omitted this word, and I am astonished to find him asking that this objectionable word be inserted in the Bill. Having met his views as expressed last session, I think in all fairness he should allow the Bill to remain in its present shape, and should not again raise the question of cattlemen. I agree that cattlemen are as good as other men, and this Bill treats them the same as other men. If cattlemen are Canadians or have acquired Canadian domicile they have the right to return to Canada. We make special provision in our interpretation for men who have been resident for three years in Canada, and, therefore, have acquired domicile. If a man is to all intents and purposes an immigrant, I cannot cenceive why he should be relieved from his position as an immigrant because he happens to have been employed in attendance on cattle.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Does the Bill not constitute cattlemen as being immigrants unless they have been in Canada three years?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, certainly.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. That is what I objected to, that does not apply to any other men.

Mr. BICKERDIKE.

Mr. OLIVER. Every other man who has not been in Canada for three years is an immigrant. Why should not the cattleman be an immigrant the same as any other man?

Amendment negatived.

On the schedules,

Mr. EDWARDS. There seems to be no form among the schedule for the certificate of the ship's physician as to the health of immigrants.

Mr. OLIVER. Provision is made for that in section 73.

On section 45,

Mr. OLIVER. On looking over this section it seems to me that all interests will be served if the section were agreed to as amended.

Section as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

INSPECTION OF GLASSWARE IN MILK TESTS.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the testing, marking, sale and use of glassware used in connection with the testing of milk, and to authorize the Governor in Council to make regulations with respect thereto, and for the imposition of penalties for offences in contravention thereof.

Mr. FISHER. This resolution explains itself. There is a complaint that these bottles are not correct sometimes, and that there is at present no means of securing their accuracy. In connection with the distribution of the money at cheese and butter factories, it is important to have them accurate.

Mr. BLAIN. What kind of glassware will be included?

Mr. FISHER. The bottles that are used in what is known as the Babcock test for butter fat in milk.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. FISHER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 184) to provide for the testing of glassware used in connection with milk tests.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to provide for the payment to members of the Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources of their actual reasonable disbursements incurred in travelling to, returning from and remaining at meetings of the committees of the commission or attending to the business thereof.

Mr. LENNOX. What have been the expenses so far?

Mr. FISHER. Apart from the civil government vote, I think the only expense incurred has been that for the meeting held in Ottawa in January last.

Mr. LENNOX. I refer more particularly to the expense incurred by the government in connection with the establishing and carrying on of the work of the commission. I saw it announced that the chairman stated that he would make an application for $50,000.

Mr. FISHER. It is evident from the programme set out by the commission for the coming year that they would require a larger sum than is provided in the main estimates. The staff consists of a secretary in subdivision (a) of the first division, two officers in subdivisitn (b) of the first division, two in (b) of the second division, and two in (b) of the third division. There are some slight office expenses for stationery and printing. I will bring down the memorandum of the chairman of the commission on the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. BLAIN. Are these officers appointed by the commission?

Mr. FISHER. They were appointed under the Civil Service Act, Mr. James White, geographer of the Interior Department was transferred to this office, as I think was also one of the stenographers, and they are all appointed under the Civil Service Act.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. FISHER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 185) respecting the Commission for the Conservation of Natural Resources.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LENNOX. May I ask what will be the business to-morrow.

Mr. FIELDING. We shall take up the resolutions and Bills on the order paper which are not of a contentious character.

Mr. LENNOX. After that?

Mr. FIELDING. There are several resolutions—one in regard to the Montreal Harbour Commission, two Bills which stand in the name of the Postmaster General, the Bills which have been introduced to-night, and several other Bills which are not likely to be of a contentious character.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.07 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 23, 1910.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 183) to incorporate the Ottawa, Rideau Valley and Brockville Railway Company.—Mr. Rivet, for Mr. Devlin.

IRRIGATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. OLIVER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 186) to amend the Irrigation Act. He said: There are two distinct provisions in this Act. One is an amendment to the amendments that were made the session before last. Drainage is deemed to be a function of the provincial government, and while the Irrigation Act places the control in the three provinces in the hands of the Dominion, the amendments of the session of 1908 permit drainage works to be carried on under provincial jurisdiction, subject to certain requirements.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Does the Act apply to British Columbia?

Mr. OLIVER. No, only to the three prairie provinces. The governments of the two western provinces find that, in dealing with drainage, there are two classes—the least important and the most important; and the amendment is simply to enable us to dispense with the filing of elaborate plans in the case of minor drainage schemes authorized by the provincial government. The other provision is to authorize expropiration where necessary for reservoir sites for the purpose of conserving water for irrigation. There is a provision already for preservation of such sites where the land is the property of the Crown, but in some cases some part of it may have passed into private hands, and that small part might render useless the reservation of the rest.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The nice question arises here as to the jurisdiction of this parliament to legislate at all with reference to irrigation. When the Bill comes up for its second reading, we ought to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WATER-POWER IN THE BRITISH COLUMBIA RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. OLIVER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 187) to confirm and declare the rights of the Crown with respect to water and water-power and relating to the diversion, acquisition and use of water in the railway belt in British Columbia. He said: As the House is aware, the proprietary rights in a belt 20 miles in width on each side of the main line on the Canadian Pacific railway, where it passes through the province of British Columbia, has, under an arrangement between the Dominion and the province, become the property of the Crown in the right of the Dominion. Up to a time, it was assumed that the province administered all water rights within that area as well as throughout the rest of the province. However, a couple of years ago, a case was entered in the Exchequer Court for the purpose of deciding definitely whether the jurisdiction in regard to water within the railway belt resided in the Crown in the right of the province or in the Crown in the right of the Dominion. The Exchequer Court gave a decision that the right rested with the Dominion. Since then, I am given to understand, the Supreme Court, on appeal, has confirmed the decision of the Exchequer Court. Of course, in order to reach a final conclusion the matter will have to be carried to the Privy Council, and that decision will be the one that will rule. In the meantime, the rights to water which have been granted by the provincial government are in a state of uncertainty. The provincial government having been declared to have no right in this matter, grants issued by that government have not—to put it mildly—a satisfactory legal status. The purpose of this Bill, then, is, first to declare, in accordance with the decision of the court, that the right to the water rests in the Dominion, and, second, to make provision for carrying forward the rights which have been granted by the provincial government until they can be readjusted or until a final decision is reached. It is for the purpose of preventing or avoiding a practically chaotic condition in regard to water rights in the railway belt so as to put them on a definite basis during the interval which necessarily occurs between the first decision of the Exchequer Court and the final decision of the Privy Council. At the same time, there is a demand for development in the railway belt, and it is proposed in the same Act to make provision for authorizing development as the circumstances may require, so, that in the first place, the rights granted shall not be in a state of chaos, and, in the next place, development need not be tied up awaiting the decision of the Privy Council.

Mr. J. G. HAGGART.

Mr. J. HAGGART. It is an interesting question that the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) has raised. On the second reading of the Bill, of course, we can discuss it fully. He states that by a decision of the Exchequer Court, confirmed by the Supreme Court, the right to legislate in reference to lands which have been conveyed to the Dominion is given to the Dominion parliament.

Mr. OLIVER. In water rights.

Mr. J. HAGGART. In reference to water rights, or any other. That is a power vested in the provincial authority, and I doubt very much if any court in the land has decided that, by the conveying of the land to the Dominion government, the right to legislate for that area is thereby conveyed to the Dominion. The Dominion can, either by regulation or by Act of parliament, decide on what terms the right conveyed to it—which is no greater right than that which is conveyed to an individual—shall be exercised. But the right of regulation, the right of legislation in reference to these lands, is in the provincial government, and by no conveyance of land can that right be transferred to the Dominion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NATIONAL BATTLEFIELDS.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 188) to amend the Act respecting the National Battlefields at Quebec. He said: The purpose of this Bill is to remove some of the practical difficulties which the commission having charge of the National Battlefields at Quebec have experienced under the statute, by which they were created two years ago. Provision is made in that statute that, in case it is desired to acquire property which has to be expropriated, the provisions of the Railway Act are to be followed. But a literal compliance with the provisions of the Railway Act, with regard to the expropriation of property, would necessitate the filing of plans and the taking of other formal steps which are scarcely applicable to the circumstances of the acquisition of property for the purposes of the National Battlefields Commission. To get rid of that difficulty, and to provide a more ready, and as we think, a more efficient means for carrying out the purposes for which the commission was constituted, this Bill proposes to repeal that section of the original statute and to substitute for it the section contained in the Bill, under which the provisions of the Expropriation Act will be followed. The original statute constituting the commission requires that all propositions for the acquisition of real estate, before being acted upon by the commission, shall be sanctioned by parliament. The effect of the change in procedure which this Bill, if adopted, will introduce, will merely be that, after parliament has given its approval to the proposition to acquire any particular piece of property for the purposes of the commission, the proceedings, in case expropriation is necessary, shall be in accordance with the general provisions of the expropriation Act, and the price of the property to be paid by the commission shall be settled by proceedings taken in the Exchequer Court.

Mr. SPROULE. This Bill relates to the expropriation of property. Does it contemplate dealing with the Ross rifle factory, and is it the intention of the commission to take over that property?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. That is a matter which it is not necessary to consider, so far as the provisions of this amending Bill are concerned. It would be a matter for the commission first to consider, and then for parliament to act upon, if the question came up for practical consideration.

QUESTIONS.

MONTREAL—OWNERSHIP OF HIGHWAY TO VICTORIA JUBILEE BRIDGE.

Mr. LANCTOT:

1. Who is the owner of the highway, from the limits of the city of Montreal, that is to say, the Emigrants' Burial ground, to the Victoria Jubilee bridge?
2. Is the government aware that all who pay toll to the Grand Trunk Railway Company for crossing the bridge must of necessity use this highway?
3. Whose duty is it to keep the said highway in a good state of repair?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH:

1. There appears to be an uncertainty as to who is the owner of the roadway from the limits of the city of Montreal to the Jubilee bridge (at least as to the line between the property of the city and that of the Grand Trunk railway). This line has never been definitely determined, but engineers have now the matter under consideration.

2. The government has no information, but it is generally understood that the roadway is used by people who pay toll to the Grand Trunk Railway Company.

3. The Grand Trunk Railway Company maintain and keep in repair that portion of the approach to the bridge on its land.

SALE OF HALF-SECTIONS IN MANITOBA.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

1. Has the N. ½ section 29, township 5, range 8, west of the 1st meridian in Manitoba been sold? If so, when, to whom, and at what price?
2. If not sold, is it for sale now? If so, at what price?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER:

1. No, it has not been sold. This land, being part of a school section, can only be disposed of at public auction.

2. No, it is not for sale now; and it is not the intention to hold any auction sales for school lands in Manitoba this summer.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

Has the N. ½ of section 29, township 5, range 8, west of the 1st meridian in Manitoba been sold? If so, to whom, when was the sale made, and what was the price per acre?

Mr. OLIVER:

The north half of section 29, in township 5, range 8 west of the 1st meridian, has never been sold.

TRIP OF ALEXANDER McLEOD TO THE YUKON.

Mr. W. H. SHARPE:

1. Did Alexander McLeod, of McLean, McLeod & Black, of Morden, Manitoba, ever make a trip to the Yukon, or any other place for the government? If so, where and what were his duties?
2. How much per day did he receive, and how long was he in the employ of the government?
3. What were his expenses and what is the total amount he received?

Mr. OLIVER:

1. Yes, commissioner of land titles, Yukon.
2. $10 per day, 133 days.
3. $1,594.57.

Mr. McLeod was accompanied by Messrs. Rinfret and W. F. Povah, but as he rendered only one account for the expenses of the whole party it is not possible to dissect his account showing the amount properly chargeable to himself.

A. G. WAKEFIELD, RANCHVALE, MANITOBA.

Mr. ROCHE:

Was A. G. Wakefield, of Ranchvale, Manitoba, in the employ of the Immigration Department during the years 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903 and 1904? If so, what duties did he discharge, and by whom was he appointed?

Mr. OLIVER:

Mr. Wakefield held no appointment, but performed duties as land guide, and correspondent for the Immigration Department in the years named, under an informal arrangement.

SHIPPING REGISTERED IN CANADA.

Mr. WALLACE:

What is the amount of tonnage of shipping registered in the Dominion of Canada, and how many seamen are engaged in same?

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN:

1. The total net tonnage of vessels on the register books of the Dominion on the 31st December, 1909, was 718,352 tons. The total number of men and boys (inclusive of masters) reported as employed thereon was 36,430.

TARIFF NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES.

Mr. LEWIS. Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to ask a question of the government. In doing so, I wish to say that while I do not represent the opposition, which is now being led by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. J. Haggart), and the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and while it is distinctly understood that I represent only myself, still I believe that every hon. gentleman around me will back me up. I desire to ask the government whether they are in a position to give the House and the country some definite statement before we adjourn for Easter in regard to tariff negotiations with the United States. This House is about to separate for a week, and will not re-assemble until the day before the time fixed for the application of the maximum clauses of the United States tariff to Canada, if they are to be applied. Does not the government consider that it is due to the business community of this country to give some indication as to whether we are to expect a tariff war or not? I wish to assure the government that the members of this House on both sides of it, I believe, are behind the government, provided they stand to their guns and do not give away one iota of our rights. I understand that the whole matter is dependent upon the importation of pulp-wood free into the United States.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING. I am afraid that, with every desire on my part to inform my hon. friend and the House generally of what they naturally desire to know in this matter, I am not in a position to give any statement to my hon. friend. He will no doubt understand that in negotiations of the character which it is known are now in progress, it would be impolitic in the highest degree to make any statement until a conclusion has been reached. At the conclusion of the conference which I had the honour to hold with the president of the United States in Albany, a brief statement was given out in these words: 'The president and Mr. Fielding have been in conference, and while no conclusion has been reached, the matter remains as one of friendly negotiation.' That was the condition at that moment, and that is the condition to-day. I am very hopeful that an early arrangement will be reached. But I can assure my hon. friend that I do not think any good purpose would be served by our making any further statement on that subject to-day. I am satisfied that the desire he has and that we have is the same, and he will agree with me, on reflection, that it would only be embarrassing the situation for the government to make any statement at this stage.

Mr. LEWIS. If the House will allow me to make one remark, I wish to assure the hon. the Minister of Finance that we are behind him in standing by the guns of Canada in this matter. While I realize that perhaps he would not feel at liberty to give any information on certain points, still he must remember, and the Prime Minister may be assured, that in so far as they stand by Canada in this matter we are behind them irrespective of party. I wish to say this also——

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot enter into a discussion after he has put the question.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely wish to state to the minister my intention of giving him——

Mr. FIELDING. I accept my hon. friend's statement.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to say to the minister that I am with him.

Mr. LENNOX. Before my hon. friend (Mr. Lewis) had propounded his question, I had taken the liberty of sending a memorandum to the Minister of Finance on a question I proposed to ask him, and which I do not think will involve the disclosure of any state secrets. I wish to ask the Finance Minister this question: Having regard to the fact that parliament is now in session, will the Finance Minister assure the House that he will not agree to admit the United States to participation in the intermediate tariff, or otherwise substantially to alter the tariff conditions between Canada and the United States, without first submitting the proposals to parliament? I do not think an answer to that question would involve the disclosure of any secret, but it will enable us to understand that we shall be consulted before anything is done.

Mr. FIELDING. I am obliged to my hon. friend for his courtesy in sending me in advance a notice of his question. I agree that an answer to it would not involve the disclosure of any secret, but it would involve a declaration of policy, which I think would rather embarrass the freedom of negotiations which we desire that the government should have. I must ask my hon. friends on both sides of the House rather to assume that the government are thoroughly seized of the importance of the whole question, and are dealing with it in the manner which they conceive to be consistent with the best interests of Canada. I do not think my hon. friend, on reflection, will feel that he ought to press this question. In respect to what has been said by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Lewis), I may say that if there are to be any guns in the matter, we will be exceedingly glad to have the hon. gentleman along with us behind the guns. But if we can avoid the use of guns at all, that will be much better.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPROULE. Before we separate for the holidays, I want to ask the government a question about the probable length of the session. When we go home, no doubt many questions will be put to us as to the probable duration of the session, and consequently I would like to ask the First Minister if he is in a position to give us any information with regard to what measures the government propose to put through, and what others they propose to bring down, any information which will enable us to estimate more closely how long the balance of the session is likely to last.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am glad to say to my hon. friend that any additional programme of business we shall lay before the House will be of a very light character. We shall have some supplementary estimates for the coming year; we shall have resolutions about dry-docks, and we may have some other matters which at the present time I am not at liberty to disclose. But on the whole, I think there is nothing to prevent us from having a very early prorogation.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it the intention to go on with the Insurance Act and the Banking Bill? These are two important measures.

Mr. FIELDING. Although the Insurance Bill is a lengthy Bill, it is one which the House considered last year with great care, and this year the Senate has also given it a great deal of attention, and I think it is in such good shape that we can deal with it without its delaying us much. I am beginning to despair of getting the Bank Act through, and if there is no reasonable chance of getting it through this session, it will stand over until the beginning of next session.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to ask the Prime Minister as to the progress that is being made by the committee appointed by himself for the revision of the rules of this House for the purpose of shortening the sessions. There is a strong feeling in reference to the matter through the country, and I would impress upon the Prime Minister the necessity of something being done this session in regard to revising the rules, which are now a hundred years behind the times.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I am able to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Lewis) that we had a meeting of that committee this morning. We shall have another meeting almost immediately after the recess, and in the meantime I will be very glad to receive all communications that come to me from my hon. friend suggesting amendments to the rules.

Mr. LEWIS. But does the Prime Minister promise anything?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will be very glad to promise every possible consideration.

MANITOBA FISHERY REGULATIONS.

Mr. BRADBURY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew the request to the government for a copy of the new regulations regarding the Manitoba fisheries. I made my request across the floor of the House, and I have repeated it to the acting minister. I understand these regulations are not printed, but that they have been submitted to the acting minister for approval. What I desire to have is an opportunity of seeing them before they are passed by council, if it is possible. I think that I could, perhaps, save the minister a little trouble by seeing them. If the Minister of Marine and Fisheries were in his place I know that I would have no trouble in seeing them.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I thought it was understood between my hon. friend (Mr. Bradbury) and myself that just as soon as the regulations were drafted and ready for consideration my hon. friend would see them. I certainly thought that I had given him that understanding. The deputy minister of the department informs me that these regulations are now being prepared, and they will be submitted to my hon. friend.

Mr. BRADBURY. That is all I desire. I would like to get a copy of them. I made application to the department, but I could not get them there.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Until the regulations become law I do not think it would be wise for the department to give copies out, but the hon. gentleman can unquestionably see them.

COTTON'S WEEKLY.

Mr. HERRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) to an article in reference to a complaint from the publisher of 'Cotton's Weekly.' He claims that his paper is being unjustly discriminated against. I put certain questions of the order paper on the 2nd of March to which the Postmaster General replied, but his reply does not seem to be satisfactory to the publishers of this paper. I would draw his attention to one part of an editorial written in reply to the Postmaster General which is as follows:

Do you not know that the Montreal 'Star' and 'Witness' and the Toronto 'World,' 'Globe' and 'Telegram' are sending bundles of their papers through the mails to parties who order an occasional bundle at a rate sixteen times lower than what you are compelling me to pay? Are you not aware that every little local paper is doing the same thing whenever occasion arises?

I have no interest in these matters beyond a desire to see fair play, justice and equity meted out to all publishers alike. I suppose there is a provision in the Post Office Act which allows the thing to be done under certain conditions. What I would like to know is how the Postmaster General learns what papers, when sending bundles, keep within the letter of the law and what papers do not? How does he know that a 'Globe' bundle, or a 'World' bundle, is all right and the bundle of the poor man's paper all wrong? Can 'sample' bundles be sent by the rich man's paper, while the poor man's paper for doing the same thing is an outlaw? Is one supposed to be respectable and the other assumed to be disreputable?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX. I need not say that I bear no ill will to the publisher of 'Cotton's Weekly'. That gentleman seems to be under the impression that the department is discriminating against his paper. Such is not the case. I have fully explained to Mr. Cotton, and to his many friends in the country that there is no discrimination, but that we are simply putting his paper under the ordinary regulations of the department. But Mr. Cotton has started a campaign against the department, and against the minister. I have nothing to say about that except what I have already stated in the House. Since I made that statement to the House the other day, which I need not repeat, because my hon. friend will find it in 'Hansard', Mr. Cotton in his paper has made a statement in regard to the accusation of discrimination against his paper. I find there is an affidavit from his business manager, in which it is stated that:

I, the undersigned, H. A. Webb, business manager of 'Cotton's Weekly,' being duly sworn, do depose and say: Not being a subscriber to the undermentioned newspapers, and not being engaged in the business of a news agency, I did send for a special bundle of the following five papers, namely, the Montreal 'Daily Star,' the Montreal 'Daily Witness,' the Toronto 'Daily Globe,' the Toronto 'Daily World,' and the Toronto 'Daily Telegram,' for each of their issue of March 1, 1910.

And he adds further that these papers came in bundles to him without bearing the address of any one inside. Well, I do not dispute this statement. It may be quite true that a gentleman might have asked these various offices to send a dozen of each of these papers. The House will notice that these are all well known papers having, in every part of Canada, a very large number of subscribers. I might explain to the House that papers, such as the Toronto 'Mail', Toronto 'Globe', Montreal 'Star', or the Montreal 'Witness', are first sent to the post offices as they have a very large circulation, the post offices have excess to their lists of subscribers, and the papers settle their accounts with the post office. But we do not affix the stamps on each parcel because we would have to use too large a quantity of stamps for that; so that it may happen that in a case like this a bundle is sent without bearing the individual addresses of the subscribers, because there is such a large quantity of these papers in the post office in such cities as Toronto, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, or Winnipeg.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it not a fact that all these papers are sent in bundles to news agents all over the country?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, and there is a proviso in the law by which the news agent benefits by the special rate. But the case of Mr. Cotton is radically different. In the first place he has comparatively few subscribers, but he sends his paper to friends who distribute it. The rule of the department is that a paper must have bona fide subscribers, and where the paper is sent them in bundles the rate is one quarter of a cent per pound. As regards this particular case I am not satisfied; probably there may be a mistake. I want to know the circumstances of each case, and I have written to the postmistress at Cowansville where the bundles were received. The following letter was sent out to-day to the postmistress:

The postmistress will find herewith a clipping taken from 'Cotton's Weekly' of 17th March, and her attention is particularly called to the following paragraphs:—

That I particularly called the attention of the postmaster of Cowansville to the fact that no postage stamps are affixed, and that he held up said bundles until he could communicate with his superior postal authorities.

That the said bundles were later delivered to me without postage stamps affixed, evidently upon the direct instructions of the superior postal authorities.

There is no record in the department of any communication from the postmistress upon the subject referred to, nor any instructions having been given. The department desires to be informed whether the statements referred to in this clipping are correct; if so, to whom the postmistress wrote for instructions; and to furnish the department with copies of any instructions she may have received from any officer connected with the postal service.

As the postmistress is aware, the duty of seeing that proper postage is paid upon newspapers and periodicals rests with the postmaster at the office where they are posted, and not with the office of delivery, unless any packages have specially been marked as short paid, when, of course, it is the duty of the delivering office to see that the deficient postage noted on the parcel is properly collected before delivery is made. If, however, the postmaster at any post office of delivery has reasonable grounds for believing that copies of newspapers and periodicals recognized as entitled to statutory postal privileges are being received at his office for delivery at a cheaper rate of postage than should properly be paid, it is the duty of the postmaster at once to notify the department of each instance, if possible procuring the wrappers upon which the address appears, so that steps may be taken by the department to properly investigate each case.

Mr. HUGHES. If a newspaper, for instance, the 'Globe,' sends a bundle of newspapers by post to a news agent in Lindsay, is that prepaid?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, it is prepaid.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the Postmaster General to say that when a bundle is sent in cases like that, a list of subscribers to whom the papers are delivered is furnished.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. But most of these news agents receive a large number of papers in addition to those for subscribers, which are sold over the counter. The list cannot be reliable, because the number will change perhaps twice a week, and a news agent may send in an order for 25 or 50 extra copies.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Of course in this as in any other matter it is a question of good faith. A leading newspaper has no interest in hiding its status or its number of subscribers, and the department must take their word. The weight is taken at intervals, and while, of course, the weight of the newspapers is not uniform from day to day, the Saturday issue being much heavier than the ordinary issues, very few errors are made in regard to the weight, by the postal officers. This business is followed very closely, and I can assure my hon. friend that no errors are made.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the Postmaster General quite certain that campaign literature, for instance, is not sent out in the bags furnished to the newspapers not prepaid?

Mr. LEMIEUX. These bags are examined at the office where they are sent, and we have an officer at the station where they are delivered to the postal clerk. As regards the adding of campaign literature, even the adding to a newspaper during a campaign, of special sheets printed say in Toronto and sent to other papers is made the subject of a special charge for that weight. A member on this side of the House saw me in reference to that recently as a newspaper in his riding had been charged for campaign literature sent in this way, but the regulations of the department are such that such a charge could not be avoided.

Mr. HUGHES. The regulations are all right if the inspections are right.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The inspection is all right.

MONTREAL HARBOUR COMMISSION.

House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

1. Resolved, that it is expedient to provide that the Governor in Council may, from time to time, advance and pay to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, hereinafter called the corporation, in addition to the money, if any, heretofore authorized to be advanced to the corporation by the Governor in Council by any Act, and which has not at the date of the passing of any Act founded upon these resolutions been so advanced, such sums of money, not exceeding in the whole the sum of six million dollars, as are required:—

(a) to pay off and retire debentures of the corporation of the par value of one hundred thousand dollars, maturing in the year 1910, and,

(b) to enable the corporation to complete the construction of the terminal facilities of the port of Montreal, for which plans, specifications and estimates have been approved by the Governor in Council, and to construct, such additional facilities as are necessary to properly equip the said port, and in respect of which plans, specifications and estimates have, previous to advances being made, been approved by the Governor in Council;

2. That during the period of construction of the terminal facilities mentioned in these resolutions the interest payable on the debentures receivable by the Minister of Finance in exchange for such advances shall be deemed to be money required to complete and to be part of the cost of construction thereof, and such interest may be paid out of the said sum of six million dollars.

3. That the corporation shall upon any advances being made deposit with the Minister of Finance debentures of the corporation equal in par value to the advance so made, repayable within twenty-five years from the date of issue, and bearing interest payable half-yearly, at the rate of three and one-half per centum per annum.

4. That the principal and interest of any sums advanced under any Act founded on these resolutions shall be payable, subject to the second of these resolutions, out of the revenue of the corporation mentioned in section 8 of chapter 10 of the statutes of 1896, and shall be a charge thereon as if the sums so advanced had been borrowed by the corporation under said chapter 10.—Mr. Fielding.

Mr. FIELDING. This resolution proposes to extend to a further amount the aid which the government have been for some years granting to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal. In former times the Harbour Commissioners issued their own debentures, but for some years now the government have been assisting the works of the Harbour Commissioners by lending them the government credit, thus enabling them to obtain the money at a much lower rate than they could raise it by the issue of their own debentures. The first loans were made by the government at 3½ per cent, and as the money market conditions improved the rate was reduced to 3 per cent. Now that money has become a little more expensive we are fixing the rate on the new loan at 3½ per cent, the idea being that in each case the Harbour Commissioners shall be charged as nearly as may be what the money costs the government. The sums already authorized and loaned by the government being about exhausted, and there being still important work to be done, the commisssioners have applied for an extension of the amounts so to be loaned.

We are proposing by this resolution that further advances shall be made to them to the extent of $6,000,000. That will be distributed according to the plans of the commissioners, the time is not limited in the Bill, over a period of about three years. The purposes for which this loan is required are to extend the general system of harbour improvements, and terminal facilities, which is already at Montreal, and which, even in its present condition, has, I think, won in the highest degree the commendation of the people of Montreal, and of many others outside of Montreal, who are interested in the work to apply $100,000 to meet maturing debentures, which were issued years ago under the old system; and to extend the operations of the Harbour Commissioners, including wharf construction, deepening the harbour adjacent to the wharfs, lessening St. Mary's current by dredging, construction of sheds on wharfs, extension of the present harbour system of railway tracks, providing proper unloading facilities, and improved methods of handling cargoes. These in general terms indicate the nature of the works on which this money is to be expended. In every case, before expending the money the commissioners are obliged to submit their plans and specifications to the Governor in Council, and get their approval. The arrangement has worked very satisfactorily in the past. The present Harbour Commissioners are men who have met with the highest approval of the public interested in this great work, and I think the extension of this loan will meet with the favour of the House, and the country. I should add that the interest on these loans has invariably been paid with promptitude. It is proposed, in accordance with the principle contained in the Railway Act, that during the period of construction, when no money can be earned, the interest on the sum advanced shall be deemed to be a part of the cost of construction. The interest on the sums which the government have advanced to the commissioners has been fully paid up to the 31st of December, last, so that the transaction as between the government, and the commissioners has been a very satisfactory one. The commissioners have had the aid of the government credit, the work has been well done, and I think the whole transaction is one that finds favour with parliament, and the country.

Mr. J. HAGGART. If I understand the hon. gentleman aright, he has not the plans of the proposed extension.

Mr. FIELDING. No, not to cover fully the period of three years. The commissioners will only send us plans of the work from time to time. The plans for past works have been submitted before any money has been expended, and that will have to be done in the future; but no plans have yet been submitted under this Bill, though the general charter of the work proposed is understood.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I do not understand how they made an estimate of $6,000,000, unless they had plans. Information as to where this work is to be done, and how it is to be done is very necessary. I was once on a committee appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the improvement of harbour facilities in the port of Montreal. A plan was then suggested for building new docks a little below St. Mary's current. The opinion I formed at the time was that all the money you may expend for docks, warehouses, and other facilities in Montreal, as at present proposed, will never accomplish anything, and that a big new plan ought to be adopted for building a large dock below the city, with warehouses alongside of it, and railway tracks on each side. I cannot of course speak of the present plans, as I know nothing about them; but I should judge from the remarks of the Finance Minister, that they are on the line of fixing up or tinkering with the works at present in Montreal. My opinion is, not that you should abandon these works, because they can be utilized, but that you should have a bigger scheme than you have at present. I would like to ask the minister what depth of water is to be provided for—35 feet or 30 feet?

Mr. FIELDING. The question of deepening the St. Lawrence channel is not in the hands of the commission. I think the Marine and Fisheries Department provides thirty feet of water, though as to that I would not speak positively.

Mr. J. HAGGART. It is proposed to deepen Lake St. Peter to a depth of thirty-five feet, and you need at least the same depth in the harbour of Montreal. What I want to know is, are the commissioners providing a sufficient depth in the harbour to meet the new requirements of navigation on the St. Lawrence?

Mr. FIELDING. I am quite sure they are; but when the Bill comes for a second reading, I shall be glad to give my hon. friend a more direct statement. I have no reason to complain of the operations of the Montreal Harbour Board on the ground that they are too small. They are quite comprehensive enough, considering the amount of money involved. The commissioners have outlined in a general way a scheme of harbour improvements which has been largely advertised in the public press. When I say that there are no plans, I mean that there are no plans that the government have approved of; but the commissioners have very large and generous views. They have plans which may not have attracted the notice of my hon. friend, and if it is desired that these plans should be brought here, I shall be glad to have them brought. If we were called upon to approve of the whole scheme of the Montreal Harbour Board, it might call for a good deal more than $6,000,000; but the proposed works are entirely in line with a very comprehensive scheme which they have adopted after having made a very careful examination of harbour improvements and terminal facilities on the continent of Europe, in England and in America. So that I am sure that what they are doing is in accordance with a broad scheme, and is not a mere tinkering with the old conditions. But I shall be happy, when the Bill comes for a second reading, to bring all the information which my hon. friend desires.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the minister give us an idea of the amount of money already expended and the estimated expenditure after this whole scheme is completed?

Mr. FIELDING. The scheme, so far as the government is called upon to approve of it, contemplates this $6,000,000 extended over a period of three years. I do not say for a moment that that will be the end of it, because the business of Montreal, with the business of the whole Dominion, is developing rapidly, and I should not be surprised if at the end of three years there should be a demand for a further sum; and I have no doubt that if the commissioners require it, and have paid interest in the meantime, parliament will be glad to provide it. But in providing for three years, I think we are looking as far forward as is desirable at present. As to the amount of money already expended. The amount outstanding of debentures of the Montreal Harbour Commission is $13,142,000, of which debentures to the amount of $1,972,000 are held by the public; but the government loans, represented by debentures deposited by way of security, amount to $11,170,000, to which this $6,000,000 will now be added.

Mr. S. HUGHES. Do the proposed plans take into consideration the place below the rapids?

Mr. FIELDING. The limitations of the harbour have been enlarged. The scheme is in that respect a broad one, and some of the works are below St. Mary's current.

Mr. SPROULE. If I understood the minister right, he said that we were not exactly loaning the money, but giving them the power to borrow on our credit?

Mr. FIELDING. No, we loan the money.

Mr. SPROULE. And we advance them the money?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. A portion is to pay off the expiring debentures of the corporation at par value during 1910. To whom are they payable?

Mr. FIELDING. To the outside public, not to the government.

Mr. SPROULE. Then the Harbour Commissioners do issue debentures?

Mr. FIELDING. They did in former years, but they are not issuing any now, except for the purpose of depositing them with the government as security.

Mr. SPROULE. The interest payable on the debentures is receivable by the minister, and the commission pass their debentures over to the government in lieu of money?

Mr. FIELDING. In return for our advancing them the money they give us the debentures, which we hold as security.

Mr. SPROULE. There is nothing in the resolution to show the assent of His Excellency the Governor General?

Mr. FIELDING. That is never found in the document itself. It is found in the intimation made to parliament when the resolution is moved, and that was made.

Mr. J. HAGGART. My hon. friend said that of this $6,000,000, a portion is to be retained as before for the payment of interest during construction, and he intimated there were other portions in the same position. What is the amount which is retained by the government for that purpose?

Mr. FIELDING. The sum so paid, in the form of interest on construction, and therefore part of the capital, amounts to $355,000. As to what is to be paid after this, that will be a matter for the future.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What is liable to be paid at present on the sums borrowed before?

Mr. FIELDING. There is nothing due. The matter has been adjusted to the 31st of December last. The total sum charged as interest during construction was $355,000. There is no interest account outstanding at present.

Mr. J. HAGGART. They borrowed a certain amount for construction before this $6,000,000 on similar terms. We have been paying ourselves interest out of the amount we lent them. Has that total amount been paid?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, the matter was adjusted to the 31st of December last, and all interest properly chargeable in that way was charged up. The government received it by adjustment of the account, and the amount so charged, as distinct from the expenditure on the works themselves, was $355,000 There is no outstanding amount, no liability not dealt with in the way I have described.

Mr. SPROULE. We have paid them out of the loan?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes. In the adjustment of the account they are entitled to charge up, as portion of the cost of the work, the interest on capital during construction just as would be done in case of a railway and for the same reason.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The work has been constructed and finished, and that ends it.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. minister gave two sets of figures which represent that amount we have advanced up to the present to the commission, namely, $13,142,000 and $7,170,000. What is the explanation of the different figures?

Mr. FIELDING. The sum of $11,170,000 represents the amount which the government has lent to the Harbour Commission. The sum of $1,972,000 represents debentures held by the public and which were issued before the system was adopted of the government lending the money and the commission giving the government their debentures. As these $1,972,000 debentures fall due, the government will have to provide for them.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What interest do you receive on the $11,000,000?

Mr. FIELDING. On the first loan 3½ per cent, on the others 3 per cent. The market is, however, higher now and money costs us 3½ per cent or a fraction more, so that we are charging 3½ per cent on this loan.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 191) to provide for further advances to the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. FIELDING moved second reading.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I have no objection to the second reading, but before the third reading I would like to see the plan of the harbour, and what is proposed to be done.

Mr. FIELDING. I will see that whatever information is available of that kind will be on the table before the third reading.

Mr. SPROULE. When the late Mr. Tarte was Minister of Public Works, the government was represented on the commission and kept substantial control over the works. What control has the government now?

Mr. FIELDING. At one time the Harbour Commissioners were rather numerous, representing various interests associated with the commerce of Montreal. Several years ago that system was changed, and the government appointed three commissioners who have the entire management. They are Major George Washington Stephens, Mr. C. C. Ballantyne and Mr. L. E. Geoffrion. They are appointed by the government, responsible to the government, and all plans and specifications and whatever they propose must be submitted to the Department of Marine and Fisheries before any work is done or money expended.

Mr. SPROULE. And assented to?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, it must receive the approval of the government before they can spend any of this money. I think this is as complete control as the government could have under a system of commission.

Mr. SPROULE. The government have no engineer in connection with this work? There is no revision except the plans being submitted to the department to be examined here and approved?

Mr. FIELDING. The commission themselves have very capable and competent engineers to assist them. After their plans are completed and sent for approval they pass under the revision of engineers of the department, so I think the matter is fairly guarded.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Who is the chief engineer?

Mr. FIELDING. Mr. Cowie is the gentleman who has for many years been over this work, an engineer of high standing.

Mr. SPROULE. Are these commissioners paid by the government?

Mr. FIELDING. Out of harbour earnings. They are under control of the government and are paid out of harbour earnings.

Mr. SPROULE. Out of the appropriations?

Mr. FIELDING. Out of earnings —charged to revenue.

Mr. BARKER. Is this expenditure audited on behalf of the government? Is there control such, for instance, as examination by the Auditor General?

Mr. FIELDING. I think not. We have followed, in that respect, the system which has been in existence for many years. Perhaps there may be something to be said in favour of audit by the Auditor General. I have not had the matter brought to my attention before. It may be well worthy of consideration.

Mr. BARKER. I should think it would be. It looks as if this were to be the government's property some day. Therefore, we shall not get the money back any more than if we had spent it directly on the work.

Mr. FIELDING. I think there is something in that. Of course, the Harbour Commission have an efficient system of administration, and, no doubt, the matter is in good shape. There is a public report every year which is accessible. I will discuss with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is the proper officer in charge, whether these accounts ought not to be submitted to the Auditor General.

Mr. SPROULE. How could you do that if the accounts are not paid out of consolidated revenue?

Mr. FIELDING. If we wish to do it, we could have the Auditor General given necessary power.

Mr. SPROULE. The Auditor General acts under authority of law, and there must be a limit.

Mr. FIELDING. The treasury board has the right to qualify the Auditor General in respect of other matters.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT.

House went into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Fisheries Act, chapter 45 of the Revised Statutes, 1906, by—

(a) Defining the standard size of the barrel in which oysters are sold, bartered or trafficked in;

(b) Prohibiting the taking, buying, selling, possessing or exporting of fish for the purpose of converting it into manure, guano, or fertilizer, or for its manufacture or conversion into oil or manure or other fertilizing product, without a permit from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; and

(c) Providing for the bringing into force, by proclamation, the regulations prepared by the International Fisheries Commission between Great Britain and the United States, now before the House, and to authorize the making of regulations to secure their enforcement, and fixing penalties for their violation. —Mr. Templeman.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Under the present Fishery Act, there is no provision as to the size of a barrel of oysters. Consequently, there is no assurance to the purchaser that in purchasing a barrel he will receive a certain quantity. One purpose of the Bill to be proposed will be to provide that a barrel of oysters shall be of equal dimensions with the barrel ordinarily used for the sale of flour—seventeen inches diameter at the top or bottom, nineteen inches at the bulge and twenty-eight inches in height.

Another proposed amendment is to regulate the taking of fish to be used as a fertilizer. The present law provides that no one shall catch fish to be used for this purpose. That is too sweeping altogether, inasmuch as there are many fish that can well be used for fertilizing purposes. The proposition is to give the minister power to name fish that may be used for manufacture into fertilizer.

It is proposed also, under the Bill to be submitted, to authorize by proclamation the regulations agreed upon under the International Fisheries Commission relating to the taking of fish in international waters.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What did the minister say with regard to the prohibition of the use of fish as fertilizer?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. We propose to give the minister power to define the kind of fish that may be taken to be used for this manufacture. For instance, there are dogfish and other voracious fishes that are of no use for human food. The minister will have power to authorize the use of such fish for manufacture into fertilizer.

Mr. J. HAGGART. There nas been a discussion in the House two or three times about dog-fish, and it was stated that they were being utilized for that purpose.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. As a matter of fact the present Act is being violated every day, because they take dog-fish and utilize it as a fertilizer. I was asked the question if farmers might not use the surplus for manuring their lands, which I believe they are doing down in the maritime provinces. No doubt under the new provisions the minister will permit that to be done.

Mr. BLACK. There are places in the maritime provinces where farmers are manuring the land with young shad and young salmon. They have weirs for catching fish, to which the farmer goes when the tide is out; he takes home for food what is large enough, and what is small he dumps into a cart and carries off to his farm for manure.

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM. Dog-fish has been a great injury to the fishermen along the coast, both because it destroys the nets and destroys other fish, and it seems almost a hardship that a man must get permission from the minister before he is allowed to take these fish and destroy them. The Act proposes to prohibit the taking of dog-fish to be converted into oil or manure except on license by the government. I think that is not advisable. I think the destruction of dog-fish should be encouraged rather than discouraged. They make good oil and they make a good fertilizer. Along the shores of Northumberland Straits and in parts of the county I have the honour to represent, they catch these fish to a considerable extent and use them as a fertilizer. I am sure that if the minister were to take the views of the fishermen he would find that they are in favour of encouraging the destruction of this dog-fish as much as possible; and farmers would say that it is a hardship to them to have to get a permit to use dog-fish. I think it would be better to allow freedom in the destruction of these voracious fish that are of no use for food. There is another thing the Act should cover, and that is the wholesale destruction of useful fish by steam trawlers. They operate with large nets, and take great quantities of fish, of which they throw overboard those that are not useful for their purposes. A great waste is going on in that way. Fish that would be useful if allowed to escape are thus being destroyed, and the fisheries along our shores are being depleted by the use of these steam trawlers. Some provision should be made against the taking of these smaller fish, or if they are taken, they should be allowed to escape instead of being killed in nets and allowed to drift along the shore.

Mr. TALBOT. While this subject is being discussed I wish to draw the attention of the minister to the taking of small and immature bar fish in the St. Lawrence. For years I have been drawing the attention of the department to this subject, and I have also had occasion to speak to Prof. Prince about the immense destruction of bar fish that is taking place. It is the finest fish we have in the St. Lawrence. They are caught by the thousand, but so small that the fishermen after catching them are ashamed to bring them on the market, and they sell them to pedlars who go about the country retailing them from house to house. They catch fish of from four to seven inches in length that are almost useless for food, nobody would dare to bring them on the market, because he would be laughed at; and so they are destroying that fish by the hundreds of thousands every year. It is really a pity, because it is one of the finest fish we have in the St. Lawrence, and attains a size of two or two and a half feet in length, and a weight of from six to nine pounds. Some stringent measures should be taken to prevent the fishermen selling this fish to the pedlars for distribution. There should be a close inspection made, and nothing of that kind should be allowed on the river. It is now allowed all the way down the river on both shores for a distance of 60 or 75 miles. It is the finest fish we have in the St. Lawrence when allowed to mature, and I consider it a perfect scandal that they should be destroyed in this manner. The fish resemble the bass.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I wish to express the same view as my hon. friend from Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm). I think it will be a hardship to require the people who catch dog-fish along the coast first to get a permit from the authorities before they can use them for manure. I trust the minister will make an exception in the case of destruction of dog-fish and permit, not only the catching of them, but encourage it, because this fish is destroying the other fish that are of use. It is really one of the greatest scourges we have on the Atlantic coast. The dog-fish arrive in the summer time when the water gets warm; they come up from the south, they tear up the nets, they eat up the other fish that are in the nets, and practically the fishermen have to go out of business when the dog-fish arrive. The government has at present two or three places on the coast of the maritime provinces where these fish are purchased and turned into manure. This has been going on for a few years, and while it has lessened the quantity to some extent, still the Atlantic ocean is so large, and these fish are so numerous, that there will not be any material lessening of them by means of these establishments. A great number of them, however, are being caught and turned to some useful purpose. It is also not an uncommon thing for fish to decay before they are taken out of the water. Occasionally a fisherman's net sinks, and when he is able to find it, with a quantity of fish in it, they are of no use except for manure. The difficulty of going for a permit in isolated cases of this kind would be great, and I trust that in the regulations which may be made the minister will keep that in mind. The idea of the minister is a good one. He wishes to preserve the fisheries, and of course we all agree in that object. But I trust the regulations will permit exceptions to be made in the case of destructive fish, and also in cases where it would be to the advantage of everybody that these fish that are not fit for food may be used as manure. I also agree with my hon. friend from Antigonish in what he says of steam trawlers. The steam trawlers operating on the banks are chiefly owned outside of Canada; they are increasing in number. A few years ago they were almost unknown on our coast, although there are many of them in in use in Britain and in the North Sea. But they are coming across the Atlantic now to operate on the banks of Newfoundland, and along the coast of Nova Scotia. They are very destructive engines. They catch not only the mature fish that are fit for food, but they also catch the small ones. The trawler is a steamboat that drags a large net along the bottom of the sea, with a wide mouth, and it takes in everything, both small and large. The small ones are crushed to pieces at the end of the net, and I suppose twenty-five per cent of the fish caught in these trawlers are of no use whatever for food, because they are too small and immature. I think you will find, on investigation, that they have destroyed the fisheries to a large extent in the North sea, and it would be a good thing if we could keep them away from the Atlantic coast altogether. It would require, of course, international arrangements to do that. I have no doubt that the government of the United States would be quite willing to enter into arrangements by which these trawlers would be prohibited on the banks and along the coast of eastern Canada. I have drawn the matter to the attention of the minister on several occasions. As the hon. member for Antigonish has mentioned it, I merely wish to say that I am in full accord with him, and I would like to see something done in that connection.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Why is it necessary that there should be a permit issued by the government to enable persons to catch these deleterious fish, that are such an injury to other fish, and sell them for manure?

Mr. SINCLAIR. I quite agree with my hon. friend that there should be no permit necessary in the case of fish that are not fit for food and are better destroyed. Of course, it is different in the case of mackerel, herring, codfish or any of the food fishes. If these food fishes are caught and used as fertilizer it should be stopped, but I trust that the minister will not ask for any permit for catching and destroying fish that are better destroyed.

Mr. SPROULE. Should not that have been included in the reference to this International Fishery Commission, and have been dealt with as well? I notice in the last part of the resolution the words:

> Providing for the bringing into force by proclamation the regulations prepared by the International Fisheries Commission between Great Britain and the United States, now before the House.

I did not understand that these words were before the House. I understood the minister to say, when the orders of the day were called, and in answer to my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury), that they would be ready in a short time, and that he would be prepared to go over them with my hon. friend.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The proposed regulations prepared by the commission were brought down in the shape of a return, and have been printed and circulated.

Mr. SPROULE. What was it that the minister referred to in answering my hon. friend from Selkirk? He spoke of fishery regulations.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Those were in reference to Manitoba.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Those were local regulations in reference to Lake Winnipeg, while these have reference to international fisheries in boundary waters. These are the regulations framed by Professor Prince and Mr. Jordan, the two commissioners.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Have these international regulations been brought down to the House?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Yes, they were brought down in the shape of a return, and they have been printed. The treaty under which these regulations have been framed provides that they shall be brought into force by joint proclamation of the two governments at a date to be fixed in the future. I assume that they will be brought into force in time for the fishing operations of this year, but this resolution provides that the Fishery Act may be amended in such a way as to empower the government to proclaim these fishery regulations. It has been deemed advisable by the Justice Department that the power of proclaiming these regulations as law should be in the Act. I may say, in regard to what my hon. friends from Antigonish (Mr. Chisholm) and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) have said in connection with the catching of these voracious fish, that it is thought necessary to have some amendment to the present law. The present law reads that 'No one shall catch fish for the purpose of using it as manure'; consequently, every person who takes dog-fish and converts it into fertilizer is violating the Act as it stands. Our desire is to amend that clause and give the minister power to define what fish or marine animals may be used as fertilizer. If it is done by means of permit, there will be no difficulty in granting permits to any persons who want them. It is merely to define what fish and marine animals may be used for this purpose. I know that at the present moment on the Pacific ocean there is a company aiming at the capturing of sea-lion, hair-seal and dog-fish for the purpose of converting them into fertilizer. There is no question that a permit should be given to any person who will capture and convert them into fertilizer.

I am advised with regard to trawlers, that as soon as a trawler was brought to this coast from Europe—I believe there is only one on the Atlantic coast at the present time—an order in council was passed prohibiting the operation of that trawler within the three-mile limit and within bays. I would assume that outside of the three-mile limit, this government has no control, and it would be a matter of international regulation. At all events, within the three-mile limit the use of trawlers, which my hon. friends say is very destructive to fish, has been prohibited.

Mr. WM. CHISHOLM. It is quite true that an order in council has been passed prohibiting the operation of these trawlers within the three mile limit. It is also true that as far as the Canadian parliament is concerned it has not jurisdiction beyond the three mile limit. That is a matter of international regulation. But, I submit that the time has come when the department or the government might seriously consider the making of some international arrangement whereby the operation of these trawlers could be prevented or controlled. It is a fact that along the shores of Nova Scotia the fishermen have to set their trawls outside the three mile limit; they have to go five or six miles out. I know that along the shores of Antigonish county when the steam trawler 'Wren,' was operating last year, and the year before the fishermen had to take up their gear because they were afraid it would be destroyed by the steam trawler. The regulation which has been passed, and which exhausts the jurisdiction of the government in the matter does not to any substantial extent protect our fishermen along the shores. Those engaged in the cod fishery practically had to give up business last year, and the year before. Their gear was threatened with destruction by this trawler. The trawler, while manoeuvring during its operations, will destroy the nets of the fishermen without those in control of it being conscious of the fact, and I would urge upon the acting minister, as I have urged upon the minister, that the matter be taken up as soon as possible, and some regulations brought about to prevent the operation of the trawler within ten miles, or, at all events, within six miles of the coast. The order in council prohibits fishing within the bays, and harbours of Canada, but what is the meaning of bays and harbours? The Americans have put a certain construction on it. They claim it means three miles from the shore, following the sinuosities of the coast. The Canadians have always contended that the three mile limit means three miles outside of the land measuring from headland to headland. If the Canadian interpretation were followed it would not make so bad a situation for our fishermen, but as it is, the practice being to follow the sinuosities of the shore in determining the extra territorial limit our fishermen are subjected to great annoyance and injury by these trawlers. I would request that an endeavour should be made to prevent this. This government it is contended could control its own subjetcs, and make it illegal for any Canadians to engage in this kind of fishing which is very destructive. But if such an attempt were made the same thing would happen here as happened in the old country. The moment Canadians were forbidden to fish in trawlers, they would fly some other flag, possibly the French flag. A number of French trawlers are fishing on the banks outside the three mile limit, and the department could not stultify itself by prohibiting Canadians from what other French and other fishermen do. A regulation of that kind was passed in Scotland some time ago, and the instant it was done Scotch and English trawlers registered in a Norwegian port flew the Norwegian flag, and then they could fish outside the three mile limit of Scotland with impunity. The only way to relieve the situation, and save the fishermen is to have some international regulation made prohibiting the operation of trawlers at least within six miles or ten miles of our coast.

Mr. HENDERSON. My reading of the regulations would be that a time is already fixed in some instances for the coming into force of the regulations. In my section the fishermen are relying on the wording of the regulations as given out by Dr. Starr Jordan and Professor Prince, and are governing themselves accordingly. For example with reference to the size of a mesh for taking small fish in Lake Ontario we are told:

No gill net or other movable net of less than four and three-fourths inches mesh, extension measure, as actually used in fishing, shall be drawn, set, placed, or maintained for whitefish or lake trout in these treaty waters.

No gill net or other movable net of less than three and one-eighth inches mesh, extension measure, as actually used in fishing, shall be drawn, set, placed or maintained in Lake Erie—

And this is the part to which I more particularly refer:

—or of less than two and one-half inches mesh in Lake Huron, Lake Superior, and Lake Ontario, for fish other than whitefish or lake trout.

The above restrictions shall take effect on and after January 1, 1911.

The fishermen in my section quite understand that whatever may be done by the government in the way of a proclamation these regulations shall not be brought into force, at least those in regard to the size of the net, until January 1, 1911. I understand that the minister proposes to authorize under an Act of parliament a proclamation declaring when these regulations shall come into force. It is important that these regulations shall not be brought into force at once. The fishermen have large quantities of nets on hand, and if they are compelled to use a mesh even one-eighth of an inch larger than what they are using now, it would be a serious matter for them, as they would have to throw away their nets and purchase new ones. I hope the minister will not bring the regulations into force at an earlier date than January 1, 1911; I would rather impress on him the necessity for extending the time for bringing these regulations into force for another year. The nets the fishermen now have will last for two years from the first of January last, and it would be only fair to the fishermen to allow them to use their present nets until they are worn out, especially as the difference in size is so very slight.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The authority that is taken under the resolution is to empower the Governor General by proclamation to bring into force the international regulations prepared by the International Fisheries Commission appointed under the treaty signed at Washington, April 11, 1908, between Great Britain and the United States concerning the fisheries in waters contiguous to Canada and the United States. With regard to the date on which these regulations shall be brought into force, if I remember rightly, under the treaty both governments have to proclaim them as taking effect on a certain date. We might, with the concurrence of the United States government, fix the first of January 1911 as that date. It is quite true, as my hon. friend says, that the first of January, 1911, is mentioned in one of the regulations as the date on which it shall take effect, which is rather peculiar, in view of the fact that the regulations might not be proclaimed until after that date. However, I think it is the desire of both the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and of the United States government that these regulations should be proclaimed so as to have effect during the fishing season of 1911. It is not deemed possible to have the regulations effective before that date, and therefore it is not at all probable that they will be proclaimed as taking effect before that.

Mr. HENDERSON. What time of the year would the hon. minister consider to be the fishing season? The class of fishing to which I refer is carried on all the year round, except perhaps during the warmer weather in summer. Some of the regulations may be brought into force sooner than others; but there would be nothing lost to the department by extending the time even for another year in the case of the regulation to which I refer, as there is only ¼ of an inch difference in the size of the nets. I hope that the minister, in preparing any legislation in regard to this matter, will deal as leniently with the fishermen as he possibly can.

Mr. SINCLAIR. When the minister said that there was only one trawler operating on our coast, I presume he meant one Canadian trawler. There has been a large increase in this method of fishing in the last few years. In 1907, according to statistics which I have, there were seven French trawlers which came across the Atlantic and operated on the banks of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland; in 1908 there were fourteen; and last year there were about thirty. They have been a great annoyance to the regular fishermen on the coast, both Canadian and American, and I am informed that there are no other trawlers at all operating on the Atlantic coast. These trawlers are nearly all owned in France, and they are invading our waters. These banks on the coast of Nova Scotia are the breeding ground of the codfish and the haddock, which are the most valuable fish we have; and if they continue to operate there, I have no doubt that these valuable fisheries will be destroyed. Therefore, I wish to impress upon the acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries and on the Prime Minister the importance of dealing with this question if there is any possibility of obtaining international arrangements by which these trawlers will be prohibited from operating on the banks. A few years ago arrangements were made by which the seal fisheries of the Pacific coast were protected by international law, and I consider that the protection of the breeding grounds of the codfish and the haddock on the Atlantic coast is of equal importance. I have the best reason for believing that the government of the United States would join with the government of Canada in anything that could be done to prohibit that mode of fishing. The banks on which these fish are found are not very large or numerous. They are confined to a few hundred miles, and there is a large fleet of Canadian and American vessels engaged on these banks. The fishermen's method of fishing is to put their gear into the water, leave it for a time, and then take it up. In the meantime, these trawlers come along and destroy it, so that when the fishermen take up their gear, they find only a few remnants left, and often their whole outfit is swept away. I trust that the matter will be dealt with seriously, and that if possible international arrangements will be made to control or prohibit parties engaged in this destructive method of fishing.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The question which my hon. friend has raised is a very large one, of an international character, and we cannot at the moment make any declaration. If we are going to have regulations dealing with trawl fishing, there is no doubt that it will be necessary for the United States, Great Britain, France and all other countries engaged in that industry to participate. I do not know whether in the past any negotiations have taken place looking for the regulation of trawl fishing. I am aware that trawlers are coming to both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. We have power to regulate them only within the three-mile limit, and that has been done on both coasts. I will direct the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the observations of my hon. friend in 'Hansard', and will impress upon him the importance of giving full consideration to this question.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I wish to ask the minister if the regulations set out in this return have been adopted by the American government without any change beyond what is shown here. I understand that some objection was taken to them and that efforts were made to have some changes made in them.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The regulations have not been adopted by either government and will not be adopted until they are proclaimed concurrently by both governments. The regulations as printed were agreed to by the two commissioners, and it simply remains for the sanction of both governments to make them law. That, I understand, is the present position

Mr. SINCLAIR

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Has there been any change made by Professor Prince, and the representative of the United States?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. No.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The regulations stand just as they are?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I understand so.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Has the American government made representations asking for changes?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Not to the knowledge of the department.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Is it the intention of the department to stand by these regulations or does it intend permitting changes to be made?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The intention is to proclaim these regulations just as soon as the United States government do. We must act concurrently. The regulations become the law of both countries on the same day, but I think the treaty provides that changes may be made from year to year on the unanimous decision of the commissioners.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. This return shows what regulations are agreed upon between the two commissioners, but I understand that representations have been made to Washington by some parties interested in the United States to have changes made, and Professor Prince has been in Washington again. I would like to know, because some of my constituents are interested, whether it is the intention of the government to permit any changes?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am informed that the department has no knowledge of any proposal to make any change, and does not know that the American fishing interests are asking for any. I would assume that, as the regulations have been agreed to, no changes will be made, but I think the treaty itself provides for the making of changes from year to year on the unanimous consent of the commission.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The United States government virtually say in the treaty that they are going to secure the assent of the various states interested to a proclamation carrying into effect these international regulations. The minister is no doubt aware that, so far as the great lakes are concerned, any property rights in the fisheries belong to the states, and are held by the states, and that the various states have different regulations. For instance the regulations of New York state, on Lake Ontario, and those on Lakes Erie and Huron, are different. It was suggested, at the time the treaty was made, that it would be advisable to have the control, and the regulation, and the governing power vested in the federal government. I have followed this question, and I cannot see that the American government has secured the consent of the state governments to permit the federal government to deal with the fisheries on the Great Lakes at all; and until such time as the federal government of the United States has secured that consent, I do not see how it can have any status at all in the matter. Why then should we make any regulations with them at all of an international character? We have taken power to make international regulations. It seems to me we are travelling a little far in agreeing with the United States to do certain things, when the Americans can back out of their agreement by saying that the state rights interfere, but will insist all the same on our sticking to our bargain. Another point is that the Americans have not taken any steps towards a close season. I do not see that any attempt is made under these regulations to have a close season at all. To my mind it is absolutely necessary for the protection of our fisheries that there should be a close season. In looking over the regulations, I find that the American position is that assumed by them all the way through. Is it the intention of our government to go into a deal of this kind with the federal government of the United States without that government having the authority from the various states to carry out its bargain?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. My understanding of the question of jurisdiction in the United States is that while the various states have control over the fisheries within those states, when the United States government make a treaty with a foreign country, that treaty supersedes state rights. I believe that such is the opinion of the Washington government.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What authority has the hon. minister for that statement? The entirely opposite view was taken with reference to the Sault Ste. Marie Falls.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I understand that is the view of the Justice Department at Washington.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Where do you find it?

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The hon. gentleman is catechising me on a legal point. But it is not at all likely that the United States government would have entered into this agreement unless the federal authorities thought they could enforce the regulations they were preparing.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. Has the minister read the correspondence brought down last session on the matter? The correspondence shows that the federal government 'hopes' to secure the co-operation of the state governments.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. I am stating the international aspect of the question, as I understand it. Whether I got that impression from the public press or from some return or document, I am not sure.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. It is just an inspiration.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. Why would the federal government at Washington appoint a commissioner, and enter into a compact with Canada to do certain things, if they did not believe they had the power to enforce their regulations?

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The documents show that they say they 'hope' to be able to get the various state interests to consent. If the various states consent to allow the federal government to deal with the matter, then the federal government may act to some purpose, but they have not done so.

Mr. CONMEE. My hon. friend is not a little mistaken in the view he takes. The states of the union are not in the position of riparian owners in the case of water rights. They are in exactly the same position as the northwestern provinces in this confederation. The federal government is the owner of all riparian rights, not only in the lands but in the water.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. What is the hon. member's authority for that?

Mr. CONMEE. The constitution of the United States, and the fact that the states of the union are not owners of the land as are the old provinces of Canada. I think my hon. friend will not pretend to dispute that.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The hon. member (Mr. Conmee) cannot quote a single case in United States jurisprudence to bear out his statement.

Mr. CONMEE. I can put the matter the other way—the hon. member (Mr. J. A. Currie) cannot find any evidence to the contrary.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I will give an instance. At Sault Ste. Marie, the state of Michigan had granted water rights to a certain portion of St. Mary's falls to a private individual. These power rights became vested in a company or syndicate. When the Waterways Commisison endeavoured to treat with the St. Mary's falls, a protest was entered, the matter was fought out and the decision of the court was that the riparian rights belong to the state, and not to the federal authority.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member is entirely mistaken; the facts of the case are not as he has stated. What happened on the American side is pretty much what happened on the Ontario side. The province of Ontario gave a charter for the development of power on the Canadian side. The state of Michigan did the same. To give that development on both sides, the company got United States federal authority. The action of the courts to which my hon. friend refers upheld, not the authority of the state, but the authority of the private owner. But the state itself was not the riparian owner. The American courts have held that the riparian owner, if a private party or company who have purchased from the state—that is, from the federal government—has an interest in the riparian rights which has to be satisfied. That case is not fought out yet, but I think it is conceded that the riparian owner, whether individual or company, must be compensated for his rights.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. From whom did the owner get his title?

Mr. CONMEE. From the federal government of the United States?

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. No, from the state of Michigan.

Mr. CONMEE. He got legislation from Michigan

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. He got his title there.

Mr. CONMEE. How could he get the title from Michigan to develop a power, when the state of Michigan did not own the land? All the land is sold through the medium of the United States. The state of Minnesota, except with regard to land that has been given to it for school and other purposes, does not own the soil of the state. And the state of Michigan is in the same position.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. I am sorry for the hon. member (Mr. Conmee), for he is very much astray. The case he cites shows only that he has not the faintest, hazy idea of the situation. The fact is that the state of Michigan gave that power to a private individual and granted the land under the river in fee. The case has been fought out, and it has been decided that if the federal government takes over a water right, it must compensate that owner. As to what the hon. member said about a state of the union not owning the land, there is no state in the union that will submit to have its ownership of its own soil challenged.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member (Mr. J. A. Currie) is entirely ignorant of the history of the United States. I do not say that what I have been contending in this matter applies to such states as the state of New York. But, as to the state of Michigan, the state of Minnesota and others, they are in exactly the same position as our own northwestern provinces—they do not own the land at all.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Who owns the water-powers of New York on the St. Lawrence—the state authority or the federal?

Mr. CONMEE. I will not speak as to the state of New York, for it was a Crown colony before it became a state.

Mr. J. HAGGART. It has been decided that the power rests and is vested in the state of New York.

Mr. CONMEE. My hon. friend (Mr. J. Haggart) has heard information read in this House which ought to give him light on that subject. The state of New York has no power over and cannot give control of the St. Lawrence river. It has no legislative jurisdiction over it. It gave a water-power to the very company over whose Bill we sat up all night recently, but before the right was complete, it had to be ratified at Washington.

Mr. J. HAGGART. But surely the hon. member knows the distinction. The federal authority has rights of legislation in regard to navigation, and, so far as state rights interfere with that of the federal authority, they are set aside. But all the profits that come from the users of water-powers on the St. Lawrence in the United States belong to the state adjoining.

Mr. CONMEE. No, that has been fought out in the United States very fully. The most important case arose on the Michigan side of the river at Detroit, over a question of building docks. It was held that the riparian owner had certain rights which must be satisfied before even the government of the United States could place a dock there. Now, that is not quite the case on our side. In this country the Crown can assume control of that very well.

Mr. J. HAGGART. How could a private individual get his right—from the federal authority?

Mr. CONMEE. I assume so.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The hon. member is drifting to his water-powers again. I don't like to get into these water-power deals. Let us keep to the point. What authority in the United States is it that issues the fishing licenses on the Great Lakes?

Mr. CONMEE. My hon. friend (Mr. J. A. Currie) has water on the brain to-day. I am not responsible for what the various states may have done. The provinces in this Dominion have issued fishing regulations, and the province of Ontario collects a license fee for fishing. The states of the union do the same.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I might suggest that as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) is now in his place, he might be allowed to assume his role.

Mr. CONMEE. The hon. member (Mr. J. Haggart) wants a higher authority than myself? I am quite willing.

Mr. J. A. CURRIE. The question simply is whether the states consent to give the whole jurisdiction to the federal authority. That is a simple question, and I am sure the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will recognize not only how simple it is, but how pertinent to the subject under discussion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The question the hon. member has put is a fair one. I believe that, at the present time, the accepted doctrine in the United States is that the treaty-making power is the paramount authority and supervenes the rights of the states. I do not agree in everything that has been said by the hon. member for Simcoe with regard to the rights of the states and the rights of the federal government. But in this matter I think it is now accepted that the treaty power of the United States is the supreme authority and supersedes the rights of the states.

Mr. J. HAGGART. No doubt that is the authority under which the arrangements were made. The federal power of making a treaty supersedes state rights, and the federal government contend that they have the power to enter into negotiations of this kind although the property may belong to the state.

Resolution reported, read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 192) to amend the Fisheries Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAND TITLES ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. OLIVER, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 125) to amend the Land Titles Act. said: The registration of titles in unorganized territory is provided for by this government. In what is now called the Northwest Territories, that is to say, the country lying north of the three prairie provinces, provision is made in the Land Titles Act for registration within that territory. There has been very little granting or transfer of titles in that territory up to the present time, but a condition has arisen where the actual title has been earned, and it is desirable that the title should be granted. No provision has yet been made for the registration of title within those territories, and no such provision is possible without an amendment of the Act. The conditions are such, there being so very few titles to register, that it is not thought advisable to establish a registry office within that territory at the present time, and we ask for an amendment to the Act to allow the titles in the Northwest Territories to be registered at Ottawa. It is simply a temporary provision, until progress requires the establishment of an office actually within the territory.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. OLIVER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 141) to amend the Indian Act. He said: This Bill contains three clauses, the provisions of each of which are entirely distinct. The first clause provides for the better protection of Indian lands. It is, of course, an understood principle, that the Indians have the sole right of occupation of their reserves. But in the opinion of the Justice Department, the procedure whereby that exclusive right of occupancy is to be exercised—the procedure by which it may be enforced, is not altogether efficient, and it is on the advice of that department that I am asking for this amendment. The second section relates to contracts made by the Indians which would obligate their band or communal funds. While it has always been an understood principle of the Indian Act that band funds or Indian property, that is, tribal property, cannot be obligated by any agreement entered into by the Indians except with the approval of the government—although that has been the understanding, there seems to have arisen some question about it, and it is thought desirable to remove that question by he provision of section 2.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Has this an ex post facto effect?

Mr. OLIVER. No, it would not have any ex post facto effect.

Mr. J. HAGGART. It might have.

Mr. OLIVER. It was not intended to have. Section 3 is intended to put beyond question the absolute right of the Indian to the money that he is entitled to receive from the government; that is to say, to declare that it is not subject to attachment by legal process.

Mr. J. HAGGART. I do not yet seem to be very clear with regard to the first clause.

It applies where there is a dispute between an individual, a corporation or other parties and the Indians as to the ownership of land?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. J. HAGGART. That has to be decided by the Exchequer Court?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What court has jurisdiction at the present moment?

Mr. OLIVER. That seems to have been the difficulty. While the law declares the position, the procedure is not defined. This is designed to provide the procedure.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Is this clause intended to apply to the difficulty which at present exists with reference to the Oka Indians?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. J. HAGGART. It would apply to it. The jurisdiction seems to be exercised by the local courts in Quebec as to the ownership of that particular property. Now the jurisdiction is removed from the local to the Exchequer Court. It may be the better plan, but we want to know the facts.

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly. It has not any reference to the Oka case. In that case the question before the courts is: Is that an Indian reserve? One step in the procedure has been taken, and as the House knows, we have made arrangements to carry the case to the Privy Council. This legislation is not dealing with that case at all.

Mr. SPROULE. It would be very reasonable to suppose that this legislation does apply. It says:

If the possession of any lands reserved or claimed to be reserved by the Indians is withheld, or if any such lands are adversely occupied or claimed by any person.

The question is to be determined by the Exchequer Court. This statute, I would take it, would apply to all such cases in future. These cases have been pending in other courts for some time.

Mr. OLIVER. I would think that if the Oka case had not been in the courts then possibly this would apply, but, of course, the Oka case having been entered in the court and being under judicial investigation—

Mr. J. HAGGART. The last dispute with the Indians is not in the court at all; it only occurred a month or two ago.

Mr. OLIVER. There is a stated case before the courts for the purpose of settling the question as to whether this is an Indian reserve or not. I would take it for granted that so long as that case is under consideration and until it has reached its conclusion it would not be proper that this legislation should intervene. But it will be clear that if there is a necessity for such legislation, and in our estimation there is a necessity for it, we cannot very well postpone it, because there happens to be a case in the court which might be affected by it. If there is any danger of a clash I would much rather have the exception declared in the Bill, but my understanding is that it is not necessary.

Mr. SPROULE. The Minister of Justice is right at the minister's hand, and this seems to be of sufficient importance to get the advice of the Justice Department on it.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would like to ask the minister to leave this Bill over and not put it through to-night, as there are some members of the House who are not present, and who would like to be present when the Bill is passed.

Mr. OLIVER. On the point raised, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) understands that the rule is that cases under procedure are not affected by a law made after the proceedings were instituted. That is his view, and I think it is certainly fair and no doubt is good law.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Ex post facto legislation would be interpreted in the strictest sense in favour of the contention that the legislation should not apply. The point is this: Disputes have arisen between the Indians and parties there with reference to the cutting of wood. The question as to the right of cutting wood, or of the ownership of the property, has not yet gone to the courts, and it would, under this legislation, have to come to the Exchequer Court. I think that all cases in dispute as to ownership with respect to Indian lands must be decided by this court.

Mr. OLIVER. That is the intention.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice that section 2 declares that:

No contract or agreement binding or purporting to bind, or in any way dealing with the moneys or securities referred to in this section . . . . shall be valid or of any force or effect, unless and until it has been approved in writing by the superintendent general.

That would cover the annuities paid to Indians?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Consequently they cannot barter off their rights without getting the consent of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

Mr. OLIVER. That is the purpose we have in view.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought that was the law now?

Mr. OLIVER. Everybody supposed that was the law, but apparently there has been some mistake on the subject, and we want to make it the law unquestionably. It is not introducing a new principle; it is merely affirming a well recognized and accepted principle.

Mr. J. HAGGART. Has this an ex post facto effect?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. J. HAGGART. This would not cover applications of money made in an unjustifiable manner with the partial consent of the department of roads, or repairs, or anything of that kind without the full legal consent of the Indians to it? It does not cover the past; it is intended for the future.

Mr. OLIVER. I would think that it could not legally cover the past, and certainly in administration I would say that it should not and that it is only in the future that it should have effect.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is this law intended to apply to Indian lands in the older provinces?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not quite appreciate why the right of trying a question between an Indian and an ordinary man in Nova Scotia should be removed from the Supreme Court. Does this take away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to try a dispute with reference to land or trespass which might be a very slight matter? I believe that questions of that kind should be tried in the Supreme Court of the province without going to the Exchequer Court which with us is regarded as a very clumsy remedy. We do not have the Exchequer Court in the province more than once in two years, and to secure a remedy from it is considered rather difficult. It is true we do not often have suits with Indians, but we would like to have the right to settle them when they do arise in the same manner as ordinary suits. As to whether the law is retroactive or not I quite agree that it is not retroactive unless it is specifically made so, but it is a different proposition when you come to deal with jurisdiction. With regard to rights it would not be retroactive, but on the question of jurisdiction of the courts it would be retroactive.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. J. HAGGART. This preserves all the old procedure and remedies, and at the same time enacts this new remedy?

Mr. OLIVER. I take it that this would allow an action for trespass or a minor action to be taken before the local courts, but a more important case would come before the Exchequer Court.

Mr. J. HAGGART. The intention of the section should be more clearly stated.

On section 2,

Mr. J. HAGGART. This certainly is ex post facto. It must certainly apply to some agreements made in the past.

Mr. OLIVER. If my hon. friend thinks that is so, and it can be guarded against by words added, I would be quite willing to guard against it.

Mr. BARNARD. While the minister is amending the Indian Act, has he considered the advisability of amending section 89 of the Act? That section provides for the control of money arising from the sale of an Indian reserve, and provides in effect that not more than fifty per cent of these proceeds can be given to the Indians. It seems to me that there might be cases in which it would be advantageous for the government to have a discretion as to giving a larger proportion to the Indians directly, instead of funding it for their benefit. For instance the question of the Songhees reserve in Victoria is a burning one and great difficulty has been found in making a settlement with the Indians to get them off the reserve. As a matter of fact, although there have been many efforts there has been no result. It has been my opinion that one of the sticking points is that the Indians cannot see where they are going to get a sufficient inducement in cash at the present time. If one of the contentions put forward by these Indians for their desire to remain on that land is correct it seems to me there is no reason why they should not get a larger proportion, if not the whole of the purchase money directly. They contend that a number of their young men and women are working in factories and other places in the town, and it is a convenient place for them to live, and they do not want to be disturbed. If they are sufficiently enlightened to work in the factories they are able to take care of their funds. If the section were amended by striking out the words 'not exceeding fifty per cent' and leaving it discretionary with the Governor in Council to deal with the funds either by funding them, or handing them over to the Indians, it might be a step towards a settlement of that very vexed question.

Mr. OLIVER. It would be contrary to the established policy of the government of Canada in dealing with Indians to treat Indians generally in that way. It is generally considered that there should be a permanence of revenue from any property which the Indians have, and the Act as it stands, allowing 50 per cent to be paid directly, is a big step in advance of the Act as it formerly was, and I doubt if it would be acceptable generally to allow a larger proportion to be paid. I quite appreciate the very difficult character of the conditions which my hon. friend has in mind. I would very much rather provide for that particular case, which is very exceptional, by a special Act, than to amend the general Act to meet a special case.

Mr. BARNARD: If one could have a positive assurance that a special Act would be brought down to deal with that case, there would possibly be no necessity for making this amendment. But I have no doubt that is not the only case. I know that there is a case within the limits of the city of Vancouver, and the people there are very anxious to get rid of that reserve. Not very long ago the Minister of the Interior made an effort to settle with the Indians in regard to this particular reserve. He was prepared to offer them a certain sum in cash, amounting to $2,000 per family for 40 families. The Indians were asking for more, but the minister said, I cannot go any further, because I can only give you 50 per cent of the value of the reserve. That being the case, if such an amendment as that proposed were made, it would materially assist the settlement of that question.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. J. HAGGART. What business will be taken up on the first day after the vacation?

Mr. FIELDING. We will continue on the Bills which have been discussed today, and which we have not been able to put through—the minor Bills. Almost anything except the Naval Bill will be taken up on the opening day.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 p. m.

INDEX

SECOND SESSION—ELEVENTH PARLIAMENT, 1909-1910.
