Then, again, I think this type of legislation has proven its worth from experience, and I am not going to take the time to go into that. We in British Columbia know, after some years of experience with this type of legislation, it has been the salvation of the fruit industry and has put that industry at the present time on a sound financial footing, provided that we get the type of legislation which is required in the future to supplement provincial marketing legislation. I think that is admitted generally.

Another point, Mr. Speaker; at this time many of us are concerned about the youth of this country returning to the farms. I am one who is very much interested in the building up of the rural population of Canada, because I believe that so long as we have healthy rural communities and a prosperous agriculture, we shall continue to have a democratic and prosperous Canada.

Many of us are particularly concerned in seeing that the young veterans returning from the last war particularly have an opportunity to become established on the farms. We find that many boys raised on the farms—I have some of them in my own district and in my own constituency—are hesitant to locate on farms. Why? Because they want to be assured of some measure of security in the future. I say—and I think I shall receive general agreement in that respect—that if we can have the type of legislation demanded by the farm organizations of Canada we shall at least be showing these boys that we are doing all that is within our power and under our control at this time to secure for them a satisfactory living on the farms in the future.

I must say that I cannot understand the attitude of this government, a Liberal government which professes to support free enterprise. I say that this government, professing the principles of free enterprise, has, in recent months, struck some heavy and lusty blows at democratic enterprise in this country, and by its failure to bring in this national marketing products act legislation is causing a great deal of delay in democratic action by farmers in Canada. We must not forget that this government for the first time taxes cooperative societies. I am one who believes that the cooperative movement is the economic penicillin of modern society.

Then this government is now apparently failing to act as a result of the farmers demand to enact farmers marketing legislation. I cannot understand that, coming from a government professing Liberal principles. When I think of these things, of the history of the Liberal party to which I once belonged, and read the speeches and writings of the great leaders of Liberalism of the past, I am beginning to think the spirit of Liberalism is departing from the benches opposite.

An hon. MEMBER: It has gone long ago.

Mr. HERRIDGE: It has gone, shall I say, in connection with the cooperative movement. The delay in natural farm products marketing legislation is arresting the activity of a large section of the Canadian people at this time, people who are not coming to the government asking for something for nothing, asking for cash, asking for subsidies or asking for a hand-out. They are simply asking this government to place upon the statute books of this country legislation which will give them an opportunity to manage their own affairs to the best advantage, in a democratic way.

In conclusion, may I say that I am going to support the bill in the hope that some amendments will be put forward which will improve it. I do say that I think even this bill indicates that the Minister of Agriculture has taken a few steps forward to the penitent's bench and I trust that, before many days are past, his conversion will be complete to the faith which is now held by the farmers of this country in the value of the legislation they demand.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, while I intend to support the bill, I rise particularly, after listening to the speeches all afternoon and evening, because I am afraid that the position of many members of the house might be misconstrued in the same manner as the position of the Liberal party has been misconstrued. There is misconception in the minds of many people that the Liberal party are out to kill the cooperative movement. That misconception is a result of discussions which took place in the house last year and is one which many of us are finding it difficult to contradict. Many wild statements have been made. We have realized that amendments have been moved this afternoon with the object of trying to tack on to this bill marketing legislation which has been asked for by various organizations. It is with that thought in mind that I rise, at least to place myself on record in the house and to make a few comments regarding some of the things which have been said.

I think it can be fairly said that most, if not all, hon. members of the House of Commons are in favour of marketing legislation. I think it can also be fairly said that every member, whether he represents a city riding or a farming constituency, is in favour of the farmers having control of their product. I think that goes without saying. I do not think any member will get up and contradict what I have just said. But I wish to say this, and I have never said it in the house before regarding marketing legislation, if I am a member of the house when marketing legislation is introduced, I am one of those who are going to endeavour to see that in the marketing legislation all the regulations and all the laws relating to it will be in the legislation introduced, because I think there is great danger unless that is done. Some of the marketing boards have gone much too far in Canada, as a result of provincial legislatures passing something like an omnibus bill giving some of the officials what I claim to be too much power and authority. That must not be interpreted as meaning that I am against marketing legislation, because I am in favour of it. But I am in favour of this parliament putting every regulation and every bit of power into the bill before it passes and becomes the law of the country. I wish to place myself on record clearly on the matter.

I now come to another point, the selling of produce. I think it can be fairly said that, over the years, the history in Canada has been a tragic one of farmers trying to sell their surplus products. It has been a tragic effort and has not been successful. I think the prices which the government has obtained under the agreements which we are dealing with under this bill have been accepted as being fair by all farmers throughout the entire dominion. That being the case, why the opposition to the bill?

I am speaking tonight not only as a member representing the constituency of New Westminster, but also as a member of the Pacific Poultry Association. I know full well, in the days past when we had a surplus of eggs, the tragic situation which arose with regard to price. Who was to take the surplus eggs which the poultry men had and market them in foreign countries or in Great Britain? No wholesaler would take the risk of taking a small shipment of eggs, going across to Great Britain and finding a market four or five thousand miles away from British Columbia, with the result that, on occasion, eggs dropped to a price as low as eight cents a dozen. Poultrymen went out of business and in many cases lost all they had.

So we come now to a time of war and of demand, and the government steps into the picture and makes an agreement. Will any member get up and say the price under the agreement is wrong? It is true that adjustments should be made. As we in British Columbia have been saying to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) adjustments should be made in the price of eggs now in view of the change in wheat prices. That is only natural because, so long as the government is controlling prices, just so long must it be responsible for the entire picture. Therefore we have had no compunction in coming to the Minister of Agriculture and demanding that the agreement made with Great Britain must be altered in some way.

I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I am going to say this. I doubt if we shall change this system in the future. A great many statements have been made about what the Liberal party is doing now as compared with what it did ten or fifteen years ago. Do hon. members realize that the lid has been blown off the top of the world, that the people are on the march, and are not going back? Do hon. members realize that governments today in certain countries are the purchasers of food and not individual wholesalers or buyers? Do they realize that no individual from Canada can go to those countries and make a deal? He is at a loss. What other agency is going to make a deal than the government of Canada through the Minister of Agriculture and the boards set up?

We listened all afternoon to hon. members trying to tack onto this bill a Natural Products Marketing Act, and probably trying to leave the implication that those who voted against the Speaker's ruling and speak now are against marketing legislation for the farmers. Let us now get the picture clear. The government is asking power for one year; and it would be tragic if it had not that power in so far as one branch of industry is concerned, namely the poultrymen. I think that would apply to every other branch of farming as well as to the poultrymen in British Columbia. So let us have the picture clear with regard to what we vote on, and let us not have it thrown at us that we are against marketing legislation. Mr. Speaker, I am going to support this bill.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am a modest sort of fellow and do not like to express opinions unless I know a little about the subject with which I am dealing. But since there are, evidently, so many immodest people in the chamber, I thought I might as well take a flyer too.

As I have followed the debate which has taken place in this chamber in connection with this bill, my understanding is that the principal difference between the members of this group and the government is that this is a temporary measure, special bill for one year, and we believe that is not what is called for at the present time but rather a measure that is more or less of a permanent nature. Whether that point of view is correct I do not know, but I do know that, when this bill expires, whoever may be minister of agriculture will be compelled—because circumstances will not be any different at the end of the year from what they are now—to introduce a bill that will do what we have been trying to do this afternoon. My point is that I am not sure whether or not this is the time to introduce such a measure. If that cannot be done, of course I shall support this bill, and I think my colleagues will do likewise. But we believe there should be more comprehensive legislation now.

As a matter of fact, the farmer is not seeking government assistance in marketing because he likes to have government assistance. He is seeking it because he has no other choice. The individual farmer today is not dealing with individual buyers but with large and powerful organizations. He is helpless in selling his products under those circumstances. He has, therefore, no choice but, first, to organize as farmer and producer groups, and, then, to seek through legislation, both federal and provincial, to obtain orderly marketing of his products. The farmer is compelled today to do what the industrial worker has done over the last 100 years; that is, to organize to sell his products. The industrial worker, having no property except his labour, could easily see where and how he was exploited. The farmer, having a certain amount of what he called property, required a fairly long time to understand that he was being exploited in the same way. He has now arrived at the point where he realizes that, and he is creating organizations for the orderly marketing of his products.

I was interested in some parts of the speech of the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton). I happened to be here in 1934 when the Bennett government was trying to get its marketing legislation through parliament. My hon. friend is quite correct when he says the Liberal party opposed it most strenuously. They debated the matter day after day, night after night, week after week, enlarging upon the dangers of government control and all that sort of thing. So much were they opposed to it that when the legislation was finally passed they took it to the courts, which declared it ultra vires. The only difference I can see now is that my hon. friends are doing the very same thing the Liberals did when they were in opposition in 1934. Referring to the fine of $5,000 provided in this act, as compared with the fine of $500 in the other legislation, my hon. friend asked, "Are the members on the government side of the house ten times as socialistic as they were in 1935?" Well, if the enlarging of the fine is the measure of their socialism, perhaps they are; but a great deal of water has gone under the bridge since 1935, and while my hon. friends on the opposite side of the house may not be as bright as those on this side, they have learned some things in those ten years. But there is another factor entering into the picture; that is, they are faced with the responsibility of administering the affairs of the country, and you cannot be as irresponsible on the government side of the house as you can be on the opposition side. That is something we do not always keep in mind.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No one knows that better than you do.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, I do not know. I have a feeling I have tried to be responsible since I came into this house. I may not have succeeded, but at least I have tried. I did not get much of an education; there were too many potatoes to dig, too many berries to pick and, when there was nothing else, there were stones to pick, so that there was not much time to go to school. But I had a fairly good training in the shorter catechism, and I have a good idea of what is it to be honest, so that I can never bring myself to the point where I can be irresponsible just because the other fellow has the responsibility; and I am in the same position now. I have said that I think what this group is asking for is reasonable; it will have to be done some time, and the only question is whether this is the time to do it, and whether this is the time we should try to force it to be done. If it is not, then we shall support this bill.

But let me get back to the point I mentioned a moment ago, as to the measure of the socialism of my hon. friends opposite. If the Conservatives in 1935 favoured legislation of this kind and the Liberals opposed it, and the Liberals favour it now while the Conservatives oppose it, does that mean the Conservatives in the house today are ten times less socialistic than they were in 1935?

Mr. FULTON: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. MARTIN: This bill is not socialism.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think I am able to define exactly what is socialism, but really it means the social organization of the efforts of the people of the community to provide for themselves. What may be called socialism today and denounced because it is socialism, tomorrow will be considered good and accepted because it is good, because it serves the needs of the community; as a matter of fact, because we cannot get along without it. Personally I have never been able to see that there was any great merit in leaving the resources of the country in the hands of a few people, because there was something democratic and fine about it, and making the mass of the people go to those few to obtain access to the economic life of the country from their hands. I was brought up on a farm. I have tried farming; I know what it is like. This is what I found. When I went to sell farm products, butter, eggs, lambs, potatoes, oats, pork and and so on, I always asked the man to whom I was selling the products, "What are you giving for this today? What is the price of potatoes today? What is the price of pork?"

But the funny part of it was, when I went to buy from these same people, I also asked what was the price, the price of the things I wanted to buy. So that the farmer, under conditions of that kind, got it, as the saying is, both coming and going. No wonder he has been skinned beautifully down through the years.

Just one point further; in regard to a statement made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I do not think I can agree with him—and I do not think he will, when he thinks it over—when he says that we must put all the details of marketing into a bill. I do not think that is possible. We would have so many clauses, sections and subsections that it would not make sense when you finished with it.

Mr. REID: If I might interrupt, I think they did that in the British House of Commons in their marketing legislation before 1939. All the regulations were in the bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot contradict the hon. member, because I did not see the legislation. But my personal opinion, for whatever it is worth, is that you cannot put all the details into a bill. Circumstances change from day to day, and the person or persons responsible for the administration of the legislation must have a certain amount of leeway so that they may be able to manoeuvre under those circumstances. If they are to be bound by legislation in an act, they just will not be able to do what it was intended they should do. So that I believe that, while the act should be as explicit as possible, we must, in the natural order of things, leave a certain amount of leeway to whatever board or minister, or whatever other officials are administering the act.

Let me repeat that this group will support this legislation. But we believe that what is required now is not merely an emergency bill for one year, but a measure which will meet the needs of the producers of this country for some years to come.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I am going to try to add further to the confusion. I rise at this time for the purpose of trying to get a few things clear in my own mind. First, I should like to say that when I first came to the House of Commons I was under the impression that I was entering the national parliament of Canada, a body which legislated for the whole country, on an equal basis. But I find, since coming here, that, instead of sitting in a national parliament, which should aim at the equalization of conditions in the country as a whole, I am sitting in a form of nine little parliaments of Canada, each of which is endeavouring to do everything it can for its own particular province. After my experience here, that is pretty much my conception of parliament at the present time.

A few minutes ago the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) rose in his place and spoke for his constituency. That is what he is here for. But, in addition to that, he talked about the west, and the extreme west. That is all very fine, too. Then he made reference to the great prosperity of the east at the expense of the west. For his benefit let me say that, so far as the extreme eastern section of Canada is concerned, that portion from Quebec to the east, his statement would not apply; he was thinking in terms of central Canada, the exploiting machine of the whole country.

The extreme eastern section of the country is in pretty much the same position today as in Europe—after having come through a war. It is on relief. It is 100 per cent unemployed, because of neglect in the field of labour relations on the part of the national government. Today they are going from coast to coast, seeking relief for the persons in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. They have chaos, and no one is trying to do much about it.

I say that for the purpose of—

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, you don't like it, do you? But you are going to hear it, so long as Mr. Speaker permits me the same latitude as other hon. members were given.

Mr. BROOKS: It is bad enough, but it is hardly that bad.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, it is that bad; it is that bad in the very section you come from.

Mr. BROOKS: No, not that bad, at all.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. GILLIS: Check up on your Minto mines, after a seven weeks' strike. I say this for the purpose of bringing to the attention of hon. members who emphasize conditions in the west, that I am thinking in terms of Canada as a nation. This is a national forum, and is supposed to look after the difficulties of the east and the west on an equal basis.

With respect to the present legislation, naturally I shall support the bill, because it is a step in the right direction. A minute ago the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) said it was a hesitant step on the part of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). Well, I hope that, before this parliament prorogues, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will take equal steps, no matter whether they are considered hesitant or not. I would hope that they would take those steps in the industrial field. I consider the step now being taken in respect of the marketing of agricultural products on a national basis is a long step forward.

This is not the farmers' problem; it is an economic problem. It affects the whole of Canada, and ramifies into all its economic processes. A minute ago the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) stated that the measure was necessary to protect the farmer, because he is an individual, and that the worker had done a similar job for himself a good many years ago. I do not see it in exactly that way. Under his cooperatives, and the like, the farmer has been organized for a long time. But when he had to go out barehanded and deal with Canada Packers, Swifts or the grain exchange, he was in exactly the same position as the industrial worker is in, whether organized or unorganized, when he has to deal with the same Canada Packers, Swift Canadian, British Empire Steel and Coal, General Electric, and such others of the few large organizations which control all the economic processes in this country.

As I said a minute ago, I hope similar legislation will be brought in by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to protect the fields covered by his department, including, for example, the marketing of lumber and the establishment of a national fuel policy for the regulation and sale, and the import and export of Canadian fuels, so that we shall be in the same position as are the farmers, with their boards.

I hope the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply will introduce a bill to set up a coal board, for the purpose I have mentioned; also to supervise the millions of dollars spent from the national treasury in the fuel industry, and to see that that money is spent in a manner whereby there will be supervision of imports and exports. That is not being done in industry today. That is why there has been industrial unrest. I hope, too, that the Minister of Labour will take a leaf from the book of the Minister of Agriculture and bring in a bill to establish national labour.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GILLIS: I know I am out of order, Mr. Speaker, and I will sit down in a minute.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member is not out of order, he is certainly on the borderline. I would call his attention to the fact that we are discussing Bill No. 25, to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products.

Mr. GILLIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I was just about to finish anyway.

Tonight I have listened to talk about peaches, strawberries, rocks on farms and potatoes, and then we have had the legalistic end of it from over here. I thought I might as well bother you a little bit and have you decide that I was also out of order. I am just going to conclude by saying that, as one from one end of this country which I consider has received a pretty raw deal, I feel that the people there will be greatly benefited by legislation of this kind in the economic field.

On motion of Mr. Bentley the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, March 17, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to extend to you and to all hon. members of this house best wishes for a happy and sober St. Patrick's day.

AGRICULTURAL PRICES

CHANGES IN POLICY WITH RESPECT TO OATS AND BARLEY

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested by a number of members of the house that as soon as possible a statement should be made with regard to the production of coarse grains in 1947. With your consent, I should like to read that statement to the house now.

The production of dairy products, meat, poultry and eggs in 1947-48 will depend upon the feed supplies available in the form of pasture, fodder, and grain crops.

The pasture, and to a large extent the fodder, acreage for 1947-48 are already determined. Farmers may increase the yields of both of these by the use of fertilizers to the extent that they can be made available, but the weather will be the determining factor in the quantity of feed produced from these sources.

The summer production of beef and dairy products largely depends on pasture, but the quantity of the product can be increased and the quality improved by the use of grain.

The winter production of beef and dairy products will depend upon the supplies of fodder and grain available. The production of pork, poultry and eggs, however, is dependent upon feed grain supplies throughout the year.

Practically all the feed grain supplies produced in 1946-47 have been consumed in the production of meats, dairy products, poultry and eggs. It is therefore not possible to increase the production of meats, dairy products, poultry and eggs in 1947-48 above the quantities produced in 1946-47 unless larger feed grain supplies can be made available.

In order to stimulate production of feed grains and to assure domestic supplies, the government has therefore decided to make a number of changes in policy affecting oats and barley. These changes are as follows:

1. Effective tomorrow, March 18, the system of advance equalization payments will be discontinued and the Canadian wheat board will stand ready to buy all oats and barley offered to it at new support prices. In the case of barley these prices will be based on 90 cents for No. 1 feed barley, in place of the former support price of 56 cents, in store Fort William/Port Arthur, and other grades at appropriate differentials to be fixed from time to time by the wheat board. In the case of oats, the new support prices will be based on 61½ cents for No. 1 feed oats, in place of the former support price of 40 cents, in store Fort William/Port Arthur, and other grades at appropriate differentials to be fixed from time to time by the wheat board. These support prices will remain in effect until July 31, 1948.

2. At the same time, price ceilings for all grades will be raised, in the case of barley to 93 cents and in the case of oats to 65 cents, basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur, or

Vancouver. The ceiling prices correspond with the support prices for the highest grades of barley and oats.

3. In order to avoid discrimination against producers who have already delivered barley during the present crop year, an adjustment payment will be made of 10 cents per bushel in respect of deliveries between August 1, 1946, and March 17, 1947, inclusive, thus raising overall returns to about 90 cents per bushel. As there is a loss in the barley equalization account for the 1946-47 crop year, no further payments are to be expected in respect of barley delivered during the present crop year. The oats equalization account for the crop year 1946-47 will, however, remain open, and net profits in that account, if any, will be distributed later to producers who delivered oats during the period August 1, 1946, to July 31, 1947.

4. In order to avoid the fortuitous profits to commercial holders of oats and barley that would otherwise result from the action that has been described, handlers and dealers will be required to sell to the wheat board on the basis of existing ceilings of 64¾ cents for barley and 51½ cents for oats, all stocks in their possession at midnight tonight, March 17. Under certain conditions these stocks will be returned to the holder for resale. Allowances will be made for the purpose of taking care of such items as carrying charges in terminal positions, special selection premiums, etc., which are considered, in the judgment of the board, fair and reasonable.

5. For the time being, because of the continuation of price ceilings on animal products, payments of 10 cents per bushel for oats and 25 cents per bushel for barley will be made within the same conditions as the 25 cent payment on wheat purchased for feeding purposes. The payment of these subsidies will have the effect of leaving the cost of these feed grains to feeders approximately at their present levels. I might add that I will shortly ask that a sum be voted to cover the cost of these feed subsidies.

6. And, finally, the wheat board, either directly or through agents will become the sole exporter of oats and barley. Any exports by the board will be from grain acquired by the board under the price support plan and the net profits therefrom will be paid into equalization accounts for the benefit of producers.

It is necessary to make a fairly detailed statement of these changes so as to clarify the position of the various interests concerned, but, from the point of view of producers, the important point is that they will now have an additional return of approximately 10 to 13 cents per bushel for all the barley they market from this date forward and several cents a bushel on the better grades of oats, over and above the total returns they have been receiving during the present crop year. In addition, producers will continue to receive any net export profits realized by the board as an additional payment at the end of the season.

Feeders, on the other hand, will be protected against any important increase in costs of the oats and barley they buy by appropriate subsidies, until the release of the products they sell from ceiling price controls. It will be observed that under this plan buyers and sellers may trade with each other without the intervention of the board, within the limits of the new floors and ceilings.

As I have indicated on previous occasions, it is the policy of the government to continue to pay freight on grain for feeding purposes and mill feeds shipped east from Fort William/Port Arthur and west from Calgary and Edmonton into British Columbia until July 31, 1948.

As these decisions come into effect, floor prices will be maintained for meats, dairy products and eggs, mainly through the operation of the British contracts. For butter, which is not under contract for shipment to Britain, the dairy products board will be authorized to establish a floor by making purchases during the season of heavy production.

In order to assure supplies to fill the contracts and to make adequate provision for Canadian needs, it is proposed to regulate exports and imports of all products which are subject to contract. This would be done under authority of legislation which is now before the house.

In any case in which a price increase or substitution of a price for a subsidy would have the effect of giving unwarranted profits to holders of stocks, such stocks will be purchased by the government at the old price and returned to the holders or sold at the new price. This procedure will make it possible to recover subsidy or prevent chance profits to the holders of stocks. I want to emphasize this point in order to discourage any hoarding in anticipation of increases in ceiling prices or withdrawal of subsidy that may take place in the future.

The government also wishes to announce that it intends to authorize the wheat board to increase its buying price for flaxseed, effective on August 1, 1947, from the present level of $3.25 to $5.00 per bushel, basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver and to buy sunflower seed and rapeseed at 6 cents per pound under the regulations at present in effect.

In reply to questions asked by the hon. members for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and New Westminster (Mr. Reid) I wish to state that the floor price on eggs was increased by one cent a dozen for the months of February to August, and by two cents a dozen for the months from September to January, prior to the increase in the cost of feed wheat. In addition, provision has been made for an increase of one-half cent per dozen to cover increased cost of packages, which increase would otherwise have been charged to producers. Furthermore, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance I am announcing that the wartime prices and trade board will remove the ceiling on shell eggs forthwith.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

INQUIRY RESPECTING HAINES CUT-OFF

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Last Thursday the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald) asked me a question as to a letter said to have been written by General Eisenhower, regarding the closing of the Haines cut-off from the Alaska highway. At that time I thought the hon. member's question was primarily with regard to General Eisenhower's letter and I said that I had not seen this and did not know what it said but that as the road had never been completed it was not going to be closed in the ordinary sense. On Friday, the hon. member made another inquiry as to what was meant by this.

The Haines cut-off, as it is called, is a road 145 miles long, running from the Alaska highway through sections of the Yukon, the province of British Columbia and Alaska to Haines on an inlet from the sea. The Haines cut-off was under construction by the United States government during the war and it was never completed in that several portions are not gravelled and certain bridges are of temporary construction only. In dry weather in summer time there has been no difficulty in travelling the road with any ordinary vehicle, and as far as the Canadian government is concerned the road has not been closed. Over part of the road the snowfall is heavy and the location of the road makes it very difficult to clear the snow. Steps are not now being taken to complete or maintain the road.

FISH

CANNED AND SALTED—DISCONTINUANCE OF INTERNATIONAL ALLOCATION

Hon. H. F. G. BRIDGES (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) asked me a question arising out of a statement I had made on Thursday as to the discontinuance of international allocation of fish. I had said that allocation of salted cod and other salted groundfish from Canada's 1946 production would come to an end on June 30 next and that there would be no allocation of such fish from 1947 production. My hon. friend inquired whether I had reference to all types of salted fish or only to groundfish and, in particular, he wished to know whether restriction on the salting of herring would be removed.

My reference, Mr. Speaker, was to salted groundfish only. As a matter of fact, no other salted fish were ever under international allocation, although, for a time, certain of these other salted products were subject to allocation by our own food requirements committee. This latter control ended on December 31 last. As for herring salting, my hon. friend presumably had in mind dry-salting of herring on the Pacific coast. During the war we halted this dry-salting in certain areas so that a maximum quantity of herring might be available for canning. This restriction ends on March 31.

COAL

PRESS REPORT OF SUBSIDY PLAN

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): On Friday last the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) directed my attention to an item in the Halifax Herald of March 13 relating to coal subsidies, and asked me to make a statement on the matter. Before doing so perhaps I should explain what the general policy is with respect to import subsidies on coal for consumption in private dwellings. Bituminous coal imported into Canada for consumption in private dwellings, apartments and rooming houses, but not including hotels or institutions of any kind, and anthracite are eligible for subsidy to the extent necessary to reduce the cost of such coal to the point at which it can be sold under established price ceilings. That has been the policy of the government since the establishment of the over-all price ceiling.

The newspaper report in question dealt only with the manner in which claims for subsidy may be made under the policy to which I have referred. Some confusion had arisen with some of the smaller retail coal dealers of Halifax in regard to the method which should be followed in claiming the subsidy which is payable on imported coal. The coal administration simply explained the manner in which claims ought to be presented in order to expedite payment to some of the smaller retailers who have not been accustomed to dealing with imported coal.

No new government policy has been announced because the government subsidy policy under which imported coal has been eligible for subsidy as part of the price stabilization programme has been in effect since 1941. The particular payment to which my hon. friend calls attention represents no change in that policy, which is of course applicable to any section of Canada when coal has been imported for the type of consumption I have described.

Mr. GILLIS: I understand the minister now to say there has been no increase in subsidy payments.

Mr. McIVOR: No change.

Mr. GILLIS: No increase in subsidy payments to wholesalers and retailers in Halifax.

Mr. ABBOTT: I imagine that in the past very little imported coal has been sold in Halifax, but perhaps my hon. friend knows better than I do about that. If imported coal was sold in Halifax since 1941, subsidy would be payable in order to enable its being sold under the ceiling price.

Mr. GILLIS: There has been an increase in subsidy payments.

Mr. WEBB:

What ruling does the Department of National Revenue make regarding the deductibility by a salaried taxpayer in ascertaining his net assessable income of expenses incurred in the operation of a motor car in connection with his business?

Mr. McCANN:

(Answer for taxation division). Because of a recent decision of the Exchequer Court of Canada it is necessary for the department to review the situation, and it is intended to issue a general ruling on this question at an early date.

BUTTER—SALES FOR INDUSTRIAL USES

Mr. SENN:

How many pounds of Canadian butter was sold for industrial uses in each of the last five years for which figures are available?

Mr. MAYHEW: Figures are available only for butter sold for industrial uses for 1944, 1945 and 9 months of 1946 as follows: 1944, 4,224,733; 1945, 3,898,891; 1946 (9 months), 2,317,214.

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS—ALBERTA GREY SOIL SUBSTATIONS

Mr. SHAW:

1. Has the government, or any department thereof, given consideration to the establishment of an experimental substation in the grey-wooded soil zone of Alberta?
2. If so, has any decision been reached?
3. Has a definite site for such an experimental substation been determined?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes, consideration has been given to the establishment of two such units in Alberta. One on grey-wooded soil typical of that which occurs in the Peace River territory served from the experimental station at Beaverlodge. The second in central Alberta to make it possible to study problems associated with crop production in the area served by the experimental station, Lacombe, Alberta.

2. The site for the substation in the Peace River district has been decided upon and plans are under way to start work this spring. The location of the site for the substation in central Alberta has not been finally decided.

3. The grey soil substation for the Peace River district has been located at McLennan, Alberta.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—M. F. BIGGS

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Is Mr. M. F. Biggs employed at Moncton, New Brunswick, by the Department of Transport?

4. Was he formerly a member of the permanent forces of the militia?
5. If so, was he retired on pension, and of what amount?

Mr. McCANN:

2, 3, 4 and 5 answered by No. 1.

EXCISE TAX AND PRICES—REFRIGERATORS

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Was the price of certain commodities, and particularly refrigerators, reduced to the consumer by 25 per cent when the excise tax of that amount was discontinued?
2. If not, was the recent increase of 10 per cent allowed to be charged on the manufacturer's price, including the discontinued excise tax?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. No. The responsibility of the board has been to hold prices as nearly as possible to basic period levels rather than to force reductions below those levels. The relief so provided to domestic manufacturers offset cost increases which occurred both before and after the elimination of the excise tax and made it possible for the basic period ceilings to be maintained for a considerably longer period.

2. The recent increase of 10 per cent on refrigerators applied to the then maximum prices. The adjustment was made in accordance with the board's usual policy of adjusting ceiling prices where production costs have risen to the point that a representative portion of the industry can demonstrate need for price relief in terms of their operating results.

INCOME TAX—INTEREST AND PENALTIES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

What is the amount of income tax and interest and penalties thereon owing in each district office for income tax for each of the years 1939 to 1945 inclusive, in respect of (1) individuals; (2) corporations?

Mr. McCANN: (For taxation division). The records of this division are not maintained in such a manner as to give the information requested.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I submit that is not the kind of answer that members of this house are entitled to when such a simple question is asked: What is the amount of income tax owing in several years, and the amount of interest and penalties thereon. Through you, sir, I suggest to the minister that my question be put back on the order paper, and that it be answered in accordance with whatever information the department has. If the department has no information as to income tax by districts, we are in a much more serious position than any of us believed.

[Later:]

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the hon. member is entitled to an answer, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: The matter cannot be brushed off by the government quite so easily as that. The minister should make some explanation in reply to the hon. members' question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, may I express my utter astonishment at the answer that has been given, and ask Your Honour not to let this pass? Surely this is a barefaced attempt to refuse the information which the member has rightfully asked.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely we do not require an atomic bomb to get information out of the government.

Mr. McCANN: Mr. Speaker, the representations which the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) has made with regard to the answer given to his question will be given the utmost consideration, and if it is at all possible we shall try to meet his wishes with respect to an answer.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean the question goes back on the order paper?

Mr. McCANN: Whether it does or does not, we shall try to give the answer.

BOOKLET "DESIGNED FOR USE"

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many copies of the booklet "Designed for Use" have been printed?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION—WAREHOUSING EXPENSES

Mr. FRASER:

1. What was paid by war assets corporation during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, for warehousing expenses?

2. What items are included in these expenses?

Mr. McILRAITH: The answer to this question is to be found in item (1) (a) under "Trust Account Items" on page 21 of the second annual report of War Assets Corporation from April 1, 1945 to March 31, 1946 which was tabled on August 16, 1946 as sessional paper No. 95.

WAR ASSETS CORPORATION—BUILDING OPERATIONS AND IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. FRASER:

1. What was paid by war assets corporation for building operations and improvements during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946?

2. What items are covered by these said payments?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Details regarding building operating expenses are to be found in the answer to a question by Mr. Fraser at page 1320 of Hansard for March 13, 1947. However, War Assets Corporation spent $220,417.91 for building alterations and improvements during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946.

2. This amount represents the cost of materials and supplies as well as the work performed by outside contractors in altering and improving buildings occupied as offices by War Assets Corporation and is distributed between the head office and the various regional and branch offices as follows:

Head office, 4095 St. Catherine St. W., Montreal	$210,631.08
Quebec office	525.00
Ottawa office	331.67

TRIBAL CLASS DESTROYERS

Mr. MOORE:

1. Were tribal class destroyers built in Canada during the war?

2. If so, how many were built?

3. At which shipyards were they built?

4. How long did it take to build and equip them for war service?

5. What was the cost of each destroyer to the government?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. Yes.

2. Four (two completed, two still under construction).

3. Halifax Shipyards, Halifax, N.S. (hull); John Inglis Company, Toronto, Ont. (machinery).

4. First destroyer—3 years, 4 months; second destroyer—4 years, 3 months; third and fourth destroyer—still under construction.

5. The first two destroyers were built under a single contract and the cost of an individual destroyer is therefore not available. The cost of building the first two destroyers, including hull, machinery, electrical work and installation of armament was $15,903,759.05, or an average of $7,951,879.52 each, not including sales tax. The cost of armament and fire control equipment which was supplied from the Naval Service was $671,183.75 per ship.

While final costs of the last two destroyers are not available, it is anticipated that the construction costs of these two ships will probably be somewhat less as development costs were absorbed in the cost of the first two ships.

4. To what firms, or individuals, were the aforesaid moneys paid?

Mr. McILRAITH:

AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT BOARD—PERSONNEL

Mr. WRIGHT:

1. Did the government give any assurance to the Alberta Farmers' Union and the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, that they would appoint a member of the agricultural prices support board recommended by these organizations?

2. Have the A.F.U. and U.F.C. Saskatchewan section, submitted names for such an appointee?

3. Has the government appointed such member? If so, what is his name?

4. If not, why has such appointment not been made?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. No assurance was given with respect to the appointment of members of the agricultural prices support board. Membership on the advisory committee to the board was discussed and assurance was given that any names submitted would be referred to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, of which both the Alberta Farmers' union and the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section, are members and that any names submitted by them would be considered for appointment. It was the intention to appoint the members of the advisory committee to the agricultural food board, together with two additional representatives from the Canadian federation of agriculture, as the advisory committee to the agricultural prices support board.

2. Yes.

3. The members of the agricultural prices support board have been appointed, but the advisory committee has not yet been appointed. It is expected that the advisory committee will be appointed in the immediate future.

4. See answer to No. 3.

INCOME TAX—ARRANGEMENTS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government taken any action by way of federal allowance to the province of Ontario in lieu of income taxes formerly allowed by the province?

2. Has the government taken any action to call another dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The proposal of the dominion government for tax agreements with the provinces was set out in the budget address delivered on June 27, 1946. It was subsequently modified in a press statement by the Minister of Finance issued on January 25, 1947. The text of this statement is contained in the pamphlet entitled: "Dominion-Provincial Conference—Correspondence since the Budget of 1946 on Matters of Substance Regarding Tax Agreements with the Provinces", which was printed by order of the house passed on January 30, 1947.

2. The position of the government respecting the calling of another conference is set out fully in the correspondence tabled in the house on January 30, 1947, and printed in the pamphlet referred to in the answer to question No. 1.

INCOME TAX—MARRIED WOMEN

Mr. TIMMINS:

How many married women paid income tax—in 1946—in respect to salaries alone (as contrasted from those who paid income tax on investments) and what was the aggregate of the income tax so paid?

Mr. McCANN: (For taxation division). As the 1946 income tax returns are not due to be filed until April 30, 1947, the information requested is not available.

Arrangements have been made to assemble statistics for 1946 so as to be able to reply to a question of this nature but for no previous year would we be able to furnish the requested information.

2. If a separate charge is laid for each offence what difference if any does this make in payment of legal fees to the solicitor retained by wartime prices and trade board in the prosecution of the various charges?

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO HOSPITAL ADDITIONS

Mr. FRASER:

1. Have any departments of the dominion government made any contributions to hospital boards or municipalities towards the cost of building additions on hospitals?
2. If so, what were the amounts of contribution in each case and where is each hospital located?

1. How many gold mines are in production in Canada, by provinces, at the present time?
2. What quantity of gold was mined in each province in the years 1935, 1940, 1945 and 1946?
3. What is the average cost of production of one ounce of gold in Canada?

5. How many persons are employed in each province, as miners or otherwise, in the production of gold?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF—INTERNATIONAL TRADE CONFERENCE

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth):

For a copy of all letters, cables, briefs, or other communications exchanged since January 1, 1944, between His Majesty's government in Canada and His Majesty's governments in other parts of the commonwealth on the subject of the British preferential tariff.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Production of the documents requested would require the consent of the governments concerned. Moreover, most of the papers are secret or confidential.

Since the question of preference is most closely related to the subject matter of the united nations trade discussions which began in London last October, the present position on preferences in their relation to the trade discussions can be found in the report of the first session of the preparatory committee of the united nations conference on trade and employment, which I tabled some weeks ago.

I believe it would be quite useless to ask for the consent of the other government, with respect to the tabling of correspondence that has been exchanged as secret and confidential. A similar question was raised in the House of Commons at Westminster on January 28, 1947. Mr. Belcher, replying for the president of the Board of Trade, said:

In accordance with the procedure agreed at the meeting of the preparatory committee in London last autumn, the various countries concerned are addressing requests for tariff adjustments to each other as a preliminary to the tariff negotiations which are to be held concurrently with, and as part of the work of, the second session of the preparatory committee later this year. It would be improper to make public the contents of such requests.

As regards the general question of imperial preference, however, I would invite the hon. member's attention to the statement about the Anglo-American financial agreement made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on December 6, 1945.

Because of the widespread interest in this matter, perhaps I might be permitted to place on Hansard the statement made by Mr. Attlee in that connection, and which represents what the position still is in that regard. He said:

There is one particular matter arising out of the terms of article VII of the mutual aid agreement which is of especial interest and importance to the British commonwealth and empire—that is the question of tariff preferences. I would therefore refer shortly to that aspect of the American document which deals with both tariffs and tariff preferences.

The statement sets forth the procedure to be followed by common consent in considering, in the context of a general lowering of tariffs and other trade barriers, what contribution can be made from our side by way of reduction or elimination of preferences.

The statement makes it clear that, in pursuit of the objectives of article VII of the Mutual Aid agreement, we for our part are ready to agree that the existing system of preferences within the British commonwealth and the empire will be contracted, provided there is adequate compensation in the form of improvement in trading conditions between commonwealth and empire countries and the rest of the world.

The statement further provides that in entering negotiations for the reduction of tariffs the parties concerned will not refuse to discuss the modification of particular preferences on the ground that these are the subject of prior commitments; on the contrary, all margins of preference will be regarded as open to negotiation, and it will of course be for the party negotiating the modification of any margin of preference which it is bound by an existing commitment to give a third party, to obtain the consent of the third party concerned.

Further points to be noted are:

(i) The statement makes it clear there is no commitment on any country in advance of negotiations to reduce or eliminate any particular margin of preference. The position is that each country remains free to judge in the light of the offers made by all the others, the extent of the contribution it can make towards the realization of the agreed objectives.

The statement does not in advance of the detailed negotiations lay down how far the process of reduction and elimination of preferences will be carried at this immediate stage. It must be realized that some preferences are of particular importance to the economy of certain parts of the world just as some tariffs are important in others. The elimination of all preferences would be such a step as would require a most substantial and widespread reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers by a large number of countries. Thus it is recognized that the degree to which the final objectives can be reached at the initial stage can only appear at the negotiations themselves and as the result of a mutually advantageous settlement.

All the subsequent correspondence that has been asked for since has been along the lines of that statement.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does that statement of Mr. Attlee substantially represent the views of the government of Canada also?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That statement is substantially in accord with the instructions given to our delegation when it left for the second part of the world trade conference.

In order to complete the information hon. members may be interested in having tabled at this time the plan of work for the second session of the preparatory commission of the international conference as forwarded to us by the secretary general of the united nations under covering letter of March 4, 1947.

Mr. HOMUTH: Could that be put in Hansard?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It is quite long. Perhaps it could be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings for the information of hon. members.

Mr. CHURCH: I suggest that the motion stand until the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) returns tomorrow.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have no objection to allowing the motion to stand if that is the desire, but I imagine after seeing the statement I have just made the hon. member will be quite prepared to have it dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

VETERANS LAND ACT—KAMLOOPS—VALLEYVIEW PROJECT

Mr. FULTON:

For a copy of any report or reports made to the Minister of Veterans Affairs following the recent special investigation into the cost, construction and condition of the houses in the

"Valleyview" project built under the Veterans' Land Act at Kamloops, B.C., and particularly of any recommendation as to refinancing submitted therewith.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The final report of the committee of inspection has not been completed, but I fully expect it will be during the course of this week. I informed my hon. friend accordingly this morning and he is willing to allow this motion to stand.

Mr. FULTON: Is it the intention to table any part of or the total report when it is received?

Mr. MACKENZIE: That will be subject to further consideration. At the present time it would appear to be the intention so to do.

Motion stands.

PRICE CONTROL—COST AND SAVING TO CONSUMERS

Mr. KNOWLES:

For a return showing (a) the total cost of the government's price control programme during the entire period thereof since the outbreak of world war II, together with a breakdown of said total in such manner as may be readily available, and (b) the amount saved by Canadian consumers as a result of this programme, together with a breakdown of this figure and an indication as to the basis used in computing the same.

Mr. MAYHEW: I should like to direct attention to the fact that while section (a) of the motion can be answered, section (b) cannot. The hon. member will have to accept the return as being applicable to section (a) only.

Mr. KNOWLES: Could not an attempt be made.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried as amended.

INDIA—SUEZ CANAL—PALESTINE

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the governments of Great Britain and Canada or any member or officials thereof, and also between the governments of Australia and New Zealand and the government of Canada, or any officers of officials thereof, during 1946, relating to the abandonment of (a) India; (b) Suez Canal; (c) Palestine.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am sure the hon. member will realize that correspondence of a secret or confidential nature between governments is not normally made public without the consent of all the governments concerned. It is the practice for governments of the British commonwealth of nations to communicate freely with one another on all questions of common concern, but such communications are not in general intended to be made public. It is the view of the Canadian government that with the present international situation as it is, it would not be reasonable to request the consent of the United Kingdom government to the tabling of any correspondence on the position in India or Palestine or in connection with the Suez Canal. It is felt it would be embarrassing to them in their international relations at the present time even to seek their consent for the publication here of these documents. I hope the hon. member will accept this and not insist that we ask them for a consent which we realize it would be embarrassing for them to give at this time.

Mr. CHURCH: Everything in the empire is being given away. There will soon be nothing left to liquidate.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

[Later:]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): With regard to the motion for papers in the name of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church), Canada is vitally interested in this question and I think the house is entitled to a better answer than the minister has given.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that when the Speaker calls an hon. member to order he must resume his seat.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are about sixty speakers over there in that corner, Mr. Speaker.

PEACE TREATY WITH JAPAN

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all telegrams, agreements, letters, cables and other documents, exchanged between the government of Great Britain, the governments of Australia and New Zealand, or any officers of these governments and the government of Canada, or any officer thereof; in relation to all these governments acting as an empire unit in the proposed peace terms regarding Japan.

2. And to include all papers regarding any conference held in London recently with the aforesaid three governments and Canada's representatives there, on the same matter.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have had a careful search made of the files and there is no correspondence of the kind described in this motion. If the motion were passed we would have to reply that there does not exist any such correspondence in our files.

Mr. CHURCH: All right then; the United States and Russia will have all the Pacific now.

Motion dropped.

CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

CONSIDERATION OF QUESTIONS NOT INCLUDED IN AGREEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made on February 3 last that six provinces have indicated their willingness to make dominion-provincial tax agreements, and in view of the fact that all provinces appear now to have made their budget plans for the coming fiscal year, is the Prime Minister prepared to reassemble the dominion-provincial conference to deal with matters not included in the agreements made, namely, health insurance, old age pensions, unemployment and public works?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in answering one question this afternoon I replied in part to the question just asked by my hon. friend. To be more specific, however, may I direct the attention of my hon. friend to the correspondence that was tabled in this house on January 30 with reference to the dominion-provincial conference. This correspondence contains several communications which relate to the circumstances under which the conference would be reconvened.

Mr. BRACKEN: What was the date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The correspondence was tabled on January 30 of this year, and was subsequently printed in pamphlet form. I have a copy in my hand at the moment. My hon. friend will find in this correspondence different references as to the reconvening of the conference. One that relates specifically to the question which he has just asked will be found at page 55 of the pamphlet, in a letter sent to the Hon. T. C. Douglas, premier of Saskatchewan, dated November 22, 1946. I might read the latter paragraph of that letter:

> My colleagues and I feel that the dominion government should adhere to the position set out in my telegram to you on July 15 last, in the following words:
> "The dominion government shares your regret that it has not been possible to include in the dominion offer made in the budget the earlier proposals relating to public investment and social security. However, as emphasized in the budget address, the public investment and social security proposals submitted last August remain an essential part of the dominion government's programme. As soon as there is a sufficient acceptance of the proposed tax agreements we shall be ready to explore in a general conference or otherwise the possibility of working out mutually satisfactory arrangements in regard to the whole or any part of our earlier public investment and social security proposals.

The conditions set forth there have in the mind of the government not as yet been fulfilled. I am therefore not in a position to say at the moment when the conference will be reassembled.

ALASKA

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED NEGOTIATIONS FOR EXCHANGE OF TERRITORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. First I will quote from a telegram that I received just as I came into the house. It is from Seattle, Washington, and reads:

> Skagway—

May I explain that Skagway is a port on the coast of Alaska from which a railway runs through the Panhandle of Alaska, through British Columbia and into Yukon. The telegram goes on:

> Skagway advises Associated Press despatch telephoned by governor Alaska to Skagway mayor that Canada was willing trade strip along Haines highway for Alaska port, presumably Skagway.

I should like to know if negotiations to that effect are going on. If they are, British Columbia has to be consulted, because the road runs through part of that province.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of any such negotiations, but I shall make inquiry as to whether before I became Secretary of State for External Affairs there had been any, and if there have been, I shall inform the hon. member.

FLAX

PRICES RECEIVED BY ONTARIO GROWERS IN 1946

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Last session I asked him what price the Ontario farmers would receive for their flax, and he replied $3.25 a bushel. A lot of flax was grown in my district and when the farmers marketed it through the elevators in Toronto, and a good deal of it in Hanover, no one received $3.25 a bushel. The most they received was $3.06½.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member should not make a statement in putting his question. He should be brief and to the point.

Mr. MENARY: My question is, why did the farmers receive only from $2.90 to $3.06½ last fall for their flax?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall read the question asked by the hon. member and give him what information I can.

POSTAL SERVICE

MAIL CONTRACTS—PROVISION FOR SUPPLEMENTAL PAYMENTS

The house resumed from Friday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) for the third reading of Bill No. 17, respecting supplemental payments on mail contracts.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the motion for second reading of this bill a question was asked about the payment of bonuses in connection with various contracts, rural routes, staging services and the like, and the Postmaster General agreed to secure the information. The purpose which the opposition had in mind is set forth in my own words at page 689 of Hansard, where I said:

> Our purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the committee—

Mr. Speaker, may I ask for order in the chamber?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Hon. members must realize that it is impossible for anyone to hear the member who is speaking. Moreover, it must be very disagreeable to the hon. member himself. I would ask hon. members to moderate their voices.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I quote:

> Our purpose in bringing this matter to the attention of the committee is simply to make sure that all mail carriers in Canada shall receive equal treatment in the award of bonus; in other words, that under similar circumstances there shall not be those who will be the haves while others will be the have nots.

In consequence of the request then made, the minister laid on the table the record showing payments of bonuses. I would ask permission of the house to file a list of wartime bonuses by postal districts, indicating the amounts paid to carriers on rural routes, stage services and side services, as well as the five per cent cost of operation bonus covering the same districts and also the same services.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has leave of the house he may table the document.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will hand the list to Hansard.

The record indicates that only a percentage of the carriers have received the bonus, and even among those who did receive it, carriers with similar routes and operating under similar circumstances received dissimilar amounts of bonus.

I wish to thank the minister and those associated with him in his department for having furnished this list in the detail in which the information is given. It is very different from the type of answer that was given today, to a very reasonable question, by the Minister of National Revenue, an answer the like of which I have never heard given in this house before. I am sure the minister will see to it that by tomorrow the information that was asked for will be furnished.

Mr. McCANN: As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lake Centre need not shake either his head or his finger at me with reference to the answer given to the question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. McCANN: I will tell the hon. gentleman what it is in a moment. I think I gave him the assurance of one gentleman to another that every effort would be made to answer his question, and if he will possess his soul in peace for a day or two he will receive what I think will prove to be a satisfactory answer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, this question had been on the records of the house for a considerable length of time, and if the minister had been able to get away with a shilly-shally answer like that, no doubt he would have thought it sufficient.

An hon. MEMBER: You are out of order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is the sort of thing I object to.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that the question before the house is the third reading of Bill No. 17, respecting supplemental payments on mail contracts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was just showing the difference between the two departments. One has furnished full information while the other has asked us to take two bites of the cherry before we can get what we are after. It is to that sort of thing that I am objecting.

On looking over the list of bonuses I find that there is no consistency in the amounts or in the proportions of the increase. In a considerable number of cases the original contract price was more than doubled by the bonus. That is a serious situation, that a person should take a contract under tender and then apply for an increase because of circumstances which existed at the time he got the contract, and that he should receive an amount in excess of the original contract price. I am not going to refer to all the examples.

As I have been able to work it out, there were fifty cases in which the mail carrier was able to get more than twice the amount he actually bargained for. The list reveals a situation that points to unfairness if not discrimination. While I have the assurance of the mnister that there has been no discrimination, on the other hand there can be no doubt that there has been the greatest unfairness in the award of the bonuses, because of this fact if for no other, that the only ones who got the bonus were those who asked for it, and the only ones who asked for the bonus were those who were aware of its existence.

In Saskatchewan a number of the carriers had no information whatsoever on the fact that a bonus was to be paid. I would ask the minister, in making payment of the bonus, to assure fairness to all the carriers everywhere in Canada. Even today, where there has been unfairness by reason of too large amounts being granted, reconsideration should be given those cases. The information that was put on Hansard the other day was that the post office had made a surplus of some $11 million last year, and the amount was somewhat larger the year before. In view of the surplus, fairness demands that the bonus be made payable to all who had contracts in 1944 and 1945 and continued them. In the second place I think the time has come for a reduction of postal rates in Canada, in view of the profit that is being made. In the United States air mail postage has been reduced to five cents per ounce. It is time a similar reduction was made in Canada; and there should be a return to the three-cent ordinary mail rate.

I shall not on this occasion go into all the details, but in order to support my argument that there has been no consistency I would point out that in one case the contract is for $425 and the amount of the bonus is $574.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Which contract is that?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Leclercville, No. 1. The next contract is for $308 and the bonus is $592. In many cases the amount of the bonus is the same as the contract rate. I do not refer to those on this occasion. Here is a contract rate of $560 and a war-time bonus of $790.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): To be fair the hon. member should give the rate per mile, because where there was such a big bonus it never brought the rates per mile higher than the contracts given in the surrounding districts.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have the records before me, and if there is any question about them, my hon. friend may place that record before the house. I have just taken the cases without comment, and there are no reasons given. Originally reasons were to have been given, but the department contended that to do so would have meant too much clerical work. The rate per mile ranges from $28 to $77.77, and many of the increases by way of bonus were given in the higher brackets, in the $45, $48 and $50 a mile class. I referred to certain other cases. At the moment I am taking these in the order in which they come, and am dealing with the Montreal district. In another case the contract rate was $373.50 and the war-time bonus $530. In the Ottawa district there is a case in which the contract rate was $539 and the war-time bonus $561. Let us take some of the large ones. In New Brunswick there is a contract for $3,000 and the bonus given is $1,850. In the Vancouver district is one for $1,200 with a bonus of $1,080.

I now come to some others dealing with stage service. Up to now I have been dealing only with regular mail couriers. There is a contract for $456 and a war-time bonus of $961. There the bonus is twice as large as the contract price, which seems difficult to understand. Here is a case in which the contract rate was $199 and the war-time bonus $348.75; here is another one where the contract was $320 and the war-time bonus $680. In the Ottawa district there is another where the amount of the contract was $1,440 and the bonus $1,560. Here is another outstanding one, where the contract was $95 and the bonus $480, five times the amount of the contract.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is unfair to give the figures in that way.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am making my speech.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, but it is not complete. If you are giving the figures, you should give all the figures.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: At the moment I have the floor. If the minister wants to answer these—and I imagine that they will be difficult to answer—it will probably take him more time than just an interruption would permit.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not difficult at all. Everything will come in due course.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: At the moment I am just giving the figures as I go along.

An hon. MEMBER: Give the mileages, dates and names.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The names were part of the information I asked for, but they were not furnished in the return. The department said it would take too much time to give all that information.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member has in his hand a document showing the detail of what he is saying, and I ask permission to give it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member is referring to Black Lake and the railway station.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister may answer these figures later.

An hon. MEMBER: He will.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am not here to interpret them. I am here to point out any inconsistencies. If there is any answer, the minister will be able to furnish it.

Here is another case in the Vancouver district: the amount of the contract is $180 and the wartime bonus $320. And so I might go through the list. The department furnished a list of upper brackets in which is shown the highest amount of bonus paid in each postal district. I have the information here which is asked for by my hon. friend. Here is a contract for $3,995. The amount of the bonus is $1,177. Here is another one where the contract price is $2,990 and the bonus $2,202. Here is another with a contract price of $700 and a bonus of $1,100; another with a contract price of $1,500, and a bonus of the same amount. Here is one in Alberta where the contract price is $1,900 and the bonus $1,900. All this indicates that there is a vast dissimilarity. The bonus seems to have been awarded on anything but a scientific basis. Certainly it is not fair that while certain persons received ample, substantial or very large bonuses, other couriers in a similar position, by reason of the fact that they did not know of this bonus legislation, received nothing.

The plea that I make is the one made earlier on the part of His Majesty's opposition, that this whole question be reviewed from the point of view of fairness and that couriers operating under similar circumstances receive the same bonus. All we are asking is that equity be assured, that couriers everywhere in this country be on a par, that no group or individual be preferred, that no individual in any part of the country be discriminated against.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great care to my young friend the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I believe he is wrong to feel scandalized about this legislation. It is one of the best acts which have been submitted to parliament. It is in accordance with the policy I have advocated for a long time, namely, to give responsibility to the minister and make him the judge or referee of all that needs to be decided by him. We come to the matter of ministerial responsibility. I have known great ministers in this department. I remember Mr. Veniot; I remember my old friend Bill Mulock, who did very well. The present minister is doing very well, and I should not forget Norman McLarty.

The hon. member for Lake Centre is scandalized because the amount of the bonus is not the same in every case. I do not wonder that he is interested in the mail contracts for his constituency, but he will know very well that from place to place the tenders will vary. He needs only to look at the list for his own county of each rural route, each contract between the station and the post office, and each contract between post offices, to realize that the amount of the contract is not at all the same in each case; that is so, not because of the minister but because of the tenderers themselves. Of course some people consider it a great honour to have a contract with the government; they might frame it and put it in the living room or kitchen with their certificate of citizenship, and be very proud of it. In order to get it they are ready to make any sacrifice. Some tenderers may put in bids so low as to be nonsensical; then later they come to their member and try to have the matter adjusted. While the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is not a supporter of the government I am sure he has had similar requests from his constituents. I wonder if he has acted in accordance with them and has made representations to the Post Office Department to have due corrections made. If he has, I am sure he was heard as courteously as I was.

If there was one branch with which I had difficulty for years and years it was that mail contracts branch. So much was that so that for two years, while the former minister was ill, during the interregnum while there was only an acting minister in charge, I did not pay any attention to patronage matters regarding mail contracts. I may tell my hon. friend more. In my county, in regard to mail contracts, I make no difference except when the tenders are the same, provided the man who puts in the bid is capable of carrying out the contract. Therefore I think I am well qualified to discuss this matter; and the difficulties every member of parliament had in that branch were countless because the man in charge is so stupid that when we say "thank you" he has to do something nasty in return. It seems necessary to kick him all the time in order to get justice. Think of that; the man in charge of that branch is an air marshal from the United States—it is honorary, of course—and if a member of parliament says "thank you" to him, then he will turn against that member and become vicious. It is impossible to do anything with him. What does he know about conditions in any part of the country, the hills the mail carrier has to climb, the rivers and streams he has to cross, the snow through which he has to walk? Hon. members who live in cities do not know the problems of the mail carriers, who have to carry on through blizzards and snowstorms. We see pictures of automobiles immobilized on the streets of large cities such as Toronto, and even Ottawa; cars left on street corners under a load of snow, but we do not think of the mail carrier who goes from house to house to deliver letters and newspapers to those who are anxious for news from home or news of a public nature. They carry on their work through all seasons of the year. Some of these contracts, of course, were made a long time ago, when the cost of feeding horses and even the cost of automobile repairs and gasoline was much lower. When the war came prices went up, and these carriers needed an adjustment. That adjustment was made by the department in virtue of the War Measures Act, and it was on a sound basis.

The figures recited a moment ago by my hon. friend seem rather strange, and not in accordance with the rules of fair play and justice; but it was because the contracts were entirely different at the start that the bonuses had to be different in making an adjustment to a common accepted average. Let me explain it very clearly to my hon. friend. Take two rural routes, each ten miles long. The lowest tenderer for one route may have put in a bid $300 lower than the lowest bidder for the other route. As a result there is a difference of $300 in the two contracts. In the first place the contract was awarded to the lowest tenderer at $300 less; in the second place the tender of the lowest bidder was accepted at $300 more. Therefore if the policy of the department at a certain moment is to establish a common average per mile it is only natural that the first tenderer should get a bonus $300 more than the bonus granted the other contractor.

That is just as clear as spring water. I admire the faculty of the hon. member for Lake Centre for making simple things look complicated; it is a gift. Then he works hard to make himself indignant, and is surprised when there is no general response to his self-made indignation. It is an unusual gift, and he is a master at it. The reason hon. members take his vehement statements with a grain of salt is precisely because he adds too much pepper to his salt. I should have liked to see my hon. friend at the time his party was in power, when the Posmaster General was putting postmasters away for any reason—

An hon. MEMBER: No patronage.

Mr. POULIOT: No patronage. All Liberals were fired, but it was in the name of justice, patriotism and purity of intention; and every time the Postmaster General fired a postmaster he looked at the ceiling, to give the house the impression that he was praying to heaven. He was clasping his hands, and everything was for the good of the country. A postmaster was a Liberal; therefore he was bad. The incoming man was a Tory; therefore he was excellent. That was the policy of "no politics; no partisanship".

One day I had the fun of my life when I made a charge against a Tory postmaster who had been carrying liquor in his rig during the provincial election. I made my investigation and presented my evidence. It was complete. Naturally, however, I did not receive judgment in accordance with the evidence; the postmaster kept his job. Afterwards he said to me, "How did you know that I brought liquor to this fellow in the middle of the night, when you were in Ottawa?" I said, "Don't bother; I know everything you do. My little finger told it to me." Afterwards he was afraid of me; he could not realize it. The evidence was complete, but nothing was done.

There were all sorts of things which promoted the exercise of the worst kind of patronage. I found it so silly that I decided afterwards not to pay any attention to patronage in the Post Office Department. That is why I speak in this way in answer to the hon. member for Lake Centre. Certainly I am not going to crawl before any official of the department, asking for favours, when I can claim rights for my constituents. I want them respected in the Post Office Department.

I pay special tribute to the present minister, because he has redressed many wrongs from which the postmasters and mail carriers were suffering. But not only that; the hon member for Lake Centre does not know the history of his party. In the years gone by the Conservative party did not do only wrong things, as it now does. At that time it was doing some good things, and Conservative members joined hands with Liberals to ask for the redress of wrongs from which mail carriers in particular were suffering.

Redress is now being carried out by the minister. The same would be done for the hon. member for Lake Centre, if he were not so proud and if he deigned to call upon the minister to ask for redress of the wrongs from which his constituents are suffering. I am sure the hon. member would receive a fair answer from the minister. But instead of that the hon. member says, "This is bad legislation." I say it is legislation which will be just as satisfactory for the mail carriers in his constituency as for those in mine.

The minister is responsible to parliament. How many times have I complained about civil servants who seem to be masters of good and bad weather in the department, and whom we cannot criticize or denounce in the house. But today we have a restoration of ministerial responsibility, and for that the minister deserves every credit.

I give credit to the government for this step in the right direction. How many times have we heard the hon. member for Lake Centre complain about fascism, autocracy and despotism. While I may complain of that at times, yet I give everyone his dues. This time the government deserves full credit not only for acting in accordance with the old principles of the Liberal party and the Conservative party, but for following the true principles of real responsible government, the true British principles in virtue of which the minister is really the head of his department. He is the one who decides whether something is just or unjust, fair or unfair. Afterwards he submits himself to the control of the House of Commons.

This is good legislation. It is not at all pork-barrel legislation. It is legislation introduced so that every citizen will receive his private mail, newspapers, parcels and the like within the shortest possible time, because the best men will be doing the job. The question before the Post Office Department is not one of examining a few cents so as to get the cheapest service. The important thing is to select the very best men to do the work in the department, so that there will be no delay in the handling of mail.

I congratulate the department, because the service is excellent. When I say that, I leave from my thoughts some of the difficulties I have had with some people who at times are most unreasonable in their treatment of contracts, and who do not act even in accordance with the law.

I shall say no more about the matter today. It is St. Patrick's day, and I do not want to say anything unpleasant to anyone on the feast day of such a great saint. On the other hand the minister is deserving of congratulations on his sponsoring of a bill of this kind. I am sure when the hon. member for Lake Centre thinks about what has just been said he will realize that it is in the interests of his constituency, as well as in that of every hon. member, to remove all discrimination and thus make things smoother for a better postal service.

Mr. C. E. STEPHENSON (Durham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly on this bill before it is given third reading. I have examined the report tabled by the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) setting out bonuses paid to rural mail drivers, as authorized by order in council. It reveals that many rural mail carriers received bonuses much larger than their original contracts, while others received no bonuses at all. Here are some examples of bonuses being paid in amounts greater than the original tenders. In the first of these the original contract was for $308 and the bonus paid was $592. In the second instance the contract price was $360 and the bonus $480. Another shows a contract price of $302 with a bonus of $339, and still another gives a contract price of $308 with a bonus of $365.

We may compare these figures with others, one of which gives a contract price of $500 and a bonus of only $85. I cannot see where there is any comparison at all. This report reveals that on a mileage basis some drivers receive as much as $77 while others receive only $20.

I am sure all hon. members will agree that mail drivers should receive remuneration sufficient to enable them to carry out their duties efficiently, and also that there should be a system of equitable remuneration for services rendered. In my own riding I find that out of some fifty contracts, twenty-four received no bonuses whatever, and apparently these men had no idea that bonuses were being paid. Under the present hocus-pocus-or-bonus-bonus-who-will-get-the-bonus system, the whole thing is nothing less than a farce and should be changed as soon as possible. I do not think these men can be equitably paid under the present system. A mileage basis of payment would not be equitable when one driver's route is over rough country or township roads, up and down hill, and another driver's route is over paved roads. Nor do I think mail drivers should be paid on the basis of the number of boxes on their routes.

May I be allowed to make a suggestion which I think would improve the system of rural mail delivery. I would suggest that all mail drivers be paid on an hourly basis. A survey could be made to determine the actual time it takes for a driver to cover his route, having regard only to the delivery of His Majesty's royal mail and other duties pertaining thereto. Allowance should be made also for the use of horses in extremely bad weather. Having arrived at the number of hours it takes to cover a certain mail route, I suggest that the driver be paid at the rate of $1.10 or $1.20 per hour. That rate would cover the driver's time and the use of his car or horses or other type of vehicle. I think this would give the driver a reasonable amount for gasoline and oil and depreciation on his equipment.

A mail route requiring five hours to cover would work out to $5.50 per day, with the yearly remuneration on the basis of 312 days amounting to $1,716. I think that would be a fair basis on which to pay rural mail drivers. This system would permit the driver to purchase good equipment of a uniform nature, as I mentioned the last time I spoke on this matter. I suggested that the equipment possibly could be a standard coach, with all cars painted a similar colour. Then there could be attached a sign bearing the coat of arms and reading, "His Majesty's Royal Mail." This sign would not be allowed on the car when it was not being used for the delivery of His Majesty's mail. A driver might need his car for only three or four hours a day and would want to make use of it at other times for other purposes, so the sign would be permitted on the car only when it was being used for the delivery of the mail. Last time I suggested that these cars might be painted red, but after considering that they would be driven over dusty roads, and having been in the car business for a number of years, I would now suggest grey or gunmetal, with a red sign to be put on or taken off.

I offer these suggestions realizing that while they may not be perfect they might offer a means of improving one of our services which is of paramount importance to our country, and of bringing about a better distribution of His Majesty's mail.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, it is a well known fact that wages of mail carriers should be readjusted. I was much impressed with the remarks of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He offered criticism of both the department and the minister, and his criticism reveals that he is not a great statesman. I am sorry to have to say that it is pitiful that a man of his standing should make these unfair statements. Let us say in a particular case the original contract was for $100 and the war-time bonus has increased this to maybe $500. My hon. friend should not be scandalized because he knows that every case must be studied and adjusted individually.

I heard with great interest the proposition of the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson) and I congratulate him upon having made a concrete proposition. It is the first time since I have been here that I have heard anything concrete from the benches over there on this matter of the mail carriers. However I am afraid that I cannot accept his proposition because I do not see how the department could follow a mail carrier around on his route if he is to be engaged by the hour. It would take a flock of inspectors to follow these men and adjust their wages or salaries according to the work done.

Mr. BOUCHER: How does the hon. member expect the Postmaster General to be able to adjust the bonuses he has been giving?

[Mr. Stephenson.]

Mr. LALONDE: It is quite easy to find out the difficulties in carrying out a contract over a set route. It does not need a flock of inspectors to tell the department that in certain cases the work is worth a certain amount of money. If I understand the proposition made by the hon. member, it is that nearly all rural mail contracts would be paid on an hourly basis, but I wonder how the department would be able to carry on.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Inspectors are sent out all the time from the district offices to inspect the mail routes. If we were to change the system it would be an easy matter to send out inspectors to determine the reasonable time in which a route should be covered.

Mr. LALONDE: I am respectful of my hon. friend's opinion but I do not share it. I wish to say to the hon. member for Lake Centre that it is not fair to the department and to the minister simply to give a list of contracts without giving further particulars or explanations. It is true that in my district nearly all the contracts have been readjusted. In every case where a contractor came before the minister and offered sound evidence in support of his proposition the contract was readjusted fairly, even though he was not a political friend of mine.

Those in my district who are complaining that they did not receive additional compensation or a readjustment are precisely those who did not make application for it. Those are the facts. I do not say that every contract has been readjusted, but those which have not been can be readjusted if the contractors will take the trouble to bring their case before the minister and the department. Therefore I think it is unfair to tell the house and the country that the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) was unjustified in his actions because some contracts were not readjusted while others were given large increases in compensation.

In resumé it is my contention that the minister and the department deserve praise, for in every case where the contractor took the trouble to build up and bring before the department a good case, based on sound evidence, justice was done and the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre cannot be accepted.

Mr. J. S. SINNOTT (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, being an Irishman, and this being the 17th day of March, I wish to congratulate all the Irishmen in the house. I also wish to extend my congratulations to the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand), who is a good Irishman.

I wish to congratulate the Postmaster General upon the efforts he has made to readjust many of these mail contracts. He has a big task on his hands, there being thousands and thousands of rural mail carriers, and of course it is impossible for him personally even to attempt to readjust all these contracts. But in every case that has been brought to his attention a fair adjustment has been made.

I do not think the proposal made by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson) is sound. We have had both Liberals and Conservatives in power for long periods and I suppose there have been fair-minded men in both parties, but obviously the programme he outlines did not commend itself to either party or it would have been put into effect some time ago. It would be impossible to get the mail carriers to work on the lines he suggests, because sometimes it takes two hours and sometimes ten hours to cover a route. Therefore I do not think his proposal would be of any value at the present time. I am sure that if the Postmaster General is given a fair opportunity to deal with the problems that arise from time to time a fair adjustment will be made in every case.

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson) refer to a bonus as high as $75 a mile having been granted. Did I hear him correctly?

Mr. STEPHENSON: It was $77 a mile.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I will explain why.

Mr. LOCKHART: Just a moment, please. If it was only $67 or $57, in addition to the amount set out in the contract, I am indeed surprised to hear it because one of the officers of the department made the statement to me recently in connection with a contract where a tender in the neighbourhood of $100 a mile had been submitted, "If you think for a moment that we can ever pay $100 a mile for rural mail delivery, the idea is absurd." There are about 300 boxes on this route and conditions are sometimes very difficult. After what this official said to me, I am more than surprised to hear the hon. member for Durham say that in bonus alone $77 a mile has been paid. There must be something wrong somewhere.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member is making a mistake.

Mr. LOCKHART: I will give the minister the details afterwards. This statement was made to me within the last forty-eight hours.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The $77 includes the bonus and the contract price.

Mr. LOCKHART: If anything like $100 a mile is being paid there are plenty of these contracts that need looking into. I know what the conditions are in some on the rural routes in my constituency and, now that my eyes are being opened as to what is being paid in other places, I can assure the minister that I am going to make a thorough check on this matter. I would ask him to explain why the statement was made by one of his officials that it would be absurd to pay anything like $100 a mile, in view of the statement of the hon. member for Durham that a bonus of $77 a mile is being paid.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, in my constituency I have as many rural mail carriers as in any other constituency, 133 altogether. So far as the bonus is concerned, from the information I have received I am satisfied that very few of the rural mail carriers in my constituency were aware of the fact that a bonus was being paid. I have the list of 133 carriers here and I find that forty-eight received the bonus and thirty received what is known as an operational bonus, which runs from a minimum of $4.20 to a maximum of $59.55. I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) say that practically all the rural mail carriers in his constituency had received the bonus. It looks to me as if there had been great discrimination all across this country. I am not blaming the present Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) because he has been in office for only a short time, and I think most of these difficulties arose before he took office. But when we are told that one constituency receives almost one hundred per cent attention so far as the bonus is concerned and another receives less than twenty-five per cent, surely that is an indication that there is something wrong.

So far as the act itself is concerned, I believe that the Postmaster General will administer it fairly. I trust that he will. We have listened to the ravings of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) about what happened years ago, and I know that, so far as the appointment of postmasters in my constituency is concerned, what he asserts was true. I do not doubt the hon. member, but I know something of what happened at that time, and I know of very few Liberal postmasters who were dismissed in my own province, from 1930 to 1935. I do know, however, that prior to that time, when we had a postmaster general from New Brunswick, a Conservative postmaster had no chance at all and was dismissed with little ceremony.

Mr. WINTERS: Shameful.

Mr. BROOKS: Yes, it was shameful, and I have no doubt it happened in the hon. gentleman's constituency of Queens-Lunenburg as well, because I have found that there is no more hard-bitten person in the country than a Nova Scotia Grit.

However, that is not what I rose to say. I hope that in the administration of the measure, when it goes through, the minister will show no discrimination. These men have worked for a mere pittance for a great many years. Perhaps it has been their own fault, but some arrangement such as the hon. member for Durham has recommended might be found to work out, though perhaps not 100 per cent along the lines he suggested. Some such arrangement, however, should be made because these men are rendering a valuable service; they have worked hard for many years, and I suggest that they should be recompensed adequately for the work they are doing.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I rise to bring one point to the attention of the minister in case there may be anyone else in the house who is in the same position as myself. I have listened carefully to the debate, I have listened in particular to the figures given, which, on the face of them seem to require considerable explanation, and on the assumption that the minister will make a statement before the conclusion of the debate, I earnestly suggest to him that these figures which have been given should not be left unexplained.

I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite say that they were satisfied with everything, that these awards were fair and just. I have no reason to think they are not fair and just, but how on earth any hon. gentleman opposite—and presumably they know no more about the figures than I do—is prepared to certify that he knows about the matter, I do not know. Therefore I repeat that it is in the interests of the administration, in the interests of this house, that we be not left with the figures now outstanding, which are quite without explanation, and which on the face of them would indicate that there have been great inequalities in dealing with different men. There may have been reasons for this, and if there are we should have them. If the minister would take some of these cases, that seem so unusual and excite wonder, and explain them we might all be satisfied.

Mr. A. J. BRADSHAW (Perth): At the last discussion of the rural mail question I asked the minister what was the highest bonus paid in any one case and he did not seem able to give me an answer. We see that there are great differences in the amounts paid out. The minister was asked on February 21, by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Charlton), certain questions which will be found reported at page 671 of Hansard:

Mr. Charlton: I want it to be quite clear that I am not against the principle of this bill; it is just the manner in which these bonuses are paid. I understand the difficulties with which the Postmaster General is faced. He said yesterday that the operational bonus of five per cent was paid on all routes. In our own case he said it was not true.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): I said that the first bonus given in 1941 was a five per cent increase; it was an increase on the general cost.

Mr. Charlton: It was not paid to all contract holders.

Mr. Bertrand (Laurier): Yes, it was. I said that it was paid to all contracts, the rates of which were determined on or before the 21st day of April, 1941.

I know of a case in my own riding where a man was a contractor in 1941. He is getting a rate of $720. He receives no operational bonus and no war bonus and his rate is $33 a mile. He has to go over rough and hilly country. In other cases in my own county the rate has risen to $52.06 a mile. I think there is some discrimination in these cases. I am sure the minister will be able to give some explanation when he replies, because there does seem to be this discrimination. I have nothing further to say at the moment.

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I have not much to add to what has been said with reference to these contracts of mail couriers, but there is one matter which I do not quite understand. I refer to the document that was tabled the other day, a statement of services where war-time bonus is in effect or was authorized on February 24. As regards my own constituency, I was complaining, the last time I spoke on this subject, that out of seventy-eight couriers only a very few had been receiving the bonus. I take it, according to this new list that has been furnished, that every one of them except three will be paid this bonus as authorized on February 24, 1947.

These people do not now have to make application for this bonus. It will be paid to them as authorized on February 24 when the opposition urged upon the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) that the couriers should be paid the bonus even if they did not take the trouble of asking him for it. Well, we have gained that much so far.

I say to the Postmaster General that, in all fairness to those who did not ask for the bonus, it should be made retroactive to them so as to give them a square and honest deal in comparison with their neighbours who had been receiving the bonus. I am sure the Postmaster General will give the question his consideration.

In going over the list, so far as my constituency is concerned, I find there is still discrimination with regard to mileage under similar conditions. I do not know on what basis the Post Office Department figured out the bonuses, whether they took the cost basis of $40 a mile or $30 a mile. I find, however, that in my constituency there are seventy-eight mail couriers, of whom seventy get from $30 a mile up to $45, and there are seven getting from $45 a mile up to $74 a mile. There seems to be this difference right through our mail contracts. To put the matter into more concrete figures, we can start at $30. Half a dozen men receive $30 a mile, and the rate goes up, although the conditions under which they are operating are exactly the same.

There is another thing that we have gained on behalf of our mail couriers. We find that when the new list comes out there are about seventy-five in different places who have been added and are now to have both bonuses extended to them. Again I say that, in all fairness to the mail couriers, they should have the bonus made retroactive to the very time when the other men were getting it.

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) said that in his constituency every one of them had received the bonus.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): That is not what he said.

Mr. McLURE: He led us to believe that they had all received it.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): He certainly did not.

Mr. McLURE: Well, let us take the minister's own words. Because a man did not apply for it is no reason why he should not have been given it. The department knew that it was due him. Why should he not have received it? Why should they have discriminated against anyone?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The man was satisfied.

Mr. McLURE: Did the minister expect any man to come all the way from Prince Edward Island to get a small bonus? Not at all. When they knew that amount was due them, they should have paid it. It is not as if we were asking the department to pay more money than they should pay out of their surplus. I maintain that, where the mail courier was entitled to it and is now going to get it, it should be made retroactive in order to square him with others who have been receiving it all along. I think I can make the statement that, had the hon. members for the dual constituency of Queens county been notified about this, my colleague and I would have seen to it, I am sure, that all our men had the proper amount paid to them.

I now wish to say a few words with reference to the suggestions which have been made regarding mail couriers and how they should be paid. I believe there is something in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson), that they be paid on a time basis or a trip basis. I notice that the best contract in my constituency is one that is paid on a trip basis, at $5 a day. That man with a route of twenty miles gets $5 a trip. He is not getting too much but is paid on a fair and honest basis.

A few days ago a mail contract came to hand for which tenders are being called in my constituency. The man has been receiving $600, and is required to leave home in the morning about a quarter to six because he must be ready to go on his mail route at seven o'clock. It takes him fifteen or twenty minutes to get to the post office. Then it takes him over an hour to sort his mail. Last year I put up a plea for the mail couriers operating out of the central post office at Charlottetown, of whom there are some eight or ten, asking that they should be provided with a mail clerk to sort the mail properly for each of the rural routes. That is quite a job. The unfortunate part of it is that, in the winter time particularly, they have to go in early, and the horses which they must use at that time have to stand out in the cold weather for an hour or an hour and a half because stabling facilities are not near at hand. All these matters should be considered with reference to these men who are operating out of the central office at Charlottetown.

I am in favour of getting down to some mileage basis by means of which we could deal evenly and fairly with all mail couriers. I believe that if the Postmaster General were to have a committee of this house set up, they would be able to go quite a distance in arriving at a proper basis for all these contracts.

Again I wish to say that in Queens county, Prince Edward Island, our contracts with all the couriers who are doing such excellent work are not on an equitable basis. The man with the longest route seems to be the one who really gets the lowest rate per mile. The distance is some forty-seven or forty-eight miles; he has 148 boxes and he gets some $42 a mile. In contrast with that, some others, with not more than one-third of that number of boxes, are getting $48 to $52 a mile. As I said, I should like the Postmaster General to explain fully what is meant by the authorized bonus. Will it be paid to all mail couriers, and will it be made retroactive to those who did not apply for it?

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I wish to say just a few words before this bill is given third reading. As I said before, it is with the principle on which this bonus is paid that we are having the greatest difficulty and about which we are complaining. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) says that there is a big difference in routes. We all concede that. He also went on to say that the Postmaster General (Mr. Bertrand) was trying to set a common average. I very much disagree with that statement for this reason; even the Postmaster General found great fault with the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) in giving the different bonuses without giving the mileage rate afterwards. I agree that in some cases the mileage rate does not appear to be so bad. But why is there a difference of $20 to $77 a mile? I cannot conceive of any route being worth a difference of $57 a mile. Probably the Postmaster General can give us reasons for that.

The hon. member for Temiscouata also made the statement that the Conservative government while in power had fired some of the Liberal postmasters. All I can say to that is that probably he has had his turn for a considerable number of years.

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) made the statement that practically all the couriers in his constituency had received bonuses. These statements would lead us to believe that with regard to this order in council some hon. members have been "in the know" and some have not. I contend that all the couriers should have been notified that this bonus was available. That would have been only fair. I have twenty-five couriers in my own riding. Twelve of these have received bonuses and thirteen have not. If a bonus was good for one, why was it not good for another? In some cases the bonus has been much higher than the amount the contract called for. Then again it would lead us to believe that some of these couriers could have tendered low in order to get the contract, and could have been assured that they would get a bonus which would bring them up to probably twice the amount submitted by the second lowest tenderer. I contend that is very unfair.

I repeat that it is the principle on which these bonuses are paid that I am finding fault with. If a bonus is good for one it should be good for all, and the bonuses should be paid in such a manner as to make them apply evenly to all. As I said before, the difference between $20 and $77 a mile is very unfair, and I do not think conditions on any route in this country would justify a difference of $57 a mile.

I believe the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Stephenson) had a very good idea, and I do not think it would be as difficult to carry it into effect as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) would have us believe. The inspectors in these districts are or should be capable of going over a route. Surely they could come to some figure which was nearly average, at least, having in mind the number of hours it would take for a man to deliver the mail on any route. They could take into consideration road conditions, the number of stops and all the rest of it, and I think that suggestion was about as fair as any I have heard. I still contend that these bonuses could be paid on a fair basis, and I would suggest that the Postmaster General give every consideration to putting them on a mileage basis, in some reasonable way.

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank those who have taken part in this debate. Some ideas have been expressed which in the beginning appeared to be good, but which, when examined, did not measure up so well. We must begin at the beginning; we must remember we are dealing with people who have tendered, who have asked for a contract at a certain price. It may be absolutely true to say this is unfair to some who did not ask for enough, but if we indict the tender system today in regard to rural mail delivery or any other mail contracts, we indict the tender system generally; and heretofore it has been recognized by all parties that the tender system for contracts is the fairest system we have been able to find.

Of course we could follow another system and pay a contractor so much an hour, after having found out for ourselves how many hours it would take to fulfil a contract, on good and bad days. When this question was first argued, however, quite a number of hon. members on the other side said that we had in our hands what they called a pork barrel, that asking permission to make supplementary payments to certain people constituted a pork barrel of the first magnitude. Well, if we were to give contracts to gentlemen at so much an hour, and, in addition, pay for the gasoline used and so on, we would no longer have any people to tender, and we would have a real pork barrel in our hands which would permit us to give these contracts to whomever we wished.

This is the point we had in mind at the headquarters of the Post Office Department for many years when we were considering what we should do in order to help these rural mail contractors. Perhaps I might tell hon. members a very short story. Once I was appearing for the respondent in a case before the court of appeal in Montreal. My adversary was rising and arguing, not exactly following the etiquette which does not permit a lawyer to get up more than once, and I was getting up each time myself to reply; but I was told by Chief Justice Greenshields, who was presiding, that is was not necessary for me to see that my adversary understood the case in order to win it.

I explained most of these matters when this legislation was brought in two weeks ago, but perhaps I should repeat certain things I said then. Starting with the point that these contracts result from tenders, and that unfortunately there are people who have put in these tenders at prices which are too low; I admit that; otherwise we would not have given any bonuses. Starting with that point, however, I believe it might well be that someone put in a tender at a price so low that, if something had not been done, he would have had to abandon his contract. In fact many of these people told us they would have to abandon their contracts unless we gave them a bonus. That was why we passed the second order in council in 1943, which allowed us to make up the discrepancy.

When we adjusted these contracts with those who asked that this be done, we took into consideration certain factors, among many others, because there were factors that had to be taken into consideration which pertained only to certain types of contracts. We looked at the rate paid for similar services in the same locality. We scrutinized those prices. Special attention was paid to the rates being obtained by tender for other similar services, as indicating a trend. We took note of the date at which the contract was entered into, in order to determine the degree of change in operating costs. If a contract had been granted perhaps only three or four months before the tenderer applied for a bonus, he would not get it, because he must have known at that time that the cost of living was increasing, the cost of labour was going up. The tenderer must have known that material was becoming harder to get, and so on. This will explain why, under the law today, we cannot grant a bonus to anyone who has had a contract for less than twelve months. If the date at which the contract was entered into was not available, tender results in other areas were accepted as indicating a general trend. Consideration was given to the general increase in the wages of labour. In certain places that increase was much greater than in others. In Vancouver, for example, we found that the cost of labour had increased much more than in certain cities in the east.

Mr. LOCKHART: I see $111 per mile is paid in one place.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, but that is for a special reason.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is laughing, but I know he will not laugh all the time. Any peculiarity entailing unusual difficulty in performing the service, or inconvenient hours of service, were also taken into consideration; for instance, that would enter into the service between a railway station and the post office. If a train comes in at half-past one, or two o'clock, or three o'clock in the morning, we have to pay more than in the day time. Then there was the matter of inconvenient hours of service, such as early morning, and the irregularity of train service, nature of the roads, and so on.

The decision was based on the foregoing, mainly the result of the individual judgment of an officer who has been for twenty-five years in the department. Since so many factors enter into the picture, there are undoubtedly discrepancies, none, however, which are not warranted.

The extent of the bonuses granted in 1943 was lower, on the average, than the bonuses granted in succeeding years. This is accounted for by the fact that rates submitted following tenders are showing a steady rise. When some of these contractors asked for bonuses they told us that they were going to abandon their contracts which, according to the written contracts, they had the right to do.

In certain instances we have asked for new tenders. I have given the figures before. Wherever we asked for tenders, the Post Office Department has had to pay more than when we passed on a contract with the same contractor, and granted him a bonus, often the bonus he was asking for. I believe this was better, because a man might have an automobile, or he might have been using horses. It would be better to continue the contract with him and to give him the bonus than to take a new tenderer at a much higher price than was asked by the one who would continue with the contract price plus bonus.

All applications for bonuses were not granted. There are many cases where the rate asked for is excessive for the work performed, even under existing circumstances. This is a fact which is borne in mind when any proposal to cure the situation by granting a flat increase to all mail contractors is put forward.

Someone referred to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) and to the fact that in his constituency a large number of mail contractors have had bonuses. Well, in this respect some of the bonuses asked for were abusive, and we then asked for tenders. Some of the tenders came with such high prices that we refused to accept them. The result is that there are two or three rural routes today in the hon. member's constituency where there is no service. We are waiting till such time as we can supply a service at a reasonable price.

In dealing with any application for bonus, steps are taken to ascertain when public tenders were last invited for the service under consideration. If tenders were received within twelve months of the application, the tenders are scrutinized to determine the degree of competition and particularly the rate of the second lowest tender. This is taken into account when deciding the amount of any bonus granted.

We were asked for details, and as a result we prepared these documents which were tabled last week. They were prepared following the request of the hon. member for Lake Centre, and were shown to him before they were deposited in the house. We asked him if he was satisfied with them and he said he was. We have not given the reason why certain figures have been given in each instance, but that information can be obtained by considering the context, and by taking note of the frequency, the number of miles, and the boxes to be served, et cetera.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Rising to a point of order I was told it would be impossible for several weeks to get those details. That is the reason they are not given.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is right. If it was impossible to get those details for several weeks, it would not have been convenient to have left this measure standing perhaps to the end of March. Had this happened, we would have been obliged to drop the bonuses, unless in the meantime another bill were passed extending them. But to give the figures as my hon. friend has done, without giving them completely, does not give a true picture.

I hold in my hand a document—I believe the hon. member had it—in which a comparison is made. This sets out the highest amount of bonus paid in each postal district for stage service, side service and rural mail service. When we consider these matters we must take into account whether it is a stage service, et ceteria. It will be understood that a stage service is a service of mail delivery between post offices, sometimes over long routes, and serving intermediate post offices. It also gives service between railway stations and post offices, if the distances exceed three miles. The side service is between railway stations and post offices for routes less than three miles. Of course all hon. members are familiar with the rural mail service.

I should like to place on record one example in the Saint John district, between St. Gregoire and Saint John, with six frequencies. It is a return trip of 118·5 miles. The contract price was $2,990, and we gave a war bonus of $2,202.67. Even at this price, after giving a bonus of $2,202.67 on a contract price of $2,990, the rate, including the bonus, was just fourteen cents a mile. I think no one will say that is too high.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Is that the correct figure?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Or should it be $14?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No, fourteen cents a mile.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That was stage coach, was it not?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That contract had been tendered at a price of almost seven cents. It was increased to almost double that figure, to give fourteen cents. These long routes are covered by automobiles or buses or trucks, depending on the mail they have to carry and the number of stations served.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who was the contractor, please? Was it not a stage?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, it is a stage service, carrying mail, and it may also carry something else.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not the rate per trip, though.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Surely fourteen cents a mile is not too much.

Mr. STEPHENSON: That is per trip?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Per trip mile.

Mr. CHARLTON: That figure is out $43.68 per year mile.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Surely that figure is not too high.

Then, let us take one in the Montreal district, from Farnham to the Canadian Pacific railway station. This is a city service between the station and the post office. The distance is 1,300 rods and there are eighty-five trips a week. The contract price was $822.28 and the war-time bonus amounted to $977.72. Even with the bonus, this works out at only forty-one cents a trip, to carry mail 1,300 rods. We do not think that payment is unfair to the treasury.

I shall not attempt to give the particulars of all these contracts, but here is one mail route in Vancouver where there are six trips for a distance of thirty-two miles. The contract rate was $1,200 with a war-time bonus of $1,080. This works out to $71.25 a mile, one of the highest we have. However the hon. member did not mention that there are 383 boxes to be served. The other routes referred to by the hon. member did not have nearly as great a number of boxes. Before this man starts his route, he must sort his mail and that takes a long time. The cost of labour is very high in this district and that was also taken into consideration. I have given three contracts which, at first sight, might be considered to be fair, but when everything is taken into consideration it will be seen that these are on a par with other contracts that have been adjusted.

I have another one here, a stage service from Halifax to Sheet Harbour. There are three trips for a distance of 82·9 miles. The contract price was $3,995.18 with a war-time bonus of $1,177. This works out to only twenty cents a mile, which surely is not too much.

A number of questions were asked, but most of those questions did not take into account the fact that we are dealing with contracts which were obtained on tender. The basic price was fixed by the contractor who would know the route and who, it would be supposed, would take great care to tender sufficiently to be able to make money. I admit that in some cases people are tendering too low, but surely it is not for the government to pass a law obliging tenderers to bid higher. If we were fixing prices it would have to be an average price on which the tenderer could make a fair living. I am quite sure that if that were done a large number of tenderers would bid the minimum price, and then we would have to choose. We would then have what some members are afraid of, a pork barrel to play with.

I admit that we are dealing with a difficult problem, but this law will be in force for just one year or for sixty days after the opening of the next session. At that time any contracts that have been closed out because of the death of a contractor or because a contractor may not want to continue will be put up for tender under the old system and the contract will be given to the lowest tenderer, provided that he has the necessary equipment to do the work.

Mr. STEPHENSON: The minister says that the tenders will be accepted, no matter what the prices are. Sometimes a man will knowingly tender at a price which will not permit efficient service of the route. Does the minister agree that the government should exploit those men?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): No.

Mr. STEPHENSON: That is what you are doing. You are accepting the lowest tender, knowing that the man cannot reasonably carry out his contract.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I like the sympathy the hon. member is expressing for the gentlemen who pass on tenders. However, if we do not abide by this rule we shall have to put aside the tender system, not only in the case of small contracts, but in the case of contracts to build buildings such as the beautiful ones we have here. We must have some yardstick—

Mr. STEPHENSON: May I ask one more question?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I have not finished. We must have some yardstick unless we succeed in finding another way to pay these contractors.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt, but I would direct the attention of the hon. gentleman and the minister to the fact that we are considering the motion for third reading and hon. members are allowed to speak only once.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the minister has the unanimous consent of the house he will be obliged to abide by the rules.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I say a word in connection with the Fraser valley—

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the minister is answering a question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I thought he had not closed the debate.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We must carry on like this unless we find a way of paying these people so much per hour. That is something we shall have to consider.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE, SALE AND EXPORT—COMMODITY AND PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS

The house resumed from Friday, March 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner for the second reading of Bill No. 25, to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products, and on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Nicholson.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned on Friday night one of the principal speakers on the amendment offered by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) was the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who gave an interesting talk, informative at times, a bit fantastic in one or two spots, a mixture of fact and fancy of the kind in which the minister frequently indulges.

I do not think there is any doubt in the minds of the members of this particular group about the bill that has been presented doing the job which the minister says the government wants done. We have no doubt about that whatsoever. But we want a lot more. We agree that the contracts which the government have made with other countries must be carried out, and if thiis vehicle is the only one they can conceive of for doing that job, we are not going to stop them from having this vehicle. But we want to make it clear that to us it is simply a horse and buggy compared with what the farmers of this country want. They want the orderly marketing of farm products and cooperative and democratic control of the machinery of that marketing, and we support their demands and will continue to do so on every occasion in this house. We also believe that, while it may be difficult at this late date, a marketing act such as is forecast in the amendment offered by the hon. member for Mackenzie would give the minister and the government an opportunity to do all that can be done under this bill, and, as well, something more. Had it been started early enough and conceived with some of the vision that the Liberal party claims to have, we have not the slightest doubt in our minds that something of that kind could have been done. I think I am safe in saying that the minister himself believes that, because at the last minute he brought in an amendment to a section of the bill dealing with apples, which indicates that he considers it necessary to have some marketing control over interprovincial trade. That is a clear indication that the minister felt that way from the start.

Another thing we do not like about this bill is that we recognize that these contracts will not last forever. Very few of them expire this year, and this bill terminates at the end of this year. As a matter of fact it is only a nine-months bill, and it will terminate at a time when parliament is not sitting. If there is no election this year—I do not know whether there will be or not; I do not know whether the minister knows—

Mr. BURTON: If he does, he won't tell.

Mr. BENTLEY: "If he does, he won't tell", my hon. friend interjects. I presume this session of parliament will be over before the end of this year. The bill does imply the possibility of a session of parliament in November and December, which may or may not happen. The bill itself will expire on December 31 next. Some of the contracts, the minister says, will not expire until 1948 and some in 1949. At least contracts for two very large items will not expire until 1949. This means that parliament will have to go through this process year after year until the government finally get rid of these contracts and do something else which they may envisage at that time, if they are still in their seats over there.

The hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Burton) asked the minister what a transitional period was. The minister was pointing out the transitional nature of this bill. He replied that he did not know what the transitional period would be, and he does not believe that anybody else knows. I agree with the minister that he does not know and that nobody else in this house knows what the transitional period will be. Not even the minister himself can give us a definition of the transition from war to peace or from this period to that, and tell us what will take place. It is a frank admission that private monopoly enterprise is always in a transitional stage, and we shall always be having bills of this kind unless we frankly face the transitional nature of our present-day society and make plans with some degree of permanence and vision.

There are times when the Liberals believe that they do know when the transitional period will end. They say they believe they know and they have paid out money at certain periods to support their belief. I have here a page from the Toronto Star Weekly, of May 26, 1945, which was shortly before the last election, and at that time it was indicated quite clearly that the Liberals did know, and they spent money to have this advertisement printed, stating they believed they could foretell the end of the transitional period. They said they had the necessary plans for going ahead, with some permanence to their plans. I will quote one paragraph of this advertisement and underline four words when I get to them. The advertisement says:

The all-important question today is the civilian staff-work and leadership which we call "government."

The "we" is the government. It goes on:

The Liberals have a working plan.

I do not know how many times we in this party have been criticized for urging a planned society. We have been criticized by all kinds of members of that party in the house and by their workers outside for talking of a planned economy.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): You have not a plan. It is a nightmare.

Mr. BENTLEY: The hon. member says that our plan is a nightmare. I shall have to go back on the offer I made to him the other day when he told the Prime Minister that he would not be looking to him for a job, and when I told him, "If you are down and out, we will give you one when we get in." Evidently my offer was a nightmare, and I now withdraw it.

Let me continue with the advertisement:

The Liberals have a working plan.

Then mark these four words:

It's big and bold!

Mr. MacINNIS: Bold or bald?

Mr. BENTLEY: "Bold" is the word here, but perhaps "bald" would be better. This nine months' bill is neither bold nor big, because the minister admitted in reply to the hon. member for Humboldt that he has no idea how long the transitional period will last. But the Liberals have a working plan, and it is big and bold! So says the advertisement. It goes on:

Parts of it are outlined for your judgment in the left-hand column.

There will be a lot of judges of this working plan, and some of them have judged it already. It goes on:

It has been designed with the aid of the keenest minds in every phase of industry, agriculture, labour and learning.

Some of the keenest minds in agriculture have circulated among the members of this house this document. It is called:

Here is exact demand of Canadian farmers; their draft act for dominion natural products marketing legislation as submitted to cabinet.

That is from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I turn back to the advertisement. It says:

The Liberals have a working plan . . . It has been designed with the aid of the keenest minds in every phase of industry, agriculture, labour and learning.

I have heard other members deal with the plans of these keen minds regarding labour, education and so forth, and I submit that if this bill has been drawn up with the aid of the keenest minds in agriculture it is a distinct slap in the face for the officials of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, who believe they have keen minds too. The advertisement goes on to say:

The plan will work. In fact it is already bringing results.

It will continue to do so! The Liberals can tell you this with confidence because they have had successful experience in operating nation-wide plans.

I would say that they have had experience in operating on a transitional basis. Some of their operations on a transitional basis would make one smile a little if it were not so annoying.

Just by way of a little interlude, Mr. Speaker, I would exhibit to the house a little sample of private enterprise and planning to indicate some of the things they do during the transitional period. These are Kleenex tissues I hold in my hand. Here is one. This is what private enterprise is making at the present time and, in spite of the demand for the other kind that I have here, almost three times as large, they are supplying this smaller tissue. You go into a drugstore to buy the big kind and they offer you the small. I ask, "Why can't I get the larger kind that I want?" The answer is, "They are all sold." That proves that the demand is there. You have only to look at the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie), and myself and other members too, to realize that a man-sized nose cannot get along with this smaller kind.

Mr. MacNICOL: He can use two, can't he?

Mr. BENTLEY: That is a sample of the transitional nature of private enterprise as explained by our good friends the Liberals in their talking and also in their advertising of big, bold plans.

Mr. JOHNSTON: They have quite a blow.

Mr. BENTLEY: They have. The minister took occasion the other day to indulge in quite a bit of fantasy, as he does every once in a while, and one of the most fantastic portions of his speech was his recitation of the experience he had when visiting a certain gentleman who had previously visited Regina. This person had told him about his visit there, and how this visitor had come to the conclusion, from his interviews with government officials there, that the province of Saskatchewan had built up its socialist regime and all its cooperative institutions in the period of a couple of years. Of course the visitor had not known that. The minister implied that he put him right. I think the minister must have been intending to imply some criticism of the C.C.F. which was not fair, and he frequently takes occasion to point out that the Liberal party, particularly in Saskatchewan, is to be credited with the great development of cooperative enterprise in that province. I pay the minister the personal tribute of believing that he is just as proud as I am of the things that have been done in that province in that field. I will admit that the rise of these associations and organizations took place for the most part when the Liberals were in power, but some of them took place when Tory governments were in power. I shall have to refute emphatically, his claim to credit for his party or the claim of any political party.

Let me give a reason for that assertion. The first wheat board was established under a Union government which was neither Liberal nor Tory. The establishment of that board and its operations gave the farmers of the west the idea that there was something good in the principle of orderly marketing. They made a demand for its continuance in 1921 and 1922. At that time we had a Liberal prime minister in Ottawa, a Liberal premier in Saskatchewan and Manitoba and a U.F.A. premier in Alberta. The cooperative wheat producers, that is, the wheat pools, of these provinces arose by the action of the farmers themselves after the failure of the parties I have cited, who had failed to meet the demand which the farmers had made. These organizations were born in spite of the Liberal party and not because of it, and I wish to make that abundantly clear.

In his talk, the minister mentioned another organization out there, the cooperative creameries. He made the following statement which will be found at page 1391 of Hansard:

> When I was first premier of Saskatchewan, between 1926 and 1929, I had all the creameries in Saskatchewan amalgamated under that organization prior to 1929.

[Mr. Johnston.]

It would take more than forty minutes for me to tell the house the whole story, but if I had time to tell the whole story of cooperative creameries—and I know it from the start until now—hon. members would be highly amused at the minister's statement, and I do not think the minister himself would be made very happy by the recital.

Mr. GARDINER: You need tell only one thing.

Mr. BENTLEY: I can tell it all.

Mr. GARDINER: The Liberal government of Saskatchewan put up $65 out of every $100 that went into the building of the Saskatchewan cooperative creameries and $85 out of every $100 that went into the building of the cooperative elevators.

Mr. BENTLEY: And they got it back. I would say this in connection with cooperative creameries, that it has been only in the last two years that the cooperative creameries of Saskatchewan began to operate according to the cooperative principles and standards of the Rochdale plan. The dairy pool arose, like the wheat pools, in spite of the Liberal government, through the organization of the farmers themselves. I wonder why the minister makes such statements. The member for Humboldt sat in the Saskatchewan legislature, in His Majesty's opposition, when the Liberals were in power. At that time a cooperative organization owned the Modern Press, a large printing institution in Saskatoon. The Liberal party claims to have given great assistance to cooperatives, but the Liberal government gave that cooperative newspaper no job printing whatsoever. Pardon me; they gave them $50 worth of printing in all those years. The minister's statements do not stand up under examination. I should like to make these points quite clear.

The minister mentioned the cooperative refinery in Regina. That was organized in 1931 and 1932, when we had the only Tory government we ever had in Saskatchewan sitting in Regina.

Mr. HOMUTH: Too bad you have not one now.

Mr. BENTLEY: We do not think so. My hon. friend is entitled to his opinion in that regard, but he does not live there. If the minister wishes to give credit to Liberals for certain institutions out there he must give credit to the Tories for the cooperative refineries. I will not join with him in giving that credit, but, in distributing his garlands he must be fair to the party that sits at the other end of this side of the chamber, the Tories.

Mr. GARDINER: You never had a Tory government in Saskatchewan. It was called a Cooperative government.

Mr. BENTLEY: Just before six o'clock I should like to finish this particular part of my talk. In connection with these matters I have been discussing, we do not claim as a C.C.F. government to have built the cooperatives, but we claim that we are of the people in the province who did build them under Liberal and Tory regimes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENTLEY: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was dealing with the attempts of the Minister of Agriculture to take credit for the development of the cooperative movement in Saskatchewan. I mentioned that the Liberals cannot take that credit; neither can the Tories; and I want to make it very clear that the C.C.F., as a political party, does not take that credit either. But as individuals, all of us here took a pertinent part in the building of this movement, just as individual citizens, in spite of any other political party. Because of that we have now a government in Saskatchewan which is sympathetic to cooperatives; we have in this house a group which is sympathetic to cooperatives; and after the next election we shall have a sympathetic government here. However, before I leave this point, I wish to mention that the minister insisted on taking that credit. If he is going to take the credit for one thing, he will have to take the credit for others. The C.C.F. party was born during the regime of the Liberals in Regina and Ottawa; it was baptized during the regime of the Tories in Regina and Ottawa, and it reached adult age during the Liberal regime at Regina and Ottawa. If the minister wishes to take credit for that, he may, although I do not know whether we shall give it to him. But he should be as willing to take credit for that as he is to take credit for some of the other developments out there. The next time he makes a public statement here or outside, I hope he will make it clear that he assisted in building the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. GARDINER: I assisted in trimming the cooperative government.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): He should be very proud of his handiwork.

Mr. BENTLEY: I think he is.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie is, I think, worthy of some consideration here. It is in three parts, after the preamble. It asks that this bill be not now read a second time but that it go to the committee on agriculture and colonization with instructions that they have power to recommend provision for, first, the regulation of interprovincial trading. I have pointed out that that is apparently acceptable to the minister in that he has already introduced an amendment to the bill itself for the handling of apples. Without any other comments on that, may I point out that the second provision of the amendment is for more democratic control by the producers of the proposed board or boards. I have dealt with that in the earlier part of my speech this afternoon; that is part and parcel of our philosophy and belief, and is what we in this group shall continue to promote. The third paragraph asks for provision for a long-range marketing programme instead of a transitional programme. This afternoon and evening I have tried to point out why we believe these things are so necessary. We believe that, had the government not been so transitional in its ideas, it could have prepared a marketing bill early enough which could have had in it all the necessary machinery to handle what Bill No. 25 is designed to handle, and also all those things which we believe should be handled by the marketing board.

In closing, I wish to say this definitely. I am about finished with my remarks, and I want to give the minister this opportunity to give us some assurance. If this group had had a real assurance that a comprehensive agricultural products marketing act would be introduced at this session or not later than the start of next session, we would have taken very little part in this debate; and even now we would consider favourably the withdrawal of our amendment upon receiving that assurance. We have no desire to obstruct the passage of this bill. We simply wish to have some assurance that the position we have taken will be given some encouragement in the very near future. As I say, we are not opposing the bill or the principle of the bill. We simply believe that this bill should have been enlarged in the first place. We think it could be enlarged now if the time were spent on it, but we are prepared to forgo that time, provided that we can have the assurance that we shall get the type of bill we believe is necessary if we facilitate the passage of this particular bill.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I shall delay the house but a very few minutes in placing before hon. members the position which this group takes with respect to Bill No. 25. The government has made certain international agreements for Canada to supply wheat, bacon, cheese and some other products to other countries. We realize that the government must be able to get the commodities with which to fulfil its commitments under those agreements. The purpose of Bill No. 25 is to provide the machinery by which the government may be able to get those products to fulfil international agreements. We feel that the bill confers on the minister very wide powers which ordinarily we should not like to confer on any minister of the crown. The provisions of the bill are to have effect for only one year; and because it is an emergency transitional bill to meet a certain set of circumstances that have arisen out of war time, this group will not put up a battle on the principle of the bill itself.

We are, however, strongly opposed to giving the minister the right to set up commodity boards as provided for in this bill and clothing them with extraordinary powers which are enunciated in the various clauses thereof. In this respect I would say we are thoroughly in accord with what was said by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). We urge the minister to make use of existing producer boards or those which might come into existence later under the various provincial marketing acts. These producer boards, I feel sure, are prepared to cooperate with the federal government in any way that they can. It seems to me that the whole principle of orderly marketing ought to be based upon the fundamental principle of keeping control of the producers' product as close to the producer as possible. Whenever the minister does require certain natural products for the purposes of fulfilling his agreements with Britain or any other country, he should direct that such commodities be purchased from the producer boards wherever possible. The obligation for him to do this should be clearly stated in the bill. The measure we are considering does make it possible for the minister to direct the purchase of commodities for the purposes of the act from provincial marketing boards; but, as I read it, there is absolutely no obligation upon him to do so.

I should now like to say just a word in regard to a natural products marketing act.

This group think the government should bring in at a very early day; in fact, we think before this they should have prepared and brought into this house, a bill providing for the orderly marketing of natural products in Canada. I am inclined to agree with the minister that we should not attempt to tack on to this bill, which is for an emergency transitional period, a long-range, comprehensive marketing measure. I do not think it wise to attempt to do that. We consider that the new legislation which should be brought in, and which we are urging the minister in the strongest possible terms to bring in, should be substantially as asked for by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Amongst other things it should provide for these: first, for orderly interprovincial and international trading in natural products; second, for the recognition of provincial marketing boards and producer boards as sources of supply. Every encouragement should be given the provinces to put through enabling legislation, under which every effort should be made to organize producer boards, to keep some control over the produce of the farmers right where it belongs, in the hands of the producers themselves. I do not believe it is wise to let these boards rest, in their control of the products raised, on a mere majority. I should say that when a substantial majority, let us say something between seventy and eighty per cent, of the producers of any natural product voluntarily agree to set up a board for control purposes, then I believe the control of the entire supply of that product should be vested in the board. Anything less than seventy to eighty per cent I do not believe could possibly be successful.

The third thing I believe should be in any marketing bill is protection of the right of the producer to be consulted through the medium of his board, particularly by the minister, as to prices and other matters, before he makes agreements with any country which might affect or set the price of the farmer's products. We have seen so many examples in this country of agreements having been made without consulting the producers of the products. Then this parliament has been asked to ratify those agreements, or to take action which would support the minister in fulfilling their terms. Finally, the new marketing legislation should give full recognition to provincial authority over property and civil rights, as is provided in the constitution. The place of the dominion in any long-range marketing scheme should be mainly that of an agent or clearing house for the producer boards and/or the provincial marketing boards.

We have before us the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson). I am not particularly favourable to that amendment at this stage. I do not think it has very much relationship, if any, to the bill before us. I should rather prefer to see an amendment similar to or exactly the same as the one suggested the other evening by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling). But under the circumstances, since this is the only amendment we have before us, and in order to show the people that this group do support the idea of a well thought out, well set up, long-range orderly marketing scheme for Canada, we propose to support the amendment, and ask that at the earliest possible day the minister bring down in this house legislation of the type asked for by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: Might I ask a question before the hon. member sits down?

Mr. LOW: Certainly.

Mr. GARDINER: I should like to ask if the hon. member has given thought to the idea that to pass the amendment kills the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. LOW: I suggested, Mr. Speaker, that it was not a question of supporting the amendment because I wanted to see such an amendment in this bill, but on behalf of our group I wanted to indicate that we undoubtedly support the idea of a new, comprehensive natural products marketing bill.

Mr. GARDINER: That is exactly the point; the house is being asked to vote against the principle of this bill and in favour of the principle of another bill. That kills this bill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is not what you said the other day.

Mr. GARDINER: There would not be any possible way of carrying out the agreements already signed with Britain under a marketing bill such as has been discussed by hon. members opposite. There might be a possibility of doing that twelve months from now, if the proper boards were set up, but there would not be any possibility of starting on April 1 and doing that job through those boards. To pass the amendment—I am not saying it would pass, even if the Social Credit group should vote for it—would be to kill this bill, because there would not be any such bill in existence any longer.

Mr. LOW: I do not believe the adoption of the amendment would kill the bill. In any event I am quite sure various amendments will be proposed in committee. I am simply trying to indicate that, in the absence of legislation of the kind we have advocated, in the event that the amendment is lost—and I am sure it will be lost—we shall support second reading of this bill, but with the understanding that when we come to section 4 we are certainly going to propose an amendment, if one is not already moved.

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I crave a bit of your time and the time of the house to speak on this bill because I farmed for so long in western Canada. Let me deal first with the gentlemanly interruption of the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low) a moment ago by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). As I understood his interruption, it was to say that if this amendment were to carry it would destroy the bill. I think I am correct so far. Yet the minister, with all those behind him, supported a ruling by Mr. Speaker ruling out amendments which, in my judgment, meant the same as this one, because they did not contain a principle different from that contained in the bill. So that now the minister has boxed the compass completely, and we are back where we were some time ago.

Mr. GARDINER: I am doing this only because I shall not have an opportunity of speaking before the amendment is put.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do you want to ask me a question?

Mr. GARDINER: No. That argument was not used with regard to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling).

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, it was.

Mr. GARDINER: Not the argument that it introduced something new. The argument there was that it did not introduce anything new. We put forth no argument on the others at all, except that they would kill the bill.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Then may I say we have completed another arc of the circle and the minister is on his way around again. He voted to support a ruling by Mr. Speaker throwing out two amendments, if my memory serves me aright, because they were not amendments to the principle. Now the minister says the present amendment is so entirely different in principle that it would destroy the bill itself. With that I leave the minister. He is not a quarter horse; he usually runs the full mile, and I think finally he will get around the track again and we shall be back where we started some time ago.

An hon. MEMBER: A wisecrack.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And win the race.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I did not hear that remark. However I think I did get something about a wisecrack; I heard that much of it. I am very happy to have that comment, knowing where it came from. I am glad the hon. member even appreciates a wisecrack, because there is little else he does appreciate. We will just let it go at that.

I come to discuss my position—and I use the word "my" advisedly. We have had two bills in this parliament recently. Suggestions have been made from this side of the house and, in fact, from all quarters of this side of the house, for certain amendments, and that those amendments should be made in the interests of the farmers of Canada. We have met with a flat refusal. The answer on both occasions has been this: "If we do what you suggest, we destroy the bill; and you men over there are in fact sabotaging the interests of the farmers of Canada." That, stripping the thing down to its—well, whatever elementary things there are in a bill—is the difference between this whole side of the house, and that side, over there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, no.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): "Oh, no", do you say? Well, I am glad to know where that came from, because he voted once with us; and it was the same principle, right through the picture.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Twice.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Twice. Apparently he has changed his mind in the course of the last forty-eight hours or so.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Nonsense; you don't know what I am doing.

Mr. ROWE: He changes every forty-eight hours.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And I shall still be changing, so far as you are concerned.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I pay the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) this great compliment: Only fools are unable to change their minds. Wise men do. He is one of the wisest men I know, and particularly when he is picking those little berries, and magnifying them into thousands of tons, as he does so readily in this House of Commons.

However, if he and you, sir, will permit me to come back—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Oh, oh.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I hear a bit of raucous laughter from somewhere. Yes, I believe I have located it. The hon. member who is leading the house at the present time is a little bit worried because he cannot go out and pick berries for the hon. member for Fraser Valley. He is the greatest berry-picker I have ever known in my life. And he always gets them ripe; I have noticed that. He waits until that time comes.

I once more come back to what I was trying to say, and it is this, that in so far as we—and I speak for this whole side of the house—I believe—

Mr. MacINNIS: Be careful.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will be very careful, particularly when I know where that interruption came from, because he is one who is happy only when the whole House of Commons disagrees with him. In that way he gets his name into the newspapers, because he is unique, you see.

I now come back for the fourth try, if I may be permitted. They say it is three times and out, but I will try it again. I come back to this, and in all seriousness, sir, that we have been met in these last two bills with the cry of "sabotage" and "wolf." In the present bill the minister's whole statement is this—and it is technical—that if you adopt these amendments, of which all of us over here were in favour, you destroy the whole bill. His answer was, "If you want to do that, have a new bill." May I say with the greatest respect that I disagreed with Your Honour's ruling of the other day, because I think the minister has this much of right in his favour, namely that it is a different principle. What he said was this, "If you want to do that, let us have a new bill." Well, if the minister meant what he said, why does he not now tell us, "You will have a new bill." We cannot introduce it, because it involves the expenditure of public money.

Mr. GARDINER: Shall I answer that now?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: I said in my speech the other night that when that position was put up to us by the representatives of the farmers I stated to them quite definitely that it was not likely that we would bring down a bill this session, and that anything we did do this session would be done in this bill. I said that we were not likely to be bringing down a bill this session to deal with long-time marketing.

Mr. ROWE: That is not much of an answer.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I heard the minister accurately on both occasions. What I am saying to the minister through you, sir, is this, that it is either government policy to support these producer boards, or it is not. If the minister will now say that he will bring in a bill to support the producer boards, then you can stop these arguments very quickly.

Mr. GARDINER: It is the policy of the government not to bring down such a bill at this session.

Mr. ROWE: Twelve months hoist.

Mr. GARDINER: The only way in which the agreements that have been made with Great Britain can be fulfilled is to have this bill on the statute books. The other bill cannot be put on the statute books at this time to deal with that situation. There is so much in common between the two that there is nothing to be gained by bringing down two bills at this session.

Mr. ROWE: Are you going to bring it down next session?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I wonder if I can take care of this myself. Between these two bills there is a very great difference in principle, and I have heard the minister accurately on three occasions. Through you, sir—and I hope that Your Honour is checking on the time which has been occupied by the minister—may I ask the minister: Are you representing this government as being in favour of these producer boards handling their marketing, or are you not? I will allow you to interrupt me to answer that.

Mr. GARDINER: I have stated the government's position clearly. We do not believe that this is the time to bring down legislation to deal with that question.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I will accept that, and interpret it in the only way I can, that it is another stall such as we have met with on many occasions.

I mentioned the word "principle". While this bill is only for a year—and I intend to have a word or two to say about that—it means—and I hate superlatives—that the government through the council, through the minister—and I am quite sure they will be guided by him, because I compliment him upon knowing more about his department than any other minister in the government, that is since the shift took place, of course. I compliment him on that—but this bill means this, that every producer of agricultural products in the whole Dominion of Canada is entirely in the right fist of the minister. Every activity, everything they have to do, is under his complete control. Granted that he is the greatest man in the world—and certainly I rank him rather highly—but, granted that he is all that, no individual in any history I have ever read has been entitled to that much power.

Someone may logically say to me, "Just what do you mean by that? The other day you voted"—and I did—"for the wheat bill". May I assure you, sir, that in this debate on second reading I shall not depart any further from the rules than those who have preceeded me; and I refer particularly to the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: I will not object.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You know, the Minister of Agriculture and I spent a long time in the same town. It has produced four great men—including myself.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who are the other two?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): One of them leads the C.C.F. party now. Another one is the Hon. Charles Dunning, whom the Minister of Agriculture supported then. I saw the light first, as the minister reminded the house the other night, away back in 1917. The Hon. Charles Dunning saw it much later in life. I think the other two are beyond the pale. But I give you my word that, in my judgment, the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) is seeing a great deal more light than the Minister of Agriculture. He is just set in that way.

Here is his attitude and that of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) with respect to the wheat bill. I remember the town from which we all came. It consisted of 2,753 people. The births just equalled the deaths and we stayed there for years. Perhaps we had the same census taker who did not bother going around year after year. That was the simple fact about Regina. In those days we did not have much money and there was a game called football, about which the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) knows something. It is the cheapest game in the world because, if you can put up $2.50 for a football the whole town can play. There is no expensive equipment needed or anything like that. The richest boy in town owned the football and, when he did not like the way the game was going, he took the ball home. That is exactly the attitude of the minister today—"take my bill, take it 100 per cent, or we won't play." That is the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce as well.

Mr. GARDINER: Both the hon. member and I played at that time and we did not play that way.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): No, we did not, but I continued being a sportsman and I am afraid the minister has fallen a little bit behind.

Having finished off the Minister of Agriculture, I want to turn and say this is serious. We have embarked a tremendously long way on the marketing of farm products. I know something about the rule which says you cannot discuss a bill during the present session, so I am going to put a supposititious case—that is twice I have used that word and I love it—to this House of Commons, and particularly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has sold 600,000,000 bushels of wheat short, more than any other exchange in the world ever sold short. What he has done is to take $36,000,000 of the farmers' money in the 1945-46 crop year as a margin. That is exactly what has been done under the wheat bill. People here sometimes get annoyed about persons gambling with the farmers' wheat, but here is the greatest gamble ever undertaken by anybody. The minister has $36,000,000 of a margin in the kitty which he refuses to give back to the farmers at the present time.

I come now to this bill and I want some one to correct me if I am wrong in my interpretation of it. I make the statement that it gives the minister, the cabinet, the government, authority over everything that is raised on a farm from beef to eggs, to barley, to oats, to alfalfa, everything in the world. They have that authority. You might say to me, and quite properly, "You voted for the wheat agreement." I did. I voted for it and I made it plain that I did so on the basis that the government had committed us to that agreement. I certainly would vote in favour of the government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): —honouring the signature of Canada. I do not know whether there are some animals in the house but I heard a peculiar sound just a moment ago. I do now and I always will support that position. What have we in this particular bill? We have beef, bacon, cheese, eggs and there may be something else. I stand in exactly the same position, but I refuse to let this government or any minister or anyone else tell me that this is for—somebody said it was for nine months, which is the ordinary period of gestation for an idea and perhaps for other things—I refuse to assent to anybody having that power to sign again on the dotted line within that time and then say to us, "There is our signature; you have to honour it." The thing stops somewhere, and in so far as I am concerned, it stops right here.

Someone may logically say, "Where are you going to get the cheese and beef and so on?" My answer is, "Go into the market and buy it, and let the people of Canada carry this load rather than the agricultural producer." There is no justice in anything but that. Certainly we want to help Britain, but let us not do it as we are doing it today by having the farmers of Canada carry the entire expense.

Mr. GARDINER: The bill provides for exactly what you have asked for.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thank you very much for that interpretation. What you have in your bill is that the selling price must have an appropriate relation to the buying price. I take it that that is what you are referring to.

Mr. GARDINER: No; the bill says that the government has the authority to buy the product at a price and, if that price is higher than anybody else's price, we buy it at that price.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am certainly delighted to hear that, but I think the minister's remarks along that line are most interesting. I have the wheat bill in my hand and it provides for the purchase of wheat only.

Mr. GARDINER: This is not the wheat bill.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It provides for the purchase of wheat only, except as directed by the governor general in council. Then today the minister came into the house and made this statement:

> Effective tomorrow, March 18, the system of advance equalization payments will be discontinued and the Canadian wheat board will stand ready to buy all oats and barley offered to it at new support prices. In the case of barley these prices will be based on ninety cents for No. 1 feed barley, in place of the former support price of fifty-six cents . . .

That is the wheat board which under the bill could buy nothing but wheat except as directed by order in council. When the minister tells me that all he is seeking under this bill is to make the Dominion of Canada responsible I cannot avoid thinking that he more than anyone else supported the wheat bill which was to deal only with wheat, and then before the ink is dry he brings in an order in council directing the wheat board to buy barley and to buy oats. That is my point.

Mr. GARDINER: That is in the bill; there is a provision in the bill for buying oats and barley.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I know I am getting a little old, but perhaps the minister is doing that too. Subsection 2 of section 7 reads—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I would direct his attention to the fact that on the second reading of a bill hon. members can discuss only the principle of the bill.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I say, with great deference to your position and with personal respect to you, that I accept your ruling and I will not talk any more about the wheat bill. I shall turn now to something else which I think you will consider as being quite relevant. I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is not in the house at the moment, but I notice the former Minister of Finance is here.

An hon. MEMBER: He is here.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am very happy to know that, but I would be ruled out of order if I saw him where he is.

An hon. MEMBER: He came in.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I have been watching him carefully and I thought I would smoke him out. I notice he came in just a moment ago. Here is something I am anxious to have someone tell me. We are selling wheat under the market price, as well as beef, cheese, dairy products, and I could go down through the list. We are buying things in the world market. We have $600 or $700 million against us on balance with the United States during the last year. What I am anxious to know is this: How can we continue to sell everything we have, even gold, under the world price, and buy everything we buy at the world price without going bankrupt? I know there may be an answer. I am quite sure it will be technical, but I hope it is in language that even I, and I speak very humbly, can understand. So I say, with respect to this legislation, it fails because the government has failed to permit those of us who, for the moment, are over here to be helpful in our suggestions. The government has taken a take-it-or-leave-it attitude and, as long as that attitude is continued, I will support the amendment. In the event that the amendment is defeated I will vote against the bill. We have been trying to be helpful. Someone said that the other day with respect to all parties, and I agree with him heartily; I think it can fairly be said of every member of this House of Commons. We are here trying to do what we can to help; we differ only in method. We have made suggestions which we thought were worthwhile, but this government has been here so long—perhaps that is our fault—that it has developed a power complex which it has been unable to shake off.

In closing, may I compliment the Minister of Trade and Commerce—I knew he would play a twopenny ante game; he is a good bridge player and can play as high as he likes—on making, with other people's money, the greatest gamble the world ever saw.

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I have sat here and listened to addresses from different parts of the house on this Bill No. 25. I have also sat here and listened for some weeks to hon. members discussing a commodity called wheat. We in eastern Canada are getting pretty well sick of the discussions on wheat.

Mr. BRYCE: You have been wanting it for feed in eastern Canada.

Mr. McCUBBIN: As I said, I have listened to discussions on wheat and we in eastern Canada are getting sick and tired of the discussions on wheat; for, when it all boils down, after weeks of discussion, we found that only seven members of this house were opposed to the wheat legislation.

I as a farmer and, representing farmers, am here tonight from western Ontario in this great old province of ours, to support this Bill No. 25. I feel that the minister is too modest in bringing down this legislation and making it operative for only one year. I think it should extend for two or three years instead of one.

I may be asked why I am supporting this bill. I am supporting it because the farmers of Canada have been asking for this type of legislation for years. They have not forgotten what happened after the last war; they have not forgotten the dark thirties, and they are willing to put into the hands of this government the sale and export of their farm products in a sane and sensible manner, which I feel is the way in which it will be carried out. Before the war started, the government encouraged us in eastern Canada to use the cheap coarse grains in the production of cheese and bacon to be marketed in the best market there is in the world for such products, Great Britain. We established a good market for those products in that country, and when the war started those markets were enlarged and encouraged. Everything has been done to make the cheap grains available, by freight assistance, not only to Ontario but to British Columbia. May I in passing, congratulate the government on bringing down the order they brought down today raising the price of coarse grains to the western farmer and assuring that these grains will be available to us in eastern Canada for feed. Since this announcement was made this afternoon, I have received telephone calls from different parts of Ontario asking me if the announcement they heard over the radio tonight was correct. I say sincerely that the farmers of Ontario will be pleased with this announcement.

I wish to commend the government for the agreement they have made with respect to wheat with the United Kingdom for five years. It will give stability to the western farmer. I have already mentioned the cheese and bacon agreements. There is another agreement I want to mention to the house and the country, and that is the beef agreement. The government negotiated an agreement with the United Kingdom with respect to beef three or four years ago in order that Britain might receive our beef products and at the same time take great quantities of surplus beef off our markets. Two or three weeks ago the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) and the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) in discussing this bill suggested shipping our beef on the hoof across the line. The United States is our natural market for beef. I have always believed that and will continue to believe it. I also know that, prior to the embargo being placed on beef cattle going from Canada to the United States, under the cent and a half tariff agreement negotiated with the United States in 1936 and renegotiated in 1939, the United States took only 193,000 head of our cattle on a quarterly basis. Great Britain is willing to take unlimited quantities of beef from us. During 1945 Great Britain took over 500,000 head of cattle off the Canadian market in the shape of frozen beef and beef products. Are we willing to do away with that contract in preference for another? Or are we willing to negotiate a further contract with Great Britain for our beef products?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is the hon. member suggesting that I or the hon. member for Calgary East advocated any more than token shipments to the United States at the present time? That is all we suggested.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I will come to that in a moment. I listened to both hon. gentlemen and heard what they suggested with respect to token shipments of our cattle to the United States. I am opposed to that. I feel that it would not be sensible for us to send token shipments to the United States at this time. Great Britain is asking for our beef and we should send her our beef. She is willing to negotiate further contracts with us for our beef. I believe that beef cattlemen both in the district from which the two hon. members for Calgary come, and in our own district, are wondering what the future of the beef cattle industry will be. I have been asked many times, how long is Great Britain to continue to take our beef? Are we finally to be left out in the cold? I was able to answer them that our contract will run only up to 1948, but I understand that the government will negotiate a contract for 1949 also. When I heard the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) state on Friday evening last that Great Britain was willing to take our beef products for a period of five years I certainly was surprised.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): With great respect, he did not say that. What he said was that our best market for the next five years was Great Britain.

Mr. GARDINER: I said definitely that when the minister was here it was stated there would be a demand for all the beef we could send to Great Britain for the next five years.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I am glad the hon. member interrupted me. I had been under the impression that the Minister of Agriculture had stated it, and I am glad he supports me in that view.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): He would be bound to do so. I still do not think he said that.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I heard him say it.

Mr. GARDINER: If I did not say it I am making it more definite now.

Mr. ROWE: It is still only a guess.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I do not think it is a guess. I will say this on behalf of the beef cattlemen of my district. If they ask this government, through the powers conferred by this bill, to negotiate a contract with Great Britain for this beef, and if the house is willing to allow the government to negotiate such contracts, should the matter be left in the hands of the packers, or should it be left in the hands of the government? I would put that question to the cattlemen and I know what the answer would be.

An hon. MEMBER: The packers have had a hand in it.

Mr. McCUBBIN: They have not.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That was under the Conservative government.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I know what the beef cattlemen are thinking, because I move among them, and I know they are willing to trust the government to make contracts for them for all the surplus beef they have for the next five years.

Mr. ROWE: Not all the beef cattlemen. You have been talking only to a few Liberals.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I have been talking to as many people as my hon. friend. I have not forgotten that eleven years ago today my hon. friend made a speech in this house condemning a contract for beef to a country not so far away.

Mr. ROWE: That was because it was on a quota. Tell the rest of the story.

Mr. McCUBBIN: I wish to refer now to another commodity which I think should be left to the hands of the government to sell and export. I refer to the bean industry. In the part of Ontario from which I come the best cash crop we have is beans, the white pea bean. This government has been negotiating contracts with Great Britain for a few years now for the sale of these beans. Last year it negotiated a contract for 560,000 bushels; and an agreement was made with the farmers through the medium of a bean board, a producer board set up among the farmers in the counties of western Ontario, whereby a certain price would be paid for the beans. The dealers agreed to it. For cleaning, processing and making shipment they got a certain price. The farmers were satisfied and we thought the dealers also were satisfied. The farmers sold beans last fall, but the dealers thought the arrangement was not good enough, that they could make more money out of this farm commodity than they were making.

What has happened? We were asked to ship to Great Britain 560,000 bushels. We had 1,200,000 bushels in that part of Ontario, not a big crop but a good crop. We have sent only 150,000 bushels to Great Britain. Now Britain is asking again for another contract in connection with this commodity, but the dealers are not willing to sell at a price Great Britain can pay. The farmers—and I do not blame them—can see a good price from the 1947 crop looming up. As I say, we do not blame them, but at the same time they are reasonable men and they know that there is no use in getting a big price this fall and a low price next fall. I feel that the bean men of our district should endeavour to help themselves, and I refer to the producers. They should establish a central marketing agency to which these beans could be brought for shipment to Great Britain at a price that Great Britain is willing to negotiate upon. I would ask the government if it would not be possible for them to negotiate a contract with Great Britain for a five-year period for white beans, just as has been done for wheat, the farmers to bind themselves under a central marketing agency to fill the contract. A down payment could be made and if beans sold, after the contract was filled, at a higher price in the domestic market, a participation certificate would be paid in respect of the balance.

I think I speak for the bean industry of western Ontario when I say that we have a product on which we think we should receive a good return for the labour that we have devoted to it over a period of years. We have this market in Great Britain if only we will help ourselves, and I think the government would cooperate with us in the sale of the commodity and not leave it to the dealers.

I do not wish to discuss this bill any further. As I said, I am wholeheartedly behind it because I feel it is a step in the right direction. The government has been asked by the house to establish floor-price legislation, but how on earth are you going to have floor-price legislation unless you have government support for it? The farmers, from one end of the country to the other, are asking, "When will floor prices come into effect?" I say to the house, as I have said to my own people, that the best floor-price legislation you can have is good markets for your products. Why should the state not handle this? After all, they are only the representatives of the country. We are a democratic country and, if we are not satisfied with the government that is in power, we have our redress at the next election because we can turn them out.

We heard on Friday and we have heard again today about the national federal marketing legislation which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture are proposing. I am not going to say that I will oppose it when it is brought in, but I do say that we shall look into it thoroughly, because the farmers will expect us to do so. They will expect us to inquire whether it is a good thing for them or not.

In conclusion, I challenge the opposition to vote against this bill, which, I submit, is in the interests of the farmers. I am wholeheartedly behind it.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it is well known that I am not a farmer by vocation, like my hon. friend the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith), but I was born and brought up on a farm and today I represent perhaps the most progressive farm district in Ontario.

There are in this bill two things that appeal to me. The first is that it will help the government to fulfil its obligation to Britain, and that is part of our duty. The second is that it will secure to the farmers a market at a decent price.

There are in Canada those who say that this bill and the wheat bill are tinged with socialism. All I have to say is that if socialism will secure to the farmer a market that he is sure of, as well as a decent price, and that he can spend his money as he likes, then I am a socialist of that type.

I was one of those who went out of Fort William and drove about thirty-five miles south; I could buy several crates of eggs at store prices, fifteen cents a dozen, and carry them to Fort William, and I had no trouble getting rid of them. I do not want to go back to those days. The farmer has just as much right as the stonemason or the bricklayer or the carpenter or the machinist to get a decent price for his produce, and his wife should get a decent wage as well. To me, therefore, this bill is certainly in the interests of stabilizing the farmers, those who are able to produce. I have had word from Fort William that this is good legislation and, if the farmers of Fort William think it is good legislation, I know they have splendid judgment.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the remarks of my good friend, the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin); but knowing his part in the production of wheat I was happy to think that the western farmers did not need to depend entirely upon him for their future livelihood and policies in the marketing of wheat. He was giving some praise to his party, to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and others, for what he termed a splendid bill.

An hon. MEMBER: You voted for it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am just coming to that point. He mentioned those seven members who, after two or three days' debate, had been so disgusting as to vote against the bill. I was not one of those seven members. I fought several parts of that bill with all the ability that I possess; but when it came to the final motion, I voted for it, because I did not want to lose the wheat board. There are, however, still several angles of that legislation to which I am utterly opposed. But by and large I have always been in favour of the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are we to have another week of wheat?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is why I voted for the bill in the final motion.

[Mr. McIvor.]

What I want to discuss now is the amendment which is before the house. That has always been a point with me in the seven years I have been here with respect to any legislation. I have on many occasions refrained from discussing the principle of a bill because I knew it was going to go to a competent committee where all the information available could be obtained. As I say, I have done that on several measures. Over the week-end I was reading some of the past debates, one of which was on the wheat bill that was introduced by Mr. Bennett on June 10, 1935.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think it is quite in order for me to refer to that, and hon. members may say, "Oh, oh" if they like. On June 10, 1935, when Mr. Bennett introduced legislation with regard to the Canadian wheat board, the then leader of the official opposition, the present Prime Minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, said that one of the greatest problems facing Canada was that of marketing her wheat. He argued with Mr. Bennett that the bill should go to the committee on agriculture and colonization; finally Mr. Bennett agreed with him and that is where it went.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it did not.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What a contrast between what happened then and what happened regarding our request with respect to these amendments to the Wheat Board Act which was recently passed, when the government of the day and the C.C.F. refused to let the bill go to the committee.

Mr. MacKINNON: No. You did not ask for it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that he should not refer to a former debate.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is quite correct, Mr. Speaker. I was just through with that point.

We are now discussing an amendment to Bill No. 25, the Agricultural Products Act, in which provision is made for the purchase, sale and export of commodities through provincial marketing boards. I am one of those people who, despite the remarks of the opposition on the government side, favour producer boards having some say in the marketing of their products.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What do you mean by "the opposition"?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Exactly what I said, and I think the hon. member fully understands.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We are the government.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, you are.

Mr. GARDINER: We agree with that. The Liberal governments passed legislation in the provinces.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): An amendment was moved by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) the other day, and the Deputy Speaker ruled against that amendment because it did not change the principle of the bill. The Minister of Agriculture rose and supported the ruling of the Deputy Speaker at that time. Later in the same afternoon another amendment was moved and was ruled out of order by the Speaker on the very same ground, that it did not alter the principle of the bill. Again the Minister of Agriculture rose and supported the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. GARDINER: I always support the Speaker.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Right or wrong, I have come to find that out.

Mr. GARDINER: He is usually right.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Therefore we now have before the house this amendment which has not been ruled out of order. I suppose the Speaker decided that, after all, there was a limit to this, and that a line must be drawn somewhere.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Probably I should say that I am speaking with all deference to Your Honour; I do not mean to be uncomplimentary.

Mr. GARDINER: This amendment is entirely different.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is a different principle altogether.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I will admit that the wording of the present amendment is in accordance with the very theory I have held ever since I have been here, to refer this measure back to a committee for further consideration. However, the Minister of Agriculture now argues that if that amendment stands, and it is apparently standing now, it will completely nullify the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not what it does. May I be permitted to interrupt?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: The motion does not refer it to a committee for further consideration. It refers it to a committee to have a special thing done with it. It is to make another bill out of it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The amendment reads:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization with instructions that they have power to recommend provision for

(1) the regulation of interprovincial trading;

(2) more democratic control by the producers of the proposed board or boards;

(3) a long-range marketing programme instead of a transitional programme.

Mr. GARDINER: That is a new bill.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is the amendment which is proposed.

Mr. COLDWELL: Power to recommend.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Power to recommend is all that there is there.

Mr. GARDINER: If the committee recommends a new bill, what is the house to do about it?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Like the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) I am one of those who are going to accept the challenge of the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin) if we are not allowed to amend this bill in any way whatsoever. I am going to vote against this bill as it stands, to continue the controls we now have, because I am opposed to having all the produce of the agricultural producers handled in that fashion by order in council. I am entirely opposed to that in principle. We have done our utmost to have the bill amended in some way in order to give more say to the producer boards in this country. I know the producers themselves desire that type of legislation.

I was interested the other day in the statement made by Mr. Graham Towers, governor of the Bank of Canada, in his report to the House of Commons on February 12, when he pointed out that even Canada under these controls could not long carry on with the great disparity which now exists between prices in the United States and those in Canada. There is much food for thought in that statement. That is another reason why I am opposed to giving all this authority to the minister to handle, as he sees fit, all the agricultural products of this land for this period. I am quite convinced that, if he is given that authority—despite the fact that he is asking for it now to carry out the present agreements—before we meet for another session twelve months hence he will come back with a new agreement signed with these countries, upon which this parliament has not had any discussion. For those reasons I am opposed to this bill in principle if we are not allowed to amend it at all. I am going to support the amendment. If that is not allowed to carry, I will certainly accept the challenge and vote against the principle of this bill as it is drawn, and against the type of legislation being brought down this long after the termination of the war.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask this question? How can we enter into new agreements with other countries when we have only nine months, as was stated by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley), allotted to us for these powers under this bill? How can we then enter into any new agreements?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Why not eliminate it in the bill? Why take that authority in the bill?

Mr. GARDINER: The authority in the bill is exactly the same authority as was in the orders in council. What we are asking for is an extension of the orders in council until December 31; and if the house has not been in session prior to that, up to March 31. It is for just one year, which is the outside limit.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I shall probably here transgress a little on the proper procedure, but we discussed this very point in regard to what was announced today. Certain people wanted provision made in the act which we passed the other day, for the handling of coarse grain, and the minister argued against it.

Mr. GARDINER: I argued against compulsion.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Today the minister made the announcement that oats and barley, from tomorrow on would have to be handled during this year by the Canadian wheat board.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is as I understood it.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What did the announcement mean, then? I think he will not deny that it can be done only by a further order in council.

Mr. GARDINER: Anyone can handle it on the margin between the floor price and the ceiling price.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Would the minister say he is not negotiating any more agreements at this time, or does not intend to negotiate any new agreements from this day on without consulting parliament?

Mr. GARDINER: If I may be permitted to reply, I have stated to the house every time this bill has been under consideration, as a result of suggestions made to me the first time it was brought in, that we were prepared to put into section 5 an amendment under which it would be possible to make an agreement in connection with one other product, that is, apples. Outside of that there is no intention of entering into new agreements.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What about cheese? No negotiations are going on now about these other products?

Mr. GARDINER: There is negotiation all the time. There has been constant negotiation.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Oh, sure.

Mr. GARDINER: Wait until I answer the question. There have been negotiations going on ever since this authority was given, negotiations with regard to price. Naturally the farmers are not satisfied as to prices, as their costs of production go up, and we are approached by farm organizations to enter into new negotiations to increase prices. That negotiation is going on with regard to eggs, cheese, milk, beef products and pork products practically all the time, and it will continue as long as we have these agreements to deliver certain quantities of produce.

Mr. ROWE: Then something might happen in the next nine months.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I had a speech on this bill ready for delivery, but I missed my turn and, since then, everybody else has said what I was going to say. I do not intend to impose that speech upon the house tonight, but I will sum up the remarks I intended to make.

I thought the minister, in rising to speak on this bill, would have been able to give the house some assurance that he would bring in something in the nature of a dominion natural products marketing act. I am disappointed about that. When he did not take that action I hoped he would be able to improve this legislation to cover some of the things that would have been of advantage to organized agriculture now. In summing up the situation, the minister had this to say, as reported at page 1394 of Hansard:

> Therefore I object to any attempt being made by the house now to put into this act terms which never were intended to be in legislation of this kind; terms which, if they are to be enacted at all, ought to be enacted under separate legislation brought into the house, discussed on its merits. and if this is the proper time to pass it, if it must be passed, then it should be passed. But if it is not the proper time to consider it, in view of the fact that organizations are not yet prepared to do the job that is required to be done, then it could be brought in at some other time by whatever government is then in power.

Then he went on to make some comments about the meeting with the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, saying that they had expected that legislation and that he had assured them it could not be introduced this session. I want to tell the minister I am glad further consideration has been given to the apple growers, as he has announced. By this concession the minister admits that the bill is not all that is desired, or all that it should be. He has turned down the request of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture for a dominion natural products marketing act, but I want to remind him that the farm organizations are growing stronger. He should pay heed to the fact that a nation which plans for war knows that, if it did not plan, it would lose the war; but when you suggest planning in peace time in order that maximum production at guaranteed prices may be maintained, this is at once condemned as compulsion. The new idea in marketing, which proved itself in war time, will surely live, though there may be those who will try to strangle it. The farmers have had a good taste of the security and stability that come from guaranteed prices for guaranteed quantities, and the taste has been good. In the last few days a great deal has been said about compulsion. I am going to leave wheat and coarse grains alone for the moment and refer to a pamphlet entitled, "What Ontario fruit and vegetable growers want done in the legislative field." The secretary of the two associations had this to say:

> The history of all progress is one of persistent effort especially when dealing with governments. Eternal prodding is the secret of success. Progress is slow.
> Signs are not wanting that governments are much concerned these days with the welfare of agriculture. This indicates response to the urgings for it is realized that agriculture cannot, once again, become a mere form of subsistence—that it must be nourished and sustained. Politicians (and, after all, the responsibility is theirs) who fail to take the forward steps will have no reason to be disturbed if others take their place. Systems are on trial.
> The policy makers must show courage and render leadership—political considerations should not prevail nor should powerful groups be permitted to dictate policy because they fear loss of vested privileges.
> Most of the opposition to many of agriculture's proposals has come from groups and individuals who, fearful of the unknown, have let prejudice and ignorance sway their judgment.

Farm leaders have developed a sense of responsibility. They are not out to wreck the system nor do they plan harm to others. They are seized with an honest desire to improve the lot of their fellow men but not on a basis of robbing Peter to pay Paul.

Live and let live is the keynote. If legislative action is necessary to establish authority and power to make the principle apply, legislation we must have. Farm organizations dislike running to government for cash aid—they much prefer the authority to do things for themselves.

There must be a certain amount of compulsion if we are to make this system work and have orderly marketing. They do not say, "You cannot grow fruit or vegetables"; they do not try to deprive any grower of his living. They only want the cooperation of the growers to abide by the decision of the majority so that all may benefit by the united effort. Other organizations go much farther than this, and it is quite all right. The trade unionist working in the union shop expects and insists that his fellow be a trade unionist as well. Even the bar association, or the lawyers' union, makes it compulsory for every lawyer to belong. They will even have a man convicted for trying to do the work of a lawyer without having been admitted to the bar. In support of that statement, I would refer to a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of March 6:

> Charged with ten breaches of the law society act,—pleaded guilty before Magistrate D. G. Potter in provincial police court Wednesday. He was given a two-year suspended sentence, bound over in the sum of $500 and ordered to pay court costs.
> Acting for the law society of Manitoba. A. E. Johnston told the court that this gentleman, notary public and insurance agent, had been drawing up legal documents, closing real estate transactions and acting as solicitor without the proper authority. He said this gentleman had not been called to the bar, and his duties as notary public did not empower him to carry out these acts.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What about doctors?

Mr. BRYCE: They are in the same category. But you do not want me to say anything about them; I might be sick some day. But I do not hope to need a lawyer.

The farm organizations have never gone so far as to stop anyone from being a farmer. Any Tom, Dick or Harry can come along, get a piece of land and produce the necessities of life. The farm organizations have no objection. All they want them to do is to be good fellows and support the organization.

In closing, I wish again to remind the minister that the farmer is demanding legislation that will enable him to run his own business in order that he can get a fair share of the consumer's dollar by orderly marketing in both home and export markets; and I would suggest that the minister promise to bring in a bill similar to the one requested by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture at their recent meeting with the cabinet, to bridge the gap between the provinces and the dominion.

Might I say to the minister that I was the seconder of the amendment. If the minister will only tell me that early in the next session he will bring in a bill similar to that wanted by the C.F.A., then I will withdraw the amendment, or at least I will consult the mover to that end. You have it in your hands.

Mr. GARDINER: I never have done any bribing since I have been in politics.

Mr. BRYCE: And you can call it black-leg or bootleg, or anything you like. I was sent here by the farmers to get these things. All I am asking you is to give us your word that you will take that up early in the next session. We asked for it in 1939 and you said that the time was not right. We agreed with you. You have been minister all that time, and we have not come back until a time of peace. We are asking you now, in all sincerity, to give us these things. Do not fail us now. I will be prepared to withdraw the amendment. I am going to support your bill, because it is a step in the right direction. I am now awaiting your answer.

As a headline in one of the evening papers I saw a boy delivering on Friday night were the words "British M.P. attacks Canadian wheat prices." On reading the paper, I found that a gentleman by the name of Smithers had made that statement. I am going to quote from the Ottawa Journal of March 14, 1947. Might I say also that he is a Conservative? Wait until you hear what he has to say. Sir Waldron Smithers declared that——having been to Canada many times, he knew that "dollar wheat" showed a good profit.

And then under the heading "Charge against Canadians" we find this:

When Strachey went to Canada recently, he said, the Canadian farmers said: "Here comes this little chap from Britain. His people are very hungry. What is the most we can get out of him?"

To hon. members in this house I say this, that no greater insult could be directed at the farmers of Canada. No greater insult could ever have been heaped upon us. Does this member of the British House of Parliament know what he is talking about? He has a "sir" to his name and no doubt he should know better than make such ridiculous statements as these attributed to him. Does he know they are getting wheat at $1.55 a bushel? Does he know that the Progressive Conservative party in this parliament have maintained here in the House of Commons that Britain should not have got wheat so cheaply, but should be paying the world price? That, I think, is $2.79 today, if we use the Chicago price.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It is $3.01.

Mr. BRYCE: I hope he reads this, then. Quoting further from the press, we find this:

Sir Waldron urged that food buying be left to purchasing firms with long experience and that healthy competition be permitted.

Upon looking up the "Parliamentary Guide" I find that Sir Waldron is a member of the London stock exchange. Here is a man who has no doubt spent the best part of his life chasing hounds and shooting grouse, a man who has lived by the sweat and toil of others, and who is now calling for the "good old days" which orderly marketing and guaranteed prices will destroy. It makes my blood boil to read this, after what Canada has done to provide food for Britain. But let us hope he is only one in a million.

Here is a letter I received from a lady in Glasgow on Friday last; and I have received many such letters. She says in part:

Many thanks to Canada for our Sunday breakfast. The last three Sundays we have been able to have one strip of bacon and one Canadian egg, which was enjoyed greatly by all of us.

When you go to the people who suffered you find that they do appreciate what Canada did for them. They do not think we are holding them up. I feel I know what I am talking about, because I was over there. Hon. members who were also there will agree with me that Canada has done and is doing everything a sister nation of the British commonwealth could be expected to do. She stood by Britain at Dunkirk; she gave her best sons, who now lie in graves across the sea; she gave her food and munitions, and did everything in her power to support Britain in her time of need.

Having lived for thirty years in the old land, I know this type of gentleman only too well. Most of them have a valet to dress them in the morning. But I am pleased to notice that this type of gentleman is now becoming scarce in the British parliament; most of the members there today can at least put on their own pants.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) has been talking about a man named Smithers, and apparently received a considerable amount of applause because of that reference. As he was speaking of this chap Smithers, I thought to myself, from his description, how remarkably like Smithers is the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), except, of course, for his stock-broking and grouse shooting activities.

Mr. GARDINER: There are other things, too.

Mr. HARKNESS: So far as his attitude with respect to wheat is concerned, I think Sir Waldron Smithers is very much the same as our Minister of Agriculture. He is just a little behind; he thinks a dollar a bushel for wheat is all that the western farmer should have, while our Minister of Agriculture, a little more advanced, says it should be $1.35. That is all he is going to pay in the next four years. There is a hope there may be a little left in the kitty after that to supplement it.

However, what I rose particularly to say was this: The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) said that there were two things in this bill which stood out as far as he was concerned. There is only one thing which stands out as far as I am concerned, and it is this: The essential principle of this bill is that the marketing of all agricultural products except wheat, which has already been looked after, is brought completely under the control of the Minister of Agriculture. In other words, this bill makes the Minister of Agriculture practically a dictator as far as the marketing of agricultural products is concerned. That is really why I object to it. I believe the bill as it stands is practically pure and simple socialism and, as a result, I am going to vote against it. As a matter of fact the best feature about the bill is that it has a one-year termination clause. That is about the only good thing I have to say about it.

The bill enables the minister to make new contracts, which I think is one of its most objectionable features. I would be prepared to give the minister all the powers necessary to enable him to meet the contracts which he has made with Great Britain for cheese and bacon and other products. I have no doubt a considerable number of the powers he has asked for in this bill are required for that purpose. However I object most strongly to giving him the power to make new contracts, thereby perpetuating the situation we have at the present time, where the minister brings in a wheat bill and says, "I must have these powers so that we can fulfil our commitments to Great Britain"; or where he brings in this bill and says, "I must have these powers so that we can fulfil the commitments we have made to Great Britain in the matter of dairy products and so forth."

Is this thing ever going to end or will it continue indefinitely? If the minister has the power to make new contracts a year from now we shall be faced with the situation where he can come back and say, "Here are these contracts which must be met because Canada cannot go back on her word. I must have these powers." Therefore we shall never get away from this socialistic type of legislation which puts into the hands of the minister and the government complete control of the marketing of agricultural products.

I think the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) stated an obvious truth when he said that we all realized that times have changed, that we can never go back to the situation which existed ten or fifteen years ago. I think everybody realizes that. I think we realize that, as long as we have to deal with totalitarian countries and countries which engage in state trading, we shall probably have to carry on a certain amount of state trading ourselves. But surely if we are a free enterprise country and are going to continue to be, our efforts should be directed toward getting away from state trading as rapidly as we can and getting things back to the place where we have a free exchange of goods and more or less of a free world market if this can possibly be done. Possibly it is too late and it may never be done, but for goodness sake, let us work toward that goal instead of working in the opposite direction, which I submit this bill does.

I was interested in some of the remarks of the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). He asked a question which I laughed over a little. He asked, "Why do I support this bill?" I think it was obvious to everyone in the house why he supported it. He supported it because the Minister of Agriculture introduced it. That was sufficient reason for him. When the Minister of Agriculture introduced the resolution a week or two ago, and when the hon. member for Middlesex West spoke in connection with beef, both said that there was no doubt in the world that the United States was the best market we could have for our beef, that it was our natural market. But both of them immediately turned around and said, "By no means let us send any beef there; it is our best market, but under no circumstances let us send any beef there; let us get as far away from it as we can." Both said, "No, we will not send even a token shipment of beef; it is not necessary; it is not required."

I should like to repeat what I said when the matter was first introduced. I said that a considerable number of the largest beef producers in this country think it is necessary. I said that I thought their advice on the matter should have been listened to by the government, and listened to carefully. I have a great deal more confidence in their judgment on the matter than I have in the judgment of the hon. member for Middlesex West.

Mr. GARDINER: They do not produce ten per cent of the beef.

Mr. HARKNESS: Who does not produce?

Mr. GARDINER: The men you are talking about.

Mr. HARKNESS: Those men may not produce more than ten per cent of the beef, but the Minister of Agriculture knows that we never exported in normal times even ten per cent of our beef. It was generally a good deal less and these are the men who produced the beef to be exported.

Mr. GARDINER: Some of it.

Mr. HARKNESS: To a large extent they raised our export beef.

There is only one other thing I should like to say. The minister said that there is a demand in Great Britain for all the beef we can produce in the next five years. I believe that is correct, but one question comes to my mind. What price are we to get for it? What price can the people of Britain afford to pay for this beef during the next five years? Are the beef producers of this country to be asked to sell their beef to Great Britain at a price much below what they could get on the world market, in the same way that our wheat producers are being asked to take a loss of some $1.50 a bushel under the present Chicago price? Is that situation to go on for five years? If so, I for one do not think the beef producers of this country will be content. I do not think they should be called upon to make that sacrifice. If we are to have to sell beef to Great Britain during the next five years under the world price, the whole project should be underwritten as a national undertaking by the people of Canada as a whole. It should be paid for out of taxes and should not be assessed against the beef producers.

Mr. C. E. DESMOND (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, if I am permitted to say a word about Bill No. 25 it would be this: I am one of those who has waited patiently for a federal agricultural marketing act. At last we have it, but what an act!

Mr. GARDINER: You have not it yet.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. DESMOND: That is what I am afraid of. I have listened patiently to a great deal of talk about wheat and I do not propose to mention that commodity, or the fact that our Ontario soft winter wheat has been priced away out of line. I have been intensely interested in the problems that face the primary producer in connection with orderly marketing. I have the privilege of representing a county in southwestern Ontario. Unfortunately for me I was paired with the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Clark) when the amendment of the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) was voted upon. I strongly endorsed that amendment. The reason I paired with the hon. member for Essex South was that he is one of those who is most conversant with the marketing problems of our district. I also listened with tremendous tolerance to my very good friend the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin) when he addressed the house tonight. I immediately went across the floor and congratulated him, and also corrected him on a few mistakes which, in my opinion, he had made.

When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) brought down this bill I do not know exactly what he had in mind, but I do know from whence the idea came. It came from the producer boards of British Columbia and southwestern Ontario. It was not the child of his own mind at all. He may have been part and parcel, one of those who were in on the play when the Natural Products Marketing Act was booted off the field of Canada's trade. Now he has seen fit to bring it back in a camouflaged form whereby all the power is vested in the minister, giving him absolute control in the marketing of the products that have been brought to his attention. As one of the farmers of this country and having been intensely interested in orderly marketing of the specialized commodities raised in our district, I felt I would be remiss in my duty if I did not bring a few matters to the attention of the minister at this time. I have hesitated all during the war to make myself heard or to be critical of what, in my opinion, was an earnest desire on the part of the Department of Agriculture, including the minister, to do the best job they could for Canada, and I am not given to handing out bouquets where I do not feel they are deserved. I have presented many of our producer boards to the minister, and I would say that our producers, having come through a serious depression during the thirties, and having come into controlled position during the war, have submitted gracefully to the situation.

My good friend the hon. member for Middlesex West mentioned one of our commodities, beans. Some members of the house may smile when I mention beans. I could mention hybrid corn, onions—and this is not Mitchell Hepburn speaking—tobacco and other commodities. All these commodities mean a good deal to the economy not only of southwestern Ontario but of Canada as a whole. Were I to quote the excise revenue from tobacco alone, the house would be convinced of its importance to our economy. It is my opinion from what I have gleaned in the last few days—I have not the actual figures —that the revenue from tobacco alone was over $400 million.

As I said, my good friend from Middlesex mentioned beans. I place an entirely different interpretation on that situation. In 1940, the first year of the war, we found ourselves with a surplus of beans. We had a board but it had not been functioning actively up to that time. It had some difficulties in organization and in bringing together a majority of the producers of that commodity. We came to the department here in Ottawa and pleaded for a price that would relieve us of that surplus. We had no knowledge of how long the war would last or what it would mean in foodstuffs, and no knowledge of the tremendous drain we afterwards experienced on the young producers of our country.

Then we found ourselves running short of beans. Our primary producer group came to Ottawa and waited on the minister, on the special products board and the food board and asked for a price that would ensure a reasonable production of beans. After we had entered into a contract with the British food ministry to provide Britain with a reasonable amount of beans in comparison with the lend-lease shipments of beans from the United States, our price was fixed at $2. That was not ample enough to bring about the desired production. In the year following, we entered into an arrangement and sold approximately one-third of our production to those who needed it so badly in the United Kingdom, but at a great sacrifice to the consumers of this country. We did not meet our quota but those beans were sold on the basis of $3 a bushel. Ours had been subsidized to the extent of fifty cents. We were on the $2.50 level. We were operating on a participating certificate in so far as our domestic market was concerned. That brought us up to $2.69 in Canada as against $3 for our overseas commitments.

I would say to hon. members that when you find a producer group vitally interested in the perpetuation of an industry that is their bread and butter, that means their livelihood, medical attendance and education and everything else for their families, it means much more to them than it means to any minister of agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: That was done under the orders in council.

Mr. DESMOND: I thank the minister.

Take some of our other commodities; tobacco, for instance. We have fought and laboured to bring about a situation that would be satisfactory to our producer group. What have they accomplished? If we are to interfere with producer groups; if producer boards are to be shorn of the authority and powers they have exercised—I am not saying that governments should not play a part in it because we need their moral support and their assistance when it comes to disposing of an exportable surplus such as we may experience in the years that lie ahead—we do not want dictatorial powers given to any individual, whether it be a minister or someone else authorized to do that job. What we have done in our producer groups is this. We have convinced our processors, our distributors and our consumers that those who are most vitally interested in any business can handle it reasonably well.

Mr. GARDINER: The government board has just as great powers as you asked for.

Mr. DESMOND: My interpretation of the bill may be wrong. I rose in rather an apologetic way because I had thought that when the federal agricultural marketing legislation was brought down I might even have to walk across the floor of the house, but I do not feel that I can do so now. I cannot see that it has provided for these groups what I hoped it might.

I listened attentively the other day to what was being said, and to show you, Mr. Speaker, how short my memory is, I have forgotten from whence it came, but I heard someone commending some hon. member in the house, or perhaps it was the minister, for the fact that the statistical branch in Ottawa was almost perfect. I disagree with that. All my experience with marketing organizations has been one with which I am in entire agreement. I have every respect for members of the government and the Department of Agriculture and the work they are attempting to do, but I feel they often get the cart before the horse.

One respect in which this is true is in connection with the duties assigned to our trade commissioners. Trade commissioners may be selected on the basis of being bilingual, or the trade commissioner may be a Beau Brummel, one who is able to cope with social activities abroad, or it may be that he has an intimate knowledge of the commodity he is asked to dispose of and the markets which he is asked by the department to explore. But in all my experience with producer boards I have yet to see a trade commissioner come to us and ask for any guidance or direction. I am not saying that authority should be taken away from the government, but I feel that those who are vitally interested in their own affairs should not be discouraged by being shorn of that right. When you are part and parcel of an undertaking, that brings together the manufacturer, the distributor and the consumer; when you increase the price of the commodity substantially; when you maintain the dividends of the company and do not increase the cost to the consumer one iota, that is an accomplishment, and I would hesitate to go back to my producer groups if I felt I had not attempted to convince the minister; and I am doing so in a kindly way. At least, I hope I shall succeed, because I am vitally interested in this business of marketing, and I see no reason why the minister should take unto himself such authority and power. I will grant you that it may be fitting and proper in order to keep our commitments and pledges and promises to other countries. When we sign "Canada" on the dotted line we mean Canada and we are prepared to support the signature; but when our groups go out to do a job and have been successful I resent very much the fact—and I hesitate to support any bill that would make it possible—that they are robbed of that power.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I have not the advantage, like my desk-mate, of being a farmer but am only the representative of a farming constituency, so that my knowledge of agriculture is of a somewhat vicarious nature. I might have hesitated to speak on this bill but for the fact that I was greatly encouraged by the words which the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) used the other day when he said—and these words interest me for more reasons than one:

> Mr. Speaker, I am a modest sort of fellow and do not like to express opinions unless I know a little about the subject with which I am dealing. But since there are, evidently, so many immodest people in the chamber I thought I might as well take a flyer too.

I think that phrase about taking a flyer is unsuitable in the mouth of one who believes wholly in a controlled economy.

[Mr. Desmond.]

I have not, either, the advantage of having played football with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Mr. STIRLING: That is yet to come.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I would have been at a great disadvantage in that event, because on the low tackle the minister would have had all the advantage against me. But in any event I hope my desk-mate will have softened him up, so that he will not be as formidable as otherwise he would be.

I would say this, before I forget it, that I am always interested in the exchange between the minister and hon. gentlemen immediately to my left as to who deserves the credit for many of the great things that have happened in Saskatchewan. I hold myself out, and I am sure some of my associates would join me, in a sincere desire to act as arbitrators. We would be ready, I think, to arbitrate as between the Minister of Agriculture and hon. gentlemen to my left as to who deserves the credit for these great things that have happened in that province, and perhaps we might then dispose of the matter. That, however, would be unfortunate, because we should then have disposed of a prolific subject of discussion in the chamber.

I would not be standing here tonight and taking your time, Mr. Speaker—and I hope I shall be brief—except that I feel that this is one of the instances, of which there are many, which show that we are still suffering from a war mentality; that we are still slipping along what the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) called the Gadarene slope, which I understand was where the swine all ran down into the river.

Mr. HACKETT: The sea.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The sea, the hon. member tells me.

Mr. HACKETT: They were engulfed.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I raise this question for the serious consideration of all hon. members, because it seems to me that, unless we are able to take more seriously than we do now, the question of the concentration of power, we may wake up one day to find that we have gone farther than we ever intended. These, I am sure, are great days for those who believe in controls and the multiplication of controls. I am sure they must take great satisfaction; they should take great satisfaction. They must feel that we are all moving in their direction. Similarly these are poor days for liberals, with a small

"l", and even for Liberals with a large "L", because many men opposite feel, I am sure, as I do. I am sure they feel that, as we go on from one concentration of power to another, the wonder is, when the time will come when we shall turn in the other direction. I know it is in the air. We are told that it is being done in the European countries, that it is being done almost all over the world, and that we must follow the fashion. But I would point out that there is one great country, the country to the south of us, that is not following the fashion in this regard, but rather is trying to burst its bonds and get clear. We should try to remind ourselves of that fact instead of feeling that we must join in what I regard as a most unenviable procession to bind ourselves with fresh chains.

I do not want to sound extreme. I know that many men opposite and many men in the government share that feeling to a certain extent. I do not forget that attempts are being made to introduce greater freedom, and therefore I wish to be quite fair in this. It is far too serious a matter for us to talk about it insincerely. When I see a bill like this, which my desk-mate says is for the purpose of giving to the Minister of Agriculture a power which ten years ago we would have thought inconceivable, we are doing it, I suggest, merely because we are still possessed of the war mentality. Let me read what the minister says, because he is quite frank about it, as reported at page 1389 of Hansard:

> To indicate what we did under that legislation, let me point out that we went into Ontario and into Quebec and took all the cheese produced between May and October, in two different years of the war; we took all of it, and shipped it to Great Britain . . . And at other times we used the authority we had under the act to go into packing plants and take the bacon, and to say to our own people, "You can have in this country only fiftv per cent of what you were buying in 1940. The remainder of it is going to Great Britain."

I approve that. Further on, the minister said:

> We are suggesting in this legislation that for one year we be given authority to continue to do what we were doing in war time.

Mr. GARDINER: Read another sentence.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I will do that.

> We are not saying that everything we did during war time will be done; but we are saying, or suggesting, that the authority we had during the war time should be allowed to us for one more year.

As I say, I want to be fair in the matter. What I am suggesting is this, and it has been most interesting to me to observe it during the time I have been here. When people get power, particularly when they are people of character and ability, they say to themselves, "It is good for us to have power. It is good for the country that we should have power because we will not misuse that power. We will use it properly." And I think they believe it. But in my opinion there is great danger in that attitude. My colleague in the next seat has pointed out these unprecedented powers and, while he has made clear what the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) has also made clear, that we recognize that when an agreement has been made we must honour it, we must give the necessary power to carry it out, nevertheless we object and I object—and that is the reason I will vote against this bill if it remains unchanged—to additional powers being taken. The minister says he is not going to use the additional authority which is asked for.

Mr. GARDINER: There are not any additional powers in it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): There are powers to make further contracts. That has been made perfectly clear. If the minister does not need the power I say, do not put it in. Second, the minister does not need to consult with anybody. He says that he does consult, but the act says he merely may consult. When we try genuinely to introduce some machinery whereby the power is diluted, whereby the people have some chance to deal with their own affairs, the minister is against it. I think it is an understatement to say that the minister wishes to stuff something down our throats without change, instead of trying to see whether there is some way whereby even a tincture or a scintilla of freedom and democratic control can be preserved. The minister asks for the bill, the whole bill and nothing but the bill. He will not even allow the bill to go to a committee, and I will come back to that in a moment. There is to be no attempt to see whether it is not possible to work out something which would give something less than this full power to the minister. We must take the whole thing.

Mr. GARDINER: May I ask one question? I know the hon. member wants to get the matter straight. May I ask where in that bill I am given any authority at all to exercise any powers other than those exercised during the war? And during the war we exercised all our authority through boards.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): My whole point is that the war is over. My whole point is that you act as if it were still on.

Mr. GARDINER: The whole point is that this is special legislation which is brought before the house for the purpose of extending these powers for a limited period of time, namely one year.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the minister mean that this parliament has no power to change it or to lessen it?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): What is the use of telling me that this is for the purpose of retaining it? I am suggesting to the minister that the war is over and that it is competent for him to change these powers to some extent. There is no compulsion on him to come back here for exactly the same powers as he had during the war. Although I am neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, I say that if we do not begin now to lessen these powers, a year from now it will not be easier but will be harder to do so. They will have had another year by then.

Mr. GARDINER: The whole contention since we began this discussion is to give me more power than I am asking for.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am all in favour of the minister asking me questions and I hope that I shall be able to answer them. But I suggest now that this is my speech and that the minister might let me make it. I am not as seasoned a campaigner as he is, and he may put me out of my stride and make me forget the rest of what I was going to say, which is very good if I do not forget it.

I wish to go back now and say that what I am complaining about—and really the minister is helping me to this extent, that he seems to me by his actions to be just underlining what I am saying—is that we still have this war mentality; and, if it goes on long enough, we may just as well say good-bye to our desire to get back our freedom. Do not let us fool ourselves. I would say that the chances of our getting our freedom back now are quite precarious. We live in a world where there is precious little of it left. Look at what is happening in Britain, the home of freedom. The minister knows better than I do the fears which are entertained there already, and the things they have been forced into which they never would have wanted. Do not think I am criticizing the socialist government there. I respect it. I think they have great difficulties. I think they have almost overwhelming difficulties. But do not let us forget that things are happening there today which would not have happened ten years ago; and when they are happening in Britain, which has been the home of freedom, it is time for us all to think about it and to watch when we give these powers to people. I do not care how greatly we respect them. I respect the Minister of Agriculture. But I say that it is a great mistake to give this kind of power to anybody. I say also that every month these powers continue it will be just that much harder to get rid of them.

If I may be out of order for just thirty seconds, I should like to point out that we are being told in one of the committees that we live in a world of import and export controls. We are asked to believe that we cannot even buy goods abroad unless we buy through the government. We are asked to believe that other people will not want good Canadian and United States dollars unless the purchases are made by our government. That is the length to which this war mentality, this control mentality, has gone. That is the only reason I am on my feet tonight. I believe with all my heart that, unless we pull ourselves together and begin to shake ourselves free from that, as I say, month by month it will become more and more difficult. The minister, of course, is somewhat of a conundrum to me. I had some dealings with the minister in those far-off days when I was in business, and I found the minister a very satisfactory man to do business with.

Mr. GARDINER: I hope he still is.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): He was pretty tough, but he was fair. But since I have been dabbling in politics, I have come to know a side of the minister which I did not know before.

Mr. HACKETT: He was an amateur.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): He was not an amateur in business. I would say that he was quite a professional in business. But I gather in politics he is the genuine article; he is super-professional. I gather that power is a thing the minister knows a great deal about, more than I shall ever know, probably, because I shall not have thirty-three years in which to exercise it, as the minister has. When I found these powers so well described by my desk-mate tonight, these unprecedented powers which, during the war, we gave because we recognized the necessity for them, and when I find that a great many people take this special war period and want to project it into peace time, I confess that I am alarmed.

I wish to say just one more thing on this amendment; and by the way, I hope it is not going to be withdrawn. I have been nervous several times tonight. I thought I would have a chance to vote for a C.C.F. amendment, and every time it was suggested that it be withdrawn, I became nervous.

Mr. COLDWELL: You will have the chance.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): The minister reassures us. I like his stubbornness at times, although I dislike it at other times, and I think he is pretty tough about this.

Mr. GARDINER: When the C.C.F. propose a Tory motion, I ought to be stubborn.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I shall not attempt to put a name on it. I will just say that I deal with motions and amendments on their merits and try not to attach any labels to them; I try to take them for just what they seem to say. This seems to me to suggest what I would have thought was a very reasonable thing. I take it that it is a matter of some importance. I imagine that the minister will not deny that a matter which involves or may involve hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars is of some importance; and yet for some reason, that no one has ever attempted to give, the minister is refusing to let this go to the agriculture committee where it can be discussed. I understand he is refusing to do that.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not been asked. I have not had a chance to refuse.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): At any rate, the minister has said many things which my limited intelligence understood to mean that he was not having any of this amendment which suggested that it go to a committee.

Mr. GARDINER: To bring in a new bill.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Just a minute, I am trying to make this speech, however inadequate it may be. If it were not for the fact that I have a fairly loud voice I think I would have been out of action long before now. This amendment, if I understood it correctly, says that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the committee on agriculture and colonization with instructions that they have "power to recommend provision for," and so on. The minister seems to read that in a way I do not read it.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the only way you can put it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Just a moment; let me give my views. You will have your chance later on. I read this as suggesting that it go to a committee, and then indicating to the committee that they can do certain things if they wish. It does not tell them they have to do these things, and it does not tell them they cannot do a lot of other things. Therefore I cannot see for the life of me why, if this is important, it should not go to the committee, and no reason has as yet been given. If this amendment is to be voted upon, I suggest that a reason should be given.

Finally, before taking my seat, I should like to refer to the same incident to which the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) referred, because I think it is so aptly in point here. I propose also to read a sentence or two from a newspaper which has not always supported the Minister of Agriculture, though by and large it has supported the government. At any rate, it always supports the government at critical times. From time to time I have hopes that the Winnipeg Free Press has seen the light and that it will continue to see the light when an election is on, but it seems to me it occasionally sees the light between elections but at election time it is always in darkness. In any event, this is what they say now, and if the minister has not read it I am sure he will be very much interested. I should explain that this refers to the wheat agreement, but I suggest that the comments it makes on the wheat agreement can stand on their own feet and that they are perfectly apt in referring to this measure, because they refer to an important principle, namely that of referring important matters to committee. So I crave Your Honour's indulgence for just a moment to quote a few sentences from the Free Press. I like to read the Free Press when it is right, even though it is not often right. They speak about what the government has done, and then they say:

> Even so, it should not necessarily follow that a Liberal government, in embarking upon an illiberal policy, should proceed by autocratic methods.

Then they refer to the fact that a committee was refused on the other bill, and go on to say—this merely embroiders what my hon. friend said—something that makes the thing clear and drives it home. They refer to the wheat board bill of 1935, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), then leader of the opposition, said:

> "It has, I think, been customary in connection with a measure of this importance to have it referred either to one of the select standing committees of this house . . . or to a special committee."

And again:

"I therefore am asking the Prime Minister... that the bill . . . be referred to a select committee."

The then Prime Minister, Mr. Bennett, replied, and this was really quite a love feast:

. . . if he (Mr. King) believes that the matter would be better dealt with by a committee than by discussion in this house, I would be the last man not to accept his system.

Obviously the word "system" should be "suggestion"; even the Free Press can nod at times. Then it goes on:

I believe it is my duty to accept one of these methods . . .

Mr. GARDINER: That was the change in the bill.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That was to refer the matter to a committee. I am suggesting that, unless some far better reason is given than has been advanced so far for not referring this matter to a committee, it is an extraordinarily high-handed procedure for a government calling itself a Liberal government to adopt.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I was quite prepared to let this amendment go to a vote until a few hon. members spoke tonight expressing opinions which I believe should be answered. Before I conclude, I should like to make an appeal to the minister, perhaps a final appeal before we have the vote, to give the house the assurance that early next session, since apparently he will not do it this session, he will bring down a marketing act such as the Canadian farmers have been requesting.

Before I go on to that, however, I want to make some reference to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and those of one other hon. gentleman to my right. It is intriguing to listen to hon. members talking about the legislation we have before us and making broad statements about this legislation containing unprecedented and unheard-of powers. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) used that phrase several times; that in peace time this bill gives the minister or the governor in council unprecedented and unheard-of powers. Those powers are neither unprecedented nor unheard-of. I have before me the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, passed by the administration headed by Mr. Bennett. Some hon. members present will remember very well the debate which took place at that time. In looking through this act, I found on page 2, for example, the powers given the governor in council enumerated one after the other, with the words "governor in council" occurring in almost every line. To refer to specific portions of that act, I find that on page 3 it says:

—The board shall—

Mr. FLEMING: It is the board; not the minister.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I shall come to that in a moment.

—subject to the provisions of this act, have power

(a) to regulate the time and place at which, and to designate the agency through which the regulated product shall be marketed, to determine the manner of distribution, the quantity and quality, grade or class of the regulated product . . .

And so on. Then, further on:

(f) to require any or all persons engaged in the production of marketing of the regulated product to register their names, addresses and occupations with the board, or to obtain a licence from the board, and such licence shall be subject to cancellation by the board for violation of any provision of this act or regulation made thereunder.

Then it goes on to give other powers to the board, and goes farther and says on page 7 that, whenever the governor in council, not the board—

. . . is satisfied, on the recommendation of the minister, that a majority of the persons engaged in the production or marketing of a natural product so require, he may approve of a proposal for . . .

Then it goes on to give him a whole list of other powers. These are not the powers of the board; this is done by the governor in council on the recommendation of the minister. Then on the same page it provides:

The governor in council may by order or regulation, notice whereof shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette,—

(a) regulate or restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product.

I now turn to page 9 of the marketing act and find this:

The minister may, at the request of the board or upon his own initiative . . . .

Do certain things. Again:

The minister may also require persons engaged in the production or marketing, adaptation for sale, processing or conversion of any natural or regulated product to submit at regular intervals or at any stated time, information demanded by the minister in connection with the matters referred to in subsection one hereof.

Then I come to the most interesting part of the bill, on page 10, dealing with penalties, where it provides:

Every person who, to the detriment or against the interest of the public, charges, receives or attempts to receive any spread which is excessive or results in undue enhancement of prices or otherwise restrains or injures trade or commerce in the natural or regulated product, shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a penalty not exceeding five thousand dollars or to two years' imprisonment, or, if a corporation, to a penalty not exceeding ten thousand dollars.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who put that in?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It was quite clearly put in by the Bennett administration. I remember that the other evening hon. gentlemen to my right said the government apparently was getting more socialistic all the time because the penalties were increasing. Well, here we find them making provision for a penalty of $5,000 in the case of individuals and $10,000 if it happens to be a corporation. They must have had in mind a corporation consisting of two individuals. So it goes all through the bill. I have read only enough to point out that a great deal of this talk about the wide powers and the regimentation contained in this legislation is not based upon fact; and that the unprecedented and unheard-of powers about which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario is so good at giving the house grave warnings, are not unheard-of or unprecedented, because in what I have read we have a very good precedent.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Will the hon. member permit a question? Do you believe in a police state, or do you not?

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Bennett tried to establish one under that bill, apparently.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do you believe in a police state, or do you not?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I concur in the answer of my leader.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Which said nothing; and therefore you concur.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If the hon. gentleman wishes to have an answer from me, then I will say, no; that I do not believe in a police state.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You are advocating it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have not even started advocating anything yet. I was merely pointing out what the Bennett administration had done. If it sounded like a police state to my hon. friend and those around him, it is not my fault.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was in here before you ever thought of getting in.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I will also say this, that the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said he was afraid of placing too much power in the hands of the government. He emphasized that, and pointed out the great danger of placing too much power in the hands of the minister, and how the love and lust for power may corrupt the intentions of the minister, whom he liked so well.

I am not one who would like to concentrate power in the hands of any individual. We have to make a choice. We have to make our decisions in this house on practically all legislation which comes up, as to whether we shall place the power of regulating trade and commerce, and things that come within our purview, in the hands of the elected representatives of the people, in whom the people have expressed their confidence in a democratic election, or whether we are to leave those powers in the hands of corporations and those firms which are only too ready to exploit the producer. That is our choice. And for my part I prefer—

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): May I ask this question: are you against your own amendment?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I will come to that in due time. But I want to start where the hon. member left off, so as to keep the continuity of it. I was going to say, before I was interrupted in the middle of a sentence, that I prefer to place power where I believe the power in a democratic state ought to be, namely, in the hands of the elected representatives of the people.

Since the individual representatives of this party cannot be here all year round to exercise the power vested in them by the people, they must delegate a certain portion of that power to the administration which is charged with the responsibility of carrying on the work of the country in the interval. In doing so—

Mr. FLEMING: We are well on the way to totalitarianism, then.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: You might be an expert on totalitarianism, and as such would be qualified to speak about it. But I am not.

Before I go on, I also wish to say this, about the amendment the hon. member is so worried about, that I am not going to urge its withdrawal tonight.

The hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), who spoke earlier in the debate, again referred to this question of socialism. We do not mind debating socialism in the house; but I do not know why it has to be dragged into almost every piece of legislation which comes before the house. The hon. member said that this measure was pure socialism. He even expressed the opinion that it may be too late to go anywhere else except, as he expressed it, down the road to socialism.

I think he will be surprised when the vote is taken tonight—if it is—or within a day's time, as to how many socialists there are in the house. Because I predict that, with the exception of the group to my right, all hon. members in the house, or a very large majority of them, will vote for this bill.

I would remind the hon. member, too, that they applied the same term to the wheat board bill. They called it socialism at that time; but when it came time to vote they rose in their places, like good socialists, and voted for it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You preach it; they practise it; that is the difference.

Mrs. STRUM: And you vote for it.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If this measure is socialism—and I am not saying that it is, because there is more involved in socialism than the mere passing of an act of parliament—it is the evolving of a philosophy of life, placing civilization on a higher plane. But if this is socialism in the mind of my hon. friend, then hon. members across the floor of the house who ordinarily cannot be classified as socialists, and who do not profess to be—and I refer to two of them in particular, namely the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), for whom I have a high regard, and the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) who contributes so delightfully to the debates of the house—both rise in their places and said that if this legislation is socialism, then they are socialists. In the face of this reconversion of political faith that is going on around us, I am afraid my hon. friends will be an island of resistance of their own.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Many members across there do not agree with those two.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I do not know why they should take that point of view. If they are not in favour of the government's having any control or regulation over marketing of products of the farm, then the logical thing for them to do would be to rise on every occasion and vote against such legislation, and not try to becloud it and camouflage it by calling it socialism.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Surely that is not beclouding.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like to refer to a pamphlet I now hold in my hand, which is called "Blue-Print for Progress," and is also headed "Bracken's charter for a better Canada." This is a delightful little pamphlet. I find there—and with many of its parts I agree thoroughly—a ready-made economic system to give to the Canadian people. We find that one of the things advocated is:

> We will appoint a board of live stock commissioners in which shall be vested power—

That terrible word.

> —to regulate and direct all aspects of live stock marketing.

Mr. MICHAUD: Regimentation of the worst kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is that from?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It is from Bracken's "Charter for a better Canada". There are a great many more delightful things in the pamphlet which I shall not take the trouble to quote. There is this, for example: compulsory collective bargaining and other things along that line. I am pointing that out only for this reason—and not because I want to have any quarrel with my hon. friends; I enjoy listening to them—that I believe there is too much of a tendency to try to create an ideological difference on a piece of legislation which had nothing to do with ideology, at all.

Marketing legislation is not primarily a political football to be kicked around. I hold in my hand a report the meeting held in this city recently by a number of representatives of agriculture, under the auspices of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which included practically all the chief farm organizations in Canada. I believe hon. members from all sides of the house were invited to attend, and a great many of them did. I was one of them. I felt that the farmers there represented farm organizations in every province. There were also representatives of the provincial governments of many of the provinces, and there was unanimous agreement that they wanted marketing legislation. They presented a draft bill, which the minister has in his possession.

Here are some of the reasons they wanted marketing legislation. I believe these point out definitely that what farmers are asking for is something which other organizations have already had for a period of time, and which the farmers find is working in the interests of those organizations, so that they want to copy it.

I would quote from what Mr. Hannam, president of the C.F.A. had to say on that occasion:

> We have three-quarters of a million farmers in Canada. Working individually these farmers cannot have any plan for orderly marketing without rules to carry out the plan. Marketing legislation simply provides legal status for the rules agreed upon by the majority. Our producers have reasoned that if the great majority agree on a marketing plan, then the will of the majority should prevail to carry out the plan.

So he goes on along that line, asking the government for marketing legislation. Another gentleman who spoke at that time was Mr. A. K. Lloyd of British Columbia Tree Fruits Limited, who said:

Why is it necessary? In view of the complexity of modern agriculture, it is essential in order that the producer may obtain at the least expense the greatest possible proportion of the consumer dollar, that he accomplish his marketing in an orderly manner. Such legislation will enable him to avoid the uneconomical waste which too often has caused the difference between prosperity and failure.

It is quite clear that the farmers are becoming anxious and want to get the greatest possible portion of the consumer dollar for the products that they have to sell. In other words, they want to find the shortest direct route between the producer and the consumer. In doing that they want to utilize government machinery set up for that purpose. Mr. Lloyd goes on:

Without such legislation, the basic industry of the country and one which is absolutely essential to its welfare, is left to the mercies of anyone clever enough to exploit enough.

That is putting it pretty close to the line. When hon. members to my right get up and accuse us of wanting to institute some sort of socialism I would point out that here is a gentleman who is saying that all they want to do is to take the marketing of their product out of the hands of the people who may exploit them and put it in the hands of the people who are interested in the welfare of the producer. I wish to impress upon the minister that the gentlemen who attended that conference felt a sense of urgency in this matter. I think it is unfortunate that the minister has not given the assurance to the house for which we have asked, that legislation of this kind will be forthcoming early in the next session. It is quite apparent that we cannot get it during this session. I want to quote Mr. Lloyd to show the urgency that was felt in this matter. He said:

Already there is a noticeable drift from the farm to the city, and this is hardly to be wondered at when it is remembered that the average farmer will be working from sixty to seventy hours a week, whereas other unionized labour has already achieved a forty-four or forty-hour week. Action on the matter under discussion cannot be postponed without distastrous results.

That is placing it pretty squarely on the doorstep of the minister. It points out that, unless action is taken quickly, there will be disastrous results in the production end of things.

I should like to go on now to the resolution which was carried unanimously by that conference. May I again emphasize that the chairman of the conference invited members of parliament who attended, to present their views if they had any in opposition to the draft bill. He got up repeatedly and asked members who were opposed to a marketing act of that kind to state their views. In my hearing, at least not one member of any political group got up and expressed any views in opposition to it. The following resolution was passed unanimously:

That this conference convened by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture with representatives of major agricultural organizations in attendance from all sections of the dominion ask that the directors of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture convey to the dominion cabinet the unanimous request of this meeting that legislation in line with the attached draft of a farm products marketing act, be introduced at the present session of parliament.

They wanted it right away. It was in pursuance of that thought that we in this group tried to do the only thing we could do, move an amendment in order that this bill might be given further consideration in an appropriate committee where the views of these organizations could be heard. We would then have an opportunity of hammering out a marketing act which would be in line with what the farmers are asking for. We are not opposed to the principle of this bill. We are going to support the principle of the bill and we have moved an amendment in an attempt to give time, both to the minister and to the government as a whole and to the farm organizations to get together to formulate an appropriate marketing act.

The minister says that it cannot be done at this time on account of the time element, since his powers will expire at too early a date and he must have power to carry on. We are willing to take a reasonable stand. We are asking the minister again to give us the assurance that at the next session of the house he will bring down a marketing act in line with the proposals made by this organization. If we get that assurance we shall have something to go on and the organized farmers will have something to go on until next year.

I do not see how it will be possible for any hon. member to rise in his place and vote against a bill of this kind if he says that he believes in orderly marketing and in living up to the agreements that Canada has made for the supply of food to Britain. I respect the views of my hon. friends to my right when they get up and say that this is a private enterprise country and that therefore we must keep the government entirely out of business, let everyone run his own show. I respect their views, but the facts of the past and present do not bear out those views. It is no longer true to say that this is a private enterprise country. No one here can say it is entirely private enterprise. The events of modern times have brought us to the point where we must do cooperatively what we cannot do individually, and the marketing of farm products is one of those things.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words before the motion for second reading passes. I do not think the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) needs to be told that there is a great difference between the bill that is before us and the legislation which was passed in 1934. In 1934 boards were set up and powers were conferred upon the boards. We have transportation boards; we have all manner of organizations from courts down to temporary commissions and committees that are manned by appointees of the government. That is one of the accepted ways that democracy has of giving effect to the wishes of a democracy. I submit that that is an entirely different matter from the executive itself taking powers. In fact the difference is so pronounced that when war came we adopted this extraordinary method which the government seeks to perpetuate by this bill.

It is not my intention to rehearse the many arguments that have been put forward against the second reading of this bill, but there are one or two points I should like to accentuate. We have been told, not once but many times, that Canada has made agreements and that the agreements should be implemented. It does appear that Canada has made agreements, but because Canada has made agreements in an improper way it does not follow that we should indulge in further impropriety to give it execution. Agreements have been made under the War Measures Act after the war was over and when parliament was in session. Agreements have been made and are being made by the government when parliament is available to express its approval or otherwise of them, and I think it is pushing the argument a little far to say that because Canada has undertaken through, if you will, a usurpation of power to do certain things it behooves us to go farther and confer dictatorial powers on the government in order that they may be implemented.

This is not entirely a new device of government. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the provinces, for instance, did confer upon the federal cabinet the right to tax, but for a special purpose and for a definite time. Nevertheless the government, in the exercise of those borrowed powers, used them not to win the war but to win an election. The government used the borrowing powers that it had got from the provinces to raise money to bring in something which, in itself, is good, the family allowance, but it nevertheless used the moneys that it had to win the war for the purpose of winning an election, and now it is using what it brought in by the improper use of these moneys, something that itself was good, as an argument to keep in perpetuity the taxing powers it borrowed for the duration of the war only. That kind of argument is not sound argument. That kind of argument is not one which appeals very much to my imagination or to any generous sentiments which I may have toward people who are in want.

If the government has made these agreements to sell wheat or bacon or other commodities, undoubtedly they must be carried out, but let them be carried out as the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) has suggested, at the expense of the people as a whole and not by a few. These agreements should not be used to push the people into further subjugation. The minister says. "I need this bill in order that I may implement agreements which I have made; I must have these iron controls in order that I may carry out my agreement with Britain." That is not so.

May I go just one step farther and say that we have had evidence in the last few days of the great danger which arises from governments entering into negotiations and transactions which are beyond their proper sphere and scope. When a government enters into trade it then exposes the nation to all the bickering and dissatisfaction that arise out of trade and especially out of trade by people who are not skilled in trading. When a merchant in Canada sells something to a merchant in Britain or to a merchant in Italy and a dispute arises, they may submit their difference to the courts; but when a nation deals with a nation there is no arbitrament but that of war. In these days when we are talking so much about peace; when we are seeking an abiding peace we seem unnecessarily to be creating causes for dissension and disagreement by injecting nations into the buying and selling of commodities and into all the disputes and difficulties which arise out of the marketing of goods, and denying them at the same time the benefits of arbitration, of adjustment and of settlement or appeal to the courts. I submit that we have got ourselves into a frame of mind from which it is becoming more and more difficult to escape. One has but to frequent any of the standing committees to hear deputy minister after deputy minister explaining to the committee that it is the policy of government that there be more control; that there be more government management; that there be greater interference by the administration in what up to now we have considered to be the private business of the people of Canada.

I submit to you again, Mr. Speaker, that what we need is not more controls, not more legislation hampering the natural activities and the business of the country, but a government with nerve enough to rid itself of the controls which are weighing upon us even now, although hostilities are over for well nigh two years.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I have had an opportunity of voting before for a marketing act in this house. That marketing act has been referred to tonight. It was brought forward by a Conservative government. It was opposed by the Liberal party almost in the same words as the hon. gentlemen to your left now use in opposing this bill. As a matter of fact I had the pleasure of challenging the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) on that act in a by-election when he first came to this house, and I found that the Conservatives rushed out to join hands with him in defeating their own act and putting him back on a policy which destroyed that piece of legislation.

I am very glad to be able to give my support again to the measure now before the house. I regret the confusion which seems to be unavoidable in regard to this legislation now before us. For instance, the Progressive Conservative party are opposing this legislation because they do not desire this kind of legislation.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Nonsense.

Mr. IRVINE: We are supporting this legislation, and we have moved an amendment from this section of the house because we think we can make the bill a little better than it is. That is the situation. I shall vote for the amendment, but I shall certainly support the bill. I should like, if the minister would do so before the vote is taken, for him to give the assurance that has been asked by those who sponsor the amendment.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Nicholson) which was negatived on the following division:

TRANSITIONAL MEASURES

CONTINUATION OF ACT OF 1945 UNTIL MAY 15, 1947

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved:

That, whereas subsection one of section six of The National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, chapter twenty-five of the statutes of 1945, as enacted by chapter sixty of the statutes of 1946, provides that subject as thereinafter provided, that act shall expire on the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, if parliament meets during November or December, one thousand nine hundred and forty-six, but if parliament does not so meet it shall expire on the sixtieth day after parliament first meets during the year one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven or on the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven, whichever date is the earlier: Provided that, if at any time while that act is in force, addresses are presented to the Governor General by the Senate and House of Commons respectively, praying that that act should be continued in force for a further period, not in any case exceeding one year from the time at which it would otherwise expire and the governor in council so orders, that act shall continue in force for that further period.

And whereas it is considered desirable to continue the said act in force until the fifteenth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven;

The following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency Field Marshal The Right Honourable Viscount Alexander of Tunis, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Companion of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India, Companion of the Distinguished Service Order, upon whom has been conferred the Decoration of the Military Cross, one of His Majesty's aides-de-camp, General, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of the Dominion of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, respectfully approach Your Excellency praying that The National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945 be continued in force until the fifteenth day of May, one thousand nine hundred and forty-seven.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on Friday I indicated to the house that an address would be moved praying for an extension of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, until May 15, 1947. This procedure is provided for in section 6 of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945 which, after establishing the day upon which the act will expire, contains the following proviso:

> Provided that, if at any time while this act is in force, addresses are presented to the Governor General by the Senate and the House of Commons respectively, praying that this act should be continued in force for a further period, not in any case exceeding one year, from the time at which it would otherwise expire and the governor in council so orders, this act shall continue in force for that further period.

As matters stand at the present time the act will expire on the 29th of this month. As the house is aware, the legislation introduced by the government at the beginning of the session, which was intended to give permanent effect to certain orders and regulations made under emergency powers—or, perhaps I should say, rather than "permanent effect", effect for a further length of time of a year, or thereabouts, in most instances—has not been fully dealt with by parliament, and none of it has received royal assent. As yet opportunity has not been presented to introduce a bill which is to continue in effect the orders which are required for a limited period beyond the end of March.

In order that the measures which are to be provided for in this legislation may not expire before the legislation becomes effective, it is necessary to extend the life of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, sufficiently to enable parliament to complete its work and royal assent to be given to the resulting statutes.

As I indicated on Friday, I think it would be unsafe to plan for the completion of that legislation within a period of less than approximately thirty days after the conclusion of the Easter recess. I should like to make it plain that the government has no desire to continue beyond the end of March any orders or regulations of the governor in council, except those to be appended by way of schedule to the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act to be based on the resolution standing in my name on the order paper, and except the orders and regulations of the governor in council to be replaced by the following bills:

An Act to Amend the Canada Grain Act;

An Act to Amend the Militia Pension Act;

An Act to Amend the Customs Act;

An Act to Amend the Feeding Stuffs Act, 1937;

An Act to Amend the Inspection and Sale Act, 1938;

An Act to Amend the Fertilizers Act;

An Act to Amend the Immigration Act, and to Repeal the Chinese Immigration Act;

An Act Respecting Import and Export Permits;

An Act to Amend the Militia Act;

An Act to Amend the Patent Act, 1935;

An Act Respecting Supplemental Payments on Mail Contracts;

An Act to Amend the Department of National Defence Act;

An Act to Continue the Revised Regulations Respecting Trading With the Enemy (1943);

An Act to Amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935;

An Act to Provide for the Sale and Export of Agricultural Products.

Then there is a bill, not yet before the house, relating to the compensation of government employees.

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is before the house now.

Mr. ILSLEY: The resolution is before the house, but the bill has not been introduced.

The government is therefore prepared to revoke, effective the first day of April, all orders and regulations of the governor in council, with the exceptions I have mentioned. Submission will be made to council promptly to effect such revocation.

I am further prepared to give the undertaking, on behalf of the government, that as soon as the bills to which I have referred receive royal assent, orders and regulations of the governor in council which they replace will be revoked.

It may be that I have been just a little too concise in what I have said. But it may also be that what the government's plans are is perfectly clear. I should like what I have said to stand exactly as I have said it, as the government's undertaking. Perhaps however I might elaborate a little so as to explain what the plan is.

We have before parliament, at various stages, these bills which I have mentioned. We also have a resolution on the order paper which will be used as the basis for another bill, called the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act; and to that bill will be appended, as I have explained to the house before, a number of orders in council, approximately fifty-five in number.

Now, it is not necessary to continue in force any orders in council which derive their validity from the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, except those orders in council and regulations which are to be appended to the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, and except the orders in council which are to be replaced by the legislation before the house, namely the list of acts and bills I have mentioned. Therefore the government is prepared to revoke, as of April 1, all orders in council except those I have mentioned. And as soon as the bills I have mentioned receive royal assent, they are also prepared to revoke all orders and regulations which the legislation itself replaces.

I do not know that I need say very much about the necessity for the bill. If we saw any reasonable probability of all this legislation becoming law before March 29, I think we would not ask for this extension. But every one of us knows that it is utterly impossible, in the time that remains before us, between today and March 29, for this legislation to pass its various stages in this house and in the other house, and to receive royal assent.

The matter is so important, and the results would be so disastrous if there were to be an abrupt termination of all these orders and regulations on March 29, that the government has a responsibility to begin—and to begin in time—to see to it that that result does not ensue. That is the reason we are proposing, on this 18th day of March, this address to His Excellency; and a similar address will be introduced in the senate.

I do not think that on this occasion I should outline in any detail the consequences of these orders in council lapsing. However, I might say just in passing that if they do lapse, rent control will disappear; eviction control will disappear; price control will disappear; the supplements to old age pensions now payable under orders in council could no longer be paid, and labour legislation which provides for a system of collective agreements between employers and employees would cease to have any effect. The effect of such an abrupt lapsing of this emergency legislation would be confusion, if not chaos. My colleagues who are more intimately connected with the various phases of the matter could go into the thing more fully than I am prepared to do at the moment, but I think it is realized, whatever our views may be about controls, that this would be no way to end controls. To those who do not believe in controls at all on principle, the argument I think must be convincing that controls must be abandoned or dropped in a little more orderly way than this would be. To those who believe that there must be some measure of control in some of these fields for some time to come—and that is my belief—the importance of not permitting a lapsing of this control legislation on the twenty-ninth day of March is very great indeed. I am therefore moving the resolution.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) has gone a long way in accepting the suggestions made during recent months by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and those on this side of the house, that statutes such as this which grant extraordinary and emergent powers should be brought to an end at the earliest possible day. I think consideration should be given to the repeal of the War Measures Act, another act in the same position as the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act; for as long as acts such as these stay on the statute book there is a continuing invitation to governments to utilize them and thereby abrogate the powers and prerogatives of parliament.

A lot of legislation has been introduced at this session and I think it has been passed with reasonable dispatch on the part of this parliament. When the minister spoke on February 4 last, as reported on page 82 of Hansard, he set out in detail the various bills that were to be introduced by the government to take the place of orders in council. If it had not been for the fact that some other legislation was introduced which was not emergency legislation, such as that dealing with the Chinese exclusion act, in my opinion there would have been no necessity for the minister to ask for any extension of this particular statute.

I think the time has come to put a stop to unnecessary departures from constitutional legislative practice and process. I think this is a step toward the restoration of the sovereignty of parliament over a bureaucracy noted by its multiplicity and even by its anonymities, a bureaucracy which in many cases is still above the law of this country, denied, as the individual is, the right of recourse to the courts against those acts that are done to him individually and which he believes to be unjust. The minister might well continue the step he has taken today and make provision immediately to do away with those portions of the orders in council which deny the individual the right of recourse to the courts when at any time he is treated any differently by order in council or by regulation from others in the same class.

Our experience has shown that when you do not trust the courts, injustice and unfairness is the natural consequence. Now that we are taking this step forward, and a step forward it is, to deny extraordinary powers by way or order in council, I suggest to the Minister of Justice, through you, sir, that now is the time to show that, the emergency having passed, the courts of this country should be trusted to protect the rights of the individual. I am going to ask the minister when he gets the opportunity to take the house into his confidence in regard to whether or not parliament in fact has the power to pass this legislation at all.

At the time the bill was originally passed in the fall of 1945 the doctrine of emergency that had been enunciated in the privy council by Lord Haldane in 1922 and 1923 was still believed to authorize the dominion parliament to entrench upon the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces under the guise or excuse of emergency. Within the last year a decision has been rendered by the privy council in the case of Attorney General for Ontario and the Canadian Temperance Federation. This case arose in connection with the Canada Temperance Act. I should like very much to have the minister explain how it can be justified under the excuse of emergency to pass large portions of the legislation that is being submitted to parliament, indeed the address that is now before parliament. If I understand that authority aright, and it has been interpreted on a number of occasions, not by the courts but by outstanding jurists and writers of jurisprudence, the doctrine of emergency no longer exists, and the excuse for the dominion parliament to entrench upon the legislative ambit of the provincial legislatures under the British North America Act no longer holds.

I intended to ask the minister to do what he has already indicated would be done, namely, to repeal or revoke all orders in council passed under the War Measures Act and continued under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act as of March 31. That has been done. The other day I had occasion to suggest to the minister that he give us a list of all orders in council that were in effect at the present time. I did that on March 14, and my remarks and the answer of the minister appear at page 1370 of Hansard. At the time it was impossible for the minister—or difficult, he said—to set forth in detail the orders in council that were in effect. Apparently now there is no necessity of having a list of those that are in effect and those that are being repealed, because all will be repealed as of March 31. But I am sure, sir, that I should not be denied the opportunity of saying this, that it was a serious situation that was revealed, that the people of Canada were subject to laws of which the cabinet was unable without great difficulty to set forth a list. We had an experience not so long ago of a secret order in council, and I am going to ask the minister when he replies to advise whether or not there are any other outstanding orders in council which will remain secret or are at present secret.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will say at once that I know of none.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister says he knows of none. I presume by that he is guarding against the possibility that one might turn up which later on he might locate. I do not know about that. At any event I accept that assurance from him that there are none.

Next, if we pass this transitional bill covering a period of six weeks there is nothing to prevent the government from passing orders in council during that six weeks over and above those comprised as an appendix to the omnibus bill. Section 2 of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act will still remain in effect, whereby the governor in council may make regulations and orders in council to facilitate the readjustment of industry and commerce, maintain and control and regulate supplies and services, prices, transportation, property, rentals, employment, salaries and wages, and so forth, and assist the relief of suffering and the restoration and distribution of essential supplies and services in any part of His Majesty's dominions or in foreign countries. I therefore think that the minister's declaration should go further and that he should undertake that no orders in council will be passed on and after March 31 under the powers contained in the act in regard to any matter other than those covered by the list of subjects and the orders in council appended to the omnibus bill, except by way of repeal of existent orders. I think too that he should give us the undertaking that in asking for this extraordinary undertaking departmental heads and officials shall be denied the right of passing regulations further and other than those now in effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: You mean taking the price ceiling off? That is what it means.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not mind dealing with that, but the minister specifically refrained from it and I am simply following him. I am asking for the assurance that parliament shall not go through the motions of denying the right of the government to pass orders in council under the transitional powers act with the government still in the position of being able to pass orders in council by reason of the continuance of the act for a further period of six weeks. In other words I want the assurance that the act will no longer be in effect except in so far as it is necessary to carry out the provisions made by the orders in council printed as an appendix to the omnibus bill. With that assurance, sir, we of the opposition are prepared to give support to the address that has been moved. It will mean that in giving that support parliament would now be making its declaration of supremacy and a declaration on the part of all of us that hereafter except in a very few matters the rule of bureaucracy in this country which continued throughout the period of the war and since will have come to an end.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to give support to this resolution. We believe that pending the passage of the omnibus bill it is essential that the government have power to continue controls in the interests of the Canadian people. We all remember the chaos that occurred in the United States about the first of July last year when their controls went out of existence because of the negligence of congress of that great country. The government of the United States at that time was unable to restore in very large measure the conditions that had existed prior to that period of chaos, and we would not be a party to anything that would bring about a similar condition in this country. Those of us who were in the United States last autumn when the president announced the removal of the remaining controls will remember the manner in which prices skyrocketed almost within a few hours of the removal of those controls.

As I listened to the discussion this afternoon and to the points made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) my mind went back to the period following the first great war. I remember how at the close of that war hon. gentlemen who now comprise the government of this country criticized very bitterly the former administration because it had been necessary to utilize orders in council to do many of the things that must be done following a war of the magnitude of the war of 1914-18, as it had been following the second world war. I have in my desk at the moment one or two acts passed by my hon. friends to my right when they were in power from 1930 to 1935, such as the "blank cheque" legislation, the Natural Products Marketing Act and other acts of that kind giving the government of the day powers to pass orders in council to do many things which in the opinion of many of us should be done only by parliament. But it seems necessary that parliament must at times give authority to the government to do the things which it must do in an emergency.

I approach this question from a different point of view from that taken by the hon. member for Lake Centre. Parliament is sitting now, and I do not think the controls that have been lifted already during the sittings of this session should have been lifted without some discussion in this house. The cost of living has jumped during the last few months, and in my opinion this house should first have had the opportunity of discussing what should be done with regard to the controls which have already been removed.

As to the right of parliament to decide what shall be done, the bill which is to be introduced by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) to secure from parliament powers in the fields covered by the omnibus bill is I think now the proper procedure for this house to follow. As far as this group is concerned we are not anxious to see the government destroy those controls which work to the benefit of the Canadian people. Indeed we should like to see some of the controls which have been removed put into effect again to improve the conditions of our people at this time. And so, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to give the government this extention of six weeks.

It has been suggested that this should not have been necessary had we not been dealing with other legislation which was inconsequential, but the only bill mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre as being in the latter category was the Chinese Immigration Act. As I recall it the discussion of that measure took only one day.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: And if my memory serves me correctly, that day was February 11.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is correct.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Since then it has not been discussed and it certainly has not delayed the business of this house. It was an attempt, with all its defects, to remove something that never should have been placed upon the statute books of this country.

My hon. friend makes a great deal of the denial of the right of the citizen to bring an action against the crown. That has not been the result of anything which the C.C.F. group has done in Canada.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I just interrupt my hon. friend to say that he has not interpreted correctly what I was saying, which was as to the right of the individual to have recourse to the courts being affected by an order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was thinking of what the hon. gentleman had to say the other evening when he did raise that question. So far as I know, only one government in this country has granted by statute the right to bring an action against the crown, and that is the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan. Under clause 3 of the Crown Corporations Act of that province, a crown company can sue or be sued. I just wanted to mention that because this question has been raised two or three times in the house.

May I say that we are in favour of giving to the government the extension of power for which they have asked. May I add that if things move slowly through this house and it is necessary to extend the time beyond May 15, we shall be prepared to assist in granting that extension.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to see the government take this step, which we consider a step forward, to relinquish some of the unusual and extraordinary powers which they felt they should have to meet the emergency situation brought on by the war. We should like to see the government take steps as soon as it is possible in the interests of the Canadian people to relinquish more of these powers and to restore to parliament its full sovereignty. We are prepared to support the resolution to extend the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act for a period of six weeks. We hope that in that period we shall be able to make sufficient progress to make it unnecessary for the government to ask for any further extension. We shall honour our commitment to assist in every possible way to get these bills through so that there will not be any necessity for asking for that extra extension.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the necessity for this resolution is apparent to all of us, and as my leader has already indicated, we in this group are in support of the resolution. I rise to draw attention to one point which I should like to impress upon the government. My fear is that this resolution, combined with the omnibus bill which is to be brought in later, could be the basis for delaying indefinitely, or at least for another year, the promised amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act. My purpose in rising is to express the hope that such will not be the case. The minister in his opening remarks has already said that this is one of the matters to be covered by this resolution and subsequently by the omnibus bill. We support him in that whole-heartedly. It would be unthinkable that any parliament, by failing to pass this resolution, should let the old age pension drop back from $25 to $20 a month. But I want to make the point that that is not good enough. The government should bring in, as an emergency measure right away, whatever amendment it proposes to make to the Old Age Pensions Act. When questions were asked about this act—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman should not use this resolution as a pretext to discuss old age pensions.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Speaker, like the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) I am referring to old age pensions only so far as this resolution deals with the matter. If you will recall the remarks make by the Minister of Justice, he said that this resolution has to do with orders in council covered by a long list of acts which this house is now dealing with, plus the orders in council which are a schedule to the omnibus bill. There are fifty-five or more of them. He specifically named old age pensions. My point is that when I asked the government a few weeks ago about this matter, the answer was that the subject of old age pensions is under discussion with the provinces, and that was given as the reason why it could not be expected that the matter would be dealt with in this house at the present time. I submit if that is the reason why it cannot be dealt with before March 31, that can go on being the reason for the entire life not only of this resolution but of the omnibus bill.

I call upon the government to realize that in the meantime the old people are suffering. The government has the power now, between now and March 31—even if it were to give to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) an undertaking not to pass new orders in council after that date—to amend order in council P.C. 6367 of August 10, 1943, and raise the amount of the old age pension. This order in council included in this schedule is different from other orders in council in this document. The others, whether I agree or not, are for the most part orders which are on the way out, orders which hon. members to my right at any rate wish to get rid of. But so far as the old age pension order in council is concerned, no one suggests that it is on the way out. We hope it is on the way up. If the government's reply is that they can do better later when they get an agreement with the provinces, well and good. But let us not wait until that maximum of $50 a month, shall we say, is attainable. Let us have an act or order in council right now improving the position of old age pensioners, in order to avoid suffering even for another month. That is my whole plea. I ask that this necessary resolution be not used as a basis for delay.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just in the interests of clearness, may I say that there are two other classes of orders in council in the same category as the old age pension orders in council. There is the one relating to the veterans' preference in the civil service, and the one relating to labour relations. The whole three classes of subject matter are to be dealt with by legislation later in the session.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister is perfectly right in referring to those other two; and I will say in support of him that those and the old age pensions order are the three which he named when he first spoke on this matter on February 10. I would support him wholeheartedly if he would treat all three as emergency matters and bring in now legislation relating to them rather than using this as a basis for interminable delay.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the house is being asked for authority for the extension of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act of 1945 as amended in 1946. I contend that the enforcement of the orders in council should be a responsibility of the government of Canada instead of being left to the municipalities. By the time parliament deals effectively with this whole control matter the war will have been over for more than two years, and in the meantime all business is being hamstrung. Business men do not know what orders in council have been passed that are still not repealed. I know this because I have received letters from magistrates and other persons from which I gather that people have been fined under certain orders in council, and when I have looked them up, having gone to a great deal of trouble to search the records, I find that some of those particular orders under which people were convicted had expired or had been repealed. The list of those still in effect should be published.

No business man can conduct his business satisfactorily today. The small business man is complaining of the handicap he is under through some of these irksome controls. It is all very well for certain hon. members to applaud and to support this legislation, but I can assure them that in the city of Toronto a large section of the police force is engaged in the enforcement of over 100,000 of these orders in council that should have expired right after the war was over. Take the housing situation. The summer will be gone before anything effective can be done by this parliament to aid it and remove some controls. The government has dilly-dallied with this question right along and it will not be before May 15, or four months after the first meeting of parliament, that we shall be able to deal with it. We might as well grant an extension to the end of the year of the whole act of 1945 as amended in 1946.

In the United States they got rid of their controls as quickly as they could. It is true that prices rose considerably for a short time, but they fell by the law of supply and demand when it was found that people were not buying the goods at the prices that were being charged. I do not see why these controls should be extended and played with by bureaucrats as they are in this country. As a member of parliament, I do not know what orders in council are still unrepealed, nor does the public know. I am sure the people do not want this legislation and a wide spread control system continued indefinitely. It leaves the administration and enforcement of these controls to the municipalities and is putting a burden on the taxpayers. Building inspectors, architects and others engaged in that line cannot get on with their work because they do not know what the law is under all these various controls that have been set up. I would not object to a reasonable extension if an effort was made to eliminate them, but I hope that between now and May 15 all the unrepealed orders in council will be tabled.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before the minister rises to reply may I make one observation and ask one question. It has to do with the omnibus bill. The proposed schedule to that bill is before us. The house will know, and the minister will know, that the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that this resolution would have the general support of this party, but he asked one assurance, namely, that no orders in council be passed during the extension period on matters other than those in the uncompleted legislation we have before us. The minister has indicated that he will likely give that assurance.

There is one other point. The minister has not yet introduced the omnibus bill. He has made no statement with respect to it. I think the house would appreciate having that bill before us before Easter. I hope the minister will give an affirmative answer to the suggestion that he introduce the bill and make a statement with respect to it before the Easter recess.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have to advise the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): With regard to the first request, made in the first instance by the member for Lake Centre and later by the leader of the opposition, the government is quite prepared to give an undertaking that no orders in council will be passed under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act relating to any matters other than those dealt with by the orders and regulations of the governor in council which are being continued. I do not mean merely the ones in the schedule to the act, but the orders and regulations of the governor in council which deal with matters that are dealt with by the other bills, a list of which I have read as well.

Mr. KNOWLES: But you may amend some of those.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It must be remembered that if we do pass any orders in council under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act in that field we must table them within fifteen days and they may be dealt with by parliament. But I am prepared to give an undertaking to stay in that field.

To make myself technically correct, I should say that it will be necessary to continue, not to revoke, the orders in council relating to the appointment and remuneration of persons in connection with the administration of those orders to which I have referred. That will be dealt with in the bill that will be placed before the house. It is a small matter, and I mention it only to keep myself technically correct.

Mr. MacINNIS: You are not concerned about being correct, apart from the technicality.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other question was with regard to the omnibus bill. I shall introduce the resolution. I am prepared to do so at any appropriate time and make an explanation in broad terms of the legislation that is to be based upon that resolution. If the resolution goes through I am prepared to introduce the bill itself, and will do that before the Easter recess.

At the moment I am not prepared to deal at all competently with this constitutional point. I do not understand that the emergency doctrine was abrogated by a decision of the privy council. If it has been varied, it has been in the direction of the extension of the powers of the dominion rather than a limitation, by the Canada Temperance Act case. I can go into that matter fully when I introduce the legislation on the continuation of the transitional measures bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Before the minister spoke I told the house he would close the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Mr. SPEAKER: I declared the motion carried on division.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall put the question. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: On division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me I heard several voices say "No." In the circumstances the government would like to have a division on this.

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, the motion was carried. I don't see how you can call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Ilsley) which was agreed to on the following division:

PRIVILEGE

MR. LOCKHART—MR. GRAYDON—PROCEDURE ON EMERGENCY POWERS RESOLUTION

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I rise either on a question of privilege or a point of order. A few minutes ago you declared this resolution carried. One minute afterward you called the orders of the day. Then for some strange reason, to suit the whims and fancies of a few, you asked—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat.

Mr. LOCKHART: On a question of privilege—

Mr. SPEAKER: I ask the hon. member to resume his seat. When the Speaker saw over twenty members rise in their places to ask for a recorded vote I believe it was the duty of the Speaker to call in the members in order to have a recorded vote.

Mr. FRASER: I protested before they stood up.

Mr. LOCKHART: What I am asking is this: The resolution having been declared carried by you, and the orders of the day having been called, on what authority or under what rule of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I will not permit the hon. member to discuss the conduct of the Speaker.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I desire to raise a question of privilege. I submit with great deference that this house should not, without the unanimous consent of the house, revert to other items of business that have already been decided upon and passed. I would have raised this question prior to the vote being taken except that some people might have regarded it as a move whereby this group was opposed to the resolution, which we are not. I raise the question now and say that I do not think the Prime Minister's influence in this house should be any greater than that of any other member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat. I repeat that over twenty members rose, and according to the standing order it is the duty of the Speaker to call in the members. Moreover, as nobody protested at the time, I think—

An hon. MEMBER: They did.

Mr. FRASER: I protested.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the house to proceed with its business. Orders of the day.

NAILS

QUESTIONS AS TO AVAILABILITY IN PETERBOROUGH AND NANAIMO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. FRASER: Mr. Speaker, I know quite well that I do not have to sit down for any hon. member in that corner of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: Stand up.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply a question based on many wires and letters which I have received.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to preserve more decorum in the chamber.

Mr. FRASER: I should like to ask the minister of reconstruction a question based on letters, telegrams and long distance calls I have had from my riding. The minister made the statement on March 4 that he had not heard of any shortage of nails during the past two months. My question is this: hardware stores, contractors and carpenters in my riding—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to make his question brief and to the point.

Mr. FRASER: Carpenters have not been able to get nails. I should like to ask the minister where they can get a few kegs of nails, because there are none in the Peterborough district.

An hon. MEMBER: In the hardware store.

Mr. FRASER: There are none in the hardware stores.

Mr. SPEAKER: If hon. members are anxious to put questions they must be anxious to get the answers. I would ask them to moderate their voices.

Mr. FRASER: Where can they get any nails?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): In response to a complaint about the shortage of nails in the Toronto district made in this house some two weeks ago I made inquiries and found that there was a stock of 5,000 kegs of aluminum nails in the warehouses. These were not selling well, although it is admitted that the aluminum nail is as good as the steel nail, and perhaps better for some purposes.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. HOWE: If my hon. friend will write the Aluminum Company of Canada I can assure him that he will get as many aluminum nails as he wishes to buy.

Mr. FRASER: A four inch aluminum nail is no good.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend did not specify a four inch nail. I am speaking of two inch and two and a half inch nails.

Mr. FRASER: You cannot put up studs without four inch nails.

Mr. HOWE: I am trying to give my hon. friend some information.

Mr. FRASER: I will keep quiet.

Mr. HOWE: The production of nails is high as compared with any previous year. Hon. members are well aware that during the steel strike stocks of nails became exhausted, and at present all pipe lines have not been filled up. I realize that Peterborough may be pretty well out on the pipe line; nevertheless I can assure my hon. friend that there is no real reason why any builder, for priority construction particularly, should have any trouble in getting nails. If my hon. friend refers to so-called non-essential building which hon. members opposite say should be stopped, then I am not particularly worried about whether nails can be had or not. But for any priority work, or for any essential purpose, nails are now available.

Mr. FRASER: These are veterans' homes.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): May I ask a supplementary question, based on two wires from Nanaimo saying that the building of houses has been stopped because no nails can be bought in Nanaimo? Can the minister do anything to assure a reasonable supply?

Mr. HOWE: I am informed that between 600 and 700 tons of rod per month are being shipped to Morrison Steel and Wire Company, Vancouver, for the manufacture of wire nails. This is fifty per cent above the shipments from eastern mills to Morrison in normal times. British Columbia is getting a greater percentage of the total nail production, compared with normal times, than any other province. I know that there can be no real shortage in that area.

FLAX

PRICES RECEIVED BY ONTARIO GROWERS IN 1946

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday on the orders of the day the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Menary) asked for some information with regard to the price of flax in his district. For the crop year 1946-47 the price of flaxseed is $3.25 per bushel No. 1 Canada eastern flaxseed basis in store Montreal. The flax producer delivering the top grade of flax in Toronto would receive $3.25 per bushel less a handling charge of five cents per bushel and less freight charges of 24 cents per 100 pounds Toronto-Montreal or a net price of $3.06½ per bushel. The Hanover-Montreal rate is 27 cents per 100 pounds. Lower net prices are accounted for in the grade spreads for grades of flaxseed lower than No. 1 Canada eastern flaxseed and also discounts for tough and damp flaxseed.

POSTAL SERVICE

REGULATIONS GOVERNING MAIL DISTRIBUTION AT WICKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, not that I have any particular brief for the gentleman mentioned, not even on March 17. I quote from an item in the Ottawa Journal of March 17—and I think I am in order, Mr. Speaker, because this is a matter that affects everybody:

> Late this afternoon there was no trace of Mr. Sullivan nor his family around Chelsea.
> "It was five o'clock in the afternoon," related Mrs. Jeanne Bambrick, postmistress at Chelsea, when a little girl came around and asked for the Sullivans' mail. I gave it to her and she walked back down the road to deliver it."

Chelsea, I understand, is in this district. I would ask the Postmaster General, has any postmistress any authority to relate anything about anybody's mail, even Pat Sullivan's, or to say to whom it was given or when?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the question was pretty long and I should like to see it in Hansard before answering. I did not hear it clearly.

Mr. MacNICOL: Read it in Hansard tomorrow.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will take good care that I do.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SERVICE ESTATES—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence) moved the second reading of and concurrence in an amendment made by the senate to Bill No. 19, to amend the Department of National Defence Act.

Mr. FULTON: Will the minister explain the amendment?

Mr. CLAXTON: Mr. Speaker, section 2 of Bill 19 as passed by the house would facilitate the administration of service estates of members of the armed forces who die during their service as such members. When the bill came before the senate it was found that two or three, certainly a very small number of members of the armed forces, had died while they were in veterans' affairs hospitals and before what would have comprised their service estates could be paid to them during their lifetime. It is possible that such a case may occur again, that a member of the naval, military or air forces of Canada may be discharged, undergo treatment under Veterans Affairs and die before what would constitute his service estate is paid to him during his lifetime. It is to cover this possibility that the amendment is introduced.

Mr. FULTON: Is the amendment acceptable to the minister and the officials?

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. CLAXTON: Yes. The amendment is to insert in line 30 on page 1 of the bill, after the word "or", the words "of former members". The amendment was suggested by the law officers of the crown and was acceptable to the members of the other place and to the department.

Motion agreed to; amendment read the second time and concurred in.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE, SALE AND EXPORT—COMMODITY AND PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS

The house resumed from Monday, March 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gardiner for the second reading of Bill No. 25, to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which I have read with great care. We have been told so often that the ideal of the Liberal party was to give the private individual a chance that I am greatly surprised at this kind of legislation being sponsored, not by Mr. John Strachey in England but by a Liberal government. I cannot conceive how a Liberal government would sponsor such legislation.

If what has been said about assistance to other countries of Europe is true, I would draw the attention of the minister to the first line of the preamble, where he will see that, whether inadvertently or not, the United Kingdom is not mentioned among the countries which were and still remain in grave distress for want of adequate food supplies. The question is not that of assistance to any other country, the United Kingdom, France or any other country. The question is whether this is a true democracy, whether we have private initiative any longer in this country, or have we a planned economy for good? We are told: Oh, this is only for a year—we will change it next year. How many times were we told during the war: This measure is only for the time of the war, and as soon as the war is over we will go back to normal. How many times did I tell the then leader of the opposition that he was wrong in that, that it was the duty of members of parliament to act as a brake to prevent this country from falling into ruins; and he said: Well, I am patriotic and I close my eyes during the war, but after the war we will see to it. The war has been over now for two years and still this thing is going on.

After all the denunciation we have heard of controls from all corners of the house I was surprised to see only thirteen members rise a moment ago to express their dissatisfaction with the continuance of controls. They speak one way and vote the other way. The members who are logical and have the courage to stand by their guns are very few in this house, and that is why parliament is falling into discredit in this country. It is because the actions of members of parliament are different from their public speeches. I want the Minister of Agriculture to understand very well that I am not discussing his case particularly. I am not discussing the case of the Right Hon. James Gardiner, Minister of Agriculture in the King government. I intend to discuss the case of any minister of agriculture. He will have control of all agricultural produce in this country except wheat, which is something formidable. He will have control even of the feed of animals. Did you ever think of that? I wonder how many members of parliament have read this legislation contained in Bill No. 25, establishing a special case, something that no one would have dreamed of in this country. Under it the Minister of Agriculture is being authorized by parliament to pass certain regulations and is being given by parliament more powers than any minister of agriculture ever had in any country.

Naturally the Minister of Agriculture will choose his own advisers. He will have power to buy and sell the agricultural produce of this country. He will have the right to establish boards, and he will have the right to tell every farmer in this country: "You will produce such and such agricultural product. You will sell it to me. If you do not sell it to me, you may be found guilty of an offence and sentenced to a fine or to jail, or to both." With the approval of the attorney general of Canada, who is the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), and the attorneys general of the provinces, the fine may go up to $5,000 and the imprisonment to two years. The man who will not obey the order of the Minister of Agriculture may be sentenced to two years in jail and to pay a fine amounting to $5,000 as the maximum; because that man will not have obeyed the Minister of Agriculture, he will be found guilty. As a Liberal I cannot approve that.

We are supposed to pass legislation. I want legislation passed by this parliament—meaning passed through all stages in the House of Commons, the Senate and having the sanction of the Governor General—establishing what an offence is. That is the way it is done in the criminal code. Who ever gave a blank cheque to anyone regarding the imposition of fines and imprisonment in this country? Where is the civil liberties league? We do not hear of them when we need them. We must do the work of the so-called civil liberties league. They are in existence only to defend rascals who have been traitors to this country.

Coming back to the bill, may I say that no farmer will approve it when it is explained properly to him. No farmer will say this bill is all right if he has an opportunity to read it. I know the farmers. I live among them. They abide by the law but they want sensible laws. They want laws which appeal to their sense of justice. They do not want to receive orders from anyone. They will not understand why such immense powers have given to one man, however worthy he is of the confidence of his fellow citizens. Even if the Minister of Agriculture deserved the confidence of the whole house—and it is possible that he has it—he may die tomorrow, and his successor as minister of agriculture will have the very same powers, powers undreamed of by any Canadian public man. This is going to be done as a matter of course.

Yesterday excellent speeches were made by some of our colleagues who explained their points of view. Those who were in favour of the bill spoke very well too, but they did not convince me. It is said in the bill:

. . . it is necessary by reason of the existing national emergency that parliament—

That is all of us.

—confer authority to enable the government of Canada to fulfil its obligations.

In the dark, outside of parliament, the government of Canada has assumed tremendous obligations to other countries; and now we are called upon to give our sanction or approval to all that. How is it that none of those agreements are published as an appendix to this bill? Some explanation may be given occasionally about it. We do not know what it is all about, and when we ask for some information we get it drop by drop. We have to fight for the information. It cannot be given properly because everything has been done in the dark. We have complained bitterly time and time again that parliament has been informed only after the thing has been done. We were informed of the accomplished fact. Parliament has never been consulted about the emergency—and I use the word which is used here—of passing such agreements with all other nations. And we are crazy enough to call it trade. It is the Santa Claus trade, with respect to food which is not paid for. When the words "sell and buy" are used in this bill, it is only an optical illusion. The minister will sell and buy nothing, in the legal sense of the word, but he will give away our birthright to other nations, because what will be given away by him will never be paid for by the other nations. It will be paid by the taxpayers of Canada; it will be paid by the farmers as well as by the labour men; it will be paid by the man in the street as well as by the millionaire. And now the minister is asking to be empowered with the authority to give away our birthright to all other countries, while there are people in this country who are badly in need of what he will give away.

I am strongly opposed to this. More than that, I take it quite seriously, and if I rise today I do so as a matter of duty. I do not rise for the pleasure of making a speech. When I make a speech it bores me as much as it does those who may listen to me. But I have a duty to fulfil, and I want to act in accordance with the solemn promise I gave my electors twenty odd years ago when I was elected. I told them that I would come here as a bulldog, one of the watchdogs of the treasury. That was a nickname that was given to me then and I never thought that one day I would be proud of it, as I am today.

Take the second section of the bill. All agricultural products except wheat—and even feeds are included in agricultural products—will be covered. The Minister of Agriculture is the one man who will deal with the agricultural reserve and agricultural production of the Canadian farmer. That must be well understood. What will he do? Subject to the reservation I have just made about the illusion of purchase and sale, there will be orders in council in virtue of which the minister may, first, sell or export agricultural products to the government of any country or any agency thereof, and, second, pursuant to agreements made by the government of Canada with the government of any such country or agency thereof, purchase or negotiate contracts for the purchase of agricultural products. This is a note I have made to make easier the understanding of the bill.

Not only is the minister empowered to buy according to the orders in council passed by this government, and also to sell accordingly, but there is a subsection which would not stand in any court. It is that we will empower the minister to purchase on behalf of the government of any country or any agency thereof—most incredible! Think of that, sir! Not only will the minister act on behalf of this country, but we empower him to act on behalf of other countries. What other countries? And what would he do? Third, by order, he may require any person to give such information respecting his facilities for the storing or processing of agricultural products, and at such times, as the minister may designate in such order, and then enter into contracts for the storing or processing of agricultural products. That will be found in section 3 (c) and (d). This I find most despotic.

How is it that members of parliament who have denounced bureaucracy approve the following sections?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I have not interrupted the hon. member, but may I draw his attention to the fact that on second reading it is not permissible to discuss the sections of the bill but only the principle.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, sir, there are several principles involved in each section. However, I will demonstrate it to you. In the first place, I am opposed to this bill because it is a socialistic measure and I shall be unable to face my constituents and call myself a Liberal if I support this measure. They will tell me, "You are a member of the C.C.F.; you are a socialist; you are more socialist than the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar." That is why the hon. gentleman was so anxious to have a division yesterday, and to his great surprise some members voted against the bill on second reading—I mean the amendment. I beg your pardon, sir. Sometimes I make a slip, but too many thoughts come to my head.

Considering the principle, I am against socialism because I am for the right of the individual to try his luck in life, in the struggle for life. In my view it is the only reasonable chance that a man deserving to be called a man has to win success in life. That is the first point.

I am against a planned economy; I am against control. That is why I was one of the thirteen who voted against the so-called address presented by the Minister of Justice a moment ago. I am not only a Liberal; I am for the liberty of the individual. I am for the liberty of the individual to engage in trade and make a success of his business and contribute thereby to the prosperity of the state. That is my understanding of the whole problem.

That is principle No. 1, and the opposite is the planned economy sponsored by my hon. friends the socialists. When I say "socialists" I do not mean all the members of the C.C.F. group, because some of them are Liberals at heart.

Mr. COLDWELL: With a small "l".

Mr. POULIOT: Well, that is something; and even if they are acknowledged by their chief it means they are bold enough to speak in caucus, which shows that they are sincere Liberals.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Some of the Liberals are liberal at heart.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not agree with the philosophy of my hon. friends because it is undermining our parliamentary institutions and substituting for them an all-powerful, all-ignorant bureaucracy. That is the idea of technocracy; it means the superiority of the man who is not responsible to the people over the man who is the shock-absorber for all the policies of the government. It means that those gentlemen who come with their mortar-boards are supposed to tell the farmer what he needs. They say, "You will have to grow turnips this year." But there may be a feud between them; one may say, "No, you will grow carrots", while the other may say, "You will grow onions." They will be all mixed up. Why not let the farmers decide what they want to do in order to make a success of farming in this country? But no; we have these fellows with mortar boards who will teach everyone how to manage with the plough and the other agricultural implements. And my hon. friend does it for their good. He taught school for a time, and everything he said to the children, as with all school teachers and professors, was "for your good, my boy. Do it for your good."

Mr. COLDWELL: Not always.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope not. The very best way to promote the welfare of our farmers is to leave them alone and give them a chance to cultivate their farms and sell their products as they see fit.

That is one thing. Not only will the minister be the omnipotent master of all agricultural produce, but we give him the right to establish one or more commodity boards. How many there will be we do not know. He may authorize and require them to exercise and perform all or any of the powers and duties he is given under the previous section, with reference to such agricultural products as he may designate. Well, sir, that is formidable. Here again we have a delegation of power. We give the minister certain powers to establish boards, and then we will confer power upon those boards which are not now in existence. We assume the responsibility for all those unborn babies of the Minister of Agriculture. If they do something wrong and a member complains about it he will be told, "Well, on March 18, 1947, you voted for it, and you cannot complain now."

These are not the only institutions the minister may establish. He will have more than that. He will also have advisory committees, which he will select himself. There he will have these geniuses that the socialists are so fond of finding in large numbers in the civil service. It will be Pelion on Ossa, mountain upon mountain. There will be a mountain of agricultural products which will serve as a pedestal for the Minister of Agriculture. He will be on top of that mountain; and the number of bureaucrats making up the boards will have to be so great as to make a mountain just as high as the one on which the minister sits, in order that they may be in a position to confer with him about what they think the farmer needs. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but the minister will dispense with the merit system and the civil service commission, and choose his own men. That is in section 7. This is another principle in which I am interested. If ministers are to be empowered to do away with the civil service commission, why leave the commission there at all? It would be just as well to abolish the commission. Either the civil service commission is useful or it is not. If it is useful the minister cannot ask the house for the privilege of appointing whomever he pleases on the boards and committees. If the civil service commission is worth something, then this bill is bad, and if this bill is bad—

Mr. GARDINER: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not mind an hon. member who does not know the rules, or does not pretend to lecture the rest of us, breaking the rules continuously, but the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) is breaking one very simple rule that he knows as well as any other hon. member. I refer to "Beauchesne", second edition, page 218, citation 759:

> On the motion for the second reading, it is out of order to discuss the clauses seriatim.

The hon. member has discussed them all up to clause 7. I submit that he is entirely out of order and ought to be called to order.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell the minister to keep quiet and not get excited about it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not excited; I just want to keep order.

Mr. POULIOT: If one does not know the rule I will not say anything; I shall name no one, and will be most indulgent. How can we discuss a bill, sir, without referring to it? I cannot speak of the man in the moon; if I do so you will say I am out of order because

I am not discussing a relevant matter. It reminds me of what I said one day when I complained of the promise of a million jobs which had been made by two ministers who are here today. I was called a demagogue because I referred to it. I believe the time has come when members of parliament should enjoy a certain degree of freedom. My discussion is not intended to be unpleasant to the minister or any other hon. member. I desire to discuss my views with all sincerity, to try to inform hon. members and have them read the very bill now before us. I want members of parliament to realize their full responsibility, because the minister has signed those absurd agreements with the United Kingdom giving away our birthright, not even for a mess of pottage but for nothing at all; and it is because he has given away our birthright that we must now salute profoundly and say, "O.K., U.K."

Mr. GARDINER: Say what you like but stay within the rules.

Mr. POULIOT: I tell the minister not to get excited. I may be very cruel at times, though I am not cruel now. I tell him that I was in this house before he was, that I was never defeated in Saskatchewan, and that I know my onions though I am not a farmer.

Mr. GARDINER: I was never defeated in Saskatchewan, either.

Mr. POULIOT: I did not say the minister was. I know, sir, how to choose my words and my expressions so as to remain in order all the time.

Now, sir, I have something here most interesting about Mr. Strachey, dear Mr. Strachey. I saw him, and I have some old clippings about him which I found in my files. According to one of these clippings, in this country which is fighting communism, some years ago this man said that he was not a communist but that he had communistic leanings. You know, sir, I have great admiration for my younger colleagues and especially for the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). The other day he defended and vindicated the honour of this parliament. He said something very proper in respect of a speech which was made by Mr. Strachey in the west, and which was quoted by my hon. friend.

Mr. GARDINER: You are out of order again, in quoting from a previous debate.

Mr. POULIOT: No; we cannot quote verbatim from a previous debate but, according to the rules, we may refer to it.

Not a very long time ago, when Mr. Bennett was in power, he had two great advisers. He had John Strachey, who was deported from the United States as an undesirable, and also Trebistch Lincoln, who was a Hungarian Jew, a Presbyterian minister, a member of the Anglican clergy, a suspected spy and a murderer. Those two were his favorite advisers. I regret very much that the British government has decided to send Mr. Strachey on a mission to Canada. That is another reason I am opposed to the agreement signed by the minister. I would not have anything to do with Mr. Strachey.

In addition to that, the hon. member with the Scottish brogue (Mr. Bryce), who spoke last night about the Conservative member of parliament in Great Britain who made the statement that the farmers of Canada were trying to fleece the United Kingdom, did a very good job because he also defended the honour of this country.

The question is not one of sending agricultural products to any other country for re-export, for the benefit of traders over there, whoever they may be, under the false pretence of saying that it is done to alleviate the misery of the people. No. The point is that we must first look after our own people, and begin again to have real trade, trade under which exports are paid for, not by the taxpayers, but by the purchasers. If we cannot have trade of that kind, let us have barter.

I tell you, sir—and these are my concluding words—that the time is coming when we shall have two parties in this country. One will be an all-Canadian party, composed of people born either in this country or outside it—and that is of no importance. It will be composed of people who consider Canada as their paramount country, who consider Canada before any country of the world. On the other hand, we shall have a party composed of colonials, imperialists, Witnesses of Jehovah and members of the Ku Klux Klan—all the bums, and all the people who think differently and who are not bums, put together. The fight will be between Canadians and non-Canadians. And, judging by the feeling of the people, I am sure the Canadians will win. This is why I am opposing this kind of legislation, which is against the interests of our own country.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with keen interest to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). I realize he needs no lessons with respect to the rules of procedure, because he has sat in the house for a long time, and comes of a family with wide parliamentary experience. It is many years since I first listened to the hon. member in the House of Commons. But I can say to him now, sir, that this is the first time I have found myself in agreement with much of what he has said.

The main principles to which the hon. member referred—and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) seemed to think the hon. member was referring to certain sections in the bill—are fundamental, and are seriously affected by the proposed legislation. I cannot agree with everything the hon. member said; indeed, some of his observations were not exactly relevant. I did not meet the two gentlemen to whom he referred as having been the advisers of the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett, when he was Prime Minister. That, however, is beside the point.

I feel that hon. members in this party ought not to be misunderstood either by Your Honour or by the Minister of Agriculture in respect of their attitude toward this marketing legislation. I believe that there is a great shortage of food, and that at the present time hunger exists in certain parts of Great Britain. There can be no doubt as to her need. Nor has anyone any serious doubt so far as Canada's obligation, if we may so describe it, is concerned. Whether we belong to the British commonwealth of nations or not, when the country which has taken so much of our products for so many years is in short supply, it is only prudent or sound business practice for us to endeavour to supply her with all the food we can possibly produce. Great Britain has been our greatest outlet for at least half a century. I believe there is no one in the house and perhaps but few in the country who do not appreciate the sacrifices Great Britain made during the war to save civilization. No member of the allied nations sacrificed so much during the war, and no member has suffered so much following it. Therefore I believe we might consider our part as that of a continuing ally in this post-war period.

Matters connected with trade have long since been the responsibility of the Department of Trade and Commerce. Yet we see that this bill is introduced by the Minister of Agriculture. I should have expected the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) would have been its real father. The fact is, however, that it is presented—one might say mothered—by the Minister of Agriculture.

We observe that it is to be effective for only a year. I do not know who will take the child at the end of that time. However, if hon. members to my left would care to adopt it I feel they would not want to change its manners very much. It will have been trained along the lines they approve, where every line of industry in the country would be strait-jacketed.

I do not believe the principle involved in this bill, whereby control is left in the hands of the minister, and through which he continues to make agreements, fix prices and tell us how much we are to receive for our products, is the best means of meeting the obligations which fall upon us as a member of the British commonwealth of nations.

I believe I can speak with some knowledge respecting the attitude of farmers; and in this I find myself in full agreement with the hon. member for Temiscouata who, I believe, understands the farmers in his district. One of the fundamentals which I have felt would be surrendered last by the farmer is his freedom of choice, and his right to do business in his own way, whether that way is or is not considered to be the most scientific by those who now seek to control his activities. I am satisfied that government policy during the last three or four years, and that government policy of today has been based upon a terrible fear of inflation. Price ceilings, controls and restrictions may have done something to avoid inflation, but what was done was done at the farmers' expense and it certainly did not help to provide food for Britain. Had we had higher prices for many lines of farm products, prices that were not arbitrarily fixed by controls, I am satisfied there would not be as many hungry people today in Great Britain.

Much has been said about what happened after the last war, but simply because something is said loudly and emphatically in this house does not necessarily make it a fact. History shows that during the last war there was a greater percentage of increase in agricultural production than we had during this war. There was a great increase from 1915 to 1920 in preparation for the day when food would be short in Europe following the war. True the minister or any hon. member may say that we are producing more now than we did then. We produce more industrial products also. We are a quarter of a century older.

I recall, and I believe the Minister of Agriculture will recall that in 1921 we sent 255,000,000 pounds of bacon to England. We did not have a strait-jacket bill like this one. It is true that our farmers received high prices for that bacon; it is true the price was higher to the consumer, and I do not mean that we should take the last drop of blood from the British after what they have suffered. I am 100 per cent in favour of the donations that this country has made to Britain in the time of her peril, but I submit that, had we had less fear of inflation, had there been higher prices for agricultural products, we would possibly have been in position to give Britain another $2,000 million which would represent little more than the loss we have taken in selling agricultural products under world prices.

There is no economist who has shown this house or this country that we are on the right road toward finding a solution for the relief of the starving people of Europe and Britain. No one can tell me that the production of eggs, butter and other lines of mixed farming products would have fallen during the last year had prices risen. If that is not the fact, then why was the ceiling removed from the price of eggs this week? I think our first duty is to find more food for what I would term our old customer, and anticipate as our future customer. It is the humanitarian duty of a great agricultural country like this to produce every pound of food we can.

True, the consumption of cereals is not as great as the consumption of many other lines. From 1913 and 1914 up to the present the British consumption of animal products, vegetables, fruits and many other lines of mixed farming products has been 150 to over 200 per cent above the consumption in 1912 and 1914, just before the first great war. The present consumption of cereals is only 89 per cent of what it was during those years. It is natural that the products dealt with by this bill are those in which we can anticipate a growing market when more normal times return.

I consider that the minister is asking a great deal when he asks this house to pass a bill giving him the all-absorbing powers referred to by the hon. member for Temiscouata. In order to avoid repetition I shall not go into the details because they have been discussed at length. As a farmer I reluctantly can conceive a situation arising where I shall have to ask the Minister of Agriculture when I can start seeding, how much I can sow and what I am going to get for the products I sell. There is a principle involved that is a vital one, and there is also a practical side to it.

What I am about to say I say in all sincerity because I do not want to arouse any bitterness at this stage of the debate. I am not speaking recklessly; I am speaking, as the hon. member for Temiscouata mentioned, more or less from a sense of duty to an agricultural riding, a duty to the people of this country. It is our duty as Canadians to do what we can to solve these terrible shortages. I should like someone to show me how you can have ceiling prices, sometimes at unattractive levels, and expect to increase production. The old law of supply and demand has worked down through the years and increased prices have brought about increased production.

Reference has been made to the havoc and recklessness following the last great war. Some have referred to the United States of America having lifted their price ceilings, but I do not know that that affected the United States very greatly. United States farmers for two years now have received fifty per cent more for their agricultural products. I can see where they will be able to buy more tile drain, fences, steel roofs, and erect more buildings and thus keep the wheels of industry going by increased purchasing power.

I know that great emphasis has been placed upon what happened to the economy of this country after the last war, but that was not all caused by high prices. True, this kind of bill is a war baby; this kind of bill is what sometimes follows war. True, following the last war wheat rose to something like $3.25 a bushel, and it even sold for $3.40 a bushel at some points. The government of the day fixed the price of wheat and established the wheat board, but that board was discontinued when the war was over.

However, it gave the people an appetite for controls, planned economy if you will, for boards, regulations and a new economic doctrine. The same thing happened all over the world. In this country we had our wheat pools in western Canada, but I shall not go into that because they have been dealt with before. Then we had the fiasco of 1929 when we told the world what they would have to pay for our wheat. We all know the sad tragic story of what happened. That was about to be repeated in 1939. No one knows better than the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), that we were about in the same position as we were in 1929. Had it not been for the war, we would have had the same tragic results with reference to wheat.

If we are to strait-jacket every line of agriculture in Canada we are apparently starting with the industry which it was thought would be the last to be controlled. We thought the farmer was the one who was free. I have heard businessmen say that they were going to buy a farm because, if the government kept on getting more socialistic, or if another government even more socialistic came into power the farmer would be the last free man. Now we know he will be the first to be strait-jacketed; he will be the first to be put more or less under restraint. True, we are told this is only for one year, but perhaps practice makes perfect and nothing corrupts like power unless it be more power.

I do not need to say that this bill involves a dangerous principle. It is not sound economically to place in the hands of any one minister power to fix prices and control the production and sale of agricultural products as this bill does. I do not think it was sound economically to carry price ceilings to the extremes we did and then expect our farmers to produce more when they had to sell their products at fifty per cent less than the United States farmers were getting just across the line. Our production in Canada would have been substantially higher but for those price ceilings. I know the Minister of Agriculture might reply: Compare our production today with what it was from 1930 to 1935 or from 1920 to 1925, and so forth. But he knows the answer to that. We all know how mechanization has revolutionized agriculture in recent years and resulted in greatly increased production in many lines. I wish that the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin) was in the house at this moment. He and other farmer members would remember what happened in 1919 and 1920 and 1921. He would remember what prompted the farmers in those days to take loads of light hogs off the market and take them back home, as I did, and put seventy-five pounds more apiece on them. In those days the people of Europe were starving; the people of Britain were almost starving, and greater production was needed in Canada. There was the incentive of price and we produced more food and fats and lard for Britain and Europe. That is how we increased our production so enormously in those years; in 1921 we produced and sold 225,000,000 pounds of bacon. During four years in that period our production increased faster than in any three or four years in the last decade.

Even though the minister is asking for this power for only one year, it is not the type of power that should be placed in the hands of any one minister. It is another illustration of the dangerous trend we see in these days, similar to the socialistic trends that started to develop not only in Canada but overseas following the first great war. We know the history of Russia in the years from 1917 to 1920 and how the same phrases were used then. They talked of getting parity between town and village, and then everybody would be happier and production would be increased. But it was Lenin himself who said that that policy had failed and Russia returned to the policy of giving her people returns according to what they produced. We all know how in Germany democratic socialism grew into nazism. We all know what started fascism in Italy. But whether it be fascism in Italy or democratic socialism in Germany, then later nazism, or whether it be so-called socialism in Canada, it all leads eventually to the one thing, and that is a totalitarian state governed by a bureaucracy. Surely after twenty years of experience the time has arrived when we should stop, look and listen before we sow even the kernel of that kind of seed in Canada. I have been amazed to hear people say that we should have a planned economy in Canada; that we should not have any big businesses, and the government should take them over. This kind of socialist legislation that we have before us is the seed that brings forth that type of fruit.

My hon. friends to my left have suggested that we have not enough controls. They believe that some businesses are too big, and yet they assume that they are big enough themselves to run them all.

It has often been glibly said in this house that we have just come through a war that was caused by the capitalists, but proclaiming it loudly does not constitute it a fact. The war was a socialist engendered war. The socialists brought in the sword and perished by the sword.

So far as I am concerned I propose to vote against this measure. Reluctantly I acquiesced in extending the emergency powers of the government for another month. I believe that even that is more than they should have asked for. But when it comes to this measure, Mr. Speaker, I say in all sincerity that I can never be a party to putting into any minister's hands or the hands of any department or of any government the control of the individual such as is sought in this legislation, whereby the government would be in a position to tell the farmer: You will obey me; you will do as I say; you will sow what I command and you will reap what I tell you; you will sell at my price; and if you do not follow my orders you will be committing an offence for which you may be fined up to $5,000 and be sentenced to gaol for two to five years. That is going a very long way in controlling other people's lives. We are taking some wild economic chances, but this is one power that I am not going to give to the minister, and if I do nothing else I know that, in taking that stand, I am representing the people who have elected me. We must return to sane and sound common sense. Call it free enterprise, individual initative; call it liberty, freedom, or anything you like—that is the system under which this country has developed and prospered and that is the system we should follow, not socialism, not C.C.F.ism or any other ism, because all these isms eventually mean the same thing or nothing at all. We must return to the truth enunciated in the Scriptures and earn our bread by the sweat of our brow and receive reasonable recompense for services rendered.

I think the minister will be well advised to review the agreements he has made with Britain. I hope he makes no more of the kind he has made. As a member from Montreal said the other day: Now that we are buying and selling as a nation, we are dealing in national cartels and if any fault is to be found against us for what is done under these agreements it will not be the Winnipeg grain exchange that will be charged or the live stock dealers; it will be Canada herself, because it is this nation that will be dealing with Britain.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that we can produce more food and send more food to Britain if the farmer is allowed to run his own business. The harder he works, the more he expects to earn; and higher prices should bring greater production. That greater production should adjust prices so that the British consumer will not be hurt. Canada's economy cannot afford such novel agreements whereby we are forced to sell our products at less than world prices. This country must maintain a sounder type of economy to be able to play her part in the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few moments to express myself on this bill, which is entitled, "An act to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products." The leader of this group the other night explained our position, and I agree with him and will vote accordingly.

The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who spoke a few minutes ago, uttered, I believe, a good many words of wisdom. I agree with him in a great deal that he said. I am not imputing any wrong motives but I rather fancy that when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) drew the hon. member's attention to certain parliamentary rules and standing orders it was not particularly because the speaker was out of order but because he had aroused the minister's ire. I believe the hon. member was speaking the truth with a good deal of passion because he was exercised with respect to the principle underlying the bill. Were it not for the fact that this is simply enabling legislation of a transitional nature I might perhaps choose to vote differently on the matter.

The fact is that there is a cunningly devised scheme abroad for the enslavement of the world, and legislation of this kind—in fact, any legislation—must be scrutinized with every care. The thought must be kept in mind that there is a scheme abroad to enslave the world and to destroy humanity. We must beware lest by the legislation which we pass in this house we aid and abet the programme designed for that purpose. As I have said before, say again now and perhaps shall have occasion to repeat a good many times in the future, there are only two ways of life. Let us make no mistake about that. There are only two programmes in the world and they are designed to accomplish two separate purposes. There is totalitarianism on the one hand—I do not care what you call it; you can call it communism, authoritarianism, dictatorship or whatever you like—and I put socialism there. That is where I "positionize" the philosophy of socialism.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is quite a word.

Mr. HANSELL: You may not find that word in the dictionary, but many good words have originated outside the dictionary. Perhaps I might be credited during my lifetime for originating one word anyway.

There is, on the other hand, the way of life known as democracy, the freedom to exercise one's own initiative; and there is a programme designed for the purpose of realizing a greater and more effective democracy. Either we believe in a regimented state where control is the order of the day and human beings are compelled to obey bureaucratic orders from the big bosses at the head of the state, or we believe in a free society where the order of the day is inducement rather than compulsion. I say that because one of the necessary things in a world slave state is world control of food. We must diagnose very carefully where agricultural legislation fits into this world picture. Members of parliament have a responsibility. Sometimes I think the decorum of this house is sinking to—

An hon. MEMBER: The basement.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, to a "degradated" state, and I sometimes wonder whether we as a parliament recognize our responsibility.

Mr. KNOWLES: Are you "positionizing"?

Mr. HANSELL: I will not mention anyone in particular, but I must confess that I do not like all these catcalls and all this "shut up" business. I do not think in my life I ever told a man to shut up. I may have told him to stop talking, but I was not brought up in a home where "shut up" was permitted to be said. However I am not dealing with that now.

Members of parliament have a tremendous responsibility in this complex and befuddled world. We might talk about nails and they are important to the builder who cannot get any. We might talk about fish traps. We might even talk about the increase in the price of agricultural products, and certainly the farmers have a right to expect all they can get for their production. Those things are important to the people who might be involved. But even those things are important matters of but passing interest. What I am trying to put over here is that the responsibility of members of parliament, as they scrutinize legislation, is to ask what effect it will have upon the nation or upon the world, because we are one unit in the world of nations. Consideration must be given to the effect this or that legislation will have upon the world twenty, fifty, one hundred or even a thousand years from now. The great statesmen of the past have always done things in the light of the effect on future generations. Any legislation which is to fit into a programme purposely designed to bring about a world socialist authoritarian state must be looked upon with tremendous care and given the closest scrutiny.

I notice that some hon. members have been urging the minister to make promises as to what he is going to do a year from now with respect to agriculture. I am not one of those. The picture may change in a year. I believe we should have some adequate marketing legislation, but it should be marketing legislation which will put the power where it belongs, namely in the hands of those who produce and have the production for sale, not in the hands of powerful bureaucrats. I am not asking the minister to make any promises about future legislation. We will deal with that when we come to it. As far as my small voice is concerned, if I see anything in legislation which fits into this evil scheme of things I shall raise my voice in opposition. I am following our group's position with respect to this bill, because I realize that the government is responsible for the filling of certain contracts; and we are assisting them for the coming year.

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): I associate myself with the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) in the remarks he made. I had the privilege over the week-end of talking to many farmers about this particular piece of legislation, and I want to call the attention of the minister to the fact that many farmers in Ontario at least are very much concerned about this bill. Last night the minister said it was necessary that he should have the bill passed in order that we may fulfil the contracts which we now have with the United Kingdom. With that, I believe, everyone is in accord; that is, that these contracts should be filled. But the point I wish to emphasize, which is giving the farmers in my community concern, is that new contracts may be entered into.

I listened carefully last night and I heard the minister say that no new agreements would be made, but if I read the bill aright it says clearly that the minister may sell or export agricultural products to any country.

Mr. GARDINER: Only under the orders in council we had during the war.

Mr. TUSTIN: It does not say that in the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: Read it and you will see that it does.

Mr. TUSTIN: I have tried to read it as carefully as I can; while I am not legally trained, I believe I have average intelligence, and I think the bill is perfectly clear in what it says. However, that is one of the concerns that the farmers have.

Let me return to the present agreements. At the present time, the minister indicates, he is negotiating a new contract on cheese. As I understand it, we have a contract entered into for the year 1947, but to date the farmer does not know what he will receive for his cheese for this year. I have been asked on many occasions in the last few weeks whether the thirty cents per 100 pounds subsidy would be maintained on milk that goes into the cheese factory. As far as I know, no announcement has been made by the government, and we are now close to the production season, when a great amount of cheese should be made for that contract. If it is not the intention of the government to pay that subsidy I wish to point out to the minister that it will mean that the farmers of Ontario and Quebec—if the same order is put into effect that takes all cheese for the United Kingdom from the first of April or the first of May until November—will sell their milk to the cheese factories and receive about 3¼ or 3½ cents less for their cheese this year than last year. If that happens, I assure the minister that there will be a great reduction in the amount of cheese produced and, more than that, there will be a rebellion among the farmers of Ontario and Quebec.

I listened last night to the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin) who, in my opinion, tried to emphasize this bill as a marketing bill. He said the farmers wanted stability. I can go along with him to that extent. That is absolutely what they want. But is there any stability in this bill? No. Instead of this bill being a marketing bill, I would call it a confiscation bill, because the minister has power under it to take any agricultural product he sees fit—

Mr. GARDINER: You had better read it again.

Mr. TUSTIN: I have read it many times. He has power to take any agricultural product he sees fit—

Mr. GARDINER: Taking it only at the packing plants, and so on.

Mr. TUSTIN: It does not say that in the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: It says it in the orders in council the bill brings into effect.

Mr. TUSTIN: When this bill is passed it becomes a statute.

Mr. GARDINER: And the orders in council become part of it.

Mr. TUSTIN: That may be so; nevertheless, we who have no legal training have to read the bill as it is printed, and the point is that the minister, under this bill, may take any crop that is now under production this year and may take it at any price at which he cares to sell it, whether that is acceptable to the farmer or not. I am trying to point out the feeling of the men who are to produce the agricultural products. That is the feeling they have in regard to the bill.

Mr. GARDINER: You must have instructed them wrongly.

Mr. TUSTIN: I did not instruct them at all.

Mr. GARDINER: They have never seen the bill.

Mr. TUSTIN: Do not think the farmers of the country do not think for themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: The farmers never saw the bill or the orders in council. You had the opportunity to and you should explain it.

Mr. TUSTIN: A number of these bills have been sent out. Make no mistake about that, because I sent a number of them myself.

It is not my intention to take the time of the house now, but I call the attention of the minister again to the fact that it is stability the farmers want and there is no stability for them in this bill. This bill, in their opinion, gives altogether too much power to the minister and his department. If that is not the intention of the bill, then the bill should be rewritten and the intent should be plainly inserted, as to what the effect of the bill will be, so that the ordinary individual can understand it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I shall be only a few minutes, because I think practically everything that can possibly be said in connection with this bill has been said already. But I should like to direct the attention of the house again to the fact that this is not the kind of bill we would like to have seen introduced, but a bill necessary because of certain agreements the government has entered into with Great Britain. It is an act to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products.

I have risen to say one or two things in particular. First, I want to refer to the speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). I am not going to deal with what he said, but there has been a practice on the part of the hon. gentleman and his friends of continually casting verbal bricks in the direction of the C.C.F., and we have not retaliated. I do not believe this is the time one should do that; but one of these days, perhaps, when the proper occasion arises, one could put a pretty well documented case on the record to indicate clearly just how democratic my hon. friends to the left really are. However I do not propose to do that tonight.

I should like to refer also to the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) in a somewhat similar vein. During this debate we have heard a great deal about the attempt on the part of those of us who are supporting this bill to impose some compulsion upon the farmers of this country in connection with the marketing of their products. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that, while this bill does not go nearly as far in connection with the marketing of our natural products as the farmers themselves would like to see it go, nevertheless I believe it has the support of a large majority of the producers of this country. When I hear, as I have heard so often during this debate, horror expressed by my hon. friends to my immediate right in the Progressive Conservative party in regard to compulsion, regimentation and taking away the rights of the farmers, I remember that throughout the debate I have had in my desk a copy of the act passed in 1934 by the government of which my hon. friend became a member shortly after; without portfolio, it is true; nevertheless a member of the government which introduced that measure and saw that it went through the various stages and became temporarily the law of this land. If you look over that bill, bearing in mind the sort of speeches that have been made by hon. members to my right, you realize how little ground they have for criticism when you look back upon their own record. In the legislation passed by the Bennett government I find:

In this act and in any regulations made thereunder, unless the context otherwise requires,—
(e) "natural products" includes animals, meats, eggs, wool, dairy products, grains, seeds, fruit and fruit products, vegetables and vegetable products, maple products, honey, tobacco, lumber, and such other natural products of agriculture and of the forest, sea, lake or river, and any article of food or drink wholly or partly manufactured or derived from any such product that may be designated—

By whom?

—by the governor in council, in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Mr. PROBE: Was that a Tory bill?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, the Conservative bill of 1934. Then, if you turn to section 12, which contains much of the meat of the bill, you find this:

The governor in council may by order or regulation, notice whereof shall be published forthwith in the Canada Gazette,—
(a) regulate or restrict the importation into Canada of any natural product which enters Canada in competition with a regulated product;
(b) regulate or restrict the exportation from Canada of any natural product;
(c) provide for the licensing of persons by whom any such natural product may be imported or exported;
(d) prescribe the forms of such licences and the terms and conditions upon which the same may be issued, renewed, suspended or revoked by the governor in council.

There has never been any greater power placed in the hands of any government than was given by the bill introduced into this house and put upon the statute books by my hon. friends in 1934, when they were the government of Canada. Consequently, when we hear all this criticism of those of us in other parts of the house today who are supporting what I would call this very minor measure, it does not sound as though there is very much in it. To me it has a very hollow sound. When the government of Canada—and I hope it will be soon—introduces a bill for the marketing of our natural products, I hope that bill will place the powers that are necessary in the hands of a board representative of the producers of this country, in order that the farmer may in reality control his own product. This legislation of 1934, while it did establish a board, nonetheless placed the vital powers I have enumerated as contained in this section of the bill in the hands of the governor general in council. So that when we hear about compulsion and regimentation I would advise my hon. friends to go back just a few years and see what kind of legislation they introduced and had passed when they were in power. Now I see the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) wants to ask a question.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Without offering any comments as to the comparison between the powers contained in the 1934 marketing act and the present legislation, may I ask, would the hon. member agree that the powers conferred at that time were for the purpose of assisting the farmers to manage their own affairs in the way they thought desirable, and that it therefore differed tremendously from the present bill? It seems to me that is a basic distinction.

Mr. COLDWELL: The clause I just read did not place the power in the hands of the farmers themselves. It took all the power away from them and placed it in the hands of the governor in council.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But may I ask the hon. member to answer the question? He has not done so yet, and I hope he will.

Mr. COLDWELL: I certainly will. A board was established representative of the producers, and to that extent that was a good bill; but only to that extent. I would say to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario that the bill now before us—and we complain about this—is in an entirely different category from the bill of 1934. That bill was for the control of the marketing of our natural products. The bill we now have before us is mainly to carry out certain orders in council that have already been passed in order that we may live up to agreements we have already signed. I hope that when a bill similar to this one comes before the house it will not contain the kind of clauses I have just read. I hope it will be a more progressive bill, so that even the Conservatives, who have now tacked on to their old name the name "Progressive," may be able to see the light and support a decent bill for the farm population of this country.

May I say just one more thing. We were told many times this afternoon by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) that this is a socialist bill. Well, I think it contains very little of socialism except that it does enable the country to trade as a nation and to fulfil certain agreements that should be fulfilled. But the whole object of the bill at the moment is to enable us to fulfil our obligations, and to bring order into what otherwise might be a chaos of marketing at this time. Consequently it deserves the support of every hon. member in the house. And when the name "socialist" is bandied across the chamber, I am not worried; because those of us who are democratic socialists are in pretty good company. The people of Norway, of Sweden, of Australia, of New Zealand, and the government of Great Britain are in that same position; and I challenge anyone anywhere in the world to show me countries which over the years have been more loyal to democratic institutions than the countries or governments I have named.

Therefore, when these epithets are bandied about the chamber, as they are, they are meaningless. So far as I am concerned, I am proud to be associated with the same kind of people who have maintained democracy, who have not endeavoured either to stifle or to control the press at any time in their existence as have some of those who profess in this chamber such love for democracy, but who have kept the torch of human freedom alight on the basis of human brotherhood and good will between all peoples and all races of all creeds and of all colours.

Consequently I do not resent it one little bit when someone refers to me as a socialist, or to the group which surrounds as a socialist group. We are a socialist group, because we believe that the principles of democracy and those principles of human brotherhood that are at the very base of the religion which most of us profess are indeed the same as those which lie at the root of a political philosophy the basis of which is that of human brotherhood and good will to all mankind.

Mr. T. B. BARRETT (Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take up the time of the house very long, but as a farmer and a representative from an agricultural constituency I feel I must add my voice in protest against this bill.

The farmers in my part of the country are already restless under the controls which now exist, and they are fearful of seeing any more controls come into effect. They have seen controls lifted, and have seen other classes released from controls; and they fear that with this bill the chains which already bind them are going to be strengthened. They feel, and I agree with them, that we cannot live half bond and half free. That is why I am so much afraid that measures of this kind will in time lead to complete socialism and dictatorship. You cannot control one thing without its affecting a great many others. The farmers I know are demanding that the government stop their ears and steer away from this siren song of socialism.

As the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) pointed out this afternoon, too many ships of state have already been lured to their doom by those seductive strains. I fear that this bill will defeat the very purpose for which it is intended, namely to produce more foodstuffs for Great Britain. One needs only to look around Ontario today, to see the acres and acres of fat farm land that is growing nothing but weeds, to look at the acres and acres of good farm land being only half worked, to look at the thousands of young men who are leaving the farms and going to jobs where they can earn twice as much money for half the work, to realize the truth of what I am saying.

Look at the reduced production in many lines; and if more restrictions are put on the farmers it will result only in more restricted production. I feel—and I speak only for myself, although I am sure there are others on both sides of the house, in addition to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who feel the same—that this thing we are letting ourselves in for, this incipient socialism, is nothing but the beginning of a cancer. If at the beginning it is not destroyed, root and branch, it will continue to grow until it destroys us. To remove it will require a major operation, an operation which will be painful and which many people dread. But unless we do operate and root it out, it will destroy the way of life we now have.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the Minister speaks he will close the debate.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when last Monday evening the second reading of this bill was called I had thought I might save time by not speaking on second reading. I am afraid, however, that I really proved that the rules and customs which have been laid down through long years of practice are better to be followed. Probably it would have taken less time, had I spoken at the beginning of the debate on second reading, rather than now. I thought that because of the discussion we had on the resolution, most of what needed to be said at the beginning of the debate had already been said, and that therefore there was not much necessity for saying more. I find, however, I was mistaken in that; and probably mistaken in something else, that I had placed in the hands of the opposition the evening second reading was called an amendment which was suggested from the other side of the house, rather than from this side. That has caused a considerable amount of debate to take place on the second reading that probably might better have come in committee.

In view of the discussions which have taken place, I think it is necessary that I should say something before the vote is taken. I am not going to follow the criticism which was made this afternoon from this side of the house by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) other than to say that no one has suggested that anything which was done during the war period under the powers given by the orders in council that are dealt with in this legislation was part of Liberal policy or principle.

I have stated on previous occasions that the Liberal party was established in Britain for the same purpose that some other organizations are being established in these days; it was established during the last century for the purpose of trying to make wars unnecessary and impossible. It was not established for the purpose of conducting or prosecuting wars; it was established for the purpose of avoiding them. In other words, it had in mind that a situation would be created of extending among the peoples of the world the opportunity of trading freely with one another which would make war not only unnecessary but impossible. It may be that time has disappointed some of those who were strong advocates of that idea; nevertheless I think something has happened as a result which has been really beneficial.

When war did come in 1939 no one thought that war could be conducted under a condition where there would be freedom of exchange of goods as among the countries of the world. The first thing that had to be stopped was freedom of the exchange of goods among the countries of the world. It was stopped, not only by the armies but by every kind of regulation that could be put on to stop it. So we had to stop trading with countries with which we had previously been trading, and with which we have not yet got back to trading. I repeat that Liberalism was never established for the purpose of prosecuting wars and it cannot be utilized for the purpose of successfully carrying on a war when once we are forced into it.

An hon. MEMBER: We are aware of that.

Mr. GARDINER: If that remark was intended to reflect on the government, I am quite sure we made a better job of it than did the Conservative party in the previous war. During the war certain agreements were made, and may I say that those agreements were not made with a socialist government. The agreements which are before this house under this legislation were made at a time when the present leader of the Conservative party in Great Britain was in charge of the government and when the minister of food in that country, Lord Woolton, was one of the outstanding leaders of the Conservative party. Negotiations for the agreements which are before the house under this legislation were mostly between Lord Woolton and myself and our officials in London. They were then carried on later by his representatives and ours both in Ottawa and in London. I say to hon. members opposite and to hon. members on this side, who criticize Mr. Strachey and other members of the British government that they are not criticizing the persons with whom these agreements were entered into. These agreements were entered into with the government that prosecuted the war under the leadership of Mr. Churchill.

Having said that, may I call attention to some of the criticism which we have had, not only during this debate but at other times, with regard to the activities of this government. We have been told that during the war period we appointed too many boards. We have been told that this country should operate under a responsible representative system of government and that the ministers should take responsibility. I have sat in my place in this house during all the years of war and listened to the official opposition hammering Donald Gordon, for example, and suggesting that the powers which were in his hands should be in the hands of the Minister of Agriculture. I have heard hon. members on both sides of the house contend that the powers which were put in the hands of the different boards ought to be in the hands of the ministers themselves. Now, when some effort is made on this occasion to retain some of the responsibility in the hands of the ministers we hear nothing but criticism of that particular action from the official opposition.

Then both prior to and during the debate we have heard many statements to the effect that we should do away with compulsion, more particularly compulsion that is exercised by bodies outside the government itself. Again I say that in this debate we have heard a constant advocacy of the idea of setting up an independent board of some kind and giving to that board all the authorities which this bill places in the hands of the government itself.

Then it was said by the leader of the opposition, as reported at page 260 of Hansard:

I am sure also that the house will be pleased to know from the minister's statement that no extension of powers is proposed but rather an extension of time during which certain controls will continue, approximately a year, I understand. We will examine the measure very carefully with respect to the statement that there is not an extension of powers. I hope we will find that that is correct.

Almost every time that hon. members of the official opposition have been on their feet they have been advocating the extension of powers that were given to the Minister of Agriculture or to the different boards or to the government itself under the orders in council that were passed during the period of the war. So I say that this debate has somewhat surprised and astonished me in the course that it has followed.

Probably I should now ask some questions with regard to the measure that has been discussed continuously ever since this debate opened as the measure that ought to be adopted by the house. I wish to thank the hon. leader of the C.C.F. party for having read into the record certain clauses from the bill that was introduced into this house in 1934 by the official opposition. I should like to read into the record some of the proposals which have been made in this debate and which, it has been suggested, ought to be adopted. I am afraid that every member of the opposition voted for them last night.

We have had the suggestion made that certain things ought to be done in this house at the present time because farm organizations have asked for them. I have in my hand the model bill which the farm organizations have asked for. On the second page is a list of the names of the heads of most of the farm organizations in Canada, and then the short title of the bill is given as follows:

This act may be cited as the Farm Products Marketing Act.

Then under interpretation:

(c) "Marketing" means with respect to interprovincial trade within Canada or export trade, preparing for sale, buying and selling and offering for sale, or otherwise disposing of any farm product in any manner whatsoever, and includes its transportation in any manner by any person.

You could hardly have an interpretation of marketing which could be wider than that. Then it goes on to give the purpose and intent of the act as follows:

The purpose and intent of this act is to provide in respect to interprovincial trade in Canada and in export trade, for the improvement of the methods and practices of marketing of farm products, and for the promotion, control, regulation, or prohibition, of the marketing of farm products, in any or all respects and in whole or in part.

The next section is headed, "Establishment of schemes and marketing boards", and reads:

The governor in council shall establish a board to be known as the dominion marketing board.

It does not say that the farmers are to establish a board but the governor in council is to establish a board. Then it goes on to say:

(a) The board shall consist of such number of persons as the governor in council may from time to time determine, and each member shall hold office during pleasure and shall receive such remuneration—

Not such remuneration as the farmers decide to give him, but:

—as the governor in council shall determine.

Then paragraph (i) says:

(i) The governor in council may from time to time authorize payment to the board out of moneys to be appropriated by parliament of such sums of money as may be necessary to assist in the organization of local boards, to defray the operating expenses of the board incurred by it directly and any expenditure incurred or authorized by the board.

Then section 2 goes on to say:

(2) On recommendation of the board, the governor in council may, from time to time establish, amend and revoke schemes for the marketing or the promoting, regulation or prohibition of the marketing of any farm product, in the interprovincial trade within Canada and in export trade, and may constitute local boards to administer such schemes.

All of this is based on orders in council, as is customary with all such legislation brought before the house.

Then we come to the powers of the board in section 5:

5. (1) Without limiting the generality of any of the other provisions in this act, the governor in council may, subject to the provisions of this act and in respect to interprovincial trade within Canada and of export trade, vest in the dominion marketing board, any or all of the following powers:—

(a) To market or to regulate the time and place at which, and to designate the agency by or through which, any regulated product may be marketed; to regulate, control, or determine the manner of distribution, the quantity, quality, variety, grade, class, or size of the regulated product which shall be marketed by any person at any time; and to prohibit the marketing of any quantity, quality, variety, grade, class or size of any regulated product.

You can tell them that they cannot market their small potatoes and small apples; that they cannot market this and cannot market that. I am not saying that this is legislation which ought to be passed or ought not to be passed, but when members of the opposition talk about the powers given by order in council to boards or by order in council to ministers or by order in council to anyone, there is in this bill no power over the individual which compares with the powers proposed in the bill that was suggested to this house last night and was voted for by every member of the opposition who was then in the house. Then paragraph (h) gives the board power:

(h) To require full information relating to the marketing of the regulated product from all persons engaged therein, and to require periodic returns to be made by such persons; and to inspect the books and premises and vehicles of such persons.

Then paragraph (k):

All these powers and many more—the paragraphs exhaust the greater part of the letters of the alphabet up to (o)—can be brought into being and would be brought into being, not by any farm organization, but by order in council and would be put into effect by the government of the day. All I wish to say in that regard, in reply to the suggestion that under the present legislation wide powers are given to the government and the minister, and through the minister to boards, is that there are contained in this bill no powers which begin to compare with those contained in the bill that was proposed to set up a permanent marketing board.

In addition, criticism was made of the penalties. In this bill the penalties do not exceed $5,000, whereas in the model bill the penalties run from $25 to not more than $10,000.

Having said that with regard to the legislation that has been proposed, may I now say something with regard to the powers contained in the present bill which have been severely criticized by those discussing the bill. I agree with the leader of the C.C.F. party when he says that, in spite of the fact that these agreements are to be carried out with a British government which for the time being is socialist, this legislation is not socialist in most of its clauses. There may be some respects in which it may be termed socialist to a degree, but I quite agree that it is not the kind or type of legislation which the C.C.F. party, if they were in power in this country, would introduce into this house. It has in it some principles with which they agree and it deals with a situation now existing in a manner with which they agree, but it is not a bill which is based on the principles of socialism any more than the bill which the official opposition advocated in 1934 and advocated again last night is based entirely or even largely on the principles of socialism.

Mr. HACKETT: If the minister will permit a question, does he mean to suggest that by voting to refer the bill back to the committee the opposition upheld the principle of the bill?

Mr. GARDINER: It was made plain to the official opposition what the C.C.F. party had in mind when they introduced the resolution. That was clearly defined, and it was supported and voted for by the official opposition.

Mr. HACKETT: That is not an answer to the question.

Mr. GARDINER: It is a good enough answer for your purposes and mine.

An hon. MEMBER: Both political.

Mr. GARDINER: Both political. What is the first thing this bill is supposed to do? The first thing it is supposed to do is to complete the agreements made under order in council. I hope that anyone who has read the order in council setting up any of these boards will not try to argue that there are fewer powers in the orders in council than are contained in the bill. I shall read only one or two of them. In the first place, we are given power under the order in council with regard to the meat board, to set up a board, and I take the meat board because it covers more countries than just Britain. Section 3 of the order in council provides:

There shall be a board to be called the meat board consisting of four members—

The only difference there is that we state the number of members.

—of whom one shall be chairman and all of whom shall be appointed by the governor in council to hold office during pleasure.

Almost exactly the same words as are used in the model bill that was presented to us the other day. It goes on:

The chairman and other members of the board shall be paid respectively such salaries or other remuneration as may be fixed by the governor in council.

There we have the board set up. Then section 4 of the order in council deals with the powers of the board:

The board shall have power, subject to the approval of the minister and subject to the provisions of P.C. 9692 of October 22, 1942, as amended, and to section 2(3) of P.C. 8528 of November 1, 1941, as amended, to regulate the storage of meat . . . to determine the prices which shall be paid to packers or other persons for meat delivered for export in accordance with paragraph (a) of the section and for meat delivered in storage in accordance with paragraph (b) of this section; provided that with respect to meats secured for export in accordance with the requirements of the board, the price to be paid shall not exceed the price established for the various kinds and grades at the time such meat was taken into store . . .

(a) to regulate the export of meat pursuant to any contract or agreement for export entered into by the government of Canada or any agency thereof with any external government or any agency thereof, and to that end to arrange with or require any packer or other person to ship and deliver meat of the kind, quantity and quality specified.

The board has also power:

And so on. In other words, we set up a board or the governor in council sets up a board. We regulate storage. We regulate the price. We determine the price to be paid packers or others as hereinbefore provided and to establish the differentials in price. We have the power to fix the minimum price to be paid by packers or other persons for live stock and so on; to inspect meat delivered; to require any packer to consult from time to time with any advisory committee and so on down to (l):

to recommend to the wartime prices and trade board conditions to be attached to licences issued to packers by such board and the fees payable therefor.

And (n):

to make such rules as may seem expedient for the conduct of its business and proceedings not inconsistent with provisions of these regulations.

And so on down through another five or six regulations.

What I want to state with regard to it is this. Under those regulations we did not have the authority to go into the back yards, or if we did have the authority we did not exercise it. The kind of authority which we exercised in relation to agreements of that kind, whether it was with regard to bacon, cheese or whatever it was, was to go to the packing plants, the plants at which the cheese was made, the plants at which the other products were produced, at that particular stage, the secondary stage of their production, and by agreement at a price take possession of them and ship them to the markets where they were required under these agreements.

There are provisions in the bill to make it possible for us to enter into a new agreement with regard to apples and/or cattle or anything that we have been dealing with up to the present time. That was put there in the first instance to meet the very situations which have been discussed by hon. members of the opposition during this debate. We were asked by producers, mostly from Alberta, to arrange for quota shipments of beef cattle into the United States. We do not at the moment agree with the suggestion and I do not know that we shall agree with it at any time during the year.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. GARDINER: I have given my reasons why prior to this and I am not going to repeat them now.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We spend too much there.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not going to say any more tonight than I would have said last night about what we are going to do a year from now. As was stated by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), many things may happen during the next six or twelve months, and no one who is responsible for the administration of the affairs of government will commit himself, either in this house or outside of it, twelve months ahead as to what ought to be done at that particular time with regard to matters of this kind.

An hon. MEMBER: The farmers will not have much to say about it.

Mr. GARDINER: The second thing which is proposed in this act is to give the government the power to go out and make a new agreement with regard to apples and to have the authority to make new arrangements with regard to such matters as beef, if it is found necessary to do so, in order to take care of the situation in this country. But as far as I know at the present time we shall probably not change our mind with regard to sending quotas of beef into the United States, for the same reason I spoke of the other night. But there could be developments in our relationship with the Americans, from thoughts expressed to us by them, which might change our minds with regard to a matter of that kind.

Discussions have gone far enough to indicate why we have special provision made in the bill to take care of apples. I have not any hesitation in saying that if it is the will of this house—and I am speaking more particularly to the opposition—and if they want the provisions for dealing with apples and the provisions for dealing, if necessary, with cattle, or any other condition of that kind removed from this bill, I have not any objection to its being removed. It will take only one word to remove it, and that word can be put in when we come to the section where it can be put in, and it will remove entirely from the act any necessity for dealing with anything new in connection with this bill.

I say I am prepared to do that, and I have not any hesitation in saying why I am prepared to do that. The government have given every consideration to the representations which have been made to them through the Minister of Agriculture by producers of cattle and by producers of apples; and we have placed in the bill, as I said the other night, a degree of increased authority and power in order to make it possible for us to go that much farther. But if, when we get into committee, this house wants that power taken away, I am not going to battle in order to retain that position, in the light of what has been said in the discussions throughout this debate. We can have everything which is necessary to be done under the agreements which we have made, because every other one of these orders in council preparing for the setting up of boards, except that having to do with meat, confines our activities entirely to the United Kingdom and does not make it possible for us to do any trading under these agreements with any country but Great Britain. The meat order does make it possible for us to deal with other countries.

One thing which is necessary before we can deal with apples as we did deal with them during the war, is to have some authority with regard to interprovincial trade. We do not require any authority with regard to interprovincial trade in order to deal with the other agreements which were already made under the orders in council which we had during war time.

I want to state clearly, Mr. Speaker, to the members of the house that the one thing which involves principle in connection with this bill is the provision for carrying out the contracts which we have made, giving us the authority to change price levels and quantities in those contracts until we reach the end of the period covered by the contracts. In addition to that, we have said that we are prepared to come back here once a year and report on what has happened. We are not saying that we are not going to ask the house for an extension of these powers next year. We have said clearly that we likely shall be doing that because our contracts on meat, bacon, beef and cheese, as well as on other products, will run beyond March 31, 1948; and unless something happens which makes it absolutely impossible for this country and Britain to continue their contractual relationship, we shall be back a year from now asking for an extension of these authorities under the bill. But this house will have the power then to deal with them just as they have the power to deal with them now. However the principle underlying this bill, and the only principle which the government has been insistent upon putting into it and keeping in it, is the authority which is necessary to carry out the agreements we have made to deliver our surpluses of food to the United Kingdom. If we have this in the bill when it is completed, we shall consider that we have reached the objective we have in mind; and I would suggest that the bill be given its second reading.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, will you please call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion will say "yea."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed to the motion will say "nay."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the "yeas" have it. Call in the members. Before putting the question, may I ask hon. members to be good enough to keep silence during the vote in order that the work of the officers in charge may be facilitated. May I also ask every hon. member to remain standing until his name has been called by the clerk assistant so as to ensure that there shall be no mistakes during the taking of the vote.

(Text):

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1.

Mr. BURTON: I hesitate to bother the minister so soon after his making a comprehensive statement. Yet there is a matter concerning which I should like him to give us some clarification. Yesterday he made the statement that "there might be a possibility of doing that twelve months from now, if the proper boards were set up". Would he explain to the committee what action he intends to take so that necessary boards will be set up, or encouragement given to the setting up of the boards to which he has referred.

Prior to that, the minister had stated that in all provinces there was provincial marketing legislation. I suggest that the committee should know to what extent the minister intends to make use of the legislation in the provinces, and to what extent the minister and his department will give encouragement to the setting up of the boards to which he made reference yesterday. I ask this so that, when we come back here a year from now, we shall not be met with the same story that the time is too short and that the necessary boards have not been set up in certain parts of Canada to make use of a wider natural products marketing act, such as that which he intimated yesterday it would be impossible to have now, even if he wanted to have it. I may say he did not sound encouraging in that respect.

Mr. GARDINER: What I had in mind yesterday, and still have, is that there are only two boards I know of—although there may be some others affecting products for interprovincial trade—which can be utilized for the purpose of providing products which might be sent to the British market under the agreements. One of those products is apples, and I mentioned that in the discussion. There are apple boards which could perform the task of providing apples to fill the contract. In addition to that, tobacco has been organized in a similar fashion. However we have no agreement in respect of tobacco, and I do not believe there is any necessity for or likelihood of it. They deal with their own product, and will probably continue to do so.

What I said yesterday was that it would be impossible for us to turn over the task of supplying products such as bacon, cheese and, at the present time, even beans, or any of the other products for which we have agreements, to any producers board which now exists. I do not know whether it is possible for the farm organizations between now and a year from now to set up boards which could supply us with, let us say, bacon. I would have grave doubts as to whether it could be done. If there are no such boards to which we can apply for the products a year hence, we would require to come back and ask the permission of the house again to go on as we are, so far as bacon is concerned.

Hon. members are reasonably familiar with the situation with regard to apples and with regard to bacon. The situation respecting cheese is probably halfway between the two. In what I said yesterday I meant simply that, so far as the carrying out of these agreements is concerned, if there were suitable organizations to which the task could be turned over, we would have no objection to doing that. We have already utilized the apple boards in carrying out arrangements we have had with regard to apples. While we have not had an agreement with regard to tobacco, we assisted the tobacco boards in carrying out their negotiations during the war.

Mr. BURTON: The minister has not quite answered the question. I asked as to what extent he and his department were willing to cooperate with people in the various provinces who would be desirous of setting up boards in those provinces.

May I enlarge upon that. I am concerned with the fact that some sections of the country are in need of assistance to get their products properly on the market, and I have in mind particularly the potato growers. When I attended the conference recently of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, to which reference has been made, potatoes were mentioned To what extent would the minister's department assist in setting up a potato board in a province with which at a later time the national board could do business. There are other commodities in a similar position. In different parts of the country producers are concerned, but in many instances they require assistance and encouragement.

When the minister spoke yesterday he referred to the possibility of setting up these boards. My concern is that a year from now we ought not to be faced again with the statement that the time is too short, that the necessary boards have not been set up in the different parts of the country, and that, as a consequence, we can do nothing more than pass another bill similar to this one.

Mr. GARDINER: Yesterday the hon. member for Middlesex West spoke with regard to beans and suggested that the bean growers might be encouraged to set up a marketing board. In 1939 we placed upon the statute books an act under which farmers could organize to market their products cooperatively. That act provides that when any group of farmers anywhere in Canada desire to pool their product and market it cooperatively the government will guarantee an arranged upon advance to the farmers in the area, but that advance could not be more than sixty per cent of the average price for the preceding three years. I was looking in my file for the return that was brought down a few days ago indicating the number of organizations which have been set up under that legislation since 1939. It is not here. I know there is one in Saskatchewan which will be well known to the hon. member for Humboldt. This has to do with the marketing of alfalfa seed, fodder crop seed. This organization has operated ever since the act was set up in 1939.

This year the fur producers of Prince Edward Island set up an organization to market the furs raised on their ranches. I have a request from the minister of natural resources of Saskatchewan for copies of the act. He is making this request because of correspondence some of their people have had with Prince Edward Island with regard to the setting up of a cooperative to deal with that product. We have sent them the act and all the regulations and information as to how to go about organizing under it.

I must say that there were more of these organizations during the first year of the act than there have been since, but now that the war is over, inquiries are coming in and these organizations are being set up again. The bean producers or the producers of any other commodity can organize. If they did organize there is no doubt that we would take the beans from the organization to fill agreements.

Mr. MICHAUD: What are the main differences between this bill and the Agricultural Prices Support Act as far as powers are concerned? Is it contemplated that this bill should apply to products which are not under contract with countries like Great Britain?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know whether the hon. member was in the house when I spoke on the second reading, but at that time I stated there was a possibility that it might deal with products other than those covered by the agreements made under the orders in council. I shall not be in position until we get by the next section to say whether that is true or not. If there is to be an amendment to make it apply only to the agreements which we already have, then that must be done under the next section. If it is to apply to apples or to any arrangement that we might desire to make to send some beef, say to the United States or France or anywhere else, then we would leave the bill as it is and in that case there would be more authority than we had under the orders to the extent that apples would be included.

In so far as any other powers are concerned, the powers that are in here are copied from the orders in council which we had during war time. It is true that they are copied in general terms, but they must be if we are to be in a position to make a new apple agreement or other agreements. If not, then we can confine the operation of the act to the agreements now in existence.

Mr. MICHAUD: Perhaps I did not make my point clear. I asked how this bill compared with the Agricultural Prices Support Act, not the orders in council.

Mr. GARDINER: The orders in council have powers similar to those provided by the Agricultural Prices Support Act. I should repeat what I said when speaking on the amendment, that it is our hope that we can avoid bringing in the Agricultural Prices Support Act to apply in connection with any particular product so long as we can maintain the agreement which sets a floor price. But if for any reason we are not able to maintain the agreement to secure floor prices it will be necessary to bring in the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

Mr. BENTLEY: In answer to the hon. member for Humboldt and at other times during the debate, the minister pointed out that it would be impossible at this stage to prepare a marketing act which would carry out the terms of these contracts as well as this bill would. Answering the hon. member for Humboldt, the minister said he was not prepared to introduce a marketing act, nor was he prepared to say that it would be done next year. As was pointed out by my seat-mate, this may go on and on for ever and ever. I noticed that someone on the Tory benches stated that the minister could make contracts and then come to the house next year and say, "I have committed the country; you must pass this bill to make it valid." The result would be that we might never have a natural products marketing act.

On the other hand, if the minister were to take steps now to prepare one we would have it for this session or early next session and it would provide encouragement for a lot of people in the various provinces to go ahead and form the types of organization he has described. It could be used for that purpose and for other purposes as well. Will the minister tell us why he is so reluctant to give that necessary encouragement? That is all we ask. We do not want the minister to wait and make this an election promise at the next election; we would like him to indicate what he intends to do.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sure my hon. friend will agree that the Minister of Agriculture is not the government, despite what the official opposition say. It is absolutely impossible for me to tell the house what will be done with regard to any piece of legislation until that legislation has been considered by the government. It would be impossible for me to say here that we intend to bring down a bill next year or the year after or any other year. The bill has to be drafted and submitted to the government; it would have to be considered by the government before I would have any authority to say in this house or anywhere else that we intended to bring in a bill at any time. All I can say at the moment is that we have decided not to bring in one at this session.

Mr. NICHOLSON: A few weeks ago the minister made a statement in the house regarding the potato situation in the maritimes. Would he state under what authority he acted? Would he also tell us what quantities of potatoes are involved? What arrangements have been made to assure that no potatoes will be destroyed in the maritimes? Will he state whether surplus potatoes will reach the British isles under the order in council or whatever legislation the minister is acting under?

Mr. GARDINER: The arrangements were made under the Agricultural Prices Support Act by the agricultural prices support board. As I said yesterday in the discussion, that is the only product we have dealt with by agreement under the Agricultural Prices Support Act up to the present. During the war we had no agreement and gave no assistance with regard to potatoes because we thought the price was sufficiently high to permit of the potatoes being marketed at reasonable returns to the producers. But this year there is an enormous crop and a situation which is more difficult to deal with, so that we entered into an arrangement whereby on the first of May we would take a certain quantity of potatoes at a certain price. I have not the price before me at the moment and I should not like to quote it from memory, but the principle is that we take a certain quantity of potatoes at a certain price.

Our information was that a month ago there were some 5,000,000 bushels of potatoes or 5,000,000 hundredweight, I am not sure which, of a surplus, and we succeeded in selling what we thought was the greater part of them at the time to the British government, to be supplied entirely from Prince Edward Island. The reason for supplying them from Prince Edward Island was that certain restrictions were placed on the deal by Britain. Since then we have been asked to advance the time at which we would take the potatoes to the first of April. Up to the present we have not advanced the time and I am not in a position to say definitely whether the time will be advanced or not. We did make inquiries as to whether we could obtain potatoes for another purpose which I do not feel free to discuss at the moment. The report I have had is that we shall not obtain the quantity of potatoes required, and so I have concluded that there were not so many surplus potatoes in the maritimes as we thought there were a month ago.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I gather from what the minister has said that there will be no surplus potatoes wasted or destroyed in the maritimes, but that the surplus will be sent to the British market.

Mr. GARDINER: Or taken under the arrangement that we made to take the potatoes left at the first of May. But what we are going to do with them, if taken, I cannot say at the moment.

Mr. MICHAUD: In view of the remarks just made by the minister, I feel that I should give him some information which I gathered over the week-end. It is to the effect that there is a tremendous quantity of potatoes along the Saint John river not being marketed. What seemed to be the difficulty was a lack of refrigerator cars, but I understand that that situation has improved. I am morally certain that an enormous quantity of potatoes is available there and I think that possibly what the minister had in mind could be filled.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member (Mr. Michaud) has been pressing the position on behalf of the potato growers in New Brunswick for some time. All I can say at the moment is that, as a result of reports received, we have had inquiries made and have had men trying to locate a sufficient quantity of potatoes to make possible boatload shipments which we had thought we could supply to some countries, not Britain, but elsewhere, and the report I received was that, contrary to previous reports, there was nothing like the quantities we had thought were there.

Mr. MICHAUD: I shall be glad to communicate further with the people down there and try to get definite information for the minister.

Mr. WINTERS: Would the minister say why this bill excludes apples?

Mr. GARDINER: When the bill was drafted I had the idea that it did include what those who were interested in apples had in mind. I thought it did give us the authority to make a new agreement. That was one of the things complained about during the second reading. I thought that if we had authority to make new agreements we could make a new agreement with regard to apples. In addition, section 4 (3) provides:

> The minister may direct that any agricultural product designated by him may be purchased for the purpose of this act or the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, only from a provincial marketing board.

With those two authorities, one to make a new agreement and the other to purchase through the marketing board, I thought we would be able to meet the situation but I was told that it would not do so. During the war we had arrangements which necessitated getting agreements as between provinces and I was informed that there would have to be an amendment made to the bill. I have an amendment to propose to section 5 if it is desired to go ahead with the idea that we should make new agreements with regard to apples and possibly meats.

Mr. SENN: That raises another question. Has the minister under his hand the agreements now in force with Great Britain, the quantities to be delivered, the price, and the date of termination of the agreements? It would be helpful to have that information on Hansard.

Mr. GARDINER: I have a big file of orders here. It is quite bulky.

Mr. SENN: You have not a summary?

Mr. GARDINER: Not at the moment. I would not attempt to give the prices all the way through.

Mr. SENN: Can you give the date of the termination of the agreements?

Mr. GARDINER: I can say in general terms that we have an agreement on bacon which is in specific terms down to the end of 1948. For 1949 the price is not yet final, but the quantity, as I remember it, is the same as for 1948. The price will not be less than the price last year. It will not be less than $25 a hundred for bacon. That is the floor price. The new prices for 1949 are to be negotiated at the beginning of next year. This means that there is a contract for bacon and ham down to the end of 1949. Then there is a contract for beef, on the same principle, down to the end of 1949. There is a set price and set quantities down to the end of 1948. The beef agreement states definitely 120,000,000 pounds for 1949.

Mr. SENN: That is the minimum?

Mr. GARDINER: No; that is what we are aiming at.

Mr. SENN: They will take more?

Mr. GARDINER: They are satisfied they will take more, but they do not want to deal this far ahead with the actual price or the actual quantity they will require. They want to do that at the first of next year. The present agreement carries us down to the end of 1949. On cheese the agreement is until May 1, 1948. It is at twenty cents a pound, plus the subsidy. Whatever subsidy we are paying in that time the British have undertaken to pay. We must discuss, of course, in advance what the subsidy is to be here, and have some agreement on it. They are paying the subsidy for this year.

Mr. ROWE: Is it subject to change during the year?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but so far there has been only a change upward.

Mr. SENN: That is not a subsidy for quality?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: The present subsidy is thirty cents on milk entering cheese, and that is turned into so much per pound on cheese and is paid by the British.

Mr. SENN: They do not pay the premium?

Mr. GARDINER: The premium is paid out of the Canadian treasury.

Mr. TUSTIN: Is the minister in a position to say now that the thirty cents a hundred will be paid during the year 1947?

Mr. GARDINER: I made an announcement some time ago with regard to dairy products. Yesterday I made an announcement with regard to feed grain. We were not in a position to deal finally with dairy products until the feed grain arrangements had been made. Now they are made and we are working out the arrangement and we hope to make an announcement in connection with dairy products. I think I can say, without any fear of its not being correct, that there will not be any lowering of return; there will be a return equal to price plus subsidy.

Mr. TUSTIN: I am glad to hear that statement from the minister. I think it would be a great thing for this country, and for the production of cheese in particular, if he could make that statement so that the farmers of Ontario and Quebec, who are the great producers of cheese, could have it just as soon as possible. At the moment they do not know whether they are to receive that subsidy or not. Second, if the statement were made, they would know accordingly and would no doubt make arrangements to have their milk go into cheese products, which at the moment I do not think they are able to do.

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member will look at the announcement which I made yesterday, he will find that it reads as follows, as reported on page 1408 of Hansard:

> In any case in which a price increase or substitution of a price for a subsidy would have the effect of giving unwarranted profits to holders of stocks, such stocks will be purchased by the government at the old price and returned to the holders or sold at the new price. This procedure will make it possible to recover subsidy or prevent chance profits to the holders of stocks. I want to emphasize this point in order to discourage any hoarding in anticipation of increases in ceiling prices or withdrawal of subsidy that may take place in the future.

That was done in anticipation of the fact that we shall probably be making some increases in dairy products. That is what it was put there for; and the machinery for doing it would have to be worked out before we would announce what the position would be.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister say if the uncertainty as to prices has caused the great reduction in the production of cheese in the province of Quebec in the year just past?

Mr. GARDINER: I am sorry to say that I cannot agree with that, in spite of the fact that it has been repeated a great many times. A great many people are repeating that statement. I am quite sure that if the hon. member had been with me when I met the handlers of feed from Montreal last week, he would not agree that that is the only reason. I am not going to argue with him as to whether it has any effect at all on it, but the present position is that there could not be any more live stock fed. There is not the feed available with which to feed live stock to produce any more than has been produced. When you take the live stock that is produced for beef, bacon, pork, dairy products and others which have to be fed, and the birds which have to be fed for the production of poultry and eggs, there is not enough feed in Canada at the present time which can be distributed to where it is wanted to make it possible to finish the live stock we now have as they ought to be finished. Therefore it ought to be apparent that, no matter what the price situation had been, we could not have got more. The farmer who produced these products would probably have been better satisfied if he had had better prices, but there could not have been any more in total produced.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like to pursue this a little bit farther if I may. According to figures supplied from official sources, there was a very large reduction in the quantity of cheese produced in the province of Quebec. My question is: was that brought about in whole or in part by uncertainty as to the price of cheese?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, I do not think so; but it is an arguable point.

Mr. SENN: As a matter of fact, it seems to me it is brought about by the fact that the price of cheese has been too low under the British agreement. I had some figures, although unfortunately I have not them with me, to show that the twenty cents plus the premiums that are paid for quality, and the thirty cents a hundred premium or subsidy that is paid on milk, brings the price of milk which enters into the price of cheese up to only about $2.10 to the farmer; and that is the outside limit which the dairy branch here gives. That is not nearly enough to encourage the farmer in the production of milk for cheese. That seems to be the difficulty which the farmer is labouring under at the present time.

Mr. HACKETT: Is there any provincial aid included in that price?

Mr. SENN: Yes, there is in Ontario.

Mr. GARDINER: There is in Ontario but not in Quebec.

Mr. BENTLEY: A moment ago I asked the minister a question as to why he would not make a commitment, and he quite properly answered that he was not the government and could not commit the government. I accept the correction there. But in his reply he did say that the government had decided not to introduce a marketing act this year, or at least a comprehensive one. That indicates to me that the government at least had considered this at some stage in their proceedings or they would not have arrived at that decision. I am now going to ask the minister if he can tell us why the government has decided not to do that this year; not why the minister has decided not to do it, but why the government has decided not to do it.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason why the government decided not to bring it in this year was the one which I gave to the house.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Do you agree with them?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I agree with them or I would not have brought this bill in. The reason given was that you could not possibly handle the situation which exists this year under the type of marketing bill which we would want in Canada over a long period; and that if you had put on the statute books, in addition, any other marketing bill that we might approve at all, whether it conformed with the wishes of the opposition or not, it would only be putting a third piece of legislation on the statute books at the present time to deal with the situation. We have the Agricultural Prices Support Act which now makes it possible for us to keep a floor under any farm product, and it makes it possible for the government to do that by taking money out of the treasury. No farm organization could do that directly. The government must tax the people, take the money out of the treasury and utilize it for the purpose of doing certain things. We said, by act of this parliament in 1944—and that act is on the statute books—that we are prepared to utilize that act for the purpose of seeing to it that the farmer is not punished because he took the prices which he did take during the time we were controlling ceilings. I think that act must stay there; at least it must stay there as long as I am in the government. I am not substituting any marketing act for it. One of the reasons for that is this. I am in agreement with hon. members on the other side of the house, and on this side too, who have said that the farmer up to the moment has not received very much from price control. His prices were held down. From the other point of view, it is true that the prices of the things he had to buy were held down too.

Mr. ROWE: Not very much.

Mr. GARDINER: But he could not buy them. They did not exist. Those of us who wanted to buy farm implements, tractors and all the other equipment which a farm needs, could not buy those items throughout the war; and up until now we have not been able to buy them in the numbers which we want to. That being the case, we did not get the full advantage of the controlling of prices downward. When it comes to textiles, any farmer member knows that does not mean as much to farmers as it does to people engaged in other occupations in this country. Farmers wear overalls, work boots and rough clothing. They dress up once a week in other clothing and their suits last a long time. It is not the same saving for a man on a farm to have textiles held down for a period as it is to some other people; but even when the farmer wanted to buy textiles he could not, and so he has now come to the period when his clothing is worn out and his implements are worn down. My contention is, therefore, that the transitional legislation ought to see him through that situation; and our bill, which we put in to take care of that situation, ought to remain on the statute books and we should not substitute anything else for it, nor should we be transferring the responsibility of the Government to some farm organzation. The government should assume that responsibility until we have got through the transitional period.

That being so, I doubt very much whether I could draft a bill or have one drafted. I know I could not draft it, but I doubt very much whether I could state the principles to someone who would draft it in legal terms clearly enough to avoid doing harm to the legislation we already have on the statute books and which, I think, must stay there for a time.

Let me say, however, that we have not been idle in that regard. I instructed my officials, not this year, but two or three years ago, that we had representations from farm organizations, just prior to the war and again during the first year of the war, to the effect that this legislation would be wanted, that all the provinces have it, and that we ought to be working on the possibility of having a bill, though not necessarily the bill that has been proposed. I do not know whether I would want to introduce a bill like that. If we could get one couched in some other terms, which would do the job more to my satisfaction and, I believe, to the satisfaction of the majority of the farmers than even the legislation which the farmers' organizations propose, then I would bring that in rather than any bill which they suggest. I do not want it understood that we have not been giving thought to the question. We have had men working on it, and after having them working on it we have come to the conclusion that, no matter what bill we might desire to bring in, we would not wish to bring it in this year, and that necessitates our giving it at least another year's consideration.

Mr. CHARLTON: The hon. member for Dauphin last night—and it has been quoted tonight—stated on several occasions that the Natural Products Marketing Act passed by the Bennett government in 1934 was as bad as or even worse than this bill now brought forward by the minister. I wish to make clear, by quoting a somewhat different section from that quoted so far, that that is not the case. First, I wish to quote from the Natural Products Marketing Act:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, exercise the powers hereinafter conferred upon it, and shall advise the minister from time to time on matters pertaining to the administration of this act and regulations made hereunder.

The draft bill as brought forward by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture contains this provision:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, exercise the powers hereinafter conferred upon it, and shall advise the minister from time to time on matters pertaining to the administration of this act and regulations made hereunder.

Are not the two identical?

Mr. GARDINER: What was the first act from which the hon. gentleman quoted?

Mr. CHARLTON: The Natural Products Marketing Act of 1934, and next from the draft bill presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: Pretty much the same.

Mr. CHARLTON: Yet it has been stated in the house on different occasions, and by the minister himself, that it actually gives more power to the minister than the bill he is now introducing, which is entirely untrue.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, no. In the section just read there is pretty much the same language; but that bill gives authority, and so did the act of 1934, to go down and deal with the individual farmer and say to him, through a board, that he must deliver his product under the terms that were agreed upon by the local board plus the central board. If I remember correctly, the vote talked about in 1934 was more than a majority, probably 75 per cent, or 66⅔ per cent. The majority talked about was a two-thirds majority and not a bare majority; but, once a decision was reached, the farmer had to market his products in the way the majority wished. I say that is greater authority than is given in this particular bill, in any of its terms, to anybody to deal with the individual.

Mr. CHARLTON: That bill gave the authority to the producer groups, not to the minister and not to the commodity board.

Mr. GARDINER: The authority that went to the producer groups went from the minister through the board he set up.

Mr. CHARLTON: I have just quoted from the bill:

> The board shall, subject to the provisions of this act, exercise the powers hereinafter conferred upon it, and shall advise the minister from time to time on matters pertaining to the administration of this act and regulations made hereunder.

Advise the minister, not have the advice of the minister. Another section provides:

> All powers herein conferred upon the board for the marketing or promotion, control, regulation, or the prohibition of marketing of any natural product shall be exercised through local boards appointed as herein provided or through boards or agencies established under provincial law for similar purposes.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the 1934 act?

Mr. CHARLTON: That is the draft act.

Mr. GARDINER: Of 1934?

Mr. CHARLTON: No; that is the draft presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, containing practically the same powers as the act of 1934. I will now quote from the bill which the minister has brought forward:

> The minister may establish one or more commodity boards and may authorize and require a commodity board to exercise and perform all or any of the powers and duties of the minister under section 3 of this act with reference to such agricultural products as the minister may designate, but such powers and duties shall be exercised and performed by a commodity board subject to the direction and control of the minister.

It has been said, as I pointed out before, that the Natural Products Marketing Act of 1934 gave just as much power to the governor in council as this Bill No. 25. It does not. It puts power in the hands of producer boards, or the local boards as they are called. One section was read last night by the hon. member for Dauphin, but if he had read further he would have found that the governor in council was given authority as set out in these terms:

> On recommendation of the board, the governor in council may, from time to time, establish, amend and revoke, schemes for the marketing or the promoting, regulation or prohibition of the marketing of any natural product, in interprovincial trade within Canada and in export trade, and may constitute local boards to administer such schemes, and may vest in those local boards respectively any powers considered necessary or advisable to enable them effectively to market or to promote, control, regulate, or prohibit such marketing of any natural product, in any or all respects and in whole or in part.

And listen to this:

> Such schemes may only be established when evidence has been submitted to the board that the schemes are favoured by a satisfactory proportion of producers in the area affected.

I cannot understand the position taken by the C.C.F. in connection with this legislation, because it would appear to anyone familiar with the Regina manifesto that, as it stands now, this legislation is identical with what the C.C.F. party would want. But now they come along and want the producer boards to have control. That is not state control; it is farm control. Just what do they want? The hon. member for Dauphin also turned around and suggested placing power in the elected representatives, which would mean the governor in council. Is that not state control again? Let hon. members get together. One says one thing; another says something else. Last evening the hon. member for Middlesex West said the bean growers should have a central marketing agency. I quote his words from page 1443 of Hansard:

> I would ask the government if it would not be possible for them to negotiate a contract with Great Britain for a five-year period for white beans, just as has been done for wheat—

And listen to this:

> —the farmers to bind themselves under a central marketing agency to fill the contract.

That is what we have been asking for all along; producer boards. Let me quote a little further from the hon. member:

> We have this market in Great Britain if only we will help ourselves, and I think the government would cooperate with us in the sale of the commodity and not leave it to the dealers.

That is the very thing we have been trying to put across.

Mr. GARDINER: May I raise a point of order. I do not want to curtail the remarks anyone may desire to make, but this is the question we discussed for two days on second reading. I raise the question now, because I am quite sure if one speech on this matter is completed others will want to make speeches in reply, and I think we should have a ruling as to whether or not that is in order. The hon. member is discussing two bills which are not before the house at all.

Mr. GREEN: If I may say something on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, it has always been the practice in this house that on the first section of the bill very wide latitude is permitted, and I suggest that that rule should be followed in the discussion of this bill. Otherwise you would be changing the course that has been followed since I have been in this house, a matter of ten or eleven years.

Mr. GARDINER: But we are never allowed to discuss some other bill.

Mr. GREEN: I came here at the same time as the Minister of Agriculture, and certainly that course has been followed ever since we were first elected.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am afraid my hon. friend's recollection is wrong. That was done first in regard to the war appropriations, and it was very often done by consent on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, but as far as I know, it has never been the general practice.

The CHAIRMAN: My recollection is that when a bill goes to committee without discussion on second reading, wide latitude is allowed to permit a discussion of the principle of the bill on the first section.

Mr. GOLDING: By unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN: By unanimous consent of the committee, but in my experience it has been the general rule that, where the bill has not been discussed in the house, then in committee on the first clause wide latitude is allowed in discussion of the principle. But where second reading of the bill has been discussed in the house, I do not recall that further discussion of the principle is permitted in committee, except by unanimous consent; and even at that it is seldom done. I would say that the principle of the bill has been accepted by the house on second reading; that question has been settled and the principle approved. We are in committee on the bill and, according to the standing order, all discussion in committee must be relevant to the clause under consideration. I did not interrupt the hon. member for Brant because a number of other hon. members had transgressed the rule and gone beyond a discussion of the clause under consideration, but might I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he curtail his remarks as much as possible in order that we may get down to a discussion of the bill clause by clause.

Mr. GREEN: It is a funny thing that these objections are always raised when an opposition speaker has the floor. Through you, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the minister that we are getting along quite nicely with this bill, and I believe the hon. member should be allowed to go ahead with his remarks. He is not in the habit of taking a great deal of the time of the house; he knows what he is talking about, and I believe he should be permitted to continue.

Mr. GARDINER: The only discussion that has taken place from this side of the house has been my effort to answer questions asked from the other side, and by one member from this side. I only want to say I have no objection, and I do not think the Chairman would have much objection, to a discussion of this bill; but surely we are not going to have another discussion of the bill which was proposed last evening and defeated in this house.

Mr. GREEN: No bill was defeated.

Mr. GARDINER: The amendment which was defeated last evening proposed the bill which the hon. member has been discussing. He has been discussing a general marketing act, and the bringing of that in this session was defeated last evening.

Mr. MacNICOL: During the time I have been here, which is five years longer than either the Minister of Agriculture or the hon. member for Vancouver South, or yourself, Mr. Chairman, it has been the custom that on the first section of the bill very wide latitude has been allowed in discussion. I think we shall make more progress in that way, and I suggest that you allow the hon. member fairly wide latitude in saying what he believes is relevant to the first section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe I have allowed very wide latitude so far, but I think the time has come when we should be discussing the bill clause by clause. As the minister has said, if one speech is allowed to be delivered on matters outside the provisions of this bill, other similar speeches will be thereby provoked, and we shall never get down to a consideration of the bill itself.

Mr. CHARLTON: I was only endeavouring to answer accusations against this party which were made during the debate. I had spoken on second reading after the amendment was moved by the C.C.F., so that it was impossible for me to speak again. Therefore my only opportunity to answer those accusations was when the bill came up in committee of the whole. I am sorry if I have done anything against the rules, but apparently my remarks were having some effect.

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, no; it is not a matter of having any effect; it is a matter of trying to get through with our work.

Mr. CHARLTON: I was just going to read one more quotation from the speech of the hon. member for Middlesex West. Still referring to the beans, he said:

> Why should the state not handle this? After all, they are only the representatives of the country. We are a democratic country and, if we are not satisfied with the government that is in power, we have our redress at the next election because we can turn them out.

All I have to say in reply to that statement is that I am afraid it is not always the good fortune of farming or urban constituencies to be represented in this house by a man of the calibre of the hon. member for Middlesex West. If it were businessmen who were quite capable of handling the marketing of various products, and who were representatives in the house, I would say that probably it would be all right. But are not the members of producer boards infinitely better qualified to handle this than are most members of parliament? I believe so.

The amendment as suggested by the minister was brought forward under the assumption that it was the only group in Canada qualified to handle the problem. I just wish to point out that the Ontario apple growers are not represented or are not organized under the provincial marketing act of Ontario. I am not saying they would not be happy; in fact, I believe they would be very happy to let the British Columbia and maritime growers speak for them. But on the other hand, if that were true—and I believe it would be—would if not be possible for the Ontario hog producers, who have an organization some 31,000 strong, to speak for some of the other provinces which are not organized?

The minister made the statement that it would be utterly impossible to carry out these food agreements without this legislation. I contend that is utter nonsense, because it could be carried out. That is all I care to say at the present time.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Minister may sell or export agricultural products.

Mr. CHARLTON: Would it be possible to let section 3 stand, until we have discussed section 4?

Mr. GARDINER: If the hon. member wants to cut these two things out, I could cut them out by adding one word in section 3.

Mr. CHARLTON: I am not suggesting that it be cut out. But I think it would be better to let section 3 stand until section 4 is carried.

Section 3 stands.

On section 4—Commodity boards.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Provision is made in section 4 (1) for the minister to establish one or more commodity boards. The word "may" is used before the word "establish" which makes it permissive rather than obligatory. Then, further down, so far as I can see there is no provision made for any producer representation on the boards so named. I believe the representations made here were fairly unanimous to the effect that the producers concerned should have some control of or at least some say in the manner in which their products should be handled. Therefore I would move this amendment to section 4 (1):

> That subsection 1 of section 4 of said bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "(1) The governor in council shall establish one or more commodity boards with adequate producer representation and may authorize and require a commodity board to exercise and perform all or any of the powers and duties of the minister under section 3 of this act with reference to such agricultural products as the governor in council may designate; but in the exercise of such powers and duties a commodity board shall be subject to the direction and control of the minister."

The changes are two in number. First the word "may" is replaced by the word "shall", which makes it mandatory that the minister shall appoint the boards. The second change, and the one I consider most important, is that the words "with adequate producer representation" are included in the subsection. In this way it appears to me we shall be combining ministerial responsibility with producer representation on the boards. I believe the acceptance of this amendment would meet the wishes of all hon. members.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to go back over the old argument about the use of the words "may" and "shall", although I believe the last argument ended to the effect that "shall" is not used to make the requirement obligatory on the government, I believe that was agreed to by the hon. member for Lake

Centre at the time we discussed it before. I do not want to open up the argument again, but I can say that we have all the boards now. We have a meat board; we have a dairy board, and we have a special products board which covers all farm products in Canada. I do not know what other boards the committee would want to make me appoint. They are appointed, and we have been carrying on under them since 1939. I am quite sure we shall not change it.

Mr. BURTON: Then why has the minister this subsection in section 4 which states that the minister may establish one or more commodity boards, and may authorize certain things? If his explanation is the correct one, why did he not have a provision to the effect that the minister may make use of the boards already established?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That is the very thing you are asking.

Mr. BURTON: I suggest that the amendment offered by the hon. member for Dauphin is quite to the point. I recall well, as do other hon. members, the arguments which took place as to whether "may" should be "shall", or "shall" should be "may". But we have thought it would be more suitable to have "shall" in here.

However we are more concerned about the other part of the amendment, where it is stated that there shall be adequate producer representation. I submit this is a perfectly good amendment, and the minister should consider it.

Mr. GARDINER: In answer to what has been said, may I point out that the preamble states:

> And whereas certain orders and regulations were made by the governor in council under the authority of the War Measures Act and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, for the purpose of enabling Canada to carry out the said agreements; and whereas the said orders and regulations will expire on the 31st day of March, 1947. . .

And so on. They will expire, and the minister must have authority to reappoint on April 1. It will be the same boards, although there may be occasional changes in personnel. Persons may be dropped here or there. But I am sure that the president of the farm organization will agree that they have been consulted, that they have their representation on the advisory boards and that they prefer to have it in that way. I, myself, offered them the chairmanship of one of the boards, or the chairmanship of the advisory board, whichever they wished. They chose the chairmanship of the advisory board. No later than this morning the president of the farm organization was in my office arranging to have a meeting of the new advisory board in the first week after Easter. It advises us on all these things. Perhaps "advisory committee" would be a more exact term. It was their preference to be on that particular part of the organization.

We simply say here that we will reappoint the different boards we have had. We have authority under section 4 (3) to utilize the apple board or any other provincial board. We intend to take the apple board as the operating or administrative body to do that job.

I may say to hon. members of this committee something which they probably do not know. Statements have been made that the apple board had negotiated a contract with Great Britain, but the fact is that the apple board have been refused a contract with Great Britain on their own negotiations. I do not know whether we can resurrect it or not. After all, we must do business with our customer in the way our customer wants to do business, not just the way we want to do it. The British people do not want apples from Canada this year, and that is the position in so far as the British themselves are concerned.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why?

Mr. GARDINER: Because there is more food value when the same amount of money is spent on salmon or something else. They are short of food and they are short of money.

Mr. ROWE: It is not because of the board?

Mr. GARDINER: No; the government has lent them money and the government will go to them and say, "Look, this is causing some trouble in a certain part of Canada. This may be something that you desire to do." The question raised by them is which is best for the British people. Their argument at this time is that it is better to have food that is absolutely essential. They consider that better than to have apples which could be put in the stores with no points attached to them. The argument may be advanced that it would raise the morale of the people to be able to buy apples, but then there is the other argument that there is more food value in the salmon. Probably we could do with more salmon ourselves and dispose of some of our apples.

We go back to the British government and say, "After all, there is some money being lent by Canada to Great Britain." We do not need to say that; they know it. We say,

"It would be to the advantage of our people if you took some apples." I think we could argue that to better advantage than the apple people themselves and I think they realize it. We would have the board there to supply us with the apples, but they know we can make a deal more satisfactorily than they can. They come to us and ask to have something put in here so that we can go ahead and make a deal.

Mr. ROWE: Does the minister mean to imply that the government of Britain wishes to deal with the government here in preference to any producer board?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not implying that at all; I am simply saying that the British government, through their representatives, have written to the apple board and suggested that they have not sufficient Canadian dollars with which to buy the other commodities they want to buy and also buy apples. They have said that, through the negotiations and to get around a condition of that kind, the negotiations will be done by the government. The apple people realize that and that is why they want us to take it on.

Mr. ROWE: They do not want apples from the producer board but you can make a deal which will make them take the apples?

Mr. GARDINER: If it is possible the British people want to do things which will help Canada. If they can do something that will help us, they prefer to do it. In the first year of the war they did not take any apples. In the second year they did not want to take any, but we went to them and said that our farm producers just could not get by without selling some apples. In order to keep the industry in existence, the government was prepared to put them in cans and send them to Britain. We did that the first year. Then we dried some of them and sent some to Finland when Finland was supposed to be fighting on our side. We got rid of part of our apples the first year.

The next year we went to the British and said, "Can you take more of these apples?" They said, "We would like to because, if we can put a few apples in our homes, it will improve the morale of our people". Then we started talking about how they were going to finance it and we finally reached the position where we helped the British to finance it. As is known in the committee, we gave them a billion dollars one year and then we lent them a billion dollars.

Mr. ROWE: Not all to buy apples.

Mr. GARDINER: They bought apples with some of it nevertheless. These things have been going on for some years. The British representatives come in and talk about it. The position is that some of them feel it would be better to buy apples, while others feel it would be better to buy something else. We will consider our position and then say, "We just have no market for apples elsewhere and we think that probably everybody would be better served if you could take some apples". Discussions finally end up where everybody is satisfied.

Mr. SENN: This amendment raises the point I have complained about more than once, that there is no producer representation on these three principal boards which are handling the products going to England. I notice that there is a representative of the packers on the meat board, while on the dairy products board there is a representative of some of the shippers. The minister stated tonight, and he stated once before, that something in the way of membership on one of these boards had been offered to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I think he was correct in saying that they had refused, but the reason for their refusal is not what the minister conveyed to the committee. They refused because the federation of agriculture did not want their representatives to be in the pay of the federal government. They would then not be free agents to act in their capacity as officials of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: That is the reason I gave to the house before.

Mr. SENN: I did not hear you say that.

Mr. GARDINER: It is all in Hansard and you can read it.

Mr. SENN: I did not hear it.

Mr. GARDINER: It was not this year; it was when it happened. You will find in Hansard that the president and I discussed it.

Mr. SENN: The minister says that it was discussed, but I have no recollection of his giving that as the reason.

Mr. GARDINER: I think that is possibly where you got your information as a matter of fact.

Mr. SENN: No, I got my information from an entirely different source. It is a reasonable request that has been made by the hon. member who introduced this amendment, that there should be producer representation on these boards.

Mr. GARDINER: The statement that there is no producer representation on the boards is just along the lines of the discussion that took place between the president of the farm organizations and myself. Anyone who was a farmer at one time and is taken into the government service on a full-time job ceases to be acknowledged as a farmer representative after he is here for three or four years. If that is the basis upon which the statement is made that there is no farm representation, then it is correct. But if you take some of the members of these boards and go back to when they started you will find that they started as farmers. Mr. Taggart is chairman of the agricultural prices support board. He started as a farmer. Then he was a farm representative in Ontario. Next he was a teacher in an agricultural school in Alberta. Next he ran an experimental farm for us at Swift Current. Then he was minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan. Following that, he was chairman of the meat board. Mr. Taggart has been working with farmers all his life, but many people would say that he is a long way from the plough, that he is not a farmer. Now he has been put on as chairman of the agricultural prices support board.

The other two men who have been taken on that board are both farmers; they are both operating farms. One of them happens to be the secretary of the dairy association in Ontario, but he still operates a farm. The other is a farmer in Quebec who still carries on his farming operations. So that the board is actually made up of farmers. I could take you through the other board and point out pretty much the same thing.

Mr. SENN: Then there should be no objection to the suggestion.

Mr. GARDINER: There are representatives on now.

Mr. BURTON: I do not wish to get into a discussion of personalities, but at the same time I think certain statements the minister made need answering. He referred to Mr. Taggart as the chairman of the meat board. Anything I have to say of Mr. Taggart is not of a personal nature. While Mr. Taggart in all probability was on a farm at one time, certainly he is not what is designated here as a representative of the producers.

Mr. GARDINER: That is what you would say about anyone we chose.

Mr. BURTON: In drafting this amendment we tried to keep away from tying the minister down too tightly, which would give him an opportunity afterwards to complain. What we had in mind was that the representation on that board should be acceptable to the organized producers of the commodities being controlled by the board. That is what we meant by adequate representation, that if they were not actual producers themselves at the time, they would still be acceptable as representing the organized farmers raising any given commodity. In the light of that, I think the amendment is right to the point.

Mr. McMASTER: I would ask the minister why the Agricultural Prices Support Act is referred to in subsection 2 and 3, and whether he has considered that, by so doing, the act may be declared unconstitutional in view of what happened to the Natural Products Marketing Act of 1934, which was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada and by the privy council.

Mr. GARDINER: There is authority in the Agricultural Prices Support Act for setting up commodity boards, and that act has been declared intra vires. This bill simply says that if we have a board set up under the Agricultural Prices Support Act we can use it in administering this act. The same is true of subsection 3 with regard to any boards that may be set up by farmers themselves.

As to the amendment, I have not had time to read it carefully because I have been listening to the discussion, but I am quite sure that in practice it would not change the situation at all. The only objection I have in submitting the amendment to the committee is that these bills are carefully drafted by experienced draftsmen, and I cannot say at the moment whether the wording of the amendment would affect some other section in some way that has not been considered. The only way in which I could consider it would be to let the amendment stand until I have had an opportunity of discussing it with the officials. There is no possibility of my accepting it now, and if a vote on it were taken tonight we would have to vote it in or out.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It is quite agreeable to me to let the amendment stand over for consideration by the minister.

Mr. STEPHENSON: The minister gave the house the impression that the British government did not want to deal with the apple growers.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. STEPHENSON: You said that.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not going to have words put into my mouth. What I said was this. The apple growers have already been refused an agreement. I did not say that they did not want to deal with them.

Mr. STEPHENSON: They have been refused an agreement to sell apples to Great Britain.

Mr. GARDINER: The British government have, by letter to the apple growers board, indicated that they do not desire to buy apples from Canada this year.

Mr. STEPHENSON: You say they do not want to buy apples this year? The impression you gave was that they would not purchase from the board.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not say any such thing.

Mr. STEPHENSON: That was the impression left.

Mr. GARDINER: It was not the impression intended to be left. You are not thinking straight.

Mr. ROWE: I got the same impression, and the minister cannot wisecrack it off by saying that the hon. member is not thinking straight. He is thinking just as straight as the minister himself. The minister should clear up that point.

Mr. GARDINER: I have cleared it up. The suggestion is absolutely wrong.

Mr. ROWE: The minister left the impression that the apple producer board had been refused an agreement with Britain this year. Then he went on to say how the government had talked with the British, and evidently the apples tasted a little sweeter because they were going to be dealt with through some new-fangled board for which the minister was responsible.

Mr. GARDINER: The apple producers asked us to take the matter up with the British government and we have done so.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that subclause 1 of clause 4 stands? Does subclause 2 carry?

Mr. FULTON: The minister indicated on the second reading that he was prepared to move an amendment to section 5. The purpose of the amendment, as I understand it, was partly at any rate to provide that dealings in apples would be carried on through some sort of board. I am wondering whether the amendment which the minister said he would propose to section 5 will have any bearing on subsection 2 of section 4. If so, would it be acceptable to him for the whole of section 4 to stand over until we can consider the amendment he intends to move to section 5?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no need for section 4 to stand on that account. Subsection 3 of section 4 is a general provision which says:

> The minister may direct that any agricultural product designated by him may be purchased for the purpose of this act or the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, only from a provincial marketing board.

That could apply to other things. It was intended to apply to apples, but I thought it should be there whether we deal with apples or not.

Mr. LOW: It was on that section that I should like to say just a word and perhaps move an amendment which the hon. minister may wish to study until tomorrow, as he has indicated it is his desire with respect to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Dauphin. Last night I mentioned that it was our desire to see the minister recognize the producer marketing boards as a source of supply. We realize, too, that there are not many marketing boards or producer boards in Canada. In Ontario I think there are only about ten. My advice is that there is only one in operation in Alberta and, in British Columbia, perhaps only two, and so it goes. But wherever they do exist, it seems to me that the minister should direct that the materials which he wishes to purchase for his commitments abroad should be purchased through these producer boards, or, in the alternative, from the provincial marketing boards. We feel that, wherever recognition can be given to these producer boards as sources of supply, it should be given, because it encourages them and helps to keep some control of the price right at the source of the product itself. Therefore I am going to move, seconded by the hon. member for Camrose:

> That clause 3 of section 4 of the bill be deleted, and the following be substituted therefor: "Wherever producer marketing boards exist the minister shall direct that any agricultural products required by him for the purposes of this act or the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, shall be purchased from such producer marketing boards or from provincial marketing boards."

Mr. GARDINER: Why put the minister in at all?

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. LOW: I did not hear the minister's question.

Mr. GARDINER: If you say "they shall be purchased", and if it is the desire to have the act say that, the minister does not need to have anything to do with it.

Mr. FULTON: That might not be a bad idea.

Mr. LOW: The minister, either by himself or through some agency which he designates, must purchase the products required to fill these agreements. Is that not so?

Mr. GARDINER: We shall take that amendment under consideration until tomorrow.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 4 will stand.

Mr. JOHNSTON: As subsection 3 stands in the bill, it says "the minister may direct." There has been some argument in this house in the past as to whether or not the words "may" and "shall" are interchangeable in the legal sense.

Mr. GARDINER: We had that argument tonight while you were out, apparently.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I did not hear that part of the discussion. Maybe the minister could assure me that they are not interchangeable. Are they interchangeable?

Mr. GARDINER: I shall bring along with me tomorrow the opinion that was given to me by the Clerk of the House after we had discussed this matter before, which was taken from the best authorities there are, and which was to the effect that I was right before. I shall bring it along again tomorrow, if it is the desire to go over that argument again. Every leader of the opposition over the last twelve years since I have been in the house has finally agreed that the decision was right. The legal adviser of the present opposition agreed, the last time we discussed it, that it was right.

Mr. JOHNSTON: That the words are interchangeable?

Mr. GARDINER: That "may" is the word used when a government is being directed. They mean the same thing.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Before we go on from section 4, I should like a little explanation of subsection 3 where it uses the terms "only from a provincial marketing board." In British Columbia we have a provincial marketing board which is an over-all, more or less regulatory board, controlling to some extent the actions of the other boards if they are against the common interest. In addition, we have a fruit marketing board and vegetable marketing boards. Which of those boards is indicated in the term "provincial marketing board"? Our provincial marketing board really only performs certain general functions, and has nothing to do with direct marketing.

Mr. GARDINER: It is with a small "p", a provincial marketing board. There may be a dozen in one province dealing with different products.

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. PEARKES: Might I ask one simple question. Is there a definition of agricultural products? I should like to know whether honey is included.

Mr. GARDINER: The definition is at the top of page 2, section 2 (a) which reads:

"Agricultural product" means any product of agriculture, except wheat, and includes "feeding stuff" within the meaning of the Feeding Stuffs Act, 1937.

Mr. PEARKES: Would that include honey?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, I think so.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 4 stands. Shall clause 5 carry?

Mr. BURTON: The minister was going to move an amendment.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a new clause 5. Since clause 3 and clause 4 are going to stand, Mr. Chairman, I think we had better allow clause 5 to stand also.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

PRICES AND TRADE BOARD

RESIGNATION OF DONALD GORDON AS CHAIRMAN—APPOINTMENT OF K. W. TAYLOR

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement regarding the chairmanship of the wartime prices and trade board which, because of its importance and interest, I have felt should be given in the first instance to parliament.

After five and a half years of service as chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. Donald Gordon has asked to be relieved of his duties in order to return on a full time basis to his position as deputy governor of the Bank of Canada. The recent appointment of Mr. Graham F. Towers as Canadian executive director of the international bank for reconstruction and development lends a certain urgency to Mr. Gordon's request.

The government, after careful consideration, has reached the conclusion that plans for the orderly decontrol of prices are sufficiently advanced to make it possible to meet Mr. Gordon's wishes without the public interest being adversely affected. Mr. Gordon's resignation has accordingly been accepted to take effect on April 15. He will be succeeded as chairman of the wartime prices and trade board by the now deputy chairman, Mr. Kenneth W. Taylor. Mr. Taylor has been with the board since its establishment in 1939.

I should not like the acceptance of Mr. Donald Gordon's resignation to pass without expressing the government's deep appreciation —which I am sure will be shared by hon. members of both Houses of Parliament—of the exceptional contribution made by Mr. Gordon, as chairman of the prices board, to the effective economic mobilization of Canada's resources during the war and, since the termination of hostilities, to an orderly transition to a peacetime economy in our country.

The success of Canada's campaign against inflation during the war and in its subsequent control owes very much to the untiring devotion, integrity and courage displayed by Mr. Donald Gordon in the discharge of the arduous duties of chairman of the wartime prices and trade board. I feel I may speak for the Canadian people as a whole when, at this moment of his retirement, I express to Mr. Gordon our thanks for the invaluable service he has rendered our country at a time of its greatest need.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this occasion should be allowed to pass without someone on this side of the house associating us with what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said. I feel that Mr. Donald Gordon has been subjected to a great deal of criticism and sometimes we felt that the criticism might have some basis. However I believe the whole country has been well served by the job Mr. Gordon has done, and I am pleased to associate this group with the expression of appreciation voiced by the Prime Minister.

7. If so, who are they and what is the amount of fees or other compensation paid or payable to each of them?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This again is one of the questions to which I referred a moment ago. While there is no objection to giving the information asked for by the hon. member before the committee on railways and shipping, I am placed in the same position as I was the other day with reference to the hon. member for Temiscouata, who very kindly consented to await the sittings of that committee for the information. I wonder if my hon. friend would not do likewise.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not see any reason why I should wait for that information. After all, sometimes we have to wait a considerable time for answers to questions. I have waited since February 3 for an answer to one question, and I see no reason why this one should not be answered.

83166—97½

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If the question stands it will stand until the sittings of the committee, because it is a matter that concerns the internal management of the railway. It has not been the practice to answer these questions in the House of Commons when the information is fully available before the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let it stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let it stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member insists, question stands.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—HALIFAX—PROPERTIES UNDER LEASE TO PRIVATE PERSONS

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. What is the location of each property in the electoral district of Halifax owned by the national harbours board which is presently under lease to private persons?

2. What is the annual amount of each such lease?

3. Have any requests been made by any municipal corporation in the electoral district of Halifax for information regarding such leases which would enable such municipal corporation to make an assessment for taxation purposes?

4. If so, what was the nature of such requests?

5. What action, if any, was taken by the national harbours board in relation thereto?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry to be getting up continually, but this is another question which affects an agency or corporation of the government. The national harbours board inform me that the information asked for would be almost impossible to obtain because they have no control over the occupiers and the amount of space each party occupies. There is a continual fluctuation, and for that reason they are unable to give the information required.

Question dropped.

OLD AGE PENSIONS—YUKON TERRITORY

Mr. LOW:

1. Does the federal government pay old age pensions to residents of the Yukon territory?

2. If not, what are the reasons for such pensions not being paid?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. No.

2. For the purpose of the Old Age Pensions Act the word "province" includes the Yukon territory. Under the provisions of the act a province may decide whether or not it will make an agreement with the dominion for the payment of old age pensions and pensions for blind persons. The authorities in the Yukon territory, which, for the purpose of the Old Age Pensions Act, is considered to be a province, have never made an agreement and consequently old age pensions and pensions for blind persons have never been paid in that part of Canada.

WHITEHORSE FEDERAL BUILDING

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

When is the federal building for which plans were drawn by the government in 1946 to be constructed at Whitehorse, Yukon?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): Plans were prepared in 1946 and work will commence when labour and material are available.

TRANSPORT CONTROL—MAXIMUM LOADING ORDER AND PENALTY DEMURRAGE

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Have the railroads filed with the board of transport commissioners an application to incorporate emergency orders T.C. order 04F (maximum loading order) and T.C. order 18F (penalty demurrage), in tariff CFA, No. 67?

2. Was this tariff an emergency order that came into being as a wartime measure?

3. Has the board of transport commissioners taken any action to make this measure permanent?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think I can reply orally to this question by telling the hon. gentleman that the Railway Association of Canada have filed with the board of transport commissioners an application such as is mentioned in the first part of the question to continue the emergency orders of the transport controller. In view of the extension which was given yesterday to the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act 1945 until May 15, the transport controller will continue to exercise jurisdiction over these orders during this extension.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

SUGAR

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. From which countries was raw cane sugar imported into Canada during the period between September 1, 1945, and August 31, 1946?

2. How many pounds of 96° raw cane sugar was imported into Canada from each of those countries during the period September 1, 1945 to August 31, 1946, inclusive?

[Mr. Martin.]

HOUSING—VETERANS—CAPE BRETON

Mr. GILLIS:

1. How many buildings for veterans have been contracted for on the island of Cape Breton, Nova Scotia?

2. How many are in the course of construction?

3. Have any been finished and turned over to the veterans?

4. Is there a time limit in the contracts for the completion of the buildings?

5. What is the average cost including the land for veteran's buildings in that area?

6. What amount of moneys has been paid to date with regards to search of titles and completion of the necessary papers?

7. Are the solicitors who are carrying out this work ex-servicemen? If so, what are their names?

POSTAL SERVICE

REGULATIONS GOVERNING MAIL DISTRIBUTION AT WICKETS

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I should like to answer a question which was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). Regulation No. 256 of the Canada official postal guide, 1947, states:

No information can be given respecting letters which pass through a post office, except to the persons to whom they are addressed, and to the senders when inquiring respecting delivery. Postmasters are not permitted to furnish any information respecting the names or addresses or the financial standing or reputation of patrons or former patrons of their respective offices.

We have communicated with the postmistress and she is going to answer in writing. I have not received the answer as yet.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CAPITAL ASSISTANCE TO PRIVATE FIRMS

Mr. HATFIELD:

For a statement showing the total amount paid, since September 1, 1939, by the government of Canada or any of its agencies by way of capital assistance to private firms, the statement to show the firms to which assistance granted and the total amount granted to each firm.

Mr. McILRAITH: The subject matter of this motion is covered by an order which was passed in response to a question asked by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). The arrangement was that this motion should stand until the other papers were tabled. I expect that that will be done in a few days.

Motion stands.

ATOMIC ENERGY—REPORTS OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES ON CONTROL COMMISSION

Mr. MENARY:

For a copy of all reports made to the government by the Canadian representatives on the atomic control commission.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, I have on previous occasions asked the hon. member if he would allow this motion to stand. The report of the atomic energy commission has been before the security council; the discussion of it has just been completed, and we are preparing a statement along the lines of the motion. The hon. member was kind enough to say that he would allow the motion to stand until that statement was made, to see if it would not sufficiently fulfil his requirements.

Mr. MENARY: I am agreeable to that being done.

Motion stands.

HOUSING—VETERANS LAND ACT

Mr. MURPHY:

For a copy of all correspondence, contracts or agreements, or other documents in lieu of agreements entered into by the government, or any department or agency of the government, between January 1, 1943, and February 25, 1947, concerning veterans' homes and holdings, in each province, for each area where three or more homes have been built under Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Speaker, to comply with this motion would involve making copies of documents which are 580 inches thick, over 48 feet, and comprise 116,000 folios. It has been estimated it would take one typist fifteen years to do the work. The cost of producing it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. TUCKER: I am giving the estimated figures of the cost of complying with this motion; surely hon. members do not object to that. Such cost would be $17,500. I suggest that if the hon. member desires specific information he indicate what he desires, or reframe his motion to ask for something definite. As it stands, to comply with it would involve a tremendous expenditure of labour and money. Perhaps he will permit it to be dropped.

Mr. MURPHY: I would like the motion to stand. I am quite agreeable to that being done. As to the expense involved, that would probably be much less embarrassing to the government than the answer would be.

Mr. TUCKER: It is not a question of its being embarrassing at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. It is against the rules to debate the question. The motion will stand.

Motion stands.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTIES IN HALIFAX COUNTY

Mr. McGREGOR:

For a statement showing the location, area, present valuation and present use of all lands and premises owned by the dominion government, and any of its agencies or crown corporations, including the national harbours board, in the constituency of Halifax, and indicating also the municipality in which such lands or premises are located.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word on this motion. It calls for:

A statement showing the location, area, present valuation and present use of all lands and premises owned by the dominion government, and any of its agencies or crown corporations, including the national harbours board, in the constituency of Halifax, and indicating also the municipality in which such lands or premises are located.

Surely that asks for far too much in the way of research by government departments. It would involve a tremendous amount of time and labour on the part of officials and of expenditure of public moneys. If there is any particular information the hon. member desires, that could be prepared readily, every effort would be made to supply it, but it does seem to me that as the motion now stands the government is being asked to make an expenditure out of all proportion to what is justifiable and I would suggest that the hon. member allow the motion to be dropped, and substitute, if he wishes, a motion with respect to some specific matter on which he wishes to get information.

Mr. HACKETT: Is it not limited to Halifax?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No; I asked about that.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is meant to be, I think.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It says:

. . . and any of its agencies or crown corporations, including the national harbours board, in the constituency of Halifax.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is a comma after that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member is asking with respect only to public lands and buildings in Halifax, then let him reword the motion. As the motion stands it is at least capable of being construed as requesting information on practically everything the government of Canada owns.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is beginning to own everything now.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. McGREGOR: For the time being.

Mr. GRAYDON: I take it that the motion is dropped strictly without prejudice to the hon. member putting it on the order paper in reworded form?

Mr. SPEAKER: I asked the hon. member if I should say "dropped."

Mr. McGREGOR: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I said dropped for the time being.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped for the time being? It is dropped, then.

Motion dropped.

GARLAND, MAN., POST OFFICE

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memoranda or other communciations exchanged between the post office department and any persons or organizations since January 1, 1946, in connection with the post office at Garland, Manitoba?

ELDORADO GOLD MINES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of the evidence taken in connection with the investigation of Eldorado Gold Mines Limited and an alleged conspiracy by Carl French, Marcel Pochon and Boris Pregel to defraud the said company and the report by the commissioner, Mr. Glassco in connection therewith.

Mr. HOWE: I would point out to my hon. friends that the documents requested are not at present in the possession of the government. If they come to hand they will be examined and I assume that at that time there will be no objection to the motion passing. I cannot say, however, when the documents will come into the hands of the government.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Are not these documents in the hands of the government by way of its counsel?

Mr. HOWE: I cannot say as to that. I do not know just what the practice is with regard to evidence, but I do know that the report of the special commissioner has not yet reached the government.

Motion stands.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

COAL SUBSIDIES—NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. GILLIS:

1. For a copy of all correspondence, reports and other documents received by the Department of Finance from January 1, 1947 to date, relative to the application for increased coal subsidies on American coal imported into the province of Nova Scotia.

2. A statement showing the names of firms in Nova Scotia to whom such subsidy is paid.

3. A copy of the original subsidy agreements between the wholesalers in Nova Scotia and the dominion government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSING OF LAKEVIEW, ONT., LONG BRANCH CAMP —USE FOR HOUSING PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence, notice of which I gave him this morning. In view of the fact that it is reported that the Long Branch camp situated at Lakeview, Ontario, is about to be closed down, will the department give consideration to having that space and accommodation made available to relieve the acute housing shortage at that point?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): The department will not only give consideration to what the hon. member has suggested, but it is already doing exactly that. This camp is at present being used as a demobilization depot and the land and part of the buildings will be used for reserve training purposes in the future, but as buildings have successively been given up by the army they have been made available as emergency shelter. For instance, the C.W.A.C. barracks were handed over on September 12, 1946, and the first building of the small arms training centre was handed over on December 5, 1946. Other buildings were handed over early in January. At the present time it is expected there will be some seventeen further buildings handed over for use as emergency shelter within the next two or three weeks.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs with relation to the setting up of the standing committee on external affairs. A week or so ago he mentioned that the government had not yet decided whether the estimates of the Department of External Affairs would be sent to that committee for consideration as was done last year. Has the government reached a decision on that point? The house has been sitting for nearly two months and this important committee has not yet held its first meeting.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The committee was established by the house. It is the privilege of any member of the committee to ask that it have a meeting and have notice given. The government has been pressing as urgently as possible for consideration of the legislation that until yesterday had to be dealt with before March 29, and I did not think it was proper to ask the house to deal with other matters until that was disposed of. But if the members of the committee on external affairs want to have a meeting, the rules provide how it can be done. There has not yet been any matter before the house with respect to estimates, and I have felt that in view of the co-operation that had been obtained from all parties in the house with respect to emergency legislation it would not be well received to try to take the attention of the house away from that emergency legislation to deal with other matters which have not to be dealt with before a set date.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think my point has escaped the minister. Does the government intend at some stage to refer the estimates of the department to that committee?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The government does not intend to refer estimates to the committee. If they are referred to the committee it will be done by the house itself. The estimates are before the house to be disposed of by the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: That means that the government has no particular line of its own to follow in connection with it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The government has prepared estimates for the consideration of parliament. If the house wishes these estimates to be considered in committee of the whole house, that will be done. If the house prefers to have the external affairs estimates considered by a certain number of its members in a select committee, the government will have no objection.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is what I regard—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have not yet received an answer to my question; it is just an evasive answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that when the Speaker calls an hon. member to order he should resume his seat. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I cannot permit a debate on this question.

CIGARETTES

DESTRUCTION BY MOUNTED POLICE OF GOODS ILLEGALLY IMPORTED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. I have been reliably informed that from time to time large quantities of cigarettes which have been smuggled into Canada and confiscated by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are burned by members of that organization. In view of this apparent waste of goods will the minister consider having these cigarettes distributed in the future to hospitals of the Department of Veterans Affairs for the enjoyment of veteran patients?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): It has always been the practice of the Department of National Revenue to destroy cigarettes and liquor which have been seized.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McCANN: I will admit that that may not have been a popular move. During the years of the first and second wars seized cigarettes were turned over to the Red Cross for distribution among soldiers as they saw fit. About nine months ago we received a notification from the Red Cross that they would wish us to discontinue that practice; therefore we have reverted to the former practice of the department of destroying seized cigarettes.

I may say that after the first war there was a request from some military hospitals that cigarettes and liquor be turned over to them. That was done in a few instances, but we found that such abuses crept in with reference to the distribution that it was advisable to discontinue the practice, and we have again reverted to the practice of destruction, which we intend to continue.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is it consumption or distribution?

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES

COST OF AIRCRAFT "NORTH STAR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. On February 4 the minister said that about the middle of February he would be able to tell the house what the North Star cost. Can he tell us now?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I can tell the hon. member now that the cost has been determined within the last two or three days. I suggested to hon. members that if they would allow the business to be completed in an orderly way I should be glad to make a statement of the whole transaction at the appropriate time. I am now ready to make that statement, and shall do so the next time questions are called.

INCOME TAX

ARREARS, INTEREST AND PENALTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of National Revenue. On March 17 I asked him a question in regard to an answer which was given to the inquiry as to the amount of income tax, interest and penalties in arrears during the years 1939 to 1945 inclusive. If I understood him aright at that time he said he would take the matter into consideration and furnish such information as was available. Is he now in a position to give the information asked for?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): I am not in a position to give the information which was requested, but officers of the department are making every effort to secure the information. I may say that it will entail a great deal of work, because the records of the department have not been kept in such a way as to indicate offhand what the penalties, arrears, and interest charges have been. But we shall diligently try to secure a satisfactory answer for the hon. member.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am sure it will be a simple matter for the department to furnish from their books the amount of income tax owing without the penalties. I would ask that the amount be furnished by districts. Leave out the penalties and the interest. Just give me the amount of income tax that is in arrears. That should be a simple matter.

UNITED NATIONS

BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF—INTERNATIONAL TRADE CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that he has not been given notice of this question perhaps he will accept it as a notice and give an answer tomorrow. Will the minister arrange to have printed as an appendix to the Votes and Proceedings the plan of work of the second session of the preparatory commission of the international conference forwarded to his office by the secretary general of united nations in his covering letter of March 4? The question is in keeping with the right hon. gentleman's own idea. It does not appear in Votes and Proceedings, and I hope he will see his way clear to have it printed there.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, I do apologize for an oversight. I made the suggestion the other day that the plan might be printed as an appendix to the Votes and Proceedings but I did not ask Mr. Speaker to give a direction to that effect and therefore it was not done. May I now ask you, Mr. Speaker, to direct that it be printed as an appendix to Votes and Proceedings.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REQUEST FOR SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue when the committee on radio broadcasting will be set up, and why it has not been?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): The committee on radio broadcasting will be set up before the Easter recess. The reason it has not been set up is that it is only seven or eight months since the committee last sat. The end of the fiscal year, of course, is the end of March. The report of the corporation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1946 has already been reviewed, and we thought it would be in the best interests of the house if the committee did not operate until the end of this fiscal year. Although the report will not be printed, the information contained therein can be given to the committee and reviewed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DIVISION ON EMERGENCY POWERS RESOLUTION, MARCH 18

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, will Your Honour consider making a statement to the house, not today but perhaps tomorrow, in order to clarify the situation with respect to the division that took place yesterday? A serious and dangerous precedent was set by Your Honour yesterday, if I may say so, because a count shows that we carried the motion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) no fewer than four times. I think some clarification and explanation ought to be made by Your Honour, because the precedent as it now stands indicates that a vote can never be conclusive under the present rules as you interpreted them yesterday.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE, SALE AND EXPORT—COMMODITY AND PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 18, consideration in committee of bill No. 25, to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: The committee is considering section 3.

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Last evening when we adjourned the discussion in committee I was asked to give consideration to possible amendments in section 4, after having had section 3 stand for the purpose of considering such amendments to section 4. Before dealing with the amendments I was asked to give a legal opinion on the meaning of the word "may" in the section. I have that legal opinion and will read it:

Legal interpretation of the word "may", law dictionary by John

May: is permitted to, has liberty to. In interpreting statutes the word may should be construed as equivalent to shall or must in cases where the good sense of the entire enactment requires it, wherever it is necessary in order to carry out the intention of the legislation, where it is necessary for the preservation or enforcement of the rights and interests of the public or third persons—

And certain authorities are given.

—but not for the purpose of creating or determining the character of rights. Where there is anything in the connection of the language or in the sense and policy of the provision to require unusual interpretation, it is used as merely permissive and discretionary.

That is the legal opinion under which the draftsmen in the department used the term "may" in these different sections.

Mr. COLDWELL: So that if the house wishes to make it certain that the government shall do something it should use the word "shall" instead of "may." Is not that so?

Mr. GARDINER: That is not what it says.

Mr. COLDWELL: But that is what it means.

Mr. GARDINER: I was going to say with regard to this section that I have no objection to the word being "shall" instead of "may" in this particular provision. But a proposal has been made that we amend section 4, and before going on to deal with that I wish to take 3 and 4 together because they were discussed together last evening. I suggested yesterday that we could take all the powers away from the minister and from the government except those having to do with agreements which have already been made, and all we would require to do, I think, is to amend section 3, subsection (a), by stating:

Subject to any regulations that may be made by the governor in council, the minister may

(a) sell or export agricultural products to the government of any country or any agency thereof pursuant to any agreement already entered into.

Instead of using the word "made", use the words "already entered into", in line 3 of subsection (a). If that were done it would limit the powers given in section 3 to contracts that have already been entered into, which contracts are in the terms of the orders in council that have been discussed in the house. In carrying those out, the last three subsections deal with something somewhat different from what is covered by (a).

(b) On behalf of the government of any country or any agency thereof purchase or negotiate contracts for the purchase of agricultural products.

That is, in carrying out the powers given under regulations by the governor in council we may purchase commodities for other governments.

(c) By order require any person to give such information respecting his facilities for the storing or processing of agricultural products and at such times as the minister may designate in such order.

Then (d):

Enter into contracts for the storing or processing of agricultural products.

I have read that section through in order to come to section 4, which it has been proposed we should amend. I must say that the government prefers to have section 3 as it now stands; but as I said yesterday, if it is the intention of the committee to confine the government to carrying out the contracts we have with Britain, which is the all-important thing in the mind of the government, then we would accept that amendment. I am not however proposing the amendment to the committee; I am simply stating how it could be brought about. Assuming that section 3 will remain as it is, it has been proposed that we amend subsection one of section 4 in these words:

That subsection one of section four of the said bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"The governor in council shall establish one or more commodity boards with adequate producer representation and may authorize and require a commodity board to exercise and perform all or any of the powers and duties of the minister under section three of this act with reference to such agricultural products as the governor in council may designate, but in the exercise of such powers and duties a commodity board shall be subject to the direction and control of the minister.

I read that in order to call attention to what would require to be done particularly in connection with subsections (c) and (d) of section 3, and I will illustrate by dealing with (d):

Enter into contracts for the storing or processing of agricultural products.

And (c):

By order require any person to give such information respecting his facilities for the storing or processing of agricultural products and at such times as the minister may designate in such order.

What we have in mind there is this. If we enter into a contract to supply bacon to Britain, that contract requires that Wiltshire sides be ordered into storage sometimes days ahead, sometimes weeks ahead, and on occasion months ahead. We order those commodities into storage in order to have them available for the loading of ships when ships can be had. There have been occasions on which it has been necessary to act the moment information is obtained with regard to what is happening in order to see that the intentions are carried out. That is the real reason why authority is given to the minister. If it were required that we should have a meeting of council and that the whole thing be determined before council as to whether we are to proceed at all or not in connection with a matter of the kind, a considerable part of the product would be away beyond the position where any storage or anything else in connection with it could be ordered. So I say that to go through the process which is suggested here would make this section of the bill unworkable and impracticable in carrying out a programme of this kind.

I submit again that it is definitely set out, in the orders in council under which the agreements were made with regard to the products, that we deal largely with packing companies in connection with bacon and with cheese boards in connection with cheese. In those operations our action is taken after orders in council have been passed by the government in order to make the carrying out of the policy, whatever it is, administratively possible, and the minister is the administration agent.

Speaking of the proposed amendment, I have no objection to the word "may" after "minister" being changed to "shall". I have no objection at all to the words "with adequate producer representation" being added after the word "board". The section would then read:

The minister shall establish one or more commodity boards with adequate producer representation . . .

And then it goes on as it is now. If that is acceptable to the mover and seconder of the amendment, I shall be pleased to accept that amendment.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: With the explanation the minister has given, it will be quite satisfactory to accept the changes he has suggested, provided that the rest of the amendment stands as we moved it.

Mr. GARDINER: Another suggestion was made by the leader of the Social Credit party with regard to subsection 3 of section 4 to which all the statements I have made with regard to subsection 1 apply; and there is this in addition. The subsection now reads:

The minister may direct that any agricultural product designated by him may be purchased for the purpose of this act or the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, only from a provincial marketing board.

It is suggested that the word "shall" should be used. The wording in the amendment is different, but I doubt very much whether, after I have made the explanation, the hon. member will consider the suggested wording an improvement on that of the bill itself. The suggestion is that it read: "The minister shall direct". There may be producer boards which are intended to deal only with the marketing of a farm product within the bounds of a province. Most of the boards now existing are in that position. In some instances they are intended to deal only with the product of a community within the province. In many instances they do not deal with all the product which is marketed within a province. If we were compelled to order from boards of that kind all the product which we are going to export under this bill, it would not be possible for us to get the commodity which we require in the quantity in which we must have it in order to fulfil the contract. Subsection 3 says:

> The minister may direct that any agricultural product designated by him may be purchased for the purpose of this act . . . only from a provincial marketing board.

Again I say that provision was included for only one purpose—and it is not required for any other purpose so far as I know—and that was for the purchase of apples or taking delivery of apples from the apple marketing board. I do not think it would improve the act, or make it possible for us to carry out as we should, the provisions of the apple agreement, to change the wording of subsection 3. I hope that with that explanation the leader of the Social Credit party will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BROOKS: Are there apple boards in all the provinces, or only in British Columbia and Nova Scotia?

Mr. GARDINER: There are only two provinces from which apples are exported in any considerable quantities to Britain or anywhere else, and those are Nova Scotia and British Columbia. The last figure I recall prior to the war was some 10,000 barrels which had been shipped from Ontario to the old land. A board in British Columbia handles the apples of that province. A board in Nova Scotia handles the apples of Nova Scotia. There is an organization in Ontario—and I think there is one in Quebec; I am not certain at the moment, but I know there has always been an understanding—which is not set up under the Marketing Act of Ontario, so far as I know. It is an organization of apple producers, but there has always been a complete understanding between the organizations in Ontario, British Columbia and Nova Scotia with regard to the transactions throughout the war period and which will go on under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BROOKS: I was thinking in particular of the apple producers of the Saint John valley in New Brunswick. They are increasing very rapidly. What opportunity would they have to sell if there were no board? Would they be included in the Nova Scotia board, or have they any connection with them?

Mr. GARDINER: Of course the first provision which is made by those boards is to supply the Canadian market. There has been complete understanding between the apple producers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick with regard to supplies going to the Canadian market, just as there is entire agreement between those of Nova Scotia and Ontario with regard to supplying the Ontario market. Up to date no difficulty has developed in that regard, and I do not think there would be any under this agreement.

Mr. BROOKS: It is not a prohibition?

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. HATFIELD: How much subsidy is paid to the Nova Scotia apple board, and how much to the British Columbia apple board? It is not paid to the New Brunswick apple board.

Mr. GARDINER: I can give that in round figures, but if the hon. member wants an exact answer I am afraid I shall have to get some further information.

Mr. HATFIELD: I should like to ask another question. Does this bill give the minister power to freeze any agricultural product for any market, in the manner in which Prince Edward Island potatoes have been frozen for the British market?

Mr. GARDINER: So far as I know, potatoes have not been frozen for the British market. A certain proportion of Prince Edward Island potatoes have been sold to that market.

Mr. HATFIELD: They have been not only sold, but frozen.

Mr. GARDINER: I suppose that when any agency, whether it be a private business concern, a corporation or an individual, obligates himself to sell a commodity, the commodity to that extent is frozen, to be delivered under that contract.

Mr. HATFIELD: Does this bill give the minister power to freeze any agricultural products for any market?

Mr. GARDINER: We did have power under orders in council during the war to say that a certain proportion of bacon and of cheese had to go to Great Britain. That authority is still in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that before we proceed with further discussion the minister would like to clear up the matter of amendments before the committee.

Mr. LOW: I should like to ask a question in connection with the amendment I moved. What is the position with respect to poultry products marketing boards? Does the minister make purchases of eggs for delivery to Great Britain under any contract? If so, does he use existing poultry marketing boards in the various provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: We have a contract to send 83 million dozen eggs to Great Britain. Under that contract we purchase eggs at floor prices from anyone who has them to sell. We take all the surplus eggs off this market, and we could take more if there were more in existence, and could send them to the British market. As I say, we have contracted to send at least 83 million dozen, and we can send as many as we have got. We contract to buy them all from any agency, so we would not want to be compelled to take them only from producer agencies, inasmuch as they have only a part of the supply.

Mr. LOW: I would not wish to attempt to compel the minister to buy only from producer marketing boards in provinces where those boards do not control the total supply. But where boards do exist and have control of the total supply, I should like to see it more obligatory upon the minister to make use of those boards for the purchase of his produce. Is there any poultry marketing board in Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: Not for eggs, I understand.

Mr. LOW: There is in Alberta.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand that is the only one.

Mr. LOW: In that province do they have control of almost the whole supply for export?

Mr. GARDINER: I understand there are other traders. But I am sure the hon. member will agree that while that may be true in Alberta—and if it is true, under this section we will certainly buy all the eggs available in Alberta; there would not be any doubt about that—to require that we be compelled to buy only from a marketing agency in any province where there is such a marketing agency, and one which may not have control of the greater proportion of the eggs, would be asking us to go too far. But there is no question as to what we will do. We will buy the eggs from the marketing agency, if it exists.

Mr. LOW: With that explanation, and the undertaking by the minister to use marketing boards wherever feasible, I shall be prepared to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) is prepared to withdraw the amendment he offered last night?

Mr. LOW: Yes.

Amendment (Mr. Low) withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: And do I understand that the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) is withdrawing his amendment, and proposing in its place an amendment to section 4 (1) whereby the word "may" in line 24 will be deleted and the word "shall" inserted in its place; and that there shall be added in line 25 after the word "boards" the words "with adequate producer representation"?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I so move.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall we now, before carrying any section, revert to section 3 of the bill?

Mr. GARDINER: The suggestion was made at the beginning that we should deal first with section 4, and then return to section 3.

Mr. WRIGHT: Before section 4 is agreed to, I should like to ask a question with respect to grass and clover seeds. What will be the government's position with regard to the purchasing of these seeds for export? Will you use the Alfalfa Cooperative Growers Association in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: As I said yesterday, I believe the Saskatchewan cooperative is still in existence. The one formed as a result of the act of 1939 is still operating. So far as I know that is the only organization in Saskatchewan which controls alfalfa and other seeds. Of course there is no doubt as to where we will get our alfalfa seed in that province. I understand that is the only organization in Canada which deals with those seeds. Elsewhere we will have to deal with others. There would be no question about our dealing with any of the cooperative boards which do exist. We would buy from them.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. I have risen about ten times. When the minister rose I took my seat, as a matter of courtesy, and gave him a chance to speak. However I now want to ask a few questions.

I recall that last year I wrote to the Minister of Trade and Commerce asking him for information with respect to the export of agricultural products to other countries, and the subsidies paid thereon. He told me that my letter was being referred to the Minister of Agriculture. Today I should like to have the following information: First, what quantity of each class of agricultural products as described in this bill has been purchased by the Minister of Agriculture each year since the beginning of the war? Second, what price has been paid for each of those commodities? Third, what total subsidy has been paid to producers for each of those commodities, both for home consumption and for export? My last question is this: What quantity of each class or category of commodities or agricultural products as described in this bill has been shipped to other countries since the beginning of the war? I should like to have each country named.

While this question may appear complicated, it is in fact simple. We look at the future, and we forget the past. The past is the best guarantee for the future. I am sure the minister will have no objection to supplying that information to the committee.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to supplying it but I hope I shall not be asked to read it. I have one small part of it on this sheet and I am afraid it would take me most of the afternoon to read it.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not asking the minister to read it because, when figures are read, no one can understand them. The best thing to do would be to put it on the record, if the committee agrees to that, and then every hon. member could study the figures.

Mr. GARDINER: The information contained on this sheet has been put on the record. This is the answer to a question asked the other day with regard to the subsidies paid on farm products. It would be difficult to make a return showing the subsidies that were paid on products which went to Britain because no direct subsidies that I can recall at the moment have been paid on food products going to Britain. There have been subsidies paid in Canada for the production of food products, most of which were consumed in Canada. One subsidy was in the form of assistance in the purchase of seed cleaning equipment in Prince Edward Island and also in British Columbia. Different kinds of assistance have been given over the years, the total amounting to $351,476,126. These began in 1939 with a subsidy on cheese of two cents a pound for 94 points and one cent a pound for 93 points. That was the first one paid, and then we went on to pay subsidies in connection with cheese factories, cold storage and apples. I might say to the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton that in 1939-40 the subsidy on apples amounted to $1,021,061.07.

Mr. HATFIELD: Is that for Nova Scotia or British Columbia?

Mr. GARDINER: That covers both.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the difference between the two?

Mr. GARDINER: The figures are not given exactly, but I would say the amount paid to Nova Scotia would be from two-thirds to three-quarters of the total paid in the different years. I can get the exact figures and put them on the record.

Mr. BROOKS: Is the subsidy paid only on apples shipped to England or on all apples sold?

Mr. GARDINER: To all intents and purposes we guaranteed a certain return. The apple producers organizations and others have disposed of the apples to the best advantage and then payments have been made in addition which amounted to a subsidy on the apples in order to give an average return.

Mr. HATFIELD: What was the certain return you promised?

Mr. GARDINER: Let me give the figures and then you can do what you wish with them. They are:

1939-40	$1,021,061 07
1940-41	4,231,146 56
1941-42	2,239,944 15
1942-43	2,900,864 51
1943-44	1,873,520 36
1944-45	1,194,540 84
1945-46	354,340 00
1946-47	552,214 00
	$14,409,632 13

May I say to the hon. member for Temiscouata that if I were to attempt to read all of this list it would take me quite a long time. I would suggest that either what has already been put on the record be accepted or that this be put on the record. The statement follows:

Agricultural Prices Support Board

1. Potatoes—$93,384.68 paid during fiscal year 1946-47—March 1.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps I could make my question clearer. What I want to know is what part of the total agricultural production in each year since the beginning of the war has been sold within the country and what part has been shipped outside, and to what countries? We need that information in order to be able to discuss the sale of agricultural products. The sessional paper referred to by the minister relates only to subsidies and does not provide the information I want.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not the exact figures here at the moment in connection with all products for all years, but I can give proportionate figures. In the case of bacon and ham, since the war began we have sent approximately one-half the production to Great Britain. During the same period we consumed about the same amount of pork in Canada as we had consumed prior to the war. I am speaking in terms of weight. Then in the case of cheese, throughout the years we have sent to Great Britain approximately sixty per cent of our production. In two years we sent all the cheese produced in Ontario and Quebec between the months of May and October, but the average is about sixty per cent.

In so far as eggs are concerned, prior to the war we were sending about 1,000,000 dozen. If I remember the figure correctly, that was the amount shipped the last year before the war and for a period of time we had been sending about that number of dozens. This year our contracts call for 83,000,000 dozen. We have sent somewhat more than that in some years but that is about the average in recent years. Those are not sent under any subsidized price; they are sent at the floor price. The floor price that is received for eggs and for cheese and bacon in Canada is the price at which these products have been secured and sent to Britain. We have been paying on cheese produced in Canada a premium of one cent a pound on cheese of 93 score and two cents a pound on cheese of 94 score. We have paid that, no matter where the cheese went. We have paid that premium directly to the producer as a quality premium, just as we have paid in the last few years a premium of $3 on A hogs and $2 on B hogs, and now it is $2 and $1 respectively. While it is true that there is no direct premium on what goes to Britain, there is a premium on all hogs produced in Canada and delivered to the packing houses.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. HACKETT: Is that paid on the whole hog or on the side?

Mr. GARDINER: On the whole hog. It is now $2 and $1 on A and B respectively. That is paid as a premium to induce the production of a higher grade commodity. Those are the main commodities we are sending to Britain.

Mr. HACKETT: Before the minister leaves cheese, was there not some bonus paid on the milk that went into cheese, and was there not some provincial encouragement given as well?

Mr. GARDINER: Ontario gave encouragement to the production of cheese by paying one cent, and I have heard rumours that that will be raised to two cents. Quebec did pay a premium for a time and then took the premium off. It was paid on all cheese of a certain quality produced in both provinces.

Mr. TUSTIN: It was two cents a pound on all cheese produced in Ontario.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. That was paid by the provinces. We started in at a lower rate and paid a subsidy of 30 cents a hundredweight on milk entering cheese. But the British are paying that subsidy; we are not paying it. Last year the British did not pay all of it but they paid part of it. This year they are paying all the subsidy that is paid on milk entering into the production of cheese going to Britain. The Canadian consumer is not paying the subsidy on cheese produced in Canada for domestic consumption.

Mr. HACKETT: Was it not because there was uncertainty whether this premium was to be paid that there was such a falling off in the production of cheese in Quebec in 1946?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not too sure about that. We were putting forth every effort to get more butter, but you cannot get more butter and more cheese at the same time unless you increase the production of milk. The production of milk was going down slightly and, because it was going down, we could not get more of canned milk, plus cheese, plus butter. It is true that the production of butter did not stay up to the level of two years ago, nor has the production of anything else because there is not the feed to feed that there was two years ago.

I should like to finish my answer to the hon. member for Temiscouata before going on with something else. The hon. member for Temiscouata and other hon. members will be interested in these facts that I have received in the last few days. The table is headed,

"Imports from Canada as percentages of 1946 average utilization in Britain," and shows:

	Per cent
Wheat and flour, as flour	57
Bacon and ham	38·6
Carcass meat	3·6
Eggs in shell	15
Dried eggs	15
Evaporated milk	10·5

The carcass meat mentioned in the table was mostly beef, which was asked about a few moments ago by the hon. member for Temiscouata. We sent 184,000,000 pounds of beef to Britain in the calendar year 1945, which is the last year for which I have the figures. That works out at 350,000 head of beef cattle in round figures, which would dress at an average of 500 pounds. The beef is in the form of frozen beef and boneless beef. We take the dressed weight and divide it into the total amount and that gives about 350,000 head of cattle. I may say that 573,000 head went out of Canada during that year, largely to Britain and European countries. The extra quantity which went to European countries went largely to UNRRA. That meat was largely in cans. It will be recalled that the year before last we took all canned meat away from the Canadian people. We did not send it to Britain but sent it to UNRRA and UNRRA distributed that beef to the different nations it was helping, largely on the European continent. The price at which these beef products have gone has again been the floor price. The meat board has been prepared at all times to take any quantity of meat that has been available in the packing houses or elsewhere across Canada at a given price, and that price is the floor price which is contained in these contracts. This meat has been sent out of Canada at that floor price. That is true of all the products of which I have been speaking. That is the reason why I have suggested in this discussion that this legislation is utilized for the purpose of putting a floor under the price of farm products. If the products can be sold at a better price for consumption in Canada they are sold for consumption in Canada, but somewhere under the ceilings which have been put on.

Mr. HATFIELD: What about the United States?

Mr. TUSTIN: Does that apply to cheese?

Mr. GARDINER: That applies to all these products, cheese and everything. We bought the cheese at twenty cents a pound. There has been more compulsion in connection with cheese than with other products.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. POULIOT: Will the minister be kind enough to tell the committee the approximate number of head of live cattle which have been exported both to the United States and the United Kingdom during the whole war?

Mr. ROWE: Dairy cattle?

Mr. POULIOT: Any cattle, but I mean live cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: About 70,000 in 1946 went to the United States. No live cattle went to Britain.

Mr. HACKETT: There were between 90,000 and 100,000 cattle in 1946.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member will have to give his own figures. I give the ones I have here.

Mr. HACKETT: I am giving the ones I received from the department.

Mr. GARDINER: We are talking of beef cattle.

Mr. HACKETT: I am talking about pure-bred and dairy cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: If you include pure-bred dairy cattle, the amount will be larger, but pure-bred and dairy cattle are not at all in the same class as beef cattle.

Mr. HACKETT: I am referring to the question asked.

Mr. GARDINER: These figures are in Hansard. I do not think the committee will expect me to give them offhand. They are already printed in the record.

Mr. HATFIELD: What price is being paid to the grower for potatoes that are going to the British market at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: The price is $1.15 for 100 pounds of potatoes.

Mr. HATFIELD: Why was no subsidy paid to the New Brunswick apple grower in 1946 when a subsidy was paid to the Nova Scotia apple grower? The New Brunswick apple grower sold his apples at a lower price than the Nova Scotia apple grower.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member is one of the men who sell potatoes in New Brunswick.

Mr. HATFIELD: I do not sell apples.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member was talking about potatoes.

Mr. LENNARD: He was talking about apples.

Mr. HATFIELD: I was asking a question about apples.

Mr. GARDINER: I have already stated the position with regard to apples.

Mr. HATFIELD: The minister has not answered my question. Why was no subsidy paid by the New Brunswick board when they sold apples at less than the Nova Scotia apple board?

Mr. POULIOT: Say it with apples.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to say whether the New Brunswick board sold their potatoes—

Mr. HATFIELD: Apples.

Mr. GARDINER: —or apples, for that matter, at less than the price at which the Nova Scotia grower sold theirs. So far as I have been able to find out, the New Brunswick people do not export apples. They grow a small quantity of apples in New Brunswick, and I am given to understand they do not grow enough for their own market. If they sold their apples at a lower price than was paid in Nova Scotia I am afraid my hon. friend will have to find the explanation in New Brunswick.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not wish to interrupt the continuity of the argument that is going on, but I have something entirely different from what we have been talking about. I should like to ask the minister this question, and if he prefers to answer it at some future time that will be all right with me. I believe this is the proper place to ask it because it involves feed and there is a principle involved. The commodity board has certain powers pursuant to the Agricultural Prices Support Act. The reason I ask the question is that I have an inquiry from a certain organization in my constituency. It is based upon an article that appeared in "The Country Guide." Why are products sold in foreign countries cheaper than they are sold here? I shall read the little statement from the article, and perhaps the minister can answer it.

> The difference between export and domestic rail rates was so high, that western feed could be sold in Denmark for less than it could be sold in Saint John, New Brunswick. The Canadian freight tariff structure was in effect a system for bonusing the Danish feeder against competition by eastern Canadian hog growers.

What is the explanation for this? If the minister cares to answer it now it will be all right; if not, perhaps he can tell me when I may ask the question.

Mr. GARDINER: As I understood it, the first part of the question is why the commodities that are dealt with in these contracts are sold at lower prices to the British in Canada, delivered at a port, than they are sold in Canada to Canadians. The answer to that is the one I gave a few moments ago, that we have had not only a ceiling price in Canada but a floor price. So far as farm commodities are concerned, the floor prices since the beginning of the war have been established by the British agreements. Under these agreements we have undertaken to take delivery of all the surplus farm production in Canada at the floor price, which is the price contained in the contracts. In the case of beef that cannot be lower than half a cent a pound on red and blue beef below the Canadian price. It is one-quarter of a cent now; it was half a cent up to this year. On the lower grades of beef the margin is wider. The floor price established on bacon and ham has established the floor basis in Canada not only for meat but for cattle and hogs. It would be somewhat difficult to state exactly what that floor price is at the different markets, but we have kept a record of it all across Canada during the war and, wherever we have noticed that it was tending to drop below what we considered was a reasonable floor price in relation to prices in the British contracts, we have insisted on the price being maintained on that level. There have been only very short periods at any time during the war when the prices have not been attained either at that level or at a higher level, so that the floor prices are the prices at which the commodities have been supplied to Britain, and in Canada they have sold between the ceiling and the floor.

Mr. ROWE: If that is the floor price what is the ceiling?

Mr. GARDINER: I would have to get the prices board records of the ceilings, which are different prices on different cuts of beef and pork.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not see that there is any first or second part to the question, but does the minister not care to answer what he calls the second part?

Mr. GARDINER: I neglected to answer that. In the first place, I am told that the facts are not that feed grain can be purchased in Denmark at a lower price than it can be purchased at in the maritime provinces. I have heard the statement made many times, and probably I have made it myself sometimes that feed grain can be purchased in China at a lower rate than it can be purchased in British Columbia. I think this statement is correct, although I would want to check it up. It is made often and by people who ought to know, that the freight rate on grain going by boat from western Canada to Denmark or to Great Britain—it is based on the British figure rather than on the Danish figure, but if it is exported it goes on the same rate no matter to which place it goes—is much lower than the rate on grain that is to be unloaded and fed in this country. It has been said many times that the freight rate on grain from here over to Denmark and back again would not be as high, if you were able to get it that way, as it is if you ship it direct. I say again, I am repeating a statement made recently in Winnipeg by the deputy minister of New Brunswick, and it was repeated by others. Some who ought to know have said to me since that time that there is some truth in the statement, but I doubt whether it has been possible to buy grain, after it has gone over and been shipped back, at as low a price here. Whether the Danish people get it at a lower price I also doubt very much, because other things enter into the cost besides the freight rate itself.

Mr. POULIOT: I understand that the Department of Agriculture is a complete unit, and in this bill there is some reference to advisers whom the minister may choose. The question I wish to ask has reference to food commodities. Does the minister establish prices after consulting with his own advisers, or does he ask the wartime prices and trade board to fix prices for the Department of Agriculture? That is the first question I should like the minister to answer if he pleases.

Mr. GARDINER: To answer the last question first, the wartime prices and trade board ever since 1941 has set ceiling prices on food commodities that are consumed in Canada, and those of course come largely from the farms of Canada. The board has not set these prices without consultation with the Department of Agriculture. There has always been consultation with the department before the prices were set, but they had the final authority to recommend to council, and the prices were set after discussions, first as between the prices board and representatives of the Department of Agriculture, and representatives of farm organizations. The prices board has always had an advisory committee, on each of the important farm products, which has been called in and the matter has been discussed from time to time. In addition to that, we have had a committee advisory to the food board. The food board is composed entirely of agricultural departmental officials, and the prices board and Department of Trade and Commerce officials and that board has had an advisory committee. The chairman of the advisory committee to that board is the president of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. Each province was asked to name a representative on that committee and they named nine men. Most of the provinces named their deputy ministers, but some of them named representatives of farm organizations. Then we asked the Canadian Federation of Agriculture to nominate three; that is to say, two in addition to their president, which made a total committee of twelve. We accepted those nominations and had those men appointed.

There have been changes. The first member of the board from Quebec was Mr. McArthur, but he took on other work later and therefore resigned and someone else was appointed on the recommendation of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. We have never refused to take their nominations for these positions. We have the authority to refuse, but we have never found it necessary to do so.

We are setting up a new food board and have given the Canadian Federation of Agriculture the right to select another two from western Canada and another two from eastern Canada. These recommendations have been made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which will increase the advisory board to sixteen, seven of whom will be representatives of the Canadian federation.

The method under which that board operates is this. Whenever the chairmen of the board think they ought to have a meeting they come to the department, and to me as minister, and suggest a date. The president came yesterday, as I said last night, and suggested that we meet the first week after the Easter holidays to discuss suggestions which the government hopes to place before the country with regard to prices or any other matters that may concern the production of farm commodities.

We are not bound by the advice we receive, and the advice given is not a one-way street. Meetings are held behind closed doors. The representatives of the province and the farm organizations talk quite freely to us and we talk quite freely to them. Up to date we have been able to reach an agreement on the things that have been done by the government, with the result that no criticism has been made by those who have been members of that organization. Some others have desired to get on that organization and we have made provision whereby some of them can get on, provided that they are acceptable to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. We have now the recommendation for the four additional to go on.

That board will meet, and it may be one of the reasons why it will be most difficult for us to make announcements early with regard to the prices of dairy products. We wish to have the advice of that organization. We want them to know what the reasons are for any action we find it necessary to take, in order that they may advise their own organization accordingly, and after we have had these discussions we hope to make the announcements as soon as possible.

I made a similar suggestion with regard to the announcements about feed grain. The main reason why we wanted to hold it up until we had met the farm organization was to have their advice before making a decision. We did not decide to do what they asked us to do, as is obvious. They asked us to pay an average bonus on feed grains. We increased the price, and the reason I give the house and the country for that is this. The condition which was outlined when the first recommendation was made was found to be impracticable of continuation, and therefore we took the alternative suggestion of the farm organizations when we brought down the official decision as to what ought to be done. So that we have been proceeding by obtaining advice and using it where, after having heard all their arguments, we think it wise to follow that advice, and trying to convince them, where we thought it was not wise to follow their suggestions, that some other course ought to be adopted. Up to date we have arrived at understandings.

Mr. POULIOT: Just one or two questions. From what the right hon. gentleman has said, I understand that prices of agricultural products for home consumption are established by the prices board. The first question I wish to ask is whether prices for agricultural exports are established under the authority of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GARDINER: Floor prices have been established under the authority of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Ceiling prices have been established under the authority of the prices board.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. My last question is this. Will the minister be kind enough to put on record on Hansard a list of the commitments actually in force regarding the shipments of agricultural products to other countries, by class or category of commodity?

Mr. HATFIELD: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: Just a minute. I want an answer; after I have obtained it, the hon. member may have the floor for the whole afternoon.

Mr. GARDINER: They are here somewhere. I wonder if the hon. member would permit another question to be asked in the meantime.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. HATFIELD: I asked the minister a few moments ago the price which the grower in Prince Edward Island was receiving for potatoes under the British order. He quoted me a price of $1.15. Does that include the bag and the tag?

Mr. GARDINER: No. I stated at the time that it was just for the potatoes.

Mr. BURTON: I wonder if we could possibly get a little closer to the bill which is before us this afternoon. I should like to ask the minister if he recalls that yesterday, while he was answering some questions I asked, he had this to say, as reported at page 1491 of Hansard, with respect to an act passed by this parliament in 1939 to assist in the formation and encouragement of cooperatives. He was pointing out that some of these organizations could be made use of under this act, and he said:

> I was looking in my file for the return that was brought down a few days ago indicating the number of organizations which have been set up under that legislation since 1939.

Would the minister be good enough to give us the number of that return so that we might look it up; or, if he has not it with him, will he have his secretary advise us what it is?

When the minister was replying to the hon. member for Kootenay West, in referring to the provincial boards which were under discussion at that time, he said, as reported at page 1504 of Hansard:

> It is with a small "p," a provincial marketing board. There may be a dozen in one province dealing with different products.

As the minister says, there may be a dozen of these organizations in a province dealing with different commodities. That part I can understand. But can there be a board or organization set up under provincial legislation setting up marketing boards, and at the same time can those boards or organizations obtain assistance from the federal government? And can those boards, by the board set up under this act, be delegated or designated as the agency for the federal government?

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. I respect the views of my hon. colleagues, but there is nothing more in order than a question with regard to what is to be done by virtue of a bill, and my hon. friend knows that. We do not want to be left in the dark. The minister seems to be willing to give the information, and I will ask him again if he will be kind enough to answer my last question, which was in regard to the actual commitments regarding shipments of food to any other country.

The CHAIRMAN: I might inform the hon. member for Temiscouata that I did not rule his question out of order. I did not know the question had been raised.

Mr. POULIOT: No; it is not that at all. This is a vital question, and one which is perfectly relevant. The hon. member who just spoke said that he would come to the nucleus or the marrow of the bill by asking another question. I want to know what is to be done with this bill. Of course my faith is not the same as that of the hon. member for Humboldt. He believes in things which I do not believe in. I am not going to repeat today what I said yesterday. Today we are to have answers giving facts, and the minister is willing to answer. The minister did not refuse to answer, but the hon. member for Humboldt tried to change the course of the discussion by intervening at the wrong moment. I think we should proceed in committee in just the same manner as we proceed in court. When one has the floor, he has an opportunity of following the line of his questioning. I did not rise on a point of order at all regarding your ruling, Mr. Chairman, because you did not make one, and no one asked you to make one. But I rise to a point of order and a question of privilege at the same time; because when a member rises in the house to ask a question of a minister, and the minister is willing to reply and looks in his file for the information with which to answer, I do not see why he should not be allowed to do so.

Mr. BURTON: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege. If it was the innocent remark that I made which has sent the hon. member for Temiscouata off on another tirade, I am quite prepared to withdraw it. I say it is a sad day indeed if an hon. member cannot rise and suggest that we get a little closer to the bill under consideration.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell the hon. gentleman that I was not offended at all, but I regret very much not having the information. I want the information; and if he rose to prevent me from getting it, let me tell him that I will stand up until I do get it, because the minister is willing to give it. I do not see why any member distracts the attention of the minister when he is ready to answer a question, and I am sure the minister will answer my question.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I understand the minister requested that we proceed with further questions while he was looking up certain information. If the minister has the information now, I am sure he will answer the question.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. GARDINER: The information is here, Mr. Chairman. My officials are looking through a pile of information here trying to find what is required, but they have not yet located it. I will give it to my hon. friend as soon as I locate it.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister very much.

An hon. MEMBER: He said that ten minutes ago.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister was willing to answer, and I wanted to have the answer, whether now or a little later on.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am bound to agree that the hon. member for Temiscouata has been very much in order in asking his questions this afternoon, and I think the remarks which were made by the hon. member for Humboldt, and which precipitated this little argument, were quite uncalled for. I understood there was agreement between the hon. member for Temiscouata and the minister that the officials were looking for the information in order that the answer might be given, and that the minister invited further questions in the meantime.

I have two related questions which I should like to ask the minister as a result of questions from producers in my part of the country. The first is this: Have Canada Packers a representative on the meat board and on the wartime prices and trade board? If so, who is the official. If the minister has that information, then I am sure he can give me some enlightenment on the next question which I wish to ask; and I shall give a concrete example.

On the Winnipeg live stock market, according to the minister's own report for February 8, finished steers were selling for fifteen cents a pound, live weight. Some weeks later than that—I have not the exact date before me—the wartime prices and trade board officials announced an increase of approximately three cents a pound for dressed beef. Since that time, live beef on the Winnipeg live stock market is selling for, on an average, one cent a pound less for the same quality beef. Could the minister give me a reasonable explanation which I can pass on to the producers, who are wondering why this has taken place, under the present regulations.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the hon. member repeat the latter part of the example he has given.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I pointed out that on February 8 the price prevailing, according to the minister's report, was fifteen cents a pound on finished steers. Some weeks later an announcement was made by the wartime prices and trade board officials to the effect that dressed beef would increase in price to the extent of three cents a pound, varying, of course, according to the different cuts. Since that time, and right up to date, the same type of live beef has been selling for approximately one cent a pound less than it was prior to that announcement. The producers are wondering why that has taken place, in view of the regulations and controls of today. I am sure if the packers have a representative on the meat board or on the wartime prices and trade board that representative will be able to give an explanation that I could pass on to these people.

Mr. GARDINER: The meat board is composed of Mr. Taggart, who is chairman. Then there is Mr. L. W. Pearsall, who is manager, and Mr. S. E. Todd, who is managing director of the industrial and development council of the Canadian meat packers, and who is a board member. I presume he is the gentleman to whom reference has been made. He was secretary of the food board during the first war, and during the war just past he was on the meat board.

Then there is Mr. McOuat, who is general agricultural agent for the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and is also on the board. The secretary is Mr. P. E. Light, chief of the live stock and poultry marketing division. It will be noted that Mr. Taggart is chairman and Mr. Pearsall is manager.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Those are not the names I had in mind. I think Canada Packers still has another representative on the wartime prices and trade board, if he is not on the meat board.

Mr. GARDINER: Canada Packers, as such, have no representative on the meat board. But the packing organization as a whole, which is the organization from which we must get our bacon and hams, have a member on the board.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They might have a representative on the wartime prices and trade board, apart from the meat board, might they not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have never heard of any representative of Canada Packers on the wartime prices and trade board. Certainly there is none in the membership of the board. They may have selected some administrator who, before his selection, worked for Canada Packers, or something of that kind. But it would not be a very high up official.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Could the minister give me an answer?

Mr. GARDINER: I would have to search the record, or have it searched, I am not in a position to answer the question as to the level of prices; and I take it that is what is wanted, from what has been said. But there are a great many things that can be said about the level of prices on a certain day depending upon the type of cattle on the market. I would not like to say that, because prices were at different levels, everything is explained. But the fact is that the board all through the war, and even now, has kept a close check on the activities in different markets in connection with live stock products. Up to date it has succeeded in maintaining returns to the farmer at the floor.

We have never attempted to keep them down. There are times when they go above what we would consider to be the ceiling. I suppose that is done because probably the packing plant is prepared to take a loss, or at the most a small profit over a period of time in order to supply its customers. They even pay higher prices for live cattle than the ceiling would permit. They claim to have sold at a loss at different times. Then, when there are greater supplies on the market they may sell closer to the floor. During that period of time they would make up the losses which they previously incurred. I assume that is the condition under which they operate. I should think it would be the natural condition under which to operate. But to our knowledge, prices have not gone below the floor in connection with this matter.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is it fair to assume that the amount of dressed beef in storage might enter into the picture, for some period of time? I was thinking that your board would have a reasonable explanation for that. For instance, if there were a great amount of dressed beef in storage, that might be the answer, over a period of time. I should think there would be some reasonable explanation for the situation.

Mr. BRYCE: This raises a very sore point with the farmers.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Just a minute; wait until I have a reply.

Mr. GARDINER: I am told that the answer that can be given by the board is this: Perhaps hon. members have noticed that in the press, for two or three weeks before the announcement was finally made, there were rumours to the effect that this would be done. I presume that what the hon. member is suggesting is that, if there were a member who was a representative from the packers on the board, they might have got knowledge of that. But from what I know of what goes on around Ottawa, I am sure that they did not require to have a member on the board in order to find out.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am not making any suggestion.

Mr. GARDINER: Most of the things decided in our boards and most of the things decided by the government are in the papers before decisions are finally reached. They may be only rumours. But there are a lot of people who have seen it happen so often that they are quite prepared to accept the rumours and take a chance on them. I understand that the price of beef did go up some days before this change was made, and this made it impossible to go up as much as it would have gone, if it had been affected only by this one price rise.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was not making any suggestion. I was looking for an answer. If these officials who had experience were on the board, or on the wartime prices and trade board, they would have a logical answer to it, something which the ordinary layman does not know anything about.

Mr. GRAYDON: You will not get anything answered over there.

Mr. BRYCE: I do not want to get away off the bill, but I should like to clear this matter up. I am keenly interested in the point the hon. member for Souris has just raised. The trouble is that the packer has a ceiling, but the farmer has no ceiling. There is no ceiling on live steers today, And the packer can pay for them whatever he darned well likes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRYCE: Oh, you fellows have said lots worse than that.

[Mr. J. A. Ross.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is nothing to what your constituents say about the government, eh?

Mr. BRYCE: The minister knows that the wartime prices and trade board has a ceiling on dressed beef. Then that is when the meat board steps in, whenever it does not make that price. You or I can take a carload of steers to the market tomorrow. If we do not like what the packer gives us for them we can take them home again. There is no protection for us from the meat board.

We have a situation today where the farmer has no protection from the ceiling. We know that if we take a 12 or 13-cent steer it will turn into 20 or 20½-cent beef, according to dressing. When we appeal to the meat board and say that we are not receiving the protection to which we are entitled, they tell us, "Well, put your beef on the rail, and we will see what they will make." They are going to force us to rail-grade them. I for one will never agree to rail-grading of beef, although I agree with the minister that that is the proper way to grade it. But it is not the proper way as long as it is so definitely in the hands of the meat packers.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 4 as amended carry?

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege which it will take me but a minute to discuss. I notice in the Ottawa Journal of this evening that John Strachey is denying in Manchester, England, what I said yesterday in the house. I have here a clipping from the Montreal Gazette of Friday, March 15, 1935, which quotes a Chicago dispatch of the Associated Press, in which Mr. Strachey is reported as saying:

I am not a communist, but a believer in communist theories.

Mr. WRIGHT: I wonder if what the hon. member is saying has anything to do with this bill. I cannot see anything in section 4 dealing with Mr. Strachey, the minister of food in Great Britain, nor can I see anything in that section of the bill that has any reference to what his opinions are with regard to communism or any other ism.

Mr. POULIOT: The rules of the house say that a question of privilege may be raised at any time. I am sorry to interrupt the discussion, but I shall not be long. I simply want to answer this person who denied what I said in the house. If my hon. friend looks at the small book he will find that that is one of the first rules. I quote what Mr. Strachey said:

I am not a communist, but a believer in communist theories. I am primarily an author. Being a communist is a full time job and I can't spare the time for it. Besides, anyone who would advocate overthrowing the United States government is crazy. I make no secret of my economic opinions. I entirely deny the charges that have been preferred against me. I am not an anarchist so you can all sleep safe and sound in your beds tonight.

I am sure that no one will consider him dangerous. I do not consider him seriously at all, and that is why I object to any transactions being made by the Canadian government with him. I protest strongly against it.

Mr. McMASTER: I should like to refer again to subsections 2 and 3 of section 4 about which I spoke yesterday. Apparently the commodity boards which are to be established will be established under section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, but I think we are faced with the possibility that that act might be declared unconstitutional. I find that that act is headed:

An act for the support of the prices of agricultural products during the transition from war to peace.

Apparently it is only a temporary act. I wish to know if that act has been incorporated in any permanent act. If it has, I should like to know how it could be, since it refers only to keeping up prices in a province. It does not refer to interprovincial or foreign trade and it could not be made permanent. I am afraid that you will find that any board appointed will have no power. There is nothing in this act that would give it any status. I am afraid that, by the terms of this section, you will be appointing something that cannot in fact exist.

Mr. GARDINER: Subsection 1 of section 4 gives authority to appoint commodity boards or to utilize any commodity board that does exist. There are no commodity boards that have been set up under the other act. What we are anticipating might happen as we go along is that some of these products may be taken out from under these boards and placed partly under other boards. If we had commodity boards under the other act handling those products, then we could appoint those boards to deal with this act as well. We have not any of them and we do not know that we shall have any. This act is temporary, being only for one year, while the other act is for a much longer period. It is not as temporary as this one.

Mr. McMASTER: This is for only a year, but the other act must fall right away because—

Mr. GARDINER: The other act is more permanent than this.

Mr. McMASTER: You think it is.

Mr. GARDINER: The other act was placed on the statute books in 1944 and it remains there until this house takes it off.

Mr. McMASTER: It remains there until some court of law declares it is unconstitutional because it is no longer necessary because of any emergency. The only reason for its being there was the emergency created in the change from war to peace.

Mr. GARDINER: It was passed by this house; it was not under the War Measures Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has it ever been brought in?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: On what date?

Mr. GARDINER: April 1 last. It is being utilized in connection with the provision of funds.

Mr. IRVINE: I rise to a question of privilege and I am sorry the hon. member for Temiscouata has left the chamber. The question of privilege raised by the hon. member was not a question of privilege. Under the guise of its being a question of privilege he was taking the opportunity to protest against making a deal with a minister of the British crown. I ask that that be stricken from the record because it is not a question of privilege at all.

The CHAIRMAN: The question should have been raised earlier.

Mr. IRVINE: I have been trying to catch your eye, but I could not.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member could have risen at any time on a question of privilege.

Mr. GRAYDON: He thinks that two wrongs make a right.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister has said that the Agricultural Prices Support Act was proclaimed last April. Is it not a fact that all the purchases of apples which we heard about this afternoon were made under that act? If I recall correctly I have seen reference to this in the public accounts.

Mr. GARDINER: No apples were purchased under that act. The apples were purchased under the War Measures Act to complete an agreement made under the War Measures Act by order in council.

Mr. WRIGHT: What would happen in this hypothetical case? You are using a board set up under this act to support prices, but this act does not come up next year; it is simply allowed to drop.

Mr. GARDINER: I am hoping I shall not have to wait as long to get it through at the next session as we have had to wait this session. I think we should leave the argument about that until the next session.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why not make it a little more permanent?

Mr. CHARLTON: Was subsection 3 of section 4 amended in any way?

Mr. GARDINER: No, it has not been amended in any way up to the moment. I think the hon. member asked us to let it stand until we had finished with section 4. We are trying to complete section 4 and then we shall go back to section 3.

Mr. CHARLTON: I had an amendment to that particular subsection which I intended to bring forward, but in view of the amendment brought forward by the hon. member for Peace River I do not know whether this would be of any use. However I should like to hear what the minister has to say about it. It is:

That subsection 3 of section 4 be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"Notwithstanding anything in this or any other act contained producer boards set up under provincial marketing acts, where such boards exist or may from time to time be brought into existence, shall be used for the purpose of this act, or the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944."

Mr. GARDINER: I would think that amendment has the same meaning as the one that was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that the hon. member is moving this amendment?

Mr. CHARLTON: Yes, I am moving it.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know whether the hon. member was in the house when I was dealing with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Peace River, but this one would have exactly the same effect, though its wording is not exactly the same. What I stated at that time was that there are very few, if any, boards set up in Canada which handle all of a particular product. It might be said that the apple board handles all the apples that are exported, but there is no authority in this bill yet, and will not be unless we accept the amendment I am proposing to section 5, that would put the apple board in a position to do what is proposed. There is an egg board in Alberta, and that is the nearest approach to such a board. What I stated on the other amendment I state again now, that where these boards do control the marketing of farm products, there is nowhere else we can go to get that product. On the other hand, some of these boards are set up to market products within a province, and others deal only with marketing part of the product within a province. But these British agreements we have to carry on from day to day and week to week, and we cannot wait for these boards to be enlarged to get the product we want from a particular province. We must go to organizations already set up to handle them. If we accepted an amendment that, wherever there is a board, we must buy from that board it would defeat the very purpose of the bill, which is to get all the surplus food that is available in a given area, in a given province or in the whole dominion, to enable us to fill these contracts. If there is such a board in existence anywhere we shall do exactly with that board what we propose to do with the apple board. We shall take our products from that board. But I would not want to be compelled to deal only with that board, if there is such a board in existence. It may not be able to deliver the surplus of a province at all.

Mr. CHARLTON: The minister says he would deal with the board but he does not want to be bound to do it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am saying that the amendment would bind me. If there is a board in Ontario that handles and markets half of the apples in Ontario—I shall not get into any difficulties by mentioning apples because it is not a product being exported—I would be compelled to go to that board to get the surplus of apples in Ontario if we wanted to market Ontario apples. But those people may not want to market any apples outside Ontario, and there may be a good reason for that. Ontario is the best market for apples in Canada, and they may not want to market their apples outside the province. I do not want to be compelled to go to that board and take their apples away from them. We want to utilize these boards where they exist to do the job that has to be done, but we do not want to go beyond that.

Mr. FULTON: The only alternative would be for the minister to requisition the apples, to get the apples before they came under the control of the board.

Mr. GARDINER: I hope we are not going to have to requisition anything. The only reason there is authority here to requisition is that we might want a product like Wiltshire sides, and the packing plant may say: "We can sell these to better advantage somewhere else and we are not going to sell them to you." Under those circumstances we ought to have authority to say that a certain percentage of the product must be put into the brine now and cured in order to go into bacon. That has to be done weeks ahead. That is what the power will be utilized for. But as for taking commodities away from small dealers or from small cooperatives or small producer organizations, we do not want to exercise that kind of authority at all and we do not intend to exercise it.

Mr. FULTON: I agree entirely with the minister's suggestion. But surely it follows, if the board wants to help you carry out these contracts, they are not going to try to beat the minister and sell somewhere else, provided that the price is reasonable. I understand that the minister has agreed to consult the producers in setting the price. Therefore we have a reasonable assurance that the price will be reasonable and just. If that is the case, the boards are not going to try to beat the minister to it by making it impossible for him to get the products to fill the contracts. A big packing plant might, but I doubt that too. That being the case, why will the minister not accept the suggestion that he deal through a board where a board exists, and then, where a board does not exist, he can go into the market himself and set up whatever agency is necessary.

Mr. GARDINER: Where a board does exist it may not have the product we want.

Mr. FULTON: Then you do not use that board.

Mr. GARDINER: But the amendment would compel me to take the product from that board and from no one else. In other words, if somebody were to set up a board in Ontario to market the producers' bacon, then under the amendment we would have to take the product from that board. But the proper place to take the bacon from, under present conditions and under any conditions that I can foresee while these agreements are running, is the packing plant. There is no one else in a position to market it. To say that I must deal with a board because somebody has set up a small board and said, "We are going to market this product"—it just is not possible to do that kind of thing.

Mr. FULTON: There would be no objection to putting in a reasonable definition of "producer board" if the minister is afraid of that situation arising. But for him to say that, because somebody may set up a board and call it a producer board, therefore he will have to deal with that board, is not a sound argument against the principle we are advocating. We have had a good deal of argument about this, but we thought we would make one more effort to have the minister accept the principle we are advocating. I have his answer now, and so far as I am concerned I have nothing more to say.

Mr. CHARLTON: I ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I ask the minister if section 4 has been amended in any particular at all? There have been amendments advanced and withdrawn until it is difficult to know the extent to which amendments have been accepted or rejected.

Mr. GARDINER: The amendment which was accepted was to subsection 1 of section 4 and was to this effect, that the minister shall establish one or more commodity boards with adequate producer representation. That is the only amendment that has been accepted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have listened to the arguments advanced. I do not know whether any arguments advanced can have any effect, but I do not recall any instance either in the Natural Products Marketing Act—and I have it here and am ready to discuss it—or in any other act where a minister has asked parliament to anoint him with the powers which the minister asks for in this bill.

Mr. GARDINER: May I repeat what I said when the hon. member was not here. If the hon. member wants to follow that argument further I suggest that he amend section 3 by inserting the words "already entered into", and then I shall not have the powers he complains of. The only reason I need these powers is to do what I am asked to do by the other side of the house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When the minister starts advancing an amendment with such anxiety I begin to wonder what is behind the suggestion and the anxiety he has. I am not going to deal with that at all.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want any extra power. That is the only anxiety.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am glad to see that the minister does not want any extra power. Therefore I am going to suggest that the minister should not be the one to establish one or more commodity boards to carry out the powers and direction and controls to be exercised by him. The authority to appoint those boards invariably rests in the governor in council.

Mr. GARDINER: It is there.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, no; that is the point. Section 4 (1) says:

The minister may establish one or more commodity boards . . .

While the minister says that only the governor in council can establish these boards, that is not what the bill says. The only power of the governor in council is in section 5 (1), which says:

The governor in council may make regulations for carrying any of the purposes or provisions of this act into effect . . .

It does not refer to the making of appointments. The only appointments that the governor in council has anything to do with are provided by section 7 (1) which says:

The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, employ such professional, technical or other officers, clerks and employees as are necessary for the proper administration of this act and fix their remuneration.

That is all. The establishment of the boards is not in the hands of the governor in council. Apparently the minister thought it was because, when he interrupted me a moment ago, he said that the bill so provides. The appointment of the boards is in the exclusive hands of the minister. In view of the fact that he thought the bill provided that it was in the hands of the governor in council, I suggest that section 4 (1) be amended in this particular, that where the word "minister" appears in line twenty-four the words "governor in council" be substituted. That is a reasonable suggestion and I think the minister will accept it.

Mr. GARDINER: To shorten up the argument, may I point out that the only authority which I have in this bill in connection with these matters is given to me by section 3.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No.

Mr. GARDINER: In that section the governor in council does make the regulations under which I operate. It simply states that I may pass it on to the commodity boards. The boards are then set up. I have no objection to putting in the words "governor in council". Let us put them in and get it over with.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not to get it over with, but because it is necessary.

Mr. WRIGHT: That is exactly the way our amendment read when the minister asked that it be changed.

Mr. GARDINER: We shall accept it. Let us get on with the bill. Apparently some hon. members are more interested in six o'clock than they are in getting on with the bill. Let us get through with this section and get on.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I move that the words "governor in council" be substituted for the word "minister" which appears on line twenty-four of subsection 1 of section 4.

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Section 4 as amended agreed to

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We now come to section 3, and I wish to refer to the preamble in order to discuss the section. The minister has said that he is anxious to get this bill through. I have listened almost continuously, except for an hour or so last evening, to what has taken place and have taken no part in the argument. Therefore I ask the indulgence of the committee at this time. The preamble sets forth the reason for the bill. It states that the reason for it is that certain agreements will continue in force and that for the purpose of enabling Canada to carry out these agreements the bill is being introduced.

The minister will admit that under section 3 the powers are unusually wide; that they could not be wider than those contained in the section if the minister had spent all his time in endeavouring to draft omnipotent powers. He has already told the committee that he was prepared to restrict them to any agreement already entered into. But aside altogether from that, the powers asked for are no less than and no greater than those under the communist government of Yugoslavia.

Mr. GARDINER: Or the Bennett government of 1934.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have heard much about the Bennett government. I have the act here and I would be ready to discuss it. As a matter of fact, that act was declared beyond the powers of parliament because of what it asked for. If the committee wish to discuss that act may I say that the powers asked for in it are infinitely less than anything asked for in this bill.

Mr. GARDINER: May I submit this for my hon. friend's attention. Judging by the legal information which has been given to me, I agree that the bill without this preamble and without the special conditions set out in it also would be ultra vires. The only thing that makes it intra vires is the special conditions that will exist and the necessity for carrying on as under what we previously called the War Measures Act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We now have the answer I have been trying to get.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member could have had it at any time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is also the question as to whether parliament in fact has these powers. Yesterday I raised the question because, after all, we are passing bills without having secured the opinion of the law officers of the crown with regard to the legality of these things, and placing it on the table. I am going to come to this in a moment.

Mr. GARDINER: We have received the opinion of the law officers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am going to ask for the production of these opinions because the editor of the Fortnightly Law Journal, an outstanding student of jurisprudence and an editor whose opinions are accepted, has concluded in several articles which he has written that, under the authority of the Canada Temperance Act case of 1946, the doctrine of emergency which is now being relied on by the minister is no longer of any force.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have a great deal of confidence in the hon. member's judgment as a lawyer. In his opinion is this bill legal or not?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will answer my hon. friend in one minute. I am going to discuss that case because the issue has to be faced. So much has been said in regard to the Natural Products Marketing Act and its illegality that the issue has to be faced in regard to this measure which, as I have already stated, goes far beyond anything that was ever covered by the Natural Products Marketing Act.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs was one of those who pointed out the difficulties in 1934 with all the power that he had at his command. When his government came into power the first thing they did was to attack that act and appoint lawyers to argue that it was not within the powers of parliament. These lawyers represented the dominion government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is that so?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes; I have it here for those who want to read, but before I come to that—

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a moment. Did the dominion attack its own legislation?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes; that is exactly it. That was the amazing attitude taken, because the question that was advanced was the illegality of the legislation in question.

Before I come to that, and I will discuss it at length, let me say this. The powers asked for by the minister to control the agriculture of this country other than wheat, in this act, were not exceeded, as I said a moment ago, by the Yugoslav people's assembly in a law passed on December 4, 1946, by which that country was brought under a complete system of socialism. I get that information from a magazine published by the Department of Trade and Commerce, issue of March 8, 1947. We place in the hands of the minister almost absolute power. The minister has stated that the reason for the preamble is to bring this bill within the power of parliament to enact, which indicates the doubts that those who drafted it had as to the legality of the powers asked for.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will ask the minister to answer this. The Minister of Agriculture said that was a fact. The Minister of Justice says it is not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Said what was a fact?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That the reason for the preamble was to cover the question as to whether or not the bill—

Mr. ILSLEY: That was not what the hon. gentleman said. He has just said that the reason for the preamble was that the government had doubts as to the legality of the legislation. It is not so.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Without it, without that preamble; and I was asking why this preamble was in the form in which it is. Listen to what it says:

> Whereas His Majesty's dominions and foreign countries, during and as the result of the war against Germany and Japan, were and still remain in grave distress for want of adequate food supplies;
> And whereas for the more efficient prosecution of the war and in order to assist in the relief of suffering and the distribution of food supplies the government of Canada entered into agreements for the sale or export of food supplies to other governments or agencies thereof, which agreements still continue in force; And whereas certain orders and regulations were made by the governor in council under the authority of the War Measures Act and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, for the purpose of enabling Canada to carry out the said agreements;

That is the first thing. The preamble sets out various conditions, and then it says:

> And whereas the said orders and regulations will expire on the thirty-first day of March,

1947, and it is necessary by reason of the existing national emergency that parliament confer authority to enable the government of Canada to fulfil its obligations—

I stop there for a moment and ask the minister, either of justice or of agriculture, to explain the nature of the existing national emergency upon which is founded the declaration in question in the preamble.

—to fulfil its obligations under the said agreements and to continue to sell and export food supplies to distressed countries for the relief of suffering and the distribution of essential food supplies, in order to maintain economic stability and to ensure an orderly transition from war to peace.

Now, sir, those are the words.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I remind the hon. member that the preamble should be discussed last. Standing order 76 reads:

In proceedings in committee of the whole house upon bills the preamble is first postponed, and then every clause considered by the committee in its proper order; the preamble and title to be last considered.

I did not stop the hon. member when he mentioned the preamble, and I have no objection to his referring to it in order to discuss section 3.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the purpose because, sir, the minister gave it as the purpose when he said that the power to do these things under this bill was dependent upon the wording in the preamble that set forth a situation that required extraordinary measures.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not what I said.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As long as it remains on Hansard the way it was said I am prepared to accept what was said at that time.

Mr. GARDINER: It will be there unless you change it. I was told after a similar remark the other night, by those who look after it, that I am noted as one of those who change Hansard the least.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister must not talk about that.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. From time to time there have been references in the committee to changes in Hansard. As I mentioned before, in my opinion that is a direct reflection on Hansard. The Hansard reporters are here to take down what is said. They are sworn to do so, and I do not think there should be any suggestion that members are not properly reported.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the minister ought to withdraw that.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not the minister; the suggestion is on the other side.

Mr. CASE: The hon. member said, "As long as it remains on Hansard".

Mr. GARDINER: And he was suggesting that somebody would take it off.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We will not discuss that any more. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that Hansard will record it. If it is as accurate as you say it is, it will record, I think, that my interpretation was in accordance with the words used by the minister.

Now we come to the section in question:

Subject to any regulations that may be made by the governor in council—

That is not by parliament.

—the minister may

(a) Sell or export agricultural products to the government of any country or any agency thereof pursuant to any agreement made by the government of Canada with the government of such country or with such agency and for those purposes may purchase agricultural products and make such arrangements for the purchase, sale or export of agricultural products as he considers necessary or desirable.

Now, sir, the price is the price determined by the minister. The only control that is placed on the price is that the price which the farmer shall receive shall be in accordance with the price and the agreement which the minister has effected. Having regard to agricultural prices today in this country, as compared with those in the United States of America, this is asking parliament to place a tremendous power in the hands of the minister. I secured the latest prices I was able to obtain for farm products that would come within the ambit of this particular bill. The date in question is March 1, and the following are the prices that I have been able to secure: hogs in the United States, Chicago, $29.08; in Toronto, $16.50, grade A plus $1 per hundred pounds bonus. In the case of cattle, good steers, $25.15 at Chicago, $15 at Toronto. Lambs, $23.60 at Chicago, $16 at Toronto. Potatoes, $2.70 at New York, $1.23 at Saint John, per 75 pounds. Oats, on March 16, 99 cents Chicago, 61·5 Winnipeg. These figures indicate a large discrepancy as between prices in Canada and those in the United States. I suggest that the minister should consent to appending to this bill a list of the contracts to which this bill will be applicable. The other day he was kind enough to let me look over those contracts and also the orders in council founded thereon. If parliament is to retain any degree of control over the minister, a list of the contracts should be appended to the bill.

In regard to the other power which is conferred on the minister, namely, the power to make further agreements at his will, I suggest that is placing in him altogether too great a power. In other words, he continues to make agreements without consultation with parliament and without regard to prices which are determined upon. We have had this experience before, for instance, in connection with the wheat agreement. We are now about to enter into the field of an international wheat agreement. The government enters into an agreement, binds the country, and then comes back to parliament and says, "we require enabling legislation in order to support the contracts which we have entered into". All that amounts to, sir, is making parliament a pawn in the minister's hands to carry out the agreements that he makes, independent of parliament, without consultation with parliament and without permitting parliament to consider the prices, whether fair or unfair.

Mr. MITCHELL: I just want to ask my hon. friend this simple question; at least to me it is a simple one. How would he expect 243 people to negotiate an agreement of this kind?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, that does not approach the subject at all.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is too direct.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As long as the minister stays with labour matters, he will have enough difficulties, I should think.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will take care of myself. Don't you worry about that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Take care of labour. Don't take care of yourself.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will take care of labour.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Let us in this case endeavour to restore to parliament its rightful place instead of turning over to a minister arbitrary and uncontrolled powers; for under this bill and under this section parliament is asked to show the greatest manifestation of faith in one man that any parliament has ever been asked to.

I come now to the question of the legality or illegality of this legislation. I shall refer to a case in point, because I should like to hear—and I am sure the committee would—my right hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, expounding the proposition upon which parliament is being asked to pass this legislation which is similar in part to that declared ultra vires in 1937, particularly having regard to the decision in the case of Attorney General of Ontario and Canada Temperance Federation, which is reported in 1946 Appeal Cases at page 193. I read in part from that judgment, dealing as it does with the question of emergency which heretofore lawyers have believed justified parliament in passing legislation which, in its essence, infringes on the rights of the province under provincial jurisdiction of property and civil rights. This is what the head-note says:

> The British North America Act, 1867, nowhere gives power to the dominion parliament to legislate in matters which are properly within the competence of the provincial legislatures merely because of the existence of an emergency.

And I repeat those words, "merely because of the existence of an emergency."

> An emergency may be the occasion which calls for legislation, but it is the nature of the legislation itself, and not the existence of emergency, that must determine whether it is valid or not. The true test must be found in the real subject matter of the legislation; if it is such that it goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must, from its inherent nature, be a concern of the dominion as a whole, then it will fall within the competence of the dominion parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, though it may in another aspect touch on matters specially reserved to the provincial legislatures.

The next portion of the head-note deals with the particular case. Having regard to the extraordinary powers which are asked for and what has happened to similar legislation in the past, I think the Minister of Justice might well, at the earliest possible moment, place before the committee and the country the attitude of the Department of Justice in regard to this bill and other similar emergency and extraordinary legislation.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 3 carry?

An hon MEMBER: Six o'clock.

Mr. FULTON: If it is necessary to say anything, I shall be glad to do so. But it is now six o'clock.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 20, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION

CANADIAN DELEGATION TO GENEVA MEETING OF INTERIM COMMISSION

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce the personnel of the Canadian delegation to the next meeting of the interim commission of the world health organization which will be held in Geneva, Switzerland, on March 28. The delegation is as follows: Doctor G. D. W. Cameron, deputy minister of national health, Doctor T. C. Routley, executive secretary of the Canadian Medical Association as alternate delegate, and Doctor J. A. Melanson, chief medical officer for New Brunswick, who will act as technical adviser.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will there be any delegates from Russia?

Mr. MARTIN: I can only say that that country is represented on the interim commission.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT IN DEBATE ON MARCH 19

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege and in fairness to the house, yesterday afternoon at page 1535 of Hansard I made this statement:

When his government came into power the first thing they did was to attack that act and appoint lawyers to argue that it was not within the powers of parliament.

I was referring to the Natural Products Marketing Act. My statement continued:

These lawyers represented the dominion government.

Mr. Ilsley: Is that so?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; I have it here for those who want to read.

Sir, I was in error in that statement. I was misled by the nature of the question that was asked of the privy council, which was:

Is the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, as amended by the Natural Products Marketing Act Amendment Act, 1935, or any of the provisions thereof and in what particular or particulars or to what extent, ultra vires of the parliament of Canada?

Then I read from the argument that was advanced by counsel for the appellant, which were counsel for the province of British Columbia. So the statement I made yesterday was in error, and in fairness I wish to state that.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER—FORM AND PROCEDURE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before questions are called perhaps hon. members will allow me to say just a word about questions as this is a matter which affects all of us, as respects both time and expense. I am sure hon. members have felt, as I have sometimes, a little bit annoyed at questions being called and then being allowed to stand, this continuing from week to week and occasionally from month to month. This has been due to the fact that some questions require a great deal of research before they can be answered. Many are standing on the order paper which might well be made orders for returns.

It is obvious that the question of time is important in getting into the business of the afternoon. If the time required for questions could be abbreviated it would be to the advantage of everyone.

There is also the question of the expense involved in preparing answers to some of the questions. It may surprise hon. members to know that that expenditure runs into very considerable figures, particularly in the preparation of returns. The house has from time to time drawn attention to the desirability of limiting rather than increasing the number of civil servants, but to answer many of these questions and to prepare returns involves bringing on additional staffs. That is one of the considerations which should be taken account of by members in preparing questions and notices of motion for which they wish to have returns.

I thought it desirable to ask the Clerk of the House, who is an authority on these matters, to give me a memorandum which I could read to hon. members so that they will not mistake the intention or purpose of the ministry where in answer to questions ministers may feel obliged to say that they have such-and-such information but cannot give more. Because a minister has not answered all that is asked for in a question is no reason why the question should stand. We have to take the responsibility for the answers we give. They may not be satisfactory, and exception may be taken to that fact, but the government itself must decide what answer it shall give to different questions.

Mr. FRASER: Before the Prime Minister reads the memorandum may I be permitted a question? Does he not think that some of the questions on the order paper save the taxpayers of Canada a great deal of money?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not as yet come across any of that kind that my hon. friend has asked.

Mr. FRASER: Thousands of dollars have been saved by these questions. Take "George's Wife," for instance.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I did not hear my hon. friend's remark, but I did see him nodding his head vigorously and I take it he was agreeing with me.

Mr. FRASER: A question I did ask last year saved the country a great many dollars.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Both the hon. member and the government are to be commended for that.

Mr. FRASER: The government would not have saved the dollars if I had not asked the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, may I now read this memorandum which I have received from the Clerk of the House, who is an authority on the rules and procedure of the house. The memorandum is as follows:

Members of the House of Commons are entitled under standing order 44 to place questions on the order paper seeking information from the ministers of the crown relating to public affairs. The rule does not compel ministers to answer but it says that in replying no facts are to be stated except so far as may be necessary. The rule also provides that no debate is allowed on the answer to a question.

It is a mistake to believe that any kind of question dealing with government business may be asked on the floor of the house. All the authorities such as Hatsell, May, Redlich, Cushing, Todd and Bourinot agree that unless certain rules are observed considerable time can be wasted in putting and answering injudicious questions.

The practice now followed with regard to questions in the house does not conform with parliamentary procedure as observed in other British parliaments. It has been decided in the United Kingdom house that a question cannot be placed on the order paper if it seeks information set forth in documents equally accessible to questioner, as statutes, published reports, et cetera. When questions seeking information published in public documents are placed on the order paper in the United Kingdom, the minister concerned replies by giving the title of the document or blue book in which this information can be found. All printed government reports are distributed free of charge to members of the house.

A rule on which the United Kingdom house is very firm is that questions are inadmissible when they deal with matters referred to a parliamentary committee. This rule does not deprive the member of his rights or privileges; it merely places him in the right channel for procuring proper information.

Public interest at large should be the guiding principle in publishing information on government matters. It seems unfair to the taxpayers of the country that thousands of dollars be spent in the preparation of answers on matters that have only a local interest.

In many cases a letter to a minister or deputy minister would be sufficient for the member to get all the facts required. The purpose of a question, as "May" says, is to obtain information or press for action, and it should not be in effect a short speech or limited to giving information or framed as to convey a particular point of view. The rules of the house are so framed as to allow every member to use his right of being informed as to management of public affairs, but it must be understood that in a house of 245 members it is desirable that certain rules be observed lest parliamentary procedure degenerate in confusion and chaos.

That is the end of the memorandum. I place it on Hansard in order that hon. members may not feel that when a minister considers it necessary to answer a question briefly or to draw attention to the fact that certain expenditures will be involved in answering the question, it may not be the thought that the government is seeking to do other than to meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen opposite. All we are seeking to do is to save time and to save expense.

May I add this further word, and this applies to notices of motion for the production of papers. The government should not be expected to be in the position of a reference library to gather together information for members which they are in a position to gather for themselves.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): If the Prime Minister will permit a supplementary question on the statement he has just read, the authorities cited are nearly all British authorities, and I would ask whether they apply equally to this parliament, since our method of question and answer is fundamentally different from theirs. Members of the British parliament may put a question and then two supplementaries are permitted. It is much the same with research. The members here have few facilities for research, and the purpose of many of the questions is to seek information that would require a great deal of research on the part of a private member. I have often wondered whether facilities should not be granted to private members to get some research work done for them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend knows, where there is no specific rule to the contrary we follow the practice of the United Kingdom parliament. The memorandum which I have just read, in pointing out that the United Kingdom parliament follows a certain procedure upon which authorities are agreed was meant only as a general guide to the house. I am not stating that that is the precise rule we should follow, but that we seek to follow their practice in so far as it is advantageous for us so to do. In the British house, as I recollect, questions are put on the order paper which are answered in the same manner as our questions placed on the order paper are answered. The only questions that are allowed in addition to questions on the order paper when they have been answered are questions arising out of those answers. No new questions at all except by special arrangement with the Speaker in advance are allowed as is frequently done here. Further questions, as my hon. friend has said, are limited to supplementary questions.

As to the matter of research, I think the government would be only too ready to provide facilities where it is obviously desirable and possible that those facilities should be granted. But there can be a great abuse of the advantage of using the public service to gather information where that information is intended for local rather than national purposes. I am just suggesting that all hon. members take these factors into consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Prime Minister if we might not adopt in some modified form, to meet the conditions of this parliament, the system which is followed in the old land? Actually what the Prime Minister says is partly true, but I think he might go a little farther. As I recall it, what happens in Britain is this. The question is first put on the order paper. This opens the avenue for further questions. The question which is first put on the order paper is not the main question at all; it is simply a lead, and then supplementary questions which are the real kernel of the nut are asked afterwards. It seems to me that something of the kind might be done to help us here; because whether by design or by accident this government has fewer questions directed to it than are directed to most governments under similar circumstances.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the hon. member is quite right in saying that questions put on the order paper in the United Kingdom are put there with the intention of opening the avenue to supplementary questions. They are put there to get an answer to those questions specifically. If the answer given is satisfactory there will be no supplementary questions at all. The important point is this: the purpose of having questions put on the order paper in the first instance is that the ministry may prepare itself for any additional questions that may be asked. In other words the ministry will not have to answer offhand any questions which may be asked on the orders of the day but will have an opportunity to become in advance fully informed in the event of any supplementary questions being asked in regard to any questions on the order paper.

Mr. GRAYDON: Urgent questions do not have to go on the order paper.

QUESTIONS

CANADAIR LIMITED

Mr. FRASER:

1. What was the cost to the dominion government for property, equipment, tools, etc., of Canadair Limited?

2. What was the total cost from the time of purchase of property by the dominion government until sold to a private firm recently?

3. What was the total of (a) materials; (b) maintenance; (c) wages; (d) other costs, during the time the dominion government owned and operated this plant?

4. What was the total amount of sales of planes, or other materials?

5. What was the sales price of the government-owned Canadair Limited which was sold or leased this year?

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. At what price was Canadair, Ltd., sold to Electric Boat, Ltd.?

2. Were any bids for Canadair, Ltd., received from Canadian industrialists or firms?

3. Who owned Canadair, Ltd.?

4. What was the cost?

5. What was the operating profit of Canadair in 1946? In 1945?

6. How much, if any, depreciation had been charged to operations in 1946? What was the total depreciation charged to operations since the inception of Canadair, Ltd.?

7. How many were employed by Canadair, Ltd., as at December 31, 1946?

Mr. HOWE: These questions have not been answered until now because to answer them without giving the background of the transaction might well be misleading. There is the further reason that announcement of a new long-range transport plane travels around the world, and it did not seem desirable to give any information about a new plane until all the information was complete. I shall now ask the indulgence of the house to make a statement on the entire transaction which will, I think, answer all the questions relating to the matter which are on the order paper.

The aircraft plant at Cartierville, P.Q., was constructed by the dominion government in 1942, for the production of P.B.Y. (Catalina) and P.B.Y. (Canso "A") types of amphibian aircraft, in response to an urgent demand for aircraft of this type from the R.C.A.F. and from the air services of the United States, it being represented that important operational assignments made the procurement of these planes imperative. A total of 340 P.B.Y. aircraft were produced at the plant between September, 1943, and March, 1945, and in addition, 29 P.B.Y. aircraft were assembled, at St. Hubert, from parts built at Cartierville. A further 119 hulls and 172 centre sections were built at Cartierville and shipped as components to the United States. The first aircraft were delivered within nine months of the start of production. This was a remarkable feat for a group of working men and women who had little or no experience in aircraft manufacture. It will be seen from the production schedule, which I will ask to have printed in Hansard, that the aircraft were produced at a satisfactory rate, and that substantially more than half of the production was purchased by the United States government.

The total cost of the facilities at Cartierville, including land, buildings, plant, machinery and tooling, amounts to $21,825,777.33.

Early in 1944, it became apparent that additional orders for P.B.Y. types would not be forthcoming. It was imperative that plans be made either for closing the plant and laying off some 8,000 skilled workers then in employment, or alternatively that another type of aeroplane should be undertaken. Requirements for fighter planes for the R.C.A.F. were well in hand, but both R.C.A.F. and Trans-Canada Air Lines had substantial requirements for long range transport planes. The stated requirement of R.C.A.F. for long range transport was then a minimum of 50 aircraft, and for TCA, a minimum of twenty-five aircraft. At that time, practically all four-engine long range transport planes were being built in the United States, and, of course, the Douglas C-54 was generally considered to be the best. An extensive study was made by Canadian engineers, in collaboration with Douglas and Rolls Royce, to determine the type of plane best suited to Canadian requirements. The conclusion was that the commercial adaptation of the Douglas C-54, known as the DC-4, powered with Rolls Royce engines, would be the aircraft peculiarly well adapted to Canadian service and commercial air line requirements.

The government therefore negotiated with the Douglas Aircraft Company, and secured a licence agreement under which Douglas undertook to furnish plans of its DC-4 type, as well as its DC-6 type then being designed, and to assist in the development, redesign and construction in Canada of an aircraft based on Douglas designs and fitted with Rolls Royce power plants. In this arrangement, the Rolls Royce Company cooperated fully. The negotiations were completed in the fall of 1944.

The Cartierville plant had been built and managed for the crown, under a management agreement, by Canadian Vickers Limited, who had additional aircraft facilities at St. Hubert. Later, in 1944, the Canadian Vickers Company was engaged in an extensive shipbuilding programme for the allied navies and the merchant service, which involved heavy financial commitments. It was considered advisable to ask Canadian Vickers to divest itself of its management responsibilities related to the Cartierville plant, and to devote its full resources to shipbuilding. The government then entered into a management contract with a group of men who were at that time in charge, for Canadian Vickers, of the management of the Cartierville plant. These men formed a corporation, under the name of Canadair Limited, as a privately-owned management company, charged with the exclusive duty of operating the Cartierville plant as agents of the crown for the production of transport aircraft, as well as to carry out further commitments such as subcontracts for the United States navy for the production of P.B.Y. hulls and centre sections. These latter orders engaged the facilities at Cartierville until March, 1945. During the same period, engineering and tooling for the Canadian transport plane was advanced as rapidly as possible, having regard to the fact that Canadair, Douglas, and Rolls Royce were then filling important war commitments.

After the end of the European war in May 1945, United States subcontracts were terminated. Employment at Cartierville was then maintained by accepting contracts from commercial air lines in Canada, the United States, South America, and Europe to meet a desperate peacetime need for transport equipment. Engineering and tooling for our four-engine plane had not reached the point where facilities at the plant could be fully employed, and therefore orders were accepted from more than 16 commercial operators for the conversion of United States Army Dakota type transports to the commercial DC-3 type. The work involved stripping down army planes and practically rebuilding them into transport types, almost the equivalent of building a new aeroplane. This work commenced in the early summer of 1945 and is still in progress. Up to the middle of September 1946, 87 DC-3 aircraft had been delivered, and this work is still continuing. The integration of these various programmes enabled a high level of employment to be maintained at Cartierville, and also enabled the plant to retain the services of trained personnel for the production, in due course, of a programme of four-engine transport planes.

The first four-engine transport plane, named the North Star, left the assembly line in June, 1946, less than two years after the programme was initiated. This prototype has performed satisfactorily, and has fulfilled the expectations of the group that planned the new plane. A total of seven finished aircraft have been produced to date, and it is expected that TCA will operate six of these planes in its regular transatlantic service on or about April 1st, 1947.

Out of several long range transport planes planned by manufacturers in the United States and the United Kingdom at about the same time, some of them earlier, only one is in operation to date, namely the Lockheed Constellation. Operational experience with that plane has not been altogether satisfactory, resulting in its being grounded for periods on two occasions. The Canadian plane being the second post-war transport plane, it was felt that exhaustive tests under all conditions of weather should be made before the plane was put in operation. These have been conducted during the winter months, and minor modifications have resulted. It is worthy of note that ours is the second post-war plane to go into operation. Not a bad record for Canada.

Total value of all production at the Cartierville plant up to September 14th, 1946, which is the date of transfer of the management to Electric Boat Company, was as follows:

U.S. government contracts and sub-contracts	$ 54,780,000
R.C.A.F. contracts for P.B.Y.'s	27,340,000
Trans-Canada Air Lines for DC-3 conversions	2,730,000
Foreign customers for DC-3 conversions	10,480,000
Inventory on hand at September 14, 1946	9,750,000
Total	$105,080,000

Employees at Canadair Limited at December 31, 1946, totalled 7,383 persons.

During 1946, the Electric Boat Company, a substantial American corporation, became interested in the Cartierville project. This company, with large financial resources, had examined carefully into Canadian economic conditions, and became convinced that it could wisely and profitably engage some of its liquid capital in Canada. After extensive negotiations, Electric Boat Company acquired substantially all of the stock of Canadair Limited, and has entered into an agreement with the Canadian government, effective as of September 14, 1946, covering the crown facilities, contracts, etc., at Cartierville. The main features of the agreement are as follows:

(a) Electric Boat Company to provide Canadair Limited with $2,000,000 working capital forthwith;

(b) Canadair Limited to waive all claim or right to fees or profits from the beginning of its operations to and including September 14, 1946;

(c) Canadair Limited to buy at book value the assets of the project, as at September 14, 1946, exclusive of plant, tools and automotive equipment, and to assume the liabilities as set out on the balance sheet of the project prepared as of that date;

(d) Canadair Limited to buy such automotive equipment as it might require, at prices to be agreed upon with War Assets Corporation;

(e) Canadair Limited and the government to enter into a fifteen-year lease-option agreement covering the plant facilities and tools, under which the company will pay a fixed annual rental of $200,000, and will have an option to acquire all of the facilities, including the tools, at an inclusive price ranging from $4,000,000 in the first year to $2,511,961 in the 15th year;

(f) Of the assets to be purchased by the company, a balance of $3,886,821.10 to be paid for in equal quarterly instalments from June 30, 1947 to December 31, 1948, with interest on the unpaid balance at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum;

(g) The government to assign to Canadair Limited its licence agreement with the Douglas Aircraft Company;

(h) Canadair to agree to sell to the government and Trans-Canada Air Lines 24 R.C.A.F. type and 20 T.C.A. type aircraft at negotiated fixed prices of $630,000 and $660,000 each respectively, sales tax extra.

Before entering into this agreement, the Department of Reconstruction and Supply satisfied itself that this company is able to provide capable and experienced management for the plant. Mr. W. Oliver West, an early officer of T.C.A., who had since become manager of operations of the Boeing plant at Seattle, and had been in responsible charge of the gigantic war production of Boeing, was designated as president of Canadair. The government is satisfied that the present Canadair Company is providing expert and experienced management for the Cartierville property.

Shortly after the war ended, requirements of both the R.C.A.F. and T.C.A. were revised downward. The present requirement of R.C.A.F. is for 24 aeroplanes and for T.C.A., 20 aeroplanes. This reduction in requirements has of course added to the cost of each individual plane, although the cost of the planes is still well below the cost of purchasing and importing into Canada planes of competitive type.

I will now table a statement showing aeroplanes produced each month from the Cartierville plant, together with a list of purchasers of DC-3 conversions. I would ask that these tables be printed in Hansard.

I believe that this statement answers all questions regarding this matter now standing on the order paper.

Mr. FRASER: Is the minister tabling the financial statement?

Mr. HOWE: After my hon. friend has examined this statement, if he has any supplementary questions we shall be glad to consider them.

WAR ASSETS—OFFICE EQUIPMENT

Mr. BROOKS:

1. How many (a) typewriters; (b) adding machines; c) calculating machines; (d) mimeograph or duplicating machines, have been disposed of since January 1, 1945, through War Assets Corporation?

2. How many of each such type of machine have been sold back to their original manufacturers?

Mr. FRASER:

1. Since January 1, 1946, what is the total number and cost of all new office equipment purchased by the government, classified in accordance with the type of equipment, for example: desks, chairs, filing cabinets, tables, etc.?

2. Since January 1, 1946, what is the total number and value of all office equipment, classified as above, disposed of by the government through War Assets Corporation or other means?

Mr. FRASER:

1. To what firms, or individuals, did the War Assets Corporation sell office equipment?

2. What quantity was sold to each individual, or firm?

3. What price was paid by each individual, or firm for same?

4. What was the original price of this office equipment?

Mr. McILRAITH: On February 17, in answer to the two questions standing in the name of the member for Peterborough West and the one in the name of the hon. member for Royal, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply made a lengthy statement. I do not propose to repeat that statement now, but it was pointed out that the answers to the questions as asked would be incomplete and that they would involve an expenditure of about $5,000. It was left to the hon. members whether in the circumstances they desired to have the answers provided, and since that time nothing more has been said about the matter. The questions have continued to stand on the order paper. I suggest, in the light of the circumstances, that unless hon. members otherwise desire, the statement be taken as an answer, without prejudice to their right to redraft their questions and put them back on the order paper in a form in which they can be answered, having regard to the difficulties I have mentioned.

Mr. BROOKS: I suggest that they be either answered or dropped. The cost about two weeks ago was $3,500 and now it is $5,000; if they remain on much longer, dear knows how much more the cost will be.

Mr. KNOWLES: It will go up, like the cost of living.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. McILRAITH: So that the record will be straight, I want to read an excerpt from the minister's statement as reported at page 476 of Hansard of February 17:

I trust that under the circumstances hon. members will decide for themselves whether the three questions are worth $5,000 to the recipients. I suggest that in the meantime, if hon. members are not willing to allow them to drop, the questions stand for further consideration.

Mr. BROOKS: There is another item somewhere else.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, this looks like concerted action by the government to throw up a smokescreen on the question of expense.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The official lecturer of the opposition.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

I. G. FARBENINDUSTRIE

Mr. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia):

1. Is the I. G. Farben company or any subsidiary of such company operating in Canada?
2. If so, what is the nature of produce of these companies and what are their affiliations with other companies?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. No; investigations are still proceeding with the view of ascertaining any relations which the I. G. Farbenindustrie may have had with Canadian enterprises through affiliated or subsidiary enterprises or companies in allied or neutral countries.

2. Answered by No. 1.

HOUSING—SHOQUIST CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. JOHNSTON:

1. How many houses has the Shoquist Construction Company contracted to build and/or has built for the Department of Reconstruction and Supply, and/or the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation?
2. Where are these houses located?
3. How many types of houses are there being built and/or have been built by this company?
4. (a) What is the total amount of money paid to this company to date? (b) what is the total amount of money yet payable under the contract?
5. What is the contract price for each type of house?
6. What provision is made in each type of contract for the payment of fair wages to employees?
7. What provision is made in each type of contract for the payment of fair wages to subcontractors' employees?
8. What provision is made in each type of contract for the payment of fair wages in the case of piece work by (a) contractor; (b) subcontractor?
9. Does the contract specify that outside painting be done by brush or by spray gun or both?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. 300 houses for Wartime Housing Limited.

2. In Calgary, Alberta.

3. Three types.

4. (a) At February 10, 1947, $398,073.31; (b) at date, $334,377.21.

5. H.5/6—4 room (asbestos shingle siding), $1,900.41; (wood siding), $1,942.41.

H.15/16—6 room (asbestos shingle siding), $2,443.56; (wood siding), $2,491.56.

H.45/46—5 room (asbestos shingle siding), $2,307.13; (wood siding), $2,355.13.

The above contract calls for sheet rock, masonite, asphalt shingles, asbestos shingles, rough lumber, hardwood flooring, mineral wool insulation and paper and felts being supplied by Wartime Housing Limited.

6, 7 and 8. In all cases, the main contract specifies that wages and working conditions shall conform to the requirements of provincial legislation and to current practice for the trades in the area. Subcontractors are bound by the labour requirements of the main contracts.

BARBED WIRE AND NAILS

Mr. WHITE (Middlesex East):

1. How many tons of steel have been used each year in the manufacture of barbed wire since the inception of the wartime regulations on barbed wire?
2. What was the estimated saving in steel each year due to these regulations?
3. What has been the production, in tons, of nails in the years from 1938 to 1946, inclusive?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Production of barbed wire from the outbreak of world war No. 2:

Year	Production N.T.	Steel Required N.T.
1939	12,449	16,600

Totals (1942-45) ..	44,122	58,829

Note: Restrictive order re production of barbed wire first issued June 30, 1942.

2. Based on the 1939 to 1941 average, the consumption of steel for the years 1942 to 1945 inclusive would have amounted to 71,224 net tons. Actually 58,829 net tons were used during this period for the production of barbed wire, therefore, a total of 12,395 net tons were made available for more essential products.

3. Production of nails:

	N.T.
1936	59,342
1937	62,399
1938	57,806

1945	70,021

1946 only 58,831 net tons produced due to steel strike.

WARTIME HOUSING—ARVIDA

Mr. GAGNON:

1. How many houses in the city of Arvida, county of Chicoutimi, Quebec, are owned by wartime housing?

2. Has wartime housing decided to sell these houses to the Aluminum Company of Canada, Arvida? If so, on what terms?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. 334.

2. Negotiations are pending, but no final agreement has been reached as yet.

WAR ASSETS—CAMP BORDEN FURNITURE AND FIXTURES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What firm of auctioneers have been engaged to auction off the furniture and fixtures at Camp Borden military camp?

2. Who are the members of this firm?

3. What experience has this firm had; on what basis are they paid and on whose recommendation were they appointed?

4. What is the name of the auctioneer of this company who is conducting the sales and what experience has he had?

5. Will a cost price be given of each article sold and an estimate of the selling price published before each sale?

6. What other work, if any, has been given this firm by the government since the beginning of the recent war?

7. Does this firm conform to civic and municipal by-laws applying to all auctioneers and warehousemen?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No government owned property under the control of national defence was disposed of by public auction. Equipment purchased from regimental funds and not required by permanent or reserve army units was disposed of by public auction by Ward-Price Limited, auctioneers, Toronto.

2. Information not available.

3. Information regarding experience not available. The firm was engaged on the recommendation of the district officer commanding approved by command headquarters and paid on a commission basis from proceeds of sales.

4. Mr. Jack Miller. Information regarding experience other than through sales conducted for army units not available.

5. No.

6. None by the Department of National Defence. Employed by army units at Petawawa and in the Toronto area for sales by public auction of unit owned equipment.

7. The department has every reason to believe that the district officer commanding was satisfied that the firm operates under proper authority.

GOVERNMENT AND NATIONAL RAILWAY HOTELS

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. In what hotels has the government or the C.N.R. an investment and what is the amount in each hotel?

2. What has been the net profit of each such hotels annually during the past ten years?

7. If so, who are they and what is the amount of fees or other compensation paid or payable to each of them?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can only repeat what I said yesterday with respect to this question. Perhaps my hon. friend will now be willing to drop it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

LONGUEUIL, QUE., MILITARY CAMP

Mr. POULIOT:

2. CBK, Watrous, Saskatchewan, which is licensed to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

*WAR CONTRACTS

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North):

1. How many corporations in Canada with capital subscribed of (a) $1,000,000 and over; (b) $500,000-$1,000,000; (c) $100,000-$500,000; received war contracts between 1st September, 1939 and V-J day?

2. What was the value of contracts received by each of the above groups?

3. What was the total value of war contracts awarded between 1st September, 1939 and V-J day?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I could answer this orally. The government has no information as to what private corporations have capital subscribed of $1,000.000 or $500,000. I am afraid that it will be difficult to answer the question in its present form. Perhaps my hon. friend will agree to its being dropped and reworded.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

INCOME TAX—VARIOUS CATEGORIES

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the aggregate number of persons paying income tax for the calendar years 1938. 1942, 1944 in the following categories: (a) employees, clerical and professional; (b) employees, manual workers; (c) professional and small businesses; (d) farmers; (e) agricultural workers; (f) others?

2. What was the aggregate income taxes paid by persons in the following categories for the calendar years 1938, 1942, 1944: (a) employees, clerical and professional; (b) employees, manual workers; (c) professional and small businesses; (d) farmers; (e) agricultural workers; (f) others?

Mr. McCANN: Completed records are available only for the calendar years 1941 and 1942. Statistics for earlier years were maintained on a fiscal year assessed basis and contained a mixture of figures for several calendar years. Records for calendar years subsequent to 1942 are still being compiled.

The occupational classifications used in compiling income tax statistics are not identical with those outlined in the questions; in particular, employees consist of a single large group and are not subdivided into manual, clerical or agricultural as asked for. Subject to these limitations the information requested is contained in the following schedule.

1939-40 Fiscal Year

VETERANS AFFAIRS

DISPLACEMENT OF VETERANS AND PENSIONERS BY PERSONS WITHOUT PREFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has he received a telegram from the Regina branch of the Disabled Veterans' Association protesting the displacement of veterans and pensioners, including amputation cases, at National Defence building, 16 R.O.D. Regina, in favour of non-veterans, and informing him that veterans are apparently being told that a condition of continuing employment at this building was that they join the army for a period of three years?

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): I have not received such a telegram, but today I received a letter referring to such a telegram. I have not been able to look into the question yet but I will do so. From what I know of the way in which the army works, I am certain that the facts are not as related.

Mr. E. G. McCULLOUGH (Assiniboia): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Are veterans employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs being let out while others with no overseas veterans' preference are being maintained on the staff? If so, what is the exact policy of the government in this regard?

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I do not believe that statement is generally true. It might apply in specialized cases. I shall be very glad to look into my hon. friend's question further and give him an answer later.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the government consider introducing at an early day as an emergency measure its proposed amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I made a statement of the government's intentions with respect to old age pensions at the beginning of the session. My hon. friend will find the reference in Hansard. The answer today would be the same as he will find there.

Mr. KNOWLES: My question relates to the urgency of the matter. It is quite clear that it is to be done this session, but the months are going by.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

CANADAIR LIMITED

AIRCRAFT "NORTH STAR"—QUESTION AS TO USE OF JET ENGINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction on the statement which he has just made. Did the dominion government, in making a contract with the Electric Boat Company for the purchase of Canadair Limited, provide in any way for experimental work with jet engines in so far as the North Star is concerned? I ask this question because I understand that jet transport aircraft are now a commercial proposition and will make obsolete conventional types at present in production.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): The government is conducting development work, both on design of jet engines and on the development of aircraft to be operated by jet engines, but that work is being carried out at Malton. There is no jet development involved in the work at Cartierville.

INCOME TAX

COMPULSORY SAVINGS—REQUEST FOR REPAYMENT IN ADVANCE TO PERSONS IN NEED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. About two weeks ago I asked him if he would take into consideration the payment of compulsory savings before the due date. Is he now prepared to make a report on that?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I am not in a position to make any statement on it. The matter has already been considered and is being given further consideration, but I would not want to hold out any hope that it will be possible to do that. There are a great many difficulties in the way. The payments which fall due by March 31, 1948, which are the compulsory savings portion of the 1942 taxes, will be made within that period. That involves a substantial number of cheques and a substantial amount of clerical work. I cannot add anything to that, other than to say that the whole question is receiving consideration.

INDIVIDUALS AND CORPORATIONS—ARREARS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): I wish to make a statement with reference to a question asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), on Monday last. It had to do with the amount of income tax, interest and penalties thereon owing in each district office for income tax for each of the years 1939 to 1945 inclusive, in respect of individuals and corporations. That question was modified to the extent that he did not require the amount of interest and penalties. It is not possible to answer the question in the form in which it was asked, as it would entail a detailed analysis of over three million taxpayers' ledger cards. I may say that we do not do business, perhaps, according to the method that is ordinarily followed in accounting in industrial or mercantile firms. There is a ledger sheet and card set up for each individual taxpayer. And whatever credits there are to his account—for instance, if he pays in quarterly payments—are put to his credit. When the assessment is made, he is then debited with the amount of that assessment.

I might say to the hon. member that we will give such information as is available at the present time. I shall place on Hansard an analysis of the figures for March 31, 1946. Perhaps I should add that this is a consolidation of district office figures, according to the provinces in which the offices are situated. It so happens that there is a defect, from the standpoint of its being a provincial summary, in that some of the districts stretch into adjacent parts of other provinces. For instance, the district of Ottawa not only takes in certain counties in Ontario, but also extends up to districts such as Abitibi in Quebec. However, we will put this information on the record today. Although it shows the amounts outstanding, I might add that those outstanding amounts for the whole of the country amount to only three per cent of the actual collections made during the year ended March 31, 1946. While we have no breakdown as to former years, instructions have been sent out to district offices calling for this data as of March, 1947. It will take about two months before the information is available.

CIVIL SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED CONSIDERATION OF SALARY ADJUSTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. Is he in a position to make any comment on the statement which appeared in the press yesterday, which was attributed to the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), that civil service salary adjustments are being considered by the treasury board?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): I am not in a position to make a statement on that.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE, SALE AND EXPORT—COMMODITY AND PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 19, consideration in committee of Bill No. 25, to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products—Mr. Gardiner—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Before proceeding may I point out that when the committee rose last night it was considering section 3. May I remind the committee of standing order 58(2) which states:

Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

It has occurred to me that considerable latitude has been allowed hon. members in the committee up to the present time. From now on, however, I believe we should hold strictly to the rules of relevancy.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the minister be kind enough to answer the questions I put to him yesterday regarding actual commitments for exports to other countries?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I have all the answers, although one is still to be sent down to me. I understood however that the Minister of Justice desired to answer some of the questions asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre. When we have the legal side out of the way, I shall immediately give answers to the questions asked yesterday.

Mr. POULIOT: The minister will be good enough to give the answers this afternoon?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, as soon as the Minister of Justice has spoken.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) requested that an opinion be obtained from the law officers of the crown regarding the constitutionality of the measure before the house. I suppose it is in order to read that opinion while this section is before the committee, because it is this section which confers powers upon the minister, and the validity of which has been questioned.

Mr. POULIOT: How is it that the minister's opinion is not enough?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told it is not the practice for the Minister of Justice to give legal advice to the House of Commons. When legal advice is given to the house, he merely passes on what the law officers of the crown have decided, instead of giving his own opinion. I am told that is the practice in parliament. However, I shall add my own opinion. I think on most occasions it will be the same as that of the deputy minister.

The memorandum of the deputy minister, as furnished to me, is as follows:

Ottawa, March 20, 1947.

Memorandum for Minister of Justice Re Bill 25

You asked for an opinion as to the constitutional validity of the proposed agricultural products act now under consideration by the House of Commons.

Clauses 3 and 4 of the bill merely authorize the Minister of Agriculture, pursuant to agreements between Canada and the governments of other countries for the sale or export of food supplies, to enter into contractual transactions relating to the purchasing, storing, processing, selling and exporting of agricultural products, and in this connection to require any person to give information respecting his facilities for storing or processing of the same. These clauses contemplate a system of voluntary trading and appear to be clearly within the jurisdiction of parliament.

Clause 5, in effect, authorizes the minister, acting pursuant to regulations of the governor in council, to requisition supplies for the fulfilment of the contracts already referred to, and to determine the prices to be paid for such supplies. It is this power to requisition and fix prices that is called in question.

The decision of the privy council given in 1937, holding the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, to be invalid, has been mentioned as relevant to the question This act provided for the establishment of a dominion marketing board with power to regulate the time and place at which products should be marketed, and the manner of distribution, and the quantity and grade of the same, and to prohibit marketing of any products. It was held to be unconstitutional because, in effect, it purported to regulate transactions completed within a province and having no connection with interprovincial or export trade; that is to say, the purpose of the act was to regulate the conduct of business including business confined to a single province.

The present bill has no such regulative purpose but is merely designed to enable the government to fulfil its international obligations to continue to sell and export food supplies to distressed countries in order to maintain economic stability and to insure an orderly transition from war to peace. These national obligations arise directly out of the war. The power to requisition supplies by the government for such a purpose would seem to me to be in no way analogous to the powers to regulate trading given by the Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934.

There is, however, to my mind, a very definite analogy between Bill 25 and the act of parliament relating to paper control enacted in 1919 and held by the Privy Council to be valid in the case of Fort Frances Pulp and Power Company Limited and Manitoba Free Press Company Limited. The purpose of that legislation was not only to control prices of paper but also to control the supply of paper itself during the abnormal conditions following the war of 1914-1918.

Reference is made in the preamble to the bill to an existing national emergency as establishing the need for the proposed legislation and it has been suggested that the validity of the statute depends on the existence of such a national emergency. In this connection the view has been put forward that as a result of the decision of the Privy Council in the recent case of Attorney General of Ontario et al v. Canada Temperance et al the existence of such an emergency is no longer a valid basis for an act of parliament which affects property and civil rights in the provinces. I do not read the Canada Temperance Act case as having this result but on the contrary it seems to me to be abundantly clear that it holds that an emergency may not be necessary to validate federal legislation which in another aspect touches upon matters specially reserved to the provincial legislatures. The true test, according to this decision, is whether the real subject matter of the act goes beyond local or provincial concern and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the dominion as a whole. Such an act is within the competence of parliament though it may in another aspect touch upon matters specially reserved to the provinces. I should think that Bill 25 satisfies this test.

In the most recent pronouncement upon the subject of the emergency legislative power of parliament, viz., in the Japanese reference, the privy council said that very clear evidence that an emergency has not arisen or that the emergency no longer exists is required to justify the judiciary in overruling the decision of the parliament of the dominion that exceptional measures were required and were still required.

For the reasons given it is my opinion that the bill is within the competence of parliament to enact.

I do not think it is necessary to add anything to that opinion. Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre put forward the view, not dogmatically but for the consideration of the government, that the doctrine of emergency no longer was valid as a basis for dominion jurisdiction. He cited in support of that position the Canada Temperance Act case, and stated that that position had been taken by the editor of the Fortnightly Law Journal, and perhaps by others. Bearing in mind what I said in reply to the hon. member for Temiscouata, I am not going to venture into an opinion on the matter. However, I have read the Canada Temperance Act case and the subsequent case, that of the Japanese reference, and it appears to me that the true effect of the decision in the Canada Temperance Act case is that there does not have to be an emergency to found jurisdiction on the part of the dominion; that the dominion may have the power even when there is no emergency to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, even though its legislation touches upon matters ordinarily regarded as solely within provincial jurisdiction. In other words, the judgment of the judicial committee of the privy council as given by Lord Simon extends rather than narrows the powers of the dominion as they had therefore been conceived. It must be remembered that the Canada Temperance Act decision was not against the dominion; it was in favour of the dominion. It held the Canada Temperance Act to be a valid exercise of dominion constitutional powers. I do not think that in any sense that judgment can be taken as a decision narrowing the powers of the dominion to legislate in a national emergency.

Even in that judgment it was said that an emergency may be the occasion of legislation which under the general powers of peace, order and good government is valid. The subsequent case, that of the Japanese reference, founded the powers of the dominion pretty solidly upon national emergency. If the hon. gentleman has read the headnote in the Dominion Law Reports report of the case he will see the vexation of the headnote writer at what he considered to be the inconsistency of the judicial committee of the privy council. But I do not think there is any real inconsistency there. In this case, the case of the Agricultural Products Marketing Act, if I were asked to describe the nature of the emergency referred to in the preamble, I would describe it, perhaps not in legal or court language but in practical language, as being something like this: Great national interests are at stake in the sense that as an aftermath of the war the economic stability of the greatest national customer that this country has had in the past is endangered and it is in the national interest that food should continue to flow to the people of Great Britain in order that they may be in a position to produce goods and exchange them for our goods in the future and continue to be the great market that they have been in the past.

If a condition arises under which that position is imperilled as a result of war and during the war and for a reasonable time after the war, there is an emergent and extraordinary situation which puts in danger great national interests and justifies legislation by this parliament under the heading of peace, order and good government. As I say, these may not be the only aspects of the emergency but these aspects are, I submit, sufficient to occasion a valid exercise of the powers under the peace, order and good government clause.

To sum up: We do not need, under the Canada Temperance Act case, to establish a national emergency. Under that case a national emergency may be the occasion for passing legislation which is valid under the peace, order and good government clause. If there is a national emergency, that in itself may be the foundation of our jurisdiction, under the Japanese reference case and under the Fort Frances case. The emergent or extraordinary circumstances in this post-war situation, are, I believe, sufficient to form the basis of a valid exercise of the dominion's constitutional powers in the manner set out in the bill before the house. In that opinion I am supported by the Deputy Minister of Justice.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thank my right hon. friend for the detail in which he has answered the question I raised yesterday as to the constitutionality of this measure and of others that are before the house whose constitutionality must be dependent upon grounds other than that they come exclusively within the powers of the dominion parliament. I am not entering into any argument with the minister on this question because, as the minister said, no one can be dogmatic on matters such as this. After all it is not what one's opinion may be that ultimately determines the question; the final determinant will be the courts of the land. Equally strong opinions were given in 1934 as to the constitutionality of the Natural Products Marketing Act and the other measures of reform legislation which were so necessary to the welfare of the people but which, by reason of the distribution of powers as between the dominion and the provinces the courts determined were not within the legislative ambit of the dominion parliament.

I shall do no more than place before the committee the supporting evidence to which I made reference yesterday. I referred to Mr. Chitty, K.C. and his opinion given in the Fortnightly Law Journal of June 1, 1946, shortly after the opinion of the privy council had been handed down. Without going into detail, the conclusion to which he came was that the privy council had exploded the emergency doctrine.

As I listened to the minister today I was impressed by this fact, that there must be a line of demarcation when the federal parliament may no longer contend that the powers are exercised not because they come under section 91 but being under section 92 are available because they arise under the peace, order and good government clause. As I understood the minister's justification of this legislation it was that the economic stability of the United Kingdom, our greatest customer, was in grave danger; that it was necessary in the interests of our own economic survival to preserve that economic unit, and for that reason the dominion must be presumed to have the power to entrench upon property and civil rights within the provinces. The arguments of those holding that view were dealt with in this article by Mr. Chitty in these words:

> Much therefore as our constitutional theorist friends would like to see the Fort Frances case—

To which the Minister of Justice made reference:

> —as a precedent for an all-powerful dominion that could create emergencies at its whim and arrogate to itself overriding powers to legislate in any sphere without regard to the views of the provinces, we are afraid that even the Fort Frances case is a broken reed. That case never went further, as a sound precedent, than to decide that the emergency upon the existence of which the right to resort to government by order in council under the War Measures Act depended might continue to exist even after the war had officially come to an end.

The great danger with legislation such as this, commendable as it may be, is that a government may centralize power in Ottawa to the detriment of the provinces under the excuse of an emergency by the simple expedient by setting forth in the preamble that an emergency exists. There is danger to the set-up of conferedation in emergency legislation or in legislation passed under the general powers relating to peace, order and good government; for surely there must come some point where the dominion cannot use such an excuse of an emergency to secure for itself the power to interfere with the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces over property and civil rights.

More than that I am not going to say. I have raised the point and the law officers have given their opinion. But in regard to this legislation and also the wheat board legislation which requires compulsory powers it is interesting to note that away back in 1922 an opinion was given by the then deputy minister of justice denying the right of parliament to pass legislation compulsorily controlling the distribution or sale of farm products.

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1922?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was quite a long time after the war was over.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The war ended officially in 1921, did it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know when the treaty of peace was signed.

Mr. HAZEN: In 1921.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In 1921, and the question arose as to the continuance of the wheat board that was in existence during the first world war and in particular as to the power of the dominion parliament to pass legislation compulsorily dealing with wheat. The then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, at page 940 of Hansard of April 19, 1922, read the opinion of Mr. Newcombe, an outstanding lawyer, then deputy minister of justice, and subsequently a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada. I am not going to read it in detail. The Prime Minister on that occasion said this:

> With reference to the fourth report of the select standing committee on agriculture and colonization, in which the house concurred on the eleventh instant, I may say that the government has obtained the written opinion of the law officers of the crown upon the question thereby suggested as to the constitutionality of the reconstruction of the Canadian wheat board, and that opinion is now submitted for the information of the house.

There were many who believed that the Canadian wheat board should be continued, but it was discontinued in 1921. The Prime Minister at that time gave the opinion of the law officers of the crown, and this is the essence of that opinion. It will be found at page 942 of Hansard of 1922:

> It is clear that so long as a subject matter of legislation finds place within the enumerations of provincial powers it does not belong to the dominion under its general authority to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada. It is certain that the essential compulsory powers of the wheat board are prima facie included in the provincial enumeration of property and civil rights or local matters in the provinces. In my opinion these powers do not lie within the field which may be occupied by the execution of the dominion power to regulate trade and commerce, as that power has been expounded in successive decisions by the ultimate tribunal of appeal; and I think it may be affirmed without uncertainty that the necessary reconstructive powers are not comprehended in any other of the dominion enumerations. While I do not suggest a doubt that conditions of export from the dominion and foreign trade relations may be regulated by parliament, I am impressed with the view that these powers cannot be made a cover for legislation which denies the freedom of contract, capacity to buy and sell and the maintenance and exercise of proprietary rights which exist under the provincial laws. The powers of criminal legislation which belong exclusively to the dominion are in their application to this case of an ancillary character and cannot as such be invoked to afford a sanction for measures in themselves ultra vires. Consequently it is my opinion that the reconstruction of the wheat board in the present circumstances with the powers conferred thereon by the orders in council is a project constitutionally incompetent to the parliament of Canada.

The opinion of the then deputy minister of justice, Mr Newcombe, was concurred in by the minister of justice, Sir Lomer Gouin, and by Mr. D. D. McKenzie, who was leader of the Liberal party in 1917 and until the present Prime Minister became the leader. The essence of the opinion was that the compulsory features that were part and parcel of the Wheat Board Act were ultra vires. You will remember, sir, that after the first great war there was a serious economic condition. We have heard it repeated on a number of occasions in this chamber that prices were up and that subsequently there was deflation. These deflationary conditions were to a large extent in existence in 1921 and continued in 1922; yet at that time, even though it would have been of great benefit to the farmers to have the wheat board continued—and the western farmers demanded the continuation of the wheat board because of the then existing economic conditions—the opinion of the Department of Justice was that the granting of compulsory powers to control the direction, the diversion or distribution of wheat was not within the power of parliament.

I present this argument, sir, for the purpose of placing before the committee the other side of the question and the opinions given by another deputy minister of justice during a time of serious economic emergency.

I want to thank the minister for the opinion he has given. I have discharged my responsibility in asking for it.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. GARDINER: I agreed to put on the record some information with regard to the questioning which was done the other evening. A question was asked as to the number of cattle that were being shipped to the United States, and I gave a round figure of 70,000. There was some discussion as to what that represented, and I finally said that it would be better to get the figures correct and bring them here, or refer to the figures which had already been placed on Hansard. The figures are as follows: For dairy cattle, 69,539; purebred cattle, all kinds, 33,675, which makes a total export of 103,219.

A question was asked as to what was the highest year's export of eggs to Great Britain under our contract. The highest year's shipment to Britain was 1945 with approximately ninety million dozen delivered. A question was asked as to the proportion of exports to domestic consumption of farm products during the war. I am informed that the figures are not compiled and therefore not available beyond 1943. I have the figures for each year from 1939 to 1943 and they are as follows:

Exports, Imports and Domestic Disappearance of Agricultural Products as Percentages of Production, Canada, 1939-43

Year	Exports per cent	Imports per cent	Domestic disappearance[1] per cent
1939	22·03	4·34	68·42
1940	22·71	5·38	67·51
1941	26·03	5·41	81·78
1942	22·29	3·93	68·25
1943	44·30	5·01	87·92

[1]Note: Domestic disappearance, plus exports, minus imports, does not equal 100 per cent of production because of the influence of year-to-year changes in stocks.

Source: Quarterly bulletin of Agricultural Statistics, Vol. 38, No. 1, Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

I hold in my hand another sheet which does contain information which the hon. member for Temiscouata desired. I am sure the committee would not wish me to read it. The statement is a return which was made to the house in the session of 1946.

Mr. MacNICOL: Put it on Hansard.

Mr. GARDINER: I can have it put on Hansard with one more year added to it, if that will be suitable to Hansard. The question asked was for everything up to date. This statement is not up to date but it covers what was required. It has to do with the quantity of each food product sent by Canada each year from 1940 to 1945 inclusive to the various European countries, and what amount to each country. That information down to the end of 1946 was asked for last evening. The information for the year 1946 had not been compiled when I came into the house today but it will be completed and if the committee will permit I will have it all put on Hansard.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to make a suggestion to the minister on this section. As has been pointed out by various ministers, this is to fulfil contracts with Britain, and one of the most important items cited has been the bacon contracts with Britain, in which we have fallen short in the last few years. Coupled with this matter, the minister on March 17 made an announcement as to prices to be paid for oats and barley for the feeding of animals for meat products for those contracts, setting a floor price of 90 cents for barley, and pointing out that there would be a drawback or payment of 25 cents a bushel for that barley to those who did not grow barley and feed animals; and coupled with that, that there would be free freight from Fort William to eastern points and from Calgary and Edmonton to the west. That means that the people who produce the grain are certainly not going to feed hogs in the prairie provinces. It gets away entirely from the theory that we have always been led to believe in, that industry should be established close or adjacent to raw materials and power.

I do not think anyone will deny that if we are to have a sound economic system there is some truth in that theory, and therefore much the soundest economy would be to feed the animals on the same farm where the feed is grown for them. It would avoid dislocation in man-power and get rid of transportation difficulties.

When your feeders in the east buy grain at Fort William and are allowed a rebate of 25 cents a bushel on barley, it means in round figures that they will have an advantage of approximately $5 per hog over the man who grows feed on the same farm where he has produced the hogs in the west. That is quite a little item right there. The point I want to make is this. We have had a wide variation in the marketing of hogs in different parts of Canada, and it has been stated repeatedly that people in the United States obtain anywhere from 50 to 100 per cent more for their meat products in the Chicago market than we are getting in Canada today.

Apart from that, according to the live stock market review of February 8, put out by the Department of Agriculture. A dressed hog sold in Edmonton for $19.90 per hundredweight; in Winnipeg $20.55; in Toronto $21.75; in Montreal $22.25. That is a difference per hundred pounds dressed pork, as between Edmonton and Montreal, of $2.35 per hundredweight. I am not objecting to this freight assistance on feed grain. I am in favour of freight assistance to feeders in other parts of Canada. But when you consider that these feeders are receiving that freight assistance, and subsidies to the extent of $5 per hog on the feed for their animals, which I think comes out of the federal treasury, then if we are bound to have this system of subsidies, there should be some equalization of transportation costs to the eastern seaboard under the bacon arrangement.

I think the western producer is entitled to consideration there to balance up all that has been done for feeders in other parts of Canada. That $5 per hog is quite a distinct advantage. It is more than a 25 per cent difference in the cost to the feeder in his feed alone. The difference in freight between Edmonton and Montreal is, in round figures, considerably over ten per cent. When it is all added together, it represents a great disparity to the producers of bacon products in various parts of Canada.

I noticed in one of the newspapers today that leading authorities in the west have said that this policy will not get the desired increase in bacon production in Canada, and I fully agree with those who have made that statement as reported in the press in the last few days. I hope that the minister will give serious consideration to these points that I have raised and endeavour to establish a basis of equalization in transportation costs throughout the country in relation to the eastern seaboard, at least for the fulfilment of these bacon contracts. That could be readily done if we must have a system of subsidies for the fulfilment of these contracts. I would rather get along without anything of the sort, but if we are to have it there should be more fairness in the system.

Mr. GARDINER: One or two things I would like to say with regard to that, largely for the purpose of attempting to get the plan into the minds of our farmers particularly, in the light that we had hoped to.

In the first place, I am not going to attempt to answer the suggestion or propose a remedy for the suggested difficulty relating to the fact that freight is paid on grain coming east but freight is not paid on hogs. I will not attempt to meet that suggestion but will leave it for what it is worth and proceed to deal largely with the feed grain position.

The paragraph which appears in the announcement I made the other day, as reported at page 1408 of Hansard, perhaps does not explain the intention as fully as it might:

> Feeders, on the other hand, will be protected against any important increase in costs of the oats and barley they buy by appropriate subsidies, until the release of the products they sell from ceiling price controls. It will be observed that under this plan buyers and sellers may trade with each other without the intervention of the board, within the limits of the new floors and ceilings.

In other words, that paragraph anticipates that some time or other there will be a removal of ceilings not on grain alone but on other products and therefore some adjustments may require to be made. But what it is important to bear in mind at the moment is this. When the farm organizations and provincial representatives were here in December they made a proposal to the government. That proposal was that we pay $5 an acre on barley, and it was conditional upon the view held at that time that in all probability ceilings would not come off many of these products until the end of the crop year 1947-48.

We have already taken the ceiling off eggs, and probably ceilings will be coming off some other products as we proceed. With that condition existing, it was not thought that it would be possible to proceed along the proposed line of paying subsidies on an acreage basis, and I think that was fairly well agreed by all those who discussed it in December—that if the inclination was in that direction it would be possible to proceed that way. At the same time it was suggested that if we could not proceed that way then we should consider raising the prices of the feed grain to those who produce it in order to encourage the production of it. At that time I raised the question myself, as a representative there of the dominion government as to what the position would be in relation to the prices of hogs themselves if the price of grain were allowed to advance in Canada. Of course it was obvious at once that there would have to be some increase in the prices, or at least the producer of hogs contended that there should be some increases in the prices obtained. Immediately following that meeting, the British did propose an increase in the floor price of hogs; that is the floor price being continued as a result of the contract which we made on bacon and ham with Britain. There was a suggested increase of $4 a hundred on bacon, to begin in October. We discussed with them the possibility of advancing that amount and of paying $2 of it immediately. We sent Mr. Pearsall over to Britain along with Mr. Jones to discuss this with the British government, and it was agreed to. I am just stating this in order to indicate that the advance in price for hogs, which has been made as a result of the increased price on bacon, ought to be taken into consideration when gauging the relationship which now exists or will exist from September 1 on as between whatever the price of grain is then and the price of the product.

In addition to that, we should consider at the same time the fact that at some time—I do not know whether it will be in 1947 or will run on into 1948—ceilings will probably come off all meat and other products, and the adjustments which are then made with regard to grain prices will be made accordingly. I presume if the ceiling is off everything which is to be fed, then the ceiling may be off the grain too. But if it is not, there will have to be some adjustment of some kind to carry us along for a time.

Mr. MILLER: Would that be after the termination of existing contracts? No ceilings would come off until existing contracts had expired?

Mr. GARDINER: It would all depend on when a condition develops which will develop sooner or later. I do not know when it will develop, and I do not think anyone in the house can help me in that regard. I think we all believe, however, that sooner or later there will be a reduction in prices on the United States side of the line. If nothing else brings that about, greater production there of pork and other products will tend to do so. It has already been happening in connection with some dairy products. That being the case, there may come a time during this year or next when that balance may be reached—and it may be reached also with regard to grain—and when, by taking off ceilings, the whole thing would reach its own level and there would be no necessity for any further controls in order to obtain sufficient meat to fill the British contract, except to maintain the floor price in proper relationship to the domestic price. If the ceilings are taken off meats, dairy products, eggs and other things, then probably the ceilings can be taken off grain too, and the whole position may find its proper level at that time. But I repeat that does not deal with the question which is raised as to whether freight should be paid on hogs—and cattle too, I presume—being shipped east because grain is being shipped east at the expense of the government to feed live stock.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The minister will admit that this policy must tend to have bacon and beef produced only in certain sections of Canada. Most people are human and are after a profit. This policy certainly does tend to have the people in certain sections of Canada do the feeding. They purchase their grain such as barley at twenty-five cents a bushel, and it takes about twenty bushels to feed a hog. That is a $5 per hog advantage over the other people of Canada. So it does tend to have production just in certain sections of the country.

Mr. GARDINER: I would agree that from now until August 1, not knowing what the condition will be after that the inducement is to produce hogs in the areas outside those in which the grain was produced. That is probably the normal thing to do at this time. The hogs and cattle which will be fed in the early part of this year will be fed with grain already grown. The hogs and cattle fed in the latter part of the year will be fed with grain produced under this policy. So that the encouragement down to the first of August will probably not throw things out of balance to any degree. But there is an influence in the policy put out the other day which will tend to have the hogs produced in the east rather than in the west. There is not any doubt about that: But I cannot conceive of any policy, apart from an acreage bonus policy, which could have the opposite result. However, the acreage bonus policy would have been most difficult to apply along with an increase in the price of grain and an increase in the price of other products. You would be paying both ways if you had both things happen. We could not find any real way of doing the job other than in the way in which it is now being done.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister a few minutes ago purported to give an answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Temiscouata yesterday.

Mr. GARDINER: Which question is that?

Mr. McMASTER: The question which the hon. member for Temiscouata asked was this:

> My last question is this. Will the minister be kind enough to put on record on Hansard a list of the commitments actually in force regarding the shipments of agricultural products to other countries, by class or category of commodity.

It struck me that we are dealing with an act, and some of us perhaps do not know to what extent we are committed.

Mr. GARDINER: The question which is referred to there is the one to give the quantities for each one of the contracts and the prices at which they are to be delivered.

Mr. McMASTER: It did not say the price, but the price would I think, be important. What the minister read out was the proportion of each commodity that was shipped every week.

Mr. GARDINER: I did not read out this long one which gives much more information, but it is not exactly the information the hon. member is suggesting. This table which I could have referred to is in the Economic Annalist that we get out, dealing with all these matters, and the information is all given in tables. Unfortunately these tables are not as completely up to date as one would hope to find them. As I said to the hon. member for Temiscouata when he raised the question, there was one question about which I did not yet have full information. I hoped it would be here this afternoon, but probably I had better put on record what I have in case the complete information may not come in. Bacon, for the calendar year 1947, 350,000,000 pounds; for 1948, 400,000,000 pounds. In the agreement for 1947 the price of bacon was $25, but it was increased—and that figure does not show here—by $2 at the beginning of the year, and now it is to be increased by another $2 in September. That will make it $29. Unless something happens this year which changes the whole situation and requires further negotiations, that would continue on during the following year. The figure for beef, for 1947, is 120,000,000 pounds at $21 per hundred. For 1948 the effect of the way it is written into the contract is that it is 120,000,000 pounds. But the understanding is that they will take, and that they expect to be prepared to take whatever we can provide for them.

An hon. MEMBER: At the same price?

Mr. GARDINER: I would not want to be definite about that. I believe it is a higher price than is stated here, but I would not want to be too definite without having the full figures before me.

With respect to mutton and lamb, the period covered is again 1948, although no figures are given for that year. The figure for 1947 is 10,000,000 pounds. There is no price given in these tables.

[Mr. McMaster.]

With respect to eggs, there is provision for 83,000,000 dozen each year. The prices are not stated for the last two years. The price is stated for the year that has gone by. Then, they have gone up half a cent, following the announcement I made the other day, and there may be some further adjustment in that respect.

Cheese has been twenty cents throughout, since one of the very early years in the war. It is still twenty cents with the equivalent of the subsidy added, and for a number of years the quantity has been 125,000,000 pounds. While that amount has always been stated in the agreement that it shall not be less than 125,000,000 pounds, Britain has had a definite understanding from us during the last season that we would not be able to reach that figure. This has been left as an indication to our farmers that if they reach it, or even go by it, Britain is most anxious to have the cheese. However she has had that understanding from us in the last year, and it extends into the year ahead of us, namely that in all probability we shall not be able to produce that quantity.

Mr. KIDD: Is it the intention to continue the subsidy of two cents for 94 and one cent for 93?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but that has no relationship with the agreement, at all. We started that in 1939, before the war, and it has continued right along. There is legislation on the statute books making provision for it, and unless it is taken off, it will continue.

Then, the figure for evaporated milk is 600,000 cases. We have undertaken to ship that quantity in both 1947 and 1948. The price is $4.95 per case.

Mr. FERGUSON: If we ship next year approximately 103,000 head of dairy cattle to the United States, have we any hope of reaching an amount sufficient to fill these contracts?

Mr. GARDINER: The number of dairy cattle was 69,000; but that does not change the meaning of the question. I believe the exact number of dairy cattle shipped last year was 69,539. It has been going up during the war, each year.

Mr. FERGUSON: They were all for dairy purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: These are dairy cattle, although some of them may have been killed.

Mr. FERGUSON: They may have been killed, but they were shipped out of here as dairy cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. But I will just repeat what I have said before, that I think that is a good thing for the dairy farmer of this country, within certain limits. I do not say that to sell all his dairy cattle would be a good thing for him. But up until last year he has been increasing his number every year, without cutting down on the number of cows being milked. Last year the farmers did cut down slightly on the number of cows milked, and we began to get somewhat concerned about it. We would like to have the number stay up where it was in preceding years. But again the question of feed is involved, as well as the inducement which is given to the farmer to sell, because of the prices he can get. I would say that up until the year we have just come through the number of dairy cows the farmer could sell to the United States has been a help to him, rather than a hindrance.

Mr. FERGUSON: In view of the price for which the farmer can sell his dairy cattle in the United States, as compared with the lower price he would receive in Canada, is it a greater advantage for the farmer to get rid of his cattle rather than to retain them and receive a higher price for his product? It must be a distinct advantage for the farmer to ship his cattle to the United States and get rid of them. In the minister's opinion is it owing to the fact that the price the farmer is receiving for his products is not high enough to induce him to keep the cattle?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no doubt that the prices of dairy products, the price of cattle and the price of everything of that kind is higher on the United States side of the boundary line. If we were to open up the boundary on everything, the same as we do with respect to breeding stock, and include dairy cattle, then of course all our food products would go to the United States. There can be no doubt about that, under present conditions.

But that, again, is all part and parcel of the price control policy we have followed in Canada, a policy which most of us think has done a better job for Canada than would have been done by allowing such slipshod activities as have been going on in the United States. Most of us here believe that. And if we believe that, then of course there is only one thing to do. If we think the dairy farmer in Canada is being hurt, then the thing to do is to do the same in connection with dairy cows as we have done in connection with all other products. We do not allow other products to go to the United States. We just say they cannot go.

I do not believe, and I did not believe during the war that it would be a good thing for the dairy industry of this country to close the boundary line with respect to the shipment of dairy cows out of this country into the United States. Indeed, I think it would be a bad thing for the dairy farmer, and I think most dairy farmers believe that.

Mr. MILLER: I should like to ask the minister two questions, which do not relate to each other particularly. In the first place, I am not clear as to the minister's answer to the question asked regarding the lifting of price ceilings. During the term of the British bacon contract, is it true that the ceiling might be taken off hogs, before the price on the open market, or the world market, became equal to or less than the British contract price? That is my first question.

Is the minister of a mind to consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Souris, a suggestion which appears to be one of the most constructive for the assistance of hog production in western Canada which I have heard in the house during the short time I have been a member of it? It seems to me that something will have to be done to encourage the production of hogs. The suggestion offered by the hon. member for Souris is one which would tend to equalize the disparity which now exists between eastern and western producers. The hon. member's suggestion would have a tendency to equalize, and I should like to know whether the minister intends to consider it or whether he intended to state to the committee that he would give no consideration to it.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member's suggestion is not a new one. As the hon. member for Souris knows, it has been put forward by farmer organizations for the last two or three years. About a year after we began paying the freight, that began to be a matter of agitation in western Canada. Down to the present, the answer we have always given was that this arose out of a case which had been presented by the maritime provinces, to the old railway board, asking for an adjustment of freight rates just as an adjustment upward is now being asked by the railroads. They had made an application to have adjustments made, and British Columbia made a similar application in connection with shipments of grain westward. They wanted to change the local rates as related to local as compared with export rates on feed grain. We were just in the midst of a discussion of that when the war opened. A decision had been given to the effect that that could not be done.

The maritime provinces then changed their request for an increase in freight rates to one for assistance from the government to pay the freight. Prior to the war, that had not been done. After we got into the war, it was found that we had to send some bacon and other live stock products which were needed particularly in Europe to the maritime provinces in order to feed the people of the maritimes. Everyone became anxious to increase the production of bacon, beef, eggs and dairy products in the maritimes. It was thought that would be a good thing, not only for the prosecution of the war but for the country as a whole. We started out, first, by paying part of the freight from Fort William, and then, later, we paid it all.

The discussion is now as to when or how much of it we ought to take back. We were discussing this whole situation last week, and we decided to announce that the freight will not be taken off in so far as the maritimes and the eastern provinces and British Columbia are concerned until at least July 31, 1948. That is as far as we have gone. I do not think the government would want to become involved in any discussion as to whether we are to start to do the same thing on hogs and cattle at least until we have settled the other matter. I would submit to the committee that if we are to embark upon that plan it will not make much difference what the freight rates in Canada are in so far as the farmers are concerned, because the taxpayers of Canada will be paying them all before we are through.

I realize that the hon. member for Souris has said that he is not objecting to this being done for the eastern farmer. I would answer by suggesting you have to balance everything that is being done in the west against everything that is being done in the east in order to arrive at a conclusion as to whether one is being treated the same as the other. I have stated before that I fed hogs in both western Canada and eastern Canada, or at least up until a few months ago.

An hon. MEMBER: Which did you quit?

Mr. GARDINER: I did not quit either. I turned one of them over to another member of the family because I could not look after that end of it. As nearly as I can figure—and I try to figure very closely on my own operations—you could make more money during the war feeding hogs in western Canada than you could in eastern Canada. There are all kinds of reasons for that, quite apart from freight rates. In other words, I prefer to farm out west.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You have a $9 per hog advantage in eastern Canada.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. MILLER: What about the question I

Mr. GARDINER: I really cannot give any information that would be helpful to the committee as to how and when ceilings are to come off. That would be a most difficult thing to do. I think they will come off eventually, but as to how they will come off or what the conditions will be or whether they will come off a little before prices come down to world levels, I cannot say at the present. I only know that we have placed on the statute books a measure called the Agricultural Prices Support Act, which is supposed to take over when conditions develop which make it impossible for us to maintain reasonable floors under this legislation.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I would call the attention of hon. members to the fact that we are dealing with section 3, and speeches in committee must be relevant to the section before the committee.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the power to requisition given to him under section 3. Would he be willing to accept any limitation? Perhaps he would be willing to introduce an amendment himself which would have the effect of putting certain limitations upon his power to requisition.

Mr. GARDINER: That would come under section 5.

Mr. FULTON: I think it would properly come under section 3, which reads:

. . . the minister may . . .

(a) . . . make such arrangements to sell or export agricultural products . . . as he considers necessary or desirable.

Mr. GARDINER: That has reference only to agreements.

Mr. FULTON: Then section 5 states that the governor in council may make regulations for carrying any of the provisions of this act into effect. I think it is under section 3 that the power is really given.

Mr. GARDINER: The power is given by section 5, but I am ready to let the hon. member discuss it now.

Mr. FULTON: I do not think it can be done as well under section 5.

Mr. GARDINER: The proper place to discuss it would be under section 5, but we will not block you if you want to carry on with regard to requisitioning. However I cannot discuss it even though you do raise it now because I am not going to break the rules.

Mr. FULTON: I do not think that is a reasonable statement because so far no argument has been advanced to support it. If the power is to be limited, then the amendment limiting the power would properly be made under section 3. It certainly would be a great deal easier to do it along the lines I have in mind than under section 5.

Mr. GARDINER: Is the hon. member discussing requisitioning?

Mr. FULTON: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: Section 5 reads:

The governor in council may make regulations for carrying any of the purposes or provisions of this act into effect and, in particular, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations requiring the shipment or delivery to or to the order of the minister or the storing for future delivery to the minister . . .

Mr. FULTON: That is not the section which gives you the power to requisition; that section merely sets forth in specific detail that you have that power.

Mr. GARDINER: Section 3 is the section which gives me the power to make agreements.

Mr. FULTON: It gives you the power to sell or export agricultural products.

Mr. GARDINER: That would be an agreement.

Mr. FULTON: It gives the power "to make arrangements for the purchase, sale or export of agricultural products." That would be arrangements with regard to obtaining the commodities.

Mr. GARDINER: Why do you desire to discuss it under this section when it can be fully discussed under the other without being out of order?

Mr. FULTON: I have endeavoured to give my reason. I want to ask the minister if he would not be willing to accept an amendment, or perhaps introduce an amendment to section 3. If section 3 is carried there would not be any opportunity of coming back to it. I can bring it up under section 5 if the minister will agree that at that time he will take under consideration my request for an amendment to section 3.

Mr. GARDINER: If it has to do with requisitioning, an amendment could be moved to section 5 but not to section 3.

Mr. FULTON: Perhaps the Chairman would interpret that section, because I maintain that the power to make arrangements for the sale or export of agricultural products includes the power to requisition them, and the power to make regulations relating thereto is specifically mentioned in section 5.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If I were pressed for an opinion I would say that the amendment should be moved to section 5.

Mr. SENN: On Monday the minister made a statement that the price of oats and barley was to be raised, and he said, as reported at page 1408 of Hansard:

Feeders, on the other hand, will be protected against any important increase in costs of the oats and barley they buy by appropriate subsidies.

I instance the case of a farmer out west who could sell his oats and barley at these increased prices but preferred to feed it to hogs. Will he be entitled to the subsidy? If not, why not?

Mr. GARDINER: If he feeds it to hogs on his own farm?

Mr. SENN: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: He would not be entitled to anything if he fed it to hogs on his own farm.

Mr. SENN: Why not?

Mr. GARDINER: I have gone over that every year. I do not know how you could do it. I do not know how I could tell on my own farm how much grain was fed to hogs unless I put every bit of grain I fed on the scale. If we could figure out a way in which it could be done, so that a farmer would be in a position to prove to an auditor the exact amount he had fed, that might be one way; but the way farms are run I cannot conceive of any farmer being in a position to make a declaration as to the exact amount of grain he had fed, in order to get a subsidy.

Mr. SENN: I think it would be a good thing for the farmer himself to know exactly what amount he was feeding. Too many of them do not know how much grain it takes to produce a pound of pork. If he cannot get a subsidy on the grain he feeds on his own farm that will make it all the more necessary for him to sell his grain.

Mr. GARDINER: This has been going on for years and it is only to continue to August, so that I do not think we should change it now.

Mr. WRIGHT: How does the government intend to differentiate between feed being fed to poultry, cattle and hogs, because a subsidy is being paid on feed for the latter purpose?

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid that we are getting a little away from the bill. We are discussing the announcement made the other day with regard to feed grain. I think it would be better to leave that discussion until some other time.

Mr. FERGUSON: Is the minister aware that, as a result of the slipshod manner of handling food commodities in the United States, the consumer in that country can buy bacon, for instance, cheaper than the consumer in Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: I was not speaking of the slipshod manner of handling foodstuffs in the United States but was referring to their controls.

Mr. FERGUSON: Taking off price controls in the United States has resulted in food commodities being cheaper to the consumer in the United States than in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggested that in all probability prices would find their level within the next year or two. Dried milk, for instance, is selling cheaper in the United States than in Canada.

Mr. FERGUSON: And bacon.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not sure about bacon.

Mr. TUSTIN: Yesterday the minister said that all these products to fill the British contracts were being bought at the floor price, and at the end of his statement he said:

> If the products can be sold at a better price for consumption in Canada they are sold for consumption in Canada, but somewhere under the ceilings which have been put on.

At that point I interjected, "Does that apply to cheese?" The minister answered in this way:

> That applies to all these products, cheese and everything. We bought the cheese at twenty cents a pound. There has been more compulsion in connection with cheese than with other products.

For a number of years the government of Canada has been buying all the cheese manufactured in Quebec and Ontario, from April 1 to November 1 in some years, and last year from May 1 to November 1. Cheese producers are not allowed to sell their cheese anywhere else. It must go to the government to be shipped to the United Kingdom and government regulations are laid down that the cheese must be white in colour, of a certain weight, unwaxed, and comply with other conditions laid down. The minister now tells the committee that if the products can be sold for consumption in Canada at a better price they are sold in Canada. Therefore I am asking the minister again why the farmers of Ontario and Quebec are placed in the position where the government requisitions at least eighty-five to ninety per cent of their cheese production, which is bought by the government at the floor price. Why is it not bought at the ceiling price? If the present policy is to be continued I protest strongly on behalf of the farmers in my county.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Commodity boards.

Mr. GARDINER: Last night on the spur of the moment I accepted an amendment which made subsection 1 of section 4 read:

> The governor in council shall establish one or more commodity boards with adequate producer representation.

That is how it reads with the two amendments which were made. The hon. member for Dauphin called my attention at the time to the fact that was exactly the effect of the amendment which he had proposed and which I had rejected and that I had given him the reasons why it should be rejected. I looked at the bill again last night and I see the reasons quite clearly. I pointed out to him that one of the authorities which I or the boards set up under me have is to enter into contracts for the storing or processing of agricultural products. In the shipment of bacon we have to require that the product shall be taken possession of much earlier than the date on which it is to be shipped. We must take possession at the time it is being put into the brine to be cured, so that at times the order has to be given without much opportunity for delay. I suggest that, in order to deal with a situation of that kind, after the word "and" in line 25, there be inserted the words "the minister". Then it will read:

> The governor in council shall establish one or more commodity boards with adequate producer representation and the minister may authorize and require a commodity board to exercise and perform all or any of the powers . . .

And so forth.

That will make it possible, if the board comes to me on a certain day and says that there is some bacon at some particular plant where they may not be conforming with the wishes of the other forty-three plants—I think there are about forty-four delivering—then the Wiltshire sides at that one ought to be ordered into the brine as well. Under these circumstances, there is no time to get an order in council or to call council together. That action must be taken on whatever the facts are at the time. I would suggest that the words "the minister" be put in there.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): In view of the explanation given by the minister, is the amendment acceptable to the committee?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Regulations.

Mr. GARDINER: May I be permitted to put in the amendment so that the committee will have the whole thing before it? The amendment was proposed on second reading of the bill. I submitted copies of the amendment to the leaders of the different opposition groups, and I have copies here. I shall ask my colleague to move it.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I move that:

Subsection 5 (1) to be repealed and the following to be substituted therefor:

5. (1) The governor in council may make regulations for carrying any of the purposes or provisions of this act into effect and, in particular, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations

(a) Requiring the shipment or delivery to or to the order of the minister or the storing for future delivery to the minister of such agricultural products as the governor in council considers necessary for the fulfilment of any contract for the sale or export by His Majesty of the said agricultural products to the government of any other country or any agency thereof and determining the prices to be paid for or in respect of any of the said products so shipped, delivered or stored, which prices shall be based on the appropriate contract price and shall bear a proper and reasonable relationship thereto.

(b) For the purpose of regulating the movement of apples from one province to another and requiring that any such movement be made only by or under the authority of a provincial marketing board.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to discuss first the power of requisition. With deference to the minister and to your previous ruling, Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to discuss the power under this section because it gives only the authority to make regulations for carrying out the power already conferred. It is merely specified here, so that there will be no question that that power exists and that regulations may be made for the purpose of enforcing that power. It would have been more appropriate to discuss it earlier, and that is why I am under some difficulty in discussing it now.

In view of the fact that the minister has said that he would not oppose latitude of discussion on this section, perhaps I can put forward the views I have. What I wish to ask is whether the minister would be willing to accept an amendment which would limit his powers to requisition. The effort which has been made by the official opposition in regard to this bill was mainly to get a complete marketing act, so that there would be no question that the producers who are affected would have a say as to the quantities and the prices of commodities mentioned in these international agreements, and the regulations and terms upon which they were marketed and exported. If that had been done, then the objection that I am about to make would no longer apply. Since that has not been done, we are in the position where the minister alone sets the prices under an international agreement and indicates the quantity which shall be delivered.

We have been able to get only a limited assurance that he must discuss the matter with the producers boards before he does that. Therefore we are in the position, as was established, I think, with some degree of conclusiveness in the wheat agreement and the position which seems to prevail in the cheese and egg agreement, where the producers feel that their produce is being sold at a price which hardly pays them the cost of production. That is adopted as a matter of government policy in order to assist in the reconstruction of Great Britain particularly and of the continent of Europe. With that policy there is no disagreement, but with the administration of the policy there is a large degree of disagreement because we feel that the farmer should not be expected to bear the burden of the policy alone.

Briefly to recapitulate, we feel that if the farmer through his producer boards were able to set the price and the quantity there would be no danger of his having to bear the burden of what might be a disadvantageous agreement. Since that is not the case the minister can make further contracts which may be bad ones from the point of view of business and which may involve the farmer in heavy financial losses when compared with what he might be obtaining were his produce not being sold exclusively subject to the terms of the agreement. The position is this: if the minister, since he is now in exclusive charge of making these contracts, sets the prices, he may make a food agreement, and he can then step in and requisition all the agricultural produce he needs in order to fulfil the agreement. If he did not have the power of requisitioning, the only way he could fulfil his agreement would be by buying on the market at the current price which presumably, under normal circumstances would be a price which would repay the farmer his cost of production and give him some profit. Therefore I wish to suggest, first, that by taking this power to requisition everything the minister is in a position where he may be able to enforce the terms of a bad agreement and make the farmer bear the whole of the burden instead of distributing it across the country. The minister has said that in some instances it is necessary to have the power to requisition, and he referred specifically to bacon. It is agreed that if we make contracts the minister must have reasonable power to carry them out. I do not think anyone would question that; but we should like to preserve this principle, that the cost of carrying it out must be borne by the country as a whole and not by the agricultural producer alone. I ask specifically whether the minister will limit his power to requisition to that necessary to fulfil the bacon agreement? At the moment I cannot conceive of any other agreement where he needs the power to requisition and where the circumstances would be the same as that which affects the bacon agreement.

As I say, the only time he would need the power to requisition is where he sold large quantities of produce at a low price which would make the farmers unwilling to part with their produce, which would necessitate his stepping in and requisitioning.

Although we may have the assurance of the minister that it is not intended to make bad agreements and then step in and requisition to enforce these agreements, I do not think it is a proper principle for the house, and for the opposition in particular, to accept this assurance, for the reasons which were put forward by the Minister of Justice in the argument which he made in 1934 and to which I have referred. He did not think it was proper for parliament to grant powers the exercise of which it did not approve. That is the position in which we find ourselves at the present time.

Just today I came across an argument used on March 3 in the British House of Commons, which puts the position so clearly that I should like to read it. I put this argument forward to the minister in all sincerity; I am not even suggesting specific amendment myself; but I am asking him if he will, to meet these views, see fit to find a way of limiting his powers of requisition so that they cover only the bacon contracts. The particular thought I have in mind in making this suggestion was used in an argument by Sir Arthur Salter in the British House of Commons on March 3, when he referred to a number of bills which, he maintained, granted excessive power. In these bills, he said:

> . . . clauses have been drafted so widely, that it has been easy for us to demonstrate that quite fantastic abusive action could be taken within the powers of the bill. When this has been demonstrated, the minister has always said: "That is not what I intend to do. I intend to do so and so. I have quite a reasonable policy." We may agree that the minister is sincere and that his policy is reasonable, but we cannot properly accept such assurances as alternatives to drafting the law in such a way as to define his powers. Otherwise, we abdicate from our position as legislators. We are concerned in this house, as legislators, with the legal intention which is to be inferred from the words of a bill, and not with ministerial intentions or assurances which do not bind even their successors of the same government and still less their successors in another government, while the measure itself, with all the powers which were given originally, still survives.

That is exactly the feeling I have with regard to this bill and particularly sections 3 and 5, which give the minister complete power to walk on to every farm in Canada and requisition such produce at such prices as he wishes. I am quite certain that he himself will agree that he does not intend to exercise that power and that he does not need to have all that power for carrying into effect the agreements he has made, and which he may contemplate making. I put these views before him and before the house, coupled with a request that he himself introduce an amendment imposing upon his power of requisition such limitations as will confine it to those things which he absolutely must do in order to carry out the specific agreements he has in mind.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the minister a question, seeing that I could not hear clearly what the hon. member said? Am I correct in assuming that the reason for the amendment in connection with apples was to enable the government or the department to fulfil the contracts with Great Britain and to take care of our apples?

Mr. GARDINER: The reason for the amendment with regard to apples is to make it absolutely clear that we have the power to make an agreement with Great Britain. There is no agreement on apples similar to what we have on bacon, but in past years we did make an arrangement under which apples were sent to Britain on certain understandings. The idea is to get an agreement similar to the one, spread over a period, which we have on bacon, but there is no such agreement, and there was no separate order in council other than that having to do with the special products board which authorized us to deal with that situation.

I was informed, after we had presented this bill to the house the first time, that we did not have the authority to direct what should be done as between provinces. That is not required in any of the other contracts but would be required in this one in order to carry it out as the producers want it to be carried out.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It was my assumption that this was considered necessary if we require, as we do, a market, and I should like to have it made clear why two hon. members from British Columbia are opposing the principle that we should have the right to enter into these agreements with Great Britain to dispose of our apples. I cannot understand why two members from British Columbia are opposing that right.

Mr. FULTON: What two members?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member for Kamloops and the hon. member for Yale.

Mr. FULTON: Perhaps the hon. member will quote some passage in Hansard where he finds us opposed to that being done.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Perhaps the member for Fraser Valley can state that neither of the two hon. members voted in favour of the bill.

Mr. SENN: I am sorry that the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) is indisposed and is unable to be here. He asked me to bring to the attention of the minister the word "apples" and to suggest that, if possible, that word be changed to fruit, because there are a number of small fruits that are traded between the provinces, and he thinks it would help substantially if "fruit", which would include apples, were used instead of the word "apples". He also asks that, if possible, it apply to trade from one province to another as well as to export trade. He gives the names of a number of countries to which the British Columbia fruit board have been selling apples in past years: South American countries, Newfoundland, the Scandinavian countries, Egypt, Australia and so on. I give that to the minister for his consideration. I know the hon. member for Yale feels strongly about it, and I should like to hear what the minister has to say.

Mr. GARDINER: On the last suggestion, I would say that the intention of this bill is not to give us authority to interfere in interprovincial trade in a manner which I think is suggested here. We have arrangements with Britain, under which we send certain fruits to that country. We go into different provinces and arrange for the purchase of it. That, to my mind, has much the same effect as the hon. member for Yale has in mind. If there are berries in British Columbia that are in surplus and they are not able to handle them, we have during the war been making arrangements to take such surpluses and ship them to Britain. We make that arrangement with the British government. That has met all difficulties and, I think, will meet all difficulties, as long as the situation created by this act exists. I understand that what the hon. member has in mind is that when this situation does not exist there may develop something similar to what we had before the war, the difficulty in interprovincial trade. But this was not intended to take care of that situation, but to meet the situation in relation to apples. There are producers' organizations across the country and they are in a position to enter into interprovincial arrangements. There is nothing particularly legal about it, in the sense that the suggested organization in Ontario is not legalized under provincial statute in the same way as some of the others may be.

Mr. SENN: Does the provincial statute give the board power to deal interprovincially without corresponding legislation here?

Mr. GARDINER: I have some doubts about that. I should not like to offer a legal opinion upon it. The position in relation to apples is this. They are able to come to understandings, and if by those understandings they are able to carry out an agreement that we may make with Britain, they have come to us and asked us to try to make that agreement. They said that, in order to guarantee carrying it out, we would require to exercise some authority in connection with interprovincial trade in apples. We have taken the authority to exercise certain authority. We do not know that we would do all that we are asked to do, but we have the authority to do it.

Mr. SENN: What about the other countries to which apples and other fruit have been shipped by the board? Does this board negotiate agreements, or how are the shipments made?

Mr. GARDINER: I presume that where they have agreements which they consider reasonable, agreements with commercial organizations somewhere else, probably we shall not have much to do with that. But when they have a considerable surplus which they are not able to sell under ordinary commercial transactions and they say they would like this sold in Britain, as I said the other night, they would ask that we talk to Britain about exchange and the need of other foods. Under those circumstances we go to the British and say maybe we can make some adjustment that will be satisfactory to both of us, probably our people could use more of some other commodity. The suggestion has been made that we took too much cheese from this market. We can go to the British and say, "It will suit our people much better if we leave cheese on this market, or a considerable part of it, and we should like you to take apples." Things of that kind can be negotiated by the government, which would not be understood as between individual organizations in Canada. The apple producers would not feel like talking against the cheese producer, or the British would not pay any attention to them if they did. But when the government goes to the British and says that it would suit Canada better if you take our surplus apples, our people will eat cheese up to a certain level, then we can get an arrangement made with them. That is the kind of thing we will be doing. On the apples, we hope to sell this fifty per cent or whatever it is they generally trade in with Britain, to the British. We are not concerned about who makes the deal, as long as it can be made. But the apple growers wish us to have the authority to make it, and that is what this gives.

On the other question of requisitioning, I am afraid that I cannot say very much more than the government said in Great Britain. I would presume that they obtained their authority from the House of Commons in Great Britain or from the parliament in Great Britain.

Mr. FULTON: They were discussing a different matter.

Mr. GARDINER: It is exactly the same principle, and I think it applies to almost every piece of legislation we pass in this house about giving greater authority to somebody, than that somebody, whoever it is, ever hopes that he will have to use. He uses it only in very extreme cases.

In relation to these contracts, the only kind of circumstances under which we would use requisitioning is this. We are the lowest per capita cheese eaters in any country in the world for which any records are kept. We eat fewer pounds per head of population than any other country. The British are the largest per capita cheese eaters in the world. According to the last records I saw, they ate sixteen pounds per head of population prior to the war. We ate three. On top of that the market for sixty per cent of our cheese prior to the war was in Britain, and it has been during the war.

It has been my experience that the cheese producers themselves have agreed to our taking cheese and sending it to Great Britain as a part of the policy that was being followed of attempting to help feed Britain with the kind of food they could best get from Canada during the period. We would not take the suggested action. I am sure our friends opposite would give us credit for having more political sense than to take cheese off the market in Canada, and send it over to Britain at a lower price than could be obtained for it in Canada, just to carry out an agreement. We would not do it for that purpose at all.

On the general question of requisitioning to do a thing like that, we would deal with the cheese boards in Canada and find out their attitude. We would discuss the matter with them. We could not carry it out without their cooperation, because cheese will keep over a very long period of time if you put it away in the proper storage, and you must keep it for ninety days. So these people could put their cheese away and keep it if we did not have that cooperation. But they cooperated with us 100 per cent, because we discussed our intentions with them and had their agreement before acting. The reason why they want us to act is that ninety per cent of them say, "It should be done," and there is no hesitation about it. But there is another small percentage who will not cooperate unless compelled. The others say, "We should like to do this and will if you say that they should do it." It is really the same principle as that contained in the legislation which my hon. friends voted for the other night, that the producer should be in a position to say to the minority, "under the circumstances, you must do this."

Mr. SENN: You are following that practice.

Mr. GARDINER: We are following that practice, and I admit it quite frankly, in this bill. We have been doing it over a period during the war and we are still doing it.

Let us consider the packers. After all, there is not a great deal of difference in human nature whether it is packers, farmers or others. Some forty packers have inspected plants and we must get all our bacon and ham from those plants. Suppose the forty of them are absolutely agreed to do the thing which is required to be done. They have sat in and discussed it. Everybody has discussed it. The advisers we have from the farm organizations have discussed it, and we have sometimes brought them together and had it discussed. Then they say, "All right, that is the thing to be done. Let us go ahead and do it." Two weeks after we get doing that, there are two packing plants somewhere who say, "I am not going to do that. I can make more money doing something else." The others wish us to have the authority to say to those fellows, "Well, the government can really requisition your product." Up to date I do not think we have had to do much requisitioning under it. We just simply make the suggestion. An inspector goes out, looks over the situation and says "Well, we have the authority to compel you to do it, and the other companies are all doing it. Why don't you do it?" That is about all that ever happens. But if we did not have the authority there is the very small percentage of those with whom we are dealing who would just say, "You do what you like; I am going to do as I like." That is the principle which is behind the requisitioning.

There is no intention of going out and grabbing off large amounts in order to try to fill contracts. It may be thought that these contracts have not been good ones, but every time they have been made we have sat down with the British; and if it is a bacon contract, we have sat down with the packers. We have sent out the best investigators we could find to ascertain how many hogs were going to be produced within the year. Then we have made the best investigations possible to find out how much will be consumed in Canada. We balance it all up and say what we can do. Last year we said, "We can give you only 267,000,000 pounds of bacon and ham." Prior to that we had been giving as much as 700,000,000 pounds, but last year we said that we could give only 267,000,000 pounds. We hope to reach levels after we have stated them, and we have to do a little of what is called requisitioning in order to get up to that reasonable level. But we are intending to do what was suggested in this case. We have no intention of utilizing it to do any unreasonable thing. I do not think the house would expect that even a Liberal government would intentionally be so foolish. We do want to do the things which are reasonable. We want to have the power to do reasonable things, and nothing more than that. But we must have the power if we are to be able to take limited amounts here and there, or go into a plant and say, "So far as your production is concerned, a certain percentage ought to go to the British contract." But as far as going out and saying that we will take it wholesale, that is not the intention.

Mr. CASE: I am more or less seeking information with respect to this clause which seems to give the minister very wide powers. As I listened to him, I understood him to say that there is no thought of interfering with interprovincial trade. The question in my mind is this: How could the farmer or anyone else make commitments on a contract unless there is a saving clause in the contract to state "subject to the goods being requisitioned by the governor in council or by the minister"? That is, how could I sell one thousand barrels of apples, so many thousand bushels of grain or so many pounds of live stock in interprovincial trade, and contract in advance, if these wide powers are provided for the governor general or the minister? In other words, there would be no means which I could employ to guarantee that I could make delivery of the goods unless that saving clause is in my contract. Since the minister says there is no thought of interfering with interprovincial trade, I should like to know from him how we are to carry on interprovincial trade should it suddenly be determined that these things are required for the purposes for which this bill is being passed.

Mr. GARDINER: I am now speaking as a lawyer, although I am not a lawyer; but what I said was that I do not think authority is given in the bill for us to interfere with interprovincial trade, in the sense indicated by the hon. member. It is for that reason it is definitely stated in the bill that, with regard to apples, we have authority which we have not in respect of some other things.

On the other hand, if we have the authority to go into a province or into a plant and make arrangements to take or to buy a product for money, take it out of the province and send it into international trade—the deputy attorney general said, we had that authority in interprovincial trade—to that extent we have that authority, but not because it is in this act at all. We can go into Ontario and buy a product and take it into Quebec now.

Mr. CASE: You can requisition it.

Mr. GARDINER: We can buy it. We can go in and say, "We will pay a certain price for that," and get it.

Mr. CASE: And the farmer must accept that.

Mr. GARDINER: The position in relation to those products is that, in most instances, they are in surplus supply before we take them. There may be some exceptions to that; but in most instances they are in surplus supply, and the farmer wishes to sell them. Assuming that the United States boundary is closed—and I am assuming it is going to be closed, so long as this arrangement lasts or until United States prices come down—then there is only one place the farmer can sell his surplus of these commodities about which we have been talking, and that is in Britain. He cannot sell them here. He is producing twenty per cent or twenty-five per cent, or, in some cases, seventy per cent more of the product than we can consume in Canada. We say, because of the different level in prices between this country and the United States, the boundary is closed into the United States for the time being. There is only one place where the farmer can sell them, and that is Great Britain. Under the circumstances we come to him and we say, "This is the arrangement; we are paying the floor price. We will give you this price for all your surplus"; and we take that surplus, and ship it.

Mr. CASE: You definitely promise to take the surplus?

Mr. GARDINER: Under these agreements we undertake definitely to take all the surplus. In fact, our difficulty will be to get enough surplus to send them what they want. There will be no trouble about that, while this agreement lasts. Of course I do not know how long it will last, but I hope it will last forever, so far as my time is concerned. However it may not.

Mr. CASE: Supposing a cheese factory has a contract to ship so much cheese to British Columbia or to the maritimes; will the owner be protected if his output is requisitioned?

Mr. GARDINER: Again, he sends a small percentage, perhaps only thirty per cent, to the Canadian market, while he sends seventy per cent, or wishes to send seventy per cent somewhere else. I can imagine some difficulties in certain relationships. There would be difficulty right now if the United States boundary were open, because, as the hon. member says, the product can be sold in the United States at a much higher price. But that will eventually right itself, and we shall find ourselves in a different position.

While we are in the position in which we are placed today, we go to them and say, "Here is seventy per cent of your cheese. That cheese would be left on this market, with the United States boundary closed; and, if it is, your price will not be a good price." He realizes that. He realizes that this is an arrangement under which we are trying to stabilize the market for a considerable time, and therefore he will go along with it.

I should have said earlier that we do not deal with the individual farmer in respect of these commodities. Rather, we deal with the cheese boards. In a certain sense they are cooperatives of farmers. They work through cheese plants or cheese factories. In connection with bacon, we deal with the packing plants in Canada; that is the only place where we can get it. We do not go down to the farmer and attempt to take his hogs out of the pen, or anything like that. We deal with the bacon when it is in the plant, and when the farmer has been paid what he is to be paid.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. CASE: You will not take their surplus of apples?

Mr. GARDINER: From what has happened, I would judge that in Ontario we will not do anything. We will depend upon the board's having made arrangements with the apple producers in Ontario which are satisfactory to all of them. I do not imagine we are going into Ontario and taking apples to ship to Great Britain under any circumstances. We have not done it during the war; we avoided that.

Mr. FULTON: I had intended to ask a question, but since it is almost six o'clock perhaps I might leave it until after recess. Therefore I would ask the hon. member for Brant to go ahead with what he had intended to ask.

Mr. CHARLTON: In how many instances has Canada actually fulfilled the contracts which have been made?

Mr. GARDINER: I have some figures before me which I shall look at before the evening sitting, and which I will place on the record after the dinner recess. These are figures which I was asked for but which I did not have earlier. However, speaking from memory, I would say that until the end of 1944 we more than filled all our bacon contracts. We filled all of them with respect of cheese down to, I believe it was 1943; that was the last year. I think we went off one year; then came back for a year, and then have gone down again.

In connection with eggs, we have fulfilled most, if not all of our contracts. I believe those are the chief products with which we have dealt. I might add that every year we have more than filled our beef contract.

Mr. CHARLTON: The quantities in contracts have gone down, both in respect of bacon and cheese. Yet we cannot fill them.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a reason for that.

Mr. McMASTER: Before asking my question, let me say that if the minister had taken up law he would have been most successful, because he is so optimistic of results of cases to come up.

I thought we had decided yesterday that the word "already" should be placed in section 4. That is, we were to deal only with contracts already made. I believe that suggestion was made twice. The act permits dealing with any other contract, whether already made or to be made in the future; is that right?

Mr. GARDINER: I believe I was the only one who mentioned that. I suggested, if it was the desire of the committee to prevent my making any new contracts, that should be done. When I referred to any new contracts I had in mind any contract on new commodities. I do not think anyone ever suggested we should not be at liberty to increase the price if the British were prepared to pay it. That type of contracting was never objected to. But there was a suggestion that we should not be allowed to enter into any new contract. I said that, so far as I was concerned personally, I was prepared to accept that, and I thought the government was. But we had been trying to arrange for a contract in connection with apples; I think hon. members on the other side of the house agreed that that was right. If the word "already" was put in, we could not do that. It has been left out. It would have effected apples and beef particularly.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Before the committee rose for the dinner recess, the Minister of Public Works had moved an amendment to section 5, and that amendment is now before the committee.

Mr. FULTON: Just before six o'clock the minister dealt with a request which I had made that he introduce an amendment to limit the powers to requisition under this bill. He made a statement, and during the dinner recess I have tried to do some research on that statement. He said that it was customary in bills of this sort to ask for wider powers than were absolutely necessary to carry out the purposes contemplated in the legislation. I have not been able to find any—

Mr. GARDINER: Not than were contemplated; that were likely to be utilized generally under the bill.

Mr. FULTON: Wider than were likely to be used. I have not been able to find anything to substantiate that as a principle, and I certainly would not like to accept that or to say that I am satisfied with the whole answer given on the basis that that principle is correct. I do not wish to set up my opinion as being superior to that of the minister with regard to whether the principle exists, but I cannot accept his statement of it as a basis upon which we should be satisfied that the powers asked for are not too wide.

In dealing with the particular argument that I had put forward, the minister said that the boards always cooperate in making their produce available in order to discharge these contracts. That being the case, it is difficult to understand why he will not accept the request made by the official opposition, ever since the bill was introduced, that this bill be made into a real marketing act and that the powers be given to the boards. If the boards have in the past cooperated and carried out his wishes with regard to marketing, then I see no reason why that should not be done. If that were done, then we would not have to ask the minister to limit his powers. I repeat the request that he see if he cannot find some way to limit the powers he is asking for under this bill to just those which he intends to exercise under the normal agreement.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley put forward a view with regard to the attitude taken by the hon. member for Yale and myself which, I think, involves the whole question of our attitude toward this bill. I thought we had made it clear. I represent an area that grows a large amount of fruit. Since apparently the hon. member does not seem to have understood our attitude, perhaps I may be forgiven for trying to make it clear again as I intended to do when I spoke this afternoon.

The position is that we agree that there should be marketing legislation, but we do not see any attempt to confine the purposes of the bill to marketing. There are introduced into this bill a number of things which we are not able to accept. Personally I did not oppose the bill on second reading because I said that I hoped when we were in committee we would be able to cut out those features which we found undesirable. So far those attempts have not been successful, and I find myself wondering whether I can accept a bill which, under the guise of seeking to do something which is desirable, introduces many undesirable features. Personally I find that on balance the bill is undesirable and unacceptable. I do not see how that can be interpreted to mean that we are opposed to long-range marketing or to making agreements to market our apples.

I should like to ask the minister if he would have any objection to adding the words "or in export trade" after the word "another" in the second line of paragraph (b) of the amendment he introduced. That would make the section applicable to export trade as well as to interprovincial trade, and I think it would cover the position which I understand the British Columbia board has taken.

Mr. GARDINER: The position is that export trade is already dealt with. One thing that was not dealt with was interprovincial trade, and the apple growers thought we should deal with the interprovincial situation. Paragraph (b) is to deal with interprovincial trade, while export trade is dealt with in another section. It is dealt with in general terms; we do not say "apples", but it covers everything including apples.

Mr. FULTON: Am I correct in saying that the earlier section does not specifically give the board any powers with regard to export trade?

Mr. GARDINER: Authority is given in subsection 3 of section 4 to appoint boards to deal with the matter, both interprovincially and for export. That authority being there, this gives us authority to deal with apples interprovincially. We can appoint boards to do both under the other.

Mr. FULTON: I was not able to follow the minister's argument just before six o'clock. I was under the impression that he was dealing with the desirability of including small fruits in this amendment. If he has dealt with that, I shall read what he has said; but, if he has not, I should like to ask him if there would be any objection to including the words "and fruit" after the word "apples" in paragraph (b). The board would then be given power to deal with all types of fruit in interprovincial trade, not just apples.

Mr. GARDINER: What I was trying to say before six o'clock—and I do not think I said it very clearly—was that in the years during the war that have gone by we found no difficulty in making individual arrangements with the British authorities to take berries in certain forms, usually in the form of mash to be utilized for making jam and that kind of thing. As I say, we have had no difficulty in making arrangements with them but we have had no long-time agreement. We make the arrangements for special products of this kind through the special products board without having a continuous agreement.

These fruits are not in the same class as apples where fifty per cent must go to Britain or somewhere else. It may be that only five per cent or a much smaller quantity than that has to be arranged for. There may be a local market which takes these commodities, and then they depend upon our special products board to make a direct deal with the British to take care of them.

Mr. FULTON: But, as I understand it, this amendment covers only interprovincial trade.

Mr. GARDINER: I was trying to point out, in connection with the interprovincial feature of it, that in most of these cases we have been able to take surpluses which otherwise might have gone into interprovincial trade, and created difficulty. We have been able to take surpluses and send them to Great Britain. While we are doing that, the interprovincial difficulty does not arise. For instance, in connection with berries in British Columbia, instead of trying to sell them at a low price in the prairie provinces, where their greatest market would naturally be—and that market has probably been filled—instead of trying to do it on a low floor price in the prairie provinces, they have come to us and have said, "Can you get the British to take it? Do the British need it?" In all those cases, up to the present time we have been able to take that commodity, and therefore there is no further problem. And we take enough off so that the floor is established.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I say a word, because my name was mentioned. I do not believe I said one word before recess about marketing legislation. What I did say was that the hon. member for Kamloops did not vote for the second reading of this bill. He is now apologizing for his action in not doing so.

Mr. FULTON: No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I accept his apology.

Mr. FULTON: No. I am a good friend of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, and in order to save the necessity of taking a more formal step, I would ask him to withdraw the word "apologizing," because I have no apology to make for my action in connection with the second reading of the bill.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I shall be glad to withdraw. I know he regrets the action he took.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall section 5 as amended carry?

Mr. HERRIDGE: I have been trying to get an apportunity to speak for some time. As a member representing a fruit-growing riding, I wish to make a few remarks. First of all, while we would like to have seen accepted the bill recommended by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the government has not seen fit to bring in a bill of that kind, but has brought in this bill.

Representing a large number of fruit growers, I support the bill, and for this reason: While it is not all we would wish, we realize that the bill does give the fruit growers an opportunity of marketing their fruit in the coming year with at least some reasonable measure of security. We are concerned with seeing our fruit marketed, and this bill does make some provision for that.

I must say I was surprised to note that the hon. member for Kamloops did not see fit to support the bill on second reading. I wonder what the fruit growers of British Columbia would say if this bill were not now accepted by this house?

Mr. REID: They would have plenty to say; and so would the poultrymen.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to deal briefly with the criticisms the hon. member for Kamloops has made in connection with the power given in this bill to the minister to requisition agricultural commodities. Personally I think the hon. member made a mountain out of a molehill, and his criticism was academic and hair-splitting. I say that for two reasons. I speak with some knowledge, as a grower, and as a member of a fruit organization. I say that experience in the past would indicate that the tree fruit board in British Columbia —and that is the board of which I am speaking—had satisfactory relations with the Minister of Agriculture when it came to making agreements for the marketing of fruit from British Columbia. I understand that also applies to the Nova Scotia board.

I know, and I am sure other hon. members know, and will substantiate me in what I say, that in the past the minister has not taken any action without full consultation and cooperation with the marketing boards concerned.

Because of that fact, and because this bill will be in effect for only one year, I say again that I think the criticism of the hon. member for Kamloops was hair-splitting and academic, and was made without a full knowledge of the facts surrounding the situation.

Mr. FULTON: Would the hon. member permit a question? He is entitled to his opinion as to my argument; but would he not prefer to see the board empowered to make an agreement, rather than the minister exclusively?

Mr. HERRIDGE: Yes.

Mr. FULTON: That was the only point I was making.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to see it different in some respects. Indeed, I should have liked to see accepted the bill suggested by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. But I accept this, as being brought forward by the government for the advantage of the fruit growers of British Columbia and other producers, and I am not going to do anything which would jeopardize the passage of the bill at this time.

Before concluding, I would point out to the minister and the committee one suggestion in connection with the suggested amendment to section 5(1) paragraph (b) of which reads:

> For the purpose of regulating the movement of apples from one province to another and requiring that any such movement be made only by or under the authority of a provincial marketing board.

By using only the word "apples" it would appear that there will not be interprovincial control of marketing of pears, cherries, peaches, apricots and plums, all of which are of great importance to the fruit-growing section of British Columbia. Would the minister consider an amendment which would delete the word "apples" and substitute the words "tree fruits." Would he give an explanation why "tree fruits" has not been used instead of "apples"?

Mr. GARDINER: That same question was brought up by the hon. member for Haldimand at six o'clock, and since six o'clock it has been discussed in another form by the hon. member for Kamloops. I explained at that time that apples are one product for which we had a difficulty in finding a market outside Canada during the period of the war. In respect of most other commodities, including berries and the other fruits mentioned, we have been able to find a market in Great Britain for those quantities which could not be marketed at reasonable returns in Canada. This has been done by making special arrangements. There have been no long-time agreements with regard to them.

This measure has to do largely with long-time agreements. But by cooperation with the tree-fruit board, and the fruit board of Nova Scotia, we have been able to get in touch with the British when there was any difficulty in connection with other fruits. I believe the hon. member for Fraser Valley will agree with me in that. He will recall that on a number of occasions he and a number of others brought the matter of surpluses of berries of one kind and another to our attention. We took the matter up with the British government and had arrangements made for the marketing of those surpluses in Great Britain.

What I have pointed out was that this section is put in at the request of the apple producers to deal with the marketing of about fifty per cent of their commodity. It has not been urged upon us that there was any necessity for doing more than we have been doing; and I am afraid it would require a number of amendments to the bill if it were to be made to cover all the other products which have been referred to, if we want to get into interprovincial marketing generally. I do not think there is any need for it at the present time. I do not think we shall have difficulty, because there are methods of dealing with surpluses which arise, and arranging for their marketing at a reasonable return.

For that reason I hesitate to start in to amend this bill so as to have it cover more than it now covers, after having given a lot of thought to it.

Mr. SENN: May I ask the minister a question for my own information? Does he think that under the provincial legislation which sets up this fruit board in British Columbia they have sufficient power to deal interprovincially without further power being given here?

Mr. GARDINER: The main difficulty is where you run into trouble in marketing the whole of a product. So long as there is a reasonable market for the surpluses of the product they do not experience very much difficulty as between, say British Columbia and the prairie provinces. The prairie provinces do not grow any of these fruits; therefore there is a market for them there. The only time they have much difficulty with the situation is when there is somewhat of a surplus, and some care has to be taken in putting the surplus on the market regularly and all that kind of thing. They want this government to be able to say under these circumstances that we shall take the control and do the regulating. When we have the bill that is now before the committee on the statute books as an act I do not think that kind of difficulty will arise, because what they do under these circumstances is to go directly to the government and say, We have a surplus for which there is no reasonable market on the prairies, let us say; we would like you to take that off our hands if you can make arrangements to take it, and that will settle the difficulty and put us in a position where our product can be marketed at the price at which we want it marketed.

Mr. SENN: That applies to other fruits as well?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; it applies to everything. We did it during the war and we can continue to do it during the next twelve months this bill lasts, at any rate.

Mr. McMASTER: Notwithstanding the fact that I may be referred to as the junior counsel for the minister, I wish to assist in the passing of this bill. I wish to say at the outset that I can see no reason why power should not be given to the minister to help the apple growers of British Columbia. The title of this bill is: "An act to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products." The preamble also speaks about the sale and export of products to other countries. It has nothing to do with interprovincial trade. I do not particularly object to the minister having that power, but I would suggest that he is pinning his faith on the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, because it is referred to in this bill. The minister has taken the power that is given in the said act to appoint a commodity board to function under the present act, and under the Agricultural Prices Support Act he may effectively deal with the sale of apples between different provinces and will not require this amendment.

Subsection 1 as amended agreed to.

On subsection 2—To be laid before parliament.

Mr. BURTON: Section 5 (2) reads:

> Every regulation made under this act shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after it is made or, if parliament is not then in session, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

I should like to point out to the minister—and no doubt he fully realizes it—that in all probability there will be quite a number of orders and regulations made under this act which covers so wide a territory. Consequently the matter of laying them before parliament is, in our opinion, not quite sufficient. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current:

> That subsection 2 of section 5 be amended by inserting after the word "be" in the first line the following: "Published in the next ensuing issue of the Canada Gazette and shall be . . ."

The subsection would then read:

> Every regulation made under this act shall be published in the next ensuing issue of the Canada Gazette and shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after it is made or, if parliament is not then in session, within fifteen days after the commencement of the next ensuing session thereof.

Mr. GARDINER: I shall be pleased to accept that amendment.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Officers, clerks and employees.

Mr. BOUCHER: Section 7 is another illustration of something that we have met several times during this session which, to my mind, is a definite attempt, or, if not an attempt, an indication of the government's continuing to employ people working for the government or for corporations or commissions of the government without reference to the Civil Service Act. I believe that that is an ignoring of one of the greatest supports and safeguards we have for the public servants of this dominion. Here we have a board set up with power to use their absolute discretion to hire, fire or employ those whom they wish under such terms as they like, irrespective of the services or the Civil Service Act.

The Civil Service Act as it now stands gives a great deal of protection to those loyal people in Canada who have worked for the government and have given brilliant service. There are privileges connected with it; they know their rights; they know their tenure of office is governed by an act of parliament. They know they are not subject to the whim or fancy of some individual employee on a temporary day-to-day basis with personal likes and dislikes interfering with the natural employment of the civil servant.

I can see no reason whatever why employees, clerks and many professional, technical and other officers should be hired by this board in a different way from permanent civil servants. I see no reason why this board should want so to hire them. If one reads the Gordon report on civil service matters he will find that that commission has within the confines of its directives recommended certain improvements in the Civil Service Act. One of the most important of those recommendations suggested a more expeditious and more efficient way of employing highly trained technical and professional men. This bill goes a long way beyond that.

The Gordon report recommended that the Civil Service Act should, in effect, be the procurement branch for those people whom the government wants to employ. This bill ignores that. As I understand it, the Gordon report recommended that the civil service commission ought to be the employment agency for those men whose services are sought by government, boards or commissions, I cannot see why the government wants to ignore the operation of the Civil Service Act, wants to put it in the limbo of forgotten memories rather than use it and improve it.

If these boards cannot get satisfactory employees through the civil service commission, why do the government not say, we do not want the Civil Service Act? Why do they try to make as many employment agencies as they possibly can, outside the confines of the Civil Service Act? It does interfere with our public service. As I have said before, hon. members should bear in mind that we cannot very well hire three or four different sets of employees without having them compare each other, without having some jealousy, bitterness and antagonism arise with respect to the rights and privileges granted each one. I think we are introducing a dangerous doctrine by having the government bring before us a bill setting up boards, commissions and crown companies and having the employees of these bodies removed from governmental responsibility and from parliament itself. It amounts to a dictatorial privilege of hiring, firing, employing and granting privileges beyond the Civil Service Act. The civil servants of Canada have had a long tradition of rights and privileges and of stability of employment. They know what they get under the Civil Service Act. I do not know what they will get under this bill or what their term of employment will be. Many factors enter into the matter, and I think the minister might very well give it further consideration, particularly in relation to officers, employees and clerks. There may be some excuse for having highly trained, technical men put on some special ground, because they are few in number and are specialists in their field, but there is no excuse for having ordinary employees and clerks, with no better qualifications, no different abilities, and in no different situations, hired by a board of this kind on a basis different from that on which the permanent civil service operates. Would the minister not take that suggestion into consideration and allow the section to stand until he sees whether he can bring in a provision that will have all these people within the scope of the Civil Service Act?

Mr. GARDINER: A question was asked the other day in connection with this matter. I am not quite sure whether it has been answered. I rather think it was submitted in the form of an order for return. The question asked was whether employees of such boards, commissions, corporations and controlled industries are on the civil service list and, if not, what are the names of the boards, commissions, corporations and controlled industries whose employees are not on the civil service list? I have the figures given here showing the agricultural food board, exempt, one; agricultural supplies board, exempt, four; meat board, exempt, one; special products board, one; agricultural prices support board, eight. That was at September 1, 1946, and it goes on down the line: Agriculture food board, January 1, 1947, one; agricultural supplies board, four; meat board, one; agricultural prices support board, eight.

These are the boards we are talking about and I wish to say this with respect to them. In spite of the fact that these figures are so small, I cannot recall any people who come in contact with myself who are not civil servants. These boards that we have are different from some other boards that hon. members will have in mind. It is one of the reasons why there has been criticism that the boards have not farm representation on them. The fact is, they are mostly civil servants. The members of the boards are practically all civil servants, though there are a few taken in from outside, such as those mentioned in connection with the meat board the other day. There are a few on the cheese board who are men in the trade itself. There are a few persons of that kind on the board. The food board consists of men who are in the inside service. The persons who are doing clerical work are stenographers and clerks who are in the civil service in their own offices, and that has been the case all through the war. We have had very few persons employed to assist in this kind of work, perhaps to a lesser extent than any other department of government during the war period.

We did not appoint dollar a year men; we did not appoint persons outside to take charge of this work. We said that the men who had been trained in it prior to the war, civil servants who had grown up in the service, in the handling of these products, were the kind of people we wanted to have handle these products. So we have Mr. Taggart, who is one of the high-ranking employees in the department itself, at the head of two boards, and Mr. Pearsall, who has handled the meat business for Canada practically ever since the end of the last war as manager of the wheat board.

These are the type of men who are handling the business. They have their own staffs in their own offices doing the job, and they have done it largely without increased staffs. It is true that we occasionally require short-time employees, probably in Montreal or in Winnipeg, probably somewhere else, to take charge of some work which will only be temporary. This bill is for only one year, and even during the war, when we made these agreements, it was anticipated that, within a reasonable time after the war was over, this work would cease. The persons taken on were competent officials, competent secretaries or stenographers who were asked to assist with the work, some of them only on part time and some with expenses paid when they came to Ottawa. As far as the members of the board were concerned, we may have employed for them in some cases one or two individuals to do the work that has to be done around their office. These are not civil servants and there is no reason why they should be.

If the figures quoted are the right ones, but whether they are the figures or not, there will not be any considerable number of them at all, and I suggest that the civil service commission itself would say that it would be more or less ridiculous to ask them to put persons through examinations and everything else necessary in order to obtain the services of these few individuals who will not be civil servants. As I have said, practically the whole staff of these organizations is comprised in the civil service. There may not be any of the types mentioned, technical persons or persons of that kind, and certainly few who will be employed in connection with this. We have these technical persons on our staff now.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to support the hon. member for Carleton, but I am glad to hear the statement made by the minister. I have always felt that this particular clause in so many of our acts was something that we should endeavour to change so that there would be no misunderstanding as to what was being done. In spite of the fact that the statement made by the minister is satisfactory, I believe that the hon. member for Carleton, in raising this matter, has done something which it was proper to do, because we must drive home to the government, when these opportunities arise, that it is the opinion of the house and, I believe, generally, that in all cases, as far as it is possible to do so, appointments should be out of the hands of the minister and in the hands of the civil service commission which we have established for the purpose.

The minister's statement was a good one and I was glad to hear it, but I wish to endorse what the hon. member for Carleton has said. In spite of the fact that the statement was a good one, I think the more frequently we drive this home to the government, the more likely it will be that the kind of policy which the minister says is being carried out in connection with these boards will be pursued in the future.

Mr. BOUCHER: I cannot go as far as the leader of the C.C.F. has gone in this respect.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am taking the face value of what the minister has said.

Mr. BOUCHER: What the minister has said shows amply that there is no necessity whatever for this section in the bill. If it is the fact that all or nearly all employees appointed by him by virtue of this act are civil servants, why not leave them under the Civil Service Act? Why put this section in the bill? Is it put there in case there might in future be somebody not the minister administering the act? Today the country is faced with a difficult problem, and the government itself appreciates the difficulty it is having in cutting down administrative costs and in releasing from the civil service a great many people who have given valiant service to the government during the war and who are now let out because there is no longer any necessity for the functions they have been performing. I submit that they are the people who, having served the government faithfully, having shown their value to the government, should be continued on under the Civil Service Act and be given preferential appointments under these boards. The same with returned soldiers who have veterans preference. A man with veterans preference who had served the government for four or five years in a certain department now finds that his work is diminishing and he is consequently being released. The civil service commission could very well assist such people, who have done excellent work for the government, by maintaining them in the service through transference from some department in which they are not needed to these boards. As to getting a few temporaries, they can always be obtained through the civil service commission. The minister has not shown any reason why this section should be in the bill and I would ask him to reconsider it in the light of what has been said.

Mr. GARDINER: If we want technical men, is it suggested that a man needed for a week's job or even a month's job should come through the civil service commission? Is it suggested that we should take that to the civil service commission?

Mr. REID: You would not get it through in a year.

Mr. GARDINER: They are the kind of persons employed in this kind of work. There is not a permanent staff employed in this work. There cannot be any permanent staff employed under a bill that lasts for only a year.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think the minister will recall that yesterday he said that some of this legislation which was being brought in for a year must inevitably be continued. This is probably one which is to be continued on. If the minister tries to let us feel that we are dealing with something that is for only a short period, I think he is entirely misrepresenting the situation, even in his own mind, to members of the house. I feel that we should carefully guard against such a provision in this act, because I do not think he has shown any justification for having it in. Would the minister give us some further justification than he has already given for having this section in this bill?

Mr. McIVOR: Who will ask the civil service for these officers or these technical advisers?

Mr. MacNICOL: Use the same method as is in operation now.

Mr. BROOKS: I wish to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Carleton. I have nothing in particular to add except this. It seems to me that this is more or less an evasion of the veterans preference. The more of these acts that we have under which the minister has power to make selection, the more it means that the veterans preference is being done away with.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not necessarily.

Mr. BOUCHER: Substantially.

Mr. BROOKS: In effect, the veterans preference is done away with. There is no protection there. I know that with the Minister of Veterans Affairs who, according to his own statement is a great champion of the veterans, we might possibly feel safe. But he might not be there all the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am grateful for the cynical remarks made by my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: You asked for it.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister ought to be able to recognize cynical remarks because I have not heard any more cynical ones than some made by him. Apart from that altogether, I do not think it is treating the returned soldiers preference in the manner in which it should be treated. The Minister of Agriculture belittles the matter. He says, "Well we appoint all civil servants anyway, except perhaps somebody who was appointed for a month or something of that kind."

Mr. GARDINER: I made it broader than that.

Mr. BROOKS: I ask the minister this question. In the appointment of his temporary employees, will he give the returned soldier the preference?

Mr. GARDINER: I think I have as much reason as anyone else in the house for giving the returned soldiers the preference, and I believe I have given them the preference as much as anyone else in the house. I do not think I require to give any undertaking, and the department knows it.

Mr. BROOKS: That is just another evasion, and not a direct answer.

Mr. GARDINER: I will make it just as direct as you want it. The answer is, "yes."

Mr. BROOKS: That is all right.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask a simple question? If the appointments are made by the civil service, will they be made, as usual, on Conservative recommendation?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall section 7 carry? Carried.

Section agreed to.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall section 8 carry?

Mr. GREEN: Before this section carries—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): It is carried.

Mr. GREEN: Do not be in a hurry, Mr. Chairman.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. FRASER: It must be carried four times now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You are lucky it does not require a greater number.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There is an orderly way of conducting the business of the house. We called section 7 and it was carried.

Mr. HATFIELD: Section 6 has not been carried yet.

Mr. GARDINER: You were asleep.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Section 7 is carried. Then I called section 8.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, there was a certain amount of cross-fire in the chamber, and while that was going on you may have said, "Is the section carried?"

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Is the hon. member questioning that statement?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, I am, very much.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The section was carried.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think section 7 should be considered as carried.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: May I just make a suggestion, Mr. Chairman? There is not any doubt that it was carried. But the usual practice in this committee is to ask that we revert to a section, if it is so desired. If the hon. member asks that the committee revert to section 7, and there is no objection to doing so, we shall probably revert to it. Why have an argument about it?

Mr. GREEN: I am not admitting for a moment that it was carried.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, it was.

Mr. GREEN: However I suggest that we revert to section 7.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): In other words, you do not take the Chairman's statement about that? You do not accept the Chairman's statement? Is that your position?

Mr. GREEN: I say that we did not hear you say "carried", and I do not think it should be put through in that way.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, it was carried.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I want to state again, and state emphatically, that section 7 was carried. Then I called section 8.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): As the Minister of Agriculture has said, if the committee wishes to revert to section 7, it is perfectly in order for it to do so, by consent of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Unanimous consent.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): But not by decision of the Chairman.

Mr. GREEN: There is a serious point of procedure involved here, Mr. Chairman. We shall be dealing with many sections of various bills during this session. I have never seen anything like this attempted before. Where a chairman says that a section is carried, and there is some misunderstanding about it, or members do not hear that that has been said, it has always been taken that we should go on with your discussion, and that there would be no such thing as cutting off discussion.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. There is a proper procedure for the hon. member to follow, and it is not to question the statement made by the Chair. He should ask the committee if it will revert to section 7.

Mr. GREEN: I will ask that the committee revert to section 7.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Is that the wish of the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

The committee having reverted to section 7.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that this question of how the employees of the dominion government are to be hired is an important one. Some of the members will remember sitting before the war, on a special committee which dealt with the Civil Service Act. We went thoroughly into the whole question of the merit system. In the last two or three sessions we have seen bill after bill brought in containing the provision that the minister concerned did not need to go to the civil service commission; in other words, bypassing the commission. I would ask hon. members to consider this fact: In effect, we are throwing the merit system overboard. It will take just a few more bills of this type completely to ruin the merit system in the Canadian civil service, and that is something which should not be done. I know there are some members of the house, perhaps some in every party, who do not care about the merit system. They would be quite glad to see it thrown out. But if the merit system goes out, we have nothing left but patronage; and surely we have gone far past the stage when dominion employees are engaged on a patronage basis. In this particular case the minister is given the power to hire technical and scientific personnel. He has already admitted that he has technically and scientifically trained men and women on his staff, and they must go through the civil service commission. They have to go through the civil service commission. Why should he now want power to hire people with these qualifications outside the commission? As for the other officers and employees, surely they can be obtained through the commission. I suggest that we should not put a provision like this in this bill. No harm will be done if the employees are engaged through the commission. Therefore I would ask the minister to drop subsection 1 of section 7. The result would be, of course, that the personnel would have to be engaged by the civil service commission.

Mr. MacINNIS: Ever since I came into this house I have advocated the employment of the staff of the civil service through the civil service commission. When we had another bill before us a week or so ago an amendment was moved, I think by the hon. member for Haldimand, to have the staff covered by that bill recruited through the civil service commission, and I supported that point of view. On that occasion the minister concerned said it could not be done, and the hon. member withdrew his amendment. There was far more reason at that time for insisting on having the staff engaged through the civil service commission than there is under this bill. If you turn to section 11 you will find that this is a temporary measure; and personally, though I favour the principle that everyone who is to be a permanent civil servant should be employed through the civil service commission, if this is merely a temporary measure I do not think there is a very good case for insisting that the staff be engaged in that way. We have to be consistent in this matter, and certainly I am not going to press for that change at this time. If this legislation should be continued; if we could make it a permanent measure, as we tried to do, as far as I am concerned and, I believe, as far as this group is concerned we would insist that the staff be recruited through the civil service commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: Like the hon. member for Vancouver East, ever since I have been in this house bills have been brought in and passed containing the same provision that appears in this bill. Let me read it:

> The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, employ such professional, technical or other officers, clerks and employees as are necessary . . .

That provision has gone through many times in many bills during the seventeen or eighteen years I have been here, not only under this government but under the previous government. I am now asking myself, how many employees now working for the government have been appointed other than through the civil service commission? I agree with all that has been said, that surely the time has come when the civil service commission should be competent to engage the staff required by the government, or that should be done in some other way. I call the hon. member for Carleton the watchdog of the civil service, because he is always on his feet in their defence, and I agree with what he has said. Having in mind what was said by the minister, however, that this is a temporary measure, that may be some justification, but the minister said that this measure may be extended for two, three or four years; or it may become permanent. In that case those employed in a temporary capacity would be taken on as permanent employees, and that would not be fair to the civil service commission. I think we have gone altogether too far in many of these bills in taking the employment of personnel for the government service out of the hands of the commission and leaving it to the ministers of the various departments, and I suggest that the time has come to call a halt.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BURTON: I am sorry to be bothering you, Mr. Chairman, but I should like permission to revert to section 6 for a short time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BURTON: This will not take long, if I have permission.

Mr. KNOWLES: That section was not discussed at all.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. gentleman wishes the committee to revert to section 6.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Go ahead.

On section 6—Advisory committees.

Mr. BURTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Section 6 reads:

The minister may from time to time establish advisory committees to advise and assist him in the administration of this act.

That deals in part with something we discussed previously, and the minister agreed to make a slight change.

Mr. GARDINER: I know what you are going to move; so go ahead and move it, without taking too much time.

Mr. BURTON: I am very happy to find the minister so cooperative tonight, and I thank him. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk:

That section 6 be amended by striking out the words "may from time to time" where they appear in the first line, and substituting therefor the word "shall."

And the said section be further amended by inserting after the word "committee" where it appears in the second line the following: "with adequate producer representation."

Mr. GARDINER: Accepted.

Sections 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. GARDINER: Now, with the permission of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Next sitting.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the house.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BRYCE—CABLE FROM SIR WALDRON SMITHERS

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I rise to a question of privilege. I have received from you a cable regarding a statement I made in this house on Monday evening concerning Sir Waldron Smithers, M.P. The cable reads:

Speaker,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Canada.

Please tell William Bryce his criticism of me due to misunderstanding. Hansard reports when I was there in Canada dollar wheat showed good profit to consumer. That was thirty-five years ago. Please ask Bryce give equal publicity. Respectful good wishes.

Waldron Smithers, Commons, London.

If Sir Waldron Smithers had been well enough informed about Canadian affairs to be justified in making any statement as to what would constitute a fair price for wheat, he should know as much about conditions in Canada today as we know about conditions in Britain. If he had possessed that knowledge he never would have made the statement which he was reported to have made, and which his cable appears to confirm. I still think the knight owes this country an apology for a statement which is the reverse of the fact.

Let me repeat this statement again: If we had done what he alleges we did, we would have demanded the market price, at least for the wheat, and that would be around $3 a bushel instead of the $1.55 Britain pays today. And let me say, I do not begrudge this bargain to Britain because it affords an opportunity for us to assist Britain in her present difficulties, which we are proud and glad to do. In the second place, it lays a base for the establishment of stabilized prices for our products. I personally, along with many Canadian farmers, resent being insulted by one who is a beneficiary of our favourable agreement.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

He said: The object of the bill which will be based upon this resolution is to continue in force for a period not exceeding one year from March 31 next a specified group of orders and regulations of the governor in council which were passed under the War Measures Act or the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945. In the speech from the throne His Excellency stated the intention of the government in the following terms:

> The policy of the government is to maintain only such price and commodity controls as may be required to protect consumers from a sudden and drastic rise in the cost of living, and to ensure the fair distribution of essential goods and services which are in short supply. You will be invited to consider what measures may be necessary to continue this policy after the expiry of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. Where it may appear advisable to continue these or other transitional measures, the required legislation will be submitted for your approval at the earliest possible date.

The proposed bill will set forth all the measures of an emergency nature which the government considers it is necessary or expedient to retain subsequent to the expiry of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945. The government does not recommend that parliament confer upon the governor in council any general powers to make orders and regulations with respect to general subject matters. Rather it is considered that the stage in progress of this country from war to peace has been reached where it is possible to carry out the policies of translation and decontrol upon the basis of powers which are contained in orders and regulations of the governor in council now in existence.

Hon. members will recall that upon the outbreak of the war in 1939 the War Measures Act came into force upon a proclamation of the governor in council declaring that a state of war existed. That statute conferred upon the governor in council the widest possible powers. Only the extreme nature of the emergency with which the country was faced justified the vesting of such powers in the executive, but this crisis made it imperative that wide powers should be exercisable in a speedy and flexible manner.

With the cessation of hostilities in 1945 it became apparent that, while the emergency created by the war had not by any means come to an end, the extensive powers necessary to meet the day to day exigencies involved in the active prosecution of the war were no longer necessary. Parliament was accordingly advised that the situation no longer called for the continued use of the powers conferred by the War Measures Act, but that powers of a less extensive nature would be sufficient. Parliament accordingly, being of the opinion that the national emergency arising out of the war continued to exist, conferred upon the governor in council power to make regulations for the purpose of (a) providing for and maintaining the armed forces of Canada during the occupation of enemy territory and demobilization and providing for the rehabilitation of members thereof; (b) facilitating the readjustment of industry and commerce to the requirements of the community in time of peace; (c) maintaining, controlling and regulating supplies and services, prices, transportation, use and occupation of property, rentals, employment, salaries and wages to ensure economic stability and an orderly transition to conditions of peace; (d) assisting the relief of suffering and the restoration and distribution of essential supplies and services in any part of His Majesty's dominions or in foreign countries that are in grave distress as the result of the war, or (e) continuing or discontinuing in an orderly manner, as the emergency permits, measures adopted during and by reason of the war.

The National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, as amended by chapter 60 of the statutes of 1946, expires on March 29 next. The government, however, must advise the house that the national emergency arising out of the war cannot yet be said to have come to an end and that the time has not yet come when emergency measures can be wholly discontinued. In particular, let me emphasize that the time is not appropriate for the complete removal of emergency economic controls for reasons which I shall give later. The government, therefore, while prepared to recommend that the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act be allowed to expire according to its terms, is nevertheless of opinion that certain transitional measures should be continued for the time being.

These measures, of which office consolidations have been printed and circulated to hon. members of the house, fall into three classes which may be described in very general terms as regulative, administrative and legislative. Examples of regulative orders are those authorizing the continuance of price control, rent control, eviction control, the control of distribution and supply, including rationing. Examples of administrative orders are those relating to members and former members of the armed forces and merchant seamen, the disposition of claims against the crown arising overseas out of the war and the administration of property of the Japanese in Canada. The orders which I have called legislative are the orders relating to old age pensions, veterans preference in the civil service and labour relations. The reason I put those in a special category is that they will be replaced later this session by acts of parliament.

As the house was informed last August, a committee of officers of the Department of Justice and the other departments concerned under the direction of the Solicitor General has since the latter part of 1945 kept under continuous examination and review the orders in council passed as emergency measures. Recommendations for revocation of orders have been made from time to time, and the committee has reported that all but the measures appearing in the office consolidations to which I referred can be allowed to expire with the expiry of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945.

However I should state that there will be a supplement to the office consolidations which will be distributed and which will contain two other orders relating to the control of atomic energy. For reasons which have appeared since the office consolidations were printed, it has appeared that these are orders which it is believed should be continued under the authority of this legislation.

Mr. GREEN: When will they be available?

Mr. ILSLEY: Tomorrow, it is expected. They will be printed in the appendix to the bill which will be circulated when it receives first reading. At least reference to that will be printed in the appendix to the bill. But the orders themselves will be circulated at once. They are at the printers now, and I was told today they will likely be available tomorrow.

When the bill comes before the house, there will, of course be an opportunity, if the house so desires, of discussing any or all of the orders in council to be continued by the bill; and the ministers of the several departments concerned will be prepared to answer questions in committee relating to their respective orders in council. I think, however, I should say something at this stage regarding the orders relating to the control of prices, rentals and supplies, and especially to the operations of the wartime prices and trade board.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

As I said earlier in my remarks, the time is not appropriate for the complete removal of these important emergency economic controls. While much progress has been made in expanding our peacetime production, and while the flow of output is gathering increasing momentum, production in a number of important fields has not yet overtaken the high level of demand which in some cases, like that of housing, has been accumulating for years.

Moreover, the consequences of the war are still very apparent in external markets. Worldwide shortages of basic materials and foodstuffs limit the supplies of a number of goods available in Canada. On the one hand, they mean extraordinarily large and urgent demands for Canadian foodstuffs, raw materials and other goods, and on the other hand, they limit the supplies of such imported basic commodities as sugar, vegetable oils, tin and steel. High and fluctuating prices in world markets give us some idea of the sort of market conditions which would be reflected in Canada if all controls, including export controls, were dropped at this time. While the government has been moving as promptly as conditions warranted in removing controls, there can be little doubt that an immediate removal of all remaining controls would have very serious and undesirable consequences.

In some cases, the consequences are quite obvious. For example, I do not think there can be much question as to what would happen if the controls over rentals and evictions were removed in present circumstances. In the face of the continuing shortage of housing accommodation, it is clear enough that rents would rise sharply and that evictions would be counted in the tens of thousands.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ILSLEY: Absolutely true; and anyone who denies it is just living apart from the facts.

The results of a sudden removal of price and other controls over such commodities as sugar and vegetable oils, where external prices are high and supplies difficult to obtain, must be equally apparent. Prices would not only rise sharply, but distribution would be uneven and disorderly, and the needs of many citizens could not be met. In the face of the international conditions in the economic sphere and of the gaps which, though narrowing, still persist between domestic supplies and demands, there can be no doubt that prices of foods, textiles, fuels and, of course, rentals would rise suddenly and substantially. The same thing would be true of many basic materials, with consequent additional pressure on the prices of many manufactured goods. And not only would prices and living costs advance suddenly and sharply, but we would also be plunged into a condition of disorderly markets, and perhaps soon after would be faced with widespread price declines with their inevitable restrictive effects on production and employment.

I do not suggest that we would be faced with uncontrollable inflation on the central European or Chinese pattern. That obviously is not the case. Production in this country has increased too much for that sort of thing, and we did not, during the war, suffer disorganization and destruction in our domestic economy.

I do say, however, that we would have a sudden and marked increase in our price level, and in the cost of living, which would rapidly carry us toward the notably higher level of prices prevailing in the United States.

One can readily imagine how an abrupt and substantial rise in living costs would contribute to an unsettled state of industrial relations and to delays and interruptions in the production of goods which are so eagerly demanded. It is not difficult to appreciate the hardship and the reduction in living standards that would result for the many families whose incomes are relatively fixed—wage-earners, school teachers, white-collar workers, pensioners and so on. That there would be profiteering and speculation in the necessities of life can be taken for granted. And it is an absolute certainty that many prices, after rising suddenly, would fluctuate widely, and later on decline perhaps as abruptly as they went up. To remove all controls now would be to ask for a sudden and disruptive jump in our prices and living costs at the very time when we can begin to see ahead of us the completion of the job of orderly readjustment. We would be throwing away many of the advantages of the policy which Canada has successfully followed when, with a little more persistence and a little more patience we could pilot ourselves through the difficult period of readjustment without the dislocation and economic disorder which usually follows war.

If we are to achieve an orderly readjustment it will be necessary to continue a number of controls for the time being. I cannot subscribe in any way to the opinion that immediate decontrol would be more conducive to more orderly conditions than the policy of gradual and planned decontrol which the government is following. We have before us the experience of the United States where all price controls except those over rents and two specified commodities were removed not long ago.

Mr. GREEN: Which two?

Mr. ILSLEY: That experience gives a very fair idea of what could have been expected in this country had we followed a similar course. What did happen in the United States can be described in its broad outlines quite briefly. In the seven months following June 30, 1946, when O.P.A.'s powers first expired, the official cost of living index rose 20 points, from 33 per cent over the pre-war level to 53 per cent over that level. The food component of the cost of living index rose by 38 points during the same seven months. The general level of wholesale prices in the United States, which was 40 per cent over the pre-war level in June, 1946, was 76 per cent over that level in January 1947, and has not declined since.

Not only have prices risen sharply in the United States, but those of a number of important commodities have fluctuated widely and in a manner which it would be very difficult to describe as orderly. To take two very important examples, prices of beef and pork in the United States have been showing remarkable gyrations. The wholesale price of beef in New York jumped from its former ceiling at the end of June of somewhat over $20 per hundredweight, to $55 early in July. It then came down to around $36 and a ceiling of around $25 was reimposed in September. When that ceiling came off the price soared to $62 and then it fell again and the latest quotation is around $40. We can see the same sort of story in pork, in lard and in butter. Whatever else it may be, it is not a picture of orderly conditions. There are, of course, many other prices that have gone up and have not come down. The prices of cotton fabrics rose in line with the rise in the price of raw cotton which was not under price control until the time when controls over textile prices were dropped. Since then the price of raw cotton has shown some decline, but the prices of fabrics have risen very substantially. While no one would suggest that Canadian consumers like the price increase that it has been necessary to authorize in this country, it must surely be clear that the immediate removal of the economic purchasing controls would involve much greater price increases, widely fluctuating markets and opportunities for speculation and exploitation which ought to be apparent to anyone who takes the trouble to examine the actual background of our present position.

The government's policy is a common-sense one. It is one of orderly readjustment as opposed to boom-and-collapse readjustment. It is a policy of trying to avoid the disorder and disruption which all history and which experience in other countries today show is the usual aftermath of war.

Most of us remember the sort of thing which happened to prices and living costs after the first world war here in Canada. Prices had risen sharply during the war, and after a short pause they soared on upward until at the peak of the boom in 1920 living costs were some 90 per cent over the pre-war level and wholesale prices had reached a peak of some 150 per cent higher than before the war. Then prices collapsed. That sort of thing which also happened in the United States and in Great Britain was boom-and-collapse readjustment. The Canadian people wish to profit by that experience and not to repeat it. And that is the policy the government has been following with some considerable success.

While prices in many other countries have been soaring and fluctuating widely, a gradual upward movement has been permitted in Canada. The cost of living in the United States has gone up eighteen per cent since the end of the war while it has risen six per cent in Canada. The wholesale price level in the United States has risen by one-third, while in Canada it has advanced by eight per cent.

Admittedly the readjustment is not completed but substantial progress has been made. Moreover, if history repeats itself and prices decline in external markets we may not have to adjust ourselves to the sort of price level which is implied by prices now prevailing in world markets. And even if that price level is sustained, we shall have made an orderly adjustment and saved ourselves the hardship and disruption which premature decontrol would surely involve.

Recognizing that we cannot suddenly abandon all controls, it may still be asked what specific economic controls remain necessary. While I cannot answer that question in full detail, both because of the time it would take and because no one can exactly forecast the conditions affecting individual commodities, a specific list of goods and services still under price control was published in the press in January and appears in its full detail in wartime prices and trade board order 684. This order lists all the goods and services over which the government believed specific price ceilings were still necessary in the middle of January. It represents a notable reduction from the list published last July but it still covers most of the basic foods, practically all articles of clothing, most of the important fuels, rentals, and a number of basic materials and farm supplies. It is the government's policy to reduce that list further as rapidly as conditions permit. But I cannot say when it will be practicable to take the next step or what goods will be included. Even if I could, such an announcement would be quite improper and would render impracticable any effective control over the goods concerned. I cannot even say for sure that all goods now freed from price ceilings will remain decontrolled. It was necessary, for example, to reimpose price ceilings on one item which was decontrolled in January. Of course there will be no general reimposition of ceilings, but decontrol is a matter of judgment and one cannot always be sure that unforeseen difficulties will not develop. I should also point out that, even when specific price ceilings are removed from particular commodities, it does not necessarily follow that all other controls affecting those products can be dropped. This is usually the case, but not always. For example, price ceilings no longer apply to most fish, but it is still necessary to exercise some controls over exports to assure a sufficient and balanced supply in the Canadian market.

Some hon. members may want to know how long the remaining controls will continue to be needed. Again, I cannot give a specific or detailed answer. I can certainly say, however, that the government does not expect to come to the house a year from now with a proposal for the continuation of the orders in council annexed to the proposed bill, at least in anything like their present breadth and scope. There are some fields in which specific controls may still be necessary even then. Hon. members can judge for themselves whether rental controls will still be needed in a year's time, and it is possible that we may still have some continuing problems of a major nature in regard to a few commodities such as sugar. But it would be my judgment that any such residual problems could be dealt with specifically and that we should have discontinued the great bulk of emergency controls before that time.

The timing of decontrol in the months ahead will be related to economic developments both at home and abroad. Production in Canada and in the United States is now expanding rapidly. In these circumstances, I believe that decontrol is likely to proceed quite rapidly but, as I have emphasized, it is the government's intention to avoid disorderly price fluctuations and confused markets which abrupt abandonment of all controls would be certain to produce.

I would remind the house that Canada led the world in the novel experiment of an over-all price ceiling and rental control. We ploughed new ground in the formulation of the policy, in the drafting of the regulations and in the administrative application of them. Of necessity, we had to phrase the regulations in broad language. The problem we were tackling had such infinite implications that we thought it better to err on the side of comprehensive coverage than to attempt specific definitions of every conceivable type of transaction affected by the over-all price control and rental control. In the event, I suggest that this approach provided the flexibility which made administration practicable and contributed greatly to Canada's success in this incredibly difficult field of economic administration, a success which has made this country the envy of practically every other nation in the world, not only for the effectiveness of its controls during the actual fighting but for the manner in which orderly conditions have been maintained in the disturbing period of post-war readjustment.

The temporary continuation of these powers is desired for the sole purpose of ensuring that this country may weather the very difficult problems of readjusting its economy to a peacetime basis after the strains of a war, the like of which this world has never seen. We tend to forget the scale and magnitude of the terrific effort which this country and its fighting allies had to achieve in order to snatch victory from forces of evil which came very close indeed to overwhelming the world we know and the way of life we seek to maintain. We may become impatient about what seems to be the slow progress out of the maze of wartime controls which for a time held all belligerent countries in the iron grip of a wartime discipline. But I urge hon. members to reflect on what the war did, and the price which must be paid for it. Make no mistake about it, the influence of this war will be felt through the life-span of every member of this house, and the two years or even a little longer taken patiently and intelligently to unwind wartime controls is not at all an unreasonable period, when viewed in the perspective of the job to be done.

The government has stated repeatedly that controls will be lifted just as quickly as is consistent with the avoidance of a sharp and disorderly increase in our prices and it has already taken a number of important steps in the direction of full decontrol. In following that policy it is clear that good judgment in regard to the timing of measures of decontrol is of prime importance. I believe the record shows that judgment in this respect has been good. In the administration of the policy I submit also that the record of the wartime prices and trade board has been a highly creditable one. The board throughout its existence has discharged its duties in the highest sense of trusteeship. In a measure of this scope, there are, of coure, bound to be individual cases in which disagreement on methods or action will arise, but as the minister to whom for years the board reported, I wish to pay a tribute to the wartime prices and trade board for its devotion to the public interest, its high regard for the principles of justice and the consistency of its record in placing at all times the general interest above any special interests whatever.

I felt yesterday that I should rise and associate myself with the tributes that were paid Mr. Gordon, but I did not do so, because I thought there might be an opportunity on this occasion. I did, however, appreciate those tributes very much. I appreciated greatly what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said and I also appreciated deeply what the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) had to say. He stood up in this house and was not afraid, although he was in an opposition party, to say a good word for a great public servant.

The board regulations have been gone over carefully in the light of over five years of practical experience. A number of provisions have recently been withdrawn, or amended, in the light of that experience, and the orders now before the house represent the kind of authority which the board needs to finish the job which it has discharged with such distinction up to date.

I am quite ready to admit that the powers delegated to the board under these orders in council are wide powers. But they are necessarily wide. The board must have authority if it is to complete the task assigned to it under the government's direction. It may be argued that it should be possible to define the particular goods and services to which these powers are applicable. But in practice, I do not think that such definition would be desirable. Some hon. members may feel that the powers should be limited to a specific list of goods and services, say the list last announced. But if that were done, the board would have no power to deal with prices which for unforeseen circumstances began to rise abruptly or unreasonably. The board would have no power to deal with speculative excesses or profiteering that might develop on decontrolled items, as it has under the present regulations which prescribe that no goods and services shall be sold at prices that are higher than is reasonable or just. It would have no power to use other measures which might be necessary even if price control for the commodity concerned was no longer required.

The system which we have had to date has worked and the administration has been efficient and reasonable. Though there are some people who have made quite unjustified insinuations about the wartime bureaucrats, the record of the prices board in efficiency, fairness, and honest administration speaks for itself. I would ask hon. members to consider whether there is any reasonable possibility of abuse of these powers in the light of the record during the war and during the more recent period of gradual decontrol. For myself, I am convinced that there is none. I am convinced that to finish this job effectively we must and we can safely rely on the prices board under the direction of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to use its powers in a fair and proper manner and in the spirit and tradition which this house would demand.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the discussion in this house of the proposed measure take place as far as possible on the second reading of the bill rather than on this resolution. The house will then have before it the bill with its appended schedule of orders in council, and after the second reading takes place, will have full opportunity to discuss in committee of the whole not only the orders appended to the bill but the individual provisions of these orders if it is thought fit to have a detailed discussion on these provisions. As I indicated earlier in the session, there will be an opportunity for members to propose amendments to the orders in council in question if they desire to do so, but I am not inviting any such amendments and I hope that none will be necessary.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) has suggested that the main debate on this matter take place on the second reading of the bill which will later be introduced rather than that we debate it at this time. With that suggestion we in this party are in entire agreement.

I wish to take but a moment now to outline the position as I see it. The motion before us is to go into committee of the whole to consider the expedience of introducing a measure providing for the temporary extension of certain transitional measures beyond March 29, measures which would ordinarily terminate at that time unless provision is now made for extending them.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The proposed bill, from the statements made by the minister at an earlier time, will deal with about fifty-five different orders in council. The main principle is the extension of the powers granted in all these orders in council. But these orders in council are of varying degrees of importance and they differ widely from one another. I think the idea now of going into committee of the whole, where we may ask the minister questions and then, later on, debate the main principles in the bill, is a good suggestion.

Speaking for this party, I may say we are agreeable to passing this motion at this stage, asking for certain further information in committee, and then, with the bill before us, and at a later time, as the minister suggests, going ahead with the debate.

We propose to reserve the right either to support or to oppose the different sections of the bill in committee of the whole, and to debate the whole general question on second reading. Under those circumstances we are agreeable to the passage of this motion at this time.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Usually when a suggestion of this kind is made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) or any other minister of the government we try to fall in line with it, but on this occasion I think one must say something more than a few cursory words regarding the motion now before us. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because, as will be seen from the remarks I shall make, we wish to place ourselves on record regarding the whole policy of controls and the policy of the government in regard to decontrols.

If it were necessary tonight to make out a case against decontrols to a greater extent than I am inclined to make it just now, I think that has been done in large measure by the minister himself. His defence of the controls that have been in effect, his statement regarding the situation which developed in the great country to the south last July and again last October, is, I think, a sufficient vindication of the main controls that have been put into effect in Canada and a vindication of those of us who believe that, instead of entering upon a policy of rapid decontrol, even on a planned basis, we should, in the interests of the Canadian people, not only maintain useful controls but, in some instances, even reimpose controls that have been lifted.

The resolution to be considered precedes the introduction of a measure—what for?—to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war; in short, by an act of this parliament to authorize the continuance of certain controls for a certain limited but unspecified period. I wish to say on behalf of this party that we shall seek to amend this motion in order to provide for consideration by the government and by this house of a different policy, the policy of maintaining beneficial controls and indeed, where necessary, of instituting comprehensive controls in order to protect the interests of the Canadian people.

I know perfectly well that in doing this we run counter to a great deal of propaganda in this country, propaganda that has gone on ever since, before the war ended. The amazing thing about this propaganda is that, while it has had some effect in, shall I say, political circles, it has had hardly any effect upon the general public. The recent Gallup polls indicate that conclusively. In the Gallup poll of Canadian public opinion, published in a number of Canadian newspapers on January 18 of this year, sixty-six per cent, or two-thirds of the persons interviewed at that time, answered "no" to the following question: "There has been talk of taking price controls off everything but rents after Christmas. Would you approve?" Sixty-six per cent answered, "no"; only twenty-seven per cent answered, "yes", and the remaining seven per cent apparently had no opinion to express. Since then, a number of labour and agricultural conferences have taken place: the United Farmers of Alberta, affiliates of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in various places, the Canadian Congress of Labour and other organizations. All of them, by resolution, have urged the maintenance of controls in the interests of the Canadian producer and of the Canadian consumer.

Last night I listened to an interesting and, I may add, an excellent radio address by the hon. gentleman who is parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) (Mr. Mayhew). But the tenor of that address was how beneficial the controls which had been instituted and maintained had been for the Canadian people. The minister himself tonight made a somewhat similar case on behalf of the controls. Yet controls are being discontinued, even while this parliament sits, I think in the face of public opinion in this country.

The voice of the executive council of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, heard from the city of Toronto on January 28, and demanding the removal of controls as soon as possible, has been, more effective, I believe and heard more distinctly, shall I put it, in this chamber than the voices of the masses of the Canadian people. What is forgotten is that the demand from private interests is a demand for the ending of public controls instituted in the public interest, for the ending of public controls now under the authority of this parliament, that is, by authority of the elected representatives of the people. I say to this house that the question we should be considering is a different one. We should be concerned, not with the elimination of controls by public bodies, but with the elimination of controls by private corporations, the elimination of controls by private monopolies; and in many respects this is a monopoly-ridden country. It is not a question of controls. It is a question of what kind of controls, by whom, and for whose benefit?

I say that the job of this house is to protect the public and to see that beneficial controls in the public interest are maintained, and as I said a little earlier, extended, if needs be, in the interests of the people and under the supervision of the elected representatives of the people. I know that such controls may embody new techniques of decentralization and democracy, which will enlarge the economic freedom and the social well-being of the people, which surely are the fundamentals of democratic progress.

At the moment we as a party are interested in preventing the removal of price ceilings and price controls, so that the cost of production and the standards of living shall not be affected adversely by price increases. The time will come of course, on the other hand, when the welfare of the Canadian people may be affected by quite the opposite thing; that is, by deflation. When that time comes the people of Canada will again demand the use of controls to prevent impoverishment of great masses of the people from an entirely different cause. As the minister has shown us tonight, our experience during the war when severe shortages of consumer goods existed, as well as in this immediate post-war period, has proved conclusively to the people of this country that public controls and subsidies can be used for the common good. But, as the minister has done tonight, the government on numerous occasions has made it clear that its aim is to dispense with controls in an orderly fashion and as rapidly as the situation will permit.

I wish to put our position in this way. On the other hand, we believe that the world situation and our own domestic situation demand the retention of public controls so that we may eventually stabilize our economy and proceed to expand and improve our own standard of living. May I say that, in discussing this problem, we cannot overlook the world situation. The clock cannot be turned back. There is no going back again to the conditions that we knew, I was going to say, in the years before the war. I hope we may never see the conditions we saw in the nineteen-thirties. But what I wish to say is that we shall not see the world return to the kind of economic conditions it knew either before the first great war or between the two great wars.

The improvement of the standards of living for the people should be the aim and obligation of public economic policy; but this requires—and I want to say this emphatically—intelligent planning, and there can be no planning without measures of control. Some of my hon. friends object to planning; they object to controls; yet time and again these same objectors in this house rise in their places and demand the setting of parity prices for farm products, or the elimination of the grain exchange, or the marketing of wheat through a public agency such as the wheat board, and support plans for import and export boards. I wish to say that every one of these policies demands economic planning, and they all demand large measures of control. To secure and maintain proper relationship between the farmer's products and the things he must buy to produce them, and to live decently, requires the planning and control of a very wide area of our economic activity. The trouble is that some people want it both ways, and we cannot have it both ways. We cannot one day demand parity and orderly marketing, and the next day denounce public planning and controls as steps toward regimentation and slavery, as my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) did in this house during the debate on the address.

Now I wish to say this because we want to put our position clearly before this house, because we believe in social planning and social security—

Mr. LOW: Planning by whom?

Mr. COLDWELL: By the people of this country, through the democratic institution of parliament.

Mr. LOW: There is no such thing as public planning.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is no such thing as a democratic institution? I believe my hon. friend believes just that.

Mr. LOW: There is no such thing as public planning.

Mr. COLDWELL: Because we believe in social planning and social security, and in the maintenance of intelligent and essential public controls, and because we want to put our position as clearly as possible before this house, I desire to move an amendment to the resolution now before us. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

> That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the chair but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the headlong decontrol policy of the government has depressed the standard of living of the people, threatens the country with economic chaos, and is surrendering the future of Canada to profiteering and monopoly;
> And be it further resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the introduction of a system of orderly and democratic controls so as to provide stable price levels and equitable price relationships in order to eliminate the injustices which now exist and to arrest the rapidly rising cost of living.

I have said that in the kind of economy in which we live, an economy still largely unaffected by the world trend toward social ownership, public controls may and will also involve the payment of subsidies. Again, subsidies involve quite comprehensive planning. Last August, for example, this house agreed that subsidies are desirable. It voted by a substantial majority, for example, for the continuation of the milk subsidy, a decision which the decontrol policy being followed forced the government to disobey. The wartime subsidy policy proved a beneficial phase of our economic planning. In a broadcast over the CBC network on November 8 of last year Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, said:

> The subsidy system under price control is aimed to keep down the cost of raw materials at the earliest stage of manufacture. This, in turn, prevents one rising price from feeding upwards to another, as it would otherwise do, because each manufacturer or wholesaler or retailer who handles the goods adds a percentage of the cost to him, as his profits.
> Consequently, the higher the price the higher the profit mark-up which is based on a percentage of cost and so the higher the final price to you. That is why the collective saving made by all you consumers far exceeds the amount of the subsidy which is, of course, paid by you collectively as taxpayers.

And a government official, as was mentioned in this house some time ago, stated that for every dollar spent on price control the Canadian consumer had saved at least $55. In commenting on that statement when it was brought to his attention, on February 21 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said he did not vouch for the accuracy of the $55, but he could say he was sure the money spent on price controls had saved the Canadian consumer substantial sums. Yet now the government and the minister are abandoning one control after another. Prices rise and the cost of living goes up. No wonder farmers are worried about their costs of production and farm prices and labour is anxious about current wage levels. Just a year ago the day before yesterday, March 18, 1946, gasoline prices were allowed to go up two cents a gallon. A month later, on April 15, farm machinery was permitted to advance by 12½ per cent. Both these increases were criticized by my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party and the Social Credit group as well as by ourselves. Yet they wanted then, as they want now, the speedy removal of all controls; and let me remind them that was before the spectacular increase in prices of farm products in the United States.

Then the budget removed the twenty-five per cent excise tax on a wide range of articles, but prices of those articles to the consumers, which included the excise tax, were not reduced by the amount of the tax then removed. Indeed, in an answer to a question I received from the government last Monday, I think it was, I was told that the recent increase of ten per cent in the prices of certain articles —and I asked particularly about refrigerators —had been allowed on top of the old prices, plus the twenty-five per cent increase allowed as a result of the removal of the excise tax. I think I heard someone say I am wrong. If that is so, the answer given me by the government a few days ago was also wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was questioning the fact that there was a twenty-five per cent tax removed recently.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the last budget.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then perhaps it was the budget before that. Whenever it occurred, whenever it was removed, it was added on to the price. I will not argue as to when the twenty-five per cent excise tax was removed, but I say, when that was done, it remained in the price to the consumer, according to the answer I received a few days ago. We are told, of course, that price increases were made necessary by increased wages. Well, look at the reports of the bureau of statistics, a government agency. They do not bear out that statement. For example, one important price rise of $5 a ton was granted the steel industry before the men were forced by the increased cost of living to strike for a modest rise in wages.

The government policy in returning the control of the Canadian economy to those selfish interests who controlled it before the war is not in the interests of the Canadian people. I want to repeat that the C.C.F. believe that intelligent controls under the supervision of the elected representatives of the people, that is by this parliament—I had better narrow that down a bit and say by this House of Commons—are far better than controls exercised by private corporations.

Of course my hon. friends will immediately conjure up the bogey of bureaucracy. What do they mean? They will tell me that the so-called bureaucrats set up by the country have absolute and great power. The power they get is derived from this parliament; this parliament gave it and this parliament can take it away. Sometimes they quote the old saying that power corrupts and absolute power corrupts absolutely. I agree with that, but public servants are answerable to this parliament. They do not possess absolute power. Private corporations are answerable to none but their shareholders, and that is quite often ineffective.

Mr. HACKETT: And the law.

Mr. COLDWELL: "And the law," my hon. friend says, but what law? It is the law of the private economy in which we live. They do possess absolute power. Let me give an example. I shall give only one, but I could quote a number. The chemical industry which strengthened its position and power during the war has further strengthened itself since the war. It has obtained valuable public property from this country through the disposition of that property by War Assets Corporation. Everyone knows, or should know, that the chemical industry in Canada is effectively controlled by du Pont and Imperial Chemical Industries of the United Kingdom, groups which had close associations with the nazi-controlled I. G. Farbenindustrie before the war. A resolution of the du Pont executive committee passed in October, 1939, set out their policy on control. What was that resolution? It is on the public record, but I shall read it. It was as follows:

> Resolved, further, that the foreign relations department be advised it is the feeling of the executive committee that Canadian Industries Limited has no right to export any products embodying shareholders' inventions, except that during the present emergency Canadian Industries Limited may be permitted to supply Imperial Chemical Industries such goods for sale in the British empire at prices returning a satisfactory profit to Canadian Industries Limited.

That resolution was passed in the second month of the war when Canada and Great Britain were facing a desperate war situation. What about this kind of control of a Canadian industry by a United States board of directors? What about the stipulation in that resolution that even in the extremity of war Canadian Industries Limited could sell only to the British company goods at only what they were pleased to term satisfactory profits?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): That was practically the same attitude taken by the C.C.F. at the time.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was the other way; we all voted for war.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): On a business basis.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, not on a business basis. I am not going to argue with my hon. friend whose friends on August 26, 1939, six days before war broke out, caused the government of this country to pass an order in council setting aside an act which this parliament had passed in June, 1939, stipulating that no contracts for the Department of National Defence could be let to give a profit of more than five per cent. The Minister of Munitions and Supply replied on September 12, 1939 to a question asked by the present premier of Saskatchewan, Hon. T. C. Douglas; he rose in his place and said that the order in council setting aside that act of parliament had been passed in spite of appeals to the patriotism of some of our manufacturers who refused to accept a single contract on the basis laid down by that legislation.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the speaker want to have the record clear on the pure matter of patriotism, because that is apparently what he is talking about at the moment?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to read a sentence from his own speech delivered on September 9, 1939, which I think makes it quite clear. I quote from page 63 of Hansard of that year—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not objecting; the hon. gentleman has my consent to read what he wishes to read.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to read this one sentence. I am doing it simply because the question of patriotism has been dragged in. This is an extract from the spoken policy as read by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. It winds up this way:

> Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.
> [Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right, limited to economic aid, but there is no stipulation as to profits.

An hon. MEMBER: What has that to do with it?

Mr. COLDWELL: Your friends refused to accept contracts unless the act of parliament limiting the profits was set aside. It is those same gentlemen who are today, trying to get rid of controls in order that they may put this country into the kind of mess we had before. I want to go on and say that Lammot du Pont, chairman of du Pont, wrote to Lord McGowan, chairman of Imperial Chemicals, stipulating that Canadian Industries must stay in Canada and not expand by exporting its products except upon terms satisfactory to du Pont and McGowan. That letter is also on the record.

Controls—yes, indeed, the campaign against public controls is in reality a smoke-screen behind which the Canadian economy can be handed over to powerful monopolistic interests. You say that chemicals are an exception. What of aluminum? What of steel? What of farm machinery? You will say that there are three firms manufacturing farm machinery and therefore there must be competition. I was a member of the agriculture committee which held an investigation in 1937 or 1938 into farm machinery prices. Read that report and you will find that the manufacturers charged the same price for the same type of machine. We found that prices were usually set after the most powerful company, the International Harvester Company, had published its prices.

What of the packing industry? Again you will say that there is competition. According to the price spreads report, two companies control some eighty-five per cent of the business with one company, Canada Packers, controlling some fifty per cent.

Yes; hon. gentlemen are opposed to controls that attempt to control the prices and profits of these corporations. They call corporation control, free enterprise. Whose enterprise? How free is it? No wonder that Canada is often said to be monopoly ridden and, be it noted, by foreign monopolies at that! Not that I think a native monopoly is any better for the people than a foreign one. We want to see the elimination of that kind of control. We want to see the elimination of speculative agencies in foodstuffs like the grain exchange. We want to see the marketing of wheat continued under a public agency. And I say, because we want to do these things, they involve both planning and control.

Now to secure a proper relationship between the price of the farmer's products and the things he must buy to produce them and live decently, we require a comprehensive system of planning. And so, Mr. Speaker, I have taken this opportunity, because I think it should be done in all honesty and fairness to ourselves and in fairness to the country, to place before this house in the plainest of plain terms exactly where we stand in regard to controls.

We believe that democracy must extend its own power; we believe that democracy must be made to function; we believe that this political democracy which we possess is valuable and must be safeguarded. The right to free speech, the right to think, the right to elect freely our representatives in our democratic institutions, the right to freedom in religion—these things must be safeguarded. But we shall never have full democracy until we have economic democracy, until the producer through his own cooperative effort, or through the effort of his elected representatives, in the legislation which they enact, is given an opportunity to control and enjoy with his fellow man and woman the products of their own cooperative toil.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say only a few words with respect to this resolution and to voice my objection to the procedure which has been followed and to the method, the routine, of bringing this legislation before the house. I have neither the time nor have I the researches necessary to permit me to discuss this question of procedure from the constitutional point of view, or even from the point of view of the rules of the house. But from the point of view of custom and usage, I respectfully submit to the minister, and the ministry, that this is a most unprecedented resolution.

In the ordinary course, when it is proposed to ask parliament to appropriate money, resolutions are introduced asking for the appropriation of specific sums of money. The estimates, which are familiar to all of us, carry a list of some 600 or 700 items, and each one of those items is a resolution of this house. The sacrosanct formula used by the chairman of committees is something like this: "Resolved that a sum not exceeding"—let us say $3,000—"be voted for the construction of a wharf at"—such-and-such a place. So that all expenditures of money must be preceded by a resolution. And in the normal course of events these resolutions specify what the amount of money is to be.

This resolution before us, in the name of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), states:

Resolved that it is expedient to introduce a measure—

"A measure".

—to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

The legislation which will be offered when this resolution passes will be offered, as I understand it, in the form of a schedule to the bill. This schedule, according to the minister's statement of yesterday, contains some fifty-seven pieces of legislation. As I understand it, by passing this resolution we are authorizing the ministry to spend unlimited sums of money on fifty-seven pieces of legislation.

And mark you, Mr. Speaker, those fifty-seven orders in council will form a body of legislation as great as that which is passed during the whole session of one parliament, or as great as that incorporated in the statutes of one session. We are asked to do this in the form of one bill.

As an aside, may I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and any member of the house: How will it be possible to discuss intelligently—and I am not talking about the particular bill—at one time, as is our duty as members of the house, fifty-seven bills, some of them more important and carrying the implication of new principles, new ideas and new thoughts such as we have never had introduced in this house before; some of them good, some of them bad, some of them indifferent, some of them unimportant, and some of them awful.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask a question? Is the hon. member aware that exactly this course was followed in the British parliament and the Australian parliament?

Mr. POWER: I have been hearing so much about following the British parliament. I am glad the minister gives me an opportunity of saying what I have been wanting to say for about ten years. During the last war, every time this side of the house or the government of the day did something, somebody rose on the other side of the house and said the British did not do it in that way. I am fed up with knowing what way the British do it, or do not do it, and I am not taking an example in administration from the present British government, even though I would have voted for the Labour party had I been in England.

I do not care what the British government did; I do not care what the Australian government did. I think we are here to legislate for Canada. We are to legislate according to principles which we have adopted. We have been a parliament here since 1867, and I do not know why we should slavishly follow the rules of any other parliament. I believe there is more free democracy yet in this country than there is in any other country on earth, not excepting England. And whether it be here or in Great Britain or in Australia, the representatives of the people sent here by the people to represent them and to discuss legislation have a duty to perform.

I contend; I assert, without fear of contradiction, that in this mass of legislation which is to be thrown at members of parliament it will be impossible to have intelligent discussion or intelligent debate on the issues that are before the house.

But to return to the question of the resolution and the financial involvement, can anybody tell me that it will be possible, or that there is the slightest chance of members of the House of Commons who are here to see that expenditure of the people's money is carried on in an orderly fashion being able to perform their duty with respect to expenditures, under the terms of this resolution? This resolution carries with it the acceptance by this house, in advance, of any expenditure under such things as the wartime prices and trade board regulations. Probably they are not very important; I do not know; I do not think anybody knows; I do not think the minister knows. It carries with it such things as this, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Incorporated. This will become law when the bill is passed. It provides for the setting up of a company, and that company may purchase or otherwise acquire, sell or otherwise dispose of stores, transport, process or otherwise deal in or deal in any goods, wares or merchandise. There is no limit. This Commodity Prices Stabilization Company can buy any goods, anything in this country, and we give them a blank cheque to do it.

We are setting up a crown company to be known as the Canadian Sugar Stabilization Company. I do not know how much money is involved in that or what the chances are of making a gain or a loss, but there are large sums involved, and so on all through the piece. Not one of these measures but at least merits, both from the financial point of view and from the point of view of principle, the most careful consideration of this house and at least some knowledge by hon. members of the amounts of money which might possibly be involved.

To return to the matters involved in the bill, I come to the question of controls. I am not prepared to say that I am opposed to all controls, nor am I in favour of all controls. I think it would be most unfair for any hon. member to say that those who oppose this resolution oppose controls as such. I would be quite willing to vote for any of the controls that we have at the present time. Like the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I too have some objection to the so-called free enterprise controlled by private industry, but I will not go as far as he does and have the totalitarian system of control which he would like. I believe it is possible for hon. members, it is possible for the people of Canada, to devise some means whereby we shall not take on the pattern of the totalitarian fascist controls as they exist in some countries in Europe, whereby we shall not return to the old system of control by private interests to the detriment of the common people.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is what we are waiting for.

Mr. POWER: I know we are waiting for it and I think thousands of people are struggling to attain it. I do not know that they have attained it as yet, but I am not prepared even today to take on holus-bolus, because the members of the government have not thought it out or because we have not been able to evolve a system, to admit that there is no middle course and that there is no means of having controls controlled by parliament.

I object to bureaucratic controls by people outside parliament. I have less objection—and in that I do not share the opinion of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)—and we are almost forced to the conclusion, in order to do away with bureaucratic control, to give more controls to the ministers of the crown and to the members of the administration. If I am to be kicked around I want to be kicked around by someone I can see and hear and kick back and not by someone surrounded by a steel or iron curtain in some office of the government whom I never see. I say that, Mr. Speaker, without in any way wishing to criticize any of the existing controllers or those of the past. The few times when, at the request of my constituents, I had business with the controllers I had the fairest and most courteous treatment, and that applies to Donald Gordon as well as to all the others.

I could, I suppose, except that it is pretty late and it may not be fair, quote a precedent with respect to bills of this kind. In my recollection there was only one piece of legislation like it, namely, that introduced by Mr. Bennett in 1931 and 1932. To that piece of legislation men now sitting on this side of the house took strenuous objection. It is within the memory of many of us sitting here that we objected to the first reading of the resolution, right up to the closing. At that time there was presented to us a bill called "unemployment and farm relief." The objection taken by the members of the opposition of that day was that the two things, unemployment and farm relief should not be provided for in the same resolution. I wonder whether we ever thought then that some day we ourselves would be bringing in a bill with fifty-seven different varieties of legislation.

I shall not quote the arguments used by the members of the opposition of that day; but I think if anyone will look over them they will find that if there was one thing that the opposition asked for it was that the resolution mention the specific amounts of money that were to be expended on each of these subjects. It was a blank cheque and members of the opposition objected strenuously to any legislation involving a blank cheque. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is a blank cheque which involves more important considerations than any blank cheque has ever been given in this country.

I would appeal to the minister once more to try to break down this legislation into its component parts. It would be possible to do that. In looking it over, I find the civil service commission mentioned. There are five orders in council all dealing with preference to returned soldiers. That has no place in this kind of legislation. One of the orders in council is simply an order providing that the people who served in the war of 1939-1945 should have the same preference with regard to civil service positions as those who served in the war of 1914-1918. Why introduce that in such an extraordinary piece of legislation as this? We may question the conditions with respect to time, with respect to age and in any other respect under which these positions and this preference will be made available to all veterans, but I have never heard in this house or outside it anyone questioning the fact that the veterans of the last war should have the same preference with regard to the civil service as the veterans of the first war. I submit that there is no necessity for bringing in this sort of legislation in a resolution which involves—

Mr. MACKENZIE: They would lose the preference without this resolution.

Mr. POWER: I hear my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) whispering to my hon. friend the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) that he is having a committee and bringing in a bill. Let him bring in a bill; he has until May 15. But do not let him load down legislation and make it an affront to parliament, as this thing is, giving us something that we cannot possibly study and discuss. The people of Canada will not understand what the whole argument is about.

There are a dozen other things in this. There is the pelagic sealing treaty. I do not know anything about it, but I do not think it has its place in a piece of legislation dealing with the wartime prices and trade board, or dealing with the stabilization fund or dealing with the control of sugar, lumber and steel. There are other matters dealing with compensation for merchant seamen, and there are, I understand, certain endeavours to wind up the war service gratuity.

All these things could be dealt with in their place and passed by this house in five minutes, but I object to these almost innocuous and certainly easily explained pieces of legislation being thrown in with pieces of legislation on the principles of which the people of this country and the members of this parliament are not agreed.

My last objection is that, by passing this resolution and bringing in the bill, in the shape in which it will be brought in, we are creating an extremely dangerous precedent. We are preparing the way for the time when any government or a government which will not have the same respect for ancient constitutional usages and practices will be in power in this country, and when they come in they will have ready-made at their hand such legislation as will enable them at once to put into effect their theories and the practice in which they believe.

I have said before and said many a time that I have no objection to a great many of their theories. I would like to see many of them put into practice if they could do away with the regimentation that goes with them. But I certainly do not want to be a member of a party which will prepare the way and make it easier for them when they do come into power to carry out what I believe to be false principles in a democracy. In other words, I do not want to be a St. John the Baptist for a socialist messiah.

Mr. SPEAKER: Having considered the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), I should like to call his attention to standing order 50:

A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to the committee of the whole, or any standing or special committee shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

I have therefore to declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to read that standing order 50 carefully.

When is the resolution to be referred to the committee of the whole? Not until after second reading. The motion to refer has not been made and I contend that this amendment to the resolution is therefore not covered by standing order 50 and is therefore in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I must read the standing order again. There is no doubt in my mind:

A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to the committee of the whole, or any standing or special committee shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

I therefore declare the amendment out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am going respectfully to challenge your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this not really and factually a motion to refer this resolution to the committee? The motion is that the Speaker do now leave the chair so that the house may consider this resolution. This is the motion to refer the resolution to the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: The motion is to leave the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: For the purpose of resolving into committee of the whole.

Mr. COLDWELL: The motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair—

Mr. MACKENZIE: For the purpose of resolving into committee of the whole.

Mr. COLDWELL: —is always subject to amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I may be out of order, Mr. Speaker, but I think it is crystal clear. The motion moved by the minister was that Mr. Speaker leave the chair so that we should resolve ourselves into committee to discuss this resolution—

Mr. KNOWLES: It was not the motion to refer.

[Mr. Power.]

Mr. MACKENZIE: —and now we have an amendment that Mr. Speaker do not now leave the chair, which is a complete abrogation of the main question and a complete refutation of the essential features of standing order 50.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. member knows, the Speaker's ruling is not debatable and I must repeat that, having considered carefully the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and having consulted not only Beauchesne but Bourinot and others, I have come to the conclusion that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but we, too, considered carefully what the implications of the amendment would be before we made it and we are still of the opinion that it is in order. I must therefore appeal your ruling.

Mr. BRACKEN: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that your ruling has been challenged, may I ask that you read to the house the motion made by the Minister of Justice? I do not know whether the form of the motion was read or not, but let us know what we have before us and then, having motion and amendment, we may be in a better position to judge as to the merits of your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think I should establish a precedent by letting the house discuss the ruling which has been made, but the motion before the house is that the Speaker leave the chair on the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency . . .

And so on; and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar moved as an amendment:

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the chair but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the headlong decontrol policy of the government has depressed the standard of living of the people, threatens the country with economic chaos, and is surrendering the future of Canada to profiteering and monopoly;

And be it further resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the introduction of a system of orderly and democratic controls so as to provide stable price levels and equitable price relationships in order to eliminate the injustices which now exist and to arrest the rapidly rising cost of living.

According to standing order 50, a motion to refer a bill, resolution or any question to the committee of the whole, or any standing or special committee shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I was going to rise before—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he knows that Speaker's rulings are not debatable. I read the motion because the leader of the opposition had requested it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then I must challenge the ruling; that is all.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of sustaining the Speaker's ruling will please say "yea".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those against will please say "nay".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the "yeas" have it. Call in the members.

Mr. SPEAKER put the question as follows:

The question before the house is an appeal from the Speaker's ruling. Mr. Ilsley moved, seconded by Mr. Mackenzie, the following motion:

That the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the Act and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

Mr. Coldwell moved, seconded by Mr. MacInnis, in amendment:

That Mr. Speaker do not now leave the chair but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the headlong decontrol policy of the government has depressed the standard of living of the people, threatens the country with economic chaos, and is surrendering the future of Canada to profiteering and monopoly.

And be it further resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give immediate consideration to the introduction of a system of orderly and democratic controls so as to provide stable price levels and equitable price relationships in order to eliminate the injustices which now exist and to arrest the rapidly rising cost of living.

I declared the amendment out of order, and I based my ruling on standing order 50, which reads as follows:

A motion to refer a bill, resolution or any other question to the committee of the whole, or any standing or special committee shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HOUSING UNDER VETERANS LAND ACT—REPORTS TABLED—DRAINAGE, REPAIRS AND ADJUSTMENTS

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief statement to make which deals partly with government policy and partly with factual observations in connection with certain reports which I shall ask the permission of the house to table.

I wish to table the report on Veterans Land Act housing presented by Colonel C. E. Parish following an inspection which he carried out under authority of P.C. 76 of January 9, 1947; also separate reports by the deputy minister of the department and the director of the Veterans Land Act. These three gentlemen together made an inspection of a majority of the subdivision projects upon which houses were built by contract under the Veterans Land Act all across Canada.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Attached to the deputy minister's report is an additional report made by a British Columbia committee into the Braefoot project near Victoria. The decision to have this inquiry into the Braefoot project was made prior to the appointment of the committee of dominion-wide jurisdiction.

Hon. members will I think find in the reports information bearing out the statement which I gave the house the other day. There are defects, but as I previously stated all these defects can be corrected, and I have already given the house my assurance that the work will be done without cost to the veteran.

Hon. members will I believe readily understand the reasons why these houses, erected under conditions of the greatest urgency, now require minor repairs. The accomplishment in housing 2,600 veterans' families who otherwise would be living under conditions which cannot make for a proper home life in my opinion far outweighs any weaknesses which have been shown in this construction programme. The fact is that the department completed in one year 2,600 homes under the most difficult building conditions which this country has ever experienced. How outstanding was this achievement is best evidenced by the fact that in Canada today thousands of houses that have been under construction for months are still far from completion owing to lack of materials and the scarcity of the right type of labour.

Contrasting with the achievement of my department in pushing these 2,600 homes through to completion is the fact that in 1946—and this is very important—private contractors embarked on 1,750 contracts for veterans under the Veterans Land Act. During the year they were able to complete only 224 of these.

My deputy minister has reported to me—and I am sure hon. members will be glad to hear this—the reception which he and other members of the investigating body met with in the homes they visited. Almost one hundred per cent of the wives and mothers were delighted with the accommodation provided.

Hon. members will be gratified to learn that every member of the inspection committee agrees that the houses on today's market represent—this is very important too; it is in the findings—fair value to the veterans. Colonel C. E. Parish, for instance, states specifically that it would be impossible for the veteran to find housing of equal value for the price he is now paying. Colonel Parish is an outstanding engineer of wide experience in house building. He is also a member of the Canadian Legion advisory committee on housing. Colonel Parish has made a detailed analysis of the defects, a close and I think very fair analysis. That is what was asked for, and I can think of nobody in Canada better qualified to make such a report.

I should like to summarize Colonel Parish's recommendations. They are as follows:

1. That the drainage problem be carefully studied and efficient drainage schemes provided without cost to the purchaser.

2. That where sewage disposal is inefficient, correction be made by installation of new disposal fields or by connection to municipal sewerage systems.

3. That structural defects be put into first class condition as quickly as possible, and that, where necessary, competent superintendents be retained to carry out this work efficiently.

4. That the temporary softwood floors laid when hardwood flooring was unobtainable be replaced by suitable hardwood flooring when available.

5. That no overall reduction in the selling price be made, but that the present policy of writing off costs owing to unusual conditions on a particular project be continued.

The deputy minister in his report recommends that an experienced drainage engineer, or engineers, be retained to supervise the carrying out of the recommendations in this regard. This will be done; in fact all necessary work and repairs will be closely supervised by officers of my department. In this connection I must point out that comprehensive action with regard to drainage cannot be undertaken until the frost is out of the ground.

While Colonel Parish and the deputy minister have hesitated somewhat to estimate the cost of the alterations, very largely because they consist of a multiplicity of detail, the director of the Veterans Land Act has recommended that an additional $500,000 be added to the million dollar fund set up a year ago for the purpose of writing off excessive costs where such were found. These recommendations as announced will be carried out.

I direct attention also to the findings of all three members of the committee that the costs encountered are reasonable and not out out of line with today's market and that Colonel Parish specifically recommends against any overall reduction in the selling prices.

In addition to the reports which I am now tabling, all three members of the committee brought back with them many field notes of observations made. These are, in cases, quite bulky and extensive as referred to in the report of the deputy minister, Mr. Woods. These detailed notes will be of invaluable assistance as a guide to those who undertake the work which remains to be done and will be useful in supplying as far as possible further information that may be desired through questioning.

Once again, with the support of my colleagues, I wish to assure the house that the work recommended by this committee will be carried out as expeditiously as possible and with the firm purpose of ensuring that the veterans who purchase these houses shall come into possession of permanent houses of which they can be justly proud.

Mr. BROOKS: Mr. Speaker, considering the latitude which has been given to the minister in explaining this matter I should like to ask him a question. Has this investigation been carried on only in the houses which have been represented to the department as being faulty, or has there been a general inspection of all houses built under the veterans' department across Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE: There has not been a general inspection of all veterans' houses. We received complaints from various specific areas, and these were the first to be attended to. In other places we have received representations from the Legion or other returned soldiers' organizations, and we cooperate with them as far as possible in making investigations.

Mr. BROOKS: I may say to the minister that the complaints he has received are in no way representative of all the complaints there are in Canada with regard to these houses. He has presented very strongly here this afternoon the case for his department. That there has been this widespread dissatisfaction in all parts of Canada with regard to the construction of these houses would indicate that there are far more complaints than the minister has represented to us this afternoon.

There is another point. The minister has said that the repairs are to be made without any cost to the veteran. Naturally we would expect that, because the veteran is in no way responsible for the faulty construction of these houses. But as was mentioned some time ago, I do not see why the public in general should have to pay the costs of the faulty construction which has been carried on under the department of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It seems to me this is a case which should be—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BROOKS: Mr. Speaker, I claim the same right as the minister—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to moderate their voices and listen to the speaker. I have called the hon. gentleman to order. I would remind the hon. member that for many years it has been the practice to allow ministers to make statements at this stage of the sitting. Hon. members know that that has been the practice and that these statements are not debatable. It has also been the practice to permit hon. members to ask the minister a few questions, but under the rules I could not permit a debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is just about through with his statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BROOKS: I have practically completed my remarks. I thought that since the minister had made such a splendid case for his department it might be well if a few more facts were presented to the house. He spoke about these houses being so well—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. member will admit that I have given him sufficient time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. BROOKS: There will be an opportunity later.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): May I ask you a question, Mr. Speaker? Under what rule of the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the Speaker should not be questioned from the floor of the house.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just one question. I have protested before about ministers making statements in the House of Commons without an opportunity for debate being afforded to hon. members.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is plenty of opportunity for debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will not permit hon. members to start a discussion on what I have said. It has been the long established practice of the house to permit ministers to make statements at this stage of the sitting, and they are not debatable.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We have rules in the House of Commons. Because the practice has grown up does it make it a rule of the house that a minister can make a statement without an opportunity for debate—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I want order and discipline in the house. I do not like hon. members rising in their places and questioning the Speaker and discussing, I will not say his ruling, but a statement he makes calling the attention of hon. members to the practice of the house. I do not think the hon. member is contributing to the order and discipline of the house by discussing the rules. I should like the house to proceed with its business.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I ask the minister a question with regard to the Boucherville project, on which I think there was a charge of more than faulty construction? Will there be a report made on that project?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes. It is still partly under the jurisdiction of the courts. Certainly there will be a report.

Mr. MILLER: May I ask the Minister of Veterans Affairs a question with regard to the Charleswood project? I understand that notices were sent intimating that the occupants of these houses must sign a contract to purchase or agree to rent or vacate by May 1. Is the minister prepared to make a statement on the question?

Mr. MACKENZIE: My recollection is that there is no mention of any specific project in the three general reports. Any question which my hon. friend wishes to have answered with respect to any particular project I shall be glad to answer to the best of my ability.

Mr. FULTON: May I ask a question arising out of the minister's statement? He said that the deputy minister recommended that there be an additional $500,000 voted for the purpose of equalizing costs. Will this $500,000 be used to defray the extra expenses incurred by reason of the repairs which the department is to undertake, or will it be used to reduce existing costs where they are now excessive?

Mr. MACKENZIE: My understanding was that with the concurrence of my colleagues I was authorized to state in the house some time ago that $500,0000 would be available to meet the conditions which had been brought to light. There is still unexpended, of the million dollars for write-offs, the sum of $322,000, part of which may be used for purposes of repairs caused by unusual conditions.

Mr. FULTON: I wish to get this clear. Does that mean that there is a fund of $800,000 odd available for these repairs?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I cannot be specific on that point right now, but the guarantee I received was that $500,000 would be available for the immediate task, leaving $200,000 available from the vote of last year.

DISPLACEMENT OF VETERANS BY PERSONS WITHOUT OVERSEAS PREFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yesterday the member for Assiniboia (Mr. McCullough) asked the following question, at page 1550 of Hansard:

I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Are veterans employed by the Department of Veterans Affairs being let out while others with no overseas veterans preference are being maintained on the staff? If so, what is the exact policy of the government in this regard?

I took the matter up with the department and have received the following answer:

With reference to the attached question by Mr. McCullough as to whether veterans in the employ of the department are being released whilst other persons with no veterans' preference are being retained, I have no hesitation in stating that this is incorrect.

The only reservation with this statement is with respect to stenographic staff, and in this regard I wish to state that any male stenographers with overseas service will be immediately employed by this department.

With respect to the department's policy in releasing staff, this is based on a directive issued by the civil service commission, circular letter 1945-12 of October 2, 1945, which states:

"The temporary employees selected for release should, in general, be chosen in the following order:

(a) Persons whose services are not fully satisfactory.

(c) Casual part-time employees.

(e) Married women not dependent upon themselves for support.

(f) Employees not entitled to preference for war service, et cetera, et cetera."

Our procedure in releasing staff is to have all our staff rated by a rating board comprising our senior officials in the district. We have brought into Ottawa for a course of training senior officials from all districts to instruct them in the procedure of rating employees.

If an employee is dissatisfied with his rating, he may appeal to the district administrator, who forwards his recommendation to head office. The overseas preference is observed in every case and I would welcome a statement of the particulars of a veteran who is being released while a person with no overseas preference is being retained.

Our staff now numbers over 20,000. We regret to have to reduce to the extent of 2,000 in the near future.

That is, a deduction of two thousand.

It is impossible for us to deal with the merits of each individual case in Ottawa and we have, therefore, been compelled to decentralize this work under the jurisdiction of our district administrators, but we have laid down principles based on the civil service directive and our own experience to govern our district administrators in this unpleasant task of staff reduction.

If my hon. friend knows of any cases I shall be glad to have him inform me.

Mrs. STRUM: May I ask the minister whether the directive from the civil service commission which he has just read applies equally to male and female employees of the government, or is there any discrimination between the sexes?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I was dealing only with those who had seen service, where a preference existed. I understood that the question was based upon that principle.

Mr. KNOWLES: You said male stenographers with overseas service.

Mrs. STRUM: I have received many letters from girls who are being let out because of their sex.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Not in this department.

EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS ON NATIONAL DEFENCE RECORDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs arising out of the reply which he has just given. In view of the apparent surplus of personnel in his department with overseas service, will his department give consideration to taking over the records from the Department of National Defence in order that those ex-service personnel may be employed in maintaining the records, which is obviously a Department of Veterans Affairs job rather than one for the Department of National Defence?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be very glad to discuss the whole situation with my colleague the Minister of National Defence.

IMMIGRATION

PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT OF CANDIDATE IN CARTIER BY-ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I have a question which I desire to direct to the Minister of Mines and Resources. I intended to direct it to the Prime Minister, but he is unable to be here today. It is urgent and I do not want to leave it until he returns. A Canadian Press dispatch was handed me just before I came into the house. It indicates an urgent situation to which I think the government ought to give consideration. Under date March 21, from Montreal, there comes this report:

> The dominion government will announce within the next few days an immigration policy whose "greatness will astound the country" Maurice Hartt, Liberal candidate in the Montreal-Cartier federal by-election said last night. . . . He said he knew of the details of the new policy, having contributed to its drafting, but that Prime Minister Mackenzie King would make the announcement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows the rules. The purpose of a question is not to give information to the house but to get information.

Mr. GRAYDON: There is little information in that. The information I hope to get will come from the minister. I should like to get this information along the lines you suggest, Mr. Speaker. First, was that statement made with governmental authority, and second—

Mr. CLAXTON: First of all, was it made?

Mr. GRAYDON: The Canadian Press dispatch indicates that it was made. First of all, if the dispatch is correct, was that statement made with governmental authority? Second, why should the House of Commons not be the first to hear of a statement of government policy before even a candidate who said he knew all the details of the policy should be given that information? I should like an answer to that question.

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): The hon. gentleman did not send me any notice of this question, and it is one which I think ought to be placed on the order paper. I have had no communication with the gentleman who made that statement. I have heard indirectly that the statement as reported is wholly incorrect.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT ON ROCKET OUTPOSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask a question similar to the one asked by the hon. member for Peel. It is an emergency matter, and one about which nothing has been said by the military experts on the other side. It arises out of a press report, the headline of which reads, "Forecast race to establish rocket outposts on mars". I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if we are taking any steps.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): May I say to my hon. friend that free transportation will be provided to hon. members for that purpose during the Easter recess.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

OTTAWA CAR AND AIRCRAFT PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the developments today at Ottawa Car and Aircraft—including, I am told, the use of police—will the minister indicate what progress his department has made in getting this dispute settled?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I am not a policeman. That is the answer to the first part of the question. In reply to the second, my understanding is that the dispute is being handled by the Department of Labour of Ontario.

WAR SAVINGS CERTIFICATES

QUESTION AS TO PAYMENT BY CHARTERED BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): On March 4 the Minister of Finance said he would let us know later whether war savings certificates when due would be cashed by the chartered banks. Did he get that information?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I have no further information on that matter.

AIR SERVICES

CARBERRY, MAN., AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, based on a telegram from Carberry, Manitoba, which I received just before coming into the house. Has a final decision been reached as to the use to be made of the airport at Carberry? Are the advantages of that airport being given full consideration?

Mr. SPEAKER: May I say to the hon. member that I do not see the urgency of his question, and I would ask him to place it on the order paper.

UNITED NATIONS

GERMAN AND AUSTRIAN PEACE TREATIES—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question of which I have given him notice. Will he give to the house such late news and information as he may have with respect to the progress we are making in getting full participation at the Moscow conference on the German and Austrian peace treaties?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): All I would care to say is that Canada's ambassador to Russia, Mr. Dana Wilgress, is in Moscow. He is in daily communication with those attending the conference of the foreign ministers and the deputies of the foreign ministers, and progress is being made. There is still reason to expect that the big powers will realize that the others will have to be associated with them in preparing the final peace treaties.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE, SALE AND EXPORT—COMMODITY AND PROVINCIAL MARKETING BOARDS

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the third reading of Bill No. 25, to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I have not spoken on Bill No. 25, and had not intended to do so, but I want to refer to one matter contained in it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to moderate their voices. I can understand that they are very happy because it is the first day of spring, but they should not forget that our rules do not melt away with the snow.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to call the minister's attention to one fact about this bill. We are now to reestablish this sort of control system under one minister instead of a bureaucratic control system. I object to that in the first place. In the second place, we voted a considerable sum of money in exports in the first war, between the wars and after this last war, to certain countries. I would like the minister to say where the countries are to which we can send these exports. As you know, this bill does not deal with wheat, but it does deal with all other kinds of food and feedstuffs. It has been said that Canada lives by her export trade, and that is especially true of her exports of food and feedstuffs. Away back in 1938, before the war started but when I could see what was coming, I wanted the minister to establish reservoirs of food and many other products in the mother country, but that suggestion was not acted upon. At that time we had a preference in the British market, and under that preference we shipped a million bushels of pears and apples from the maritime provinces. During the debate on this bill an amendment was moved to substitute the word "fruit" for "apples" and "pears", but that amendment was not accepted.

As I say, I would like the minister to tell us what countries we can send these exports to and get paid for them. If anyone thinks we are going to be allowed into the United States market with food or feedstuffs for any substantial length of time, I am afraid they are going to be disappointed. As I said during the previous debate, the only things they will take from us will be the raw materials from which to manufacture the finished products they want to export. We spent many days in another debate on control in this house getting out from under hundreds of thousands of orders in council and controls. Now we are going to create a vast new de luxe system of controls under one minister. I can tell you that it is not the part of responsible government to adopt this practice at the present time, with the overtaxation and over-government we have in this country today. Under this bill the minister will have absolute control in his own hands. It is true that some provincial boards may be called in once in a while, but the control will be with the minister and the governor in council. It was stated by a former prime minister on another occasion that actually the governor in council meant the minister. That is quite true, because the minister must make the recommendation to council, and that recommendation is acted upon.

The kind of control contemplated under this bill will involve the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country to a greater or less degree. These matters are being removed from the jurisdiction of parliament; and now that the war is over I object to these things being done over the head of parliament. We have been told that parliament is supreme, but if that is so by this bill we are losing our supremacy. This bill will permit money to be spent without any control whatever by this house, and all we will be able to do is conduct a post mortem on the corpse after it is dead and buried. I believe this will lead to widespread unemployment, and that in the years to come we shall regret our action. Only yesterday or the day before someone mentioned something about free trade. Well, at one time hon. gentlemen to my left and the minister himself were free traders, but now we have the minister bringing in a bill establishing the highest form of protection, in fact eight or ten forms of protection. At one time under free trade, and the law of supply and demand the price of wheat went as low as 38 cents a bushel, and at that time other bills were introduced along this line by another government, to which I raised the same objection.

I believe this bill is a retrograde step for parliament to take. We are giving the governor in council power to appoint all kinds of officials over the head of parliament without the control of the civil service commission or anybody else. It is now almost two years since one war ended; next summer it will be two years since the other war ended, and here we are passing a measure of this kind when we do not know the countries to which we can export anything and receive payment for it. I do object to legislation of this kind. It is not in the interests of responsible government, and as I see the matter it is against the constitution for us to delegate such powers to one minister of the crown, because the executive, the privy council, must act as a unit; they cannot have differences of opinion. I have gone over the whole bill, and I can tell you that if a motion were made for the six months' hoist I would vote for it.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Thursday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything at this stage. Until last evening I was quite content, together with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken), to allow the resolution to go to committee at the earliest possible moment, there to discuss freely with the various ministers concerned what they had to propose. But a statement made in the house last night by the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), in which he attempted to create an impression completely off the track of truth, has lead me to make a brief statement concerning the social credit position with respect to this whole matter of controls.

To listen to the leader of the socialist party in this house one would think he and members of the C.C.F. are the only people in this country trying to fight the battle of the common people. One would think all the rest of us are a bunch of knaves and scoundrels—

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what you said of us.

Mr. LOW:—who are combining our efforts to sell the people into the clutches of the "fifty big shots." That, of course, is sheer unadulterated nonsense. I have consistently pointed out that during these past few months the leader of the C.C.F. party has attempted to lead the people to believe that we—and when I say "we" I mean the social credit organization—have joined forces with the Liberals and Conservatives to sell the people into the clutches of the fifty big shots. I have in my hands extracts from a radio address given over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation network by the leader of the socialist party on January 22, 1947, from which I quote:

The Liberals, backed by the Tories and the Social Crediters, do not believe in economic democracy.

That is a pretty broad categorical statement. Then he continued:

They are determined to hand back the direction of the economic life of this nation to the financial institutions, Aluminum Limited, Steel Company of Canada, Consolidated Mining and Smelting, International Nickel, Imperial Oil, and so on. Offsetting our political democracy, they are imposing an economic dictatorship which rests in the hands of a few hundred so-called big shots who direct big business. The C.C.F. believes that under such conditions we can never have complete democracy.

I do not pretend, Mr. Speaker, to speak for the Progressive Conservatives or for the Liberals, but I am going to speak in no uncertain terms for the Social Crediters of this country. I am going to say that the leader of the socialist party in making that statement was either wilfully ignorant of what we do propose or was deliberately attempting to mislead the public.

In the house last night the leader of the socialist party said this:

We cannot one day demand parity and orderly marketing, and the next day denounce public planning and controls, as steps towards regimentation and slavery, as my hon. friend the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low), did in this house during the debate on the address.

I wish to state that I have consistently denounced a policy of planned economy, because I am convinced that a policy of planned economy will inevitably lead to statism and dictatorship. I have never at any time denounced public planning. I have simply maintained that there is no such thing now possible as public planning. There could be public planning only under a system of finance that succeeds in getting purchasing power into the hands of all the consumers of Canada, and that ensures healthy competition in most fields of endeavour. Consumers under such circumstances could then be called public planners—but only then.

The trouble with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is that he has shifted his ground so often that not only is he confused, but he has so confused the people about what he means when he speaks of planned economy that they cannot follow him. He found that the people generally—and he found it some years ago—saw the danger in state planning, or in government planning, the terms which they were using then; so he shifted his ground to another term which he thought would be much more palatable to the people, with the result that now he calls it "public planning."

I should just like to know what is meant by planning and by controls. I am sure that all honest members in the house—and I am sure that most of them, indeed if not all, are honest—will recognize that everything depends upon just how one defines the word "control" or the word "planning". No agreement is possible among us, as hon. members of the House of Commons, unless we are most careful to define our terms.

When the leader of the C.C.F. speaks about controls he means turning over to a government department or board or commission the power of absolute control over some phase or aspect of the national life. I do not think there is any question about that. It is true, and I grant him this, that he may hope that it could be done in a democratic way; but I must emphasize that to the extent that somebody else has the power of control over any aspect of your life, you are divested of that much of your freedom, and you are a slave to that person's will.

I believe it is perfectly correct to say that if one's life is to be controlled, it does not matter much who controls it. I cannot see that there is any virtue in being victimized by state officials rather than by privately controlled interests. I do not think there is any difference at all. And yet the advocates of state socialism, right here in this House of Commons, try to tell us that the regimented, planned and controlled state, under a vested interest of a political party seeking power, is democracy, while a regimented and controlled economy under private monopoly, which all talk so much about, is dictatorship.

Mr. REID: There is only one perfect controller, and that is the Lord himself.

Mr. LOW: I think that is perfectly correct. But the fact is that both systems I have mentioned are dictatorships, and I denounce them as such. If anything, in my opinion the regimented and planned state is even more of a dictatorship; for in the regimented and planned state the people are the absolute slaves of the state, and short of revolution and bloodshed they are helpless to do anything about it.

Actually there is no real difference between a state monopoly and a private monopoly, except that the state monopoly is much more powerful. We have witnessed that the ones in Germany, Italy and Russia, which are the perfect examples of completely planned economies, or completely controlled economies, are certainly much more ruthless than any private monopolies we have ever known about.

Bearing this in mind, let us take a brief look at the controversy about government controls. The present controls that the government have been using were imposed under wartime conditions to meet an emergency situation. Rents were controlled to prevent landlords from taking advantage of the housing shortage to raise their rents and thereby reduce the standard of living of the people. Prices were rigidly controlled for the same reason. Wages were controlled so that workers could not demand higher pay, since under our present financial organization in Canada there would have resulted nothing but increased production costs and therefore higher prices to consumers. You can take these controls one by one, and you will find, if you examine them carefully, that their real purpose was either to restrict production of goods and services in this country, particularly goods for home consumption, or they were to bolster up a week and faulty system of finance.

On the one hand the controls may have been introduced for the purpose of restricting production of certain goods and services, especially those for home consumption, so that the maximum effort could be diverted into the production of materials for war. Now that the war is over, it can only be common sense, it seems to me, that the cure for the shortage of homes is not to continue indefinitely to control rents. The sensible cure is to embark upon an adequate programme of building of dwelling houses which will ensure all Canadian families having homes of their own. Similarly, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me foolish to continue a rigid control of prices which was an emergency measure designed mainly to restrict certain kinds of production. Rather it seems to me that by removing every possible barrier to it, production should be increased to the utmost in order that through competition to please consumers, the control of prices will be exercised by the people through the things they have to buy.

Instead of limiting wages or allowing prices to go on rising with every increase in wages, thereby offsetting any possible benefit that workers would otherwise receive, surely the sensible thing to do is to supplement wages by providing workers with social security incomes which do not form a charge on industrial costs. By doing this we also get away from the need for imposing on the people an intolerable burden of taxation which reduces their incomes, all so that the state can dole out grudging charity administered by a hard-boiled democracy.

It must be increasingly evident to all thinking Canadians that we have to get away from our present methods of doing some things. We all must admit that. Surely every straight-thinking Canadian can see that it is the harsh taxation, the centralized state controls, the state imposed restrictions and the bureaucratic regimentations introduced under war conditions that have landed Great Britain, the United States and Canada into the mess in which we are floundering today. I do not think there can be any question about that at all. If we continue to adopt that policy, surely it can lead us only to disaster and dictatorship.

I should like for a moment to review the position which this Social Credit group took in November 1945 when bill 15 of that session was before the house. The government at that time took the position that if remaining controls were to be removed, chaotic conditions would result, prices would rise, and labour unrest would follow. In answer to that we pointed out that though the government had been warned repeatedly about these very dangers, they had persisted in remaining within the confines of a debt-creating system of finance which created for themselves the very problems which they were then seeking power to continue to control.

We further pointed out at that time that under a sound democratic and scientific system of finance, neither inflation nor deflation could threaten our economy. At the same time we admitted that it is a fact that under our present debt-ridden and restrictive money system both inflation and deflation, with all their disastrous consequences, did threaten our economy. But we said these dangers cannot be dealt with satisfactorily through controls that place in the hands of individuals great power over their fellow men, because, as the war has so definitely proved, when one control is introduced to cure human problems it inevitably creates other and more serious problems and leads from one control to another until you have nothing but a great network of controls. The only effective controls are those which are inherent in a justly scientific economic structure which by its very fairness and justice induces—mind you, Mr. Speaker, I say induces—the full support of all classes of the community and will be freely sustained without compulsion of any kind. That was the position we took.

We further granted at the same time that the government required to exercise a measure of control over price structures, foreign exchange, import and export of goods, rentals, and so on; but we did urge that the government abandon bureaucratic controls as rapidly as possible and concurrently introduce a system of automatic controls that would do a better job without endangering the freedom of individuals in this country.

Just here I want to remind hon. members that Social Crediters were the first in this house to advocate price controls as an alternative to taxation, before the war situation became intense. The minister at that time said it would take a gestapo to enforce it. Well, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that it has not taken a gestapo to enforce it especially in that field where the government introduced the compensated price discount system to the payment of milk subsidies. That is exactly the thing we have advocated for many years as a means of price control, and it was effective without a gestapo or horde of controllers.

Moreover, not only have Social Crediters consistently demanded a system of parity prices, which has been talked about so glibly, for all Canadians, but we have gone further and shown the government how it can get the money to establish that system without resorting to taxation, which is much more than the hon. leader of the socialist party in this house has ever done.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are waiting for you to do it.

Mr. LOW: Some people are so dense they cannot see.

Mr. COLDWELL: Thank you very much. We will see about that in a moment.

Mr. LOW: The hon. leader of the socialist party in this house has advocated parity of prices. That is quite true, but his smoke-screen of vaporings about the advantages of social ownership has failed to hide the fact that he would depend upon heavy taxation to produce parity. I declare it as my opinion that a full parity price structure can never be secured for the people of Canada if it has to depend upon taxation applied by this parliament.

Where do we Social Crediters stand on this whole question of controls? Do Social Crediters advocate the immediate return to the laissez-faire of irresponsible enterprise of the pre-war years? The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said so. He has tried to make it appear to the Canadian people over the radio, as I have already said, and again in the house last night, that we favour throwing the people of Canada completely on the mercy of private interests who will be free to exploit them. This is sheer nonsense. Social Crediters have always advocated responsible enterprise, and we did so long before the hon. leader of the C.C.F. veered into that position from the pressure of public opinion. We acknowledge the necessity of safeguarding the welfare of the people and of providing them with adequate and effective protection against evil forces that may exploit them.

With us it is not a question of the need of controls; it is indeed a question of what kind of controls.

Social Crediters are implacably opposed to planned controls which enhance the power of the state at the expense of the liberties of the individuals of Canada. We vigorously oppose all such controls as vest in hordes of insolent bureaucrats authority over every phase of the lives of the people. Rather do we urge that as rapidly as possible wartime bureaucratic controls be removed, be replaced immediately by a set of effective checks and balances inherent in a revitalized and reformed financial policy, and which automatically safeguard the whole political, economic, and moral welfare of our people. Every thinking person knows that substantial reduction in taxation will open the floodgates to full production, which I think is the surest possible way to control the threat of inflation. Electoral reform to ensure continuous response to the will of the people by their elected representatives in parliament is the surest way to control the threat of rising state socialism and totalitarianism and to safeguard the freedom of the individual. Establishing a monetary authority charged by parliament with the responsibility of maintaining a constant balance between effective purchasing power in the hands of all the people and the total of goods and services available for sale, together with a condition of healthy competition in all fields, is a guarantee against deflation and in my judgment is the surest way to prevent the exploitation of the people by financial monopolies.

"Public planning" becomes a reality only when all of the people are able to exercise the economic vote through the dollars they have in their pockets to spend. These dollars are their economic ballots through which they express their choices with regard to the kind of goods and services they want, with regard to the amount of these goods and services that they want, under what conditions they shall be delivered to them, who is to make them, and so on.

Again, application of the compensated price discount, which has been used by the government in its milk subsidies policy, is the surest and the safest way to control prices to consumers. We advocate that.

Again, a system of subsidies, financed not out of taxation, but by the creation of new money, debt-free, to represent the goods and services that otherwise would be wasted in Canada, is the surest way to establish stability of wage scales and of commodity prices to primary producers. We have always thought that the government acted very unwisely in dropping the subsidies on milk, and it would be equally unwise to drop the subsidies on cream. Through this action of the government a good many people will suffer a seriously depressed standard of living. I predict that the government will have to come back to these subsidies, and the sooner they do the more surely will they prevent serious deflation in this country in the years ahead.

All these things which I have outlined Social Crediters fight for and all of them are entirely practicable. They represent the only alternative to bureaucratic controls of the "planned" state on the one hand, and on the other the weak, ineffective, laissez-faire checks and balances of the present out-worn and irresponsible financial system which juggles so carelessly with human life, and which has plunged it periodically into depressions with all their hell of hunger, of nakedness and of economic insecurity. Social Crediters fight constantly for a revitalized democracy with all that that means, including economic democracy. I would say right here and now that the leader of the socialist party has no right to declare that this group has not fought for economic democracy. There can be no democracy at all without economic freedom. That is the very thing we have been advocating, and that is the thing which my hon. friend has only recently come to understand must be—

Mr. COLDWELL: That is untrue, and I shall prove it.

Mr. LOW: You will have your chance to prove it, but it must be the whole truth and not the half truths that the hon. member has been frequently muttering over the air.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the hon. member be listening?

Mr. LOW: We shall be listening. In a true economic democracy, Mr. Speaker, all the consumers in the country with purchasing power in their pockets are the real controllers, and they will exercise effective control.

This ends the statement I wished to make in connection with this matter of controls. I should like to say that we are prepared now to facilitate the passing of the resolution into committee and we shall there get all the information we can from the ministers concerned, but we shall reserve the right to propose changes in the bill if we find that these changes are desirable when the bill is brought before the house.

Mr. JEAN LESAGE (Montmagny-L'Islet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of unduly stretching out the debate on the resolution which has been submitted to us. If I speak at this moment, it is because I feel that I must explain the way I am going to vote. And I believe this explanation necessary because of the constitutional factor which consideration of the resolution injects into this matter.

It is evident that the bill which will follow the passing of the resolution, will impinge on the field of property and civil rights, which our constitution places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, as stated in subsection 13, section 92 of the British North America Act.

The question that comes to mind is the following: From a constitutional viewpoint, are we authorized to pass such a resolution? If the answer is "Yes", as I believe it must be, on what principle are we to base our gesture? As a rule, when the federal parliament invade the field of property and civil rights, they justify their action on the basis of two different principles.

The first of these principles is that the government may, in the event of a national emergency and in order to provide against extreme cases of urgency such as those to which the war gave rise, pass temporary legislation even after the cessation of hostilities. The other principle was stated yesterday in this house by the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), in the following terms:

the dominion may have the power even when there is no emergency to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, even though its legislation touches upon matters ordinarily regarded as solely within provincial jurisdiction. In other words, the judgment of the

I refer the house to page 1553 of Hansard:

And to supplement this expression of opinion which was formulated after that of the deputy minister of justice, may I quote the following from the legal opinion given by Mr. Varcoe:

(Text):

The true test, according to this decision, is whether the real subject matter of the act goes beyond local or provincial concern and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the dominion as a whole. Such an act is within the competence of parliament though it may in another aspect touch upon matters especially reserved to the provinces.

(Translation):

Let us first consider the sources from which the first principle arises so as to ascertain whether we can admit it and subsequently rely on it to vote for this resolution. This principle, I repeat, is the following: In a national emergency, in order to meet extremely serious situations like those to which war gives rise, the dominion government may enact legislation of a temporary character even after the end of hostilities.

This constitutional principle is admitted in all jurisprudence; it is clearly and definitely admitted in a recent judgment of the privy council in the reference on the Japanese question. That decision is based on the principles which the privy council had already enunciated in the case of the Fort Francis Pulp and Power Company Limited v. the Manitoba Free Press Company Limited. Here is what is said in Viscount Haldane's judgment:

(Text):

It is clear that in normal circumstances the dominion parliament could not have so legislated as to set up the machinery of control over the paper manufacturers which is now in question. The recent decision of the judicial committe in the Board of Commerce case, a well as earlier decisions show, that as the dominion parliament cannot ordinarly legislate so as to interfere with property and civil rights in the provinces, it could not have done what the two statutes under consideration purport to do had the situation been normal. But it does not follow that in a very very different case, such as that of sudden danger to social order arising from the outbreak of the great war, the parliament of the dominion cannot act under other powers which may well be implied in the constitution.

Then a little later on:

The general control of property and civil rights for normal purposes remains with the provincial legislatures. But questions may arise by reason of the special circumstances of the national emergency which concerns nothing short of the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole.

Then later:

Their lordships, therefore, entertain no doubt that however the wording of sections 91 and 92 may have laid down a framework under which, as a general principle, the dominion parliament is to be excluded from trenching on property and civil rights in the provinces of Canada, yet in a sufficiently great emergency such as that arising out of war, there is implied the power to deal adequately with that emergency for the safety of the dominion as a whole.

(Translation):

And Viscount Haldane states, a little further in his judgment, that it is incumbent on the dominion government alone to determine at what time the national emergency ceases, even after the end of hostilities. I quote:

(Text):

When, then, in the present instance, can it be stated that the necessity altogether ceased for maintaining the exceptional measure of control over the newspaper print industry introduced while the war was at its height? At what date did the disturbed state of Canada which the war had produced so entirely pass away that the legislative measures relied on in the present case became ultra vires? It is enough to say that there is no clear and unmistakable evidence that the government was in error in thinking that the necessity was still in existence at the dates on which the action in question was taken by the paper control tribunal.

(Translation):

In accordance with this first principle, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the resolution now before the house because I find that it is based on two factors which are essential to the validity of this bill: first, the temporary nature of the measures; second, the emergency crisis. At this stage of the resolution, I do not intend to discuss whether there really is an emergency crisis nor to ascertain which controls we ought to throw overboard and which we ought to maintain. Reserving the right to take up this matter when the bill is before the house, I may however express my deep conviction that, if all controls were removed overnight, Canada would be thrown into a state of economic chaos that would adversely affect the very life of the country.

Mr. MICHAUD: That's right.

Mr. LESAGE: I now wish to discuss as briefly as possible the second principle which I mentioned at the beginning and under which some jurists would allow the government to encroach upon the exclusive rights of the provinces by claiming that the object of the legislation is peace, order and good government of the country, even if it deals with matters usually considered as subject to provincial jurisdiction only.

I respect the enlightened opinion formulated yesterday by the Minister of Justice, who also quoted his deputy minister, but I must say that I respectfully disagree with them on that point, and several of my colleagues have told me that they share my views on the matter. The Minister of Justice contends that the principle stated is based on a judgment rendered by the privy council in the Temperance Act case. That piece of legislation had been adopted by the Parliament of Canada in 1878 and had to do with the sale of alcoholic beverages. The validity of the act had been questioned in the case of Russell vs. the Queen, in 1882; however, the privy council had confirmed its validity. That very question was again raised regarding the same legislation in the recent case of the Attorney General of Ontario et al vs. the Canada Temperance Federation et al, brought before the privy council in 1946. Judgment was delivered on January 21, 1946, by Viscount Simon. It is contended that the principle I mentioned earlier and which was stated yesterday by the Minister of Justice, was enunciated in the said judgment. In my humble opinion, the decision rendered in 1878 in the Russell case was erroneous. Subsequent decisions by the privy council express opposite views. I will only mention two: the judgment on an appeal re the Board of Commerce Act; and the judgment delivered in the case of the Toronto Electric Commissioners vs. Snider.

In the first case, concerning the Board of Commerce Act, judgment was delivered by Viscount Haldane. I wish to stress this point, since the part which I propose to quote from Viscount Haldane's decision is in direct contradiction, I submit respectfully, with the opinion expressed yesterday in this house by the Minister of Justice. I quote:

> No doubt the initial words of section 91 of the British North America Act confer on the parliament of Canada power to deal with subjects which concern the dominion generally, provided that they are not withheld from the powers of that parliament to legislate, by any of the express heads of section 92, untrammelled by the enumeration of special heads in section 91. It may well be that the subjects of undue combination and hoarding are matters in which the dominion has a great practical interest. In special circumstances, such as those of a great war, such an interest might conceivably become of such paramount and overriding importance as to amount to what lies outside the heads in section 92, and is not covered by them. The decision in Russell v. The Queen (1882) 7 App. Cas. 829 appears to recognize this as constitutionally possible, even in time of peace; but it is quite another matter to say that under normal circumstances general Canadian policy can justify interference, on such a scale as the statutes in controversy involve with the property and civil rights of the inhabitants of the provinces. It is to the legislatures of the provinces that the regulation and restriction of their civil rights have in general been exclusively confided, and as to these the provincial legislatures possess quasi-sovereign authority. It can, therefore, be only under necessity in highly exceptional circumstances such as cannot be assumed to exist in the present case that the liberty of the inhabitants of the provinces may be restricted by the parliament of Canada, and that the dominion can intervene in the interests of Canada as a whole in questions such as the present one.

In the case of Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, Viscount Haldane again delivered judgment, referring to the case of Russell v. The Queen in the following terms:

> It appears to their Lordships that it is not now open to them to treat Russell v. The Queen (7 App. Cas. 829) as having established the general principle that the mere fact that dominion legislation is for the general advantage of Canada, or is such that it will meet a mere want which is felt throughout the dominion, renders it competent if it cannot be brought within the heads enumerated specifically in section 91. Unless this is so, if the subject matter falls within any of the enumerated heads in section 92, such legislation belongs exclusively to provincial competency. No doubt there may be cases arising out of some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada, as a whole, such as the cases arising out of a war, where legislation is required of an order that passes beyond the heads of exclusive provincial competency.

In my opinion, both judgments formally contradict the judgment delivered in the Russell case and implicitly admit that the decision of 1878 was erroneous.

It is true, however, that in the judgment rendered by the Privy Council in 1946 on the validity of the Temperance Act, the Privy Council seems to confirm the opinion given in the Russell case; but if the judgment of Viscount Simon is carefully examined, it is seen that the original decision was reluctantly upheld, for a reason which I can better express by quoting an excerpt from the judgment:

(Text):

The appellants' first contention is that Russell's case (supra) was wrongly decided and ought to be overruled. Their lordships do not doubt that in tendering humble advice to His Majesty they are not absolutely bound by previous decisions of the board, as is the House of Lords by its own judgments. In ecclesiastical appeals, for instance, on more than one occasion, the board has tendered advice contrary to that given in a previous case, which further historical research has shown to have been wrong. But on constitutional questions it must be seldom indeed that the board would depart from a previous decision which it may be assumed will have been acted on both by governments and subjects. In the present case the decision now sought to be overruled has stood for over sixty years; the act has been put into operation for varying periods in many places in the dominions; under its provisions businesses must have been closed, fines and imprisonments for breaches of the act have been imposed and suffered.

(Translation):

Therefore it seems that if the Privy Council refused to reverse its former decision, it is because the judgment had been delivered a long time ago and the principles involved were considered as part of the constitution itself.

Therefore, this decision, merely because it confirms the judgment delivered in the Russell case, should not justify enunciating a principle as dangerous as that expressed yesterday by the Minister of Justice. I cannot admit that principle, and I repeat that if there were no emergency and if the proposed measure were not of a temporary nature, I could not support it.

In conclusion, may I emphasize that the existence of a state of emergency in another country, even though it may affect the economy of Canada, could not justify the adoption of legislation, even of a temporary nature, under the first principle which I have expounded, unless a state of emergency existed in our own country.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. LESAGE: Therefore, notwithstanding the great respect which I have for the enlightened views expressed by the Minister of Justice, I cannot admit the validity of the additional reason he gave in his remarks, which I quote from page 1554 of Hansard:

(Text):

Great national interests are at stake in the sense that as an aftermath of the war the economic stability of the greatest national customer that this country has had in the past is endangered and it is in the national interest that food should continue to flow to the people of Great Britain in order that they may be in a position to produce goods and exchange them for our goods in the future and continue to be the great market that they have been in the past.

(Translation):

Every precedent indicates that a state of emergency must exist in the country itself, and I cannot conceive that we have reached a point in the international sphere or that we have reverted to colonialism to such an extent that a state of emergency in Great Britain should allow us to disregard our own constitution.

Mr. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Hear, hear.

(Text):

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, this resolution, which provides for the continuation of certain orders and regulations for a limited period during the national emergency, is to my mind one of the most important to come before the house this session. It is because what I have to say has to do with the principle behind the whole measure that I wish to speak on the resolution rather than on the bill itself.

Before I come to the resolution I should like to make reference to the speech delivered earlier today by the leader of the Social Credit party. He began his speech by dealing with such things as ignorance and nonsense, and I think he is to be congratulated on the way he stuck to his point all through his speech. I do not know why the hon. member should make so much of what he considers to be the urge for regimentation coming from this part of the house. If he looks back to the record —and one does not need to go very far back— he will find that his friends in Alberta have been doing some things which to my mind bode ill for democracy in this country. I hold in my hand a clipping which I took from the press only this morning. It appeared in the Globe and Mail, and the headline reads, "End present political parties, Alberta Social Credit urges." Then it goes on to say:

> The annual report of the Alberta government's social credit board, released today, urges "abolition of political parties" . . .

Then it goes on to say why, and here is the most intriguing part of the report. It not only would abolish the political party system as we know it, but they go on and say:

> The board criticized the secret ballot and recommended its abolition in certain circumstances. All the board's recommendations are qualified with some such as abolition of the secret ballot based on establishment of a new economic system.

I do not know what kind of economic system we could envisage in this country which would require the abolition of the secret ballot. To me the secret ballot is the sacred part of our democracy, because when we can no longer express our opinions in times of election freely and without fear, we can no longer have a truly democratic parliament.

The press report goes on to say:

> The report said the secret ballot enables a citizen to evade responsibility for his actions, adding when he votes for a candidate of a political party, he is also voting for the party platform.

That does not always hold good. The press report goes on:

> The secret ballot, the report continued, gives the voter the opportunity to condemn later the actions of the government for which he voted.

That is the privilege which they would take away from the voter. Having once voted for a government or for a party to form a government, apparently this board thinks that the voter no longer has any right on any future occasion to reverse his decision and to vote his party out of power. That to my mind is a vicious principle to insert in any recommendation in any report.

While the hon. member was at the height of his oratory, he went on to say that he was for electoral reform, that he was in favour of making parliament more responsible to the people. He did not go on to say how he was going to do it, but if he were to follow the pattern that is apparently shaping in Alberta, we can see what he would have. I spoke of the social credit board, and the personnel of it is given. You will be surprised to find that the board is composed of four members of the Alberta legislature. There is a board made up of four persons elected by the people who now would deny to those same people the right to exercise their secret ballot to remove them from the office which they were given the honour to hold for the time being. The hon. member made some mention of insolent bureaucrats. If there is anything which can go farther in the way of insolence than what is suggested by that board made up of four elected representatives advocating that in the future the people should not have a secret ballot, then I do not know what it could be.

I do not want to go much farther in that direction, because I have other things to say; but I want to state clearly that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) in his anxiety to attack the C.C.F., has exposed certain of his philosophy which does not look very democractic to me. He said that he denounced dictatorship. I congratulate him upon that. Why should he not denounce it? All of us in this chamber are against dictatorship. But when the province from which he comes, the only one which has a government of the same political persuasion as himself, has the temerity to set up a board of four of their elected representatives who have, to use his own words, the insolence to present a report of the kind to which I have referred, then I say he is not doing much to prevent the dictatorship which he fears.

Mr. QUELCH: Have you the report there?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am quoting from the Globe and Mail.

Mr. QUELCH: Do you believe everything you see in the Globe and Mail?

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Read the report first.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I shall read the report as soon as I receive it from the social credit board to which I have written, today, asking them to send me the full text of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: One can prove anything if he takes statements out of their context.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: That was exactly what the hon. member for Peace River tried to do when he was talking about the C.C.F.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member mind reading the report in the Globe and Mail?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have placed it on the record.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Read the whole thing.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I have quoted the parts of the report which have a bearing on what I have to say. If the hon. member wishes to quote the rest of it he is welcome to the use of the clipping, which I have here. I did not rise to attack the Social Credit party, and said what I did only because they have made certain statements which needed to be elaborated upon.

Last evening, in my opinion the minister made one of the best speeches he has ever delivered in this house, and during the course of his remarks he brought out certain facts which should be seriously considered. He pointed out that at this time there was the danger of subscribing to the propaganda which seems to come to us so regularly, to the effect that all controls except rent control should be done away with. Yesterday the leader of our group placed on record the result of a Gallup poll taken early this year on the question of whether or not all controls should be removed, with the exception of control over rents. Two-thirds of those asked the question replied "no". I am not suggesting that such a poll is 100 per cent accurate, because we have to allow for its mechanics, but generally speaking I think it can be said that two-thirds or more of the people of this country are alarmed at the way in which the cost of living is rising.

When hon. members rise and say they would like to see the removal of all controls except those over rents, I think they are doing an injustice to public opinion in two respects. In the first place, it does not bear out what the public have expressed, when they have had an opportunity to do so. In the second place, if at this time it were possible to remove all controls except rent control I still would not be in favour of taking that action. Why should we penalize one sector of our population? Owners of homes who are under rent control are just as worthy as any other people in this country; so why should we make them an island in our price control system and say all controls will be removed, all other prices may rise as much as they like, but those who own property will still be subject to rent control? I cannot see the logic in a situation of that kind. I have also before me a number of statements made over the radio by Mr. Donald Gordon. I am not going to take time to quote them all, but this is part of one delivered on November 1, 1946, which I think should be considered:

> People that want price increases sometimes suggest that removing the controls at this time would not result in any serious advance in the price level. That is sheer nonsense. That sort of view is the kind of logic used by an ostrich when he hides his head in the sand.

I believe there is a good deal of truth in that statement. We have only to ask ourselves why we have this propaganda at this time for the removal of price controls, in order to have an answer to the question of whether or not prices would rise. If it is the opinion of those who are urging that price controls be removed that prices would not rise, then there would be no reason for them to ask for the removal of controls, because in that event price control would have nothing to do with their prices. Under the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board no one is prevented from selling at less than the ceiling price, but people are prevented from selling at more than ceiling prices. Therefore anyone who says the removal of price ceilings will not cause prices to increase should not advocate decontrol, because it would have no effect whatever on his prices.

Who wants decontrol? Well, at their meeting in Toronto on January 28, 1947, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association went on record as being totally opposed to price control, and other similar organizations have been sending their representations to members of the house. Hardly a day passes when letters do not arrive on our desks asking for decontrol in certain fields. When you examine them carefully you find that many of these persons and organizations asking for decontrol of their prices so that they may charge more for their products are still quite willing to have controls remain on the things they must buy in order to produce their products. You cannot have it both ways. I believe, if the government wishes to deal fairly and squarely with all segments of the population, controls must be administered fairly and squarely. There must not be any hit-or-miss system, allowing one industry or one group of industries to be decontrolled so that they can clean up on the prices caused by shortages while others have to take the consequences.

In this chamber it is hard to analyse accurately the feeling from time to time on price control, but as a general thing I believe it can be said that the group to which I have the honour to belong have taken a consistent stand that, as long as it is necessary for the administration of just prices, controls should be maintained in effect. On the other hand, members of the Progressive Conservative opposition have been fairly consistent in advocating decontrol. If you look back over the record you will find that at least one hon. member when speaking in this house the other day, I believe it was the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Menary), made the statement—and the members of his party sitting around him applauded at the time—that in his opinion all controls except those over rents should be removed. He also said that was the opinion of his colleagues, and

I take it that represents the attitude of the Progressive Conservative group at the present time.

Mr. MENARY: Rising to a point of order, I did not say it was the opinion of my colleagues. I made the statement that it was my opinion.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I presume I would be out of order if I quoted from a former debate, but if my recollection is correct I believe my hon. friend used these words: "I join with my colleagues to urge that all controls except rent control be removed." If that is not the case I shall be glad to be corrected. The hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), I believe during the same debate, also took a determined stand against any controls whatever, as did the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) and a few others. I am not trying to pick a quarrel with members of the opposition as to their intentions or desires. They have their opinion on this subject, and it is an earnest opinion which I respect. But I believe it is an opinion which, if carried out, would cause what the minister described last night as a gyrating price system in this country. If we followed their advice, not only would we have inflation in this country; we would have the anomaly of both inflation and deflation at the same time. We would have more than that. We would find it would be not only a matter of prices going up, but a matter of a breakdown in the distribution of articles for sale.

I am sometimes told by hon. members that the average small businessman is sick and tired of controls and wants to get rid of them. But if they were to examine what took place in the last five or six years; if they were to ask the average small merchant about the business he did in the last few years as compared with the five years prior to that, they would find that under the price control and ration system the average small merchant did exceedingly well. They would find, too, that today a great many of these small merchants are changing their minds about price control and rationing. They are beginning to realize that, had it not been for price control and control over the distribution of goods, thousands of them would have had to close their doors during the war, with nothing to sell because they would not have obtained the goods. The big industries, the chain stores, the big concerns next to the manufacturers would have had all the business at whatever prices they felt like charging, while the small businessmen, dependent upon certain regulations and controls to see that all were treated fairly, would have been left with either nothing to sell or no one to sell it to.

The small businessman today realizes, too, that there is only a certain amount of purchasing power in the hands of his customer. And the average small merchant does not make his living by selling to the people in the high-income brackets. Those are the people who can afford to go other places to buy their goods. He makes his living from selling his product to the worker in the factory and in the mine, and by selling to the farmer, if he happens to be in a farming community. They are the people having modest incomes. If inflation starts in, and if their incomes are suddenly taken away from them in the form of inflation, purchasing power is cut in half, and the business of that merchant is also cut in half.

So that the average merchant today, after having studied the situation, and after having a slight flirtation with inflation, is finding that the honeymoon is over. He is finding today that, under price control; under a control of distribution, he did better than he ever did in any other period in the history of this country.

I would point out to the minister and the government the seriousness of the steps they are contemplating. It seems to me that what they are attempting to do is to follow out what they call orderly decontrol, a process which the minister said was the opposite of the boom-and-collapse system of decontrol. If that is what they are trying to do, then I am not altogether sure they are succeeding. All we have to do is to look over the papers from January 1, 1946, to January 1, 1947, and follow the news items announcing the different rises in prices, announcing the removal of ceilings, to see that the government policy of decontrol has not been one designed in the best interests of the average workingman in this country.

I do not need to quote many figures; the house will have plenty of them later. But just to give one example, in the period from January 1, 1946, to January 1, 1947, the increase in prices of agricultural products is shown as an index of 4·4, while the increase in manufactured products in the same period was 8·6. It will be noted that the second figure is almost twice as large as the first.

It cannot be called orderly decontrol when prices of manufactured products increased twice as much in the same period as did prices of farm products. We find today that many farm products are still under price control; and so long as that means stabilization the farmers are not objecting to it. But while this is going on, the government is permitting others to get out from under the ceilings entirely, or to raise the ceiling to an extent where they make it almost impossible for the farmer to produce his goods, which are under control.

I want the government to realize, too, the effect of a headlong decontrol policy, such as is being advocated by the Progressive Conservative party, and which unfortunately the government is following to a large extent, upon old age pensioners, for example, and other people who are retired and living on pensions of some kind. They may be receiving railway pensions, or they may be people with fixed incomes, who cannot go on strikes to raise the amount of their pensions or incomes, who cannot go into collective bargaining or come to the government and say, "You must increase our pension because the cost of living has gone up". They are people who are in a category who have to live on what they receive; and if their cost of living is doubled, then the government is cutting their cheques in half. Surely that is a mathematical statement which cannot be contradicted.

Then there is another class of people, sometimes referred to as white-collar workers. In that class would come civil servants, schoolteachers, clergymen and thousands upon thousands of others who are living or attempting to live on salaries which cannot be adjusted from month to month, or sometimes even from year to year, but whose salaries have been set over a period of time. These people find that, as the cost of living goes up, their purchasing power proportionately falls, and their standard of living is necessarily lowered by that amount.

I should like the government also to realize what it will mean to people in modest income brackets who invested their last dollar, so to speak, in victory bonds or war savings certificates. They bought their bonds in good faith during the war, many times having to spend more than they could afford in order to make the purchase, and put that money away. But they did it, first, because it was a patriotic duty, and, second, because they believed it was good business to have some money put away in order that they might, after the war was over, buy things which they could not get during the war.

It was good business, provided that conditions remained the same. But let us consider the person who bought a $100 victory bond in 1942 and put it away. Then in 1947 he decides to use that bond to buy a piece of furniture, or something else which he could not have bought in 1942. He takes his $100 bond, cashes it, and finds that his $100 is worth only $75 or perhaps $66, because the price of the article he was going to buy has gone up to a point where the value of his bond is almost cut in half.

That is something else to which consideration should be given. Let us not forget, too, that we have heard representations about widows and orphans, and the effect of certain measures on their living. Widows, orphans and others in that category have never been given enough by way of allowances to bring them up even to an ordinary standard of living. They have been given allowances which permitted them what might be described as a subsistence standard of living. Today there does not seem to be anything on the horizon to show a general increase in allowances for widows and their children. Yet those people have to take the same amount of money, go out and try to buy food, clothing and all the other necessities of life, the prices of which in many instances have gone up fifty or sixty per cent, and in some instances seventy-five per cent. It is not fair to ask those people to do that.

Then we have our war veterans. When they were overseas many of them, in their slit trenches, dreamed dreams of successful businesses they were going to have in this country, or dreamed about the farms they were going to operate. But when they come back and see the rise in the cost of living, and the increased prices of materials which would be necessary to set them up in business or to operate their farms, they are becoming cynical and discouraged, and in some instances dispirited, because they find that their gratuities and their reestablishment credits do not go nearly as far as they had dreamed they would. Had they been warned that we would have inflation to this extent, the situation might have been different. But many of them came back, expecting in good faith that every dollar they received during their service would be worth a dollar in 1947. Today they are finding that is not so.

Many times we have heard in the house about the tremendous increase in the cost of building houses, in the cost of farm machinery, and so on. All those things are affecting directly, day by day, all the war veterans in this country. And taking all these things together, I do not see how we in this parliament, we, who were in a position to enhance our own remuneration without having to feel too keenly the effects of inflation, can advocate that controls be now lifted so that the law of supply and demand may take its course.

Surely those who talk about that law of supply and demand must realize that for every law that there is in that so-called law of supply and demand, there are thousands of economic lawyers who are ready to destroy it. Those who profess to believe in capitalism must admit that the objective of capitalism is not that of free competitive enterprise. It is to prevent as much as possible free competitive enterprise, in order to corner goods or prices in one's own particular field.

Mr. FULTON: What dictionary did you get that out of? Where did the hon. member find that definition of capitalism?

Mr ZAPLITNY: Surely members of parliament do not have to speak in terms of dictionary definition in this house. If we have not learned anything in our lives from practical experience and common sense, definitions will do us no good. If the hon. member disagrees with my definition of capitalism I shall be happy if he has in his own mind a definition that suits him. He has only to read the McGregor report on monopolies and cartels and a lot of other documents along the same line to find out that what I am saying is perfectly correct. I think the mistake that we would be making if we attempted to depend on the law of supply and demand would be to assume that all people under that mythical law would have the same opportunity to take advantage of the law of supply and demand. But that is not so and in this country it never has been so. There may have been a time when free competitive enterprise existed and worked. If there was, it was for a brief period after the fall of feudalism. But so far as the economic system of this country is concerned, there has always been a tendency for those who have economic power to destroy competition and do away with free enterprise and, instead, build up monopolies. I am not saying that this is an immoral urge because, under the system under which we live, it is the proper thing to do. It is the very essence of capitalism to do away with your competitor. That makes you what they call a successful businessman, one who has succeeded in pushing other businessmen out of his field entirely.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you a success?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: If success were to be judged by the dollars I have accumulated I do not suppose I could be called successful. But I have always taken the view that there are other things in life besides dollars and cents.

I think the choice we shall have to make is between stabilization and profiteering. The government is trying to steer a course, and truly it is a wondrous course, between those two points of view. Either we can have a system under which the law of supply and demand shall have full sway, as the Progressive Conservative party advocates, in which all persons will be thrown on the competitive market and the stronger ones win, those who are in a position to profiteer will do so and the others pay the shot, or we can have stabilization. But we cannot have both. The government will, I believe, find it increasingly necessary to establish stabilization if we are to have peace and prosperity in this country and realize the dreams we dreamed of during the war of the new social order which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) loved to talk about and which he warned us must be on its way before the war was over, that new social order that we continually heard about over the radio all during the war. The government will find themselves compelled to pull themselves away from the point of view expressed by my Progressive Conservative friends, even though they hold that point of view sincerely and with the best of intentions, because it was that same philosophy and point of view which flung the ship of state on the rocks in the dark thirties, and the same philosophy will again land us in the same place.

There are those who say that if controls were taken off we would have tremendous production and that inflation would be defeated because of the great production we would have, which would do away with the necessity for having any control. But let me quote from the report of the wartime prices and trade board for 1946, where at page 45 I find this:

It was hoped that these adjustments—

That is, adjustments in the prices on furniture.

—would promote increased production of lower price lines which had been disappearing from the market . . . By the end of the year, the total supply of household furniture had improved substantially. There was, however, a lack of balance in the supply since higher-priced lines were quite plentiful and lower-priced lines were often scarce or unobtainable.

Those who talk about production being increased through the removal of controls do not realize that those who are in the business of making profits are not interested primarily in production. Their interest primarily is in profits and they will produce those things on which they make the most profit, regardless of whether it is the type of things that are essential or whether they are what the people want at that moment. They will even go to the extent of restricting production to keep their prices up.

The other day, as the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was making one of his usual good speeches and telling us that he was against the state going in for trade and against the powers the government was asking for, I picked up the Ottawa Journal and there saw a picture of a mountain of potatoes, several thousand bushels of them in the state of Maine being dumped because they were surplus production. While I was reading the news item accompanying the picture, the hon. member for Lake Centre was quoting the price of potatoes in Chicago at $2.70 a bushel. Surely that shows a weakness in the private enterprise system which my Progressive Conservative friends believe would be a cure-all. Here was a case where thousands and thousands of bushels of potatoes were being dumped, destroyed so that no one could make use of them, at the very time when food was urgently and desperately needed all across the world.

Mr. FRASER: That was done by the United States government, was it not?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It is a good capitalist government, the kind of government my hon. friend would have in Canada if he had his way. I do not care whether it was done by the government or by anyone else. I say that the destruction of food at this time when people are dying of starvation in Asia and in parts of Europe is immoral, un-Christian and everything else I could think of to call it.

When hon. gentlemen talk about free enterprise it is time that they realized, as the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) indicated last night, that however terrible they may consider government control, there is also such a thing as private control. Those who talk of free enterprise seem to think that if all government controls were removed we would have perfect freedom of enterprise in this country. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Under our capitalist system there is and always will be control of prices. Prices do not set themselves. In spite of all the talk of the law of supply and demand, someone is in control of the things we buy and sell, and we must take our choice between providing, through our elected representatives, democratic controls so that prices will have a fair relationship to one another and all classes of the people shall have all the freedom they want in carrying on their livelihood, provided that they do not encroach upon that of somebody else, and have stabilization of prices and the cost of living; and, on the other hand, taking the lid off, as our Progressive Conservative friends would like us to do and have their mythical free enterprise, which actually would mean handing over our economy to those concerns which, during the hungry thirties, destroyed not only potatoes but wheat and coffee and live stock, which they burned or dumped over the cliff into the ocean in order to keep prices up. Those are the powers I am afraid of. Those are the powers which the hon. member for Lake Centre did not mention in his speech. He only shakes his finger at the government and says they are asking for very wide powers. Who else should have the power if not hon. members who are elected by the people? Surely, if we believe in democracy, then we believe in giving power with responsibility. What the hon. member wants, what the Progressive Conservatives want, is power without responsibility. They want to give power to du Pont, to the big corporations, to the International Nickel Company, to Falconbridge, so that they can manufacture nickel for the enemy.

Mr. SKEY: On a point of order, the statements the hon. member is making are completely false.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Some hon. member said something about its being a speech from the backwoods. I wish to remind him that some of the finest people in the country live in the backwoods.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. GRAYDON: And also the patience of the country.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Last night the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) concluded his remarks by asking that the house defer debate until second reading of the bill. He said:

> I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the discussion in this house of the proposed measure take place as far as possible on the second reading of the bill rather than on this resolution.

That suggestion seemed to be a reasonable one. It was accepted and concurred in by my leader; but, as indicated by the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low) this afternoon, the suggestion was not adhered to by others. In view of some of the things that have been said, notably the remarks last night of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), it has become necessary that the position should be clarified with what I hope will be a brief statement on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party.

Stripped of all its socialist jingo and propaganda, if anything then remains of the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, it would be reduced to this, that he exposed in naked reality the fact that the essence of the socialist position taken here by the C.C.F. party is, first, they want controls; second, they want them to be permanent; third, they want centralization of power in Ottawa and, fourth, they want these things even if necessarily, and it would be necessarily, at the price of freedom itself.

Mr. KNOWLES: What page is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. FLEMING: I certainly am not quoting from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Last night the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had something to say on what now passes from C.C.F. lips under the euphonious phrase of "democratic planning". Actually it means socialistic planning. There was a time when the socialist party, the C.C.F., were a little more frank with their expressions than they are today. There was a time when they called by its true name the kind of planning that they are now calling by this euphonious title "democratic planning." They called it "socialist planning" in their Regina manifesto, the C.C.F. bible. And socialistic planning it is. That is precisely what the C.C.F. are calling for, socialism; and they have seen this, if they have seen nothing else, that between socialism and continued perpetuation of controls there is a bond of union which demonstrates that controls are of the essence of socialism. You could not have socialism without a network of controls. They are of the essence of socialism. Socialism does not work without controls imposed by those who think they are doing the planning, regulation and regimentation of the lives of the people.

Of what does this planning consist? Hon. members who espouse the cause of socialism keep parroting away about its being done in parliament. We who have sat in this parliament during the past two years know very well that the planning, where it is being done, is not done in parliament or by parliament. It is done by those who derive their power at the expense of parliament. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that this whole system of controls was built up during the war on one basis and one basis only, and that is by taking power from parliament, from the elected representatives of the people and vesting it in a group of people whom we call the cabinet, who then proceeded to delegate it to controllers. That is the way the planning was worked out, planning through controls, and that is the method by which socialism would be enforced in this country. It is perfectly idle for anybody to expect serious-minded people to believe that planning would be done in parliament. The kind of planning that our socialist friends want is the planning that would be done in the way in which it has been done in recent years, by taking power from parliament and putting it in the hands of a group of people outside parliament and usually beyond the control of parliament.

Mr. JAQUES: Outside Canada.

Mr. FLEMING: The fact of the matter is that control in this country and the power of parliament have moved in opposite directions. The more control there has been, the less power has parliament enjoyed. We who came here under the Progressive Conservative banner in 1945 were determined that we would fight to the limit for one thing, namely the restoration of the supremacy of parliament over the executive branch of government. That is why we come into headlong conflict with our socialist friends. It is not that we are advocating the abolition of all controls but because the method that they are advocating is a method which, if pressed to its logical conclusion, means the death-knell of parliament; it means the death-knell of our democratic parliamentary institutions. They may not realize it. It may be that they have not seen very far; it may be that they have not pursued this matter to its logical conclusion. The fact of the matter is—and we have seen it with our own eyes—

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. FLEMING: —the farther control proceeds the farther the power of parliament recedes. If the hon. member will come back a little later I shall endeavour to accommodate him.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was going to ask him how he voted in the wheat board issue.

Mr. FLEMING: The hon. member can get the information by consulting Hansard without taking up my time. In the house last night the socialist leader worked himself up into quite a lather protesting against what he called the policy of headlong decontrol. That is a curious description to apply to government policy. We thought it had not been moving very fast in the direction of decontrol, but let us take it on the basis on which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar put it. He objects to decontrol. He cannot have it both ways. I shall have something more to say later about that expression he used. He will therefore insist, if he intends to be consistent, that parliament return to these boards any powers that these boards have given up; also that parliament may confer new powers on them. If he is to be consistent he must go that length and he also must accept the things which have gone with this bureaucracy; one of them has been secrecy, the difficulty of obtaining on the floor of the house essential information that should not be denied to the elected representatives of the people in parliament. That is the sort of thing the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is, in effect, advocating, whether he realizes it or not.

Mr. KNOWLES: Nonsense.

Mr. FLEMING: I am glad to see that the hon. member is at least following what I am saying even if he may not understand it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Nobody could.

Mr. FLEMING: As long as we have government by bureaucracy we shall have the same excuses that have been resorted to by the government in recent years. When we have asked for essential information we have been told that it is not in the public interest to give it. That has been the stock answer given to parliament. Now the fact is inescapable, and the lessons of history are plain for all to read, the way in which all totalitarian systems began was precisely by the method advocated and espoused by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I would not say that the hon. member is himself an admitted or an avowed exponent of totalitarianism. What I do say is that unfortunately the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has not seen that what he is advocating will lead inevitably to totalitarianism, if pressed to its logical conclusion. It cannot do otherwise. That is the way it began in Russia: a moderate government to begin with, having a leaning to socialism, but it did not last long. It gave way to an out-and-out communist government. What happened in Italy? They did not come to fascism at one jump, but they got there in the end. The same with Germany.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does the hon. member make any distinction between those countries?

Mr. FLEMING: I do not know whether the hon. member would understand it if I tried to make it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Well, do you?

Mr. FLEMING: The fact is that his own leader cannot appreciate that the line along which he is leading the hon. member who just asked the question is the line that will take him where Russia went in 1917, where Germany went in 1934 and where Italy went in the twenties.

It is unfortunate that the hon. member does not realize it, but the fact is that what he is advocating would lead eventually to that length. Apparently the hon. member does not realize that is the road which he is advocating should be taken. I do not suggest that he advocates communism at one jump. No. But he has not seen nor has his leader seen that the things they are advocating, when pressed to their logical conclusion, will lead eventually to despotism, because despotism is the essence of the system they are advocating.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is nonsense. The hon. member knows better.

Mr. FLEMING: Under that system would come the restriction of the powers of parliament. The system which they would foist upon the people of the country is one that would result in a contraction of the powers of parliament. It is built upon that principle.

Mr. KNOWLES: Does the hon. member really believe that?

Mr. FLEMING: It is also of the essence of the system which these hon. members are advocating, that it should be based upon centralization of power at Ottawa. I hope the members of this house have begun to realize that, next to the common sense of the people themselves, confederation is the strongest bulwark we have in this country against socialism, and that is the reason why the socialist party in this house is continually advocating policies that would mean the centralization of power in the hands of a bureaucracy at Ottawa, at the expense of confederation and at the expense of the provinces.

The two things go together, socialism and centralization. These are the twins that the socialist party has adopted. We shall not forget, I trust, the ready way in which the socialist party rallied to the support of the government last year when they resorted to a method of amendment of the British North America Act, which we of this party said was fraught with the utmost danger and would open the way to depriving minorities of their guarantees under the constitution. The policy that Lapointe preached, Lapointe whom hon. members opposite claim to follow, whose titles they possess, but not his principles—

Mr. MARTIN: And whom you did all you could to persecute.

Mr. FLEMING: —and who advocated that this constitution should never be amended in that way without consultation with the provinces; the policy of Lapointe, who warned against treating our constitution as a scrap of paper, is forgotten. I remember his words when he warned this country and parliament against treating confederation, the constitution, as "un chiffon de papier." Hon. members, the socialist members of the house, are quite prepared, in their desire to see socialism foisted on the country, to see these powers taken from the provinces under the guise of an emergency and vested here. And well we know that the vesting of these powers here, the permanent continuation of these emergency powers in Ottawa, means that the freedom of the people of this country would be strangled by a perpetual bureaucracy.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar last night used an expression which I should like to refer to now: "You cannot have it both ways." That is one remark in his speech with which I am in complete agreement. You cannot have it both ways. Amid all the contradictions in that speech, and in C.C.F. statements and policies, it is interesting to hear the leader of the C.C.F. using an expression like that. I might liken it, when he is directing it to the government, to the pot calling the kettle black.

What is the essence of it, this matter of not having it both ways? It means, Mr. Speaker, that when the C.C.F. party deplore the decontrol that has proceeded thus far they are deploring the end of wage control. It means that they are deploring the end of salary control, because those are two important steps, belated steps, taken in the direction of decontrol. They were taken only on November 30 of last year.

Now the leader of the C.C.F. cannot have his cake and eat it. He cannot have it both ways, and in protesting against the decontrol that has proceeded thus far he is telling the government that it must go back and reimpose wage control and salary control. There is no escape from that. He knows perfectly well, and his own followers have admitted it, that you cannot have a system of widespread price control without control of wages and salaries. Let him rise in his place, or let any follower of his rise in his place in this house today and say frankly that he advocates the reimposition of wage controls and salary controls. Let him be consistent and frank and say that. He will not dare to. There is not a member of the socialist party in this house who will today rise in his place and say frankly and honestly that he advocates the reimposition of wage control and salary control.

We have witnessed a very good example of double-talk. You cannot have it both ways. Of course you cannot. You cannot have price control on a widespread basis without salary and wage control.

Mr. GRAYDON: They are glued to their seats.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, and their tongues are glued to the roofs of their mouths for once.

Mr. KNOWLES: If you want an answer you will get it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Make it fast.

Mr. FLEMING: The C.C.F., now in 1947, nearly two years after the conclusion of hostilities, stand for the reimposition of wage and salary controls. In time of peace, that is inviting the workmen of the country to accept serfdom, and the C.C.F. are the people who are advocating it, advocating the submission of the workmen of the country to serfdom. They pose—and what a pose it is—as the friends of labour. Let these pretending friends of labour shake off the cloak they are travelling under today and tell this house frankly that they are in favour of the reimposition of wage control. They cannot have it both ways.

Some tears were shed by an hon. member, one of the socialist members, on behalf of the white-collar workers of the country. Well, I should like to see that hon. member, instead of trying to have it both ways, be frank and consistent and say that what he is advocating means the reimposition of salary controls. The class who suffered most in the country during the war was, I believe, the white-collar class, the people ground between the upper and the nether millstones—on the one hand, high taxes and rising cost of living and, on the other, fixed salary ceilings without any escape from them. The hon. member for Dauphin apparently wants to put the white-collar workers of the country back in that straitjacket. There is a fine sample of socialist regimentation.

Of course hon. members will recall that he had something to say on behalf of the people who are living on fixed incomes and the people who are drawing interest. It is strange that he did not choke on those words. I have before me this Regina manifesto of the C.C.F. It probably has been forgotten by hon. members of the C.C.F., but we have in this strange document this sentence:

> The C.C.F. proposes that in future no public financing shall be permitted which facilitates the perpetuation of the parasitic interest-receiving class.

These crocodile tears that were shed this afternoon on behalf of the interest-receiving class are on behalf of the people who are described by the C.C.F. in its official manifesto as the "parasitic interest-receiving class". That is the fine type of championing the C.C.F. want to do for those whom in 1934 they called the parasitic interest-receiving class. Nor will it be forgotten that the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) in this house during the term of this present parliament, on October 5, 1945, had something to say on this same theme. He was not concerned then about the people of fixed income, the people who were dependent upon interest for a livelihood. You will find that on page 821 of Hansard of the second session of 1945 he said:

> . . . when the war is over, the debt should be cancelled. There is no reason why when they come back and go into overalls, into plants and factories, they should start to pay tribute by way of interest to people who sat back comfortably and secure and invested their money. The national debt, apart from the interest, we owe to ourselves. It is not a liability, but an asset.

And so on. He was asked further questions and he came out with the remarkable statement that these people who had invested money in government bonds in time of war should not be paid their interest because that meant paying tribute to unworthy people Let us have no more of this nonsensical shedding of crocodile tears that we have had here this afternoon, in this amazing exhibition on the part of the C.C.F.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. GRAYDON: They asked for it, and they have got it.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not pretend that my hon. friend has liked what I have said, and I do not pretend that he will like the rest of what I have to say.

Mr. Speaker, the same hon. gentleman who was shedding tears profusely here this afternoon said something on behalf of old age pensioners. I hope before long the government will bring us face to face with an opportunity to put old age pensions on a proper statutory basis. But what is essentially involved in the contention this afternoon and last night by the leader of the C.C.F., is that they want to see a part of the old age pension continued simply on the basis of order in council, where it rests on the whim of the cabinet—a fine state of affairs.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is completely untrue.

Mr. FLEMING: I say that it is the duty of this house not to expose any person on the old age pension to the whim of the government, through an order in council. It is something that this parliament should take responsibility for and should put into effect.

Mr. KNOWLES: I rise to a question of privilege. No one has risen more times in this house this year than I have—

Mr. GRAYDON: There is no privilege there.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Is the hon. member speaking to a point of order or a question of privilege?

Mr. KNOWLES: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is saying that we of this party want the old age pension continued on the order in council basis. From time to time, and no later than yesterday, I have asked that the act be brought in.

Mr. GRAYDON: What the hon. member's party believes in is not a question of privilege in the House of Commons.

Mr. FLEMING: What the socialist party believes in does not even make sense.

Mr. KNOWLES: There is such a thing as sticking to the facts.

Mr. FLEMING: It is too bad that the hon. member does not know how to do that.

Then there were some more remarks made last night by the leader of the C.C.F. on the subject of the big interests. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar exhibits an amazing acquaintance with what he says are the views of big interests. As a matter of fact, he displays more familiarity with them than I am sure any other hon. member could possibly hope to command. The fact of the matter is, although he did not tell the house so last night, that many of the big interests like controls. Why? A good many of the big businesses prospered under them during the war. In the second place, controls gave them guaranteed markets and relieved them of a good deal of competition which would otherwise have arisen from small businesses. The fact is incontrovertible and inescapable that the continued imposition of controls in this country is favouring big business and is penalizing small business.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nonsense. I will say "nonsense" now.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are right there.

Mr. FLEMING: It satisfies me, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) makes the remark that he made. He might as well be frank and admit that he sees essentially eye to eye with the C.C.F. on this question.

The hon. member this afternoon was shedding more crocodile tears about those who were coming back from overseas and were unable to start in business just as easily as they would have liked. The lot of many a returned man coming back to this country has been that he has been prevented by controls from setting himself up in a small business.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That fact has been brought to the attention of the minister more than once.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all. It has been prevented by shortages.

Mr. FLEMING: When the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was pillorying the so-called big interests, what an amazing exhibition we beheld, Mr. Speaker, in the south half of the government side of the chamber! When the hon. member drew attention to the fact that the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) had given way to some of these big interests in September, 1939, they applauded him in his indictment of the present Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. That was the essence of the speech made by the hon. member and it was applauded more vigorously by those members in the south half of the chamber to your right, Mr. Speaker, than it was by the socialist members themselves.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Where is the dividing line for the south half?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member is on the border line.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley sits just about at the apex of the great divide.

We heard last night from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar the usual jingo line with regard to monopolies. His solution for the problem of monopoly in this country today was what? It was the imposition of the biggest monopoly that ever man's mind could conceive, a super state-monopoly. We of the Progressive Conservative party do not believe that is the solution. We do not like monopolies and we believe that monopoly cannot be permitted under a system of free enterprise. We believe in free enterprise, not monopoly; but monopoly is not to be cured by the creation of a super state-monopoly which the C.C.F. would create in this country.

Mr. GRAYDON: Two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. FLEMING: And two two's do not make four to the C.C.F.

Mr. KNOWLES: What is your cure?

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, we would see proper application of the Combines Investigation Act. I think it is high time that we had an end of this shilly-shallying on the part of the C.C.F. in speaking of combines and monopolies. Where they have any information concerning a monopoly, surely it is their minimum duty as citizens to go to the authorities and swear out an information, lay a charge under the Combines Investigation Act. But they do not want to do that. That would deprive them of one of their big talking points. They prefer to take up time in this house creating these bogeys about monopolies and combines, but not taking the effective means which exist today for bringing these monopolies and combines, where they exist, to book. Let us have a little wholesome sincerity and honesty and frankness in this matter. If the leader of the C.C.F. or any other member of that party has any knowledge of combines and monopolies, then let him go to the authorities and lay his charge under the Combines Investigation Act. Thanks to the leadership given in this matter by the Progressive Conservative party at the session last year, there were made to the Combines Investigation Act amendments under which it is possible for any citizen to lay such a charge. If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has a sense of citizenship sufficient to make him want to see something effective done by the law officers of the crown in the administration of law in this country to bring combines to book if he finds such combines, let him take that simple course. Let him go to the authorities and swear out an information, or at least let him give his information to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). He needs information.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where do you stand on controls?

Mr. FLEMING: I admire the hon. member's impatience; it is a pleasure to see him roused into doing something. At page 1583 of Hansard for yesterday, the Minister of Justice had this to say on this subject:

> Only the extreme nature of the emergency with which the country was faced justified the vesting of such powers in the executive . . .

He was referring to these sweeping powers vested in the executive to control almost everything in the country. By parity of reasoning I suggest that it is only by reason of the existence of an extreme emergency that the continuance of such powers can be justified. The emergency does exist in certain fields; of course it does. Accordingly certain controls will need to be continued as long as the extreme nature of the emergency continues, to use the words of the minister. But it is high time we did away with a lot of these controls that do not come under that definition, and it is about time we had some regard—the government, especially, and those whom they have placed in charge of the administration of controls—for the essential relationship of this problem to the problem of production. Times without number we have heard from the government that the danger existing today, the danger against which they require these extraordinary powers from parliament, is the danger of inflation. There is no great secret as to how this danger of inflation arises. It is created by the lack of goods in proportion to the available consuming and purchasing power. How are we to arrive at a solution of this problem? The C.C.F. really do not want the problem solved; they want the controls continued. Anything that points to the existence of an emergency lends weight to their argument that controls should continue. They are not interested in seeing the end of emergent conditions; as a matter of fact they do not see the difference between emergent conditions and conditions that are not emergent. They want the controls to continue permanently. Surely, however, it is high time we gave a great deal more regard in this country and in this parliament to measures that will have the effect of increasing and encouraging production rather than those simply concerned with the rationing of scarcity. We need to do a great deal at this session of the house in the direction of encouraging production, and one means that must be put into effect, before this house concludes this session, is a substantial and material reduction in taxation.

Mr. Speaker, I have time to add just one word in conclusion. At the appropriate stage we shall have more to say concerning our views on specific orders contained in this volume which I have no doubt will go down in history as the Heinz bill. We do not have anyone in this house by the name of Heinz; but I believe this bill, with its fifty-seven orders in council, all different, is likely to go down in history as the Heinz or pickle bill. We are confronted at the present time with a curious situation. We of the Progressive Conservative party, the official opposition, have done our best to contribute to an orderly approach to a review of this problem. Last night the Minister of Justice asked that we defer discussion of the resolution; I took his suggestion to mean that we might seek information in committee, but that we reserve our principal contributions to the debate until second reading of the bill is moved. I wish to make it perfectly clear that, in doing what we have done in trying to assist the minister, we have made the only contribution that lay within our power to bring order out of the chaos that has been created by the procedure the government has followed. By bulking all these measures in one bill—a whole session's legislation, as was pointed out last evening by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power)—it is going to be difficult to carry on an intelligent discussion of the various measures. It will be difficult to carry on any successful questioning in committee of the ministers concerned with these resolutions, when you have fifty-seven different measures all rolled into one. But that is the way the government has chosen. It is an awkward method, just about as chaotic as anything could be; but then what could we expect?

Mr. ILSLEY: Could you suggest a better method?

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, I could suggest about fifty-seven methods that would be better than this.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, name one.

Mr. FLEMING: One would have been to introduce separate bills.

Mr. ILSLEY: Thank you very much.

Mr. FLEMING: To follow the statement made last evening by the minister, another method would have been to break down the fifty-seven varieties into three categories. He said there were orders which were regulative, orders which were administrative and orders which were legislative. At least he might have tried to break down his bill into three bills, which would have reduced the chaos somewhat.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would it?

Mr. FLEMING: I do not think it could have failed to do so, when there will be so much chaos as it is. The blank cheque being asked by the government in the matter of the consideration of this resolution and the bill to follow is not something new on the part of this government. I should think it will be difficult for anyone to discuss the principle of a bill having attached to it a whole volume of legislation, but that is the way the government has chosen to proceed, perhaps to confuse the house. The fact of the matter, as my leader said last evening, is that we had hoped we might help to clear way as much chaos as possible in trying to devise an orderly method of considering this measure, or rather these fifty-seven varieties of measures, in the house and later in committee. That objective was defeated, largely by the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, who certainly did not contribute anything to the clarification of the issues or the simplification of the procedure.

Mr. KNOWLES: He made our position clear, which is more than you have done.

Mr. FLEMING: However, Mr. Speaker, I think we have made our position clear on this and other occasions. Having regard to the emergency which exists in relation to certain of these measures, of which perhaps rental control is the best example, there will have to be a continuation of some controls as long as particular emergencies last. But as to those measures which cannot be justified by what the minister has called the extreme nature of the emergency, they should go. We are not prepared to just take everything holus-bolus, to swallow everything whole, as one would have to in order to accept legislation like this. We shall try to be soundly discerning and discriminating, as is the duty of all hon. members, when we come to scrutinize these measures in detail.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate, but the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) regarding the report of the Alberta government social credit board, published in the Toronto Globe and Mail, make me feel that the people throughout Canada and the world who will read Hansard have a right to know what is in that press report. Therefore I should like to have the privilege of reading it into Hansard, so that everyone may know just how bad or good it is. The article appears in the March 21 issue of the Toronto Globe and Mail, at the bottom of page 1. It is headed "End present political parties, Alberta social credit urges." And then follows:

> Edmonton, March 20 (CP).—The annual report of the Alberta government's social credit board, released today, urges "abolition of political parties dominated at the top as we know them today" and establishment of "unions of voters" which would control the actions of their elected representatives.
> The board criticized the secret ballot and recommended its abolition in certain circumstances. All the board's recommendations are qualified with some such as abolition of the secret ballot based on establishment of a new economic system.
> The board is composed of four members of the legislature—A. V. Bourcier, Lac Ste. Anne, chairman; N. B. James, Edmonton, secretary; William Tomyn, Willingdon; and F. M. Baker, Clover Bar.
> The report said the secret ballot enables a citizen to evade responsibilities for his actions, adding when he votes for a candidate of a political party, he is also voting for the party platform. The secret ballot, the report continued, gives the voter the opportunity to condemn later the actions of the government for which he voted.
> "The political party system makes it very difficult for the people to exercise their democratic privileges and assume their personal responsibility, even if they were so inclined," the report said.
> The board reported "the obvious remedy for the evils of party politics is the abolition of political parties dominated at the top as we know them today," and adds "in Canada we have never had an unfettered parliament subservient to the will of the people."

I think it is only just that the whole of the ugly truth should be placed on Hansard, so that each person can form his own opinion. I believe it would be well to comment briefly on one or two matters in this report, so as to help everybody to understand the point of view of the people who made this recommendation.

First, let me point out that the social credit board is only a special committee appointed by the Alberta legislature to examine into and make a report respecting certain problems. It does not indicate that the government has accepted the report, that the cabinet has accepted it, or that the social credit league in Alberta or throughout Canada would accept it. It is merely a report and recommendation, probably purely philosophic and scientific and perhaps not to be adopted for a good long time if ever into the actual and practical political activities of the country.

In the first paragraph hon. members will note that these words are quoted:

> "Abolition of political parties dominated at the top as we know them today."

The essential words are "dominated at the top as we know them today." I would probably be out of order in what I am now about to say if I were not discussing orders in council of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott). But I will just call the attention of hon. members to the absolutely indefensible policy which has obtained in Canada in respect of beet sugar production during the war. And I will ask hon. members to tell me whether they think the Liberal government which has been in power, and has been administering that policy, has been free to do the thing it thought best, in the interests of Canada, or whether it has been influenced by certain bodies of people who perhaps contributed to the slush fund or election funds of the party which is in power. Without arguing as to whether or not what I have suggested is true, I believe this is an excellent illustration to show how utterly helpless the people of Canada would be in electing, election after election, parliaments made up of parties of men bound, to begin with, because of promises made long before the election was called.

The attitude of social crediters is that both of the old line parties in Canada—at least both the Liberals and the Progressive Conservatives—are bound before they ever enter an election and before they are ever voted on, making it utterly impossible for the people of Canada ever to obtain the kind of government they desire, a kind of government, in fact, which in many cases can oppose the interests of the people themselves.

Mr. FRASER: That is only your understanding of it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right. I am trying to give the people of Canada the conception held by the social credit league. But members of the Social Credit party are elected absolutely free and untrammelled.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no doubt about it. Members of this party, from the time they came to the house, have been free. They have struck out boldly at the things they feel they ought to strike at.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They have not struck for home, though.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And no man in this parliament can gainsay that point. Certain people who would like to see reaction in this country for the next hundred years would like to see us go home; there is no doubt about that.

But the people of Alberta do not think that way. They think the time has come for a change which is the right kind of a change.

May I come now to the second paragraph which states:

> The board criticized the secret ballot and recommended its abolition in certain circumstances.

How widely different is that statement from what we were given to understand by the hon. member for Dauphin. It states:

> All the board's recommendations are qualified—

And how important is the word "qualified"—

> —with some such as abolition of the secret ballot based on establishment of a new economic system.

This indicates clearly that the board did not advocate the abolition of a secret ballot until a new economic system is established, under which there would be a different kind of voting, such as that to which the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) referred in his speech this afternoon. I think what I have said will probably help people to understand better the meaning of that paragraph.

I now comment briefly on the fifth paragraph which states:

> "The political party system makes it very difficult for the people to exercise their democratic privileges and assume their personal responsibility, even if they were so inclined," the report said.

I believe what I have said with regard to the sugar situation is probably sufficient comment on that paragraph.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before the house took recess at six o'clock I was referring to certain remarks made by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) this afternoon in which he had done the Social Credit group in this house a favour by drawing our attention to a Canadian Press dispatch from Edmonton in the Toronto Globe and Mail of today to the effect that the Alberta social credit board had submitted a report in which they recommended some measure of discontinuance of the use of the secret ballot and the abolition of political parties dominated at the top.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I did not want to do so before six o'clock, but it is my duty to call his attention to the fact that he should discuss only the principle of the resolution which is before the house, which is to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war. I would ask the hon. member to resume his remarks on the principle of the resolution.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that you have drawn our attention to that fact. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) spent his whole time on this kind of thing, but apparently the Chair did not notice it. A good deal of time was taken up on this sort of thing this afternoon and therefore I thought I would be in order if I referred to it, but if it is your desire, Mr. Speaker,

I shall certainly refrain from discussion along the lines followed by other members this afternoon.

I think, however, it will be in order for me to make this suggestion to the house. If the house goes on as it has done for the last several days in discussing measures which are designed to give the government an extension of its extraordinary powers we shall be discussing this matter until the middle of the summer.

Mr. REID: Until Christmas.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And the very members of the C.C.F. and Progressive Conservative parties who are rising in their places and using the time of this house in great gulps in discussing this measure will be whining in the middle of the summer because the government did not bring in its important measures early enough to give time for their consideration. I think it is fitting that somebody in the house should point that out.

Just as an illustration of what these gentlemen can do: I sat in this house for two years, in each of which a special war appropriation measure was under discussion, and in one of those years the members of this house spent seven solid weeks in discussing the war appropriation. All that prolonged discussion did not alter the size of the appropriation by a single cent. I fail to see any good that was accomplished by all that discussion. In Britain they passed the whole thing in four days. But here, after we had spent seven solid weeks in discussing the special war appropriation measure, we did not have time to discuss vital measures which should have been considered with great care by the members of this house. Now again we are going on in exactly the same way, except that the measure before us is for the purpose of extending the government's emergency powers, an extension which I think every hon. member agrees the government ought to have in order to be able to bring about decontrol in an orderly manner. It is a measure which probably we shall not modify to a degree worth considering as a result of all our talk, but as a result of the talk great and important measures which should be before the house will be brought down too late in the session for consideration as they were last year and in years before.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, the members of this Social Credit group have refrained entirely from entering into this discussion; we have not spent any time to speak of upon it; I draw your attention to that fact. Tonight I chose to use a little time because I thought the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) last night and the remarks of the hon. member for Dauphin this afternoon called for an answer from this group. And let me say that this group is perfectly ready to answer and will answer with complete effectiveness whenever called upon to do so. Having said that much, I shall refer only briefly to the question of controls.

Social credit, as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) pointed out this afternoon, favours the right kind of controls. There are two ways in which controls can be exercised by a government: one is by compulsion, and the other is by inducement. Social credit favours the use of inducement rather than compulsion. Social Credit favours measures of motivating control rather than measures of regimenting control. Such having been said, I think we have no further contribution to make at present to this debate. We are anxious to see this measure carried so that we can get on with the nation's business.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, first I wish to pay a special tribute to the former Minister of Finance, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) and the officers of his control board with whom I have had a great deal of correspondence during the war and since. I have always found the minister very attentive, patient and courteous with regard to any complaints made and I believe that he and his staff have carried out their duties with zeal and diligence in a difficult situation to the best of their ability. The situation with which they were faced was one in which business generally throughout Canada was upset by so great a war, and in addition we had problems in domestic and foreign affairs.

Coming now to the resolution, I believe that the discussion on the bill itself will be shortened by the statements which have been made by the minister and the various other speakers. I come from a large industrial city where we have been very much affected by the continuation now, for nearly two years after the war, of a vast control system. The Canadian people have, I believe, been long-suffering under these controls, but they have about reached the limit of their patience and I trust that the minister, when he tables the various orders in council, will give some further explanation of the necessity of these controls.

Business large and small in this country, as you know, Mr. Speaker, from your knowledge of your own great city, has been clamouring for freedom from so many controls. With the overtaxation, overgovernment and the failure to eliminate some of these somewhat minor controls, the smaller businessmen are finding it very hard to continue. They are hamstrung and interfered with in the conduct of their business from the commercial aspect.

I do not wish to go into the matters which the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) dealt with so ably last night, but I wish to point out one or two things with regard to the policy of the government in domestic matters as I see it.

As I see it, the policy of the government in domestic matters since the war ended almost two years ago is menacing to anybody who wanted to see controls eliminated. So far as I see it, the balance of the controls are not placed on any definite settled principle. The government are operating with none of these principles to guide them after the 15th of May. They do not indicate what one can expect from the ministry to clear the way after May 15. The whole story at home is one of the greatest menaces that we have. What are these orders in council that are to be enforced until May 15? Once they have this system, they find it difficult to get away from it. Those who are in charge of the controls think that they are indispensable, that the country cannot get on without them. Unless price control is unified with wage control, it leads to inflation and no control at all.

Since the war closed, the board has been seeking to control every walk of life and almost every commodity, over parliament's head and without any responsible action by a minister of the crown to interfere with it. The minister never even sees the speeches. These officials just issue them over the heads of the ministers. The people of this country are long suffering, but there is a limit to their patience and it has now been overreached.

Since the war closed, the board has hamstrung almost every private business. It is interfering with those who are trying to conduct their business. As I see it, at the present time there is virtually no control on all kinds of bodies that are spending a great deal of money over the head of parliament. Every principle for which the British nation struggled in the old land since the seventeenth century has been surrendered to political caucuses. Parliament itself, which came into being to ensure that taxes shall be voted only by those who have to pay them, has become the institution through which those who do not pay them impose them on others.

I wish to emphasize to the house that the powers of legislation, even older than the right of taxpayers to determine the national expenditures, have been surrendered and, if we are to continue this sort of thing, the power of parliament will be gone forever. Whole spheres of activity involving the livelihood of every man, woman and child in this country have been removed from the jurisdiction of the law of parliament and reserved for the determination of tribunals, irresponsible, irremovable, governed by no control and subject to no appeal. I wish to object to that as I have done before. We are told that parliament is supreme. Why does it allow all this to go on and even pass the expenditures?

The story so far as I can see is this, that the government instead of lessening controls and giving the industrialists a freer hand, is retaining controls and adding to them. This reacts on the small business man. He has to make out reports and papers, and that all interferes with his business. Firms are hamstrung in their business, and it makes the task of true recovery most embarrassing and difficult. The doubts, uncertainties and fears which are being engendered in the minds of the small and large businessmen in the management of their industries great and small affects them adversely, with the heavy taxes and restraints. So far as private enterprise and private initiative are concerned, they have never had a chance in Canada since the war has ended. This condition of affairs is sapping the energy of many businessmen. The control system is becoming heavy and laborious on the people. So far as the businessman is concerned we have seen the result of all this on taxation. This country has squandered its natural resources for many years, so much so that we are heading for a financial disaster. With the heavy taxation, with the burden of debt on the people and all that kind of thing we have squandered our resources at a rapid pace, and generations yet unborn will be taxed for it all.

The ministry seems to be depending largely on some of the propaganda we have had not only over the radio but from the Gallup poll, which seems to be galloping very fast at the present time. I think it is all gallop and no poll. It reminds me of an uncontrollable racehorse I mentioned the other night.

So far as private initiative and private enterprise are concerned, they are the key to unlocking the door of all this reconversion; they are the key to the solution of the domestic problems. You have to see the cause and effect of it. In the proposed resolution the minister refers expressly to certain orders and regulations. "By their fruits ye shall know them" The resolution speaks for itself. The minister said that on the first reading of the proposed bill he would table certain things and schedules of the controls left. I do not wish to deal in full with the list of controls. One of them relates to a serious matter, namely, housing and all that kind of thing. The other day, the successor to the minister tabled the orders in council which are to be read into this resolution. What was it? It had to do with people and soldiers who had purchased houses up to July, 1945. At that time very few men in the army were home. In the spring of 1945 the war with Germany ended and the war with Japan ended later on in the year. In my opinion, there were few soldiers home at that time. There was a very large army overseas. Since that time they have come home. That order in council should be amended to allow soldiers into the homes they bought down to the end of 1946.

The government has no inspection services of controlled housing in regard to this housing proposition to eliminate the undesirable tenant. Under the control system there is no inspection of these houses to find out who is profiteering. Many owners have lost their homes because they could not get into them. It is leading to confiscation of property because, under the control system, under the proposed extension of these emergency powers to May 15, and under the housing matter as it stands today—I refer to an order in council passed three weeks ago—the present state of the housing situation is largely responsible for the issue of that order in council—they have done nothing to relieve the situation. The controllers have never built a single house. It is simply imposing an intolerable burden on owners of property.

I come from a city where sixty-five per cent of the people used to own their own homes. Many of them are losing them today because they cannot get into them. They rent their property to a tenant. What does he do? I have seen some houses where the tenant is profiteering, and the landlord cannot get anything out of the house. Many of the property owners have undesirable tenants who put electric stoves in cupboards and place every man they can get into small rooms with great danger to the health of the people, and break all kinds of municipal by-laws. It is leading almost to confiscation of property and insurance policies are vitiated. Nobody wants to own property under the present state of controls and taxes and continued losses on the investment. If it tended to relieve the housing situation I would not object; if it helped to get soldiers houses I would not object, but it does not.

[Mr. Church.]

The government spent large sums of money on public buildings. They tore down a large number of temporary huts which cost over two and half million dollars, and which were built on the waterfront in Toronto. These huts could have been used for temporary housing, but that is not being done—except to a limited extent. The army buildings are not being used to aid the housing shortage, and builders cannot get materials.

The whole story at home is told in a very few words. Are we to continue this system which is no aid to real estate? With the burden of taxation, with the housing situation as it is, with the rate of interest and taxation going up—with all these things, does it alleviate the housing situation? No; it does not. It has retarded all private enterprise and private initiative and building construction and prevented housebuilding.

In conclusion, I wish to make this point. In the United States we find an example of the grave danger from inflation that was inherent in the emergency control legislation which it was found necessary to enact during the war, but a committee was set up in Washington and they went into the whole question of controls. They adopted there, Mr. Speaker, a principle which I sincerely hope will be recognized and put into practice in Canada, under the able auspices both of yourself and of the Speaker of the senate. I hope that a joint committee of both houses of parliament will be appointed in this country to deal with these matters along the lines followed in the United States. In Washington, President Truman and some of the leaders of both houses got together and, through the medium of their ways and means committee, they have endeavoured to solve this problem in connection with controls and to decide what controls should be left to emergency legislation. There they have brought in a valuable report which indicates the dangers that exist in further controls. The result of their inquiries is that in the United States they have wiped out all controls with the exception of one or two of a minor nature, and rent matters and evictions.

Controls accomplished a great deal of good in difficult stages of the war, but now that the war has been over for two years, I hope that something will be done to eliminate them here.

I should like to read two or three sentences from the Washington Truman report, because I think it would be well for us to heed them and the warnings. I quote:

Discussing the monetary problem, the committee on monetary relations declares that "the immediate danger in most countries is now one of continued inflation. This danger must be countered." One cause of rising prices is too much money and too much government debt; another is too little production in the face of urgent needs. The report continues:

"To a considerable extent, the upward tendencies of prices are due to non-monetary causes, arising mainly from destruction and disorganization brought about by the war, such as the shortage of goods, deficient production, and the rising costs largely attributable to higher wages. Among the most essential tasks are an increase in the production of power, a general recovery in efficiency, and firm measures to avoid the vicious spiral of rising wages and prices. It should now be clear everywhere that until sufficient supplies become available, an attempt to improve the people's standard of living merely by raising money wages is doomed to failure, for it will simply lead to a rise in prices which will tend to imperil the integrity of national currencies."

But in many countries inflationary pressure is still largely the result of monetary causes in the form of large accumulations of purchasing power continually increased by deficit financing and a policy of excessively cheap money, which involves the monetization of debts and artificially increases the money valuation of capital assets.

Therefore, the first task is to arrest the increase in buying power by bringing budgets under control, so that no new notes need to be printed to fill the gap between expenditure and revenue. Government expenditure must be subject to a thorough overhauling so as to eliminate superfluities and prevent too large an administrative establishment from reacting unfavourably on the budget position and on the standard of living.

I hope that we shall soon see the end of this policy of controls, which has cost the country so much. Generations yet unborn will have to pay the colossal debt that has piled up during recent years. We cannot very well appraise the situation just now. No newspaper can size it up. Historians will have to deal with it in proper perspective twenty-five years from now, and only then will the Canadian people see to their full extent what the cause and effects have been from the economic and national points of view and so far as the interests of the taxpayers and of our small businessmen are concerned, by the price ceilings, and economic controls. It is too early to predict now what the effect will be, but there is a great deal of doubt in the minds of the people today and we who are assembled here as a parliament do not seem to be doing anything to remedy the situation.

Mr. A. P. COTE (Matapedia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I wish to say that, contrary to the views of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) and contrary also to those of the leader of the Social Credit party, I intend to speak as a Liberal and as a liberal with a small "l." It is needless, therefore, for me to state that I am in favour of controls, whether during the war or during the period of transition from war economy to peace economy; and I am in favour of controls, I may add, for an obvious reason, that controls have proven in this war that they were serving the population at large. They were serving the small fry's interest versus the bigwig's ambitions, with the result that the people were on a standard of living in accordance with their ways and means, whereas during the first world war the big profiteers enjoyed life while the ordinary citizen did not enjoy it at all.

But I must be frank and also say at once that I am certainly not in favour of controls for the reason that was given yesterday by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) for continuing controls. The reason he gave will be found at page 1554 of Hansard of yesterday:

Great national interests are at stake in the sense that as an aftermath of the war the economic stability of the greatest national customer that this country has had in the past is endangered and it is in the national interest that food should continue to flow to the people of Great Britain in order that they may be in a position to produce goods and exchange them for our goods in the future and continue to be the great market that they have been in the past.

I think it is about time for an enunciation of policy by the powers that be; it is about time, after the achievements of Canadians during the war just ended, for people in authority to state definitely the policy of this government and to think in Canadian terms first and always. It is about time that we minded our own business and left the interests of other people to their own countries.

I am also opposed to the way in which this resolution introduces the omnibus bill for the consideration of parliament, because I think it is the most anti-democratic and anti-Liberal measure this parliament has ever seen since confederation. May I be permitted to cite authorities instead of giving my own views in this respect? I shall refer you, Mr. Speaker, to a statement made in this house by our great leader, our dear Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1932, with regard to a measure which was every bit as anti-democratic and anti-Liberal as this one is. At page 701 of Hansard, volume 1, of the session of 1932—and he was referring to chapter 58—he said:

What does this mean? Chapter 58 is the act to which I have just referred.

It was the Unemployment and Relief Act which was continued and called in 1932 the Unemployment Continuance Act.

It means that notwithstanding that parliament is in session, notwithstanding that the people's representatives are here assembled for the express purpose of dealing with the great problems of the country and voting supplies in the regular way, the Prime Minister—

The Prime Minister was then Mr. R. B. Bennett.

—asks this parliament to give to the ministry while parliament is in session the power to do by order in council that which should be done only by act of this parliament and by supply voted in the regular manner. A more audacious or amazing piece of legislation never was introduced to a free assembly by any prime minister. This measure proposes that, while parliament is in session, actually assembled here with representatives from all parts of the country, hon. members shall forgo, by the changing of a date in an act of parliament, their whole duty of dealing in the regular manner with the problem of unemployment in what my right hon. friend will tell us is another emergent situation.

I admit that we also are possibly in another emergent situation. But if it was that bad to introduce two objectives in one bill, I am asking you frankly what it is to introduce fifty-seven objectives. In case the Prime Minister's words are not sufficient to convince hon. members of the situation as it now stands with this omnibus bill, I shall refer the house to another hon. gentleman who at the time called himself Mr. Ilsley. At page 937 of Hansard of March 8, in the session of 1932, volume 1, I shall quote Mr. Ilsley, who is now Minister of Justice, who is introducing this resolution and who, on the bill introduced by Mr. Bennett at that time, was saying this:

I submit that the most serious objection to be taken to this resolution is that a violation of the constitutional rights of the members of this house is being sought by the government of the day. It is hard to find words strong enough to characterize the action of the government in attempting to put through this resolution. It was bad enough in the emergency session of 1930 to ask for a vote of $20,000,000 for works which were not specified; it was worse in the session of 1931 to get from this parliament a blank cheque and legislation which set up a dictatorship between sessions, but it is infinitely worse for the government to have the temerity to come before this house and seek to perpetuate that dictatorship while parliament is in session.

I do not think I could use any better words to express myself tonight, because I think this resolution of today is quite similar to the one I refer to. I think it also involves a blank cheque, because the resolution does not indicate in any way what is the amount involved. In the second place, it is a resolution to perpetuate the sort of dictatorship which we had to stand for during the war, and which I would be willing to stand for during this period, but as a result of a resolution that should come to this house and leave in the mind of no members any doubt whatsoever as to its implications. I say that, first, with respect to money, and, second, with regard to the controls themselves, it leaves in the minds of all members of this house nothing but doubt and suspicion. Therefore I think the words of the man who is Minister of Justice today, but who was then in opposition as the hon. member for Hants-Kings, can be easily applied to it. I said that, as far as money is concerned, we are being left in the dark. As far as the controls themselves are concerned, and the emergency power that the government is seeking in this resolution, we are advised to a certain extent of what these measures may be in this publication called "Office consolidations of orders in council, specified in the schedule to the Bill, an act to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war".

Of course I see in this things which should be dealt with and taken care of; but I also see things that we could dispense with; for instance, the breaking and separating of eggs —I do know how to break my eggs at breakfast—the pasteurizing of honey; the slaughtering and stuffing of poultry, and things of that sort. When I bring forward this criticism it is in order to seek from the minister first a rectification of the enunciation of policy that he put on Hansard yesterday for what I would call the necessity of this bill, namely, that when Britain is in need in peace time, Canada must be the cow. I would hope that when this legislation is introduced in the house and we go into it, it might be possible for the minister, instead of bringing in an omnibus bill, to break it down and separate those matters dealt with by legislation already on our statute books, and introduce new bills for other matters, as for example, with regard to the wartime prices and trade board. In any event I think it should be dealt with in such a way that all hon. members might know the amount of money involved as well as all the items included in this legislation, and their purpose.

If that is not done, I for one shall feel like a shareholder in a large corporation such as the Sun Life, the C.P.R. or some other corporation, who is called once a year to rubberstamp the decisions of the executive. I submit to you, sir, that if that is what we are asked to do—and I say it is—there is no need for us to stay here for six months and spend the money of the taxpayers. We might as well come here for only one day and rubberstamp the decisions of the government, or send a proxy and stay home. I do not feel that I can take the responsibility of destroying the most elementary privilege possessed by any taxpayer of this country or any member of this house; I do not feel that I can subscribe to the annihilation of the greatest prerogative of members of the Commons by submitting to legislation twenty-five times worse than R. B. Bennett's legislation in 1931-32. I feel that I must redeem my accounts with the taxpayers of my riding and the country at large; I have to explain that when I voted for a certain bill on a certain date, I knew I was voting so much money which they would have to cough up, and that certain principles were involved touching their most intimate everyday dealings.

In conclusion, may I repeat that I hope the government will find ways and means of satisfying the people who really believe in a controlled economy, in a stabilized economy and in orderly decontrol, so that we may be in a position to vote intelligently on this legislation, and in order to give back to parliament its privileges and to members their right to know the amount of money involved and the items dealt with.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to assure you I am not going to read my speech; I never have and never shall. I am sorry the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) is not in his seat at the moment, because tonight he would have seen what a great privilege it is to be a Liberal; you do not have to agree with your fellow Liberals. I entirely disagree with the previous speaker. He comes from that part of the house which this afternoon was referred to, by an hon. member from the western end of the Conservative party, as the southern end of the Liberal party. The other night we heard the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) refer to packing plants, and I want to assure the hon. member for Eglinton that in the case of an animal going into a packing plant, the south end of the animal is by far the most intelligent end.

One reason I disagree with the hon. member from the southern end is that if we were to consider these fifty-seven varieties of orders one by one, while it might be all right for hon. members who live in eastern Canada, if they had the great privilege of living in the province of British Columbia they would not want to stay here until the end of December, and certainly we would be here that long if we took up these matters one by one. The hon. member for Eglinton referred to me in what I thought were flattering terms, and I hope the acting leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) will pay attention to what the hon. member said. In order that there might be no misunderstanding, during the recess I looked up the word "apex" in the dictionary. I had my own idea of what it meant, but not having the privilege of having been a Rhodes scholar I wanted to make sure. I have only a small dictionary, but I found that the word meant "the highest point." I do not want to read my speech, but I read that meaning so that Hansard may be correct, and particularly for the benefit of the two members of the cabinet. So the hon. member for Eglinton referred to me as the highest point in the Liberal party. Therefore I should be in a good position to bring in my hon. friends from the southern end of the party, who do not yet quite see eye to eye with the rest of us on the matter of controls. It is a funny thing but apparently in the Liberal party, as geographically in Canada, the finest things come from the west. I do not believe, like some of my hon. friends in the C.C.F., that I have a complete knowledge of everything.

Mr. GILLIS: That is obvious.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right; I will attend to that. I am sorry the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is not in the house at the moment, because I want to mention an item which proves the need for controls. Among the many benefits which we enjoy in this great democracy, no one can take your name unfairly or unjustly. I admit this has nothing to do with the bill; and incidentally the main objection I have to this legislation is the use of the word "omnibus," which is too hard to say. I would make the name a little shorter; it would be much easier to say. To indicate the need for controls, I am going to quote from the Manitoba Gazette, and surely anything from that publication should be an excellent authority, because for many years it was guided by no less a gentleman than the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken). So I take the Manitoba Gazette as being authoritative and fair, and I give the leader of the opposition credit for that. This, by the way, is in reference to the remark of my hon. friend across the way that obviously I do not know it all. This is a notice of an application for a change of name; it is in the issue of Saturday, March 8:

> Notice of application for a change of name. Notice is hereby given of the following application to the provincial secretary under the provisions of "The Change of Name Act."
> Mark this:
>
> I, Stanley Nowalsky—

An hon. MEMBER: Spell it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

—of the city of Winnipeg, in the province of Manitoba, hereby make application under the provisions of "The Change of Name Act," for a change of name as follows: From my present name, Stanley Nowalsky, to Stanley Knowles.

That proves that you have to have these controls. For the benefit of the record, I regret my hon. friend the member for Eglinton is not now present. I know of no better place than my own riding to go to get advice I should follow, and I believe it would be in the best interests of the people of Canada if we were to follow their advice more often, and also the advice of the churches of Canada.

I should like to quote here an unsolicited letter from one of my own churches. I am very fortunate to be able to say that the people attending this church had the good judgment to see that Cruickshank came back here at the last election. This letter is dated at Sardis, British Columbia, March 12, 1947. It is addressed to myself, George Cruickshank, at the parliament buildings, Ottawa, and states:

Dear Sir: The women's association of Carman United Church respectfully request you to support the maintenance of price control, until the period of short supply is over. We believe that this is the only way of avoiding serious inflation, as suffered by the United States last year, when their price control was abolished.

Hoping you will give this matter your serious attention and bring it before the house in the same efficient manner you have given other matters in our riding.

Wishing you every success in your work at Ottawa—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Let me finish this.

We are, yours truly, Carman Women's Association, Sardis, British Columbia; per Phillis Kirkness, Secretary.

Let me ask the hon. member for Eglinton to produce a solitary letter from as responsible a source as that asking for the abolition of controls. Every hon. member prides himself upon his good connections, but the hon. member cannot produce a letter such as that from any United Church in the Dominion of Canada asking for the abolition of price controls at this particular period.

I do not want to weary the house, so I shall read only one paragraph from my reply. It is dated March 17, 1947, the same day as I got the letter. I reply to my mail on the day I get it. Take note of this reply, because it speaks volumes.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it all.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I shall be delighted to file all my correspondence. Modestly, as you all know, I seldom speak about the Fraser valley in the house.

Mr. FRASER: Honest George.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is right. I do not blame my hon. friend for merely asking questions on the orders of the day. If I had nothing but Peterborough to represent, that is all I would do here, too. I am going to read this paragraph:

Unfortunately, for reasons best known to themselves, the opposition have strenuously objected to the maintenance of these controls and I am sorry to say by delaying action have made it difficult for the government to bring them under statutory form before the end of this month.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, it is not carried yet. And did that come from this party—or from which party? Maybe I had better attend to that party a little bit, because apparently they have a lot in common over there—in some sections. That has proved to be so—not the west end, but the middle end of the Conservative party. You know, they have changed leaders over there so often since I have been here—and I have not been here so very long—that apparently they now have a leader for the west end of the party, and a leader for this other part.

Mr. FLEMING: The leader we have is here to stay, and he will be leading on the government side of the house before very long.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, my friend, I am an older man than you are, and I wish you the best of luck for a long life—and I hope it for myself, too. But I am sorry to say that, even with my magnificent physique, I shall not live long enough to see my good friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) over on this side.

Mr. FLEMING: It will be soon.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to read that letter again, because I want my hon. friend to produce a letter like it, but which asks for the abolition of controls at this particular time.

I believe in giving all sides of a story, so I shall quote from the St. Croix Courier. And just in case anybody has any misunderstanding with respect to that newspaper, let me say it is from St. Stephen, New Brunswick.

Mr. MICHAUD: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Apparently the southern end of the Liberal party did not wait for me to finish, and that is why his cheer was loud because the St. Croix Courier is a strong Conservative paper. They have one—only one—reporter, and he is a leader in the Conservative party. But I want to quote what he says, so that we can understand the opinions held in number two corner, over there. I shall quote only part of it. This man is an excellent gentleman, one of the most outstanding men in the Conservative party—he ought to be, because he comes from British Columbia. I shall quote from this paper under date of March 20, and March seems to have done a lot of things. This is it:

"The Social Credit party see things as the Progressive Conservatives do except on monetary policy," said Mr. Green.

I am glad to know now that you are both tied in together. I have thought it for a long time. But now I know it, from a leader in that party.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member tell us what he read that from.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Must I give them more publicity? I quoted from the St. Croix Courier, published in St. Stephen, New Brunswick, on March 20. I don't blame you for trying to disown it. I might, myself, if they had supported us.

The riding I represent does not consider this bill perfect, by any manner of means. But we do know that if we abolish controls it would be a mistake. Nobody suffered from controls, from a financial point of view—and opposition members know this—more than did the dairy farmer. No one has made a more direct financial contribution to Canada's welfare during the period of controls than has the dairy farmer. I say that as the representative of a constituency the industry of which is principally that of dairying. Yet we know that if at this time controls were taken off, as some of my hon. friends would have them taken off—and the word they use is "holusbolus" or some such Greek word—the results would be bad; and the people in my riding realize what would happen.

We do not like regimentation. Some of the people in Fraser valley have for a long time been trying to regiment their present members, and it will be a long time more before they accomplish it.

Mr. FLEMING: The government tries to regiment him, too.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Listen, my hon. friend; even coming from Toronto, if you got into the Liberal party you would find that we never try to regiment anybody. We allow each and every member to express himself and to vote as his conscience dictates. And we do not have a caucus every day at two o'clock to tell us what to do when we get in here.

Mr. FLEMING: We don't caucus by provinces.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right now; I enjoyed your speech this afternoon, because I know of no more profitable way of spending an afternoon—when you have nothing else to do, or less chance of improving your mind than by listening to a speech from Toronto.

But to get back to my riding and its position with respect to controls, we do not approve this bill in its entirety, by any manner of means. But most certainly, Mr. Speaker, I would not have a letter from a United Church in my riding asking that these controls be kept on, if the riding did not think along those lines. I want to tell the hon. member for Eglinton that if he goes to that source for his advice as to what he shall say in the house, and how he ought to vote, he will end up eventually by seeing the light of day as to what is best for all Canada, and will be moving over to this side of the house.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is an excellent thing for parliament to have such a prolonged discussion as this one on the matter of "controls". Among the public, it is often said that members of parliament have more or less self-control. What with hearing that said and examining the matter under its various aspects, we may come, I hope, to achieve perfect control over our thoughts, our tongues, our acts and possibly even over the present government.

It is often repeated that controls breed an over-strong and all-powerful bureaucracy. After having scrutinized the whole world and studied their political set-ups, we may very well ponder over whether any other political group represented in this house were they to attain power—and this would be their luck, not ours—would do away with this bureaucracy bred by controls, of which so much is said; whether they would do away with the civil servants, who, after all, form the only bureaucracy which has been so much talked about. I was once told, in a government department, that the civil service commission was more powerful than any government. I almost believed it, for I do not think that any party could do away entirely with bureaucracy. I do believe, however, that it would be replaced by another much stronger, more numerous and probably all-powerful.

(Text):

To show, Mr. Speaker, that controls were not born yesterday, I have something here that was sent to me a year ago by my hon. friend the member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding). It is a translation into modern English of a proclamation concerning butchers, and there is a footnote on this sheet stating:

The first price control chief was the Roman Emperor Diocletian. In the year 301 he put price ceilings on all commodities and froze wages.

On March 25, 1535, a proclamation was issued by King Henry VIII concerning butchers. It reads:

"A Proclamation Concerning Butchers 1535"

Dated this 25 of March of reign of King Henry the VIII

Forasmuch as the King's Majesty is credibly advertised and informed, that beeves, muttons, and veals are likely to be more scarce and dear now against this holy time of Easter than in other seasons of the year, by reason of the charges of keeping such cattle with hay and other stover in the winter; by occasion whereof the butchers and others that shall sell such beeves, muttons, and veals by weight cannot buy them of the breeders, brokers, farmers, drovers, owners, and feeders of such cattle at such reasonable prices in gross as they may sell the same again by weight by retail at such prices as are limited in the act made for selling of flesh by weight, unless it should be to their utter loss and undoing; His Highness therefore willing that the same butchers and others selling flesh by retail for the time hereafter limited in this proclamation should be so conveniently provided for in the premises as they should not have any cause reasonably to forebear their provisions for such victuals to be sold at retail against this holy time of Easter for relief and succor of his subjects in as ample manner as heretofore have been accustomed; is therefore contented and pleased that, from henceforth until the 23rd day of June next coming, butchers and all others that shall sell flesh of the kinds aforesaid by weight by retail shall and may sell from time to time, unto the said 23rd day of June next coming, every pound of beef good and wholesome for man's body for a half-penny and one half-farthing and no more: And every pound of mutton for three farthings only and no more. And every pound of veal for a half-penny and half farthing and no more. The said act of provision heretofore had and made for selling flesh by weight by retail, or anything therein contained, to the contrary hereof notwithstanding.

Provided always that no butcher or others shall kill any calves to sell by retail for the term of two years ensuing, from the first day of January last, upon the pains limited in the act made for killing of calves, this proclamation notwithstanding. And his Highness hath ordained that if any butcher or others selling by retail do sell any of the kinds of victuals aforesaid otherwise than by weight or at any priecs than is afore limited or refuse to sell according to this proclamation; then every butcher or others so offending shall suffer loss and forfeit all such pains and penalties and also be ordered in all things as is contained and limited in the act made for the premises. This proclamation in any wise not letting.

And furthermore the King's Highness straightly chargeth and commandeth all and every one of the said breeders, brokers, drovers, feeders, farmers, and owners of such cattle that they and every one of them furnish the fairs and markets with such fat cattle as they have to sell from time to time in as large and ample a manner as hath been the custom: And to sell their said cattle at such reasonable prices as the said butchers or such others as shall retail the same again by weight may utter and sell the same to his loving subjects at such prices as are above limited, as they will avoid his Grace's high displeasure and answer to the same at their uttermost perils.

And that after the said 23rd day of June, the said butchers and others selling flesh by retail shall from thenceforth sell by weight by retail according to the prices limited in the same act and made and provided for the same upon the pains and penalties contained in the said act without any abstinence or redress to be had thereof after the said 23rd day. Wherefore the King's Highness straightly chargeth and commandeth all the singular mayors, justices of peace, sheriffs, bailiffs, constables, and other his officers and faithful subjects to whom it shall or in any manner or wise appertain that they and every one cause this his proclamation to be put in due and effectual execution according to the tenor thereof, as they will answer to his Highness at their uttermost perils.

Thomas Berthlet authorized to sign same with privilege of the King.

GOD SAVE THE KING

That shows, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian controls are not the first to be put into effect by a government.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, controls are merely the result of war, or at any rate, of an unusual situation. Ever since I have been sitting on this side of the house and even during the two long sessions when I sat on the other side, we were wont to say that our war effort would have a most disturbing effect on the economy of this country if it did not destroy it. Obviously, at that time, without presuming to prophesy, we feared that the war effort would be too great and that it would result in coercive measures being applied during and after the end of hostilities.

Controls are coercive measures and nobody likes them; they do not please any mother of a family or charitable institutions; nor do they please old people or children who are thereby deprived of some of the necessaries of life, but since the child is born—"control"—it must be brought up and be it a matter of controls, price regulations or something else, we must put up with everything on account of the present economic situation not only in Canada but throughout the world, and that is the point we must consider.

Let us take as an example the rationing of sugar. It did not please anyone. Everyone likes sugar, and more especially children, sick and elderly people who need it most. It was absolutely necessary to ration sugar because, since 1942, production was altogether insufficient.

The output of North America, the continent in which we live, amounted in 1938 to 2,467,258 tons of sugar, while in 1946, it had dropped to 1,845,000 tons, which means an annual reduction of at least 600,000 tons. That, however, is nothing compared with Europe which was laid waste by war. Its annual sugar output of 9,412,325 tons in 1938 decreased through the years to 5,700,000 tons in 1946. Therefore, war-torn Europe needs some of these controls and rigid rationing must be maintained so that world-wide distribution may be adequate.

Take Asia, for instance. Production has decreased by 2,380,255 tons, a drop which is almost as disastrous as that which occurred in Europe. If you multiply these figures by the number of years included between 1942 and 1946, you will see how inadequately the sugar output compares with demand and consumption.

Now, I come to the Philippines which have been almost destroyed by the Japanese. The production there, in 1938, amounted to 1,039,305 tons, while, in 1946, it had fallen to 13,000 tons. Listen to this: in Java, production, in 1938, was 1,761,000 tons and only 125,000 tons, in 1947. You can see the difference right there and realize at the same time that rationing is not entirely bad, especially in regard to certain goods, such as those I am speaking about at this moment, and which must first be distributed, if we are at all human, to those who need them, those whose health is failing, who are advanced in age and must have a definite amount of calories to keep alive.

In Formosa, the same conditions prevail. Production, which stood at 1,487,000 tons in 1938, is estimated at only 175,000 tons for this year. Fortunately, Europe is recovering faster than the Philippines, Java, Formosa and Borneo, for the Europeans had foreseen that they could some day be short of sugar, either as a consequence of war or of some other catastrophe and they put in larger acreages in sugar beets.

This reminds me first of having heard the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), in 1942, delivering a speech, requesting the government to encourage the growing of sugar-beets. I also remember that, in 1932, while a member of the provincial legislature, the hon. member for Montmagny, Mr. Paquette, a former mayor of the City of Quebec, the hon. member for Quebec Centre, Mr. Samson and myself had initiated a debate on sugar-beet growing. We had not much success then, but today the province of Quebec is equipped with a beet plant of 1,200 ton daily capacity at St. Hilaire. Other sugar-beet factories in various parts of the country, including Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario, have a daily capacity of 11,200 tons. I submit that if, in anticipation of some accident, or rather of such a scourge as war, we had developed the sugar-beet industry to a greater extent, as Europe has, we would have suffered less hardships from sugar rationing because we would have been in a better position to cope with our requirements.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that controls are depressing and irritating. We dislike them, as everybody else, except those who believe in state regimentation. Even though we may not fancy this liberal enactment, let us consider the present situation in Canada and outside the country. At the beginning of the war, I spoke the following words in this house:

> In order to survive, democracy will have to resort eventually to the very same means which are used against it if it hopes to conquer enemies bent upon its destruction.

Totalitarians resorted to controls in Germany, Russia, Spain and elsewhere. Why? To regulate their expenses, their production, their consumption in order to reach a goal of which they never lost sight: the domination of the whole world and the destruction of true democracy. I was justified, and I still am, in saying that even if it does not please our constituents democracies must sometimes resort to the very means used against them by their opponents. I quote a recent article from the New York Herald Tribune:

> Canada has shown us how to control salaries and prices during the war and now apparently she shows us the way in which controls must be lifted during the reconversion period.

I understand that some people demand the immediate abolition of controls. However, I find with dismay that those who demanded a superhuman war effort of Canada, knowing that the expenditures entailed would endanger our economy, are the ones who clamour for the lifting of controls and the return to peace-time conditions.

And now, we are labouring under the very conditions brought about by the pressure they exerted at that time. Canada gradually reduces her staffs. The number of employees of the prices board has shrunk by 1,220 in 1946 and further cuts are contemplated. I do not claim to be more liberal than anyone else, and I do not intend to give the impression that I changed my mind when

I took a seat among the liberals; I still hold to the same opinions which I held and voiced at that time, when I stated that controls were things that we could hardly countenance and that we abhorred even. However, we foresaw that the state of war and Canada's war effort, as well as that of all the countries of the world, would bring about the conditions under which we are presently labouring. If we study the schedule of prices referred to, yesterday, by the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) in his review, we find that the United States have experienced a disastrous and frightful rise in prices as a result of having removed all controls at one stroke. Those who will read the statement of the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice will see that the controls, in Canada were not done away with all at once, which has certainly been to the advantage of the Canadian economy and the Canadian taxpayer.

Mr. Speaker, that it is proper to quote in this connection a statement which the right honourable the Prime Minister made early in February. It reads as follows:

> The Tories would abolish in one fell swoop all government controls. The socialists of the C.C.F. would not only maintain them, but multiply them and establish them permanently. The Liberals avoid those two extremes; they want neither to abolish the controls for the benefit of private interests nor extend them needlessly, but keep those which certain circumstances make necessary in the general interest.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, like all the hon. members who have spoken before, I cannot accept straight away and smilingly a system of controls which will continue to be enforced. Some of those controls have been abolished and others will be. I hope that all will disappear in the near future. But, while I am not and do not pretend to be an economist, I cannot see how any country in the world, can possibly remove all controls on its domestic and its external trade.

That is why I shall vote for the bill, even though I do not like it. This does not mean that I have changed my mind about those measures of control, it is merely because I feel that we must keep a certain degree of control so that our economy will not be entirely destroyed, especially in view of the hard blows it has suffered after the war.

(Text):

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Quite a bit has been said about the south end on the government side. Since I represent the extreme south of the south end—I feel at times as though I were in Antarctica—I must express my views. I am afraid I cannot say it is a solid south at the present time, because I shall have to differ with my good friend the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote).

I am one who is convinced that this omnibus bill should go through as quickly as possible. I wish to explain at the outset that I am a Liberal, a Liberal of the Liberals, and I do not like controls as such. But I realize that there are times when we have to exercise controls, when we are in an emergency; and we are definitely in an emergency now. It is true that the guns have ceased firing, but we are going through possibly a more difficult period from the economic point of view than when the guns were still firing. We are running into what I consider to be the final lap, and if we falter in that lap and lose the race as a result of trying to be too hasty I maintain that we shall live to regret it.

We are not the only country which has to exercise controls. I had not expected to speak on this resolution; I had intended to wait until we came to second reading of the bill, but because the south end of the house has been referred to so often I thought I had better express my views. I picked up the Halifax Herald of March 20 while sitting here, and what do I see. The date line is "Washington, March 19—AP". I will not read the whole item. The heading is "Ask Power be Continued." I quote:

> President Truman asked congress today to continue his wartime power to control shipments abroad, as a curb on inflation at home and as a tool to help those countries "whose existence must be preserved".

Further on I read:

> Uncontrolled shipments into the higher-priced markets abroad would encourage domestic inflation and increase "the already substantial burden of living costs borne by the American people."

I skip a paragraph and read the last:

> About 500 items, mostly foods, now are under export curbs, compared with a war-time total of more than 3,000. Truman promised the fastest possible removal of controls but predicted that the need for them will "remain acute for some time".

I maintain that our position is very similar to the position over there, only we are much better off inasmuch as we have never relinquished controls in the wholesale manner in which they did in the United States and for which they are suffering today. I would urge all hon. members not to treat this question on party lines. It is too important for that. We want to get rid of these controls as soon as we can, but we must regard this as a big measure which we must face for a limited period of time.

We have been operating safely under these controls under the wartime prices and trade board and I contend that we have nothing to fear by operating under them for a few months longer. But we have a good deal to fear if we do not get this legislation through in sufficient time.

The suggestion has been made that we have separate bills for all fifty-five items. That would be all right if we had the time; but from what I have seen in this house this session, I suggest that, by the time we got through, the need for control would have gone by or the holocaust would have caught up with us and we would be definitely out of luck. We have not time to do it. We have to recognize that fact. Therefore I urge that as soon as we possibly can, when members have expressed what opinions they may have, we allow the Speaker to leave the chair so that we can consider the matter in committee.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Until now the question has been put whether one is for or against controls. Some have said they do not like controls, and it is a respectable opinion. They have said also that, although they do not like controls, they would be in favour of continuing them for the public good. That is acceptable. Some others have been against. It was their view and also mine, and I wonder if my hon. friend the member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), who has just spoken, had in view those who have expressed themselves against controls when he passed such severe judgment against them. I wonder if his words apply to the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and to my humble self.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): They apply to no one in particular.

Mr. POULIOT: All of us together. Therefore he divided the house into two categories, those who see the light and those who do not. I appreciate the fact that he has the right to his own views.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): I never meant that.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but it is my understanding of what the hon. member said. There is no one who is more ready to concede that everyone has a perfect right to his own view. Well, the question may be put differently. One may be for the controls in principle; but under certain conditions, one may be for the controls theoretically but against the application of the controls. These distinctions are necessary in a discussion. In the first place, I would be in favour of controls —and in fact I was the first one who wired to the Prime Minister on the eve of the war to ask him to see to it that prices of sugar and flour would not rise too quickly—under one or several cabinet ministers responsible to the House of Commons, responsible to parliament. That kind of control I would be for in case of emergency.

I believe that parliament is supreme and I believe also it is a great mistake to establish boards or commissions that are entirely independent of the government. If they are created as independent of the government it is because of the intellectual laziness and lack of determination of the members of the cabinet who would not assume responsibility for unpopular measures taken by a board in charge of control. It is just as clear as spring water. And then the control is decided; independent boards are organized, and members of parliament are just rubber-stamps to vote measures like this one.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mostly soft rubber.

Mr. POULIOT: That is another respectable opinion. Therefore, sir, I am against the constitution of commissions and boards that are independent of the government. It is precisely the view of the C.C.F. socialist party to have such boards organized and manned by men who are superior to members of parliament taken as a whole. These men on the boards—I am not complaining of anyone in particular; I am considering the question on principle—are considered superior to members of parliament, and we are here to give them powers which we are afraid to discharge. That is the constitution of all the boards that we have.

But there is something else. We are at the other end of the line. No minister has the outlook that a private member of parliament has on the effect of any legislation because, in the first place, ministers are not in daily contact with their constituents and because, in the second place, most of their constituents do not write to them except to ask for special favours. At times it may be letters of friendship, but when a man does not live among his constituents for the greater part of the year he loses contact with them. Moreover, ministers are surrounded by men who tell them that the wrong thing is the right thing and when a member of parliament tells them the truth it is sometimes considered as heresy.

If controls are necessary they should be under one or several members of the cabinet; then I am sure my hon. friend, who voted against controls on Bill No. 25 and on another occasion, would accept controls because, when the question of controls would come before the house, the minister would have to give explanations just the same as he gives in connection with any matter coming under his department. What I regret very much is that those who man the control boards very often consider themselves infallible. They think that if they admit a mistake they are doing something they should not do and they will be ashamed of themselves. They are not supposed to err. They are the infallible ones. Therefore, when it is pointed out to them that there is something wrong somewhere, they will not admit it, for any reason. Then the minister will tell us that it is difficult for him to intervene in such a case because he would not want to intervene in regard to an independent board. How is it that those people are independent? They have grown up like mushrooms, and it is impossible for members of parliament to make any observations to them. Sometimes we may make observations and explain certain things to them. As I said to one of them the other day, and as I said just a minute ago, members of parliament are the shock-absorbers. They are the other end of the line. We know what is going wrong with the application of controls, and we very often tell them that there is some-redressed, to have the error corrected so that the people of the country will not complain of any injustice. It is evident that the controls are unpopular. They cannot be popular. But they should be exercised with fairness so that no one can complain of any injustice at the hands of any officers of any branch.

It is necessary to keep order in the country and to maintain the respect of the Canadian people for our institutions. But what happened in my constituency? There was an overzealous man who was closely related to one of the members of the wartime prices and trade board, and who was in charge of an office in my county. He was unjust to the people. I will not say that he was dishonest, but I will say that he was unjust. He even went so far as to put the people under oath and ask them what price they had paid for used cars? I brought those facts before the board, but I did not get a satisfactory reply. I wanted that man to be fired, but he was never fired because he had support in high places. Finally, at the request of the wardens and the mayors of the county, the office was closed. I asked that the office be closed just in order to get rid of one incompetent man, and what did I discover afterwards? I discovered that the man was in the Quebec office and to a large extent in charge of the business for the twenty-three counties in the district of Quebec. It is impossible to get rid of them. He was like a girl who was employed in the civil service. She missed her examinations nine times and was fired at my request. The first news that the civil service commission had was that her chief had protested against her being fired, saying that she was rendering exceptional service. It is the same thing with regard to these people I speak of. We cannot get rid of them.

Is it not possible to make a certain clean-up in all these controls? There is great duplication. There are controls in the Department of Reconstruction; there are controls in the prices board, besides the control of the treasury and the foreign exchange control board. There are controls everywhere. There are fences. There are ropes. There are all kinds of ways to keep the people embarrassed and inactive. I will suggest something to the minister before the bill comes out, but I wonder if it will be of any use because the whole bill may be cooked now. However I will put it on record and show my willingness to help by making a few suggestions. Why not get rid of the controls of the wartime prices and trade board, which duplicate those that exist in the Department of Reconstruction? Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) told us that in the Department of Agriculture they established floor prices, but the ceiling prices were established by the wartime prices and trade board. If controls are necessary, why not have the ceiling prices of agricultural products established by the Department of Agriculture or by the Minister of Agriculture; and under his authority, so that he will be responsible for the matter in parliament? That is one suggestion. The same thing applies to all departments.

Instructions have been given to reduce the staff of all departments by ten per cent, to fire mostly minor employees such as stenographers, clerks, messengers, and so on. Why not dispense with the useless, dead branches of duplication? It is easy to do.

I will not speak much longer, sir, because all the discussions which are carried on in the house, even when fine and eloquent speeches are made, are purely academic. There is no result. I remember one day that six members of parliament obtained what they wanted by uniting; and the matter in point was not one of national importance. It concerned steel pipes. There were six members—one was from British Columbia, another from Winnipeg and I do not remember where the others were from—who joined together to call on the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, and complain about the high price, or the increase of price by the prices board with regard to steel pipes. It was not a matter of national importance, but they went there and said to them, "Gentlemen, if you do not reduce those prices to what they were before, we will vote against you." They obtained what they wanted. Everything was all right and the prices were changed, although it had been found by the prices board that the prices were too high.

I have not always had the support that I expected to have on matters of public interest, and although I respect the opinions of others I do not despair of the future, because in a matter of minor importance last year the House of Commons was turned upside down by the new members on the question of whether we would have Canada day or Dominion day, a matter of very little importance. But the senate argued for weeks and months about it. They did not know whether it should be Canada day or Dominion day. Why discuss it? We must have Dominion day; there is no reason for having Canada day when there is one single member who is against it and who prefers Dominion day as a sign of colonialism. But here in the house one vote was 26 to 165, and among the twenty-six were thirteen cabinet ministers, while among the 165 were two cabinet ministers. All votes were most interesting. The discussion lasted a day. Although it concerned a matter of minor importance, everybody was concerned about it, and the rank and file won the day in the House of Commons, which shows that we can expect something for the future if members first know what they want and then unite for that particular purpose. It was done last year. It could be done today in matters of greater importance.

Mr. KNOWLES: We also had a vote last year on the price of milk.

Mr. POULIOT: Exactly, and it was forgotten very quickly, unfortunately.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not by the people.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not say by the people. The vote was significant but the result was nil. I regretted not being in the house that day, because I would have voted with my hon. friends. I arrived in the evening, and that occurred in the afternoon. But it was well done. The hon. member who has just spoken got a promise, but if I am not mistaken that promise turned out to mean nothing. With regard to the Canada day business the House of Commons did its duty; then the Senate was all mixed up; finally the legislation stayed on the table and we did not hear of it again. It is a question of peace, of not drawing a red herring across the trail, of being quiet and good in order not to hurt those who think we should continue to have Dominion day instead of Canada day. We can carry on like that in regard to various small matters, but when the time comes to discuss important matters it seems to me the essential distinction is not made between important matters and minor questions.

I do not despair of the future. I still hope for a better future, but we shall have it only if men who have a definite purpose unite and follow the example of those who were so successful in having the price of steel pipes reduced to what it was before, and if the members of the house will continue to do as well for public business as they did for Canada day last year. Am I right or wrong to hope for a better future? It all depends upon my colleagues. More than that, sir, I believe the distinction between political parties is a pure farce. I am a Liberal at heart and proud of it, but I do not see how a Liberal could stand for a socialist measure like this control by independent boards. I am bitterly opposed to it. Control under the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley); control under the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott); control under any minister responsible to parliament; that is one thing. The Minister of Justice is responsible to parliament for the mounted police. He brings in a report. That is all right; I do not complain about it. But everything should be like that. Now we must admit we have been remiss in our duty by not making the necessary distinctions and by letting those mushrooms grow in such numbers that the government and even the House of Commons—because the government is no worse than the house—are afraid to abolish these controls. Why not replace them by controls responsible to parliament, so that members of parliament will have their say; so that members of parliament will be heard when they make representations on behalf of the taxpayers of this country who happen to be their constituents and who are entitled to justice from anyone.

I wonder how many hon. members have read the resolution sponsored by the Minister of Justice. It reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war—

Mark this, sir.

> —and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act—

That is the first thing. The second is:

—and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

In the first place, we are to have the creation of new boards and commissions; there are not enough already. In the second place, provision is made for the continuation of the present state of affairs. Then, how are we to reduce bureaucracy? We are creating more and more bureaucrats all the time. Bill No. 25 created more boards, more advisers, more men who will come from outside to supplant parliament, more termites who will destroy the pillars of the state, and now we are to have still more and more. Nearly everybody is for it, and there are philosophical dissertations about controls. "We like them". "We don't like them". "We think they are necessary". "We think they are not necessary", and no action is taken. I believe in the sincerity of all my colleagues who are so kind to me, but may I tell them that my faith will be greater the day members unite to interview the government and notify them they will cease their support if they do not make necessary changes, and if we do not have responsible instead of irresponsible controls.

Mr. REAL CAOUETTE (Pontiac) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the resolution now before the house is simply the continuation of the administrations, controls and plans set up on account of the war.

The war ended in 1945, almost two years age, and the "plan makers" are still trying to persuade the people that the continuation of control measures is necessary and that their abolition would be detrimental to the economic stability of Canada. Where, in 1947, is economic stability to be found in our country? Strikes are going on across the country, production has sharply decreased and our wealth and available products are very unequally distributed. Black markets are rampant all over the country and we wonder why they should exist in Canada. Why were there no black markets in 1939 and how is it they exist in 1947? Why did they exist during the war? It is easy, very easy, to understand. In 1939, we had not controls, whereas these controls exist in 1947, as they did during the war. Therefore, these controls are the cause of black markets. How can we do away with black markets unless we begin by abolishing controls? In order to illustrate what I have in mind, I should like to read to the house an article which appeared in the newspaper Vers Demain, edition of March 1, 1947, under the title: "Subsidies vs. controls."

When stores are full but pockets empty, the unsold goods remain outside the home. One recalls the depression, when neither dealers nor customers were satisfied. When pockets are full but stores empty, non-existent goods remain outside the home. Such is too often the case today, when neither dealers nor customers are satisfied.

What applies to dealers and customers is also true of landlords and tenants, since houses are goods, and equally so of doctors and patients, since professional services provide for certain needs.

Therefore, two conditions are required:

First, the goods must exist.

Second, consumers must have money to pay for the goods.

In other words, we have on the one side goods and money on the other, that is farmers, industrialists, workers of all kinds, who produce abundantly and buyers who pay well.

How can the first condition be met? Through an ever-expanding production of consumer goods of which Canada has already proved herself capable.

Everything that encourages production helps to produce goods. Everything that discourages production tends to cause shortages.

When do we encourage production?

When we enable the producer to sell his goods at a profitable price.

When do we discourage production?

When we prevent the producer from selling his products or when we compel him to sell them at an unprofitable price.

Who should determine the selling price?

The seller because he knows how much his products cost him.

A reasonable selling price includes the cost of production plus an adequate margin of profit. Only the dealer or the producer are in a position to determine the selling price. They cannot sell at a loss; if they do, they cannot earn a living. They cannot demand prohibitive prices, otherwise their competitors will undersell them.

What happens when the wartime prices board in Ottawa determines the prices of goods throughout the country? Every producer who for that reason must sell at a loss or without profit first decreases his production, hoping to better is before long; if the system lasts, he finally sells his cattle or his farm, his machinery or his factory. As a result, goods cease to flow toward the market.

Do controls therefore cause production to drop? Certainly, as experience has proved. Before controls came into being, everything was plentiful. Since they have been brought into effect, any number of products are in short supply.

Free enterprise, unhampered by dictatorial boards and their inspectors, has always been capable of mass production. Controls, state-management, have not only shackled freedom but have also hindered production.

How can plentiful supply be brought back? By the removal of controls set up because of the war.

Will the lifting of controls not cause prices to increase? Yes, rents and the price of various commodities will rise to a level which will bring profits to owners and producers, which is quite normal. That is needed to bring back plentiful supply and widespread house building projects.

But will consumers be able to afford the various commodities? Yes; if their purchasing power is increased to the price level.

Will it therefore be necessary to raise all salaries? No, because such a step would bring prices still higher.

How can the purchasing power be increased while salaries remain at their present level? One method consists in subsidizing the retail trade, as was done during the war with regard to certain commodities. Thus, milk distributors wanted 12 cents a quart instead of 10 cents. Housewives continued to pay the latter price.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! I wish to draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that a rule of the house, which is unfortunately not sufficiently adhered to, forbids the reading of speeches. I take the liberty of interrupting the hon. member for the following reason: I wish to explain to him that the reading of speeches is forbidden in order to prevent any hon. member from expressing the views of persons who do not have the privilege of being members of this house. The hon. member, who is reading from a newspaper, is not expressing his own views but is only repeating someone else's opinions. I would therefore ask the hon. member to stop reading from that newspaper and to express his own views.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall continue with my speech. During the war, subsidies to retailers took care of the price and control of milk. The government paid a subsidy of two cents per quart on milk. The consumer did not have to pay any more for his milk, and the producer and distributor received a two cents subsidy for each quart of milk. What has the government done since the end of the war? They have maintained harmful controls and they have abolished beneficial subsidies. As soon as controls give way to subsidies, farmers will start producing instead of selling their equipment, their live stock and everything they need for production. Prior to the control era, they were able to tend their farms and give something to Canada. The granting of subsidies will be an incentive to production. Retailers will secure a fairer distribution of goods and the price he wants, buyers will pay less, and the government will have accomplished its function, that of providing the consumers with adequate supplies of goods and giving them satisfaction as to quality.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is the only way of encouraging production in Canada. The C.C.F. demand still more control. They keep on asking for controls and they never talk about suppressing them. They want controls for the people and not for themselves. They wish neither to control themselves nor to be controlled, but to subject the people to controls. It is claimed by some that there is a shortage of goods in this country. The hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) said a moment ago that we wanted sugar in Canada.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): There is a shortage the world over.

Mr. CAOUETTE: I know quite well that in certain towns people have hoarded 500, 600 and even 700 pounds of sugar—which proves there was some sugar to be had—because they feared a shortage. Such hoarding took place throughout Canada. Others purchased 50 pounds, whole cases of butter, without surrendering ration coupons. Now some people imagine that it is absolutely necessary to subject Canadians to rationing.

Mr. Speaker, there is not to my knowledge a single member of the house who, because of rationing, has had to go without sugar, butter and clothing although our constituents and the citizens of this country in general were subjected to rationing. Even in the parliamentary restaurant there is no shortage of sugar; we get all we want. And yet, Mr. Speaker, I know of miners, workers and poor families who are short of sugar, of butter, of the necessities of life. Are we to spend our time trying to find means to prevent them from satisfying their needs?

Instead of gauging the rations on Canadian stomachs, the stomachs have to conform to the size of the rations obtainable with the coupons. Such a system is undesirable. Canadians prefer subsidies, so that our country may enjoy plenty. I was saying that the hon. members do not like rationing as it applies to them, nor controls for that matter.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Neither do we like them for others.

An hon. MEMBER: You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): We do not like them for others either. You cannot read.

Mr. CAOUETTE: They do not like controls as they apply to them and I maintain they have no right to vote for controlling their electors. Our constituents have elected us to serve them. They must be just as important as the members of this house. They are entitled to their own opinions about food, just as much as the members of this house, including the hon. member for Rimouski. I know that certain hon. members from Quebec will support the resolution, not because their electors are in favour of it, but because they have to submit to party discipline. Party politics are paramount to the common good and to the electors.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't be ridiculous.

Mr. CAOUETTE: I would not be at all surprised to hear in the very near future that some hon. members from the province of Quebec who voted for the resolution will have to face delegations of electors from their various constituencies.

An hon. MEMBER: Is that a threat?

Mr. CAOUETTE: In order to avoid meeting them in their hometown station, some of these hon. members will have to flee across fields and jump over fences when they get off the train.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I wish to point out to him that he is now speaking in parliament and that he is using language unworthy of the chamber in which he is heard.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Mr. Speaker, I do not want it said that I am in favour of the regimentation of our men, women and children, under a government dominated by finance and controllers. I shall vote against the resolution with the utmost energy and if our financial set-up does not permit at this time the granting of the logical and necessary subsidies we are claiming in order to promote and stimulate production, it is no fault of mine. Let the government take the necessary steps in this direction or else we will be forced some day to see that it is replaced unless it reassumes its sovereignty in the near future.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, which of these two philosophies—controls or subsidies—is one of selfishness paving the way for the Soviets. My hon. friend the member for Rimouski (Mr. Belzile) shall have to speak more intelligently the next time, otherwise his remarks will boomerang against him.

If the members of parliament think they are intelligent enough to take care of themselves, they must admit that their electors are also capable of doing the same. Therefore, controls must be done away with and replaced by subsidies which will stabilize our economy by stimulating production and making distribution easier.

I have one further remark to make, Mr. Speaker. We no longer need the bureaucrats who, throughout Canada, as everyone knows, have the duty of distributing ration coupons, which are used for depriving us of our fair share of goods, under the pretext that we must have an uninterrupted production and a more equitable distribution. Instead of paying bureaucrats for rationing the people who pay their salaries, the government should compel them to produce, so that we may have a greater abundance from which all Canadians will benefit.

Mr. L. DIONNE (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up the time of the house to refute the unfounded statements which in the course of his remarks the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) has repeated in reading a newspaper article, but I must register an emphatic protest against the untrue statement which the hon. member made when he said that it was possible to obtain plenty of butter and sugar in the parliamentary restaurant. That is a falsehood and I ask all hon. members of this house to contradict me if I do not speak the truth.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Mr. Speaker, I did not say what is rationed in parliament, I was referring to sugar. When I stated that it could be obtained in any quantity, I was right and I stand by what I said.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): You mentioned butter and sugar.

Mr. CAOUETTE: I mentioned sugar only.

(Text):

Mr. E. B. McKAY (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly on the resolution and refer particularly to the subject of price control. I hope I shall not delay the house too long because I should like to see this measure carried as quickly as possible.

During the course of the war, controls as they related to food and other commodities achieved the ends for which they were intended. They maintained a price level high enough to encourage maximum production and at the same time by the payment of subsidies, they prevented an undue rise in the price of goods to the consumer. The payment of subsidies repaid the Canadian people ten to one according to a statement credited to Mr. Donald Gordon, former chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, and reported in the Toronto Daily Star of March 19. Therefore subsidies have not been a costly experiment but, on the contrary, have held the price level for consumer goods down to a figure which has saved every Canadian householder hundreds of dollars.

The policy of the Canadian government in purchasing goods from abroad in bulk quantities assured a continuance of the largest possible supply of tropical products such as tea, coffee, citrus fruits and vegetable oils. Rationing assured to everyone a reasonable supply of the essential foods, and I must commend the government at this time for the control policy which they followed during the exacting war years.

But the policy of decontrol which they are at present following must be viewed with some alarm. The present policy is forcing the cost of living higher day by day and should have been withheld until goods are in more plentiful supply.

The advocates of decontrol would like to make the public think that, freed from restriction, business would serve the consumer just as well as, if not better than under the price control system, but it appears obvious to everyone now that, without controls, prices will seek the level they have reached in the United States. United States business pledged to hold prices but, when controls were removed, prices in the period from June to December, 1946, rose 15 per cent and are still rising. The real income of workers and farmers decreased accordingly. The people affected the greatest and those in most distressing circumstances are people on small incomes, old age pensioners, disabled veterans and widowed mothers with large families to support. Many can recall the real distress and suffering which was the lot of the same groups in the early twenties, when prices soared to unreasonable heights. In parts of western Canada sugar in 1920 sold for thirty cents a pound, bread at twenty cents a loaf, shoes for $20 a pair and clothing at double the usual prices.

I do not believe that anyone wishes a repetition of those conditions unless it be the people who make enormous profits out of a rising market. Complete decontrol now will ultimately lead to such a situation. It is well on the way. Prices in the United States are at present higher than in 1920, with but few exceptions. The policy of too hasty decontrol being followed by this country is causing an alarming increase in prices here which will soon overtake the high prices in the United States. In Montreal, according to the Montreal Gazette of February 4, 1947, pastries and rolls were up over the preceding month by ten per cents; shortening, thirty-three per cent; raisins, twenty-five per cent, and milk, fifty per cent. Bedding, soap and clothing are still advancing. Since the ceiling was removed from maple syrup the price advanced from $3 to $5 a gallon, or an increase of 66⅔ per cent.

On the prairies, farm machinery advanced 12½ per cent, gasoline two cents a gallon, and binder twine, $7.50 per 100 pounds. The ceiling has been removed on distillate and gasoline quite recently and it is expected that these commodities will also register another advance. When prices rise on goods which the farmer must have, his cost of production is certain to increase.

The prices of what the farmer sells in normal times are for the most part determined by export trade levels and are today set by the long-term agreements negotiated by the government. The principle of these agreements was accepted by the C.C.F., with the proviso that prices on consumer goods would be held down by the continuance of the price control policy of the government. It is obvious that the farmer's position will be worsened by the decontrol policy followed by the government today, and it is grossly unfair to hold the prices down on commodities the farmer has to sell, while allowing other prices to soar. The farmer's operating costs are increasing substantially, while the price he will receive for his primary products will be virtually unchanged until 1950. For this very reason concern about the increase of prices on consumer goods is most extensive in the west, particularly amongst the farming population, according to a recent Gallup poll.

The income of the farmer has been to a large extent set. If prices of consumer goods are allowed to advance it will be equivalent to a reduction in the prices realized for his primary products.

In so far as labour is concerned, the complaint is registered by labour organizations that there has been a general advance in prices all along the line, and there has not been a corresponding wage increase. This is equivalent to a wage cut and a lower standard of living for the workers. Wage increases gained by labour last year after, in many cases, a most difficult struggle, have been wiped out by increased costs of consumer goods. The Toronto district labour council, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of March 10, by resolution called upon labour immediately to seek wage increases in order to meet the increased cost of living. This is the direct result of the government's decontrol policy.

Big business is demanding higher profits before increasing production. In this way they hope to force the government to hasten the decontrol process. A similar attitude prevailed in 1939 in connection with the production of war supplies when industry held out for larger profits before signing war contracts. The government's hand was forced then and it is apparent it is being forced again. When big business takes this attitude it is on strike just as much as the worker who walks off his job and joins the picket line. The difference is that the government meets the demands of industry for higher prices which come out of the consumer's pockets, but does not come to the aid of workers in need, as, for example, the steel workers at Hamilton last year and the coal miners in the maritimes now who are on strike for nothing more than a living wage.

Big business argues that increased wages materially increase costs of production. Of course there is some increase, but not to the extent which is claimed. Every wage increase, small though it may be, brings demands from the manufacturer for increased prices for his goods. But wage increases do not appreciably increase the cost of production unless they are very large. In the United States it was revealed in the eighteenth quarterly report of the O.P.A. that the percentage of price increases for fifteen major industries, which include petroleum, food, iron and steel, and textiles between January and September, 1946, required to cover wage rises was only 2·5 per cent, but the actual price increase demanded of the public by the same industries was a little less than eighteen per cent, or seven times more than was necessary to meet the increased labour costs. When consumers are informed that labour costs have increased the prices of consumer goods they should keep in mind these figures so that they may be able to place the responsibility for the high prices they pay where it rightly belongs.

The decontrol policy of the government is not popular with the great mass of Canadian people. In January of this year, sixty-six per cent of the people interviewed by the Canadian institute of public opinion registered their disapproval of the removal of price control. This represents a cross-section of the Canadian public and may be considered as a fairly accurate gauge of public reaction to increasing prices. If two-thirds of the Canadian public are opposed to decontrol of prices at this time I suggest to my Progressive Conservative and Social Credit friends that such a large percentage of the Canadian public must include a good many Conservatives and social crediters who do not approve their party's stand on this matter.

More recently a survey conducted by the same institute revealed that the public was still of the same mind. In answer to a question, "If it were your job to decide the first problem to be tackled by parliament at Ottawa which of these would you put at the top of the list?" there followed a list of important problems facing the Canadian people, but at the top of the list in the answers was placed the control of prices and the cutting of taxes. Everyone recognizes that these are the two items which figure largely in the family budget. The government is reducing expenditures so that there is promise of tax reductions, but the policy of decontrol which the government is now following, at a time when production has not yet caught up with demand for consumer goods, is increasing prices contrary to the wish of the great mass of the Canadian public.

One must assume that the government, by continuing such a programme is being dictated to by big business who are the only people which can benefit by decontrol; big business represented by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association which in Toronto on January 28 of this year called for a removal of price control as soon as possible.

Consumers are of the opinion, as revealed by surveys to which I have referred, that controls should be maintained until goods are in plentiful supply. They should be retained until production has reached a stage at which they can be removed without increasing prices of goods to consumers. Should prices increase much more, they will reach a level that will discourage buying, since people will not have money enough to go around. A surplus of goods will then result which, in turn, will cause lessened production with unemployment in its wake.

Controls should be maintained as an anti-inflationary measure. There is less inflation in Canada as a result of the government's war policy of price control than in the United States. But we are rapidly nullifying the effect of this policy by removing controls too quickly. Inflation is always to be feared. A boom is inevitably followed by a slump. Westerners can remember only too well the effects of the slump in the thirties when, according to the Rowell report, page 175, table III, the following prices were paid in Saskatchewan in 1932: wheat, thirty-five cents a bushel; rye, twenty-four cents a bushel; cattle, $20 per head; oats, thirteen cents; barley, nineteen cents; eggs, 8½ cents a dozen; butterfat, fourteen cents a pound.

No one in his right senses wants a return of such conditions. But the policy of too rapid decontrol will lead to it. Present policies are causing inflation. Inflation can have but one result—recession or depression. The government must assume responsibility for the high prices which consumers must pay in the immediate future if its present programme is continued. It will be held responsible for the aftermath which will follow. I appeal to the government to reimpose controls on all essential commodities before it is too late and to discontinue its policy of decontrol as soon as it is humanly possible to do so.

Public opinion is demanding that the price line be held. Old age pensioners are asking for it; the disabled veteran is hoping for it, and both the worker and the farmer are insisting upon it. On these grounds, we in this corner of the house appeal to the government to take immediate action to arrest the upward trend of prices of consumer goods so that the Canadian people may not be the victims of the distress and suffering that such a policy engenders.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I hope I shall not be considered out of order if I express to you and to the ministers a certain degree of sympathy for having listened to this very long debate on this particular resolution, but I feel that some value will accrue from the discussions which have taken place, because I believe there is no problem about which the people of the country are more perplexed than the question whether controls should be removed or should not be removed. It seems to me that the various parties are not so widely separated in the objective which they are striving to achieve.

I could subscribe wholeheartedly to the final remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, namely, that the country wants the government to stop the rising cost of living. I believe that every party in this house wants to prevent the cost of living from going up, but the problem which faces us, the problem which the country is interested in, is to find the method of stopping this increase in the cost of living.

From the point of view of the removal of controls, I think this debate has brought out quite clearly that there are certain controls at least which do retard production, and if production is retarded, then is there not a danger of the cost of those particular articles going up? I can give one or two examples to show where control has definitely retarded production in certain small, particular items, and these are items the production of which has been undertaken by certain returned veterans whom I have met in my own constituency. In some cases they have been able to overcome the difficulties.

I would refer to one particular type. A group of young air force men started making souvenir furniture which was placed on sale in the city of Victoria and was readily bought by United States tourists. Everyone seemed to be happy. The veterans were turning out the goods; the retail merchants were selling them, and the tourist was taking away something he could remember Victoria by. But the controllers caught up with it and said that the article produced by these veterans of the Royal Canadian Air Force was selling for more than a similar article was sold for before the war. Actually this was nothing more than a souvenir coffee table which was decorated with inlaid wood and so forth and made to look quite attractive, but the ruling was that a coffee table was a coffee table, no matter how much you dolled it up, and therefore it would have to sell at the price at which coffee tables were selling in 1939.

I wrote to various departments about the matter and got most courteous letters in reply, but the result was that no change could be made in the price, and therefore these veterans had to stop making that particular article, and so they produced no more of this souvenir furniture which was so attractive to tourists coming to Victoria.

I would illustrate that type of control by another example. I refer to two veterans who started crushing lime out of an old limestone quarry. It was what you would call a one-horse show. One veteran broke the rock and put it into the crusher, and the other man bagged it up at the end of the crusher and took it out and distributed it to nearby farms. They were selling this crushed lime at $6 per ton bagged, and their united efforts enabled them to put through from two to three tons a day of really hard work. Oh, no! They could not sell the crushed lime at that price because there was a control upon it, and about a hundred miles away there was a quarry run by a bigger concern which was able to sell at the quarry mouth crushed limestone at $4 a ton, bagged. This happened to be on an island and there was no one going to that island to buy any of this crushed limestone at the quarry, so that the company had to ship it, and was able to ship by means of their barges to cement works in other parts of British Columbia. The selling of the limestone was very much a side issue with them. When they had a little by-product surplus which they could deliver, they were prepared to sell it to farmers next to this little quarry where these two veterans were trying to turn out the product for $6. The company were able to sell it at $11 a ton, for it had never been sold in that area at anything less than $11. Those two veterans would have been put out of business, and the farmers in urgent need of the crushed lime in that area, because of the shortage of that type of mineral in the pasture lands, would have suffered in consequence. Threatening letters were sent to the veterans. They were told that if they offered the product for sale or attempted to sell the limestone at more than $4 a ton they could be prosecuted. I must admit that in that case, after nearly six months of correspondence, it was agreed to let them go on selling the crushed limestone at $6 a ton, as a special concession.

There, I suggest, are two examples of the type of control which is retarding production. Another type of control which seems to be objectionable is the control where the administration of it costs more than the benefits that accrue from the control on the price of the goods. If you have to have a great many inspectors, administrators and agents travelling all over the country, checking on the various storekeepers, taking up their time in producing returns and proving that they are living up to every little detail of the regulations, I suggest that the cost of that administration takes away from the take-home pay of the wage-earners of the family more than is saved to the housewife of the family in getting that particular commodity at a cheap price.

It seems to me that these two types of control must definitely come off if we are to stop the increase in the cost of living.

For just a few minutes tonight I wish to refer to another form of control which to a certain extent is covered in this omnibus bill. It is not a control of prices but is, I think I could say, a control of men's habits. One of the fifty-five orders in council deals with the interim army. I wish to ask whether it is necessary to maintain an interim army at this time. We realize perfectly well why the interim forces were established after the war, during a period of uncertainty when no firm policy had been devised for the regular forces of the crown. It was necessary to have a force in the interim, an interim force, as it was called.

The pattern for the future defence force has been decided on, and we find that the army are short of recruits. Letters are being sent out from the adjutant general's branch to veterans, I presume, or to a large number of veterans—it is addressed, "Dear veterans" —asking them to come back into the forces in order to make up the numbers required not only in the active army but also in the reserve army. Yet we still keep several thousand officers and men in this interim army, and by one of these orders in council are continuing this interim army until September of this year. Surely any man who has been in that interim force has had plenty of time to decide whether he is anxious to go on soldiering in the regular forces of the crown. He can make his decision. Just because there are no vacancies, is there any reason why he should not go in? But if he does not want to go in, or if the officers of the department do not want that particular man in the regular forces, why not let him get out now? Why not let him go into industry and work producing some commodity which is urgently required? There are still men who are in neither the active force, which in the old days was called the permanent force, or in this interim force but who are still in the active army—that is the wartime army—although they have never disclosed their intention of remaining in the interim army or of going into the active force. Those men in the old war-time active army are, I presume, being retained there under the provisions which are made in these orders in council. Why do we need all these men, some of whom are unwilling soldiers?

There is another regulation which governs the behaviour, shall I say, of the army. It says that the active army and the interim army in Canada are still on active service. I suggest that is an unnecessary control on the habits, behaviour, deportment and discipline of the men of this country. Why should the army in Canada today be considered on active service? I think that is a form of unnecessary control which gives an indication of the inability of the government to release itself of powers which it obtained during the war. After some of the remarks which were made last night in this house, one is diffident about suggesting that we should copy what has been done in Great Britain. But I offer for consideration that the active army or the regular army in Great Britain is no longer on active service, while the regular army here in Canada is on active service. I cannot avoid feeling that is a ridiculous control. It affects the well-being and the method of life of the soldier who is in that force, because the scale of punishments while an army is on active service is much greater than the scale of punishments for the same military offences when the army is on its peace-time status. Theoretically, while on active service a man can be shot at dawn. I am not going to suggest it will be carried to that extreme, but the scale of punishment is much heavier on active service than it is in ordinary peace-time soldiering.

There is another point which governs or controls the lives of the soldiers. In peace time, a soldier who becomes dissatisfied with the conditions of the service or who has an opportunity of going to a better job and bettering his mode of life has the option of breaking his contract by purchasing his discharge; but as long as our army here is on active service, a soldier is not permitted to purchase his discharge. I know of a young man who decided that he would remain in the regular force, the active force, and some eighteen months ago he signed up so to do. He is a well educated boy and has become disappointed with his prospects. We know that sort of thing happens quite frequently. He has applied no less than five times to purchase his discharge. The reply has always come back—and this has been referred, so I am told, to the senior officers of the department—that "the active army of Canada is still on active service here in Canada; therefore you may not purchase your discharge." That is the case of only one individual of whom I know; probably there are others, but I think it indicates the frame of mind which may exist over on the government benches which makes it so frightfully difficult for them to relinquish the authority and power they have enjoyed.

I know this debate has revolved mainly around the question of price control as far as commodities are concerned, but I wanted to bring in these illustrations of this other form of control, namely control of our armed forces. I cannot avoid thinking that at the present time, nearly two and a half years after the end of the war, it is unnecessary to control the lives of our soldiers to such an extent that we say they are still on active service here in Canada.

I want now to mention just one other point in reference to veterans; that is, the freezing order which has prevented a veteran from occupying a house he purchased or that was purchased for him during the war. If he had occupied that house before he enlisted and went overseas I believe he could insist upon the tenant moving out; but, as the war went on, our men came back and purchased houses with their savings and gratuities, or acquired them by other means. Until now they have not been able to remove the tenants occupying those homes unless those tenants have been unsatisfactory in that they have not paid their rent, and so forth. Recently, of course, the restrictions were modified slightly, but only to a narrow extent; that is, from one fixed date to another. At the moment I have forgotten the actual dates within which the freezing order has been lifted, but I think it was up to the end of 1945. A veteran purchasing a house after that date cannot get possession of that house.

I have had brought to my attention several cases in which real hardship is being caused. I know of one veteran who is living in a bunkhouse, holding on to a job he does not want, until he can get a place to live. He has a place of his own, with some five acres of land, only a few miles away. In the middle of the war, out of the kindness of his heart, he allowed another family to move in. That family is not working the land, which is lying idle; this veteran has to keep a job he does not want, thereby preventing another man from getting that job, and his land must remain idle because he cannot remove the tenant. One could go on and give numerous cases of that kind, and I suggest that the removal of certain controls—even including those connected with rents—which make it difficult for a veteran to move into his own house should be undertaken, because that is working a definite hardship on many men who have been overseas.

To sum up, I feel that controls which retard production, controls which cost too much to administer, and controls which unnecessarily govern the lives and mode of living of men, should be removed.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, as one of those members of this house who recorded a vote against the address in reply, I should like to put the record straight to some extent by saying I was not voting against every measure or every control dealt with in the bill which will be founded on this resolution. I was recording a vote against what I consider to be the socialism it contains, and the socialism under which the control boards operated during the war. I appreciate that there will be some hardship as a result of removing controls; yet I feel that these controls are such as to lead to socialism, and therefore we should be prepared to face what hardship may result from their removal in order that we may get back to a free society and a free way of living.

I also believe that the abuses and costs under these controls are greater than the benefits derived from them by individuals or industry. I am in agreement with the statement tonight by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) against boards, controllers and enforcement officers. It seems to me that it would not be a very great step from an enforcement officer to a secret policeman; and I could cite a case exactly similar to the one cited by the hon. member. I have in mind a young veteran in Toronto who obtained a licence to sell used cars. This young veteran also seems to have incurred the displeasure of the wartime prices and trade board office in that city, because he has been persecuted. Every person to whom he sold a car was interviewed by the enforcement officer and, I am informed, practically threatened by that officer that, unless he disclosed the exact price of the car, and unless he was prepared to inform against this used car salesman, he was in danger of being prosecuted by the government. Some of these people saw an opportunity to say they had paid more than the ceiling price, and to make a claim against this veteran. Others were terrified and came to him saying, "What can we do? This enforcement officer has called on us and said all these things, when we know it was a legitimate purchase." That veteran has been in court twice; he has been fined thousands of dollars, and he informs me that this enforcement officer has said he will put him out of business.

Those are some of the abuses which can take place under an organization such as the wartime prices and trade board. Just about a year ago, in agreeing with the hon. member for Temiscouata that these boards should be responsible to parliament, I suggested in this house that Mr. Gordon, who was then chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, should be brought into the house, not only to relieve the then Minister of Finance of the onerous burden he was carrying—perhaps the budget was a result of that—but also to make him responsible to parliament. I also advocated that, for this reason, I felt that one who had been so remote from the public, as the then chairman of the wartime prices and trade board had been, would find it a healthy and refreshing experience to face the electorate of Canada, and that the electorate of Canada would have had an opportunity to express their opinion of the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board. I thought it would be a healthy procedure all round, and the Minister of Finance would also have been relieved of the burden of defence which he had at that time.

I have one further observation to make before asking Your Honour for the privilege to adjourn the debate. It was my opinion last summer, and it still is, that the unfortunate intervention of the then chairman of the wartime prices and trade board in the steel strike was the cause of prolonging that strike and bringing hardship to the labourers and union men in Hamilton; and that had he not made his ten-cent speech, had he not been supported by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), the strike could have been settled in a much shorter time.

How foolish all these ministers and controllers must feel now, when they recall that they said a ten-cent increase in pay for the steel workers would break the price ceiling! How foolish the Minister of Labour must feel, when he recalls that he rose time and time again and said, "You cannot have price control without wage control"—and now, only a few months later, the government has removed wage controls and is still struggling to maintain price control.

On motion of Mr. Skey the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

MERCHANT MARINE—GRANTS OR ALLOWANCES FOR WAR SERVICE

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni):

1. Are any gratuities, allowances or grants paid to members of the merchant marine who served during the war years?

2. If so, how do they compare with payments to those who served in the armed forces?

3. If not, what steps have been taken by the government to grant these men gratuities and allowances?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned:—

1. The monthly remuneration of able seamen was increased to a basic rate of $89.93, to which was added a war risk bonus of $44.50, making a total of $134.43 per month.

Income tax was paid on the basic rate only, war risk bonus and subsistence being exempted.

A special bonus of 10 per cent was paid on gross earnings, for a minimum period of six months' service in dangerous waters prior to April 1, 1944, provided a seaman signed an agreement to serve for two years or the duration of the war, or alternatively, signed an agreement to join a reserve of seamen to serve if called upon. Merchant seamen who have received a special bonus for service prior to April 1, 1944 are eligible to participate in the Veterans Insurance Act.

A war service bonus of 10 per cent on gross earnings was paid for service subsequent to April 1, 1944 until the end of the war, for seamen who served on agreement or were listed as permanent employees of a Canadian company.

Leave on pay at the end of each year on agreement, at the cumulative rate of two days for each month of service, was allowed, together with round trip rail transportation from a manning pool to the seaman's home, at the low cost of one-third of the one way fare.

Merchant seamen on agreement on completion of service were entitled to receive railway transportation from the port of discharge to their place of permanent domicile.

During service on a manning pool two year agreement a merchant seaman, if incapacitated for sickness or injury, received basic pay for a maximum period of twelve weeks.

Merchant seamen who qualified for the special bonus are entitled to vocational training to assist them to advance in their profession at sea.

Merchant seamen who left civil employment to serve at sea during the war are entitled to the benefits of the reinstatement in Civil Employment Act.

Pension for disability incurred from enemy action or counter-action is payable to merchant seamen serving on any Canadian ship, and to Canadian merchant seamen serving on ships of allied nations employed in service essential to the prosecution of the war. A disability pensioner is entitled to free medical care, with allowances during hospitalization for his pension disability, and is eligible to participate in the benefits of the Veterans Land Act and the Veterans Insurance Act. If debarred by their disability from following their former profession of seamen, they may be given vocational training under the Veterans Rehabilitation Act for any occupation.

In case of death from similar causes, widows and dependent children are pensionable.

A Canadian merchant seaman in receipt of a pension from an allied nation is entitled, during residence in Canada, to have his pension raised to the Canadian scale.

Merchant seamen detained by the enemy received a detention allowance, equivalent to their basic pay and war risk bonus, and also the special bonus. Dependents of merchant seamen who were detained by the enemy received appropriate portions of this detention allowance for their maintenance, the balance being paid to the seaman on his return to Canada.

Unemployment insurance coverage for merchant seamen came into effect on October 1, 1946, and by a special provision under the act seafarers have been placed on a parity for unemployment insurance purposes with Canada's wartime armed forces. Under this provision many seamen are given credit for wartime service without payment of contributions after they have become established in insurable employment.

Medical and dental care is extended to pensioners while men on service are covered by the sick mariners fund and Merchant Seamen's Compensation Act.

2. It would be very difficult to make such a comparison, inasmuch as the benefits differ so widely.

3. What did it cost the government to collect same?

4. What race tracks or associations did the government make grants to?

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—MOTOR VEHICLES—TRANSFER FROM OTTAWA TO OTHER STORAGE DEPOTS

Mr. FRASER:

1. Were any motor vehicles, owned or stored by any branch of the armed services of Canada, transferred from depots or storage in the city of Ottawa, or depots or storage within ten miles of Ottawa, to other depots or storage space in Ontario?

2. If so (a) how many vehicles were transferred by each department; (b) to what place were these vehicles transferred?

3. Were any of the above vehicles transferred to the war assets corporation?

4. If so, of what make and number?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

VETERANS LAND ACT—KAMLOOPS—VALLEYVIEW PROJECT

Mr. FULTON:

For a copy of any report or reports made to the Minister of Veterans Affairs following the recent special investigation into the cost, construction and condition of the houses in the "Valleyview" project built under the Veterans' Land Act at Kamloops, B.C., and particularly of any recommendation as to refinancing submitted therewith.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I understood a week ago when the reports were tabled that my hon. friend would be prepared to drop this motion.

Mr. FULTON: I am prepared to drop the motion, but I would ask the minister whether he will give instructions that the report he tabled on Friday be printed. Such instructions were not given, and it is not possible for members to obtain copies through the distribution office. Will the minister have a limited number printed so that members may have it?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall have to consider that.

Motion dropped.

HOUSING—VETERANS LAND ACT

Mr. MURPHY:

For a copy of all correspondence, contracts or agreements, or other documents in lieu of agreements entered into by the government, or any department or agency of the government, between January 1, 1943, and February 25, 1947, with architects, for plans and specifications, or either, for use in constructing homes under the Veterans' Land Act.

HOUSING—VETERANS LAND ACT

Mr. MURPHY:

For a copy of all correspondence, contracts or agreements, or other documents in lieu of agreements entered into by the government, or any department or agency of the government, between January 1, 1943 and February 25, 1947, concerning veterans' homes and holdings, in each province, for each area where three or more homes have been built under Veterans' Land Act.

Mr. LENNARD: The hon. member for Lambton West is pleased to have the motion dropped on the understanding that he may redraft it and have it put back on the order paper.

Motion dropped.

HOUSING—VETERANS LAND ACT—BOUCHERVILLE, QUE.

Mr. MURPHY:

For a copy of all correspondence, contracts, agreements, memoranda and other documents in lieu of contracts entered into by the government, or any department or agency of the government, between January 1, 1943 and February 25, 1947, concerning veterans' homes and holdings at Boucherville, Quebec; also copy of all time sheets and invoices in connection with the above.

Also a copy of plans and specifications for each house constructed in the above area.

Mr. TUCKER: The subject matter of the motion is sub judice, both in the criminal and in the civil courts. I must ask that the motion be dropped.

Mr. LENNARD: Stand.

Mr. TUCKER: No; dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. LENNARD: The hon. member is not here. It stands.

Mr. TUCKER: The matter is sub judice both in the criminal and in the civil courts. There are several prosecutions involved and there is a civil action so that the matter is sub judice in every way. I ask that the motion be dropped.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, this is the second or third time that this reason has been advanced by the government for not answering a question. I only want to raise this point of order, that I do not think the fact that the matter is sub judice is necessarily a good defence to not answering the question. I think the matter should be cleared up.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that, the matter being sub judice, the question cannot be answered.

Mr. GRAYDON: But the question cannot be sub judice. It only calls for the production of certain documents which might be used in the trial, but the question is not a sub judice matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the matter has been referred to the courts, it is sub judice.

ELDORADO GOLD MINES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

For a copy of the evidence taken in connection with the investigation of Eldorado Gold Mines Limited and an alleged conspiracy by Carl French, Marcel Pochon and Boris Pregel to defraud the said company and the report by the commissioner, Mr. Glassco in connection therewith.

Mr. HOWE: I have previously reported to the house that the information asked for in this return is not yet in possession of the government. I have however made inquiries and I find that even if the information were in the hands of the government it could not be tabled, for the reason that it contains information which is of a secret character affecting other governments as well as the government of Canada. The hearings were held in camera, for reasons that appealed to the attorney general of the province of Ontario as justifying that procedure. It was at the request of another government that the hearings were held in camera, and the reasons for secrecy are as firm today as they were at that time. Therefore I must advise that it is not in the public interest to table the information.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Will the minister file the reasons for the change in attitude towards the three men, Carl French, Marcel Pochon and Boris Pregel? I understand they were committed for trial—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that these motions are not debatable. I will permit him to ask a question of the minister, if that is his intention, but I cannot permit a debate.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am not debating the motion; I am making a request of the minister, because if we are for ever to be bound by answers such as the one just given, whether proper or not, we cannot discharge our responsibilities. I am asking the minister whether he will not place on the table of the house the reasons why, after these men were committed for trial, a decision was made by the government that criminal proceedings should not be gone on with, but that civil proceedings should be substituted therefor.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to table the letter from Mr. John Robinette, the prosecutor appointed by the Department of Justice, and also the letter from the Department of Justice which conveyed Mr. Robinette's letter to me.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will the full story be in those?

Mr. STEPHENSON: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have just reminded the hon. member for Lake Centre that these motions are not debatable, and I would ask that other hon. members be guided by what I said to him. May I point out that the Speaker is not responsible for these rules; they are the rules of the house. If hon. members are not satisfied with the rules of the house, they know what they should do.

HOUSING—VETERANS' LAND ACT—BRAEFOOT ESTATE PROJECT, VANCOUVER ISLAND

Mr. PEARKES:

For a copy of the report of the joint investigating committee, under the chairmanship of Mr. McCarter, appointed to investigate the cost and construction of the houses built under the Veterans' Land Act on the Braefoot estate project at Saanich, Vancouver Island, British Columbia.

Mr. PEARKES: As this report was included as an appendix to a larger report, may the motion be dropped?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Thank you. I may say that I was overgenerous. I had a second report ready for my hon. friend.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY ACT AND AMENDMENTS THERETO

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs.: Beaudry, Bertrand (Prescott), Brooks, Cote (Verdun), Fair, Fournier (Maisonneuve-Rosemont), Gariepy, Gladstone, Hackett, Hazen, Kirk, Lockhart, MacInnis, MacNicol, Marier, Marquis, McKay, Murphy, Mutch, Richard (Gloucester), Ross (Hamilton East), Sinclair (Vancouver North), Sinclair (Ontario), Stirling, Zaplitny, be appointed to study the several amendments to the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, and amendments thereto, suggested by the chief electoral officer, to study the said act, to suggest to the house such amendments as the committee may deem advisable, and report from time to time, with power to send for persons, papers and records and to print the proceedings, and that the provisions of section 1 of standing order 65 be waived in respect of this committee.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Before this motion is debated, Mr. Speaker, I have a word of praise for Mr. Jules Castonguay, chief electoral officer. He is a most remarkable civil servant because he answers the letters he gets the day he receives them. He should be mentioned as an example to many others.

I have been interested in Mr. Castonguay from the beginning, when he was paid $4,000 a year. He was working very hard and was doing the work that another man, who was the grandson of a prime minister, did not do and for which he was paid $12,000. At that time I brought the matter up and was delighted that some consideration was given to Mr. Castonguay. He deserves special mention because he gathered the votes from all over the country at the last election. He has shown his efficiency. If he makes a recommendation to improve the act, I shall probably find it a good recommendation.

We have had experience of the unequal operation of the elections act. Before 1930 the election act was satisfactory; it was a good act. Between 1930 and 1935 it was changed by the administration of the day and made complicated and unsatisfactory. After the general election of 1935 the Liberal party decided to improve it. Then a committee met, in the daytime and at night, for a whole session, but it was impossible for them to reach a conclusion. The following session they met again. They fought hard, had bitter discussions, worked day and night, and finally made a report which was excellent. Do you know what it was, sir? The report recommended that the Bennett act be repealed and replaced by the previous act, something which could have been done by a very short bill without imposing so much work on the committee. But it was necessary to keep the members busy and to chase all evil thoughts from their minds. That is probably the only purpose achieved by the elections committee during the two sessions in which they worked so hard without accomplishing very much. My hope is that this time the members of the committee will not be fooled by such proposals, that they will have something serious before them and that their work will not be in vain.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. C. W. G. Gibson.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REPORTED CLOSING OF D.V.A. HOSPITAL AT SYDNEY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs arising out of telegrams which I have been receiving from veterans' organizations in Nova Scotia with regard to the proposed closing of the Department of Veterans Affairs hospital at Sydney, Nova Scotia. Can the minister inform the house if the government have definitely decided to close this hospital, or will his department give further consideration to the matter?

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): The government has made no final decision in the matter as yet. This week the director of treatment services is down in the beautiful country whence my hon. friend comes, and when he returns I shall be able to make a further announcement to the house.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Friday, March 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, on Friday evening last we were debating the omnibus bill, and I had a few remarks to make about controls. Today I should like to follow up the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) on Friday when he proved to this house, as I believe you will agree, that controls are the essence of socialism. I say socialism cannot thrive without controls, and that socialism is contrary to human nature. That is my belief; and I address the house on this subject because on Thursday, March 20, the leader of the C.C.F. socialist party (Mr. Coldwell) laid down a challenge to this house to divide on this issue.

That is why today I choose to debate the subject that socialism is contrary to human nature.

First let me give a quotation or two. The first one is found in Benham's Quotations, and is from Dean Inge's book "Prognostications on Social Life in the Next Hundred Years". He says:

> The three strongest instincts in human nature are religion, the family, and private property.

Where does socialism come in there? Then in another place he goes on to say:

> What is called socialism is simply political bribery on a large scale.

There is only one period in history when socialism will work. That will be after the second coming, when we are in the millennium, but fortunately we will not need it then because we will have a better government. Lest you think I am biased in my quotations, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from something said by Pope Leo XIII on December 28, 1878:

> Socialists, communists and nihilists strive to uproot the foundations of civilized society.

That is taken from the New Dictionary of Quotations; and at another point in the same speech he said:

> These monstrous views—these venomous teachings . . .

Just to show that the Roman Catholic church has not changed its views I quote from something said by Pope Pius XI on May 15, 1931:

> No one can be, at the same time, a sincere Catholic and a true socialist.

My quotations today are not taken only from the clergy. I also have some from laymen, and here is what they have to say. In 1884 Herbert Spencer said:

> All socialism involves slavery.

F. J. C. Henshaw, in "A Survey of Socialism", published in 1928, said socialism is—

> The combination of religious sentimentality, industrial insanity and moral obliquity.

Then I quote the views of Mr. H. L. Mencken in "Prejudices" at page 109:

> Socialism is simply the degenerate capitalism of bankrupt capitalists . . .

That is taken from the Home Book of Quotations; and in the same quotation Mr. Mencken goes on to say:

> Its one genuine object is to get more money for its professors.

I return to the authority from whom I quoted first, Dean Inge, to quote a little couplet he wrote on the subject:

> What is a socialist? One who has yearnings
> To share equal profits from unequal earnings
> Be he idler or bungler or both he is willing > To fork out his sixpence and pocket your shilling.

I have covered the clergy and the laity, Protestant and Catholic, but I cannot for a moment forget one of our finest modern writers, one whom I am sure other hon. members admire as I do. I refer to Mr. Somerset Maugham, who once wrote a paragraph on this subject which I believe to be as pertinent as anything I have ever read. He said:

> For all the vaunted hopes and promises—there is no single instance where socialism has succeeded in bettering the lot of the common man.

You may ask, Mr. Speaker, why I have put these quotations on record. I can answer that question in a moment by saying I have done this because I have a mandate from my constituency to oppose socialism in every form in which it may find its way into this house. In my constituency are men of all religions, all races and all creeds. Since it is in the heart of Toronto you may think it is dominated by Anglo-Saxons, but that is not altogether true. It contains a great many who have their roots in central Europe, many of Polish and Ukrainian origin, many from the Baltic states, and numerous others. These men, these European-born Canadians, know what socialist and totalitarian governments mean. They do not have to be instructed in what their relatives still in Europe have suffered under those governments.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is why their relatives in Europe vote for those governments every time they have a chance.

Mr. SKEY: This may hurt my socialist friends, and I do not blame them for yapping a bit about it. I say to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) that these men whose roots are in Europe know what socialism means. They know what it is to have the iron heel of authority on their necks. They know socialism is an expanding doctrine, that socialist and totalitarian states are anxious to expand and to dominate not only Europe but this continent as well.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Tell us about R. B. Bennett's slave camps.

Mr. KNOWLES: What did your friends do to the Speaker in Ontario?

Mr. SKEY: I understand he resigned; it is a free country.

Mr. KNOWLES: It was dictation from the Tory government benches.

Mr. SKEY: We find socialism creeping in upon the country in a most interesting way. It starts with benevolence. Here are the great benefactors of the people, clothed with kindness, and with the purpose of raising up the common man! Then we move from benevolence to tolerance. As the next step they tolerate the views of the people. Then after tolerance we reach the point where they impose controls on the people. After controls there is enforcement; and after enforcement there is protection of those who are doing the enforcing. After that there is policing; and after policing there is the process of individual investigation. After that come the purges; and after that dictatorships—and finally tyranny and darkness. That is the path which we will take if we follow socialism.

Mr. KNOWLES: A perfect description of capitalism.

Mr. SKEY: Here is a quotation from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, a socialist state. The New Dictionary of Quotations contains this:

> The temporary victory of socialism in one country alone is possible, but its lasting victory in one country alone is impossible. That demands the victory of the revolution in other lands as well.

That is Joseph Stalin on Leninism, in 1926. I returned from the last war filled with admiration for the courage and bravery of the Russian soldiers who fought as our allies. But I cannot for one moment approve their philosophy of government, its teachings, its treatment of its own people or of some of the enslaved people in Europe. I am sincere in my belief that socialism will not work to the advantage of mankind. My socialist friends may be glad to hear that I am ready to admit capitalism is not all good. It has some abuses. But it is our privilege as members of a free parliament to rectify those abuses. Capitalism is subject to the law makers. We, who are the law makers, are subject to the electorate. The electorate are free to change their law makers at any time.

These times are not the times to be neutral; rather they are times to follow a positive course, to look ahead, to see the lessons of history, the lessons of the past.

In common with members of many other parliaments, we in this house have been accused by Major John W. Foote, V.C., of failing to lead the people. He is another Canadian who wears the Victoria Cross, in common with two members who belong to this party. At Fort William on March 23 Major Foote is reported by the Globe and Mail to have said that politicians are—> —mealy-mouthed and have not the brains in many instances to bring out a constructive programme.

He goes on to say:

> "Too much narrowness and bitterness is sweeping the country today, creating a gulf between races and creeds. But problems of Canadians are simple in their elementary nature. Only interest and goodwill are required for a solution." He had a word of praise for labour organizations that have purged their ranks of outside leaders.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He was speaking of Toronto.

Mr. SKEY: He was speaking at Fort William.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: But of Toronto.

Mr. SKEY: No, I think he was referring to the part of the country my hon. friend comes from, as well. I have never noticed the hon. member speaking without prejudice. Then, to quote further from the newspaper report:

> The country was in the most precarious stage of its history because of differences of opinion in various sections; there was more disunity than ever before.

I said that this is no time to be neutral, that the government would do well to follow a positive course, to trust the representatives of the people and listen to their advice. In the three sessions I have sat in parliament I have never heard either of those two hon. members, who carry the same decoration from His Majesty as is worn by Major Foote, advocate any policy in which they did not believe, or did not know was for the good of the country as a whole.

I plead with the government to forsake their controller mistresses in the ivory towers of Ottawa, and to return to the House of Commons the power to govern. This is the challenge of the times. What actually happened was that we went to sleep one night in the summer of 1945 and awoke to find atomic energy a reality—to find ourselves in a new world. History is on our doorsteps. Today we see the United States of America, a young and vigorous but perhaps immature country, summoned—challenged—to lead the world. We in the Americas must respond with her, to keep the flickering light of freedom alive for western civilization. If we in Canada wish to preserve our birthright of British freedom we must be intelligent enough to understand its worth, and we must fight with all our vigour against the inroads socialism has made on this continent.

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska): Mr. Speaker, I would not have taken part in the debate had it not been for representations made to me by a considerable group of electors who signed numerous petitions calling for the abolition of all controls. I shall deal later on with the matter of these petitions, and the information which I received from those whose names appear on them. What are these so much abused controls, after all? Judging from the tone of some members of the opposition one would be led to think that they are some sort of contagious, shameful disease. This may sound impressive to the unthinking, but to those who care to give the matter serious consideration, those controls are simply part of the law of this land. It is true that in these days this law of the land is much more considerable than it was a hundred years ago, or perhaps even fifty years ago. There is no question that the volume of federal and provincial laws and orders in council and regulations made thereunder has increased considerably. All this makes an imposing amount of legislation, but it is all based upon the proper legislative authority and hence it is the law of the land. Obviously all this legislation must have been good and desirable at some time and for that reason it cannot be condemned outright without a hearing. The most that can be said of some of these regulations is that they may have outlived their usefulness and should now be repealed.

The fact that very few of them have been singled out for particular criticism goes to show that the matter of their usefulness is generally recognized. For instance, the timber controls were debated with some amount of heat in this house on March 10 and we find that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) gave very good reasons for their retention. As far as I can recall, whenever any specific control has been attacked on the floor of this house there has always been a good reply made to the criticism.

A prominent British statesman, I think it was Edmund Burke, once made a remark in a jesting mood that the best governed country was the one with the fewer laws and the fewer taxes. That may sound all right to the unthinking, but how does it measure up to the facts? Listening to hon. members opposite one would think that they agree with such a statement, but I respectfully suggest that they compare our standard of living with that of other people who have fewer laws and fewer controls. Possibly there are a number of countries or peoples in Asia or Africa which are not burdened much with either laws or taxes. I am quite sure that the natives of Africa and of many parts of Asia are not in any way bothered by irksome controls such as the stipulation that they must cover certain parts of their bodies, but if one of those people were to look into our laws, usages and customs I am sure he would find that they are unnecessary and stupid restrictions which curtail unduly our freedom, and very likely he would denounce them with the same scathing language as that used by some hon. gentlemen in the course of this debate or the debate on the address.

Our modern civilization has become quite complex within the past century. In 1846 our population was mostly rural, and our farmers bought and sold very little. Industry was in its infancy and there were few manufactured articles compared to what there are today. Consequently trade was negligible in the terms of present day language. As we progressed our economy became more diversified, even to the point where our farmers are drifting into specialized farming, something altogether unheard of one hundred years ago. With an economy becoming daily more diversified, we need more laws and regulations if we are to benefit from our progressive specialization.

At this point I wish it to be well understood that I am not suggesting that our increased volume of laws and regulations is the cause of our material advancement. I simply want to observe that it accompanies it almost invariably in every country which enjoys a standard of living similar to ours as a result of greater industrialization and a greater diversification of production. There was a time in this country when we did not have any highway laws, and very little in the nature of game laws, liquor laws, income tax laws, and so on. Does anyone suggest that the degree of freedom enjoyed by our forefathers was more desirable than our present restricted freedom and increased social scurity? I think it is impossible to make progress along the line of social security unless we impose upon ourselves certain restrictions which do not inconvenience us to any great degree. Personally, I cannot say that I have suffered very much as a result of controls and rationing. On the other hand, like all of us, I have been inconvenienced by them on more than one occasion. And at this point I feel that I should take to task the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) who is reported on page 1641 of Hansard of March 21 as having said:

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, there is not to my knowledge a single member of the house who, because of rationing, has had to go without sugar, butter and clothing although our constituents and the citizens of this country in general were subjected to rationing.

This statement can only mean one thing, namely, that there is one set of laws applying to members and another set applying to the people in general, which is a monstrous falsehood. The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) knows very well that the law is the same for everyone. He must have noticed that notwithstanding his position as member of parliament, the income tax deductions are made at the source, at the end of each month, from his indemnity cheque. The law applies to members on both sides of the house as well as to low wage-earners.

Such language reflects the demagogic and thoughtless statements which unfortunately fill the pages of the Social Credit newspaper Vers Demain of which the hon. member has quoted lengthy excerpts in his latest speech.

I said at the beginning of my remarks that representations on this contentious matter of controls were made to me by a group of my constituents. Here is the gist of their requests:

Mr. Benoit Michaud,
Member for Restigouche-Madawaska.

Sir,

The undersigned, constituents of yours, absolutely opposed to all war-time and post-war controls, express the wish that you do all you can to have them removed this very session, for the following reasons:

1. Controls are slowing down all production.

2. By curtailing production, they are causing higher prices.

3. They are depriving citizens of their freedom.

Anxious to find out if this petition was serious and justified, I sent each signer the following circular:

Sir or Madam,

Your name appears on a petition that recently reached me requesting removal of all controls. Though I do not as a rule send individual replies to signers of petitions, in this particular case, for very special reasons and without in any way undertaking to reply to signers of any future petitions. I wish to answer those who saw fit to make representations to me on this ticklish matter of controls.

In the first place, may I point out that I take little stock in representations of this character, bearing all the earmarks of a put-up job by a handful of people. I have just received from some of you a set of pink cards all bearing the signature of the same person. It is obviously a put-up job instead of a free and individual expression of opinion on the part of those whose names appear on the cards. Such is the case with most petitions that come to us.

Now, let us come to the substance of the petition.

1. Are you fully aware of the scope of your representations? No member of this house has, at yet, requested the removal of all controls.

[Mr. Michaud.]

At that time, the hon. member for Pontiac had yet to express an opinion on the matter of controls.

Are we to believe that you are better qualified than they to pass judgment on the measures which create so deep a division in the public opinion at the present time?

2. And now, if you favour the removal of certain controls in particular, let me know which, in your opinion, should be removed.

3. If you can convince me that the removal of such or such a control will cure the ills of which you are complaining, I shall be the first to demand their removal.

4. It is an easy matter for people who are in no way responsible to the population to favour one measure or another without any knowledge of their consequences. I would be very much interested in knowing how many, among the signers of the petition, would be willing to make their eternal salvation dependent on the efficiency of the measures they favour for the greater good of the greater number.

5. Finally, do you know that large organizations of your district are forwarding representations favouring the maintenance of controls? Who has the more foresight in these circumstances? Let us hope that our leaders, and their technical advisers, from the lofty observation posts they occupy, will be in a position to discover the best means of ensuring the greatest measure of material welfare to the greater part of our people.

For all the above mentioned reasons, I support the government's policy on the matter of controls, because I am convinced that their advisers are in a better position than you or I to decide what controls should be kept for a while. I consider these advisers as good doctors who prescribe bitter medicine to their patients, because it is essential to their recovery.

For your information I am enclosing copies of the five talks given by Mr. Gordon in November last. They explain much better than I could do it myself the advantages of these very irksome controls for the economic life of our country. I hope Mr. Gordon's explanations will satisfy you and help you better to understand why the government is deciding to keep certain restrictions in force for a period of time.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Hear, hear!

Mr. MICHAUD: In reply to my circular, I have received, so far, six letters. Here is the first. Listen carefully; what suaveness!

Mr. CAOUETTE: The electors know what they want.

Mr. MICHAUD:

Obviously controls are useless and serve only to favour the black market; the same applies to the speeches of dictator Donald Gordon who controlled our dollars during the depression when people starved in spite of mountain-high supplies of products and when Canadian farmers, asked not to till the soil, were paid to this end with taxes collected from the very masses who were dropping with hunger; then began the grand slaughter designed to sell Europe to Joseph Stalin in order that communism might flourish with Tito and his kind.

The same ration expert who had done so well during the depression was appointed to dictate to Canadians what their standard of living should be and to forbid them to spend as they saw fit . . .

Mr. CAOUETTE: That's right!

Mr. MICHAUD:

. . . after having collected a large proportion of their money in taxes used to present strangers with gifts and to pay interest on our wonderful debt-creating financial system.

Speaking of organization, we are setting up in every parish of the various constituencies an electors' union which will insist on results from their member of parliament.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Good!

Mr. MICHAUD: I shall leave aside the next four and quote No. 6, issued by the Organization of the New Brunswick Union of Electors. It is signed by the president, the vice-president, the secretary and five directors, one of whom is the author of the first letter. May I cite a few gems from this tirade:

The people are fed up with the promises of their politicians. One does not need a university degree to see to what extent they are being exploited by the high priests of international finance which gave rise to political parties and their stupid politicians who allow the people to have bread to eat only when guns and engines of destruction are being manufactured for their mutual destruction, under cover of democracy and Christianity.

Mr. LESAGE: Is the member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) included?

Mr. CAOUETTE: The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) is.

Mr. MICHAUD: And further:

We are not surprised, because a member of a political party must, if he wishes to share in the electoral funds, obey the orders of his party rather than the will of his electors, and controls are much more essential to dictatorships and slavery than they are to democracy and freedom. That is why dictator Donald Gordon is preaching to us over the C.B.C. network—a network for which we are paying $2 a year only to be told lies every day of the year—that selfsame Mr. Gordon who, during the depression, while people were starving to death midst products of all description piled mountain-high was personally, and through the politicians of the day, stating that people had to starve and go about in rags precisely because of that overabundance.

Mr. Speaker, I apologize for those long quotations which to me, however, appeared essential to give hon. members and the many right-minded people among my electors an idea of what is being thought and written about controls by friends of the Social Credit in my constituency. And now, listen to those gentlemen from Alberta speaking "in New France" to use a favourite expression of Vers Demain. What are, exactly, the boundaries of that New France and why that expression? Would it be that France is now ruled by a socialist government and that it seems to be rushing headlong into communism? I should like to know.

Mr. CAOUETTE: You tell your colleagues.

Mr. MICHAUD: Mr. Speaker, there is evidently no control over the language used by those gentlemen in my constituency who go on merely repeating what has been so well taught them by the newspaper Vers Demain.

Mr. CAOUETTE: That is right. They follow faithfully the example set by their representatives.

Mr. MICHAUD: If we were to believe the statements made by that newspaper which mixes religion with economics the government and the politicians, except Social Credit members, would be mere exploiters of the people. Those are revolutionary statements which do not offer any solid or constructive proposals. Those renovators of society seem to have only one purpose in mind: to destroy without knowing what they could rebuild on the ruins. The letters which I have quoted are to my mind examples of demagogic appeals to popular prejudices.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Why not explain the meaning of the word demagogue?

Mr. MICHAUD: Mr. Speaker, I listened to three speeches by the hon. member for Pontiac and I refrained from interrupting him. As my time is limited and as I am anxious to complete my remarks, I would ask the hon. member to wait until I have finished my speech; then, if I have a few minutes left I shall endeavour to answer his questions if I deem it necessary.

As I consider such language dangerous, as well as several statements which appear in Vers Demain, I would ask the Social Credit members for Alberta in this house whether they approve of such verbal excesses. I would be very much surprised if they endorse those articles. I have heard them in this house and I know that they recognize the sincerity, the integrity and the devotion of all members of parliament. While they are at it, they could tell us what they think of New France of Messrs. Even and Grégoire, of Mrs. Côté-Mercier and others.

They could tell us what they think of what happened recently to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Cloutier). As he was coming home a fairly large group of social crediters were waiting for him, for the purpose of ill-treating him—

Mr. CAOUETTE: Three social crediters—

An hon. MEMBER: A whole gang of them.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Yes, a whole gang. It takes a politician with cold feet.

Mr. MICHAUD: On the other hand, I ask the serious-minded people of my constituency—

Mr. CAOUETTE: Meaning the Liberals?

Mr. MICHAUD: —especially those with dependents, if they approve of such methods. I ask them what they think of the statement of the hon. member for Pontiac, as reported on page 1642 of Hansard, at which he clearly referred to what happened to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. I quote:

I would not be at all surprised to hear in the very near future that some hon. members from the province of Quebec who voted for the resolution will have to face delegations of electors from their various constituencies.

Those are the very words of a letter published in the Drummondville-Arthabaska newspaper by the local Social Credit leader.

Mr. CAOUETTE: We are responsible for the fear you experience. This is but the beginning.

Mr. MICHAUD: It should be noted—

Mr. CAOUETTE: Place yourself at the service of your electors before serving your party.

Mr. MICHAUD: It should be noted that I express no opinion on the principles on which the Social Credit monetary doctrine is based and to which I reserve the right of reverting later on. For the present, I shall be satisfied to reprove methods and dealings which threaten to become the rule among us. To my way of thinking they have much that resemble that of the fascists. They differ from those used by communism which is craftier and less vulgar.

Mr. CAOUETTE: It is not as bad as Liberalism.

Mr. MICHAUD: On this score, I shall quote a comparison from Vers Demain, of October 1, 1945, page 2:

More and better communists. Alone, perhaps, besides the Social Crediters, the Communists have to a degree that sense of personal responsibility toward the promotion of social and political ideas.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Read the whole article, instead of picking a single paragraph.

Mr. MICHAUD:

And yet, we believe that, in the province of Quebec at least, Social Credit supporters show far more dynamic energy and individual zeal than Communists, judging more especially by the results achieved.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Communists are tenacious, but Social Crediters are even more so. Communists are daring, but Social Credit partisans have it over them in this respect. Communists are as active as they can be, but Social Credit adherents again have the upper hand. Communists, for instance, were forced to drop their newspaper La Victoire while the Social Credit organ Vers Demain attained heights heretofore unscaled by any other newspaper.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Read the whole article.

An hon. MEMBER: No, we have had enough.

Mr. CAOUETTE: That is all you are capable of understanding.

Mr. MICHAUD: According to—

Mr. CAOUETTE: That's a pretty feeble intellect!

Mr. MICHAUD: According to Social Credit supporters, people are being exploited. Voltaire once said: "Keep on lying, and something of it will always remain." If you tell the people often enough that they are being exploited and make flashing promises, they will end by believing part of what you say.

Mr. CAOUETTE: You tell them so many stories that they will no longer believe you.

Mr. MICHAUD: All revolutions began like this. Let us look into the nature of this exploitation. Granted, there has been misery among the masses, but it is gradually disappearing. Will it some day vanish altogether? No one can foretell, but in order the better to appraise our own lot, let us cast a glance beyond our borders and see what happens elsewhere. In what other country do the workers live as well as in Canada? Why—and the fact is well known to us—do so many Europeans, of every class, ask for permission to settle in Canada?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. MICHAUD: Recently, I read a newspaper article which claimed that 3 million British wish to come and live in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: Forty thousand Japanese.

Mr. MICHAUD: There is a reason for this. Here is a piece of evidence which was not supplied by Liberals. I quote from an article entitled "Living Costs and Wages in Canada":

(Text):

Living Costs and Wages

Canada's favourable position shown by I.L.O. Figures

What has been happening to living costs and real wages all over the world is shown by articles in the latest issue of the International Labour Review, the monthly publication of the international labour office. The fortunate position of Canada in both respects is made quite clear.

Taking the cost of living first. Of 12 countries mentioned, the over-all living costs in Canada have gone up least since 1937, taken as the base year. Thus, in Canada costs went up by 26 per cent only; while in Great Britain they rose by 32, South Africa 38, the United States 48, Sweden 50, Norway 65, the Netherlands 82.

And further down in the same article:

In most of the 12 countries mentioned above, the cost of food alone went up further than the over-all cost of living.

(Translation):

It is true that we are more fortunate than some other countries, but is not our good fortune due, to some extent, to the fact that after all the affairs of our country are not too badly administered?

Mr. CAOUETTE: This is due to the fact that the people are working; it is no credit to the government.

Mr. MICHAUD: The statements made at times by our opponents of all the parties of the house support my contention. Generally they claim that they would do better if they were in our places. It is to be expected. Then why make such statements as those which I have pointed out and which, like sensible people throughout the country, I strongly condemn? Before concluding, I shall quote the four other letters which I have received from my constituents in reply to a circular letter which I forwarded them. Letter number 2 follows:

I acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 25 in connection with a petition demanding the removal of all controls. I was very much surprised as it was the first inkling that I had of such a request. I wish to thank you for having written to me in this regard; otherwise I would not have known that someone had taken upon himself to sign my name to this petition without my permission . . .

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

. . . and you can see for yourself by comparing the signature appearing on that petition with mine which appears hereunder.

I have compared the signatures with those appearing on the petition and none bore any resemblance with their true signatures.

I would like to know, however, who dared to sign my name without my permission.

For your information may I say that I am a low wage-earner and I have a great deal of trouble balancing my budget. I am convinced that price controls have certainly helped us to make both ends meet. I regret that the removal of several controls has resulted in a substantial increase in the cost of living which affects me personally.

I do not consider myself important enough to attempt to dictate to our representatives the policies which they should follow in the administration of public affairs, and I know that my knowledge is very limited in that respect.

I shall now read letter No. 3:

(Text):

I received from you quite recently a circular letter informing me that I had signed a petition for the lifting of all price controls.

I can assure you that I had nothing to do with the signing of any cards or petitions against price controls. Personally, I feel that the government has done a great work in the carrying out of these measures.

Thanking you for enlightening me to the fact that my name had been falsely used in the signing of these cards or petitions, I remain,

Yours truly,
Gerard Belliveau.

(Translation):

Mr. CAOUETTE: He didn't write that either.

Mr. MICHAUD: No, sir, as you shall see. We now come to No. 4:

Dear Sir,

I acknowledge receipt of the circular you apparently mailed to all alleged signers of a petition on price control.

Let me state at once that I never put my name to such a petition. Like several friends of mine who received your circular, I had not even heard about the matter.

Naturally enough, I would be interested in knowing who took the liberty of signing my name to a petition which I certainly disapprove.

Here is the fifth and last:

May I be allowed to reply to your letter of the 12th which came as an unpleasant surprise to me. I can't see who, in this district, could have had the nerve to use my name for insulting you this way. I have never criticized in any way the steps taken by our leaders with regard to price controls. My wife and I are indignant.

May I ask you as a favour to let me know who circulated this petition and thus used my name without my knowledge?

And there, Mr. Speaker, you have the tactics of the Union of Electors of New Brunswick.

An hon. MEMBER: It is the same everywhere.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is not hard to choose between these two groups.

Besides, I have had representations from a large labour union favouring the maintenance of controls. No one aside from those who signed the above mentioned petition, demand their removal. As these good people have advanced no serious arguments to support their claim, I cannot consider their request. I shall vote for the resolution in accordance with my convictions, as I have always done, even when I voted against my party. The party to which I belong does not impose its will on its members. I support it, knowing full well what I am doing, having studied its programme and concurred in it before I decided to be a candidate, in 1945. As the government follow the policy decided upon which is infinitely better than that of any other party represented in this house. I do not have to hesitate in supporting them.

Mr. CAOUETTE: You are the only one in that position.

Mr. MICHAUD: I hope the crediters in my constituency will be gentlemen enough to give me credit for as much sincerity and devotedness as I give their leaders in this house.

And now, let us revert, if you wish, to the petition whose text was no doubt taken from the newspaper Vers Demain, since my friend, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras), in far-away Manitoba, receives petitions worded exactly the same.

Mr. CAOUETTE: The war was the same for all the provinces and you voted for it.

Mr. LEGER: Try and improve on your learning.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Speak for yourself.

Mr. MICHAUD: Mr. Speaker, I have been extremely polite while the member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette) made his speech; indeed, I am polite every time my friends, the Social Crediters have the floor.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Talk about things you know. Study.

An hon. MEMBER: Study yourself.

Another hon. MEMBER: The wonder of Pontiac County.

Mr. MICHAUD: Some Social Crediters of my county—

Mr. CAOUETTE: One must not be lazy.

Mr. MICHAUD: —want the removal of all controls, unaware of the fact that they are simply repeating the disjointed utterances of unscrupulous wire-pullers.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Financiers are pulling yours.

Mr. MICHAUD: I invited them to define their attitude. They thought fit to answer back by tirades taken from this pamphlet from which emanates, in the words of Cardinal Villeneuve, "a current which tends much more to inflame revolutionary passions than to promote social consciousness and the desire to work for the rehabilitation of society".

[Mr. Michaud.]

Mr. GAUTHIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAOUETTE: All "ration-mongers" are revolutionary.

Mr. MICHAUD: "Ration-mongers." That is precisely the kind of expression used by those gentlemen, as well as in Vers Demain and in the documents from which I have just quoted.

An hon. MEMBER: And by the hon. member for Pontiac.

Mr. CAOUETTE: A term you will get to know, gentlemen.

Mr. MICHAUD: One can but deny or ignore such gratuitous assertions.

Mr. CAOUETTE: Thank you.

Mr. MICHAUD: "Controls paralyze production and thereby cause prices to rise." This is all wrong and I challenge anyone to prove the contrary.

Third: "Controls deprive us of our freedom as citizens." What freedom, may I ask? The freedom to do and speak as one pleases? In that case, our freedoms are much more jeopardized by the ten commandments and by our federal, provincial and municipal laws and regulations. These gentlemen, I fear, are mistaking licence for liberty. No one is absolutely free to do everything. My freedom stops where that of my neighbour begins.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

(Text):

Mr. HLYNKA: They are worried!

(Translation):

Mr. MICHAUD: Nowadays, neighbours being fairly numerous and economic life quite complicated, it necessarily follows that the freedom of the individual is perhaps limited to a greater extent than formerly by that of his many neighbours whose needs are far from few. What is the freedom to which these gentlemen refer? As they do not commit themselves, I am left to form what seem to me the most plausible conjectures. Do they mean the type of freedom which, thanks to the policy of rationing goods in short supply, would allow a few monopolizers to buy large quantities of commodities, thus raising prices while pocketing enormous profits and depriving less fortunate people of essential products?

Mr. CAOUETTE: There is no need to change the administration to bring about this state of things since it exists under the present government.

Mr. MICHAUD: Listen and learn!

Do they mean the kind of freedom that would allow some producers to take advantage of the scarcity of certain commodities and sell their goods, always to the detriment of the working classes, at prices twice and three times as high as the cost of production?

(Text):

Mr. WYLIE: Put it on Hansard.

(Translation):

Mr. MICHAUD: And I could conjecture ad infinitum on this freedom which, in such cases, becomes indistinguishable from licence and mass exploitation beneficial to a few individuals only. I will have none of that freedom. The sooner controls destroy it, if I may use the terms of the petition, the better it will be for all who recognize and appreciate true liberty which gives the working classes of the country free access to the largest number of commodities, at prices which those of limited income can readily afford.

For these reasons I shall vote for the resolution and for the bill which will follow it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

(Text):

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised at the many weird fears of dire calamities which have been aroused by some hon. members in this chamber with regard to the legislation now proposed. Some have tried to make us afraid that parliament was prepared to give up its power to some external body; and they have gone on from that to talk about bureaucracy, regimentation and all the evils which they have been able to gather during the past few years from regimes which have been a disgrace to modern history. May I say that these fears, in my opinion, have been greatly overstated. Personally I have no fear at all about these things, and I hate them just as much as do hon. gentlemen who have opposed them. I do not for one moment believe, for example, that the right hon. gentleman who has led this parliament for more years than any other man in the history of Canada will deliberately give away the powers of parliament to somebody outside. I do not even believe that the Right Hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would abuse the powers which we the other day permitted him to exercise in regard to a very important measure. I would not even be afraid of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) having similar powers conferred upon him by this house, which has the right and power to withdraw them if they are abused; for the people of Canada have the right and power to punish those who may be guilty of such abuse by discharging them.

In the past we have had to wrest our political freedom from great powers: kings, nobles, lords and potentates; and still we have not possession of all the powers which the people must have. We must carry the struggle for democratic power into the field of economics. It is an extraordinary thing how hon. members can argue that a piece of legislation such as that proposed in the resolution before the house, which is to extend for a period of time certain powers which this parliament has never yet exercised except in time of war, could be represented as the abrogation of powers. It is the most extraordinary twist of illogical construction that I have ever listened to. I say, Mr. Speaker, we must not be simply content with the measure of political power the people have been able to obtain by their own efforts, despite the Conservative party in years gone by; we must gain economic power, and we must learn to use that power when we have achieved it. We must achieve it by democratic means, and we must learn to use it democratically. This means we must set up an entirely new technique, one which perhaps no one knows exactly how to proceed to organize, but one we must find as time goes by in order to exercise democratic power in the economic as well as the political field.

It took the crisis of war to reveal the need for the controls now under discussion, but peace has its crises as well as war. The resolution before us is to provide for the extension of those powers, taken in time of war, for a limited period, and I desire to join with the leader of this party in protesting against the willingness of the government to release these powers too readily at the urging of the private interests who are most concerned and the political parties who would like to serve them. The government, in following a policy of decontrol, appear to me as happy as children going to a circus when they can announce that they have let go something to which they should have held on. They have already given up many of the powers they should have held on to. This legislation is a proposal to continue some of those powers for a time, but the object eventually is to release all controls and go back to the old method of allowing the economic powers of the country who are personally interested to determine the economic course of this nation.

I want to impress upon this house that the economic pursuits of this nation are going to be controlled by somebody. They always have been controlled by somebody, and that control will be continued. It is of vital interest to the people of this land whether those controls are exercised by the people themselves in their own interests, or whether they are to be exercised by those interested only in their own personal gain. The questions we should be asking in regard to controls, and which really should not be applied to this measure at all, are these. Who are going to control the economic destiny of Canada in the future? How are these controls to be exercised, and what is to be their purpose? As I see it, sir, there are just two alternatives before us. The one is to allow those who own and control the great basic industries of this country to determine, in the interests of their own profits, what shall be the economic policy of Canada henceforth. That is one course. The other is to find a way of democratically controlling our economic destiny, through the democratically elected representatives of the people.

I have been astounded, too, at the way those who profess to believe in democracy can express such dire fears of power, as we have heard some hon. gentlemen in this house. Some have even boasted that they have no plans and do not desire power. In this respect I would refer particularly to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). Both these hon. gentlemen have exhibited great nervousness over the possibility of having too much power, for fear they might be corrupted. But I have seen no nervousness on their part in respect to the powers now being exercised by certain individuals and corporations over industries which affect the lives of all the people of this country. I should like to ask the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario what he will do if by some chance, some day, he might become chancellor of the exchequer or minister of finance. Then he would have to prepare a budget. That is a great power, because a budget will affect the lives of all persons in this nation, from the baby in the cradle to the man in the coffin. Everyone will be affected, so it is a tremendous power. What will the leader of the Social Credit party do if he becomes prime minister? According to his own philosophy, announced in this house from time to time, he will be on the horns of this dilemma. Either he will have to permit himself to be corrupted by the power which goes with the office, or he will have to divest himself of power to the point that he will be completely useless. That will be his choice. A government without power and without a plan is the most perfectly useless institution in the world. Canada can very well do without a government that has neither a plan nor the power to carry it into effect, because such a government is nothing but a blundering, expensive, useless dummy. Government is government only to the extent that it has power. A government is a good government only to the extent that it uses its power wisely. A government must have a giant's power; but I agree with the great Shakespeare that it had better not use that power as a giant sometimes does. There must be no competing power within the nation that can equal the power of a government; otherwise you have no government, because government is where the power is, whether that be in the factory, in the bank or on the treasury benches; and in most instances in Canada that power is still in the factories and the banks of this country. The real power of democracy is amongst the people themselves, and, as I say, they must have more power than any other body within the nation. A government without power is like a steamer without steam, like a car without gasoline, and I have my suspicions of people who are afraid to use power when they are asking for it.

Why do these people who are so anxious to get power express such fears of it? All power is dangerous in the hands of incompetents. The power of steam is a destructive power. It can blow up the boiler, wreck the establishment and kill everybody within a certain range. Atomic energy is a great power, and a dangerous and destructive power, but it may also be a very constructive one. Power may destroy, but power can also fulfil. Without power, however, we can do nothing in any government. I repeat that the important questions are: Who has the power; how is it to be used; what is it to be used for?

The danger in a democracy is not in having power; it is not in its using of power. The danger in a democracy is the abrogation of its powers, and the allowing of irresponsible people to use powers which ought to be in the hands of the representatives of the people.

It is assumed, theoretically at least, that the power of the people is supreme in a democracy. If the representatives are not to use that power, then who is to use it? I assume that the only practical way in which the people of Canada can use their power is through their representatives in parliament. It may be that we shall find some better mechanism as time goes on; but for the present that is the only way we have been able to devise. The old village moot is gone, and we have found it necessary to send representatives here to carry on the work of the people. They, from time to time, give power to ministers of the crown who are responsible to parliament, powers which are essential in order to carry out certain essential public services.

That is how our democracy operates; and until we find a better way for democracy to express itself we must adhere to those methods. Those who fear power should neither seek it nor be entrusted with it. Some hon. gentlemen are fond of quoting in the house the alleged aphorism of Lord Acton. I say it is an "alleged" aphorism, because it is not true. The so-called aphorism is this, that power corrupts—that absolute power corrupts absolutely. I have heard that from this corner of the house until I am tired of hearing it.

It is more clever than it is wise, Mr. Speaker. The most absolute power in human affairs in a democracy is the power of the people themselves. No autocracy or dictatorship in history, whether it was a so-called absolute monarchy or an absolute dictatorship, has thus far been able to withstand the absolute power of the people. The czars, the kings, the Hitlers, the Mussolinis, the potentates—they have all been humpty-dumpties on the walls of power, and have been thrown down by the absolute power of the people. They are not anything today but the dust of a disturbing memory.

Therefore I say to you, sir, if the leader of the Social Credit party believes that absolute power corrupts absolutely, then the democracies of the world are the most absolutely corrupt of all bodies whatsoever, because they have the most absolute power. Indeed, by the application of that assinine aphorism they are condemned to inevitable corruption. That is the logic of the Lord Acton parrots.

The fear of power implies the negation of all government. There can be no government without power. The fear of power indicates a lack of confidence in oneself to do the job of representing the people. The fear of power implies a lack of confidence in one's fellows, and lack of faith in the democracy of which he is a part. This distrust in ourself leads to our passing the precious, if dangerous power, to others, so that it can be used by them even against us, instead of our using it on our own behalf.

I think the fear of power constantly popular objections to taxation. Here is an illustration of that. I have known farmers who have been farming at a loss for a complete decade in the past history of Canada. They were farming at a loss, largely because speculators on the grain markets were making fortunes out of their produce, because monopolists, mortgage companies, railway companies expressed in the house is symptomatic. It is a symptom of a mal-education or mis-education which has been fostered deliberately in Canada by the few who have power, who like to use it, who enjoy being corrupted by it. The same idea crops up, for example, in and banks were overcharging them in prices, in freight rates and in interest rates. Yet they kept on farming.

But when a government taxes much less from them than the monopolists did, and leaves them with much more, what do they say? They say, "We won't milk cows for Ilsley." That is what they say. "We don't mind milking cows for mortgage companies; we don't mind milking cows for monopolists; but when it comes to milking cows to pay taxes to our own country, which money comes back to us in social services—no, we won't do that."

That is exactly the same attitude of mind as that of those who are afraid to exercise the power which democracy has conferred upon itself, and which we as representatives of the people are charged to uphold and exercise in the interests of the common people.

We are not taught in a similar way to fear the power of the profiteers, the power of the monopolists. It is suggested we ought to fear our own power, but never to fear the power of the profiteers or monopolists.

It is strange with what complacency we permit the most potently coercive power, namely that enjoyed by economic Hitlers, to dominate our lives, while we are so afraid of using power ourselves. I do not understand men who fight against delegating a portion of power in our possession to a minister, or to a board for which a minister is responsible, but who would not fight against the power now exercised by a corporation to use or not to use, or to misuse, the means by which all must live.

It is time we distinguished between power exercised by dictators and that exercised by a prime minister in a democracy. In the latter case the power is in our own hands, the hands of the people. We can delegate it or exercise it or withdraw it, at will. It is power that has never corrupted any government. It has been the power which governments refused to use—the economic power—which has corrupted governments. It is because we have never taken over economic power that it has been used by those who have it to corrupt public life, because they could not get what they wanted in any other way. Some public men in our history have succumbed to it.

Some writer has expressed the idea—I forget who it was; at any rate the idea is capable of standing on its own feet—that "He who fears what he must face exhibits symptoms of mental sickness; and until he is able to face what he fears he is not on the way to mental health."

I suggest that we must face this question of power; we cannot get anywhere without that behalf. The danger is always greater when power is in the hands of people other than in our own. This government or any other government in a democracy is simply a machine driven by the power of the people. To say that we must not use our own democratic power to control things which otherwise would destroy us is nothing short of political insanity.

power. Someone will use it against us if we show we are afraid to exercise it on our own

The British government was drawn into this argument by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). I must say that I agree with that hon. gentleman when he says that we should never follow blindly what any other government does. While I agree with him on that, I would say also that we should never fail to follow a good example, no matter what government sets that example. I notice that the hon. gentleman is the subject of an editorial in today's Ottawa Journal. He is now regarded as the one Liberal left; not a left Liberal, but the one Liberal left. I believe the hon. member for Quebec South is a very good Liberal. I agree with many of the things that he says and does. I like him, but I do not like the company he is now in. I am afraid of his Liberalism when he gets the support of the Journal. I do not know whether the Journal knows he said in his speech that, while he disagreed with the idea of copying any government, if he had been in Britain he would have voted for Labour. If the Journal knows that, perhaps it will take back its support and the hon. member for Quebec South will be all right yet.

I think the British government have done some good things about which we ought to know. First, they have revealed that planning and controlling can be done without dictatorship. Second, they have shown that nationalization preserves all the advantages of large-scale production achieved by monopoly without any of the disadvantages of monopoly. Those are significant things for us to know. In this connection I should like to quote what I regard as a brilliant passage from a speech recently made in the British House of Commons by the Prime Minister of Britain. He said:

> The British people will show that in peace as in war democracy can be combined with strength, tradition with progress, liberty with self-discipline and prosperity with social justice.

I want now to reply to some of the things that have been said by one or two hon. members who have preceded me in this debate. I am replying to them because they seem to think it is socialism that is covered by the resolution and not the extension of the meagre power which has been practised by this country for years during the war. I shall refer first to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who charges the government and the C.C.F. with taking power from parliament to transfer it to somebody else. If that were the case I am sure the hon. member would be the first one to vote for it. However the very opposite is the case. We are not transferring power; we are taking a little more power than we ever had before. What is the point of his argument? What we want to do is to continue the power proposed in the resolution; it as a matter of fact we want to extend. He wants to discontinue the exercise of these powers. That is what this debate is about. He is the one who is trying to give powers away or to allow the powers that this parliament has never exercised to remain in the hands of those who have always exercised them, apparently according to the pleasure of the hon. member for Eglinton.

The hon. member says that the Progressive Conservative came here to fight for the supremacy of parliament. They are 500 years late. The supremacy of parliament was fought for by the British people right in the very teeth of Conservative opposition throughout all history. For an hon. member who has as fine a mind as the hon. gentleman; for an hon. member who has the education he has been privileged to have to rise in his place and make an absurd claim of that kind with respect to parliament is nothing short of extraordinary. It has been the traditional position of Conservatives to retard democracy, to prevent the people from having their votes, in every way possible to hold power from the people. That is their tradition.

I do not charge deliberate totalitarianism to the Conservative party. I do not like to charge that to any party, because most of those who talk that way have just got hold of a stinking term that they like to apply to the policies of other parties in order to frighten the people. But while it is not perhaps totalitarian in its intentions, it is certainly totalitarian in its policy. If I wanted totalitarianism in Canada I would vote for the Conservative party. They want total economic power vested in private interests—private monopoly.

An hon. MEMBER: Under parliamentary control.

Mr. IRVINE: That is what we are doing now; that is precisely what the minister is proposing, and that is what we have prevented him from having passed for the last two or three days. Why all the discussion if that is what the hon. gentlemen want? The slogan of the Conservative party—I never can see much in this Progressive that they use—is that parliament must have nothing to do with business; let the business man do everything with business. But business has everything to do with the lives of the people of this country. No parliament which represents the interests of the people of this country can afford to allow power to stay in the hands of business without a check by parliament.

The hon. member goes on to say: "We have seen it with our own eyes that the further the control, the further the power of parliament recedes". The hon. member heaps conundrum on absurdity. He says he saw it with his own eyes. With whose eyes did he expect to see it?

An hon. MEMBER: To whom are you referring?

Mr. IRVINE: To the hon. member for Eglinton. He saw it with his own eyes. What he saw was a large, overgrown hobgoblin, something no more real than the mythical "oogapooga" which so many people have seen in the lakes of western Canada. Then he goes on to say that big business is anxious to have controls maintained. That was the most subtle cut of all. I think there must be an element of cleverness in it if it were not so obvious.

The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is never afraid to say exactly what he thinks, and just three or four minutes after the hon. gentleman who is one of his colleagues sat down he blurted out the truth without the slightest hesitation. He said that business large and small has been clamouring for freedom from so many controls. My hon. friend should realize that he cannot have it both ways. If he does not get off that fence he will tear his breeches for certain.

I wish to say something now with respect to the argument advanced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). He reminded me somewhat of a helicopter. He flew over the whole empire of economic problems, but hovered here and there over very interesting spots, and then, when you thought he was going to make a landing, he roared away and never made a landing at all. I agree with him, however, on one thing. He said:

> There can be no democracy at all without economic freedom.

I thought he was going to land on that spot, but if he had he might have discovered something about what economic freedom means. Economic freedom and monopoly cannot go together.

Mr. FLEMING: That goes for state monopoly.

Mr. IRVINE: There is no such thing as state monopoly except in the minds of those who do not understand the meaning of terms, and I shall deal with that in a moment because the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) dealt with it. He said:

> There is actually no difference between a state monopoly and a private monopoly.

Just because a man says that with great unction does not make it true. Private monopoly is a one-man show, and he gets the proceeds of the gate; a public monopoly is everybody's show and they all get the proceeds of the gate. Private monopoly is a privilege held by an individual or corporation at the expense of all the rest of the community. A public monopoly, if you wish to call it so, is where the common people, all the citizens, are shareholders and have equal benefit in the so-called monopoly. If that is not a difference there is no meaning in the English language.

Then the hon. member went on to say:

> The only effective controls are those which are inherent in a justly scientific structure.

Now, sir, that is the largest mouthful of sweet nothings I have ever seen anyone take at any one time. Not knowing what it means, I have to pass it. I will not say that the hon. member had nothing in mind, but I will say that if he had anything in his mind when he said that it is still there. He was anxious that we should define our terms. I ask him to define the terms in that statement. He then went on to advocate the establishment of a monetary authority charged by parliament with the responsibility of maintaining a constant balance between effective purchasing power and available goods and services.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Will the hon. member disagree with that?

Mr. IRVINE: No; I was just going to agree with that; but I am going to ask the hon. member and ask the leader of the Social Credit party, what is the difference between a financial bureaucracy and any other of the bureaucracies that he has spent so much time in criticizing in this house? If that is not a bureaucracy, then a planning commission set up by this parliament and empowered by this parliament to give direction to the economic policies of this nation is no more a bureaucracy than the financial bureaucracy suggested by the leader of the Social Credit party.

Mr. JOHNSTON: But the hon. member agrees with that.

Mr. IRVINE: Certainly, I agree with him on that, but the hon. member does not agree with me with respect to the other—a most extraordinary thing.

Mr. JOHNSTON: I do not agree with Donald Gordon but the hon. member's leader did the other day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. IRVINE: The hon. member said that the best way to plan is by competition of consumers with dollars as ballots and they will vote with their buying. Well, that is nothing like a plan; that is not planning anything. For the hon. member's information let me quote something of what that kind of thing does. This is a quotation from the brief presented on February 2, 1937, to the royal commission on textiles by Elie Beauregard, K.C., commission counsel. He said:

> It is destructive competition that maintains wages at a low level. When responsibility does not rest with foreign competition, it lies with domestic competition waged at the expense of the worker and resulting from the wage inequality between provinces, cities, towns and villages.

Let me give another brief quotation from an official document of the British government which will give some idea of what happens when you leave things to the dollar votes of the consumer and have no regulatory plan for a national industry. This is in regard to electricity and reads as follows:

> At present Britain suffers from the inconveniences of total absence of standardization in voltages or appliances. In 1936 there were as many as forty-three different declared voltages for low and medium pressure supplies, ranging from 100 to 480 volts. A citizen moving from one part of the country to another, or from one London district to another must often scrap the whole of his electrical equipment because of these divergencies.

That is the sort of thing which calls for planning. It is not enough to let anybody buy just what he likes so that when there are shortages the first thing that would happen is that all our sugar would go to the making of candies and they would be bought at high prices by the sweet-toothed people who have money in their pockets and the rest of the people would not have anything. But I must not take the time to develop that, because I believe I have just about exhausted my time and I should like to finish what I have to say.

I intended to take up the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Caouette); I think he needs someone to take him up after what "Little Chicago" did to him a little while ago. I shall conclude, sir, by saying that planning means balancing all the needs of the nation against all the available resources of the nation; balancing the man-power demands against the available man-power; balancing the needs of factories, housing, transport and other public services against each other; balancing the need for exports against the need to keep at home products which are essential to the lives of the people within a given country. These are some of the things that are meant by planning. Therefore, sir, I am getting tired of the evangelism of private enterprise, of the ranting about bureaucrats, regimentation and the death-knells of freedom when we suggest that parliament must be supreme in economics as well as in political policy. I would say that hon. gentlemen who carry on a programme of that kind are mental monstrosities limping frantically across the political stage on crutches of hate.

Mr. EDOUARD RINFRET (Outremont): I listened with great pleasure to the speech delivered the other day by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), and I compliment him on the brilliant exposé of the constitutional question which he made in that speech. However, as I read the resolution before us I see that it states:

> Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war . . .

There is in this resolution only one constitutional basis.

Before taking the time of the house to discuss the constitutional aspect of the whole question, I should like, if I may, to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) this simple question.

Is this legislation based upon any constitutional ground other than that mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I may, I will answer that immediately. The answer is no. I suppose the hon. gentleman has in his mind something I said the other day in the house, but all I said the other day was this. In response to questioning about a recent judgment of the privy council, I told the house what that judgment seemed to decide, supporting what I said by an opinion from the deputy minister of justice. None of our legislation is based on this decision of the privy council. Our emergency legislation is based on the existence of a national emergency arising out of the war, on the emergency doctrine, to which no one takes any exception either in this house or outside it. My statement did not purport in any sense to be one of government policy or any indication of government policy. It was a report to the house on what the court had decided, nothing more.

Mr. RINFRET: Mr. Speaker, in view of the explanation just given by the Minister of Justice, I do not consider it necessary to continue discussing the constitutional question, and on the basis of the information just given I shall support the resolution.

Mr. J. A. DION (Lake St. Jean-Roberval) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for this resolution and for the bill on the continuation of controls, not because I find it pleasant, but because I deem it necessary to do so. Furthermore, I support this legislation because of its urgency and its temporary nature. Were it neither urgent nor temporary, I would oppose it, because to my mind it would be unconstitutional. I may add that on that score, the majority of my colleagues from the province of Quebec are of the same opinion. I submit this with all the due respect for the decisions of the Privy Council and I take this opportunity of thanking the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) for the explanation which he has just given us. His statement of Thursday last had left a few aspects of this legislation out of focus, but now that the measure is recognized as constitutional, everything seems to be quite clear. I thank him once again and I congratulate him for having shed some light on the matter.

It is in order, I believe, to compliment the government on allowing Parliament this year to legislate on controls. I must admit that last year I felt some misgivings about supporting bill No. 15, which maintained the government's right to rule by orders in council.

I believe that the sooner we revert to the true allotment of legislative, executive and judicial powers, which constitute the very essence of our parliamentary democracy, the better it will be for the true interests of the Canadian people.

It is the duty of Parliament to enact laws and appropriate the money required for the management of the country's affairs.

It is the function of the government to administer those laws and to manage the money voted by Parliament.

Finally, the courts are required to give an interpretation of the laws and of the Constitution when disputes arise between citizens or between citizens and the Government. However, it is not within the jurisdiction of the courts, whichever they may be, to change the laws or to modify the Constitution.

Those are elementary principles of constitutional law, but it is advisable to bring them to the attention of this house from time to time, for, unfortunately, they are too frequently disregarded nowadays.

In a debate on controls and planned economy such as this one, if hon. members indulge first in electoral propaganda and then give their attention to the legislation under discussion, if the house is turned into a public forum instead of legislating, there are a large number of useless speeches and unending discussions. I suggest that parliament does not accomplish its true function which is to study and legislate.

If, on the other hand, instead of putting it up to parliament, as was done in the case of this bill, the government enacts too many orders in council, it transgresses the prerogatives of parliament. This should happen only in extreme cases, under quite exceptional circumstances, such as war.

And while it is the Government's duty to govern and to manage, if it allows its planned economy to be managed by boards and bureaucrats with no responsibility to the house and to the people of Canada, the cabinet surrenders part of its rights and privileges. Such practice, if allowed to last, will eventually distort the spirit of the constitution.

Then again, if a court, such as the Privy Council for instance, instead of merely interpreting the constitution of this country, takes upon itself to change it on the grounds that the central authority may encroach upon provincial rights, even when there is no urgent necessity to do so, this court is not exercising purely judicial functions. Instead of merely interpreting the law, it changes it, and in so doing trespasses upon the legislative powers of this country's parliament.

It then becomes a cause not for amusement but for genuine alarm to see the keenest champions of provincial autonomy acting likewise as the most ardent advocates of appeals to the Privy Council. Such inconsistency is nothing short of appalling.

In closing, may I express the hope that this measure for the maintenance of controls will be discontinued as soon as practicable in the best interests of the whole country.

Finally I hope that the necessary distinctions between the legislative, executive and judicial fields will henceforth be more and more closely observed, so that our constitution will operate as designed by the fathers of confederation.

Let no one exceed his powers and the constitution will be more secure.

(Translation):

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the resolution which is submitted to us, shows once again that the optimistic forecasts of our leaders, both before and during the war were, in truth, nothing but weird fantasies of minds overstrained by the abuse of the imperializing drugs of our overseas friends. Master propagandists and experts in false mirages paid by the war mongers, they used posters, newspapers, pamphlets, as well as the radio, to sing the virtues of military conscription and to promise happiness to the heroic nations whose sons, forsaking their native shores, would fly to the defence of christiandom at the sides of Joseph Stalin.

The golden age would be the reward of the sacrifices made by the Canadians to ensure the sway of the Muscovite Bear over the world. It will soon be two years since the storm has ended, two years since we should enjoy freedom and peace; however, we still are on a war footing, victims and slaves of a planned economy administered by a cankerous bureaucracy. What a formidable price in human lives and economic disasters will we have paid for this crusade which served no other purpose than that of increasing the prestige of the man from the Kremlin. War has brought upon us problems the solution of which, in the opinion of the government, lies only in an undue restriction of the freedom and privileges enjoyed by individuals and in the discarding of the basic principles of our constitution. The hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand) had good reason to fear the dangers which he mentioned on February 3, 1944, when he said:

> Will it be possible to make this post-war readjustment without running counter to the traditions, without breaking old covenants, and the conventions which ensure autonomy to the central authority and to the provinces in certain spheres. Some claim that we should forget about traditions and even that we should run ahead of evolution. Is it possible to break away from the past of a nation? Others advocate the most arbitrary measures, but that view is to be condemned just as the doctrines of those who would sabotage the present structure of the nation and replace it by the fragile columns of an exaggerated socialism.

Mr. Speaker, while listening on Friday last to the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) expressing his faith in the present controls and his desire to have them maintained, I was reminded of these words which he spoke in this house on February 10, 1944:

> I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come for parliament to remember that besides the empire, there is a country called Canada which is now being bled white, with the result that its economy will have to be built up anew and her citizens will suffer both from the moral and the physical standpoint. That will be a consequence of the hardships, the vexations of all kinds, and the various controls forced on the labouring classes, the farmers and workers.

[Mr. Dion.]

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Is that all? Excellent.

Mr. GAGNON: It is a fact that the workers and the lower-salaried groups have been hardest hit by the unfairness and the annoying features of government controls. Wealthy people, those whose powerful pocketbooks carried weight, monopolizers and selfish individuals did not feel the harshness of rationing to the same extent. They obtained the required goods and services and still do get them quite easily while the little man, the poor man, whose influence counts for nothing with some dealers, saw biscuits, chocolate, liquor, nylon stockings as well as automobile tires go to fatter purses or black market profiteers.

Sugar at $20 a bag, butter at 60 cents a pound, jam at $15 per twenty pounds, such are the trade practices fostered by the ineffable control of the wartime prices and trade board.

On page 124 of his book La révolution d'hier, d'aujourd'hui et de demain, Mr. L. Marlio, member of the Institute, professor at the Académie des Sciences morales et politiques, writes as follows:

> Planned economy represents a bastard compromise between dictatorship and freedom and yields only a powerless dictatorship or an encumbered freedom. Never up to the present has this system given favourable results but, on the other hand, it has brought about numerous disasters.
> In short, according to the same writer, planned economy is destructive of democracy. It robs private enterprise of its initiative. It is conducive to indiscriminate control by the State, to anonymous dictatorship, the worst form of absolutism. It organizes disorder.

We are asked today to maintain controls on various economic activities. But the people are surfeited with restrictions. This colonial policy is designed, above all, to serve the interests of a foreign country, to which we are committed to the detriment of Canada. Discontent waxes rife in this country, Socialists, Communists and Jehovah's Witnesses are undermining our democratic institutions, and still we are amazed to hear the proponents of strange systems, every one crazier than the other, expounding philosophies which nobody understands but perhaps themselves and promising happiness based on an equal distribution of material wealth. State paternalism which is practised on a large scale by the present administration, and the untimely intrusion of the government in spheres which rightly belong to the individual, while destroying the principles of democracy, have allowed certain thinking and living habits to become ingrained in the mind of many, who are now accustomed to expect everything from the state. It will be difficult to eradicate such habits.

In the words of Benjamin M. Anderson, economist of Chase National Bank—

(Text):

It must be recognized that government has made dangerous gains in power as a result of the war. The primary historical functions of government after all, have been (a) organizing the groups for war against foreign enemies, and (b) maintaining internal peace.

War and preparation for war constituted the major activities of government until fairly recent times. Internal liberty of the individual and of private organizations was strictly and sternly subordinated to war time necessities. England, following the anarchy of the Wars of the Roses, surrendered liberties for the sake of internal peace under Henry VII and Henry VIII, and struggled to regain them, and to protect them by a bill of rights, in the seventeenth century.

(Translation):

An investigation carried out last January by Mr. Gordon's board on the prices of foodstuffs, clothing and household furnishings showed that prices were lower in Canada than in the United States. For instance, it was pointed out that bread sold from 8 to 11 cents for a 24-ounce loaf in Winnipeg, whereas it cost 15 cents in Minneapolis; that a pound of round steak cost from 43 to 44 cents in Ottawa and from 59 to 72 cents in Syracuse; that shortening retailed from 17 to 25 cents per pound in Montreal and from 43 to 51 cents in Boston.

In regard to clothing and furniture, the prices were about the same in Canada as in the United States. However, the Prices Board forgot to mention that cigarettes cost 33 cents or more per package in Canada whereas in the United States they sell for approximately 15 cents; that gasoline cost much more in Canada than in the United States; that we must pay from $100 to $500 more than our American neighbours for an automobile; that shoes which sell for $20 a pair in Montreal are offered for $6.95 in Syracuse. Nor does the investigation mention that hourly wages are on the average 35 per cent lower in Canada than in the United States; that the taxes affecting the middle class are one and a half times higher in Canada than in the United States.

Entrusted to officials with no responsibility to the people, the operation and supervision of controls are an almighty state within a moribund state. The people are very often at the mercy of employees who don't know the first thing about the people's problems, or the special economic conditions of a given area, and they have to bow to the edicts and obey the whims of meddlesome and invisible czars.

Under order No. A-2225, for instance, Mr. Taylor, the new chairman of the prices and trade board, will no doubt keep on looking, beyond May 15, after the wholesale and retail prices of toe and heel studs, fly-doors, chemical toilets, septic tanks, bath mats, adhesives, brassieres, skirts and shoulder straps, pinafores, smocks and dungarees.

If I had to set up communism in this country, Mr. Speaker, I should not go about it differently than has the present government. The dictatorship we have known during the last war has alarmingly favoured the establishment of a socialist system in Canada. And if the C.C.F. members look so fondly today upon their friends across the way, it is because the Liberals, in taking over their principles and in legislating as the C.C.F. would have them do, are paving the way for the advocates of a system that has failed in every country where it was put to the test. Communists will then follow, whose Canadian family tree will reveal its descent from the present Liberal party.

"Socialism has liberalism for a father and communism for an heir", proclaimed His Holiness Pius XI, in Quadragesimo anno.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Economic liberalism.

Mr. GAGNON: Yes, a doctrine applied at present by the Liberal government.

The bill which is to follow the present resolution will be, in essence and in fact, a new encroachment on provincial prerogatives. This reason alone justifies my voting against the resolution moved by the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BRUNELLE: As usual.

Mr. GAGNON: On the other side of the house, hon. members gargle high-sounding, throbbing and hypocritical statements about the sacred rights of the provinces—

Mr. DION (Lake St. John-Roberval): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I ask that the hon. member withdraw the word "hypocritical".

Mr. GAGNON: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is any reason for withdrawing this word—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order! I request the hon. member to be kind enough to change the wording of his statement.

Mr. GAGNON: Mr. Speaker, under what rule am I bound to withdraw the expression?

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the rule which prohibits the use in the house of an unparliamentary term. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. GAGNON: I did not apply the word "hypocrite" to any member in particular. I made a general statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will not insist, I am sure, and he will withdraw his expression.

Mr. GAGNON: In order to please you, Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw the word "hypocrite".

Mr. MARQUIS: It must be withdrawn unconditionally.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order!

Mr. GAGNON: In order to be agreeable to you, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word "hypocrite". However, I regret the intervention of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Marquis) had no consequence.

Hon. members opposite indulge in high-sounding statements on the sacred rights of the provinces concerning civil legislation. The premiers of Ontario, Quebec and Nova Scotia, as well as members of this house, are taken to task for insisting upon the prerogatives of the provinces. When the government is charged with trying to centralize power to a degree never attempted by any previous administration, members sitting to your right pretend to be deeply offended. Looking demurely upon us, they try to use such honey phrases as the fabulist Lafontaine puts in the mouth of a fox strongly tempted by the fine-feathered bird's piece of cheese. The recent statement by the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), generally known as being brutally outspoken and a true lover of Great Britain has given us another proof of the federal government's willingness to impinge upon the exclusive rights of the province, should they find it convenient in order to promote their own objectives or those of the United Kingdom.

Progressively, through successive precedents and abuses of power, we have been led to our present alarming situation. It seems to me that the mandate given to us by our electors was already burdensome enough without the government adding new problems quite beyond our concern.

Mr. GARIEPY: What statement are you referring to? I interrupt with the permission of the hon. member who has just mentioned some speech made by the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice. I am asking him to tell us specifically which statement he has in mind.

Mr. GAGNON: I am referring to the observations which the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice put forward last week when we were discussing the bill having to do with grain before the resolution which we are now debating was introduced.

Mr. GARIEPY: That has nothing to do with this debate.

Mr. GAGNON: Our plates are so well garnished that we do not feel the need of picking those of others.

If it was a mistake to start this deadly game, and I contend it was, the least we can decently expect is that certain limits will not me transgressed and that this whole business will cease before the advent of a socialist or communist dictator who could hoist himself to power simply by donning the cast-offs of the Liberal party.

(Text):

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I feel that this moment in the history of our country is too great to be allowed to pass without a word on my part. I have listened with considerable interest to the discussion of the various aspects of this legislation; and I have learned with concern of that part of it which could not be regarded as other than socialistic, which could indeed be very harmful to democracy in this country. As a matter of fact, I do not see how any stalwart Liberal who loves his country and believes in democracy can support this legislation. That is my principal concern. I am not rising necessarily to criticize the socialistic aspects of the bill, but rather to plead with the government, who are still proud to call themselves Liberals, to turn back while yet there is time. My sympathies indeed are with the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). When parliament delegates to the government such tremendous powers as are contained in this legislation, dealing with so many aspects of our whole economic life, it is time we who still believe in democracy and in our way of life take notice of the trend of the times. That trend is toward socialism, and the pace is quickening. I have only to remind hon. members that there is only one alternative to democracy; that is dictatorship.

I should like to remind my Liberal friends, because my appeal will be made principally to them, that the socialist party in this country are selling the Liberals short, just as they did in the old land. When the late Prime Ministers Asquith and Lloyd George were persuaded to introduce socialistic and social welfare policies they actually signed the death-knell of Liberalism, and today the Liberal party in the old land is a nonentity. I am one of those who would regret to see the same fate overtake the Liberal party in Canada. Yet if they carry on with those who are seeking by subtle methods, by pressure methods, to undermine our democracy and to persuade our government that the only method they can employ is one by which they would rule by legislation which is subversive to the best elements of democracy, then I say Liberalism is indeed in for a very difficult time.

History has a habit of repeating itself, and Canada is today at the cross-roads. I can appreciate the unfortunate situation in which the government finds itself. Yet no one can be blamed. This country could have entered into a policy of decontrol during the last session of parliament. Had we done so we would have been further advanced today along the road of a return to government by parliament rather than government by orders in council or by omnibus bills.

Once you embark upon the road to socialism, there is no turning back. Follow the pattern of those who present the views of socialists in this House of Commons, and you discover that constantly they seek to advance the interests of the state and to submerge those of the individual. In other words, they would seek to make of Canada and of the Canadian people a nation of leaners, depending upon some form of central authority, which would guarantee their security and economic freedom.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, the greatest asset this nation possesses is its strong citizenship. The greatest asset we possess is our people. If we seek to interfere with ambitions and ideals, and to kill the enthusiasm of our people; or if we seek to depend upon some central authority to provide us with leadership, then indeed Canada has taken a backward step.

Mr. PROBE: Come and sit over here.

Mr. CASE: Well, I do not like to question the motives of anyone. This, after all, is a democracy, and you can expound your theories. History reveals that, wherever your doctrine has been tried, it has ended in bloodshed and sorrow, and has left a wake of broken hearts in its trail. Make no mistake about that. After all, socialism is not new. It has been tried time and again, and it is failing in Great Britain today.

The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) quoted the Prime Minister of Great Britain; but he did not quote their minister of labour who said, "You will work or starve." That is the socialism which will be applied in Great Britain, because they realize today as never before that their whole salvation depends upon their ability to produce more goods. And they cannot produce more goods under socialist doctrines which guarantee security at the expense of the taxpayers and the state.

Therefore I offer this advice to hon. members who try to fasten on to Canada something which has failed—and failed miserably—in other lands. After all, this is a land of freedom, a land we are all proud to call our home. And I am one who will stand up and, by all the means I can employ, seek to stamp out socialism. I appeal to those hon. friends of mine, who are sitting opposite and who still believe in Liberalism—as I do—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CASE: —that now is the time to turn aside this threat to our Canadian way of life.

Mr. KNOWLES: You never forgot your first love, did you?

Mr. CASE: It rests with the government. Thank God, I have the right to express my thoughts freely within this party, and to endorse the principles and ideals enunciated by my leader. I think I come a lot closer to ideal Liberalism than those who are sitting opposite today.

In respect of socialism there seems to be no saturation point. Never are they satisfied, but constantly they attempt to regulate and to control. The challenge is now one the government must meet. I know it is said that this omnibus bill is to meet a special emergency. If many of us could believe that there would be a turning back a year hence we would feel just a little more secure. But because the leader of the C.C.F. rose in his place and endorsed the bill, and because his followers have supported it so wholeheartedly, I am more than convinced there is something wrong with it.

Certainly it is not a Liberal bill.

Mr. KNOWLES: You are against it, no matter how good it is, eh?

Mr. CASE: There have been times when there has been lack of understanding with our friends from the province of Quebec. But I believe I can say to the house this afternoon that we in Ontario, and those from many other parts of Canada can say in all sincerity, "Thank God for the province of Quebec." It stands today as a bulwark against this threat to our economic freedom; it is our first line of defence against socialism and communism.

Mr. MacINNIS: The line-up with Duplessis is complete.

Mr. CASE: Quebec remains the one focal point where they are not going to attack our democratic way of life, without a real fight. That has been indicated in the house.

Even though I am not entirely satisfied with the answer given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) to the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret), it would be wrong on my part in any sense to question the constitutionality of the resolution. That has already been taken care of. I do know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is one who has always given close attention to the matter of constitutionality. If my memory serves me correctly, it was the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then leader of the Conservative party, who introduced to this house many measures of social security, comprising legislation which afterwards was determined to be ultra vires of the House of Commons.

The time has come when the battle lines are drawn. Are we to have happiness in Canada, or are we to have that which has taken place in the old land? I was greatly impressed with the words of the Prime Minister when he pleaded with Canadians to stick to the two-party system. I believe the day will come when we shall return to that two-party system. But I say—and I say it with feeling and regret—that unless the present trend is stopped, the Liberal party will be submerged in its desire to adopt measures which can lead to nothing more or less than socialism in Canada.

My chief point of appeal is to ask the government to reconsider, even at this hour, the resolution now before the house. I ask it to bring in bills so that parliament may decide that which may best be continued or discontinued. I realize, of course, that this procedure would take more time. But after all, with our future at stake, with the welfare of Canada, the welfare of the Canadian people and the whole economy of our country at stake, surely it would be best in the long run to do what I have suggested. We have already granted an extension of time of these emergency powers until May 15. It would be possible no doubt if these bills were not concluded by that time to seek a further extension, but in the meantime parliament, the elected representatives of the people, the voice of the people would be heard so that they might place their stamp of approval or disapproval on the bills as they were presented to this house.

I think we all feel greatly concerned at the trend today in world events. Canada is in position to give a certain type and degree of leadership in world affairs. We have reason to expect that leadership. We have a great land, a country which offers a challenge to all Canadians. This afternoon the hon. member for Cariboo spoke about the supremacy of parliament and referred to the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) as being 500 years late. That brings to my mind the thought that sometimes the things we value most are treated much too lightly and parted with much too carelessly.

Certainly it has been a long upward fight and struggle to gain freedom. Freedom is the greatest thing we shall ever possess. Now they talk of our supremacy at a time when we can go on to greater things with the initiative and background and enterprise of our people. Are we to turn back the pages of history and seek to begin the struggle all over again? Balancing the needs of the nation, says the hon. member for Cariboo, but I ask him who in his group sitting in this house today would he feel capable of balancing the affairs of a great nation? Where would he find the ability or the initiative or the understanding of the complex problems of industry and finance and development that he would seek to have placed in the hands of someone who would tell you or me what we should do?

I think the time has come when we must seek to break the shackles and bonds that are binding us, so that we may have an opportunity for greater expression, greater advancement and greater development. Then Canada will indeed find her way to the leadership which she is capable of providing. In this great land we should seek to encourage those who believe in freedom, those who believe in democracy to come to our shores. We shall not get the people we would like to have as long as we have on our statute books legislation which provides for the continuance of the very things many of them are seeking to escape from in distant Europe.

I can see the trend today in Great Britain. We have a great stake in the British isles. I am not going to condemn the British government, but I am going to say that, unless they change, Great Britain is indeed in for a difficult time. Unless they can step up the production of their nation, where will they arrive at? We find that today they are seeking to import hundreds of thousands of workers to do the work which Britishers formerly were able to do for their nation. If that is done, the nation will suffer just that much more; yet they must produce even with foreign labour, if necessary, to pay for their imports.

Last year in Canada we had to seek to retain German prisoners of war and to import Polish immigrants in order that they might assist in farm work. What is wrong with our great country? As long as these controls remain, business will have no faith in the future. As long as we continue to regulate by legislation, farmers and others will not till the soil and we shall not obtain that vast production which is so necessary if we are to avoid inflation and satisfy the demands and needs of a starving world.

I make this last appeal to the right hon. minister and to the government of Canada: Reconsider the step you are taking, turn back while yet there is time to avoid this socialistic trend which is seeking to undermine our democracy; bring in these bills separately so that we may consider them in their true perspective; let parliament decide, and then the people of Canada must accept our judgment or exercise the remedy they have in their hands.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it would take a brave man to try to pick out the central feature of the legislation now before the house. That is obvious from the way in which the discussion has ranged literally all over the universe. However, it does seem to me that the aspect of this legislation which most concerns the people of Canada is its bearing on the cost of living. There is included in the orders in council that we shall be dealing with when the bill is before committee the orders having to do with price control, rent control and other measures which have an effect on the whole economy of this country, and therefore on the cost of living. That being the central issue, as I see it, in this legislation, it seems to me that this house is faced with two questions to which we should give our attention. First of all, is it necessary to do something about the cost of living? Second, is the something which must be done a course that might cost us any of our liberty or our freedom? In other words, I admit that the injection of discussion about freedom and liberty into this debate is germane to the subject, and I wish to deal with my remarks under these two headings.

First of all, there is no doubt that parliament has to do something about the cost of living. If we are a responsible body at all; if we consider that we are here to concern ourselves about the interests of the people of Canada, we must pay serious attention to what is happening to the cost of the necessities of life. As an example, a short while ago the price of shortening took a tremendous rise in a very few days. I know of few articles concerning which I have received from housewives across Canada more letters of protest than in connection with the increase of the price of shortening. I placed some questions on the order paper about this matter and received from the government the information that in a matter of two or three days prices went up all across Canada. An example was in Winnipeg where the price went from nineteen cents to twenty-nine cents a pound in a matter of just two or three days. Similarly one might mention what has been happening to the price of soap.

Mr. MITCHELL: Nineteen cents a pound for what?

Mr. KNOWLES: Shortening.

Mr. MITCHELL: A farm product.

Mr. KNOWLES: No; it includes vegetable oil. The increase was not due to removing the ceiling altogether, but just the permission from the prices board for an increase.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And the farmer was not getting much of that, either.

Mr. KNOWLES: So with the cost of soap-flakes and bar soap, and also with the price of tea; coffee; meat, especially bacon; canned goods, especially soup, and so on.

Hon. members throughout this chamber have, I am sure, had the same experience that I have, namely, of being bombarded by housewives with their protests against this rise in the cost of living, even under the controls which are still in existence. This is true not only with respect to articles of food—and I must not forget the increase in the price of milk, despite the vote in this house last summer—but also in connection with articles of clothing, particularly children's clothing. If I might cite an example which is close to home, may I say that the streets are rather wet in Ottawa today and it is necessary for children in this city to have rubbers or rubber boots of some kind. There are two children in the home in which I happen to stay here in Ottawa. I know that the parents have been desperate in the last few days to try to get rubbers or rubber boots for their children. They managed today to get a pair of rubber boots for their eight year old Gretchen for the sum of $5. Admittedly the boots are better than they would normally buy, but that is all that was available and that is the price they had to pay to get any at all. In addition, I have before me, but I shall not take the time to give them, other figures indicating conclusively that it is urgently necessary to do something to hold down the cost of living.

Last summer certain newspapers in Canada were singing the praises of the policy being followed in the United States where price control was taken off and the law of supply and demand was allowed to function. I have before me copies of editorials which appeared in the Financial Post in July, 1946, and again in November, 1946, drawing attention to the fact that decontrol in the United States had not then had the disastrous results which had been predicted, but rather it was permitting certain initial fluctuations and then in due course the proper level was being reached—at least so it was claimed.

These editorials in the Financial Post to which I have referred called upon the government of this country to follow the lead of the United States in this matter. Today the story is quite different. I have before me now a clipping from the monthly letter of the National City Bank of New York for March, 1947, which is right up to date. That monthly letter says:

> The resumption of the rise in commodity prices is the feature of the business news during the past month.

Then later on:

> The resumption of commodity price advances is to be deplored rather than welcomed. It defers hope of a downturn in the cost of living.

Then still later on:

> Meanwhile the situation holds various dangers, some of which have been alluded to. One is the danger that an unwarranted confidence in the price level, and in the continuation of inflationary advances, will spread.

I hold in my hand a copy of the Financial Post for March 22, 1947, on page 20 of which is a digest of an article headed: "What is ahead of us this year." It is an account of what business expects in the United States under present conditions. Let me quote a few sentences:

> Prices are higher than at any time since the boom period that followed world war I and are still rising.

Then later on:

> Actually a turn from boom to set-back is approaching, and probably will become apparent by or soon after mid-year.

Still later on:

> That average factory worker, due to price rises, can buy less with his weekly pay cheque at this time than he could buy a year ago. The same is true in the average salaried man.

The article goes on from a business point of view to point to the difficulties and the dangers that confront the United States where this policy of the removal of controls has been carried to reductio ad absurdum. Therefore I contend that the answer to my first question is a definite yes. As a matter of responsibility to the Canadian people whom we represent, we must do something to try to keep down the cost of living.

I said, however, that it is germane to the whole question to have something to say about freedom. It is theoretically possible for one to agree that something should be done to hold down the cost of living and yet to be afraid that the something that has to be done interferes with liberty and freedom and therefore might be at too great a cost. I for one do not believe that to be the case. As a matter of fact, this whole position was presented to the house most forcibly this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine). It does seem to me that we can too easily become the victims of certain cliches, and one of these cliches is the supposition that the protection of freedom involves only protecting the individual against the state. That has been the ultimate position stated in this house by those who claim to represent the essence of liberalism, and I agree that the day is not gone when we must watch in a democratic way to make sure that the state does not make inroads on the life of the individual.

But, Mr. Speaker, the thing that I should like liberals—with a small "l"—to bear in mind is that our main concern is to protect the individual against anything that interferes with his freedom and his liberty. In the days of our grandparents, if they were protected against the authority of the state, well and good; but in our day that is not sufficient for the protection of the individual. A person's life depends upon the cost of living; it depends upon whether or not there is full employment; it depends upon whether or not there is a market for the produce of the farmers and whether that produce can be disposed of in an orderly fashion. There is a whole gamut of things that bear on the life of the individual today which our grandfathers knew nothing at all about, and in that situation governments have a new responsibility; they still have the responsibility not to be bureaucratic or interfere with the liberties of the individual, but in addition, they now have the responsibility to protect the individual against the things over which he has no control in the economic order.

Our lives today are not cast in the simple environment that our grandfathers had; they are cast in a complex world where, underlying our very existence, underlying life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, is the whole question of how the economic system functions. I maintain that those who claim to be liberals, those who claim to be concerned about protecting the freedom of the individual, must be concerned about the freedom of that individual against the caprice and the depredations of the economic system. And so it seems to me that all this talk about bureaucracy, about state monopoly being just as bad as any other, is a case of well-meaning individuals failing to think the matter through.

The liberal position—and I am still using the small "l"—is a great position, but it is a position that needs to be thought through and worked out in terms of the kind of society we have today, and in that society what is needed is responsible democratic government that protects the individual at every point where he needs protection.

It has been said a good many times during the course of this debate that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) has introduced a socialistic measure into this house. He has been chided by my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party and my hon. friends of the Social Credit group for this action. The attempt has been made to pin the word "socialist" on this bill in the thought that that would condemn it. Let it be said quite clearly, Mr. Speaker, that this measure is not socialism. This measure is a device to save capitalism. My hon. friends to the right are missing the boat completely when they rise in opposition to it. This is a measure that would save capitalism in Canada from the kind of chaos that the Minister of Justice rightly described the other night; and if that happened, there is no telling where this country might go. We of this group are not anxious to protect or save capitalism, but we do believe in orderly progress. We want to move on in an orderly fashion from what we now have to democratic socialism, and I pause for a moment to thank those who have taken the trouble to call attention to the fact that we in this group are socialists. We want to move on in that direction.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does my hon. friend say, Marxian socialism?

Mr. KNOWLES: I said, democratic socialism. My hon. friend knows about it; at least he used to know a good deal about it.

Mr. MITCHELL: What they had in Germany, they said, was democratic socialism.

Mr. KNOWLES: Not at all; you know very well what they had there. Mr. Speaker, what we want to avoid is the kind of chaos which the minister rightly described as that which would follow if this measure were defeated. Capitalistic chaos it would be. That chaos might throw the C.C.F. into power. If my hon. friends to the right want to take that chance, well and good; but there is no guarantee that it would throw this party into power. That chaos might throw into power something worse than we now have. That is the reason we take the position we do in supporting this measure as a means of avoiding chaos and keeping things on as even a keel as possible so that we can move on in orderly fashion.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) the other day had something to say about the alleged crocodile tears of my colleague the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) because he was interested in protecting the position of people on fixed incomes, even people who were drawing their incomes from interest, if I understood him rightly, against rises in the cost of living. The hon. member for Eglinton was quite surprised that the hon. member for Dauphin was concerned about these groups of people. I ask the hon. member for Eglinton, does he not want to protect even his friends from the dangers and the chaos of a rise in the cost of living? That is what this is all about, and frankly I have been amazed—I confess I have changed my mind half a dozen times in the debate whether to speak or not—

Mr. MACKENZIE: That could not be possible.

Mr. KNOWLES: —but I have been amazed and annoyed at the kind of thing that my hon. friends particularly to the right have been saying about this measure, so I finally decided I would speak. If their heads were on straight, they would know that this is the kind of thing they ought to vote for to keep this country on some sort of even keel.

Mr. HOMUTH: If we had socialism a lot of us would lose our heads.

Mr. MacINNIS: You would not be losing very much.

Mr. KNOWLES: In addition to the confusion to which I have already referred, we have had other forms. It has been suggested that, because we in this group are prepared to support the measure before us, that means we thereby swallow in its entirety everything that goes with it and all the decisions made by all the so-called bureaucrats who function under the authority of these orders in council. That is just as ridiculous as the opposite position would be.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who sits near me here, believes in private enterprise and supports it wholeheartedly. But that does not mean he approves everything that every private enterprise in this country does. He finds some fault here and there with some of the things that some of them may do. So I say that neither acceptance nor support of this measure involves approval of every decision which has been made by every board set up under this legislation. I am simply suggesting that we try to keep a proper balance and perspective about this kind of thing. By supporting this measure it does not mean that we in this house approve controls just for the sake of controls. To hear some of my hon. friends talk one would think it means we go all-out to hunt for new phases to control in the lives of the Canadian people. It does not mean that at all, any more than the desire of the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario—and I am using him only because he is so close and is paying such good attention to me—

Mr. MacINNIS: He is a decent sort of fellow.

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes, he is a decent sort of fellow. As I say, it does not mean that any more than his desire to have controls taken off means he wants no law or order at all in this country. It is a matter of balance, a matter of perspective.

Mr. FLEMING: Why not let the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario give his own views?

Mr. KNOWLES: He very likely will. I am helping to develop his thinking for him before he gets to his feet. In principle, Mr. Speaker, and on balance, we feel that, in its effect on the cost of living—and that is the aspect in which this thing touches the lives of the Canadian people most closely—it is better for our people that at least this much control that we now have be kept intact. As a matter of fact, our quarrel with the government is not that they ask for the kind of powers which are involved in this resolution and in the bill which is to follow, but that they do not take the responsibility which is involved in asking for those powers. As the Minister of Justice and other members of the cabinet know, I have been on my feet several times already during this session protesting against the action of the government in removing controls every week before the matter gets discussed in this house. My contention is that they owe a moral responsibility to parliament not to go on taking steps which keep boosting up the cost of living until the matter has been decided in this parliament. If parliament decides, either in this vote on the resolution or in the vote on the price control order when we get to it, that price control is to go out the window—and it will be against my vote if it does—then the government would be perfectly right in doing away with it, but until such time as that decision is made, we contend that the government has no right to take order in council action, or action by orders of the wartime prices and trade board which results in these increases that are annoying housewives, old age pensioners and other Canadian citizens and making it exceedingly difficult for them to carry on at all.

As I say, our contention is that the main fault of the government in connection with this whole measure is not that they are asking for powers beyond those which a democratic government ought to have in order to protect the interests of the Canadian people, but that they do not exercise the full responsibility which those powers involve.

In introducing this measure, the Minister of Justice referred to three different kinds of orders in council which were to be included in the bill. He put in one special group three of those orders in council: P.C. 1003, the order having to do with labour relations regulations; the order having to do with veterans' preference matters, and finally, order in council P.C. 6367, of August 10, 1943, which provides that the old age pension maximum is to be $25 a month rather than $20, which was provided in the Old Age Pensions Act itself. In putting these three matters in a separate category, the Minister of Justice gave as his reason for doing so the fact that it is the intention of the government that in due course these orders in council shall be replaced by acts of parliament. I agree wholly that since such acts of parliament or such amendments are not yet in statute form, we must pass this measure and keep these specific orders in council in effect. I wish those who voted against the six weeks' extension last Tuesday and those who say they intend to vote against this measure would realize that in doing so they are voting against the continuance of old age pensions at $25 a month until such time as we can have them raised to whatever amount this parliament agrees to. It is all right to enjoy the holier-than-thou position which says: "I took a truly Liberal stand and voted against this measure". But suppose the majority had done that sort of thing. My hon. friends to my right say they are voting against controls. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) sought to make it clear Friday night or this afternoon—

Mr. SKEY: That he is voting against socialism.

Mr. KNOWLES: He is not voting against socialism. He is voting against a device that would protect capitalism from its own inherent chaos; and he is also voting in a manner which would result, if the majority of this house joined with him, in old age pensions dropping back to $20 a month on May 15. It was March 31, but has been extended by the resolution we passed last Tuesday.

An hon. MEMBER: Whose fault is that?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It is not the government's fault.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is the government's fault. The government put us in this position, and I deplore the fact that we have been put in this position. But having been put in it, surely we owe a responsibility to the old people of Canada not just to pride ourselves on being able to say that we voted against the government without taking into consideration the consequences of such a vote. Therefore I contend that, on the basis of the labour relations order, the veteran's preference order and the old age pensions matter alone, we ought to vote for this measure, even if we must swallow some things we do not like. But having said that I wish to go on and say that in relation to the old age pensions question I have a real quarrel with the government, and it is this: When this resolution is passed and when the bill has been introduced and passed, it will make it possible to delay a proper amendment to the Old Age Pensions Act until March 31, 1948. I do not say that the government intends to do that but I have not been given any assurance that they will not. I have been told repeatedly—and I hear some remarks on the opposite side now which I fear Hansard is not getting—that it was promised clearly by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on page 83 of Hansard that amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act would be brought in this year. A few days ago, on March 20, as recorded at page 1550 of Hansard, I asked the Prime Minister if he would consider bringing in Old Age Pensions Act amendments as an emergency measure at an early date. His reply was that he had made a statement about this earlier in the session and that I would find his remarks on Hansard; that is the reference on page 83. Then he said the answer to it would be the same as I would find there. Well, I am not quarrelling with the fact that it has been made clear to us in the speech from the throne and in the promises of the Prime Minister that the Old Age Pensions Act is to be amended this session. I take the Prime Minister at his word; it is there in plain language.

We had a similar promise last year from the then Minister of National Health and Welfare, but that promise was amended. This year we have the promise of the Prime Minister himself that it will be done, and there is no argument on that. My question is, when will it be done? The promise was made in the speech from the throne on January 30, nearly two months ago. I could give this house the names of old people—I have in my office letters from their sons and daughters, their widows and so on—who have died since January 30 waiting for these old age pensions to go up so that they could keep alive, or waiting for something to be done about the means test so that they could get the old age pension. My fear is that this thing will be dragged on and on, causing continued months of suffering to our old people. Here is what can happen. We do not yet know what is to be the nature of the legislation that is to replace this order in council, but it is not impossible that it will be the kind of legislation that requires concurrent legislation by the provinces. That could mean the matter would not come into effect until some time next year; and, for all I know, 1948 may be the year of an election. In fact many people are beginning to suspect that is what is in store for us, the increased old age pension being held until the eve of an election.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend does not believe that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Well, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) had his speech cut out from under him by a statement from the Minister of Justice which satisfied him completely. If any minister will rise in his place now and tell this house that the amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act will be introduced within the next month, I will sit down immediately.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The price is too high.

Mr. KNOWLES: What did the minister say?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nothing at all. I was somewhat amused at the hon. member's attitude; that is all.

Mr. KNOWLES: The answer would be a very simple one to give. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) says he is amused at my attitude. It is not mine only; it is the attitude expressed in letters from old age pensioners which I receive literally every day. What is the government doing? What is the delay? The promise was made on January 30.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The Prime Minister keeps his promises, and will keep this promise.

Mr. KNOWLES: But in the meantime old people are suffering and dying as a result of this delay. That is the point I have been trying to get across to the government. My contention is that it is utterly callous and inhuman for us to sit here in the comfort of this parliament and accept this continual delay. I am sure the impatience I feel about it is shared all over this house. As a matter of fact, I am sure it must be shared by the private members on the government side; I imagine they are embarrassed by the delay and are doing everything they can in their own way to prod their government into doing something about this matter which is so important in terms of human relationships. I wish they would express themselves in the house, so that it would be out in the open and the government might really be prodded from all sides into taking action without further delay.

We shall soon be in committee, I presume, or at least the Minister of Justice will have a chance to reply. I had hoped that when I made remarks similar to these on the resolution last Tuesday, the minister would reply and give some assurance, but it was not forthcoming. When he replies now I hope he will give some assurance as far as he is concerned, at any rate, that the adoption of this measure with the resultant extension of P.C. 6367 will not be used as a basis for interminable delay in the matter of old age pensions. When I spoke on this matter in the house on Tuesday of last week, March 18, it drew an interesting paragraph in one of the daily newspapers, which read something like this: "The Commons showed marked impatience when Stanley Knowles (C.C.F.—Winnipeg) began to discuss old age pensions."

Mr. MACKENZIE: Hear, hear. That is what they said.

Mr. KNOWLES: What does my hon. friend say?

Mr. MACKENZIE: It was just something slightly accusing.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is just the point: impatience. The people who have a right to be impatient are the 190,000 old age pensioners across this country, and I decry this inhuman attitude.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We on this side of the house are as close to them as you are; we have been all our lives. We gave them old age pensions before you ever started to work for them.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am tempted to pick up a volume of Hansard I have here in my desk and see just how well you gave old age pensions to them.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We started it for them. Where were you then?

Mr. KNOWLES: Where was I? I certainly was not a candidate for an old age pension. I was at the other end of life in those days. The thing I am decrying through all this is the callous and shamefully jovial attitude in which this thing can be taken right here in the house tonight.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish to say to my hon. friend that I signed the agreement to bring old age pensions into existence in Ontario. I do not know whether my hon. friend was even in Canada then; and to suggest that I am taking a callous attitude is not fair, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister won an election on it on one occasion.

Mr. MITCHELL: If you would only stop talking and get on with the legislation.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not need to get into a discussion as to how old age pensions got started; it is too well known. I give my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) all the credit he has coming to him for what he did in the trade union movement to try to get the idea of old age pensions started. I know that story; he has told it to us before, but some other people had a part in the matter as well, and we are still at it. The point I am trying to get across is that the promise of improved old age pensions was made to the people of Canada in the speech from the throne on January 30. Today is March 24; nearly two months have gone by and nothing has been done about it. Any questions that have been asked have simply brought forth the reply that it will be done some time this session. On one occasion the Minister of Justice repeated the old excuse that the matter is the subject of dominion-provincial discussions. If that is the basis on which it rests I am afraid the chances are that the old people of Canada will not get the benefit of these increases until some time in 1948.

So, Mr. Speaker, while I have stated my position in support of this measure so as to avoid chaos and confusion—let it be clear that it is by no means a socialist measure but a device to keep capitalism going in some more or less orderly fashion—nevertheless I protest against this necessary measure being used as a basis for interminable delay in this important matter of doing something for Canada's old people.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have been one of the more or less appreciative audience listening to the numerous speeches, pro and con, for and against the resolution now before the house. There is an old saying that too much of anything is not good for one. We have had a great many speeches; I have listened to most of them, and now I should like to take about five minutes to vary the monotony as far as I am concerned and offer a few words on this important legislation.

I believe this matter of controls resolves itself into something not only of domestic but also international concern. I believe it places before this parliament and the people of Canada a problem that is of extreme importance in view of the disorganization that exists today in a world weary after many years of war. Right now this country is faced with the challenge of solving these problems which face us in this period of rehabilitation, and we must bear in mind that in this conflict—if we may call it that—we are confronted with threatening forces just as terrifying as those which obtained in time of war. This should be the leading issue in the minds of our people today.

Fortunately we in Canada are in a better condition than most people in the world, including even our allied friends, because Canada is today economically sound. After the depleting war through which we have passed, I believe much of the credit can be attributed to the ex-Minister of Finance and the gentleman who until recently was chairman of the wartime prices and trade board. These men stood at the lines of defence when the country was in great danger, and not only combatted but hurled back what I might describe as the fifth columnists, those selfish interests which fain would break through the lines and put our economy into a state of chaos, even at a time when the government was enduring the stresses and strains of war.

The superior position enjoyed by Canada today, after a depleting war, certainly cannot be attributed to accident. As I said earlier, I believe our present economic soundness can be traced to the controls which obtained during the war. Is it not reasonable that in this conflict we should go cautiously and carefully before we eliminate or withdraw those measures which have done so much for Canada in time of war?

Let us not forget that, while Canada is enjoying the fruits of a victorious war, we are today engaged in a conflict that is just as important and just as serious, and bids fair to be just as enduring as the conflict of war. In those circumstances I believe it is just as essential that we should preserve the same precautions which operated so beneficially during the time of the greater stress of war.

There are those who advocate that all controls should be removed entirely and immediately. I believe people who hold that view disregard the best interests of millions of our people. It may suit some of the selfish interests, but certainly it is not to the advantage of the masses of the people of Canada.

Fortunately we have in Canada today a government that is very little concerned with the selfish interests of the few. We have a government which takes great concern in the interests of the masses. I have every confidence that the government will not continue one control which it considers unnecessary. I have the further faith that from time to time the government will be willing to make changes in any of the controls it considers should be maintained, so as to eliminate any factors in those controls which would tend to penalize any particular individual interest.

During the war there was a certain element that undertook to belittle and to hamper our remarkable war effort. I am afraid that today there is under the surface an element that is undertaking to hamper the progress of the efforts made by this government in the present conflict which, as I said before, is just as serious as was the conflict of war.

In war we had the dread of defeat. Right now we are threatened with the dread of economic collapse. This is too serious a time to be thinking about politics, or to think about the few who would gladly take this opportunity for their own aggrandizement, and to promote their own interests. I say that today in this conflict the government are given the same mandate they were given in the time of war. They did their part well by bringing us out of that struggle in a sound economic position. They have a mandate in the present conflict, a mandate of administration. That mandate is to meet present problems and to give leadership. Today I say they are giving that leadership. The government has a difficult and dangerous task to undertake, and I say that we must use the same generosity and have the same degree of tolerance, even to the extent of making some sacrifices, if we are to win this important conflict in a time of peace. Our very sons who went out and shed their blood in order that we may have prosperity in Canada, and so that we may have peace, have sown the seeds of peace on many soils. It is the responsibility of the government and of the Canadian people to cultivate that soil so enriched by their blood, and to see that that harvest of peace and prosperity for which they fought will be worth reaping.

I hear a great deal about bureaucracy. One would almost think the government's action is such as might be expected from Hitler. But as a Canadian, and one who will live in Canada so long as his span of life continues, I would be more happy living under an authoritative rule administered by responsible ministers of the crown, men who have done so much in the handling of controls, than I would be if all those controls were removed and those selfish interests were given the green light to proceed to the practice of that policy which they fain would undertake, for their personal aggrandizement and in disregard of the national interest.

Mr. LUDGER DIONNE (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, many people are asking the house to do away with controls. Some of those people think this move will favour their political publicity, some others have the intention of protecting their personal interests, and others take that stand because they think that if controls were lifted the flow of commodities would be resumed through the natural channels of trade.

In order properly to inform the fair-minded people, having in mind the welfare of the population of Canada, I have made a careful study of the subject and I shall now proceed to outline the conclusions at which I have arrived. If the government were to lift controls immediately I think everyone will admit that a large number of tenants would be thrown out of their homes. Since there exists at the present time an acute shortage of houses in this country, it does not require much imagination to foresee the perturbation which would result throughout Canada. Farmers and proprietors of houses do not realize what would be the distressing situation of tenants dislodged from their farms or homes, who would be at a loss to find shelter within the means of their pocketbooks. It is evident that the price of rent throughout the occupies rented quarters, and these people country would be increased tremendously. As a general rule it is the labouring class that occupies neeed an immediate increase in their wages to face this sudden additional increase in their budgets. It is evident that under such circumstances the cost of manufactured articles would have to be increased in proportion, and the disastrous result would be that the financial condition of every citizen in Canada would be upset.

The Labour Gazette of January, 1947, contains figures showing the cost of living in Canada as compared with that in effect in the United States since controls were abolished. The increase in the wholesale price groups from June to November, 1946, were as follows:

	Canada	United States
General Index	2	21
Farm products	1	19
Textile products	0	19
Metal and metal products	1	4
Buildings material	4	8
Chemical and allied products	1	26
Raw material	3	20
Semi-manufactured articles	3	21
Manufactured products	3	31

The same issue of the Labour Gazette contains the following statement:

> The point of the two comparisons above is that while wholesale price groups moved in a parallel manner until June, 1946, there has been a considerable divergence since that date, with United States prices outstripping their approximate counterparts in the Canadian scene. Canadian food imports from the United States are only a small portion of the total imports from this source, so that pressure on our own food price ceilings in this particular respect is not excessive. But our imports of manufactured articles, as well as certain industrial raw or semi-processed products of iron, coal, cotton and petroleum, are very large. The increasing cost of these items places additional pressure upon our own price structure. An indirect pressure is offered by the greater disappearance of our own produce now in short supply that is sold in the United States at high prices rather than in Canada at controlled prices.

I should like to give a brief resume of another article which appeared in a prominent newspaper last week. This article stated that it is evident that business in the United States is due for a shake-down by the middle of 1947. Even the most bullish supporters of the commodity market in the United States feel that the end is in sight, and it is this feeling that is given as the reason for the stock market remaining dull. A comparison of United States commodity prices prevailing last January, this month and those being paid on September futures will show that prices are due to decline considerably. Here is the picture:

	January	Today	September
Wheat	2·06	2·59	2·09
Corn	1·34	1·62	1·51
Cotton	·30	·34	·28
Cocoa	·25	·27¾	·23½
Hides	·22½	·25½	·21½
Wool tops	1·51½	1·58	1·29
Black pepper	·47	·57	·35
Lard	·26	·31½	·24¾

I sincerely believe that if we have the patience to wait a little longer before releasing more controls it will be possible to do so without creating too much disturbance of our economy. Every fair-minded member in this house will certainly realize that the government is not asking for the continuance of these controls for its own satisfaction. So far as I am concerned—and I know there are many others who share my view—I hate this interference of the government in private business.

In one of my previous speeches in this house I drew the attention of hon. members to the fact that I suffer personally from these controls. I have to sell the production of rayon yarn made in one of my plants at the same prices as prevailed on October 11, 1941, namely, seventy-five cents to $1.40 a pound when I could dispose of my production on the New York market at prices varying from $1.40 to $2.60 a pound f.o.b. shipping point. We produce in another plant ladies' shoes which retail in Montreal at from $6 to $9, when the same shoes are being sold at from $20 to $25 in Washington. I use these two items as an example only because I am familiar with them. I think they prove that it is against my own interest to favour controls. On the other hand, what lasting benefit could I expect from a situation in the United States which is bound to collapse at any moment? In the fact of such a precarious and dangerous situation, I prefer to carry on business on the basis of 1941 and not expose my country to an indescribably chaotic economic situation in which I would be engulfed with the rest of the Canadian population.

The government expects to reduce its expenditures next year by $900 million. This is interesting news for the population of Canada, but what is more important is the stabilization of prices without which we would be in the same situation as now exists in the United States where the purchasing power of 1947 salaries is lower than that prevailing during the war, even though there have been substantial increases. Salaries in the United States have increased eighty per cent. Weekly wages in industry averaged $25.20 in 1940 for thirty-eight hours. At the beginning of 1945 these had increased to $47.50 for a week of forty-five hours. The increases in wages have been completely wiped out by the lifting of controls in June last, except on rent, sugar and rice. In comparing the increases which took place in the prices of commodities and wages, the United States secretary of labour admits that the purchasing power of salaried people is seventeen per cent inferior today to what it was during the war.

Since the decrease in the expenses of running the government of Canada, as announced in the federal budget, must reflect a decrease in taxation, the normal consequence should be a decrease in prices. Instead of a decrease in the prices of the necessities of life, it seems that we are on the threshold of a new wave of increases. Some controls have been abolished on some products and prices have increased. Any overvaluation of prices would absorb at least part if not all of the benefit derived from a decrease in taxation. The salaried man would not be any better off. At a time when employment is reaching normal and products and goods of all kinds are reappearing on the market, this man would notice with consternation his diminishing buying power. By that very fact his situation would become helpless. Scarcity of goods caused by the war does not free him from purchasing the necessities of life. He would then be compelled to ask increased wages or strike.

It is easy to prove to him, with indisputable figures, that he is the loser when he goes on strike. On the other hand, increase in salary, which will serve as a pretext for an increase in prices of goods, will create inflation and by the same fact will destroy the benefit foreseen by the increased wages.

Under ordinary circumstances the increase of prices should create abundance and should thereby correct the evil through the law of supply and demand. But unfortunately this scheme cannot produce any satisfactory results to prevent inflation owing to the fact that consumers need too many things at the same time.

During the war the government has assumed control of the economy in this country. Through many mistakes, it has nevertheless brought about useful and indispensable corrections. While our war effort has created an abnormal situation, requiring controls, we have to face the same situation today which is created by an unlimited demand for all kinds of products.

It is not the proper time to relax controls which are still in existence, and it is to be hoped that the government will receive the authority to maintain this policy for a limited period. The members of this house have so fully realized the importance of this precarious situation that when a vote was taken on the transitory measure presented by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) on March 18, 177 members voted in favour of the measure while only thirteen members voted against it.

In some requests which I received asking for the suppression of controls I notice there was also a demand to prohibit exportation. Needless to point out, we have an unfavourable balance of around $500 million with the United States for the year 1946. This means we need foreign currency to finance our importations. Moreover, if exports were prohibited how could we dispose of our wheat, bacon, cheese and other manufactured articles that we must sell to other countries if we want to maintain and preserve the position that this country has acquired in the world. If one takes into account the overvaluation of prices in other parts of the world compared with Canadian prices, he would certainly admit that suppression of controls would create an increase in the exports of our products and thus increase the scarcity of same on the Canadian market.

For the above-mentioned reasons and for many others which would take too long to enumerate, I believe that maintenance of existing controls for a certain period is not only useful but absolutely necessary if we want to maintain a sound economy in our country. I understand that proprietors deserve sympathy because they are the most affected, but in face of two evils it is natural to choose the lesser. I would rather see the proprietor rent his house on a cheap basis than witness the renters being thrown out on the street. It is to be hoped that the competent authorities will give preferred attention in the near future to the urgent case of the proprietors.

If I listened to some of my electors who have not given much consideration to the matter I would vote against the controls. In so doing, I am sure I would please them. Unfortunately the duty of a sworn member of parliament does not consist only in pleasing electors and himself but rather to take the interest of the Canadian people at large, no matter how disagreeable his attitude might be on such an important matter.

Before taking my seat, may I draw the attention of the minister to some decisions of the officers of the wartime prices and trade board, which are unjust and detrimental to the interest of Canadian citizens. Personally, I have been the victim of one of their decisions which was far from being equitable, though the case, after different stages, had to be decided finally by Mr. Gordon himself.

Recently a firm in my constituency made application to the timber controller to extend an export permit from 1946 to 1947 because their timber could not be shipped last year, on account of the lack of cars. The permit was refused by the timber controller on the ground that it was not the policy of the board to consider such requests. I do not know the salary being paid to this officer. I imagine he must earn many thousands of dollars yearly. What is the use of paying such a high salary to this officer if he refuses to use practical sense in face of uncontrollable circumstances? A clerk with a weekly salary of $25 could do the job. As a matter of fact, it does not require much experience to tell the people that the rules and regulations of the board must be observed. Though many additional cases could be told the house, I will not mention any more. However I will suggest to the minister that he appoint a committee composed of a few members of the house to reconsider unfair decisions of the wartime prices and trade board officers. There must be someone to judge and straighten out the actions of these officers when their decision is detrimental to the welfare of our citizens. I think this suggestion is a protection which we owe to our people when they cannot obtain justice from our bureaucrats.

I have been told by many of my colleagues that my suggestion would not be accepted by the minister because the officers of his department would not approve it. I have too much confidence in the honesty of the minister to believe this. I am convinced that if my suggestion is not acceptable to the minister, he will find some means of establishing some kind of control over the officers of the wartime prices and trade board. If he does not, I leave it to him to bear the responsibility of his inaction.

When I take the responsibility of voting for a measure of this kind which is very unpopular in many parts of our country the least I can offer to my electors is that I have taken every precaution so that they may enjoy some kind of assurance that their cases will be fairly dealt with.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when he introduced this resolution, the Right Hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) expressed the wish that we wait until the second reading of the bill to fully discuss this measure.

His suggestion might be just and reasonable if this were an ordinary piece of legislation; but when I know that at this very moment a large part of the people on the north shore are undergoing hardships that may be even worse than those endured by the populations of conquered countries; and when I know, as I shall show in a moment, that those hardships are the direct result of the imposition of "controls", you will readily admit, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot pass by a single occasion of protesting against that policy of controls which the government want to maintain.

I say right now that I am far from joining in the praises of Mr. Gordon which we heard last week from certain corners of the house. Our national economy was much too long under the "control" of that man, a real dictator, who did not even have the decency to answer telegrams such as those I sent him and in which I nearly pleaded with him to grant the people of my county permission to obtain the necessities of life before winter had set in, when it is too late to have them brought over to the north shore.

The country in which we live is regarded as essentially democratic, but the claims made by the official representative of 70,000 Canadians carry no weight in the eyes of such bureaucrats who have no responsibility to the people.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. DORION: Had I been speaking in the name of a few financiers instead of pleading the cause of 70,000 Canadians, there is no doubt at all but that I would have gained a better hearing.

The present legislation is placed before us with consummate skill. We admit readily that it may be necessary to control certain economic activities such as the relations between landlord and tenant. But on the plea of necessity, the government are asking us to pass various measures, every one more unconstitutional than the other.

Even as regards rentals, I deem such legislation to be unconstitutional. As I said in this house in 1945, the dominion government should allow provincial legislatures to adopt similar measures, if they are considered necessary. Let us once for all return to the provinces the rights guaranteed to them by the federative pact.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in support of my opposition to this measure, I shall not indulge in academic discussions. In the last twenty-five years, when I had to plead cases before the courts of my country, I always made it a point to present facts, and once the facts were proven, draw conclusions. I should like to present a series of facts which, I am convinced, will substantiate my opposition to the continuation of controls.

I might explain, in the first place, that my constituency extends over a distance of 900 miles on the north shore of the St. Lawrence; in the Charlevoix section the population is composed of farmers, whereas the Saguenay district is inhabited by fishermen. The last 600 miles of the St. Lawrence north shore are also inhabited mostly by fishermen, and no lands suitable for cultivation is to be found there. Therefore the fishermen depend on supplies shipped to them from Quebec city and Montreal. As the hon. members know, navigation in that large section of the province of Quebec is usually interrupted at the end of November. It is absolutely necessary, of course, that those people bring in adequate food supplies for the winter season, which extends from early December to the end of April and even into May, before it is too late. To those people, as to anyone else, milk is one of the prime necessities of life. Unable as they are to obtain so much as a drop of fresh cow milk on the coast, they naturally have to bring in evaporated milk all the way up the north coast. As a provident people, who know they must not wait till the very last days of fall to bring in needed provisions, by last August they had come down to Quebec and Montreal in an attempt to secure goods to carry them over the winter. I have just called them provident. Knowing they sometimes have to put up with much hardship, they generally provide as best they can for possible emergencies. For all the makeshift means at their disposal, they none the less insist on taking the best possible care of their health. And here, Mr. Speaker, may I quote parts of a letter I received early last January from Dr. Currie, a member of the International Grenfell Association and the hospital superintendent at Harrington:

(Text):

I am a newcomer to the coast and only here for the winter months, having practised in the city of Regina, Saskatchewan, for twenty-one years, then bought a fruit farm near Toronto, Ontario, and one year ago retired but came out of retirement to give a hand out down here.

I have been here only two months but have covered all settlements from Romaine to Blanc Sablon and am starting on the second round trip tomorrow, weather permitting.

Thought you might be interested in the medical aspect of your constituency. As you perhaps know, health conditions are not what they should be.

Deficiency diseases are rampant, such as bad teeth in both old and young, poor vision, susceptibility to skin diseases, all due to faulty diet, lack of fresh fruit and vegetables and the essential minerals. Estimate over 1,000 people with scabies (itch) and impetigo along this coast. This is generally being brought under control. It is not due to dirt or unclean bodies in these people as I have been amazed at the cleanliness of their bodies, have not even seen a pair of dirty feet.

Many cases of gastritis, duodenal ulcer and gall bladder disturbances, due usually to indiscretions of diet. These respond to proper diet usually.

Have seen a number of cases of high blood pressure, mostly in women over 50 years. This I did not expect to see at sea level.

(Translation):

So, Mr. Speaker, it is clear that the living conditions of the inhabitants of the north shore are normally very hard, but when they are worsened by the implementation of control measures such as those that are in force we are bound to arrive at the results described by Dr. Currie in the report he sent me.

I said, a while ago, that last year, these people tried as usual to get their supplies in as early as August last. Here is a letter from one of the most important merchants of Natashquan, Mr. Emilien Landry, an excerpt of which I shall read to you. The letter is dated August 26, 1946:

During my last trip to Quebec city, early in August, I wish to make arrangements to order my stock of evaporated milk for the winter and, at the time I was there, on August 3 to be exact, an order was issued forbidding all or nearly all shipments of evaporated milk to the north shore, for the reason, I was told, that more milk had already been shipped to that district than in 1941.

See how intelligently the controls are administered. In August 1946, a good looking man, comfortably seated in an office in Ottawa or in Toronto, learns that the people of the north shore have had more evaporated milk than in 1941, it matters little whether they lack food during the coming winter. He decrees arbitrarily that no more milk will be shipped to those people.

Which meant that milk was the object of a black market on the north shore. At least, that is the answer I received on the occasion of my visit to the office of the board in Quebec. On the other hand, I cannot see what outlets we could have had for such a black market, considering navigation facilities we now have at our disposal, namely, two boats that call at the same time and do not show up before another fortnight.

How ridiculous it is for the representatives of the prices board to make such an assumption when we know that all the places I have mentioned on the north shore are isolated from each other! How can it be said that those people were in the black market business? With whom could they have traded?

Moreover, they cannot leave their place except to go fishing a few miles off shore. Their only means of communication with the outside districts is the boat which calls every two weeks.

However, as soon as I found out about the situation to which the people of the north shore were being subjected, I at once tried to get in touch first with the office of the prices board at Quebec. Unfortunately, I did not obtain satisfaction. In passing, may I say that all the officers in the Quebec branch of the prices board gave me, in this and every other instance, their full cooperation; however, they were unable to do anything. They had to follow the instructions of the controllers. At the end of August, I described our plight to the Quebec office of the prices board to the best of my ability. I then received from an official of that board a letter dated September 6, from which I quote the following excerpt:

As stated in the course of our telephone conversation, Saguenay county is a "free zone" as far as the rationing of evaporated milk is concerned. Wholesalers operating in "restricted zones" and requiring extra coupons to cover their deliveries to free zones should apply directly to the wholesale administrator, Metropolitan building, Toronto.

In other words, Quebec and Montreal merchants wishing to supply the population of the north shore with condensed milk had to request permission from a Toronto gentleman who had not the faintest idea of conditions prevailing in our province.

Towards the end of August and the beginning of September, I received a great many letters from merchants all along the north shore complaining about the restrictions to which they were subjected. Some of these are really pathetic. In September, realizing that they would be caught by the oncoming winter season without supplies for the children of their district, therefore, still trying to help these people—it was my duty to do so—I contacted the controllers in Ottawa and Toronto but unfortunately, I obtained no satisfactory results.

Incidentally, may I quote a wire which I received on September 6 from the mayor of Sept-Iles who explained the said lot of his fellow citizens:

Please contact Mr. Hugh Cree, distributive administration, Toronto. Village in sad plight without lard or condensed milk. No farmers in district. According to physician's report, submitted today, many children suffering now. Please understand we plan for six months ahead, being cut off during winter season. Heard today from our wholesaler that 1,600 cases of milk for north shore are frozen by government. Would appreciate prompt reply.

J. R. Vigneault, Mayor of Sept-Iles.

About the same time I received another letter from Godbout in Saguenay county. Let me read from it the following excerpt:

Ordinarily, I buy from 50 to 60 cases of evaporated milk for my store during the winter season. But now I have no way of securing it. If existing conditions continue, we shall be unable to obtain milk for the winter and our people will go without milk for their children.

The dealers have milk that could be sent to the coast, but they are under government orders not to do so.

During the same period, I received a similar letter from the mayor of Riviere-au-Tonnerre. On September 5, when I had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to correct this abnormal situation through the wartime prices and trade board's officials in Quebec, I sent a message to Mr. Hugh Cree, wholesale retail food director, Metropolitan building, Toronto, explaining the predicament of my constituents. My message was dated September 5. On September 9, four days later, as I had no answer from this controller, I decided to send another communication and finally, not having yet received an answer on September 10, I thought that as a member of parliament, representing a population of 70,000, I might at least get in touch with Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the prices board. I therefore sent him on that day a message of which I have here a copy, giving him a clear and lengthy description of the near plight of my electors and asking him, as a special favour, to remedy that condition. On September 13, having received no answer from Mr. Gordon, I presumed that my message might have been overlooked and I sent another, urging him to kindly take whatever action might be needed to help a population and specially children who, without his assistance, would in all probability have to endure very severe hardships. But Mr. Gordon did not take the trouble to answer. Little did he care for the Canadians along the north shore.

A few days later, on September 12 or 13, I received from Mr. Hugh Cree, of Toronto, a letter from which I quote the following excerpt:

(Text):

In an effort to correct the situation and stop the distribution of needed reserves, suppliers in restricted areas were reminded that shipments into free areas such as the north shore must not exceed basic quotas.

(Translation):

Note this, Mr. Speaker. The controller himself told me that the north shore people drank more milk than usual this year and will therefore have to do without for the rest of the winter. The children of the district, scattered along the coast, will have no milk next winter; such is the decision of the controller.

While we are deprived of this essential commodity, our government is doing its utmost to push it on the export market. According to information supplied in answer to a question which I asked recently, Canada produced, from August 1945 to July 1946, 198,394,000 pounds of evaporated milk. During the same period, we shipped abroad 62,423,900 pounds of this product while Canadians on the shore line did without. The controller had decided to deprive them of milk because this year they drank more than in 1941.

Such are the fruits of the control policy. Some people may claim that these are a few isolated cases; but I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this bulky correspondence in my hand, these exchanges of telegrams, these numerous telephone conversations are proof enough that our dictators were not in the least concerned about the plight of the north shore people. Furthermore, I maintain that many cases similar to the ones I have just mentioned could be brought to our attention by other members. I am convinced that the same situation exists in various constituencies of my province and elsewhere. We had reached November, and still our people were clamouring for help.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to quote a few excerpts from a letter which reached me on November 18, 1946, almost on the eve of the closing of navigation. It was sent to me from Riviere-Moisie:

I have just written to you about an application I have filed for a permit to secure Carnation milk. I had asked permission to obtain 60 cases for the winter season. It is two months since I have had any to sell. I had been counting right along on that permit, but now I have been advised that I will receive only 10 cases...

We have no milk for sale here; the other dealers have none either.

As the season is far advanced, it would be necessary to ship the milk next week, for the longer the shipment is delayed the greater the risks of freezing. I am counting on you as I know that you are aware of our plight, especially that of our infants. Mothers are wondering how they will feed their babies, as there are a large number of them and all are fed on Carnation milk. It is not logical that we should allow our own children to starve in order to send our foodstuffs overseas.

Those are the letters which I have received from the merchants of the north shore during the months of August, September, October and November, 1946. But I was unable to obtain from those gentlemen of Ottawa and Toronto the permission to send supplies to our merchants. Finally, in December, I succeeded in obtaining a small portion of their requirements. May I, on behalf of my constituents, thank sincerely the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) for the help which he gave us when, at the end of December, it was necessary to enlist the services of an ice-breaker in order to send foodstuffs to the north shore. As the river had frozen over, navigation was closed in all the bays of the shore. Hence it was necessary to use an ice-breaker in order to send supplies to the merchants. As I said just now, these are facts, amply sufficient to show that the government's present policy in the matter of controls is absolutely nefarious. Against the facts I have adduced, nothing has been advanced so far but theoretical considerations. It is claimed that frightful chaos would follow in the wake of decontrol, but I have yet to hear facts in support of such a claim.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this control policy. I feel that the people of this country should no longer be subjected to the whims of bureaucrats. I know that Canada has all the resources required to avoid a predicament such as I have just described. If it were proved that certain controls are still necessary, then, Mr. Speaker, the government should assume its responsibilities. Let the ministers assume responsibility, let them take away dictatorial powers from irresponsible bureaucrats and when I have cause to complain of conditions such as I have just described, I shall know just what minister to blame.

(Text):

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I was going to claim sabotage, because I have been squirming about in my seat, jumping up every little while during the past two hours, and I am sure I have worn my pants as much tonight as ordinarily would be the case in a month.

Canada is a big business, with a great many branches such as agriculture, mining, transportation and so forth. This great business is owned by its shareholders, the citizens of Canada. I do not know who would own this great business but the people of Canada; and when the matter of controls comes up I immediately ask myself: control whom, by whom, and for what purpose? The greatest of all controls is taxation, and I went into the library for the sole purpose of reading up a little on taxation. I opened the encyclopaedia and noticed one quotation from what I must assume to be the greatest authority in the world on this matter. I called the librarian and asked if he would obtain for me the book by that author. In about the time it would take me to pluck a chicken he brought it to me, and here it is. I see a page boy has just brought me some water. I hereby christen this book, representing orthodox political economy, under the name of "Bureaucratic Blanc-Mange". I should explain what I mean by blanc-mange. That is a French word meaning nothing more or less than plain, ordinary cornstarch pudding, spelled "pudd'n". Perhaps I should explain what I mean by bureaucratic blanc-mange. It does not matter what problem may face us; it does not matter what definition we seek, there is only one place to go for the answer. That is back to nature, so let us go back to the farm.

My wife has reminded me that unless I go over my hives we are not going to get the honey we deserve. So of course I ask her where I left this, that and the other thing, as is natural with most husbands. She tells me where I left everything, and I gather up the various odds and ends required, such as a bee veil, a smoker, an old piece of sacking, some matches, some toothpicks to pry into suspicious looking cells, a little pair of scissors to clip the wings of the queen, and a hundred and one things including a notebook and pencil to keep a record of each hive, and I start off toward the hives looking like Robinson Crusoe. But I am stopped by my little daughter, who pulls at my overalls and says, "Daddy, if I help you with the bees will you give me all the honey from one hive"? What father could refuse such a request? Taking note of her delicate little hands and fingers, I see an opportunity to have that child pick up the queen bee so that I can clip her wings without injuring her. I arrive before a hive, ready to operate, as it were, and I say to my daughter, "A little anaesthetic", meaning a little smoke; I tap on the top of the hive, indicating that I am coming in; I ask for the hive tool, and open up the bowels of the hive exposing the combs. I lift out a comb. There on the bottom are queen cells, and I begin to cut them away. My little girl notices a specialized substance in these cells and inquires what it is. So I explain that a queen bee lays eggs, that when those eggs hatch out they are fed a normal diet and worker bees emerge. Fed a specialized diet, drone bees emerge. They are the ones that live on the products of the toil of the others. Fed a highly specialized food called "royal jelly", the larvae will hatch out and turn into royal queens.

I take one of these cells, about the size of an elongated thimble, and squeeze a glob out of it and offer it to the child, saying, "Taste it." She, being like her mother, keeping one eye on business and the other eye on me, says, "You taste it first." Well, I can't very well back out, so I take some in my mouth but I immediately turn my face from her because it shrivels up my tonsils till they are like a dried prune; the roots of my back teeth shimmy in their sockets and I am rendered temporarily cross-eyed. However, with a gulp I quickly recover my normal composure, face her again and say, "There, you see; it is all right." She asks, "You didn't spit it out?" and I truthfully reply "Oh, no, I didn't spit it out. I swallowed it, and now it is your turn." I squeeze a great glob of it, including the wriggly larvae, or maggot, into her pretty little mouth. The immediate result startled me, for she licked her pretty little lips, looked up into my face and said, "That's pretty good stuff, eh, daddy?" The ultimate result, however, was astounding; for ever since that day the child has stood at the top of her class in school, and I have become a member of parliament.

This bureaucratic blanc-mange is very similar to royal jelly, because if this is fed to unsuspecting, gaping, gullible students they are certain to turn into bureaucrats.

I now open the book, and here are two full pages of testimonials. Let me read just a couple of the shortest, just one sentence. Here they are from Leland Stanford university; Brimfield, Massachusetts; the Idaho Industrial Institute; Boston university; the university of Chicago; Liege, in Belgium; Columbia university, the university of Kansas, the university of Texas, Yale university and so on. Here is a short testimonial by one of these professors of political economy:

> It contains admirable features, and I shall recommend it to our students.

Here is another:

> It is, I think, the best . . . treatise that I have read. How clear and simple it is!

This, hon. members will understand, is the real cat's whiskers. Let us see what this man says in regard to taxation. He starts out by saying, "First of all, students, you must never forget"; that is the way these professors, with profound dignity of deportment, speak to these poor, gullible students. He says:

> First of all, it is to be remembered that taxation . . . may be looked upon as a blessing...

That is his opinion. My opinion is that it is a blessed evil—and I believe my opinion is just as good as his. But listen to what he says further on:

> Taxation stimulates individuals to endeavour by increased industry and economy to repair the breach taxation has made in their fortunes.

Can you imagine that! In other words, if you are out fishing in a rowboat, with your family, don't let the kids know, but just carry a small axe along with you, and knock a hole in the bottom of the boat. The whole family will be stimulated with renewed efforts to repair the breach you have made in the boat. And that is the sort of bureaucratic blanc-mange that is fed to students in this day and age.

Let us have a look at these bureaucrats. At the time of confederation they claimed, mind you, that we owed a tremendous amount of money. They said we owed $93 million. Under their careful, painstaking, thorough and efficient supervision it increased to $500 million in 1912, to $544 million in 1914, to $1,000 million —a billion dollars—in 1917, to $2 billion in 1919, to $3 billion in 1920. In 1939 it was $3,710 million and in 1946 it was $17 billion. And these bureaucrats want us to hand over controls to them today! Can you imagine it!

Here are the shareholders of this great business of Canada, which has been so wonderfully prosperous and has produced untold wealth in coal, in food stuffs, in oil and tar sands, in everything imaginable under the sun. And then these bureaucrats actually tell us we have been operating at a loss. Don't believe it. It is not true. I claim that the people of Canada, the shareholders of this business, have been robbed and deceived all these years into believing that these bureaucrats have been doing their duty faithfully, when in fact they have been sabotaging the resources of this country, which belong to the people. That is why we say it is time an accurate and true record was kept of our business and a dividend paid. I am certain of this, that no country in the world can show such prosperity as Canada. No business in the world can pay such dividends to its shareholders as can this dominion.

I am a farmer, a practical one, and it grieves me to know that the people of Canada, who are so trusting, will actually permit themselves to be so sabotaged. Look at this, as an example: In 1944, in hogs alone we produced 8,863,830. And we produced them at a time when the majority of our able-bodied young men and women were away from home. Taxation officials were not imposing such restrictions upon us at that time; they were leaving us alone. But no sooner was the war over than the enemy set its troops on the farmers throughout western Canada. They have not bothered the people in Quebec, because they know very well what would happen there. But out in western Canada these enemy troops have attacked agriculture, claiming that they are after money to pay debts—to pay for this, that, and the other thing; whereas their real objective is to pry and spy into the affairs of every person in Canada, and to keep a record for no other purpose than that of establishing socialism. And that is right here in Canada. It is a domesday book; that is true.

It is an old trick, as old as the hills. Here is the communist manifesto. What does the second paragraph in the list say? It says that there must be a heavy and progressive or graduated income tax against all the people. Is that not what we are doing now? You cannot establish communism until you do impose a heavy income tax upon the people, robbing them of their hard-earned money and rendering individuals dependent upon the state. That is the only objective of taxation —to enslave the people of this country.

What in the world are we doing today, I wonder? Why, at the time of the Petition of Right, the people were not afraid of kings. Listen to this. Paragraph 4 reads:

> Resolved that the ancient and undoubted right of every free man is, that he hath a full and absolute property in his goods and estate, and that no tax, tallage, loan, benevolence or other like charge ought to be commanded or levied by the king or any of his ministers, without common assent by act of parliament.

The whole issue at stake at that time was between members of parliament—the House of Commons—and the king. The whole fight today is between the House of Commons—hon. members who sit here—and the bureaucrats, and bureaucracy. Are we afraid of bureaucrats?

In the year 1100, in connection with the Arabs, I read this:

> Eleven hundred years after the birth of Christ we find conditions very similar to our own existing. Taxation reached burdensome proportions, farms were neglected, soil robbed of its fertility, sand storms, dust storms, plagues and famine stalked the land. The people finally revolted against socialism and communism and once more began anew.

That was away back in the year 1100. It states further:

> The subjugated people shared in a common fate of excessive taxation and oppressive rule. No wonder if under such conditions no creative work in art or literature was produced.

That was written by Professor Philip K. Hitti, of Princeton university, in his book, "The Arab".

Now let us see what has happened to our hog production. It is reported that in 1944 we produced 8,863,830 hogs. Last year the production had dropped to 4,465,159, or a loss of nearly 4,500,000 hogs. These bureaucrats would tell you that it is because Mars winked at Venus, and she let him down, or something of the kind. They will give you some excuse. The reason is that these controls are being used for no other purpose than to restrict production. If these bureaucrats do not know the results that are going to ensue they ought to be fired, discharged—dishonourably discharged—from their duties. That is what I would do, if I were in a position to do it. There would not be a deputy minister in his office tomorrow morning.

Can you imagine the shareholders of this great business, the people of Canada, being insulted and ruled by these dictatorial bureaucrats?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Sold down the river.

[Mr. Ashby.]

Mr. ASHBY: Yes. Controls usurp the legitimate sovereignty of the people. That being true, those who seek to usurp the rights, powers and privileges of the sovereign people of Canada are guilty of high treason. That is a serious charge. The people of Canada can and, I believe, should demand the arrest of every deputy minister employed in every department and place them on trial for the serious offence of high treason. I think we would get some results if that happened and I should like to give evidence at such a trial. The power to tax is the power to destroy and that is the only reason why they have usurped this power.

Away back in the time of Charles I, the people through their representatives protested against government by order in council. The authority for the forced loan at that time came from the council. Those who refused to pay, those who revolted against that undemocratic compulsory law were examined by the council. The protest of the members of parliament was that the council was taking upon itself both the functions of the judicial courts and those of parliament, and that is exactly what these bureaucrats are doing today.

Let us see what the Lord Chief Justice of England has to say about this. I do not think any other country in the world can claim to have greater justices than those to be found within the British empire. I should like to quote from the book, "The New Despotism" by Right Hon. Lord Hewart of Bury, and I read from page 11 as follows:

> A little inquiry will serve to show that there is now, and for some years past has been, a persistent influence at work which, whatever the motives or the intentions that support it may be thought to be, undoubtedly has the effect of placing a large and increasing field of departmental authority and activity beyond the reach of the ordinary law.

And later on:

> . . . a despotic power which at one and the same time places government departments above the sovereignty of parliament and beyond the jurisdiction of the courts.

And again:

> That there is in existence, and in certain quarters in the ascendant, a genuine belief that parliamentary institutions and the rule of law have been tried and found wanting, and that the time has come for the departmental despot, who shall be at once scientific and benevolent, but above all a law to himself, needs no demonstration.

And again:

> It is that the whole scheme of self-government is being undermined, and that, too, in a way which no self-respecting people, if they were aware of the facts, would for a moment tolerate

And again:

. . . the goal . . . is to subordinate parliament, to evade the courts, and to render the will, or the caprice, of the executive unfettered and supreme.

Coming, as it does, from such an authority as that, we should realize the meaning of controls.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When was that book published?

Mr. ASHBY: It was reprinted in 1945. I noticed a small article in the Edmonton Bulletin by Harold L. Weir, a very wise man, which I should like to put on the record because it bears directly on this matter. It reads:

Decline of Parliament

There is no doubt that the power of the Canadian parliament and especially the power of the House of Commons has declined seriously in this generation. This gradual undermining of parliamentary authority may well be regarded as the most sinister development of this age.

The Canadian constitution, that is to say, the constitution of tradition as well as of statute, was developed on the democratic principle that primary governmental authority should be vested in the smallest units of government and the larger units should enjoy residual authority.

In other words, all government possible for the municipality to effect should be in the hands of municipal or civic councils. All affairs which are beyond the municipality but are within the scope of the province, should be left with the provincial legislatures. Inter-provincial or foreign matters are clearly the business of the central government at Ottawa.

The present trend is decidedly away from this basic principle.

Thus, the current dispute between the provinces and Ottawa is clearly more than a question of subsidies and taxation. It involves centralization of control in Ottawa. And that centralization of control is daily violating to a more alarming degree the democratic structure of this country.

Every power that is stripped from the municipality or the province is an unhappy step towards the fascist system.

During war time, centralization of control was perhaps an emergent necessity. Some vestige of central control may be essential while the nation moves into normality again.

But it is utterly wrong to argue that centralization must be maintained on the grounds of efficiency because efficiency is not the first consideration in a governmental system.

Efficiency is an excellent objective. But when the steps taken to secure efficiency destroy even better objectives, efficiency can become dangerous.

Freedom of enterprise, for instance, is infinitely more vital than mere efficiency. And controls necessary in a war economy can very easily become intolerable bonds once the need for them is gone.

Italy was translated into a corporate state to give the people employment and to "make the trains run on time." These were splendid purposes. But in the achievement of them the Italian people lost their freedom and very nearly lost their souls.

The centralization of power became so great in Italy that the common man became a slave.

And that is the great danger today in Canada. Once we restrict the right of the common member of the Canadian Commons to have a free voice in every public policy we will have lost much of our democratic right of governing ourselves. No matter what is gained in efficiency or financial yields or even administrative economy, the loss in democratic freedom is frighteningly greater.

The Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley to the contrary, the cabinet must be the servant of parliament. It governs the country, not by a divine right, but by the will of the people. Once we assume that governmental power is derived from elsewhere than the people's will, we are throwing overboard the very fundaments of democracy.

The member who permits himself to be dominated by a party whip is untrue to his functions. When a man is elected to represent a constituency, he must raise his voice in behalf of that constituency no matter what his party says or thinks.

Does that practice prevail today? It is so rare as to be practically non-existent.

If liberal and democratic ideals are not to go into eclipse before an encroaching fascism or a protesting socialism, the early power of parliament must be restored. The necessities of the war years must cease to shackle democracy.

It is only too easy, because Ottawa presently holds the purse strings to sometimes surrender rights for security.

It is an evil deal. To trade freedom for security is a precarious business. To have security without freedom is to be in chains.

I happened to discover quite by accident the cause of our difficulties. I played hooky the other night and went down to see some of the members of those adorable creatures the fair sex skating at the ice carnival. I paid $2 for my seat, but I lost about thirty-five cents worth of my enjoyment when my mind was brought back to parliament. Of course I went there because I could see more of these beauties than I ordinarily could on the street and therefore could admire them the more. I asked myself the question, how on earth can any human male possibly avoid marrying one of them? In fact I think so much of them that I would have married a half dozen of them by this time if my wife had not kept her eye on me and I had not watched myself pretty closely. How on earth any young Canadian could possibly sit on a sofa with one of these lovely creatures and edge away from her is more than I can say. Right then and there it struck me like a bolt from the blue that Canada has suffered for over a quarter of a century from bachelor administration.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I am sorry that I shall not be able to follow the previous speaker.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The house could not, either.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): May I say that the war was won on the battlefields, in the air, on the seas, on the farms and in the factories and that on the present emergency powers measure, in reply to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken) agreed that the main debate should take place on the second reading of the bill which will be introduced following this resolution rather than on the resolution stage. However the leader of the socialist group (Mr. Coldwell) did not agree with this and, since then, we have listened to some thirty odd speeches, fifteen of them by members of the government and five by members of the C.C.F. group to my left.

In speaking on this measure on the evening of March 20, the leader of the socialist group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, as reported at page 1588 of Hansard:

We should, in the interests of the Canadian people, not only maintain useful controls but, in some instances, even reimpose controls that have been lifted.

At page 1590 he also said:

We believe in social planning and public control.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have had fine examples of social planning both in Germany and in Russia.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Does the hon. member make any distinction between the countries?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I do not know how much there is.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member does not make any?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Other speakers have said it is no wonder that the farmers are worried about their costs of production and so on. I have compared the arguments of these same people of that group of a year ago with their arguments of this session. I well remember that when we were debating the wheat issue in 1946 these people as a group unanimously swallowed hook, line and sinker with respect to the United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement. Some of the same speakers today are endeavouring to crawl out from under. With reference to the inference of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) may I just give one or two quotations taken from Hansard of the war years of the remarks made by the socialist leader of the group, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. In the House of Commons on June 5, 1940, as reported at page 545 of Hansard, during the discussion on the unemployment relief and agricultural distress measure at that time, the hon. member said:

The secret of the recent success of the Germans is the fact they have consciously planned their economic structure.

Then on March 18, 1942, at page 1430 of Hansard, on the war appropriation—

Mr. NICHOLSON: Read it all.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have not time to read the whole speech.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Then the hon. member must be doing it for a diabolical purpose.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member said:

On the other hand, we have another nation with another theory called communism . . . the basis was planning . . . The basis was the control and utilization of the economic resources and labour of those nations . . . They did a remarkable job in a short space of time.

Then on July 11, 1940, again at page 1520 of Hansard the same member said:

Policies and controls advocated by the British Labour party are the same as the policies advocated by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Then some question was asked my good friend, the hon. member for Melfort, (Mr. Wright) who is a fine successful farmer. The question was: "What about the nationalization of land?" The leader of the C.C.F. party said, on November 14, 1940, as reported at page 117 of Hansard:

My conception of the programme and philosophy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation is that they are the same as the programme and philosophy of the British Labour party.

Therefore there is that planning in all these various nations.

I was surprised this afternoon in listening to the speech of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine), who belongs to the same group, on taxation. He severely condemned the farmers who had continued to farm while the grain exchange and such other people whom he mentioned, took the profit until the farmer went broke and still continued to farm but then refused to milk cows and feed pigs for Ilsley. I wrote down exactly the words that he used this afternoon. I can quite understand the hon. member and several others of his colleagues not knowing very much about farm problems; but I would think he might have consulted his farmer colleagues of the socialist group before making such a statement about the farmers of this nation. I think it was rather uncalled for.

I wish to make some comparisons of prices in Canada and the United States as of March 4, 1947. This is the price of wheat per bushel —and this at North Portal. For any hon. members who do not know where North Portal is, may I say that it is on the boundary line, half in Canada in the constituency west of mine and half in the United States. It is rather an odd situation. The man who takes his bushel of wheat into the elevator on the Canadian side as of March 4 received at that elevator $1.20 a bushel. A few yards across the street in an elevator in the United States his neighbour received $2.22 for the same type of wheat.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What did he pay for his bread in the other place?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I shall come to that a little later. Barley per bushel—and these are figures for Cartwright, Manitoba, in my own riding, and Searle's, North Dakota, right across the border—67 cents in Canada and $1.65 in North Dakota; oats 52 cents in Canada and 74 cents in the United States; a 1,000-pound steer, a good finished animal, would net the Canadian producer $140; the United States producer, $255; a 210-pound hog would bring in Canada approximately $34 as compared with $61 in Chicago.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have not much time. I should be very glad to answer the question when I complete my remarks if the hon. member will ask me then.

As of March 1, 1947, to purchase a Farmall M. tractor, International company tractor, in Canada required 1,225 bushels of wheat; in the United States, 710 bushels of wheat. To purchase a 3-furrow International tractor plow in Canada required 151 bushels of wheat; in the United States, 82 bushels. To purchase a 24-run International double disc seeder in Canada required 270 bushels of wheat; in the United States, 146 bushels. To purchase a 10-foot International binder in Canada required 333 bushels of wheat; in the United States 184 bushels. To purchase the same tractor in Canada would require slightly over the price of eleven finished 1,000 pound steers that I have spoken of, while in the United States the same type of tractor would require the proceeds of only slightly over six such animals. In the matter of hogs it would require forty-six select hogs weighing 210 pounds in Canada or twenty-six such hogs in the United States to purchase the same type of tractor. After all, what you can purchase with the goods that the farmer produces is what he is interested in. To purchase the same type of tractor in Canada would require on that date 2,365 bushels of barley; in the United States, 955 bushels. According to a press report from a reliable paper, dated March 10, 1947 the International Harvester Company announced that it would institute, by April 1 of this year or before, reductions in prices of many lines of tractors, farm machines and motor trucks. Mr. McCormick estimated the price cuts would save harvester customers $20 million a year. Within the past few days these price reductions have been announced, running in some instances to as high as a ten per cent reduction in the prices of certain types of tractors and machines. The disparity in the purchase price of automobiles, as most people know, in each country is at least twenty-five per cent greater than is the disparity on farm implements. More than that, the people employed in the United States receive a greater remuneration for their services than people working on like jobs do in Canada. That is also recognized, and the point there is that the standard of living is higher in the United States than it is in Canada.

Some mention was made this evening about the production of live stock in this country. The greatest production of hogs for market in the history of Canada was in 1944, and that rather on a sound economic basis as compared with some of the controls we have developed in the later years. Out of a total of 8,863,178 hogs, 5,768,046 were produced in the prairie provinces where the grain was also produced to feed the animals. Alberta led all provinces that year, producing 2,981,940 hogs. In 1946, Canada as a whole produced only 4,465,161 hogs. May I also add that during 1945 there were in Canada some 6,760,000 beef cattle, and of that total 3,596,000 were in the three prairie provinces.

We have some of these controls in this omnibus bill applying to the agricultural food board and agricultural products, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), in a statement on March 17, said that the production of dairy products, meat, poultry and eggs in 1947-48 will depend upon the feed supplies available in the form of pasture, fodder and grain produced in this country, and that, effective March 18, the system of advance equalization payments will be discontinued and the Canadian wheat board will stand ready to buy all oats and barley offered at new support prices, in the case of barley the floor price to be ninety cents a bushel and in the case of oats, 61½ cents a bushel. These support prices remain in effect until July 31, 1948.

Because of the continuation of price ceilings on animal products, payments of ten cents a bushel on oats and twenty-five cents a bushel on barley will be made under the same conditions as the twenty-five cent payment on wheat purchased for feeding purposes. The government will continue to pay freight on grain for feeding purposes shipped east from Fort William or Port Arthur and west from Calgary and Edmonton until July 31, 1948, and the Canadian wheat board, either directly or through agents, will become the sole exporter of oats and barley.

Now on the basis of requiring twenty bushels of barley to produce a select hog, that twenty-five cents a bushel rebate to the hog producer other than on the prairies gives that producer a $5 per hog advantage, and in the free freight on his feed alone, and in transportation cost on the dressed hog there is approximately $4 difference as between Montreal and Edmonton, thus giving the eastern hog producer approximately $9 per hog advantage over the man in the prairies who may produce both the grain and the hogs on the very same farm.

Not only have we under these controls the great disparity, as set forth, as between the United States and Canada, but we have this great disparity in several sections of Canada, with the taxpayer of Canada settling for the difference under his or her personal income tax. As of November 30, 1946, these freight assistance and feed grain subsidy payments amounted to $105,081,627.62. That is quite an item which the taxpayers of the country had to account for in connection with that system of controls, which to me is not a sound economy for this country.

I have here a copy of an advertisement sponsored by the dominion government and appearing in various newspapers of western Canada during the spring of 1941:

> Help Canada win the war by growing less wheat in 1941. See the secretary of your municipality. He can help with your application. Get your application completed by May 1, 1941, if possible. Published by authority of the dominion Department of Agriculture.

When you think back over the past few years and compare this with what I have termed on previous occasions the ridiculous 1946 United Kingdom-Canada wheat agreement, and further controls that place an unfair burden on the wheat producers of the country, I think it is interesting. The same case might be made, I understand, with respect to the potato producers of the maritimes or the milk and cheese producers of Ontario and Quebec. My colleague the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) speaking on March 6—his remarks may be found at page 1069 of Hansard—placed on the record at that time a brief submitted to the cabinet on November 28, 1946, last, containing a detailed statement of the cost of producing 100 pounds of milk for sale to cheese factories, condenseries and creameries. And so the same situation obtains under these controls in various sections from coast to coast.

I am quite convinced that the reason for so many shortages in essential goods today is to be found in these controls. Many big business interests have rather liked the controls. They prospered under them during the war years. These controls gave them markets and freed them from competition which would probably have come from many small business people in the country.

As has been said in previous debates on this matter, you cannot have it both ways. It has been next to impossible for some time to procure proper clothing in Canada for young children. I am surprised that some of my hon. friends who spoke earlier did not cite that fact along with their other arguments. Let them ask mother how difficult she finds it to obtain satisfactory clothing for young children.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Also ask them about controls.

Mr. HACKETT: We do not have to; we know.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It has been very difficult and in some cases really impossible for some veterans to set themselves up in small business owing to these controls. Quite a few of these cases have come to my notice and I have taken them up with various controllers. When I could not get a satisfactory decision from them I took the matter up later with the responsible minister in charge of the wartime prices and trade board, or with his deputy minister. They gave me a courteous hearing and due consideration, but on no occasion did they upset or reverse the decision of the controller who had first determined the question with respect to the establishment of these young men in business. It may be true enough, as the minister said the other day in rebuttal of the hon. member for Eglinton, that there were shortages, but the shortages were distinctly brought about by the operation of the controls.

We have the present deplorable veterans housing muddle in Canada as a shining example today. Just today in the mail I received a letter from one in my constituency, from Boissevain, Manitoba, from rather a different angle. He said:

> As president this year of the Boissevain hockey club I would like if you would draw the attention of the minister who this applies to, we have bought this year over $400 of hockey sticks and the sample of stick is a disgrace for the price that we have had to pay, $2.75, which before the war a better stick could be bought for $1.50 and besides about six or seven sticks would be broken each game.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Shame.

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

We go on record that unless our manufacturers down east at Brantford and other places can't do something about the sticks that they are putting out that the government allow sticks to enter from the United States duty free, they have a far better stick as has been proven in Winnipeg this year when American college teams played in the city.

May I add that this chap was an ardent supporter of this government in the past. I am not surprised that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) says "shame," because he probably will not have the same interest in these young chaps coming along playing hockey and taking part in sports that many fathers necessarily must have.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): It was a good game Saturday.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How are the broomsticks out there?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The operation of these controls is greatly responsible for the necessity of the heavy taxation of the past few years and of the present. This in turn affects the pockets of the average taxpayer in all sections of Canada. I do not think there is any argument about that. As a result, production of many essential goods has been slowed up in Canada. The cost of living index for Canada, as of December 1946, shows an increase of twenty-seven per cent since 1939. Ask any housewife in Canada if she believes that figure. Also ask her about the quality of material in the goods of 1939 as compared with the quality today. I am not arguing that every housewife in Canada desires to get rid of all these controls.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No; you bet you are not.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But anyone I have yet discussed the question with says that it is just a matter of timing and that they would have been better off without many of the controls.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member has been talking just to hockey players.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I have talked to some of those good officials of the United church that the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) referred to the other evening.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Name one who says he wants to have controls removed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): A good many blame the present shortage of materials on the operation of these controls over the past few years.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Name one who wants them removed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And if there happens to be one, two, or three of those controls which cannot be eliminated, it is because of the muddle and jam we find ourselves in today as a result of controls during the last few years.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Brooms and hockey sticks. The hon. member for Souris said that he would answer a question.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish to ask a couple. I am sorry if I interrupted the hon. member, but he did not hesitate to interrupt me the other night. But I can take it and apparently he cannot. I should like to ask the hon. member for Souris two questions. What is the difference in the cost of living—I am glad my hon. friend behind the hon. member for Souris told him to be careful.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He did not. He was trying to get me to join the Anglican church.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right. Bring in the rest of your party and I will take them on. The question I wish to ask is this: What is the difference between the cost of living in the United States, including the cost of dairy feed, and the cost of living in Canada? Can the hon. member answer that?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I said that I have not the figure; and I said I did not believe the figure we have for the index in Canada gave a true picture.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You bet you cannot give the figure. I wish to ask another question.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member said he would answer a question.

An hon. MEMBER: He did.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have another question.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): All right; ask it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will you answer it?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I will try.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Speaker, he said he would answer it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If I can.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will ask him to answer this question, if he can, which I doubt very much. I do not come from a wheat district—

An hon. MEMBER: Don't get mad, George.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not getting mad. You never saw me mad. Could we sell Canadian wheat in the United States at the price quoted by the hon. member for Souris, if it was permitted?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We had no desire to sell wheat in the United States, but we can sell it for practically one dollar a bushel higher than the figure I gave in the United States, in many other overseas countries today. If the hon. member will consult the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), they will tell him that in recent months, they refused a deal of some millions of bushels with other countries.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member did not answer my question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, let it go. They are afraid.

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I interrupted the cross-fire that was going on. I can assure you that I enjoyed it as much as other hon. members did.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are you on my side?

Mr. BURTON: If the hon. member waits until we are through, he will be more pleased than ever. I would also say that the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) presented his case in an able manner; and while I cannot agree with him in his line or argument, at the same time I believe that both he and I have something very much in common, namely, that we both consider this to be a much too serious business for us to enter into the frivolous side, as we sometimes do. I can assure you, sir, that, like the hon. member for Souris, I shall not endeavour to emulate the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby).

The question before us is one of great concern to all the citizens of this country. In my humble opinion, this house and the country are divided into three camps. One is a small but sometimes very vocal minority, speaking for a small minority in the country, which would do away with controls willy-nilly, so that those who would fatten on the necessities of the people would have their way. The other group, as I see it, is represented in this house by a small number, also representing possibly the same proportion out in the country, who would like to do away with controls. In fact, they are anxious to decontrol as fast as possible, but having taken hold of the tail of that pussycat they do not like to let it go or possibly are alarmed at the consequences if they did let go. In the third camp that I mentioned are members of this group. While we are in a small number in this house, I believe that we are speaking for the large majority of the people out in the country, the citizens who are vitally affected by this question of control or decontrol. We believe that we are speaking for them when we say we need these controls just as much to win the peace as we needed them to win the war. It is my humble opinion, Mr. Speaker, that had the government not undertaken the controls which they did undertake during the time of war, our road to victory would have been much more difficult, if not even impossible.

My leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and other members of this group have since this debate began, placed on the record in an able manner the stand we take, and it is not my intention to belabour the point much more this evening. In fact, I can assure you, sir, that it had not been my intention to take part in this debate at all until a certain question was brought into it by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey). In my opinion, it was ill-advised on his part, and, if not irresponsible at least misleading, when he made a statement that no sincere Catholic could be a true socialist. He gave only part of the story. He took only one short sentence out of the paragraph. I know where he took it from. It is in the encyclical quadragesimo anno by the late Pope Pius XI, from which the hon. member for Trinity took that one small sentence:

> No one can, at the same time, be a sincere Catholic and a true socialist.

I am sorry the hon. member is not in his seat at the moment, because in the short time at my disposal this evening I hope we may have this question straightened out once and for all. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is with the utmost regret I find it necessary to enter into a discussion of this kind. Had the hon. member read at least the whole paragraph, the story would have been quite different. The heading is, "Catholic and socialist are contradictory terms". The late pope said this:

> If, like all errors, socialism contains a certain element of truth (and this the Sovereign Pontiffs have never denied), it is nevertheless founded upon a doctrine of human society peculiarly its own, which is opposed to true Christianity, "Religious socialism," "Christian socialism," are expressions implying a contradiction in terms.

I would point out that when this was written the Conservatives had not yet established a contradiction in terms by adding to their name the word "Progressive". Times are changing. I would say that the church to which I belong condemns in no uncertain terms the type of socialism that interferes with a person's religious beliefs, which is opposed to Christianity and totally opposed to the ownership of private property; and that is the only kind of socialism the church recognizes as such. I would point out further for the benefit of the hon. member that as the years have gone by, we have had many different kinds of socialism throughout the world; and for want of a better term we have applied to the philosophy and principles of the C.C.F. the expression "socialist", because the fundamental principles of our policy are to build laws around the protection of society rather than the protection of capital. I would also point out to the hon. member if he were in his seat that I take my religious instruction from the authorities of the Roman Catholic church and do not need to go to Tory Toronto for it. Eight years ago, almost to the day, I had to rise in my place in the legislature of Saskatchewan and tell a Liberal of like mind that I did not need to take my religious instruction from the Liberal party. I never thought I would be called on to rise in my place in this august chamber and deal with a matter of this kind.

As I mentioned, there are different kinds of socialism. I am not attributing any motive to the hon. member for Trinity, but why did he bring this matter into this debate at this time? I know from experience that on different occasions people have tried to put me on what they called a spot by asking, "Are you a socialist? If so, you cannot be a member of the church to which you profess to belong." I say that politics in this country have reached a very low level if we must put up with that kind of thing. Those people should stop and consider how unfair they are. For instance, if I were to ask the genial and honourable Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) "Are you a Christian?" his answer certainly would be, "By all means." Would I then be justified in saying, "Oh, but you are a member of the Salvation Army"? Or if I were to ask the hon. member for Trinity, "Are you a Christian?" he would certainly and quite properly answer, "Yes, by all means." Would I then be justified in saying, "Oh, but you are one of Jehovah's Witnesses"? I ask for a little fairness in these things. Ever since I have been around in the world I have adhered to the teaching of my father, which was, "Let every man practise his religion according to the dictates of his conscience."

I said a while ago I wanted to get the record straight. I have another quotation from the same encyclical from which the hon. member for Trinity took one small sentence. Here is a paragraph entitled, "Domination has followed from free competition." It goes on:

> In the first place, then, it is patent that in our days not alone is wealth accumulated, but immense power and despotic economic domination is concentrated in the hands of a few, and that those few are frequently not the owners, but only the trustees and directors of invested funds, who administer them at their good pleasure.
> This power becomes particularly irresistible when exercised by those who, because they hold and control money, are able also to govern credit and determine its allotment, for that reason supplying, so to speak, the lifeblood to the entire economic body, and grasping, as it were, in their hands the very soul of production, so that no one dare breathe against their will.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member did not read that part.

Mr. BURTON: Quite right; the hon. member did not read that part. I would also ask what party in this house has gone farther than the party to which the hon. member belongs in helping to foster those very conditions that are being spoken of. There is a further quotation in the same encyclical that I should like to read:

> . . . for it is rightly contended that certain forms of property must be reserved to the state, since they carry with them an opportunity of domination too great to be left to private individuals without injury to the community at large.

I contend that if we gave full sway to those interests which are so determined to have decontrol, to have everything thrown back into the hands of those who would use the power of their economic dictatorship, it is those people who would bring about an undesirable form of socialism or communism in this country, rather than the C.C.F. or any other group.

May I give one final quotation from an address entitled, "The Catholic Church and the C.C.F.," delivered on the trans-Canada Catholic broadcast, October 24, 1943, by Reverend C. J. Foran, D.D., St. Anthony's Pro-Cathedral, Edmonton, Alberta, in which he said:

> Catholic social teaching will permit the nationalization of industries and facilities which must be nationalized to protect or ensure the common good. Thus far we can certainly go. The Co-operative Commonwealth Federation advocates the socialization of banking, transportation, communications, electric power and all other industries and services essential to social planning. Among the industries listed as essential to social planning the C.C.F. manifesto included mining, pulp and paper and the distribution of milk, coal and gasoline.

I wish the hon. member for Trinity to pay special attention to this:

The statement issued by the bishops of Canada after their recent conference in Quebec indicates that the gap between the Catholic position which allows for the nationalization of industries that need to be nationalized to protect the common good and the programme of those who call for the socialization of such industries as mining, pulp and paper and the distribution of milk, coal and gasoline—that gap can be bridged with safety.

Again let me express my hope that never again will a member in this august chamber, be he Jew, Gentile, Protestant or Catholic, find it necessary to defend his being in this party or that party because he belongs to a different religious sect or community.

I would say to the house that in our humble way we realize that we are only human beings. As human beings we have our faults and failings. As a human organization the party to which I have the honour to belong also has its shortcomings. But even so has the House of Commons its shortcomings, simply because it is a human institution. And so long as we bear in mind the ultimate end for which our Creator created us, and the destiny toward which we are all working, I hope that we may humbly walk in that way.

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate, I have but a few observations to make, and I should like to deal with them as they affect the riding I have the honour to represent.

I wish, first, to deal with butter, and the price control of that product. The ultimate result is, of course, a reduction in production. Along with that comes the threat of oleomargarine. It is a threat to the dairy farmers of Canada. May I observe right here that if it is proper to protect industry and to protect labour, it is equally proper to protect the farmer from the importation of this product of cheap labour.

Another indication of the threat to farmers lies in the importation of New Zealand butter. In an order for return tabled some time ago, it was shown that the farmers of New Zealand were receiving 28·35 cents a pound for butter. I would ask the socialists to my left to explain how the farmers in New Zealand can be prosperous when selling butter at that price.

Another factor which enters into the picture lies in the fact that we spent $24 million a year on butter subsidies. During the war years we were told that we paid only half of our expenditures in this direction, the remainder being borrowed. In other words, $12 million a year that was spent on butter subsidies is still to be paid. Our children's children will be paying for butter, milk and other subsidized foods consumed during the war years. I do not believe they will find it as easy to pay as we would have found it.

People have money to buy luxuries. They buy drinks of all kinds, and yet they want to have their milk subsidized. In this connection, may I make a few comparisons. On February 12, while butter was selling at forty-four cents a pound, Mr. Coulter, a general merchant in my home town, gave me figures showing that the price of lard was twenty-seven cents a pound; shortening, thirty cents, Mazola oil, thirty-seven cents, and Lux soap flakes, thirty-two cents. No one complained about those prices, but they did complain about increases in the price of butter. It is easy to bear down on the farmer who did not object to these things being done in the city, where no objection was made to increases in the price of manufactured products. But the little increases paid on farm products—oh, they were terrible!

The milk subsidies alone amount to about one-half the money paid out in family allowances. But people did not want to use family allowances to buy milk; they wanted those moneys for other luxuries, while at the same time subsidizing milk consumption.

At this time I should like to say a word or two about steel and hardware controls. Certainly they are working to a disadvantage, so far as the farmers in Middlesex county are concerned. Ilderton farmers cooperative say that lumber has never been so scarce. Farmers needing lumber for repairs have found it impossible to obtain it. Letters from Thorndale, Hyde Park, Dorchester and Glanworth complain of shortages. Small villages and towns in my community say that farmers are asked to produce in quantity and to maintain quality, while at the same time accepting immigrant labour. And what do they get for it? They get no nails, no lumber, no steel, no wire and no roofing.

A recent fire destroyed a service garage in the town of Lambeth. I was approached to have some steel made available so that quick repairs could be made in order to enable the proprietor to continue to give service to farm tractors, cars and trucks in the community. The steel controller advised me that there was no steel control, and that if I could obtain it from the manufacturer it would be all right. I approached a certain manufacturer and he said, "Yes, you can have the steel." But about the time it was to be delivered someone said, "No, you cannot have it." And there is no roof on that garage yet.

Recently the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) stated there was no shortage of nails. After he was questioned, it developed that those nails were of aluminum. They were about three times the regular price, and certainly were not suitable for farm repairs since, in many instances, hard lumber is used in farm equipment and construction.

Hyde Park reports that there are no nails in the stores in that area, and none in sight at the wholesalers. Dorchester reports a very short supply of nails, and not enough spikes in town to build a hog trough. There are no steel troughs. Farm buildings are in need of repair. There are no nails, and there is no lumber or roofing.

From Glanworth one dealer says that he had only one keg of nails in six months, no wire of any kind for a year. Another report indicates that from June, 1946, to January, 1947, there were three kegs of nails, but wire and many sizes of nails were unobtainable. Poultry fencing, hooks and staples were unobtainable. Roofing paper and tar paper were very scarce, while harvesting tools, forks and repairs, as well as other kinds of hardware, were almost unobtainable.

It is true, too, that good, decent farm overalls cannot be obtained. Let me say a word or two about barbed wire. On March 20, I had on the order paper a question to which a reply was given. Among other things I inquired about the kind and tonnage of steel that was used, and how much was saved in changing over from heavy gauge to the lighter war-time gauge. I shall read the paragraph which deals with that particularly:

> Based on the 1939 to 1941 average, the consumption of steel for the years 1942 to 1945 inclusive would have amounted to 71,224 net tons. Actually 58,829 net tons were used during this period for the production of barbed wire, therefore, a total of 12,395 net tons were made available for more essential products.

I submit that not only the amount they mention as being saved, but the whole 58,829 tons of steel was wasted. Farmers who bought that wire and put it up a year ago have not a decent fence today. The whole business was wasted. They might better have made a few rolls of good barbed wire and let the rest go, because, as it is, these farmers have spent the money and they have nothing to show for it. It is about time the manufacturers started to make some decent wire for the farmers.

I wish to say a word or two about rent controls. Rent controls have developed a lot of injustices and many crooked practices. I have in mind two houses in my own riding in east London. These houses are not more than two hundred yards apart and are identical in construction and size. One house rents for $23 a month, but the man who owns it cannot get into it. He rents two rooms in an identical house a short distance away, for which he pays $36 a month for the two rooms. These houses are of practically the same value. If there is any justice in that I should like to know about it.

The reason so many people are anxious to retain rent controls is that they have a minority group over a barrel and at a disadvantage. If it were not for that they would not want these controls. The same applies to food controls. The farmers are getting tired of feeding the world and getting the lowest labour return of any class in the country, while having to work longer hours than anyone else. Along with this, they are being denied the goods they need to maintain their farms and homes.

On motion of Mr. White (Middlesex East) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Tuesday, March 25, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COLDWELL—REFERENCE TO REMARKS IN DEBATE ON MARCH 24

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise to a question of privilege. Last evening the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) said, as reported at page 1696 of Hansard:

> In the House of Commons on June 5, 1940, as reported at page 545 of Hansard, during the discussion on the unemployment relief and agricultural distress measure at that time, the hon. member—

Meaning myself.

> —said:
>
> "The secret of the recent success of the Germans is the fact that they have consciously planned their economic structure."

My colleague, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson), interjected:

Read it all.

The hon. member for Souris replied:

I have not time to read the whole speech.

Mr. Speaker, had the hon. gentleman read the sentence which followed, the purpose of his quotation would have been destroyed. The next sentence read:

> True, they have planned with diabolical intent, but they have planned with an end in view.

And the next sentence:

> We have failed to make any plans or to give any direction to our economic system for the worthy purposes for which we ought to have been planning in the past.

My point of privilege is, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that what I had said was misrepresented by quoting a sentence out of its context.

ELDORADO GOLD MINES

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): I was asked by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) to table correspondence bearing on the case of the King v. Carl French, Marcel Pochon and Boris Pregel. I now table copy of a letter dated March 5 from John Robinette to the deputy minister of justice, copy of a letter dated March 7, from the deputy minister of justice to John Robinette, and also copy of a letter dated March 11 from John Robinette to the Hon. Leslie Blackwell, K.C., attorney-general for Ontario.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION UNTIL MAY 15, 1947—ORDER IN COUNCIL TABLED

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the address to His Excellency the Governor General which this house recently passed with respect to the extension of the time of application of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act was presented to His Excellency this morning by the Hon. the Speaker of this house. A similar address was presented to His Excellency by the Speaker of the Senate. The act provides, as hon. members will recall, that after addresses have been presented the governor in council should order that the act shall continue in force for a further period. I have in my hand a copy of the order in council which was passed subsequently to the presentation of the addresses this morning and which orders that the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, shall continue until the fifteenth day of May, 1947. I would ask leave of the house to table the order.

HOUSING

RENTAL HOUSING PROJECT—NEW PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPRECIATION, AMORTIZATION, ETC.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, during my remarks in this house on February 7 I stated that the government would shortly take steps to increase the supply of privately-owned rental housing. At that time, I outlined three proposed incentives: (1) allowance of double depreciation for new rental housing units; (2) a longer period of amortization under the National Housing Act for loans on approved types of rental housing; and (3) extension of priorities for materials to assist in the construction of approved rental housing.

As I mentioned in February, our supply of new rental housing is proportionately too low and there is a great need in the country today for this type of dwelling. Perhaps the principal reason for the reluctance of private owners to enter this field is their belief that present capitalized costs may be high in relation to stabilized rents.

To stimulate an additional supply of rental housing, I now table order in council P.C. 1095 which provides for depreciation at double the rates normally allowed in respect to rental housing projects and equipment installed therein, built or acquired in a fixed period.

As hon. members know, the owner of a rental property, on filing income tax returns, is allowed as a deduction from the property value depreciation for buildings at standard rates which vary from two or five per cent, depending on the type of structure. In the case of equipment, these standard rates vary from five to ten per cent. The order in council I have just tabled has the effect of doubling these rates for a period of ten years when applied to projects consisting of four or more family dwelling units which meet the requirements set out in the order. This incentive will apply only to the types of rental housing approved by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Basic qualifications include rentals under $70 a month, based on a standard four-room unit; veterans' preference for occupancy of completed units; and an average of at least 1·75 bedrooms per unit.

The order provides that:

Any project wholly constructed between March 31, 1947, and December 31, 1949, will be allowed double depreciation on the full cost of construction.

Any project under construction on March 31, 1947, will be allowed double depreciation on costs incurred after that date.

Any project not completed by December 31, 1949, will be allowed double depreciation only on costs incurred prior to that date.

While I do not wish to discuss the order in detail at this time, I would point out to hon. members that provision is made for an extra principal payment by the owner of a rental property where the project is financed by mortgage. The extra principal payment required amounts to one-third of the allowable extra depreciation.

Hon. members may also be wondering why the effective date has been advanced to March 31. Under the order, the owner of a project at present under way who proposes to apply for double depreciation must obtain from a qualified architect or engineer a certificate of costs of the project at that date. The advanced date will allow him time to do so.

To determine whether or not a rental housing project qualifies for double depreciation under the provisions of this order, a builder will be required to complete and file an application with a regional or branch office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Full information may also be obtained from these offices, which are located in principal cities throughout the country. If a project is found to qualify, the corporation will issue a certificate of entitlement.

Increased amortization. The second point I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks was an extended period of amortization. We will introduce shortly legislation under the National Housing Act to increase to thirty years the period of amortization for this type of rental housing.

Priorities. As a third stimulation, priorities for building materials will be granted for rental housing projects which meet the same requirements as those set out in the order respecting double depreciation. While I am on the subject, I wish to take this opportunity to reaffirm the government's position with respect to priorities. During the past few weeks, it has come to my attention that certain groups are apparently anticipating a relaxation of the priorities policy. I wish to state emphatically that the government does not now propose to revise the present system, which is based on a veterans' preference and some control over the end sales price or rent to be charged for housing units.

So that there can be no misunderstanding or confusion, I list again the housing categories entitled to priorities on materials:

1. The house of any individual veteran of world war II where the house is fifty per cent completed, which generally means roofed and closed in.

2. All government and government-sponsored housing carrying the veterans' preference, such as that built under the integrated housing plan, Veterans Land Act, and emergency shelter order and by Wartime Housing Limited and Housing Enterprises of Canada, Limited.

3. Housing in remote areas built by basic industries such as lumbering, logging, mining and fishing companies, for which the rentals or sale prices of the units are approved by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and where an undertaking is given by the company that fifty per cent of the units will be occupied by veterans of world war II.

4. Rental housing projects, as I already stated, which meet the same requirements as those set out in the order I have tabled today respecting double depreciation.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to ask the minister for clarification of the first part of his statement. As I understand it, the consideration which is being extended to those who will after March 31 build rental housing, applies only to those who will erect houses in groups of four units, or units which are themselves four-family units, but will not apply to those who are erecting smaller units for a lesser number of families.

Mr. HOWE: It applies to single houses, for rental, when built in groups of four or more. But if the owner is an occupant of the house, it must be a four-family house. In other words, it does not apply to a single duplex where the owner is also the occupant. If the owner is not an occupant it will apply to a double duplex, or any unit of four or more.

Mr. FLEMING: Otherwise if a person is not building a multiple family unit it does not apply. He would need to build a four-family house to come within the scope of the order.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: What is the situation with respect to the construction of single family units?

Mr. HOWE: It will apply to single family units in groups of four or more.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister made it quite clear.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

EMPLOYMENT OF VETERANS ON NATIONAL DEFENCE RECORDS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): On March 21, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) asked a question about the transfer of records from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Veterans Affairs. I can assure him now that the matter is not only being considered but is being actively explored, and I hope to be able to give further information in the very near future.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN

PRESS REPORT OF PROSPECTIVE VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. About a week or so ago I spoke privately to the Prime Minister about President Truman's proposed visit to Canada. At that time the Prime Minister indicated that there was no official information available. I noticed a report in the press, which I think all Canadians will hail with delight, referring to the prospective visit of the president of the friendly republic to the south. Can the Prime Minister give us some details of the visit or some official imprimatur with respect to the news which is in the papers this morning?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The reports which appeared in the press this morning are evidently based on a statement made yesterday by the president to a press conference at Washington. Nothing that I am aware of has been given out officially by anyone in Canada. As I mentioned to my hon. friend the other day, conferences respecting President Truman's visit to Canada have been taking place between the two countries, but no definite date has yet been fixed. The expectation is that the president's visit will take place early in June, but there has been no final word given by the president as yet. Just as soon as the visit has been officially arranged an announcement will be made if possible in this house in the first instance. I was as much surprised as my hon. friend when I read as much as I did in the press this morning, but an official statement is still to be given out both in Washington and here as to the date and programme of the visit.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO FILLING OF DIPLOMATIC POSITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it the intention of the government to make an announcement as to the filling of the senior diplomatic positions in Mexico and Australia?

Right Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As hon. members know, appointments to these posts require formalities which must be fulfilled not only by the Canadian government but by others as well. These formalities are being dealt with and I think that they will be completed so that an announcement can be made on Thursday.

WAR SAVINGS CERTIFICATES

QUESTION AS TO PAYMENT BY CHARTERED BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): On Friday last the hon. member for Peterborough West asked whether war savings certificates when due would be cashed by the chartered banks.

In reply I might first point out that war savings certificates are by their terms redeemable only at the office of the registrar of war savings certificates, Bank of Canada, Ottawa. In view of the large number of certificates outstanding and their small denominations, very careful consideration has been given to the question whether it would be possible to make satisfactory arrangements to have them redeemable elsewhere than at the Bank of Canada. However a substantial number, some 62,000, duplicate certificates have been issued under regulations approved by the governor in council, without the furnishing of any bond of indemnity. In addition further duplicate certificates will, of course, be issued in the normal course of events. So far it has not been possible to work out adequate safeguards to prevent the redemption in such cases of both original and duplicate certificates, if redemption elsewhere than at the Bank of Canada were permitted. However, continuing consideration will be given to the problem.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF—STATEMENT OF SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS IN BRITISH HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that he has not my question in front of him, an answer tomorrow or the day after will be satisfactory. In the House of Commons in England yesterday Sir Stafford Cripps made a statement with regard to a delegation looking after British interests at the international trade organization wherein certain principles were laid down, I suppose to help guide this delegation. Will the minister examine the statement made by Sir Stafford Cripps and, if within government policy, make to this house a preliminary statement or a statement similar to the one made by him on preferences.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I am not just sure whether the questions should be addressed to me or to my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). In any event, the questions will be taken into consideration and a reply given.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The statement was made in the British house in regard to British industries, trade and commerce. I understand the minister took cognizance of it, particularly when the charter for world trade was published some months ago.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

CAR FERRY "ABEGWEIT"—PROGRESS OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): As you announced on Friday last, Mr. Speaker, that spring is here, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. What is the latest report, if he has one, concerning the progress of construction of the S.S. Abegweit?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I can tell the hon. gentleman that progress on the Abegweit is exceedingly favourable. As I have told him once before, we hope to have it ready for operation within the next few months.

MILITIA ACT

AMENDMENTS TO FACILITATE CANADIAN ARMY REORGANIZATION—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 14, to amend the Militia Act.

Mr. PEARKES: Is the minister going to make a statement?

Mr. HUGUES LAPOINTE (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): In the absence of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) may I be permitted to give a few words of explanation? The proposed amendments refer to sections 15 and 32 of Bill No. 14 as passed in this house last February. Section 15 of the bill amended section 46 of the Militia Act. It referred to certain restrictions on the wearing of uniforms. The proposed amendment does substantially the same thing but it is reworded to make it clearer and less ambiguous.

Section 32, which amended section 139 of the Militia Act, refers to the power given to the governor general in council to empower the minister to make certain regulations. When this section was studied by the senate the remark was made that the amendment as worded implied that it was rather the exception than the rule for the governor general in council to make regulations. It was pointed out that the paramount authority in the act was for the governor general in council to make regulations, and any exception to that rule would be by the governor general in council empowering the minister to do so. Consequently the section was redrafted to make this implication clear.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): I am afraid I cannot agree with the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence that the senate amendment makes clearer the amendment to section 46 as passed in this house. I suggest that the amendment now under consideration changes the meaning of the amendment adopted in this house; it does not merely change the words. The words of bill 14 amending old section 46 of the act read:

No unit—

By "unit" I understand is meant an organized body of troops.

No unit or man, other than a unit or man of the active force or a warrant officer shall at any time appear in uniform or armed or accoutred, except . . .

Then it gives certain exceptions. The amendment suggested by the other place reads:

No unit warrant officer or man other than a unit warrant officer or man of the active force shall at any time appear in uniform or armed or accoutred, except . . .

The essential difference is that the privilege which has always been granted to a warrant officer to appear in uniform on the streets, or to attend any function in uniform without having to go to his commanding officer and get his consent, is now removed by this amendment which has been suggested by the other place. I suggest that it is not of national importance but it is a prerogative and a privilege which has been enjoyed for many years by senior warrant officers who served in the old non-permanent militia, which is today known as the reserve army.

When our amendment to the old act was introduced it seemed to me that care was taken that that privilege should be continued. In this proposed amendment the warrant officer, who up to the present has had the same privileges so far as the wearing of uniform is concerned as the commissioned officer, is having these privileges taken away from him. I do not know what the procedure is, but I do suggest that this amendment, as it changes the meaning of our bill, should be referred back to the other place, or that a further discussion should be had, or some other means taken to rectify the matter. As I say, it is not a matter of vital national importance, but it is a privilege which has been cherished by those people in the reserve army, in the non-permanent militia, who have voluntarily given up their time. Sometimes these niceties of the services are highly appreciated, and it will be resented if they are taken away without just cause.

There are some other comments that I should like to make regarding this suggested amendment. It uses the words, "no unit warrant officer." Well, of course, all warrant officers are not on the strength of a unit, and it would seem to me this gives a warrant officer who is not on the strength of a unit the right to wear uniform at the same time as officers without having to apply to the commanding officer, but denies this privilege to the warrant officer who is serving with a unit. I do not believe the other place intended to make these alterations, and if it can be referred back perhaps the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) can adjust it with the movers of the amendment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary assistant. As I understand it, this amendment comes directly from the other place. Is that so?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then I am against it. Send it back whence it came.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In view of the divergency of opinion I suggest that this motion stand for the time being.

On motion of Mr. Pearkes the debate was adjourned.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Monday, March 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make one observation. It will be so short that hon. members on the other side will be glad to hear it. There has been over the last few days a good deal of discussion with respect to this legislation. Perhaps some issues may have become clarified and others not. Perhaps some new issues have been brought in. I should like it made clear to the house and country that in this regard I speak on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party as a whole, and I repeat what was stated by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) at the beginning of the debate. It is only proper and fitting that at this stage we should indicate again the position this party took, namely that we were prepared to allow the resolution to go through and would not on the resolution stage take our stand with respect to the principle of the bill to follow. Rather it was stated that we were prepared to allow the resolution to pass; and it was understood that while in committee of the whole we would seek from the government the information we needed respecting the stand we would take subsequently on the bill itself.

There were however a number of things which intervened, with the result that many

hon. members made speeches. We are now in the same position as that which we occupied at that time. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the house, that we reserve now, as we did then, the right either to support or to oppose the bill on second reading, after the information we shall seek in committee stage has been given to us by the government. The whole debate, from our point of view, will of course be relegated to the motion for second reading of the bill. On that basis, and strictly without prejudice to our rights as a party to take such stand as we may think is proper and desirable or in the public interest, we are now prepared to allow the resolution to pass.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on this resolution. The time has come for this country to get rid of dictatorial powers which no longer have any justification. There is a limit to unwarranted emergency measures. The war has been over for almost two years. The government mobilized all our resources to crush dictatorship. But they are asking us now to surrender our prerogatives as representatives of the people to an irresponsible bureaucracy. This army of officials has taken the place of parliament much too long. All civil servants, clerks and employees look down patronizingly on those whose mandate they have usurped. The people are surfeited with this bureaucracy which has implanted in Canada a loathsome form of dictatorship. We owe nothing to all these boards, save inflation and the black market. In a country like ours, so rich in natural resources, there is no ground for imposing rations conducive to hoarding, simulation and fraud.

I have had many an opportunity, in my professional capacity, of representing persons amenable to a court which had been prosecuted by the wartime prices and trade board. Invariably, the seller only was summoned. The buyer, who had also broken the law, always got off scot-free. No action was brought against him. Such justice is not worthy of the name. I have heard some magistrates denounce, with reason, the procedure followed by those bureaucrats who, daily, break our laws, both federal and provincial.

For too many years, under cover of the 'national emergency arising from the war" the most flagrant infractions of our federal and provincial laws have been perpetrated under the guise of controls. The astonishing statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) bears me out. In the first place, he contended that even in peace time the dominion parliament may legislate in a field reserved to the provinces when it is necessary to do so in order to maintain peace, order and good government, etc. That is the pet phrase so dear to the hearts of those who have supported the extravagant expenditures made in war time. Were it only for that statement of the Minister of Justice I would have a thousand reasons to reject his resolution. I cannot have any faith in the man who unscrupulously builds up a bureaucracy upon the ruins of parliamentary prerogatives. I respect the views expressed by the Minister of Justice, but I cannot conceive how anyone can make such a statement of policy eighty years after confederation.

For years the dominion government has striven unceasingly to assimilate and centralize. Taking advantage of the word "war," it launched into the great adventure and never returned. This is proved by the fact that we are still squatting under the Moscow conference table. Denied a part in the conference of the Big Four, it is forced to while away its time cultivating socialism and consolidating an already flourishing bureaucracy. The same old reason will be used in justification of controls: "Inflation must be avoided." Come now, inflation is here despite all controls. Anyone buying property will have to pay four times the price of 1939 or 1940. Build your own home and it will cost you much more than a few years ago. Walk into your dealer's, your grocer's or any place of business, and you shall find that the price of commodities, of clothes for instance, has increased enormously. In the case of clothes and many other prime necessities, prices have gone up as high as 200 and 300 per cent. On top of this, consider the burdensome taxes that have to be paid especially by the small wage earner, and you shall have the sad picture of the pernicious results of controls and bureaucracy.

And now, with this resolution, the government would have parliament allow bureaucracy to carry on? For my part, I refuse any longer to surrender parliament's prerogatives to a bureaucracy that keeps exploiting the people under the cloak of ultra vires legislation brought in by a parliament which is giving up its mandate.

Under pretext of urgency, the government slash our statutes and constitution. Centralization and assimilation lead us directly to legislative union.

I represent a constituency which took up arms to fight the dictatorship of bureaucracy. More than a century has elapsed since this pathetic struggle. Canada has taken part in the two largest wars of history for the sake of the four freedoms as defined in the Atlantic charter. In a helpless world, I seek in vain for even a shadow of these freedoms. What has become of all these loftiest ideologies which we have defended: Christianity, freedom, justice and right? In our own country, provincial rights granted by the constitution are infringed upon in the name of a so-called national emergency. Freedom, justice and right, for which our soldiers laid down their lives, have become idle words. Among those who lived through the struggle, how many are looking in vain for a shelter, while our building materials are being controlled or shipped outside the country? Such is, in all its ghastliness, the work of a bureaucracy unanswerable to the people. I shall fight this regime without let-up for it is a source of centralization and injustice on which the parliament elected by the people have no control whatever.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, while not an advocate of repetition I deem it my duty to express my views on this resolution. First of all I am in complete agreement with the stand taken by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on the first night of debate of this resolution. I think his exposition, argument and presentation were logical and strictly in accord with democratic socialism and given with a view to the requirements of the people of this country. I do not think there is any necessity at this time for me to attempt to repeat those arguments or the arguments that many other members have put forward in this debate.

I listened particularly with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and to his argument in opposition to this resolution. I must say that I have a great deal of respect for the attitude of men of the type of the member for Quebec South. He expressed the attitude of the classical Liberal, and I was very much interested in his remark that had he been in England recently he would have voted for the Labour government. That is significant. Of course he has full knowledge of the fact that the species he represents in Canada is almost extinct now in England but his statement was an indication of this fact, for which I give him credit, that all genuine Liberals when they have to choose between advancing democratic forces and conservatism will generally be found on the side of the progressive forces.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments, or, should I say, to the declamations of the members of the Progressive Conservative party. I think they are sincerely alarmed over the effects of this legislation so far as they are concerned and from their point of view. But honestly, Mr. Speaker, after listening carefully to the remarks of the Progressive Conservative party, I think that their arguments and attitude indicated an almost feminine excitability—

Mrs. STRUM: Libel, libel!

Mr. HERRIDGE: —over the possibility of a political mouse that does not exist. I would like to tell my hon. friends of the Progressive Conservative party that this resolution is not socialism or anything approaching socalism. It is a resolution brought forward by a democratic capitalist government in an effort to stabilize to some extent for a limited time the capitalist system, a system which can never be stabilized. But I give hon. gentlemen opposite credit; this is necessary legislation at this time.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If my hon. friend will permit a question, while what he says is perfectly true as to the tenor of the resolution, does he not agree that the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did in fact broaden it out and change it so that in effect we were from that moment bound to discuss socialism, or at all events a very large instalment of it? That is the way I read his speech and the amendment, and our arguments should be considered in that light.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I can quite appreciate the hon. gentleman's position. As soon as I heard the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar speak I was fully prepared for an epidemic of anti-socialist speeches. I think the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar supports this legislation for two reasons. In the first place it is for the benefit at this time under these circumstances of the great majority of the Canadian people, and in the second place the socialists are given to thinking logically about economic questions, and this resolution from our point of view is logical in a concrete way. I just want to say again that I think our good friends in the Progressive Conservative ranks are too much disturbed over the possible socialist contents of this resolution and the legislation that will follow.

I want us to look at this resolution for a very few moments without prejudice, and from a non-partisan point of view, because I think the country is looking at it on the whole with a non-partisan view.

First of all, controls were definitely necessary during the war and were supported by the great majority of the Canadian people. There is no question about that. Secondly, controls worked during the war to the great advantage of our war effort and without doubt proved our ability successfully to overcome the common enemy. My third point is this, that as the result of our war experience and as the result of what is happening in other countries, and no one can deny this, the great majority of the Canadian people, realizing the value of these controls during the critical war period and now, are expressing their support for a continuation of controls particularly while commodities are in short supply. I think that is generally recognized, and no one can deny it. The evidence is found in the stand taken by organized labour, by the organized farmers, by large groups of consumers, throughout the country, by church organizations and by many women's organizations. So far as my riding is concerned I know that when I stand here and support this resolution I am expressing the will and the opinion and the desire of the great majority of the people I have the honour to represent.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): And of British Columbia too.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I think that is correct. We all know the situation as it exists in Canada. Conditions in Canada are not by any means perfect, but if there is one thing to the great credit of the present government it is their operation of controls during the war years.

To the Progressive Conservatives I would say this. If they have read carefully British, Australian and New Zealand papers and the papers of the United States in past years, they will have found repeated references to the successful operaton of controls in Canada, made by the press not only of the Liberal party, of the Labour party and of the Socialist party, but of the Conservative party in all these countries.

I want to quote something which the bureau of agricultural economics in Washington reported recently. It reports that one dollar today will buy only as much food as 72 cents would have bought a year ago when price control was in effect in the United States. The bureau reports that between January 1946 and January 1947 retail food prices in the United States have risen as follows—and these are things that are vitally important to the people of this country: meats, 67 per cent; dairy products, 37 per cent; bakery and cereal products, 30 per cent; canned fruit and vegetables, 32 per cent.

In addition the National Retail Lumber Dealers Association of the United States from its executive offices in that country issued a statement to the effect that in their opinion home-building costs have increased 50 per cent in two years, and the United States section of Proctor and Gamble Company announce that tallow, a very important ingredient in soap, has climbed from 20 to 27½ cents per pound recently, and that is going to be reflected in the cost of soap to consumers. It would be possible to go on for hours giving illustrations of the value of controls in this country as against the situation that has existed in the United States since the forgoing there of price control.

I have heard it stated on many occasions and several times in this debate that controls will restrict production. I do not think that argument has any validity or is rooted in fact. One has only to examine the production figures of this country for the last two years, the balance sheets of all large industrial firms, or to read carefully the addresses made to the shareholders by the presidents of all the banks of Canada at their annual meetings, to realize that on the whole production never reached a greater height in Canadian history. I want to give one illustration of the absurd statements made at times by people occupying responsible executive positions in the industrial field. I have not one handy from a Canadian source, but I have one from an American source, and it is a gem, what you would call a beauty. I quote from an Associated Press dispatch from Philadelphia of a few days ago:

> J. Howard Pew, President of the Sun Oil Company, said today that until government wartime controls are ended "industry cannot function efficiently and effectively to serve the nation."

One can almost hear the voice of the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming).

> He told stockholders in an annual report that Sun established new records in 1946 for crude oil production, refinery operation and marketing.

How can you place those two statements together?

That concludes my argument so far as this resolution is concerned. I support the principle of controls because experience has proved that controls are to the benefit of the great majority of the Canadian people and I have no fear of controls provided they are exercised as a result of action by this parliament.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I wish to say just a few words in connection with this resolution, which is designed to extend some of the emergency powers in the hands of the government for the period of another year. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge), who has just preceded me, has contended that these controls are necessary for the reason that the country is in a state of short supply. I am not going to argue that point, but I would say that if the country is in a state of short supply there must have been a reason for it, and I contend that government policy during the time that we have granted to them the power to exercise control under the emergency powers act has been largely the reason that goods are in short supply.

The hon. member mentioned that production has increased, but it is a well known fact that the government of the day have been so—I was going to use the term hell-bent, but that might not be appropriate for me—so desirous and covetous of foreign markets that they have permitted much of our production to go out of the country and thus by control have controlled to the minimum point the consumption of Canadian goods in Canada.

Again we have our price control. I voted in the past for giving to the government emergency powers to combat inflation, and I am not going to say they have not done a fair job under existing conditions in combating serious inflation. But there is another thing. When goods are in short supply, even by reason of exports, then prices are bound to rise. I was not going to speak along that line, and perhaps those few remarks will serve more or less as an introduction.

What I am concerned about is the principle involved in this measure, which as I see it is fundamentally the principle of controls placed in the hands of government rather than, where it belongs, in the hands of parliament or the people.

The member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) yesterday spent some considerable time in emphasizing the necessity for governments to have power. He expressed no fear that the present Prime Minister would deliberately give away the powers of parliament to somebody else. Of course that statement was carefully worded. I personally do not express any fear that the present Prime Minister would deliberately and knowingly do any such thing. That is not what we are in danger of. The thing that we are in danger of is that power is to be taken from us by stealth; that is the principle that is involved, and one has to make a decision between governmental power and the power of our parliamentary institutions.

He expressed no fear that the Minister of Agriculture or even the leader of the official opposition would deliberately give away those powers, because, he went on to say, the people of Canada have the right and power to punish those who may be guilty of such abuse by discharging them. But the danger, Mr. Speaker, is that even though the power of the people at the present time can discharge any government—at any election they can put one government out and another party in—

An hon. MEMBER: Not under Social Credit.

Mr. HANSELL: I will come to that in a little while, and I am glad my hon. friend mentioned it. But I wish to warn that even the power of the people can be taken away by stealth, so that even the people themselves would become divested of the very power they now have to discharge a government. That is the thing that has happened already in socialist countries. I might refer to Germany, if you wish. Were not the people of Germany conscientious in voting for the nazi regime? Did they not say something similar? I have not read all the records of the debates in the reichstag but I can imagine some member there rising in his seat and saying, "I have no fear that the fuehrer will deliberately take away this and that power and hand it to someone else." I can imagine that happening.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I do not want to create a precedent. The hon. member for Macleod adjourned the debate on March 20. If he will consult Beauchesne at page 762, he will see that having moved the adjournment of the debate, a member has spoken on the question, and having spoken on the question he cannot speak a second time.

Mr. HANSELL: I was not quite aware of that ruling, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the ruling is correct. I am not arguing the point of order, but do I understand that because I adjourned the debate I cannot speak now?

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules, by reason of the fact that the hon. member adjourned the debate the other day he is considered as having spoken, and as he has not moved a substantive motion he cannot speak twice. Therefore he is out of order in speaking this afternoon.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if that is so your ruling is drawing things closely. I am not sure whether you were in the chair yesterday, or someone else, but the Minister of Finance was given the opportunity of making two speeches in this debate, and I think, in view of that, the member for Macleod ought to be allowed to speak, seeing that he only adjourned the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Macleod will understand that if I took the liberty of interrupting, it was because I did not want to make a precedent.

Mr. GRAYDON: You made one yesterday.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member adjourned the debate on March 20 and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) spoke first on the next day in place of the member for Macleod. According to our rules, therefore, the hon. member for Macleod is considered as having spoken. He cannot speak this afternoon because by doing so he would be speaking twice in the debate on the measure which is before the house, and that is not permitted.

Mr. HANSELL: I appreciate the point of order, Mr. Speaker, and I am not discussing it. I must admit that I was ignorant of that particular point. I shall be pleased to forgo speaking now and to speak at some later stage in the debate.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, because of the remarks made by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), I think I must say a few words. Evidently the hon. member did not understand what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) said yesterday, or else he was not in his seat when the Minister of Justice replied to a question put to him by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret). Evidently the Minister of Justice does not need to be defended by anybody. He can defend himself very well.

Mr. HOMUTH: He got himself into an awful mess, though.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I am sure, from what he said yesterday, that the Minister of Justice has no desire or disposition to bring to this house any legislation which would encroach upon the rights of the provinces, except for the peace, order and good government of this country pursuant to section 91 of the British North America Act. Some objection has been taken to this bill on the ground that it includes about fifty-seven orders in council relating to controls. For this I think the minister and the government deserve congratulations for trying to expedite matters in this house. At the beginning of this session I advocated a change in the rules of the house in order to shorten the debates. Up to the present time may I say that we have taken about two months to do what we could have done in about two or three weeks at most. Usually, after scores of speeches and amendments have been presented by opposition groups, the measures of the government are adopted exactly as they were moved. I again ask that we in this house do business in a businesslike manner. Personally I will take about ten minutes to express my views in this matter relating to controls.

May I say first that the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) objected to the procedure followed in this connection more than he objected to the substance of the bill itself. I repeat that the minister is to be congratulated upon bringing in this bill in the form in which he has brought it in. If he had done otherwise and had brought down fifty-seven different bills, it would have meant that if only fifty out of the 245 members of this house—and that is a conservative estimate—had spoken on each of those fifty-seven measures, there would have been about 2,850 speeches inflicted upon the house.

On this subject of controls, the government is taking, as usual, a moderate course. On the one hand, some of the Tories want to abolish all the controls immediately and suddenly, although, as they did on some other bills this session, they may finally vote for the bill. On the other hand, the C.C.F. want more controls than we already have. I reaffirm the view and suggestion that a practical procedure to follow in abolishing controls would be to set a date of expiration, to give it wide publicity and warn the public of such date of expiration so that no one would be taken by surprise when controls would come to an end. Everyone would then know definitely what to expect and would act accordingly.

Since the declaration made by the Minister of Justice last Thursday, we have had what we usually call a tempest in a teapot, highly activated by press and by radio reports. According to rumours, there was a fatal split in Liberal ranks; there was revolt among Liberal members; there was dissension between ministers of the crown.

Mr. HOMUTH: There was until the minister back-tracked.

An hon. MEMBER: Imagination!

Mr. BRUNELLE: And the fall of the government was fast approaching, et cetera, et cetera. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that all these rumours were just as silly as they were false. Here are the facts. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is really the cause of this misunderstanding.

Mr. HOMUTH: He is the cause of a great deal of dissension over there.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Order, order; be serious.

Mr. BRUNELLE: The hon member for Lake Centre may or may not have the confidence of the electors of my constituency, and I imagine he does not care, but I want my friends to know that he nevertheless started this difficulty in expressing the opinion that in the light of the Canada Temperance Act case, the dominion government need not allege emergency in order to legislate for the peace, order and good government of the country, even if that legislation would encroach upon provincial rights.

Mr. HOMUTH: And the minister swallowed it hook, line and sinker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I wonder if the hon. member for Waterloo South would mind not interrupting?

Mr. HOMUTH: I am just trying to help.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Thank the Lord I do not need the hon. member's help.

Mr. KNOWLES: The hon. member for Waterloo South lost his head yesterday.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I do not like what the hon. member for Waterloo South says, and I do not think anybody else in the house does. I do not like what he says and I do not like the way he says it.

The hon. member for Lake Centre also asked the Minister of Justice for the opinion of his law officers regarding the point I just mentioned. I wish to emphasize, that when this happened, we were not discussing this particular measure relating to controls at all. We were discussing Bill No. 25, an act for the sale and export of agricultural products.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would the hon. member allow a question? As a lawyer, does he agree that the dominion parliament may, in reference to matters such as the sale of farm products and matters of trade and commerce, infringe upon the rights of the provinces under the peace, order and good government clause?

Mr. BRUNELLE: I do not agree at all.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I just wondered.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I do not agree at all, and that is not the question. I do not think the hon. member for Lake Centre, who is a very clever lawyer, will succeed in taking me out of the course which I intend to follow.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am sorry; I did not mean to do that.

Mr. BRUNELLE: On Thursday, March 20, the Minister of Justice read an opinion of his department, which begins as follows, as reported on page 1553 of Hansard:

[Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf).]

Ottawa, March 20, 1947.

Memorandum for the Minister of Justice re Bill No. 25.

You asked for an opinion as the constitutional validity of the proposed agricultural products act now under consideration by the House of Commons.

Following this is the opinion of the law officer of the Department of Justice which gives quite a body of jurisprudence and discusses a few cases such as the Temperance Act case, the Fort Frances pulp and paper case, and the Manitoba Free Press case in relation to the Natural Products Marketing Act of 1934 and the act for the sale and export of agricultural products of 1947. The deputy minister said:

You asked for an opinion as to the constitutional validity of the proposed agricultural products act now under consideration by the House of Commons.

I am not going to quote all the discussion on which this advice was based. The advice concludes as follows:

For the reasons given it is my opinion that the bill is within the competence of parliament to enact.

The Minister of Justice then spoke as follows:

I do not think it is necessary to add anything to that opinion.

Therefore whatever was said by the minister on that occasion was simply what had been said by the law officer of his department and what had been said by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself. I quote:

Yesterday the hon. member for Lake Centre put forward the view, not dogmatically but for the consideration of the government, that the doctrine of emergency no longer was valid as a basis for dominion jurisdiction.

It was not the minister who said that, it was the hon. member for Lake Centre. I continue with the quotation:

The hon. member for Lake Centre cited in support of the position the Canada Temperance Act case, and stated that that position had been taken by the editor of the Fortnightly Law Journal, and perhaps by others.

The minister continues:

Bearing in mind what I said in reply to the hon. member for Temiscouata, I am not going to venture into an opinion on the matter.

The minister made other remarks, all based on the opinion of the law officer of his department. That was not such an alarming declaration after all. In fact the Minister of Justice made no declaration on that day. He just followed what the law officer of his department had said. It will be easily seen therefore that there is no occasion or reason to think or fear that this jurisprudence quoted in the legal opinion just referred to is to be implemented or translated into any definite or positive act or step or legislation whatsoever. The present measure relating to controls is not based on that legal point of view at all. The minister emphasized this point yesterday in reply to a question put to him by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret). I invite the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) to read that answer and try to understand it, and not repeat things that are false, not repeat rumours that have been published in newspapers and broadcast on the radio.

The present bill relating to controls is founded on section 91 of the British North America Act which authorizes parliament to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in cases of emergency. Everyone admits that following the war we are still in a period of emergency.

In conclusion I wish to say that if I support the present measure for extension of controls it is with reluctance and only because I have the assurance that this measure is of a temporary nature and that it will be of short duration, and also because until their total disappearance control laws may be softened or amended so that the protection given to one group of citizens will not constitute an injustice to other groups.

Mr. LOW: I should like to raise a point of order. A few minutes ago when His Honour the Speaker was in the chair an incident took place which I should like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, for a definite ruling. A note having been sent up to Mr. Speaker by the leader of the C.C.F. party calling attention to the fact that my colleague, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), had adjourned the debate on the evening of the twentieth, Mr. Speaker declared the hon. member for Macleod, who was addressing the house at the time, out of order. I should like to point out, sir, that the freedom of speech of hon. members is at stake in this decision. There is already in this very debate a precedent by which we can safely go. There is also a ruling—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I cannot change a ruling which has already been made by the Speaker. I understand he made a ruling and heard argument at that time.

Mr. LOW: There was no argument at the time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand there was some discussion and the Speaker did make a ruling which is not debatable and could have been appealed at that time. Therefore—

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say just a word? There was no—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. There is no provision for discussion.

Mr. COLDWELL: There was no discussion. It was my intention to raise the question after the hon. gentleman had taken his seat.

Mr. MARTIN: There was discussion.

Mr. COLDWELL: There was very little discussion.

Mr. GRAYDON: On the point of order—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I was in the house at the time and I recall that the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) spoke. I do not know that others did, but at least he did.

Mr. GRAYDON: When I spoke it fell on deaf ears.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: In any event, if the hon. member for Peace River wishes to raise this question I think it would be more appropriate to do so when Mr. Speaker returns to the chair.

Mr. LOW: Mr. Speaker, I must take serious exception to the curtailment of the freedom of speech of hon. members.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There is no curtailment of freedom of speech. I have suggested to the hon. member for Peace River that it would be more appropriate for him to raise this question in a few minutes when Mr. Speaker returns to the chair.

Mr. LOW: Thank you.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): I should like to say a few intelligent words. The statement was made in the house that this resolution was like a blank cheque. From my experience in dealing with money matters it is only on money matters that you can have a cheque. There is no reference in this resolution to money, and since we like to have things clear and plain, to me this resolution is simply to keep in existence controls which we now have for two sets of people, first, the people at home so that they will have enough until the supply is equal to the demand; that people with small incomes will be able to get what they need, just as well as people with big incomes. The other reason is that we shall have enough to help the hungry abroad. Unfortunately there are some hon. members in the house who do not feel like sending food, clothes and other things out of Canada; but our argument is that He said to feed the hungry, clothe the naked and feed the sick, and it is our duty so to conserve our food resources that we can feed the hungry anywhere.

I am strongly in favour of keeping controls and, after controls are lifted, to have stable prices for farm produce so that the farmers may have a decent living. I agree, too, with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has said that old age pensioners should be properly taken care of. In any country which calls itself Christian we should see that the old folks get a decent living, have enough to eat, a decent place to sleep and decent clothes to wear.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on the resolution, following the stand made clear by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in the early stages of this debate.

However, yesterday the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) had presented to him an opportunity to clarify a statement respecting the law. It was a most fortuitous opportunity and one which revealed a high degree of telepathy as between the hon. member who asked the question and the minister who had the answer prepared for the question asked.

I have read the answer with some interest. The hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) indicated that there was a good deal of doubt over the dissertation on the law which had been given a few days earlier by the minister, and in a speech notable for its brevity the hon. member asked a simple question. His question was as to whether the resolution was based upon any constitutional ground other than that mentioned in the resolution.

The resolution sets out the reasons for the powers sought when it states this:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Some days ago the minister gave his opinion in regard to the agricultural legislation before the house. That legislation was introduced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and it, too, was founded on the basis of national emergency. The preamble to that bill read, in part:

> And whereas the said orders and regulations will expire on the 31st day of March, 1947, and it is necessary by reason of the existing national emergency that parliament confer authority to enable the government of Canada—

To do certain things, namely to fulfil its obligations under an agreement, and to continue to sell and to export food and so forth.

The minister's opinion was given in regard to the agricultural legislation which was founded on the doctrine of national emergency, and none other. He gave his opinion in considerable detail. Yesterday when he spoke he said this:

> Our emergency legislation is based on the existence of a national emergency arising out of the war, on the emergency doctrine, to which no one takes any exception either in this house or outside it.

Well, sir, I am not going to repeat the arguments which were advanced the other day. But according to the Canada Temperance Act case the doctrine of emergency can no longer be taken advantage of by any federel government to infringe upon the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I say that by a subsequent privy council decision, the Japanese reference case, the emergency doctrine was emphatically affirmed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will come to that in a minute. I did not have the opportunity yesterday, sir, of asking the minister certain questions, when he made the ex parte statement. I wish to deal with that statement, because he has stated that this legislation is founded on the emergency doctrine, and as such can be passed by parliament. Then he went on to make this strangely exculpatory statement:

> My statement did not purport in any sense to be one of government policy or any indication of government policy. It was a report to the house on what the court had decided, nothing more.

Now, sir, with the greatest of respect for the Minister of Justice I submit that the facts are altogether the opposite of what he said they were. First, he set out, as reported at page 1553 of Hansard, the opinion of the law officers of the crown. Then he added:

> However I shall add my own opinion. I think on most occasions it will be the same as that of the deputy minister.

Then he set forth the opinion of the deputy minister. The minister continued in these words at page 1553:

> I do not think it necessary to add anything to that opinion.

And a little farther on:

> I am not going to venture into an opinion on the matter. However I have read the Canada Temperance Act case and the subsequent case, that of the Japanese reference, and it appears to me that the true effect of the decision in the Canada Temperance Act case is that there does not have to be an emergency to found jurisdiction on the part of the dominion; that the dominion may have the power even when there is no emergency to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, even though its legislation touches upon matters ordinarily regarded as solely within provincial jurisdiction. In other words, the judgment of the judicial committee of the privy council as given by Lord Simon extends rather than narrows the powers of the dominion as they had heretofore been conceived.

There, sir, he enunciates a doctrine which he said yesterday was his personal opinion, which would place in the hands of the dominion parliament, the power to override the British North America Act, to infringe upon the rights of the provinces under section 92 and, to all intents and purposes, to destroy the rights of the provinces under confederation.

Even if it is accepted as the personal view of the Minister of Justice, it is a view which would destroy the rights of the provinces in this country by permitting their coercion at the instance of a dominion parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is utter nonsense, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Speaking about nonsense, I am just wondering how to designate yesterday's opinion which was given by the Minister of Justice. May I now proceed further to quote the minister's own words. After setting forth the power of the dominion, he states this as a personal opinion:

As I say, these cannot be the only aspects of the emergency but these aspects are, I submit, sufficient to occasion a valid exercise of the powers under the peace, order and good government clause.

To sum up: We do not need, under the Canada Temperance Act case, to establish a national emergency.

"We" is not personal. "We" represents the government in the parliament of this country, because up to that point the minister had invariably used "I" to describe himself.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said, under the Canada Temperance Act case. That is merely a statement of what that case says.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will read it further:

To sum up: We do not need, under the Canada Temperance Act case, to establish a national emergency. Under that case a national emergency may be the occasion for passing legislation which is valid under the peace, order and good government clause.

And a little later on:

In that opinion I am supported by the deputy minister of justice.

Mr. ILSLEY: "Under" the Canada Temperance Act case means "according to" the Canada Temperance Act case, does it not?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: After all, I am just reading from the opinion.

Mr. ILSLEY: But don't twist things, please.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: When it comes to twisting there was a fine example of twisting yesterday on the part of the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is more nonsense.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We on this side of the house have realized for a long while that this government, day by day and week by week, under the guise of national emergency has infringed on the rights of the provinces. The minister has declared as the viewpoint of the government of this country that they have the right to do so. That is a dangerous doctrine, a doctrine that would say that by a simple majority on the part of a government in power and its allies it can at any time, simply by a declaration in a preamble that an emergency exists, impinge on the rights of the provinces over property and civil rights. I can understand that my hon. friends to the left would accept this doctrine of emergency, for, should they ever come into power, they can simply call into existence an emergency and infringe on the jurisdiction of the provinces over property and civil rights, for socialism can never come in this country until all the provinces are socialistic or until parliament accepts the principle that, by a simple declaration of an emergency, the dominion parliament can infringe on provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights.

Mr. BRUNELLE: If the hon. member will permit a question, was it not he himself who suggested to the Minister of Justice that, under the Canada Temperance Act case, emergency was no longer necessary upon which to found jurisdiction? Was it or was it not he?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I said that, under the Canada Temperance Act case, the doctrine of emergency no longer justified the dominion, by a simple declaration in a preamble, infringing on the rights of the provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was not your position.

Mr. JAENICKE: Would the hon. member for Lake Centre mind quoting parts of the decision in the Canada Temperance Act case?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have it here, but those who run may read, particularly those who are lawyers. I quoted from it the other day and I will quote from it again. My hon. friends to the left naturally support this infringement on the jurisdiction of the provinces, for to bring their system into effect they have to have emergency powers of legislation in the parliament of Canada. They have to deny the right of the individual to recourse to the courts.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is ridiculous. That is a statement you cannot prove.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right. Would Sir Stafford Cripps be an authority, I ask my hon. friend?

Mr. COLDWELL: Not for this group, maybe for somebody else.

Mr. ROWE: You have often quoted him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is another example of lack of cabinet solidarity or unity within a party. I have heard my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar say that his party stands where the Labour party of Britain stands.

Mr. COLDWELL: They have a unitary government over there. You cannot discuss a federal system and a unitary system in the same light.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend has made the situation most clear. That is exactly what this government by legislation of this kind is effecting. It is creating a unitary state in Canada under the guise of an emergency. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is right. I find him reasonable. I always enjoy listening to him, but he quite frankly admits by the very question he asks that socialism can never come into effect if we uphold the principles of the British North America Act and the division of powers set out in that act in sections 91 and 92.

Mr. COLDWELL: The people will decide that some day.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: True enough, the people will decide. But at the moment I am saying that if my hon. friends of the C.C.F. came into power tomorrow the precedent declared the other day by the Minister of Justice would be the blueprint upon which they, with a majority, could override parliament. They would have with them the supporting corroboration of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is John the Baptist to them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. says that he cannot accept what Sir Stafford Cripps has to say. I was in the library today and I was reading what was said away back in 1933 by Sir Stafford Cripps, when the whole plan was revealed. Does my hon. friend accept Major Attlee, the present Prime Minister of Great Britain?

Mr. COLDWELL: So far as what he says about his own country yes, but in what he says about this country, no.

Mr. GRAYDON: What a change!

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Here is revealed how socialism is to be brought in. These words were written in 1933. Sir Stafford Cripps said in 1933 in "Problems of a Socialist Government", at page 43:

> The government's first step will be to call parliament together at the earliest moment and place before it an emergency powers bill—

Mr. KNOWLES: What parliament?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend does not need any information on that. Surely he can answer his own question.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just to keep the record clear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will read it again:

> The government's first step will be to call parliament together at the earliest moment and place before it an emergency powers bill to be passed through all its stages on the first day.

Mr. ROWE: A little of Hitler there.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Get it through quickly—applying the doctrine of emergency. It goes on:

> This bill will be wide enough in its terms to allow all that will be immediately necessary to be done by ministerial orders.

That quotation indicates why my hon. friends to the left invariably support the government in its order in council type of government, because Sir Stafford Cripps, the guide and beacon of his party, has set forth the course. When I said that whatever was done under ministerial order was not subject to the courts, did the leader of the C.C.F. say "nonsense"?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I did not say that.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask in what year that book was written?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In 1933.

Mr. MITCHELL: People are naive when they are young. The year 1933 is a long time ago.

Mr. ROWE: Another naive observation!

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister was a socialist then himself.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not want to see an argument between my hon. friends because they have been allies up to now. Sir Stafford goes on to say:

These orders must be incapable of challenge in the courts.

Then he sets out what has to be done. He says that the government will have to govern by ministerial order. Then at page 54 he says:

In the extended use of ministerial orders for giving legislative effect to the general principles laid down by parliament, one great change must be effected. At the present time it is left to the courts to decide whether these orders are within the powers given by parliament. It is always possible for them to be challenged in the courts and to be declared invalid. This power—

The power of recourse to the courts.

—must be taken from the courts, and the sole right to challenge such orders must rest with parliament.

There is the blueprint, even to the name. As the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) says, it was a long time ago, 1933, fourteen years ago, when Sir Stafford Cripps, now a minister in the Attlee cabinet, set forth not only the course to be taken but the name for the bill which the government of Canada fourteen years later adopted.

Mr. ILSLEY: The name for what bill?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That has been one of the names used, the emergency powers bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not of this bill.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend the leader of the C.C.F. said, "Well, we cannot accept Sir Stafford Cripps." I turn over a few pages, and Major C. R. Attlee, M.P. adds his chapter, page 186:

In his chapter "Can Socialism come by Constitutional Methods?" Sir Stafford Cripps has examined the conditions in which a socialist government, returned with a majority and a definite mandate from the electors to transform the economic system, would have to work.

And these are the words:

I associate myself with his conclusions.

Well, there is the picture.

Mr. COLDWELL: The mandate of the people should be carried out. That is all that says. The hon. member knows that perfectly well.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: He associated himself with the words of Sir Stafford Cripps as to the means whereby it could be done.

Mrs. STRUM: So did the people of England.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, I have heard that before; that is no answer.

Mr. KNOWLES: Didn't they?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, yes, they voted for it, and I am not going to discuss that situation today. But the other day Churchill, in the House of Commons, pointed out the difficulties in Britain today in consequence of the election of a government that has destroyed initiative.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What were the difficulties here in 1933 when that book was written, when a Tory government was in power?

Mrs. STRUM: They almost ruined the country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Even Your Honour has to laugh.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are all laughing at the present speaker. The whole house is laughing.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not know why there are all these interruptions, but I am glad to see that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) sees so clearly through the same glass—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He is a good socialist.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: —as do my hon. friends to the left, who found it necessary today to renounce the doctrines of a man whom a few short weeks ago they held up as a model leading a government the like of which they would wish to have in this country. Here we are in 1947, with the government asking for powers which, if the doctrine enunciated by the Minister of Justice is accepted by this house and the country, means that as far as our federal system is concerned the dominion will be placed in the position of a landlord with overriding powers of legislative eviction in so far as the provinces are concerned. The provincial jurisdiction will be that of tenants at will, with its legislative power at the will of a majority in the House of Commons.

Mr. CLEAVER: That is cheap bologna, no matter how you slice it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Worse than that, mischievous tripe.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No one can speak with greater authority on that subject than my hon. friend.

Mr. CLEAVER: More of the same.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly, sir, my hon. friend would be prepared to give his legal opinion on the subject when I conclude.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would my hon. friend give his? Will he answer this question: Does he deny the constitutional basis for this proposed legislation? Does he say it will be invalid?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I say, sir—

Mr. ILSLEY: Answer the question.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Having regard to the change of face on the part of the Minister of Justice, I think there cannot but be doubt on the part of anyone who reads, first, his opinion of the other day and his withdrawal yesterday.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend will not answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: He does not dare.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend dare not answer the question, yes or no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend is able to ask any question like that because he realizes that this is—

Mr. MARTIN: Answer the question.

Mr. ROWE: Give him a chance to answer it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. CLEAVER: You are afraid to answer it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Lake Centre has the floor. He must not be interrupted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I was going to say this. My right hon. friend has taken two stands. The first stand was a logical one. He took that and then began to realize that the provinces would appreciate that what we have said over here for the last two years is coming true.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not take two stands.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I beg your pardon?

Mr. ILSLEY: I say I did not take two stands.

Mr. ROWE: Read Hansard.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot reply in this debate, or I would reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is nothing to reply to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I could follow the course my right hon. friend started yesterday by having one of his supporters ask a question which my right hon. friend was ready to answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why should he not ask the question?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

An hon. MEMBER: That was perfectly in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What was wrong with it?

An hon. MEMBER: It was framed.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Lake Centre should be allowed to continue without so many interruptions.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would now point out the case in reference to which the question was asked by the hon. member for Kindersley, and that is the case of the Attorney-General of Canada and the Canada Temperance Federation. I have quoted from it in a previous discussion wherein it is set forth that the doctrine of emergency can no longer be taken advantage of by the federal authority. My right hon. friend yesterday said he was speaking only for himself when he made the statement the other day. I ask, sir: Since when can there be a bifurcation on the part of a minister of the crown, when he can speak from the treasury benches for himself, and then later on say words to the effect that when he spoke the other day he was speaking only for himself and not speaking for the government?

Mr. ILSLEY: That was not the position I took at all.

Mr. JAENICKE: Would the hon. member permit another question? Will he read that part of the judgment which refers—

An hon. MEMBER: Read it yourself.

Mr. JAENICKE: I am not going to make a speech just now.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, well—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. GEORGES H. HEON (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, the resolution before this house is in effect to continue for a limited period certain orders and regulations passed by the governor in council under the War Measures Act. Further, the resolution is to authorize the governor in council to hire and to pay out of public funds an unfixed, undetermined amount to the numerous officers, clerks and employees of the wartime prices and trade board and the crown companies who will administer, execute and decide the limitation of freedom of the Canadian people for a limited period under these orders and regulations.

The resolution, as I understand it, assumes that a state of emergency still exists, and the debate has brought a statement of the law officers of the Department of Justice into Hansard, that even if a state of national emergency did not exist de facto, it would still be lawful and constitutional under the "peace, order and good government" proviso of section 91 of the British North America Act to apply in peace time the orders and regulations which were passed under the War Measures Act and which, it is alleged, violate some of the provisions of section 92 of the British North America Act.

It could be stated here as an aside that if the officers of the Department of Justice who wrote that opinion had been expressly mandated to prepare an opinion which would furnish Messrs. Macdonald, Drew and Duplessis precious ammunition in their fight for the respect of provincial autonomy, they could not have done better. True, after the speeches made by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), whose opinion I fully share, on the constitutional issue at present involved, and after the carefully timed question put by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret), the government has taken pains to restate, I would say, its constitutional views. But—and this is a big "but"—I have not heard or read yet that the advisers to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) had changed their own legal opinion on the same subject. Whether the right hon. minister will be able to convince his advisers or whether the advisers will reconvince the minister, I do not know. Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, the constitutional issue, although a most serious one, is not the only issue involved in this resolution.

In preceding debates and in the course of this debate, another highly controversial assertion has been brought into play. It has been stated that a national emergency in Britain creates a national emergency in Canada because, Britain being our best customer, if she does not remain so we shall ourselves immediately suffer dire economic consequences. The fact remains that our best customer is at the moment also our heaviest and least immediately-solvent debtor, despite the fact that this country has literally pumped into the economic heart of Britain, both during and since the war, billions of dollars in loans, goods and credits. Certainly Canada can never be accused of having been miserly in its help, even if Canada decided to discontinue that benevolence tomorrow, and set herself to do business with customers who are able to pay their bills immediately.

No one has greater admiration and sympathy than I have for the courageous British people in their present straits, and no one wishes them a speedier recovery. Yet as a Canadian I cannot fail to take notice of the conditions prevailing in my own country, of the various shortages which handicap our own economic recovery and which create unrest and discontent among all classes, particularly the labouring and white-collar classes who, already deeply affected by small wages, cannot procure those few items of necessity or comfort to which as humans they are entitled.

As was so ably stated by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) last evening, you will never be able to convince the fishing community of Quebec's north shore that it must do without powdered milk. You cannot convince the Canadian farmer, who cannot procure a much-needed truck that he must do without it; similarly you cannot convince the veteran who cannot procure decent lodgings; the father of a family who has saved for years to build a small house of his own but cannot do so for lack of building materials; the rural dweller who wishes to have electricity installed, but cannot obtain wire and fixtures because they are nonexistent, except on the black market; the mother of a large family who cannot procure the butter she needs when she needs it because of our commitments to Britain and the necessity of keeping solvent our best customer. In all cases, to the man who is not acquainted with the intricacies of international finance and markets, the answer will be: "Well, ordained charity begins at home," and I know of no one who is prepared to challenge the truth of this old saying and wisdom. That we should export our own production surpluses, I agree, and say, "yes"; that we should export that portion of our production which is evidently needed here, I disagree and say "no". After all, there is a limit beyond which a nation of twelve million people, which bled itself in its magnificent war effort, cannot be asked to go even if it is to help its good customers. If controls are to be maintained for a further period, the boys at the controls should be instructed to control in such a way as to give to the Canadian people who pay their wages, those necessities, utilities and goods which are sorely needed, before controlling for purposes of exportation and favourable trade balances. Highly trained economists, and exponents of internationalism may believe that exportations come first, but the average Canadian thinks that, because he produces, pays the bills and the taxes, he comes first; and in that attitude I believe he is absolutely correct and honest.

The present resolution involves a still greater principle than constitutional integrity, the opportunity of maintaining exports and helping our friends and erstwhile allies; it involves that principle which further consecrates a planned and controlled economy rather than a return to the old competitive system. One of these days, and maybe very soon, we shall have to make a definite choice. We cannot forever pay lip service to the cause of freedom of enterprise, the while fostering and abetting state control, state power, by looking to the government or to the bureaucrats to provide a way out of our economic difficulties.

Various opinions have from time to time been expressed in this house on this all-important issue, opinions which vary all the way from out-and-out socialism to mitigated socialism, to mitigated capitalism and to rock-ribbed individualism.

To the believers in continued state control, I should like to read this extract from Time magazine of February 17, which is speaking about the communist Eisler, who is now in the hands of American justice:

But beyond Eisler there are a host of other men—fellow travellers, confused liberals, "totalitarian liberals," left-wing new dealers—who owe muddled allegiance to the idea that government should be omnipotently responsible for the lives of its citizens even to the point of benevolent despotism. They fail to understand that despotism, which has a way of beginning with benevolence, usually ends by being merely despotic. Few of them even understood the incompatibility of their views with democracy, or that it is just such views which makes them so sympathetic to Soviet Russia.

I should also like to read this extract from Friedrich A. Hayek's great book, "The Road to Serfdom":

In order to achieve their ends, the planners must create power—power over men wielded by other men . . . Their success will depend on the extent to which they achieve such power. Democracy is on obstacle to this suppression of freedom which the centralized direction of economic activity requires. Hence arises the clash between planning and democracy.

And further:

To decentralize power is to reduce the absolute amount of power, and the competitive system is the only system designed to minimize the power exercised by man over man. Who can seriously doubt that the power which a millionaire, who may be my employer, has over me is very much less than that which the smallest bureaucrat possesses who wields the coercive power of the state and on whose discretion it depends how I am allowed to live and work.

And still further:

Our generation has forgotten that the system of private property is the most important guarantee of freedom. It is only because the control of the means of production is divided among many people acting independently that we as individuals can decide what to do with ourselves. When all the means of production are vested in a single hand, whether it be nominally that of "society" as a whole or that of a dictator, whoever exercises this control has complete power over us. In the hands of private individuals, what is called economic power can be an instrument of coercion, but it is never control over the whole life of a person. But when economic power is centralized as an instrument of political power it creates a degree of dependence scarcely distinguishable from slavery.

It can be argued, and quite properly, that the present resolution does not go that far and that it is a move to decontrol slowly; yet it is maintenance of controls in the most potent and dangerous of forms, namely, statutes. On this continuation of controls, I should like to quote two opinions. One is by the Canadian chamber of commerce passed at Winnipeg, and reads as follows:

The highest standard of living in the world has been developed on this continent under the system of private competitive enterprise. The Canadian chamber of commerce records its unswerving support for that system and its vigorous opposition to anything which would weaken or destroy the rights and freedom of the individual citizen.

Freedom of choice and freedom of action, within the limits of the public welfare are regarded as inalienable rights of the individual. The chamber holds that Canada can be great and prosperous only if all individuals have the incentive of adequate reward for energy, initiative and enterprise and the right to enjoy the products of their thrift and foresight. Freedom is indivisible. The individual cannot be deprived of his economic freedom and retain his political freedom.

The rights of free citizens to sell the products of their labours cannot be surrendered to the state without a loss of personal liberties, such as few citizens would be willing to accept.

The other quotation is from a statement made by Robert P. Jellett, chairman of the board of the Royal Trust Company, on February 11, 1947, and reads as follows:

There is need for much careful thought by all citizens as to the part that the state may properly exercise in the total of the country's activity. The attempt to regulate prices and wages has brought about a remarkable extension of the state's control. I have not believed, however, that any combination of brains at the disposal of governments can ever equal the almost automatic effects of the ordinary law of supply and demand in the efficient adjustment of prices and wages. There is a limit to the number of experts who may be engaged to watch conditions, costs, and prices, and to endeavour to exercise control of them to the best interests of the economy of the country. But there is almost no limit to the number of people who through their multitudinous purchases and sales bring about the changes in prices needed to balance supply and demand. A point to bear in mind is that these multitudes, in contrast to those employed in government bureaux and boards, render this essential service without cost to the taxpayer.

What is of still greater importance, only the prices established in this natural way can be regarded as genuine. The price levels established by bureaucratic manipulation are generally deceptive. For a low price can often be maintained only by the payment of subsidies or by the lowering of the quality of the goods—both of which must ultimately reduce the purchaser's income in other ways. Moreover, the artificial control of prices has led to many most undesirable complications, such as the encouragement of black marketing and the decline in the production of needed goods because the fixed prices do not make their manufacture profitable. It is well to face the fundamental economic fact that only free prices can tell the truth.

Return to Fundamentals

There are signs that people and government alike may be returning to the realization of the fundamental economic truth that whatever regulations may be found desirable in the public interest, the most natural and the most fruitful role of government comes from what it may be able to do to reduce all that restricts and discourages, and to assist all that may release the immeasurable potentialities that lie in free individual effort and responsibility.

Sir Ernest Benn has gone farther still: he has stated that a free trading competitive economy will not only prevent depressions, but also prevent wars. He spoke thus:

I am one of those who believe that but for the Ottawa agreements and our protective tariff at home, designed to save us from the supposed disadvantages of competition, Hitler would never have been heard of. I hold it to be a myth that wars of the past have been conducted for trade reasons or that economic competition has had anything whatever to do with them. At all events so far as we are concerned it is undoubtedly true that so long as we are prepared to buy and sell in the open market in competition with one and all, we offer no economic incentive to the most persistent of war-mongers.

It is then a matter for every hon. member to decide for himself, depending on the school of economics to which he belongs. As for me, I choose to align myself with the editors of Time, Freidrich Hayek, the Canadian chamber of commerce, Mr. R. P. Jellett, Sir Ernest Benn and countless Canadians who feel that full scope be given to the individual's initiative. If this initiative runs amok, this house can legislate to curb it and punish it if needs be; but let this initiative, within law and reason, be given full speed ahead to hasten our economic recovery.

The resolution as it stands before us, Mr. Speaker, is too general in its terms. If a specific control were shown to be temporarily essential, by a specific measure, I would vote for it, except rentals, which should revert to provincial legislatures. If I can be shown that there is not enough butter, or cheese, or milk produced in this country to satisfy this country's needs, I will gladly vote to ration it; if it can be demonstrated that lumber is not being produced in sufficient quantities to fill our construction needs, again I shall favour its control. But as regards lumber, I must say that producers feel that control is not further necessary, and I wish to put on Hansard copy of a letter written by the Canadian International Paper Company to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), permission for quotation having been obtained from the Canadian International Paper Company. The letter is dated February 17, 1947, and reads as follows:

Hon. Brooke Claxton, K.C.,
Minister of National Defence,
M.P. for St. Lawrence-St. George,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir:

We are of the opinion, along with other Canadian lumbermen, that the time has arrived when price control should be abolished and the lumber industry allowed to function in its own way.

Our cost of production has increased—in fact, above our present ceiling price, owing to increases of wages, food, supplies, especially labour, which makes up about 60 per cent of our total cost. This increase has forced us to look to foreign markets in order to balance the low prices of Canadian ceilings. This situation, if not checked, will jeopardize Canadian position in the world markets.

If decontrol is put into effect promptly, graded lumber will flow more freely under free distribution. Also the results of decontrol have been demonstrated by conditions in the United States where prices increased for a short period but settled down to a lower level; in some cases below the old OPA prices.

If decontrol is to be put into effect, the most opportune time would be at once, before the new production comes onto the market in early spring and summer.

We believe that you would be benefiting the country as a whole and the lumber industry in general by urging your cabinet members at Ottawa to have lumber controls removed.

Yours truly,
Canadian International Paper Company
(Signed) G. G. Goodall,
Lumber Sales Manager.

I should also like to quote a paragraph from a letter of the Western Retail Lumberman's Association, dated February 27, 1947, which reads as follows:

Retail lumber dealers ask that price control on lumber be removed, firmly convinced that this course alone will restore order in the business and make possible increased volume of construction work.

For all the reasons I have given above, and because the resolution is too general in its terms and perpetuates government by order in council and administration of officers, clerks and employees not responsible to this house or to the people, I shall vote against it, and in so doing I believe I shall be in distinguished company.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Last evening the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross), in taking part in the debate, took occasion to quote from a speech delivered by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) on June 5, 1940, as reported at page 545 of Hansard, as follows:

> The secret of the recent success of the Germans is the fact they have consciously planned their economic structure.

I interrupted the hon. member and suggested that he should read the entire statement. He replied:

> I have not time to read the whole speech.

Hansard then reports me as saying not what I had intended to say, as follows:

> Then the hon. member must be doing it for a diabolical purpose.

What I was seeking to do at the time was to give the rest of the statement the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made at that time. The complete statement as found on page 545 reads as follows:

> Many of us are realizing for the first time today that the secret of the recent success of the Germans is the fact that they have consciously planned their economic structure. True, they have planned with diabolical intent, but they have planned with an end in view.

I thought then that if the hon. member for Souris wished to be fair to this group he should have given the entire statement. I should like to remind him of the old Chinese proverb that the beginning of wisdom is the calling of things by their right names. I am sure that the hon. member for Souris knows the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar well enough to know that he is the last person in this house or in Canada who would seek to force on the Canadian people any form of government which would be undemocratic or undesirable. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has been well known throughout his lifetime as one of the outstanding champions of democracy in Canada. Hon. members like the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) and the hon. member for Souris are not performing any useful public service by lumping together all ideas which are objectionable to them and hurling them at those of us who sit in this part of the house. I think they should recall that less than two years ago Russia was a great ally; she was fighting bravely because the people of that country thought there was a fundamental difference between the system they had in Russia and the system in Germany. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it does not make for good international understanding when members in this chamber now tell us that there is no difference between the forms of government they have had in Germany or in Great Britain or in Russia.

The hon. member for Souris took some time to tell about the wonderful conditions prevailing to the south of us in the United States. I was expecting that after he developed his argument, in which he pointed out how few bushels of wheat the North Dakota farmer pays for a combine or a tractor, as compared with the number of bushels a farmer in Manitoba or Saskatchewan would have to pay, he would have gone on to make a speech advocating the removal of tariffs in Canada. I suggest to him that one of the reasons western farmers have always paid much higher prices for their farm machinery has been that the Conservatives in eastern Canada have imposed unreasonable tariffs on the farmer.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Is that so today?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Throughout our generation the tariff structure, generally, has imposed an unfair burden on the people of this country.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): But tell us what that tariff is today.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is a good deal on automobiles, for example.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The hon. member mentioned farm implements and combines.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It applies to all farm costs. If it were not for tariffs, prices in Canada would be a good deal lower.

Mr. JACKMAN: Skating around it again.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Souris might have gone on to tell us about the cost of living in the United States. I have a report here showing the cost of living in several United States and Canadian cities where conditions are as comparable as one might expect. I have chosen Vancouver and Seattle; Winnipeg and Minneapolis; Toronto and Detroit and Cleveland; Ottawa and Syracuse; Montreal and Boston. This survey was made between January 6 and 17. I find that, while milk sold in Canadian cities at from twelve to sixteen cents, it sold for from twenty-two to twenty-six cents in the United States. Perhaps I should explain that in making this comparison the fact that the Canadian imperial quart is larger than the United States quart was taken into account. The former O.P.A. ceiling price in the United States on milk was twenty to twenty-four cents. Creamery butter in Canadian cities sold at from forty-one to forty-six cents, and in the United States at from seventy-five to ninety-one cents, the former O.P.A. price being fifty-five to sixty-three cents. Cheese, which sold in Canada at thirty-one to forty-two cents, sold in United States cities at from forty-six to sixty-nine cents, and the O.P.A. price had been forty-three to sixty-one cents.

All down the list of foodstuffs we find these marked differences in flour, corn syrup, soap—all the items used in Canadian homes. The effect of the removal of price ceilings in the United States has been that the citizens get less for their dollar. I am much happier to be in Canada than I would be if I were in the United States. True, certain wages and prices would appear more favourable on the surface, but I believe, on balance, conditions in Canada are a good deal better.

When the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) rises in the House of Commons he always makes an interesting speech. However I think a discussion of what has been advocated in Great Britain by a labour government under one set of circumstances, despite the fact that their approach to the problem is similar to ours, is not necessarily relevant when we are discussing a Canadian problem.

The hon. member might have gone on to develop an argument which was started some time ago regarding the town and country planning bill in the United Kingdom. Over there they have a set of conditions under which the ownership of the great resources of the country is vested in the hands of a small number of people. I saw that in an article which appeared in the Toronto Star Weekly of March 15, regarding this vicious socialist legislation, as it would be described by the Progressive Conservative party, Matthew Halton, C.B.C. correspondent, said this:

> The measure is obviously then revolutionary. It is no wonder that one socialist journal calls it "the end of the bastille", while another headlines its story, "Death to Debrett's." The land has always been the bastille of privilege in Britain, and a fortress hitherto inviolable . . . A handful of men owned the land of Britain, and still do; but their tenure, or at least their control, is now to end. Of the 45,000,000 people in the United Kingdom, less than 2,000,000 own a single square foot of land. Of the 9,000,000 people in London, less than 40,000 own a piece of land.
> In the United Kingdom there are 90,000 square miles of land. Half of it is owned by 340 men. Lord Derby owns one-third of Lancashire. The Duke of Norfolk owns 50,000 acres, the Earl of Breadalbane 300,000 acres, the Duke of Devonshire 186,000 acres, the Duke of Portland 183,000 acres, and so on. Just before the war the Marquis of Bute sold half the city of Cardiff for $150,000,000—and still owned 117,000 acres.
> The ancient families own the land by ancient right or reward or accident or plunder. Typical example: Five hundred years ago at the battle of Tewkesbury, which ended the Wars of the Roses, Lord Stanley deserted Richard III at the crisis of the battle and went over to Henry VII and the Lancastrians. King Henry rewarded the traitor with the earldom of Derby and with the lands of the Lancastrians who had fought against him. Today, Lord Derby owns whole towns that have grown up on the lands so acquired, some $9,000,000—quite a substantial profit at that figure.

If I were living in Great Britain I would be advocating a land policy different from that advocated in Canada by the C.C.F. The fact is that in Canada the land belongs to the farmers, but they are not exploiting the consumers. It is a well-established fact that the Canadian farmers, in war time and in peace time, have worked unreasonably long hours and have produced enormous quantities of foods for local and foreign consumption. They have supplied these foodstuffs at less than the cost of production.

Therefore there is no reason under the sun why any political party in Canada should advocate a land policy such as that being advocated by the labour government in Great Britain, where we find a small handful of people owning vast estates and exploiting the people who work on that property.

I was amused by the hon. member for Lake Centre. One would think, when listening to him in the house, that those who sit on the treasury benches are leading the country straight to socialism, that they are public enemies number one. But it is interesting to note that when the hon. member is out in Saskatchewan he sees to it that his supporters in that province work with the Liberals, with a view to defeating the C.C.F.

Press dispatches from Regina make it clear that the remaining Conservatives in Saskatchewan are desperate, and are saying to the Liberals, "Really, there is nothing to keep us apart. We must get together to stop the C.C.F." It is going to be extremely difficult for the hon. member for Lake Centre and the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) to go back on the hustings in Saskatchewan and tell the people out there that they have settled their differences, that they are one in Saskatchewan, but that they sit on opposite sides of the House of Commons in Ottawa. I suggest that it would keep the record straight if the hon. member for Lake Centre would see to it that his followers in Saskatchewan pursued the same general tactics followed in the House of Commons by the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. KNOWLES: And it is the same thing in Manitoba and British Columbia.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes; I could add that in all the western provinces that is so.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Bring them all down to give you a hand in Manitoba.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It appears there is no difference between the Liberals—

Mrs. STRUM: We haven't any in Saskatchewan.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, we had you there; I enjoyed your visit.

Mr. GRAYDON: Didn't you people enter into a coalition in Manitoba, at one time?

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Heon)—

Mr. GRAYDON: Did you get out of it?

Mr. COLDWELL: When we did not know him as well as we know him now.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Would others kindly save their speeches until I have finished? The hon. member for Argenteuil—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): It was not that way last night.

Mr. NICHOLSON: —made an eloquent appeal for the power and pulp manufacturers, for the poor members of the Canadian chamber of commerce who are being forced out of business by these bureaucratic controls! Each morning as I come to the parliament buildings I read the Montreal Gazette, and I find the financial page of this publication supplies some interesting information. The large corporations in Canada are submitting financial statements for 1946 which make all their previous net profits look like chicken feed. For instance, the Woods Manufacturing Company is reported in today's paper as having made a net profit of $197,315 in 1945, and $302,610 in 1946. I submit that their position does not deserve very much sympathy.

Then, International Nickel, one of our very poor relations, showed a net profit in 1945 of $25,010,938, and in 1946 one of $29,681,352. The Paul Service Stores increased their net profit from $43,675 in 1945 to $91,681 in 1946. And one of the well-established firms, Distillers-Seagrams had a net profit of $13,194,441 in the six months ended January 31, 1946, while their net profit for the six months ended January 31, 1947, was $31,834,858. One of these very poor pulp and paper companies, the St. Lawrence Paper Mills, had a net profit of $431,460 in 1945, and $1,241,504 in 1946, or nearly three times as much as in 1945. The Lake St. John Pulp and Paper Company had a net profit of $310,898 in 1945, and of $872,202 in 1946. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that with corporations in Canada showing balance sheets such as I have mentioned, it is obvious that they have not been hurt very much by the controls which existed during the war.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Having said that much on the comments made by the members of the Progressive Conservative party, I want now to support the view expressed by the leader of this group and by my colleagues, that we are not satisfied with the government's disorderly retreat from the whole price control field. Calling the Minister of Justice a socialist is, I think, unfair. I believe that members in all parts of the house had a great admiration for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Minister of Finance during the war. There was a good deal of sniping at many of the dictatorial powers that he took, but I shall be surprised if any evidence is ever presented to show that the Minister of Justice in his position as Minister of Finance improved in any particular the financial position of himself or any of his friends, and I submit that that is an important test to apply to an organization which had such sweeping power and control over the lives of so many people. There can be no argument about it, that if Canada was to make her greatest contribution in prosecuting the war to a successful conclusion some authority had to decide the quantities of materials that should be allotted for domestic consumption and what quantities should be devoted to the manufacturing of armaments and supplying the necessities of our allies. During the war from 1914 to 1918 we got through without any of these controls, but in that war we diverted only about ten per cent of our national production to war purposes, while from 1939 to 1945 we diverted nearly fifty per cent and the interesting feature is that after we had diverted fifty per cent of our domestic consumption to war purposes, and after 750,000 of our youngest and finest went forth in the armed forces, our Canadian citizens at home enjoyed on the average, a higher standard of living than they had ever done before. I see that my hon. friend the member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) is about to interrupt me and tell me what the income tax did to him and how his way of life was cramped, and I am not denying that.

Mr. FRASER: I think in Ottawa it is only the C.C.F. who have maids. We have none.

Mr. NICHOLSON: It is true that people in the higher income tax brackets have had to pay more drastic taxes and they have not been able to do all the things they would have liked to do. But until controls were introduced there was no way of assuring that automobile production would be available for military purposes. Without controls we would have had automobile factories running to capacity, and Canadian citizens who did not have a patriotic sense of duty would have been buying and using automobiles for pleasure. But controls were introduced, and the Canadian people, in response to appeals made by the government were prepared to get along without new cars, were content to drive their old ones, and put up with the rationing of gasoline.

It is unfortunate that some hon. members should have made such wild and reckless statements as to the extent of black markets in Canada. While there has been some black market business, I think that, on the whole, only a very small amount of business has been transacted on the black market. I did a good deal of travelling during the war and sometimes found myself arriving at a hotel without having made reservations in advance, but never once did I offer a bribe to any of the staff to get me a room. Sometimes I had to wait for some time and I did have to stay up all night on one occasion, but generally speaking I believe that the staff in hotels and stores and garages, in fact all our people, cooperated with the authorities in complying with the regulations.

I think it was the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby) who suggested that all the deputy ministers should be called before the courts of justice and charged with treason. I believe that suggestion did a great disservice to public spirited citizens. The deputy ministers are not here to defend themselves, but each has a minister who must take responsibility for everything he did, and if any deputy minister has acted in an undemocratic way or has advocated things that are not in the public interest, the way to proceed against him is to get the minister on the carpet and make charges or bring the matter up on a question of privilege.

Again I suggest that we should determine for ourselves whether we would have had a more effective war effort without controls, whether it would have been better to allow the dollar ballots to decide what should be done.

I was interested in a release put out by the government during the war indicating how controls on truck traffic had operated to the benefit of our war effort. I quote from the release:

> The effect of the order has been the elimination of at least 100,000,000 truck miles per annum (this is an ultra conservative figure), with few instances where justifiable criticism based on actual hardship can be levelled at the board, either through lack of service or increased costs.

I submit that the saving of 100,000,000 truck miles a year is a matter of great importance to the producer and the consumer, and without controls of this kind Canada would not have been able to make such an effective contribution to the war effort.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) was speaking on Thursday he made reference to the housing problem which still exists in this country, and he said:

> While much progress has been made in expanding our peace-time production, and while the flow of output is gathering increasing momentum, production in a number of important fields has not yet overtaken the high level of demand which in some cases, like that of housing, has been accumulating for years.

He was understating a pretty obvious fact. Later on, he said:

> In some cases, the consequences are quite obvious. For example, I do not think there can be much question as to what would happen if the controls over rentals and evictions were removed in present circumstances. In the face of the continuing shortage of housing accommodation, it is clear enough that rents would rise sharply and that evictions would be counted in the tens of thousands.

The minister was interrupted by some of my Progressive Conservative friends over here who said "Oh, oh." The minister at once replied:

> Absolutely true; and anyone who denies it is just living apart from the facts.

There have been suggestions from the Progressive Conservative section of the house that if all controls were abandoned, if free enterprise or private enterprise could have its way, the housing problem would be solved next week, or, if not next week, certainly next month.

Mr. GREEN: There was never any such suggestion.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) indicated that the removal of controls would be an important step with a view to solving this complex problem.

Mr. JACKMAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Somebody says "hear, hear" to support my claim. The minister was right in saying that the problem is acute, because it has been accumulating for many years. While the Progressive Conservative party was in office from 1930 to 1935, we saw the building of houses drop from 100, if you take your base prior to the depression, down to less than 20 during those years. Our sawmills were closed; tinsmiths and carpenters joined the ranks of the unemployed because we failed to provide needed homes for Canadians at that time. We made the situation which existed during the war much more acute than it might have been, and I think it is perfectly obvious that if controls were removed the public-spirited private entrepreneurs would ship their commodities where higher prices prevail. There are other countries that are now prepared to pay higher prices for our building materials in short supply than the wartime prices and trade board regulations permit in Canada. I submit that we would have a chaotic situation in this country if the advice of the Progressive Conservative party were accepted in connection with the problem.

The former chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, Mr. Donald Gordon, in a radio address last November correctly outlined the problem that forced the government to take action with a view to preventing evictions for the time being, and he said that the position of landlords in Canada was not as they would have us understand. In his speech, referring to the landlords, he said:

> During the past few years he has had very few vacancies, practically no bad debts, and has cut down on decorating. As well, he has reduced renting commissions and saved some expense in unnecessary alterations and decorating which often had to be done previously to meet the whims of tenants when they were able to pick and choose.

Unfortunately our Canadian statistics do not tell us the story as far as the landlords in Canada are concerned, but in the United States the statistics over the past few years make it clear that the landlords there have had a profitable period all through the war. They have been able to pay attractive returns on their capital investments, and the fact that they had few vacancies and no trouble making their collections meant that they had a veritable gold mine. However, that set of circumstances does not curb their agitation with a view to getting rid of controls in the hope that rents might be forced to high levels and that real estate would change hands at even more highly inflated prices than now prevail.

My only comment would be to criticize the government for retreating so rapidly in this field. The federal authority should have retained firmer controls over supplies. They turned over to the municipal authorities the problem of deciding what was an essential building and what was not. I remember being in Fort William and Port Arthur last fall when the most essential type of building there seemed to be poolrooms, theatres and what have you. The municipal authorities said, "What would our position be in Port Arthur, for example, if we decided that we could not give a permit for a theatre because it was a non-essential building? The builders would immediately go to Fort William and would have the local citizens up in arms because the city fathers had driven away a project from the city."

The federal authority was the logical one to see that, while the housing situation continued as it was, our short supplies should be diverted first of all to provide adequate housing for the people who are so crowded in all our metropolitan areas and in the towns of rural districts across the country. I think, therefore, that the comments made by hon. members to my right fail to take into account the situation that now exists, and I am sure that the great majority of the Canadian people are behind the administration in seeing to it that rent controls are maintained and that the public are not compelled, until the housing situation has been greatly altered, to go on the streets without shelter over their heads, while those who have the largest bank accounts are placed in the position where they can get possession of the short supply of shelter.

In conclusion, the members of this group feel that they are advocating the retention of the democratic privileges of the citizen to the greatest extent by insisting that the people, through their elected representatives in the government, should retain those controls that will be successful in keeping the cost of living down for the people of Canada.

Mr. F. E. JAENICKE (Kindersley): I shall not detain the house at any great length. In fact, I had not intended taking part in the debate at this stage, were it not for the fact that this afternoon, when I attempted to ask a question of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) at the conclusion of his address, I was told to make my own speech. That is what I am doing, and I shall briefly give my opinion regarding the constitutional question about which we have heard so much this afternoon.

But before I do that, I should like to refer to some other phase of the debate which we have heard, namely the disparaging references to the so-called bureaucrats. The exposition which we had last night was, I think, a disgrace to the house. After all, the so-called bureaucrats are our civil servants. Being a member of the banking and commerce committee, I had the privilege of getting in contact with them and to me they appeared to be decent, intelligent civil servants who were trying to do what was best for this country. Are they not responsible to a minister who is, again, responsible to this parliament? Surely these so-called bureaucrats, as well as any other civil servants, are responsible to the minister and the minister is responsible to this house. While they have been vilified by hon. members, it appears to me that no specific charge was at any time made against any of them, unless it be a charge from this particular corner of the house when we complained that some controls had been lifted which should not have been lifted; and then, if I remember aright, those actions were always taken on the responsibility of the minister himself. If we recollect the experience which we have gone through during the war years and the two years since the war ended, it seems to me that we owe a debt of gratitude to these civil servants and these so-called bureaucrats.

As far as the constitutional question is concerned, I submit that the argument this afternoon had nothing whatever to do with the resolution before us. It seemed to be a jockeying for political advantage or position. I asked the hon. member for Lake Centre to read a certain part of the judgment that he had been discussing, which part is, I think, most important. When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) on March 20 gave to this house the opinion of the deputy minister of justice, which opinion is quoted on page 1553 of Hansard, he dealt with the Agricultural Products Act and not with this particular resolution. The deputy minister of justice says in part, at the bottom of page 1553:

> The true test, according to this decision—

That is, the Canada Temperance Act decision.

> —is whether the real subject matter of the act goes beyond local or provincial concern and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the dominion as a whole. Such an act is within the competence of parliament though it may in another aspect touch upon matters specially reserved to the provinces. I should think that Bill 25 satisfies this test.

Bill No. 25 is the Agricultural Products Act. The deputy minister of justice came to this conclusion no doubt upon the following section of the decision, and I quote from the decision of the Canada Temperance Act case decided last year, as reported in Western Weekly Reports (1946) volume 2, page 6:

> In their Lordships' opinion, the true test must be found in the real subject-matter of the legislation: If it is such that it goes beyond local or provincial concern or interests and must from its inherent nature be the concern of the dominion as a whole, then it will fall within the competence of the dominion parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada, though it may in another aspect touch upon matters specially reserved to the provincial legislatures.

As I said, the decision was quoted in the legislation concerning the Agricultural Products Act and has nothing to do with the present resolution which is simply one based upon the emergency powers of the dominion. The decision in the Canada Temperance Act case could not by any stretch of the imagination be used as authority for the dominion parliament to legislate upon this resolution. It could not be used as authority for the dominion parliament to legislate, for instance, about rent and tenancy. Therefore I think the discussion this afternoon was altogether out of place.

While I am on my feet, may I be permitted to refer to some remarks made by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) the other night. He stated, as reported at page 1659 of Hansard:

> That is why today I choose to debate the subject that socialism is contrary to human nature.

That is his opinion. I may say that I respect his opinion and I hope he will respect mine. According to the studies which I have pursued in that particular realm, there are two schools of thought or two schools of philosophy. One school says that man, the human being, is an individual and always will be. The other school says that man is a social creature. I may say that I belong to the latter school and perhaps the hon. member for Trinity belongs to the former school. The first school is particularly represented by persons such as those he quoted as authority that socialism is against human nature, and that authority is Mr. H. L. Mencken of the United States, whom I consider to be the principal proponent of this philosophy and possibly the apostle of that famous German philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche. I have here the book of Mencken which is a sort of biography of this philosopher Nietzsche.

The hon. member also quoted Spencer, and while I will not go so far as Mencken to interpret Spencer, this is what Mencken says at page 192:

> Like Spencer before him, Nietzsche believed, as we have seen, that the best possible system of government was that which least interfered with the desires and enterprises of the efficient and intelligent individual.

Later on, at page 194 Mr. Mencken proceeds to prove some of the "freak legislation" that has been passed under democracy in some of the United States legislatures and even in congress itself. After he discusses this, he quotes the position in England and Germany, and this is what he says:

If, in England and Germany, the effect of universal suffrage has been less apparent, it is because in these countries the two upper castes have solved the problem of keeping the proletariat, despite its theoretical sovereignty, in proper leash and bounds.

If my hon. friend wishes to associate himself with this class of philosopher or with this school of philosophy, he is entitled to do so. But I believe that man is more a social creature. If you consider the annals of history from the earliest times to the present, you will see that he has made advances in his social connections and in his behaviour toward his neighbour. I fully believe that at one time or another socialism will be the ruling philosophy also in Canada.

I should like to refer here to a speech which was made almost fifteen years ago by Hon. Mr. Cahan, who was Secretary of State in the ministry of Mr. Bennett. It was during the debate on the so-called blank cheque legislation which was referred to the other day by the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). In this debate the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), had implored the then Secretary of State to make his influence felt so that this legislation would not pass, because it would create a terrible precedent for some socialist government that at some time or another might hold sway in this parliament. The following day Mr. Cahan replied to that challenge, and this is what he said, as appears at page 1634 of Hansard for April 1, 1932:

But the right hon. gentleman says if we follow the precedents established in the mother of parliaments we must look forward to the time when there may be socialistic control of this parliament of Canada. I do not wish to refer to myself personally—I have passed the age of three-score years and ten and I appreciate very keenly that my mentality, my prejudices and my predilections are born of the times in which I have lived and the vicissitudes of my own personal life—but I do not look forward with any fear or shrinking to the development of socialistic institutions in this country on a proper basis. I recognize that the strain and suffering through which we have passed and are passing has already borne fruit in remedial measures, socialistic in their tendencies, and those who are younger than I may well look forward to the time when those whose views are more socialistic than mine will assume the reins of government in this country. When they do they will assume the reins with the voice of a great majority of the Canadian people as manifested at the polls, they will assume office under our parliamentary institutions, not by force and violence, not by bullets and bayonets, but by the voice of the democracy of this great country. In that democracy, although I shall not live to see its development, I have the strongest possible confidence, and I think it would be a shame indeed if any minority in this house at any future time should attempt to thwart the views of the people, should attempt to thwart necessary and essential socialistic reforms by such procedure as we have witnessed in this house during the past few weeks.

To be charitable, Mr. Speaker, I believe the majority of the members of the party to my right are Conservatives like Mr. Cahan, and that when the time comes they will graciously bow to the will of the majority of the Canadian people.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. LOW: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) was prevented from taking part in this debate on the ground that he had moved the adjournment of the debate on the evening of March 20, and that therefore he was considered as having spoken once at that time. I should like to point out that the hon. member for Macleod did not speak on the resolution, and I cite Beauchesne, third edition, page 92—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he knows perfectly well that rulings made by the Speaker are not debatable; and, moreover, I do not believe the hon. member has a point of order. I would call his attention to citation 108 in Beauchesne, second edition:

The Speaker decides the questions of order only when they actually arise . . .

The hon. member is discussing a ruling I gave this afternoon, and I suppose he wants me to revise a ruling I have already given in connection with a situation which was settled at the time. I do not believe the hon. gentleman has any point of order. Moreover, I am sure my hon. friend is familiar with the rule that he should not discuss a ruling given by the Speaker. That ruling was given this afternoon. If the hon. member who was called to order at that time because he was not entitled to speak twice did not agree with the ruling of the Speaker, it was the privilege of that hon. gentleman to appeal the decision, which followed a ruling given by a previous Speaker. An appeal was not taken at the time. The matter has been settled, and I do not believe the hon. member has any grounds for rising to a point of order.

Mr. LOW: I would ask your pardon, sir, for continuing, but my point of order is that Your Honour has not the right to put the question on the resolution until every hon. member who wishes to speak to the resolution has had an opportunity to do so. I submit that the hon. member for Macleod has not had an opportunity to speak and that he has a right to do so, according to citation 216 at page 92 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, which reads:

> On resuming an adjourned debate, the member who moved its adjournment is by courtesy entitled to speak first if he rises in his place when the order is called, but if he does not avail himself of this privilege he is not thereby debarred from subsequently joining in the debate.

I submit that the hon. member for Macleod has not spoken, and that therefore the motion should not be put until he has had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Peace River will look at the end of citation 216, which he has quoted, he will see the letters "Hd.", which mean it is taken from the British Hansard, that it is a rule of the British House of Commons. If the hon. member had taken the standing orders of our own house he would have seen standing order 1, which is applicable:

> In all cases not provided for hereinafter or by sessional or other orders, the usages and customs of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland as in force at the time shall be followed so far as they may be applicable to this house.

When we have no rule to cover a question which is raised in this house we follow the rules which apply in the British house; but since we have a rule to cover the case in which the hon. member is interested, and since this afternoon I followed a ruling given by a speaker of the House of Commons of Canada, the rule followed in the British house does not concern this house. So I repeat that the hon. member for Macleod, having moved the adjournment of the debate on March 20, according to our rules is considered to have spoken once on the resolution; and, since he is not the mover of a substantive motion, he is not entitled to speak twice.

I shall now put the motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. COLDWELL: Would you put the yeas and nays?

And the yeas and nays having been called:

Mr. SPEAKER: Call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Ilsley) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. MERRITT: Mr. Speaker, I did not vote. Had I voted I would have voted for the motion. I did not vote because it appeared from the tone of some members of the house that my vote for the simple motion that you leave the chair would be taken as a vote for socialism, or something other than the motion itself.

(Translation):

Mr. GAGNON: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I was paired with the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

(Text):

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to continue the speech that I was making this afternoon. I prefer to do that on the second reading of the bill. I rise to ask a question of the minister since we are now in committee. When the bill is brought down, should parliament decide by amendment to change any clause in the bill or any clause in the schedule against the minister's will, will he or the government consider that a want of confidence motion?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the government opposes the amendment and the house nevertheless votes in favour of it, that would have to be taken as a vote of want of confidence in the government.

Mr. HANSELL: Then I suggest, Mr. Chairman, since now we can talk as man to man across the floor, that that puts us in a precarious position in the light of what the minister has already said that there will be a column in the bill for amendments. That is, to my mind, an important point.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a moment. The government may accept amendments, of course, but the answer I gave is substantially the correct one. There may be some detail, some very small provision, where that would not be the case, and the position would be made clear at the time. But an important amendment of any kind which the government opposed but which nevertheless the house voted for would imply want of confidence. The rules that will apply to this bill in committee are the rules that would apply to any other bill.

Mr. HANSELL: I point out a further detail. The schedule contains orders in council. There are in the orders in council some things to which we absolutely take exception, even though granting in principle that the government may have certain powers. For instance, take rent control. The regulations governing rent control are, to my mind, simply terrible. During an emergency period we must have a certain control of rents themselves but these regulations go much farther than that. They give the right to officials to walk into your house and cut it up. They may look at a room and say, "Do you mean to say that you two people occupy this room alone?" "Oh, yes." Then they can say, "It is too big. Cut it in half so that somebody else may live in the other half."

Mr. MITCHELL: Has that ever been done?

Mr. HANSELL: No, it has not been done.

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, let us be sensible.

Mr. HANSELL: We are not passing regulations on the basis of what has been done or whether we think it will be done. We are passing regulations on the basis of giving the government power to do these things. What I want to know is whether the government will consider it a vote of want of confidence in the government if the house votes to change a thing like that.

An hon. MEMBER: Order.

Mr. HANSELL: Who is hollering "Order"? I am not out of order.

Mr. ILSLEY: The rules with regard to amendments of this bill will be no different from the rules with regard to the amendment of any other bill that comes before the house, and I do not think there will be any question at the time as to whether the situation is one in which the vote implies confidence or want of confidence in the government. This bill is not any different from any other bill. There will be opportunities for amendments to be proposed to the orders in council which are in the schedule to the bill, and the ordinary rules of parliamentary practice and procedure will apply.

The CHAIRMAN: It seems to me that the committee has been anticipating what will be before the chair when the bill is in committee. We are not at this stage discussing the bill. We are discussing a resolution, and the only discussion which should take place at this time is discussion respecting a resolution. Is it advisable to bring in a bill based on this resolution? That is the whole question. What will be in the bill must be left for discussion when the bill itself is before the chamber.

Mr. GREEN: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that ruling is severe. We are entitled to ask questions about the whole nature of the measure to be brought down, and such a ruling makes discussion impossible. I submit that we should not be hampered by any restrictive ruling of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN: The only matter before the committee at the present time is the resolution. The committee does not know what the bill will contain. When the bill is before the house it can be discussed. At the present time we have a resolution and the discussion should be strictly relevant to the resolution. Is it advisable to bring in such a bill? The hon. member for Eglinton.

Mr. FLEMING: We in this party, Mr. Chairman, attach considerable importance to this stage of the discussion with reference to this measure. As indicated this afternoon by the hon. member for Peel, speaking for this party, we desire in committee on this resolution to elicit, not necessarily from one minister alone but from the government, important information with reference to the controls, the power to continue which is sought by the government in the bill referred to in the resolution.

I raise a point at this stage in the hope that one might make some contribution now to orderly procedure in the committee. We want to have the utmost information so that when the stand of this party is taken on second reading of the bill it may be, as I said the other day, a discerning and discriminating stand. We have a resolution which contemplates the introduction of a bill, and we have been told already that the bill is intended to give statutory effect for a temporary period of some fifty-seven orders in council. There are many questions which we in this part of the house would like to ask with reference to the controls which will be continued as a result of that bill. Is it your thought, Mr. Chairman, that we should just take those measures in the order in which they appear in the volume which has been circulated, or take them as members rise in their places? To give a concrete situation, I have half a dozen orders on which I should like to ask a number of questions of more than one minister opposite. I am raising this point now in this way in the hope that one might make a contribution to as orderly a procedure as possible in this committee. You can well understand that if questions come one after another in matters referred to or contained in fifty-seven different orders it may be highly confusing to the house. If it were acceptable to you, Mr. Chairman, and the committee I should be glad to start with rent controls. I have a number of questions on rent controls.

The CHAIRMAN: I am in the hands of the committee. I can only repeat what I stated previously, that it is not in order at this time to discuss the bill or what the bill is to contain. We should discuss at this time just the principle whether it is advisable or not. The wording of the resolution is that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide, et cetera. At this moment the committee should consider whether or not it is expedient to introduce such a measure.

Mr. FLEMING: So far as the Progressive Conservative party is concerned, the expediency with relation to the introduction of such a measure depends, as has already been indicated, upon each of these controls and the case made for it. That is why, in our opinion, it is so important that the fullest information be given the committee by the government with respect to each of these measures on which members seek information—and there is much information that is sought. There is the further point, and I speak, I hope, with the deference that becomes a new member of the house, that it is surely in keeping with the procedure followed on other measures, the introduction of which has been preceded by a resolution of the kind now before us, that the fullest opportunity should be provided at the committee stage on the resolution for the asking of questions and obtaining all available information from the government as bearing upon the question of expediency of the introduction of the measure which the government is asking leave to introduce. With that in mind, I should like to ask a number of questions. It does not matter whether the Minister of Justice or the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply answers these questions, but I have a number of them with reference to the matter of rent control. I can ask them seriatim or, if it is more convenient, I can indicate a number of them in a group.

Mr. HOWE: If I may interject an objection, the minister who is responsible for rent control is not in the house at the moment. I suggest that the list of orders in council furnished to hon. members is not officially in their hands. It is a preview of the bill and was given as a matter of convenience to hon. members. It seems to me irregular to discuss the bill in the resolution stage and I think, Mr. Chairman, your ruling was quite correct.

Mr. GREEN: I would point out that it is quite irregular also to bring in fifty-seven measures in one. We are facing an unusual situation. It may be that was the only way these measures could be brought in; but, that having been done, I suggest to the ministry and to all members that the reasonable way to proceed now would be to allow questions with regard to these orders in council. It may take a little time, but in the long run it will save time. With regard to your suggestion, Mr. Chairman, I would point out that the resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period . . .

The Minister of Justice very properly, I think, gave us a list of these orders in council and there have been two added since which deal with radioactive substances. I suggest that the discussion now would be meaningless unless we were able to ask questions about the orders in council. I would appeal to the ministry to support that stand. Let us carry on here and we will work out a reasonable procedure as we go along. I do not think anyone has any desire to go into every little detail about every order in council, but there are certain broad questions that should be asked and answered, and I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that this is the stage at which that should be done. I have three or four questions of a general nature which I think will help later in the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Vancouver South has said that there are certain—and I think these are the words he used—broad questions of a general nature which he would like to ask. I think that would be perfectly in order on the resolution. The point I endeavoured to make was that we should not anticipate the bill any more than is absolutely necessary and that we should not at this time go into discussion of the bill. The bill will eventually come to the committee and then it can be discussed. But broad questions of a general nature could, I think, be asked at this time.

Mr. BOUCHER: The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations.

As I understand it, that word "certain" means something specific. If, as the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has stated, the index or the compilation of the orders in council which has been provided to us has no legal significance, not having been submitted to us personally, I think we should then rise and ask him what certain orders and what certain regulations will be included in this bill. Then I think we should ask him what certain duties and what certain officials are to be continued by the act. I do not think the members of the house should be asked to come into committee on a resolution, having approved the resolution, to discuss certain regulations and certain orders in council without knowing what the certain regulations and certain orders in council are. If we are to discuss the broad principle of controls, the broad principle of bureaucratic government, or the broad principle of having the minister hire officials, fix compensation for officials, let the officials have certain varied or extensive duties, then, of course, there can be some meaning to this resolution. But actually, as I see it, there can be no meaning whatsoever to a resolution if it is to bar discussion about certain things which the government in its discretion has decided to put into the resolution. How can we discuss it?

Mr. FLEMING: I think the Minister of Justice, who had jurisdiction over rent control for so long, can answer the questions I should like to put to him on the subject of the regulations pertaining to the freezing of tenancies of housing accommodation. There are two cases in particular which have been raised, not once but a number of times, in the house, and as to which I wish to ask the minister if he can give some indication of the intention of the administration. The first has to do with the purchase of houses by veterans. An order announced in the house on February 24 by the Minister of Finance to the effect that owners would be permitted to obtain occupancy of houses purchased within a period beginning late in 1944 and extending into 1945. My question is on broader ground than that. Where a veteran has made a bona fide purchase of a house for his personal occupancy, is it the intention that the present order should be continued so as to deprive him, unless he happens to have purchased within the particular period to which I have referred, of the right of occupancy of his home?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is important, Mr. Chairman, that we should agree as far as possible on the line of procedure to be adopted. Otherwise too many weeks will be taken up getting through with this measure. While that cannot be helped if the discussion is necessary, we should take a course of procedure which will avoid double discussion. I agree with the hon. member for Carleton that if we are asked what orders in council are to be continued under this legislation, we must tell the committee what the orders in council are; and I would say at once that they are the fifty-seven orders in council which have been printed and circulated to the members of the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Plus two more.

Mr. ILSLEY: Fifty-seven altogether. Then, I think if we go at all into the specific provisions of these orders in committee of the whole on the resolution, we shall have a duplication when we reach the bill; because the possibility is that certain amendments will be proposed in the bill and that the provisions of the orders in council will be discussed again when we are in committee of the whole on the bill. I think this is different from the procedure which was adopted on the war appropriation acts. When they were before the house, we did fall into a procedure—and perhaps not a very good one—whereby discussion took place, usually for months, on the resolution, and then the bill usually went through the house within a day or two. But that was much easier to do there than here, because here, when we reach the bill, we are dealing with a large number of specific orders in council, and inevitably we shall have a repetition of the discussion then. Probably we cannot be strictly logical and consistent about the matter. Perhaps the right course to adopt is to confine the questions at this stage to broad general questions, keeping them down to as low a number as possible, and leave the more detailed questions to be asked when the bill is introduced. The procedure that is being followed here of appending fifty-seven orders in council, the number of orders in council that it was desired to continue, is, of course, unprecedented in this sense, that never has there been a situation like this to be dealt with by parliament. But I think I should point out that it is not the same kind of situation as would arise if we were attempting to introduce fifty-seven new pieces of legislation. All these orders in council are already the law of the land, and some of them have been the law of the land for seven or eight years. It would of course, be improper, if we were proposing new measures, for us to lump them together like this and cover them by one bill. But the situation is different when we are, in effect, saying that everything shall lapse but these orders in council which are already the law.

I also wish to say what I said the other night about other countries that have had the same kind of situation to deal with. Two other countries had an analogous situation, namely Great Britain and Australia, and they found, upon consideration, that this was the only way to deal with it; so they introduced bills of this type with a large number of regulations in the schedule. Provision was made for amendment of these regulations in the bills they introduced, and there were some amendments.

Perhaps the government should give a little further consideration to what might be the proper procedure to follow, so that I could state the view of the government tomorrow. Tonight I would be prepared, as far as possible, to answer questions, provided that they are of a general nature rather than concerning details. This question of the intention of the government with regard to the recovery of houses by ex-service owners is one on which I shall have to send for information from the Minister of Finance, and this illustrates the difficulties of this line of procedure. That, of course, is not something I can answer at all myself; I shall have to send for that minister, and get officials. If we were dealing with these seriatim and regularly, order by order as they are in the schedule, we would not have any such difficulty; we would start and go through them, and the minister would be here with his officials until his orders were dealt with and concluded. Anyone in the house who wanted to propose amendments could do so; the government could either accept or reject the amendments, or they could be voted upon. Then the matter would be wound up and finished. It is pretty hard to do that here, when one hon. member gets up and asks about the eviction order; another gets up and asks about the order in council relating to old age pensions, and so on. If we are not careful we shall have no order here, and, moreover, we may have a great deal of duplication.

Mr. FRASER: Is that the procedure you intend to follow when you bring in the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: When the bill is in committee we propose to take up these orders seriatim.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps a procedure something like this would work out. We might ask the Minister of Justice, who is in charge of this resolution, general questions first and then go on to question the different ministers. The orders in council are grouped under the different ministries, and after a general questioning we might go on and question each minister about his group of orders in council. Perhaps a procedure along those lines would be satisfactory to all parties in the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wonder if I might try a suggestion, which would be that we rise and report progress, go on and deal with something else, and call a conference of the various groups to see if some arrangement could be worked out. Such a conference need not be limited to the leaders and the whips; there might be several from each party.

Mr. GREEN: We have an hour and a half to go tonight, and we might go ahead with general questions. Then a conference can be held tomorrow in regard to further procedure.

Mr. MITCHELL: Are you not in the position that you are trying to have a wedding without the bridegroom?

Mr. GREEN: Who is the bride?

Mr. MITCHELL: You were a fine kind of bridegroom this evening, talking against everything and voting for it.

Mr. GREEN: We are getting on pretty well; leave out the cheap politics.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Lay off; you are hurting the thing, not helping.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, I am not. I just want to put forward this point of view. How can you discuss an order in council if it is not before you? These orders are not before us. It seems to me that we have to deal with the resolution now, and I do not think you can ask detailed questions until we have the orders in council in committee. In my judgment, just to talk about the thing in a general way is a waste of time.

Mr. GREEN: We have the orders now.

Mr. MITCHELL: But they are not before this committee.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, they are.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, no, they are not.

Mr. GREEN: In a kindly way may I say we have read them all.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let the simple people have their turn. The lawyers have been at it all evening.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour had better get together. The Minister of Justice has admitted that the certain orders and regulations are those contained in the index and the compilation we have before us. That being so, I do not see how the Minister of Labour can get up and say that because we voted to go into committee on a resolution we voted against the principle of anything the members on this side have spoken against. How can he make his argument consistent?

While we are dealing generally with the resolution, may I ask the Minister of Justice if it is the intention of the government to leave the same men in power, with the same regulations they have administered, with the same duties to perform and the same powers, and to continue the same restrictions we have had in the past? I would submit that, if so, we shall be continuing wartime regulations, bureaucratic administration and bureaucratic legislation two years after the end of the war. So that at this stage I think the minister should be able to tell us he is going to bring about some moderation, some lessening of bureaucratic control, some restriction of the powers of various boards, not responsible to parliament, to make and interpret law which the people must obey.

Take the situation in regard to rents, for instance. Today I do not believe five per cent of Canadians, and I doubt if ten per cent of the officials administering rental control, know exactly and precisely what the law is with regard to evictions. During the last few days I personally have had great difficulty in getting anyone in Ottawa to answer certain questions, and I know there is confusion throughout this city as to what is required to raise rents, renew leases, terminate leases, evict tenants, get possession of homes, disqualify tenants from homes on the grounds of abuse, and multifarious other matters.

My point in rising at this time is to express the opinion that, before we are through with this resolution in committee, we should know exactly and in great detail to what extent if any the Minister of Justice is prepared to lessen controls, reduce the powers of appointed officials, and remove the impediments to freedom and life and freedom of action in this country. I wonder if at this stage, in a very general way if you like, the government could not give us some indication that they realize that some of the regulations and restrictions under these fifty-seven items should be moderated or abandoned altogether.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know just how to answer a question like that, containing the usual references to bureaucrats and bureaucracy, words which are terribly overworked in this house.

Mr. BOUCHER: By the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I say words which are terribly overworked in this house. A great many men, who are great public servants and who have rendered magnificent service to this country, are abused on the ground that they are bureaucrats. They are indiscriminately abused by certain hon. members who ought to know better, and I get very tired of hearing this indiscriminate abuse from them.

What I was going to say was this: The hon. member for Carleton asks whether I can give any indication about the future course of controls. I thought I covered that rather fully in the speech I made when I introduced the resolution. What controls will be imposed will depend upon the provisions of these orders in council which are continued. Very large numbers of orders in council are being dropped altogether, as the hon. member knows. With regard to the personnel, agents, officers and servants, in the main they will continue to be the ones who will administer these orders in council. It could not be otherwise. I do not know what is in my hon. friend's mind when he suggests anything else.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to follow the hon. member for Carleton, because I have the same point in mind. I would put a specific case to the Minister of Justice. Here we have orders in council setting up the wartime prices and trade board. I have before me the interpretation clause which, among other things, defines "offence". An offence, among other things, is a contravention of an order. And an "order" is set out in paragraph (k) of the section. This interpretation clause gives a long list of orders. Then we go all through the powers of the board and the obligations of citizens.

What I wish to ask is this: We are coming to the end of, or are gradually working out of, this situation. Is it necessary that all these powers, which I think we agree were necessary in war time, should be continued? Must we continue these powers? It is extremely easy for a citizen to break the law without knowing he is doing so. When I read the enforcement section of the report of the wartime prices and trade board, one of the unpleasant things I find is that, with this multitude of orders, there is an enormous number of people, ordinarily law-abiding citizens, who now find themselves, sometimes willingly I am afraid, but also sometimes perhaps unknowingly, breaking the law.

My question is this: With this huge body of orders and regulations, is there no thought of ameliorating them or softening them in any way, or are we to keep this huge body of orders and regulations to deal with what I would assume is at any rate a much smaller situation than we had before?

I might apply the same question in respect of other orders in council, but the question I have asked will indicate that I have in mind the same principle which was discussed by the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. ILSLEY: It must be remembered that a very large number of orders are being revoked. As hon. members know, the number of orders outstanding was very great. As I said to the house, a committee of civil servants, of which the Solicitor General was chairman, was working on these orders, and they have been working on them since the middle of 1945. They have succeeded in eliminating by far the greatest number of them. So that the number, which originally was several thousand—I cannot give the exact number—has been reduced to these fifty-seven.

These orders have been examined and amendments have been the result. There were many amending orders in council before they were reduced to the form in which they are now found. We think the provisions of these orders in council are substantially all necessary at the present time. If, after examination in committee, hon. members feel that they are unnecessary, and if we are not in a position to give reasons why they are necessary, then a good case would be made for deleting them. But I do not know of such cases.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Did I understand the minister to say that recently, when these orders were being consolidated to be put forward as a schedule to the bill, they were at that time scrutinized to see whether changes should even then be made?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): To accommodate them to the new situation?

Mr. ILSLEY: That applies to the more important orders; I cannot speak as to the less important ones. But some of them were amended with a view to presentation to the house. That is, they were amended in such a way as to drop out sections which were no longer necessary.

Mr. MacINNIS: It seems to me that the question before us is more one of procedure, so as to expedite the business in which we are engaged. As I watched the debate in the last few days I was comparing it with the work of the "Big Four" in Moscow. I think, really, there was a great deal more agreement among them than I have seen in this chamber. After all, I am pretty sure that if my hon. friends to my right had an opportunity to do so today, they would not abolish offhand these orders in council.

That being so, I was going to say, "Let us be honest". I will not say that; but I will say, "Let us be reasonable, and take it for granted that the government was elected and is responsible for running the affairs of the country".

During my years in the house I have seen legislation go through its various stages. My experience has been that at this particular stage, when a resolution goes before the committee there is not a great deal of time taken for the consideration of it, and for the very good reason that we shall have another go at the principle of the bill when second reading is moved. Then the bill goes to the committee; and, if I am not very far wrong, hon. members to my right can take clause after clause, paragraph after paragraph, in each order in council and worry it to death, if they like. In any event, they will have ample opportunity to deal with it.

That being so, why not let this go. I was called away from the house for a short time, but I understand that in the vote this evening most of my hon. friends voted for the resolution. Why not let us be reasonable, give up this obstructionism, and let this thing go through.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, it amazes me to hear the hon. member for Vancouver East talk about obstructionism, letting things go through and hurrying. If he will refer back to Hansard of March 20 he will find that the Minister of Justice and the leader of the opposition suggested that the resolution should be put into committee, right away. My leader and, I believe, the leader of the Social Credit group, were committed to that course. The leader of this party made that commitment, stating that we were not going to take the time of the house at that stage, but that we would let the resolution get into committee, reserving our rights to ask questions at that time, and to debate the principle of the measure on second reading. We were not committed either to approving or disapproving the principle.

Then who was it who rose in his seat and started a political dog-fight which has been going on since that time? It was the leader of the C.C.F.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a point of order, we had an important point we wanted to make, and we made it. My hon. friends did not have a point at that time, but now they have.

Mr. GREEN: There is no point of order about that; it is merely another political speech like the ones we have been listening to here for the last several days. They started this kind of thing; they have been making political speeches right through the debate while the Speaker was in the chair and it is most amusing now to have them come along and object to anybody else taking the time of the committee. It is just typical of the procedure they carry on. They pretend to be above politics and they are the smoothest politicians in Canada; they are playing politics all the time, not only here but out in the ridings, and I think the Canadian people are beginning to realize that that is the fact.

The CHAIRMAN: I think this—

Mr. GREEN: I am all through, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacINNIS: The political part of the hon. member's speech is all finished.

Mr. GREEN: You make your political speeches; why object to my making one?

The CHAIRMAN: May I ask the hon. member, as well as all hon. members, to deal with the resolution.

Mr. GREEN: There are two or three questions I should like to ask the minister. The first has to do with the time that this measure will continue in force. As hon. members know, the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act which was passed in the fall of 1945 contained a provision to the effect that it would continue in effect until fifteen days after the commencement of the 1947 session of parliament. There was also a provision that the life of the act could be extended for a further period; but there was another unusual limitation inserted in the act which the minister will find in subsection 1 of section 6, reading as follows:

. . . for a further period, not in any case exceeding one year, from the time at which it would otherwise expire . . .

The words "not in any case exceeding" are very unusual, and I understand they were put in to make it absolutely certain that the measure would not be carried on past that time. Then in the 1946 session it was felt that the fifteen days was not a long enough time to permit legislation to be put through the house, and I think that was perfectly correct. An amendment to that section was passed extending the period to sixty days; but again we have the words, "not in any case exceeding one year," which would mean until the spring of 1948. Is that to be the limit under the new legislation? Is there to be any power taken to carry on the bill to be brought down past March 31, 1948?

Mr. ILSLEY: There will be in the proposed bill a provision identical with the provision in the original bill and the amendment mutatis mutandis.

Mr. GREEN: In English or French, does that mean that the bill may be continued until March 31, 1949?

Mr. ILSLEY: If addresses are presented to the Governor General by the Senate and the House of Commons respectively the bill may be continued beyond March 31, 1948, but not for a period exceeding one year. That is the same provision as is in the present bill.

Mr. GREEN: That means that the bill we are being asked to enact may be in effect until March 31, 1949?

Mr. ILSLEY: If parliament so orders by passing addresses.

Mr. GREEN: I realize that, but I just wanted to have it clear whether it was to be until March 31, 1948, which was the time set by the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, or whether it is to be March 31, 1949. I take it from the minister's answer the year will be 1949; that will be the latest date to which this act can be carried on.

Mr. HOWE: Parliament has the right to extend it. Surely my hon. friend would not agree to deprive parliament of that right. All that the bill provides for is the continuance of the controls until 1948.

Mr. GREEN: Then the government may direct—

Mr. HOWE: Parliament.

Mr. GREEN: Parliament—I am not trying to make any point here; I am simply trying to find out whether the thought is that the measure may be carried on until 1949.

Mr. ILSLEY: If parliament directs by two addresses, one by this house and the other by the senate.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the Minister of Justice to say the other day that no new orders in council were to be passed and that these fifty-seven orders in council were not to be amended by the government, that they could only be revoked; that the cabinet would take the power under the bill to revoke any one or more of these fifty-seven orders in council.

Mr. ILSLEY: In whole or in part.

Mr. GREEN: In whole or in part, but could not add anything to them; is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct; that is the case after this legislation becomes law. As to the period before this legislation becomes law, the other day I gave an undertaking that after March 31 no orders in council would be passed under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, which will be in force until May 15, in regard to matters which are not dealt with either by the orders in council in the schedule or in respect of matters covered by other emergency legislation.

Mr. GREEN: But at the lower level of the controller or the administrator there may be power to alter or amend. While an order in council cannot be changed, an order issued by a controller may be changed; is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the change is authorized by an order in council in the schedule.

Mr. GREEN: As I read the orders in council, they authorize whoever is given the power to pass orders to change those orders, to amend them.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the usual provision, yes.

Mr. GREEN: And that power is to be continued?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not changed.

Mr. GREEN: The controller or administrator who happens to be administering a particular field will not be affected?

Mr. ILSLEY: Will not be touched by this legislation at all.

Mr. GREEN: Take P.C. 3, which is the wartime industries control regulations, as an example. I understand that this is a general order in council giving certain powers to the controllers appointed by the department of reconstruction. Will there be any power to appoint new or additional controllers?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a detail I could not answer. Whatever powers are conferred by the order in council may be exercised under that order in council.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the minister of reconstruction could answer that.

Mr. HOWE: If the order in council provides for a timber controller, there will be authority to appoint a timber controller. If the timber controller should resign there will be authority to appoint another timber controller, but it would not be possible to appoint a controller whose duties are not defined by the orders in council under this bill.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be any power in the minister of reconstruction to appoint additional controllers, to decide that there should be a controller of shipping? I cite that merely as an example. Will there be any power in the minister to appoint additional controllers, or are we to have only the controllers already appointed?

Mr. HOWE: Unless my hon. friend can find an order in council which authorizes the government to appoint a shipping controller, it will be impossible to appoint one.

Mr. GREEN: I used that only as an example.

Mr. HOWE: The only controllers who can be appointed are those for whom provision is made in the bill.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention of the government to appoint any additional controllers?

Mr. HOWE: I think the only continuing controllers under the industries control regulations are the controller of steel and the controller of timber. If that is true those are the only controllers the government would have authority to appoint.

Mr. GREEN: P.C. 3 provides:

"Controller" means a controller heretofore appointed and now in office, or hereinafter appointed by the governor general in council.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

That does not refer to any particular industry but is a general power vested in the governor in council to appoint controllers, and what I should like to know is whether it is the intention, under P.C. 3 or any other order in council, to appoint additional controllers.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question of the personnel to administer these orders will be dealt with in the bill. Are we not doing something unprecedented here, when discussing the resolution in committee, in running ahead and attempting to discuss the provisions of the bill? If we had had the first reading of the bill the hon. member would have it before him as well as the orders in council, and then he would be in a position to make up his mind if he is troubled about what he ought to do on the second reading.

Mr. GREEN: Let me put it in this way. We have certain controllers now. Is power to be taken to appoint additional controllers?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are no controllers in the wartime prices and trade board. I do not know exactly what a controller is, but I understand there are controllers under another order.

Mr. HOWE: Controllers are peculiar to the Department of Munitions and Supply and are continuing their functions under the Department of Reconstruction and Supply. At the moment there is only one controller. He happens to be controller of three branches. He is controller of timber, controller of steel and controller of priorities. He acts through deputies. The government may decide to appoint separate controllers in these branches, and it probably will if it can find the proper personnel. It is free to do so under the bill, for the reason that these controllers are set up by order in council and the government has the power to appoint them.

Mr. GREEN: I agree that at the present time there is power to appoint a steel controller and a timber controller. Is power to be taken to appoint controllers of other materials?

Mr. HOWE: There is no such provision in the order in council.

Mr. GREEN: It is not the intention to take power to appoint more controllers?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Mr. GREEN: I would ask the Minister of Finance whether power is to be taken to appoint additional administrators or to set up new administrative branches under the wartime prices and trade board, or are we dealing with a structure which is not to be extended but, on the contrary, will be cut down?

Mr. ABBOTT: There are certain provisions in the bill which relate to the administration of the various orders that will be annexed, but as my colleague the Minister of Justice has said I suggest that it is perhaps not entirely appropriate to discuss the provisions of the bill until it has been given its first reading. There is, I understand, no substantial change in the provisions of the wartime prices and trade board order as it now stands, which will be one of the orders in council annexed to the bill, but I cannot say at the moment that there is no provision in the bill to provide for a new administrator of, let us say, some form of textiles or something of the kind. I am not in a position to answer that. I repeat, I think it would be better if we dealt with that type of question when we have the bill before us.

Mr. GREEN: But the principle is important. It is whether the government is retaining power to appoint administrators over new materials. You have an administrator now, let us say, of textiles perhaps and wholesale goods. Is power to be taken to appoint entirely new administrators? We want to know whether this is to be on a diminishing scale or whether the government is taking power to extend the number of administrators?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend can take it without fear of contradiction that it is very much on a diminishing scale. The wartime prices and trade board set-up is now a fairly comprehensive one, with administrators or with officers fulfilling the duties of administrators in most of the major fields in which the board has control of prices. But to say that there is not power to appoint an administrator to replace an existing administrator is something I cannot say at the moment, but I can give the assurance that there is no expansion of the functions of the board contemplated but rather a marked contraction of those functions.

Mr. KNOWLES: If the hon. member for Vancouver South would permit me to ask a question on the same point before he resumes, I would ask the Minister of Finance, is it not true, in spite of what he has said about the intentions of the government, that there will be in the order annexed to the bill power to extend the application of price control in case it should be necessary? I am not asking about the intentions but about the powers of the bill.

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot answer that. I again suggest that when we have the bill before us we can look at it and look at the orders in council annexed to the bill. Then the Minister of Justice or myself or the Minister of Reconstruction will have to answer every proper question that is put. But it is difficult, under the rules of the house, to answer questions now until we have the relevant bill and the orders before us.

Mr. GREEN: Another question has to do with the fifty-sixth and fifty-seventh orders in council. Perhaps the government would have been wise to keep it at fifty-five, because fifty-seven has unpleasant connections. But these two additional orders in council have to do with a reserve of radioactive substances. The first of them has to do with radioactive substances that may be discovered in Yukon, and the other is similar to it but applies only to the Northwest Territories. As I understand the effect of the orders in council, it is that, although the prospector may go and locate a claim and under statute law applying to Yukon get title to all the minerals in that claim, this particular order in council reserves the radioactive substances, so that he cannot get title to them. I am not quarrelling with the order in council containing that provision. It probably is a wise plan. But why should that be carried on in a temporary measure of the type of this bill? Surely that condition is going to apply for many years. I do not understand why the government does not bring in an amendment to the Yukon Quartz Mining Act reserving radioactive substances, or an amendment to the Atomic Energy Control Act, which this house passed last year. In the latter act there are certain powers. Under section 8, paragraph (c), the board has power, with the approval of the governor in council, to acquire or cause to be acquired by purchase, lease, requisition or expropriation, prescribed substances and any mines, deposits or claims of prescribed substances; and under section 9, subsection 1, paragraph (c), the board may, with the approval of the governor in council, make regulations respecting mining and prospecting for prescribed substances. Obviously this provision reserving radioactive substances to the crown is of a permanent nature, and it would seem that that should be covered by an amendment to the statutes and not by continuing an order in council for a period of a year or even two years. Why is it necessary to put these two orders in council in this bill?

Mr. HOWE: The question is a reasonable one. At the last session the house passed permanent legislation for the control of atomic energy and gave the atomic energy board the right to pass regulations. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that this provision could be covered by a regulation of the atomic energy board or, failing that, an amendment to the Northwest Territories Act.

Mr. GREEN: The Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. However, the question as to whether radioactive substances should be controlled in the ground or not is a matter of debate at this moment before the atomic energy committee of the united nations. There is a sharp difference of opinion on the subject. I may say that Canada is not urging that radioactive substances be controlled in the ground. Canada would prefer to rely on the provisions of the Atomic Energy Control Act which provide that after radioactive material is produced it should fall within the control of the atomic energy board. The United States takes a different view and the atomic energy act of the United States—I have a memorandum on the subject—actually reserves title to uranium, thorium, et cetera in public lands. It was felt that the situation at the moment is such that Canada did not wish to legislate in a permanent way for the control of these substances in the ground. It preferred to regulate every type of control but, while the subject is rather hotly debated in the committee, it was felt that it would be wise to continue the regulation by order in council, which does control these materials in the ground, with the thought that, after a decision has been made, either the order in council can be dropped and we can rely on the present regulations of the atomic energy board, or we shall amend the regulations of the atomic energy board to provide for the control of radioactive substances in the ground.

Mr. GREEN: Is that stand not inconsistent with the terms of the Atomic Energy Control Act? As I said, the atomic energy control board was given power over prospecting, for example. Nobody can even prospect for radioactive substances without approval of the board. Now the minister says that Canada takes the position that she is not interested in the radioactive substance in the ground but only after it has been extracted. Has there been a change in government policy in connection with the raw material?

Mr. HOWE: There is no change, but the nations are divided rather sharply as to whether control of radium and thorium should extend to control in the ground. Some countries believe that anyone should be free to prospect for thorium or uranium and even mine them as long as the material passes into the control of its regulatory body as soon as it is mined, and that, I think, is the view of the atomic energy board of Canada. Nevertheless, while there is a sharp difference of opinion on the point, and while it is hoped that a common viewpoint may result, Canada does not like to change the position at this moment. Perhaps a month from now we shall be able to do so; perhaps two weeks from now. When the decision is reached we would like to take whatever action may be consistent with the view of the atomic energy committee.

Mr. GREEN: The government policy at the moment is that the prospector is free to prospect for radioactive substances without interference?

Mr. HOWE: No. At the moment the situation is governed by this order in council to which my hon. friend refers, which says that all prospects, all indications must be reported to the atomic energy board and that mining can be done only by the government in the Northwest Territories and in Yukon. But that is covered by an order in council which we wish to extend temporarily, with the thought that in a month or two we shall know whether we wish to drop that position, which we can do by cancelling the order in council, or whether we wish to turn it into permanent legislation, which we can do.

Mr. GREEN: At the moment, government policy is in favour of allowing free prospecting. That is the policy the government believes should be effected eventually?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: One other question. It has to do with the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East on March 10. He brought to the attention of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply the fact that there were 1,600 completed houses available in Bremerton, Washington, for sale to people in British Columbia, to be used as emergency shelters, and the minister said at that time that he was having exhaustive inquiries made into the situation and would be able to report at a later date. Could he tell the committee now what the position is at the present time with regard to those houses?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I can. I have had a report from our representative on the west coast who has examined the houses and has looked into the situation thoroughly. The houses can be bought for, I think it is, $500 each. The cost erected in Seattle was about $2,300 each. The cost erected in Vancouver is likely to be something more than that as far as we can find out. After the houses are erected, they are not $2,300 houses. They are perhaps $800 or $900 houses, which would be the cost to erect in Vancouver. We have stated that if the city of Vancouver wishes to buy these houses and move them to Vancouver, we will make a grant for the erection of the houses as emergency shelter, but we will not participate in a plan which proposes the sale of these houses to veterans, for the reason that we believe they are not of a standard that the government should sell to veterans.

Mr. GREEN: What grant would the government give?

Mr. HOWE: A maximum of $500 a house.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Before the committee proceeds may I again remind hon. members that, in my opinion we should be discussing this evening only the terms of the resolution. Considerable discussion has related to the resolution, but at times it has proceeded quite a distance from it; there has been discussion of the bill and there have been other questions also.

I refer the committee to "May" fourteenth edition, at page 732, under the heading of "Scope of debate on resolution."

Debate in committee on a financial resolution is confined to the terms of the resolution itself and must not be extended to the related bill.

It is accordingly clear that at this stage we should be discussing the resolution only and not the bill. I do not wish to be too strict in my interpretation, but I trust that hon. members will stay within the scope of the resolution itself.

Mr. BOUCHER: I bow to the Chairman's ruling, but at the same time I must point out that the resolution itself says certain things.

Mr. HOWE: You pointed that out before. Must we listen again?

Mr. BOUCHER: Sometimes hon. members do not wish to hear.

Mr. HOWE: We love to hear your voice.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister has stated in effect that the bill which will be founded on this resolution is to limit the controls to within fifty-seven spheres. In other words, there are fifty-seven orders in council—the fifty-five in the index and two others—dealing with matters on which the government retain the right to continue controls. They do more than that; as I understand it, they retain the right to extend these controls within these various spheres, to make new controls, to modify controls, to appoint new officers, to give new duties to new officers, to extend the duties of officers.

To illustrate my point, let me deal primarily with rental control. For some five years now the government have adopted a system of rental control. In my opinion, they have had ample time to figure out what controls are desired for rental control and what regulations are required to affect those controls, what officials are necessary to administer them, and what problems they are to deal with. For the past five years the public at large have allowed, or been subjected to—and I believe willingly—variations in regulations, day-to-day changes in regulations, day-to-day changes in controls, changes in the conditions under which they can get possession of their own homes, under which they can allow tenants in, can eject tenants and can extend leases. For instance, just recently the government allowed owners of commercial property to increase the rental by twenty-five per cent on certain conditions. Those conditions in some cases required the landlord or the lessor to give a five-year lease, in other cases to give a two-year lease, and in each case allowed the tenant to vacate upon thirty days' notice, but would not allow the landlord to eject the tenant under any condition.

I give that to illustrate what, to my mind, is the greatest objection the public has to these controls; the objection is to the unknown laws of the land, the laws of the land which are being made by regulation, by administrative officers and which are not the concrete law of the country. Consequently I believe that if the government should ask parliament today to continue the policy of rental control, they should be prepared to submit to parliament the rules and regulations under which that control is to be continued. They should allow the people of the country, the landlord and the tenant, to have some knowledge of the security of tenure the tenant has or the length of time the landlord must submit to his tenant. They must give to the public some indication, I would say, of the need of the conditions, whether it is more advantageous to the housing problem of Canada to let a tenant remain in possession of premises, or to let the landlord get possession of his own. As I see it, the returned soldier who has been fighting overseas for five years, being a young fellow may have either himself, or through his parents or friends, purchased a house, so that when he became rehabilitated he could get into a home of his own and become established. I cannot see where government policy is in any manner giving any opportunity for the returned soldier to establish a home which he did not have when he left; and a few of them had their own homes when they left. The result is, I believe, that the government must, in order, at least, to satisfy public demand, modify that policy and let the returned soldier know at what time in the distant future he may be able to get possession of a house which he may have bought or which his father, mother or a friend may have bought for him.

I also believe that many people who are in the same category as the returned soldier brought home three or four years ago, are as much entitled to the housing accommodation as the tenants now in the premises, and that if they could occupy them it would provide just as effective an answer to the housing problem.

I give these points entirely to illustrate the fact that this government, having had five years' experience, in my humble opinion should now be prepared to set a definite policy, so that the public of Canada will know what the rules are and have some guidance as to what will be the policy for some little time in the future. You can take almost any one of the spheres of activity that these controls provide for and put up arguments similar to that. There is the wartime prices and trade board, for instance. Although we may require some controls in prices, there are many points where we do not need to leave with the officials the power to make new regulations, which they have. We do not need all the controls within that sphere which we have had. We should modify them to a much greater degree than this government is doing, in order to meet post war conditions. The conditions during the war were vastly different.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOUCHER: My hon. friends are calling out "order." I think I have just as much right to order as they have, and I ask for order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You are out of order.

Mr. BOUCHER: I am not out of order.

Mr. CHEVRIER: You did not listen to the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. BOUCHER: I did listen to the Chairman's ruling. The ruling says that we must speak to the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Let me repeat the quotation I gave a moment ago:

> Debate in committee on a financial resolution—
> [Mr. Boucher.]
>
> And this is a financial resolution.
> —is confined to the terms of the resolution itself and must not be extended to the related bill.

Hon. members must discuss the terms of this resolution. It is difficult for the chairman to have to rise every few minutes and call an hon. member to order, and I hesitate to do so. All I can do is to bring to the attention of hon. members the ruling with regard to discussion of a resolution in committee of the whole.

Mr. BOUCHER: I fully agree with your explanation, Mr. Chairman, but there is a resolution brought in by the government with definite wording. We must confine ourselves to the wording used by the government.

Mr. ABBOTT: Read the resolution.

Mr. BOUCHER: I shall be glad to read it, and suggest that the minister read it also.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have done so.

Mr. BOUCHER: The resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations . . .

All I want to know is what those words mean. "Certain orders" do not mean any orders; they mean orders of a certain kind or within a certain scope. Then the resolution goes on and provides for certain officers, clerks and employees who may continue to perform certain duties.

Mr. HOWE: You would never understand.

Mr. BOUCHER: I believe I am right when I say "certain" means "definite" rather than "vague" or "general." So I wonder if the minister cannot give me some explanation.

Mr. ILSLEY: How many times must I give it? The hon. gentleman raised that point half an hour ago; I told him he was entitled to an answer, and I gave him the answer. I said the certain orders and regulations of the governor in council were the fifty-seven printed and circulated to hon. members. Now the hon. gentleman gets up and asks the question again. Let us have a little moderation in this process.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not propose to enter into a discussion, but I desire some information that will bear upon the expediency of introducing the bill referred to in the resolution. I take it that the committee is strictly within its rights in asking for this information, particularly since the attitude our party took in the house during the debate on the resolution was related directly to the information we hoped to obtain at this stage. Now that the Minister of Finance is in the house, I should like to direct a question to him which will be perfectly general and directly related to the resolution. We have here a resolution which says:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations . . .

—for a certain period. We had some explanation from the Minister of Justice in moving the resolution in the first instance, and later, as to the period in question. What I want to get at is this. What objective has been set by the government with respect to what I consider to be one of the most important of these controls, namely rental control? Is the objective set on a strictly nation-wide basis? Has the government given consideration to the possibility of conditions improving in different areas, so that at some stage it might be possible to consider decontrol in that respect on an area basis, or perhaps on a provincial basis, or perhaps on a rural basis as distinguished from an urban basis, or perhaps on the basis of the larger cities, and so on?

Then in his statement would the minister also indicate whether in that respect some particular objectives in reference to the construction of houses have been set in measuring the period in question? For instance, I should assume that studies have been made to determine the number of houses which would have to be constructed in Canada in order to permit of decontrol, we will say, first of all, in reference to the freezing regulations. Can the minister give the committee any indication as to the objective that has been set in these respects and the basis upon which it has been set, because it is of great importance to those of us who sit on this side in measuring the expediency referred to in the resolution.

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend has framed his question, as he said, in very general terms, and I am afraid my answer will have to be couched in somewhat similar terms. All these questions on which he has touched in connection with rental control have been under fairly intensive consideration for some time, and still are; that is to say, whether it is necessary to continue a uniform policy of control throughout the whole country, or whether it may be possible to make some relaxation in certain areas where conditions are not as acute. That whole question is being studied. So far it has not been considered desirable to modify the rental control order to provide for special regional differences. It may be possible to do so; I could not make any positive statement as to that.

On the general principle, the objective of rental control is to protect occupants of rented accommodation during this period of acute shortage. I do not think that is an overstatement, speaking of the country as a whole and perhaps particularly of the urban areas, though the condition is fairly general. I have indicated on previous occasions, as I think my colleague the Minister of Justice has indicated, that there is no intention on the part of the government to recommend the abandonment of either rental control or eviction control as long as such conditions continue to exist. But it is a brave man who will constitute himself a prophet as to exactly when conditions will be such that these controls can be either lifted entirely, or the point at which they can be relaxed from time to time. But I repeat the assurance I have given before in connection with other controls, that they will be relaxed just as soon as we believe we can do so in justice to the people of Canada, for whom we have some responsibility. Certainly no one will be more pleased than myself and some of the people who have had to administer these rental controls when it is found possible to take this action.

I am sorry I cannot be more specific in answer to my hon. friend's question, but I doubt whether he really expected me to be.

Mr. GREEN: If I may ask a supplementary question, have there been any discussions with the provinces concerning the possibility of having them take over rental control?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not as far as I am aware. That is a thought which might be worth exploring.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been no application.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my colleague says, there has been no application.

Mr. FLEMING: The question which I asked, and to which the minister made a reply, had to do with the horizontal application of decontrol. Now, as to what one might call the vertical application of decontrol, I take it that as the government, or the wartime prices and trade board with the approval of the government, approach this question of decontrol we may expect it will be on a gradual basis, rather than a case of the government or the board waiting until such time as they think they can eliminate rent control entirely in connection with both rent ceilings and the freezing regulations. Am I correct in that?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would think so. I would hope it would be gradual; as rapid as possible, but gradual.

Mr. FLEMING: The question has reference to the statement made in the house by the minister on February 24. I would ask him now directly if he will deal with this question, which has been raised before in the house; and I should like to put two particular matters to him. The first relates directly to his statement of February 24, when he announced in the house that the government had authorized certain amendments to the rental orders and regulations of the wartime prices and trade board. One of the amendments was to provide relief for persons who had purchased tenanted houses as homes for themselves between November 1, 1944, and July 25, 1945. The case I put to him is that of the veteran who purchased his home outside the period referred to in the amendment the minister announced at that time. It is a matter about which I am sure the government must have received many representations, and about which hon. members must have heard a great deal. I can tell the minister I personally discussed this matter with some of those who are administering regulations of this kind, and there has been an indication to me that it would be quite feasible to have an amendment made which would permit veterans who have made bona fide purchases of homes for their own occupancy to assume possession.

The other matter has to do with a proposal which has been made, not infrequently, for increasing the supply of shared accommodation. This is a matter of great importance, particularly in the cities and towns. There has been considerable evidence that people have not been willing to open up their homes to tenants who would take shared accommodation —perhaps a room or a couple of rooms— because of the difficulty in evicting tenants. There is a provision in the present regulations for the eviction of obnoxious tenants, but anyone who has had experience with it must know that it is difficult to apply that provision.

The suggestion has been made more than once—I made it in the house in the fall of 1945—that the freezing order, so far as shared accommodation is concerned, should not apply to tenancies created after a given date. That is not going to interfere with any situation existing at the present time. Where there is need for freezing—very well, let it continue. But as to tenancies hereafter created, that freezing regulation should not apply in respect of shared accommodation.

If that were done, it has been stated by veterans organizations and labour organizations that there would be many people willing to open up their homes, people who have space they would let on a shared basis, if they were sure they could evict easily and not have to go through the difficult procedure which is available now only in respect of those who have proven to be obnoxious tenants.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think that matter should be discussed when the bill is before the committee. It deals with a certain order in council which will be in the bill, and suggests certain changes which should be made in it.

Mr. GREEN: We have had these fifty-seven varieties of orders in council placed before us. I submit it is not right that the position should be taken that no question can be asked about these orders in council.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is obvious to me from the discussion tonight that we shall have two full-length discussions respecting the details of all these orders in council. We must exercise a little self-restraint because, if we are not careful, we shall have two complete discussions. There is no sense in that. Unfortunately we have slipped in our procedure in the last few years, especially in the resolutions preceding war appropriation bills, discussion of which used to take months. But the whole tradition in respect of resolutions has been that the discussions have been brief. And they ought to be brief, to avoid duplication. Tonight we have slipped into a discussion of what is contained in the bill, and I have had to pick up a printed copy of it and look at certain sections in order to answer questions which have been asked.

Mr. GREEN: You have had to do that with other bills.

Mr. ILSLEY: That should not happen on a resolution, because hon. members who ask the questions ought to have the bill before them when those questions are asked. I am much disturbed by the thought that we can deal, in considerable detail, with shared accommodation and changes in the rights of evicted tenants, and so on, and then ask questions about other matters of some other minister.

The only proper procedure is to keep the questions general. I have in mind the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South: "You are talking about a limited period; how long is the limited period?" Or the question asked by the hon. member for Carleton: "You are talking about a limited number of orders; what orders are you talking about?" That is the type of question which should be asked. They should be questions I can answer without having detailed knowledge of the various departments. Otherwise we shall have complete duplication.

If I felt hon. members were really not in a position to decide whether they think it is expedient to introduce a bill the situation might be different; but they have the orders in council before them. We have told them what those orders in council are, and we have told them what we are going to ask. General information of that kind has been given.

There is no objection to giving information. It has all got to be given sooner or later. But should it not be done in an orderly way, when the bill is before the house, when orders in council can be taken up in their proper order, and when we can have ministers here who will have their officials before them? Then, after the orders under one minister have been discussed, another minister can come forward, and his officials can be here. Is that not the only way in which we shall ever finish this mass of work?

Mr. GILLIS: I am not going to pursue the questions asked by hon. members to my right, because I think the minister is correct in what he says.

Mr. GREEN: The old axis.

Mr. GILLIS: The resolution is simple. It is stated that the government wishes to introduce a bill. But there is a question I should like to ask the minister.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that the hon. member is about to ask a new question. I thought we were discussing a point of order. I asked several questions of the Minister of Finance. Then a point of order was raised, and I do not think it has been settled. Before the hon. member for Cape Breton South asks another question, do I understand that Mr. Chairman is ruling that my questions are not to be answered?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no point of order in that.

Mr. KNOWLES: We have had nothing else.

Mr. GILLIS: Have I the floor?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would be very glad to answer the questions. But I understood the ruling was made four or five times that questions of this sort were out of order.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Early in the sitting of this committee I brought to its attention the fact that at this stage we should be discussing only the terms of the resolution. It has occurred to me that the questions asked by the hon. member for Eglinton went beyond those terms in that they were detailed questions referring to the bill itself. For that reason, while I did not make a firm ruling—because I am in the hands of the committee, and I believe we are trying to work out a proper procedure—I did suggest that I thought the questions should not be asked at this time, but rather when the bill itself is before the committee. I gathered that was the consensus of the committee, that questions of that kind, or similar to those asked by the hon. member for Eglinton, should be held over until we reach the committee stage of the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: It is amazing when one sits here, as I have, for the last four or five days and listens to the brains of the country discussing seven lines in a resolution asking for the right to introduce a bill which might give us some idea about what we are going to discuss. I am coming to the conclusion that a legal training is a bad training, especially if you are on this side of the house. You get so used to cutting corners and arguing about matters in which you do not believe that it becomes a habit.

Mr. GREEN: You are good at it, too.

Mr. GILLIS: We plain, simple folk read a thing and understand it as it was intended. I should like to ask the minister one simple question about the resolution, just so that he will not forget there is a resolution before the committee. He is likely to begin discussing the bill and I want to bring the minister back to the resolution. Certain orders are going to be carried forward for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war. Who is to define or decide when that national emergency has ceased to exist? I am thinking back to September 10, 1939, when a much greater national emergency existed than exists today. Am I to assume that the national emergency will not be over until we get back to the economic stagnation that existed prior to 1939? Am I wrong in assuming that that is where my hon. friends to my right want to go? I wish to be sure that that is not what the minister has in mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not what the government has in mind.

Mr. TIMMINS: On page 11 of this bill—

The CHAIRMAN: We are not discussing the bill.

Mr. TIMMINS: We are discussing what is to come before the house in a short time and it seems to me that we should be able to find out what we are to be dealing with. For instance, we are to be dealing with returned soldiers who receive appointments under the civil service. In the omnibus bill that is before us there are five or six different orders in council, some of which go back to 1927. We are now in the year 1947. When we come to the omnibus bill are we to deal with this matter in this hit-or-miss way that we are dealing with at the present time, or are we to have these bundled together and put before us in the form of a statute so that those who run may read? If the minister would answer that, then I should like to ask one other question.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): The Civil Service Act will be amended eventually, but we do not want to take a chance of veterans preference lapsing. Consequently the orders in council which have existed during the war will be continued under the omnibus bill so that there will be no chance of that preference lapsing between the time the orders run out and the time the amendment to the Civil Service Act is brought before the house.

Mr. TIMMINS: Will this act be consolidated some time during the discussion? Shall we have something before us to crystallize it in one form? After all, it is not fair that one should have to go through five or six different orders in council to find out the position of the returned soldier.

Mr. ILSLEY: When the bill is introduced I will lay on the table copies of the orders in council and the amending orders in council. For the convenience of hon. members, the orders in council as amended have been consolidated in office consolidations which have been circulated. Each hon. member has before him this office consolidation which is a most convenient source of information to consult. There will also be on the table of the house the orders in council and the amending orders in council as they appear in the schedule to the bill. Everything has been done to place before the members of the house exactly what they will be dealing with.

Mr. TIMMINS: I am sorry to have to refer to this omnibus bill but I am not going to speak about it. There are wartime leasehold regulations dealing with both commercial and residential properties. There are two orders which set out the regulations. Shall we have before us those regulations which at the present time are dealt with by orders in council dealing with housing and commercial accommodation? Shall we have those orders before us so that we may know where we are going and what we are discussing? We should know whether the department has decided to make any changes. The Minister of Finance, if I understood his words correctly, said that the department is discussing whether or not changes will be made before the bill is put before us. Are we to have all the orders dealing with those two fields before us?

Mr. ILSLEY: All the board orders should be produced by the minister. This house is entitled to them if they want them.

Mr. TIMMINS: Will they not be produced so that we may know about them at the beginning?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the house wants yet.

Mr. TIMMINS: I think we want everything.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a library here.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I agree fully with what the Minister of Justice said. We do not want to go over the course twice, but I submit that there are a few things which, if we could clear in our minds about them now, would perhaps save time later. There are one or two which I think are worth mentioning now. One thing that will be important when we come to the wartime prices and trade board orders in council is the cost figures which appear in the report of that board. I presume I should address my remarks to the Minister of Finance, so I shall ask him if he would have the figures on page 55 which show the rises in prices reconsidered. From a remark made by Mr. Gordon the other day in the banking and commerce committee, I understand that these figures do not contain anything to indicate the subsidies which have been paid. In other words, if the subsidies paid were included in these figures they would show a different figure.

I do not know whether anyone else has had this experience, but I know I have had it and some of my friends have had it. When she is told that the cost of food had risen from August, 1945, to the end of 1946 by only 6·8 per cent, my wife, whom I have always considered to be a sensible woman, just smiles. I am not suggesting that there are any wrong figures there and I am not criticizing the bureaucrats or officials, but I am suggesting that it is possible to include figures which are not really typical ones. I have had inquiry made and I confess I am puzzled about the figures showing the rise in the cost of food in Canada from the pre-war figures to the end of 1946. This is given as forty-five per cent. I have had a figure made by a person who, I think, is a reliable person. I admit it is hard to be sure that you have all the figures, but at any rate the result arrived at is a much larger figure. I suggest that when we come to consider this matter these figures will be important because they are relevant to the consideration of the full picture.

I suggest to the minister that he might have these figures looked up, and in particular I suggest that care be taken to include the subsidy figures. To my mind, these figures are really misleading if the subsidy figures are not taken in. Otherwise we have not a fair comparison with the United States, and if we could get that it would be useful to us when we come to discuss the bill itself.

There is one other question I would raise in regard to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. The order in council with regard to that is long, and wide powers are given. Then I look at the schedule and at the report of the wartime prices and trade board. I am not quite sure that I have it all clear but, as far as I can make out, a large number of items are said to be ineligible for subsidies; in other words, the subsidies are no longer to be continued. I raise the question whether these extraordinary powers are needed to do what is now a much smaller task. In answer to my question some time ago the Minister of Justice said that thought had been given to seeing whether all the powers previously conveyed during the war were necessary to continue with the much smaller task now.

I turn to page 20 of the consolidation of the orders in council to draw attention to the extraordinary variety of things which are included as "services" such as laundering, cleaning, tailoring and dressmaking; hairdressing and beauty parlour services; the pasteurizing of honey on a custom or commission basis. I am not going to take time to read more, but I am asking seriously whether these astonishing powers which lead to lawbreaking on a large scale, as referred to in the report of the prices board, are necessary. I know we are continuing them for only one year, but I am asking whether all these powers are necessary or not.

I am going to make a suggestion on detail. I think it would be useful to us, when we come to what will be the arduous task of considering the bill, if it would not be possible in some way, purely as a matter of mechanical convenience, to show not merely the original orders, not merely the consolidation which the minister says we shall have in addition to the detailed orders, but also what deletions have been made and what powers have been restricted. If there is some way in which that can be shown it would greatly simplify our task.

I should like to add one word. The minister said that these orders had been scrutinized to see if certain deletions could be made. The powers are still so ample, so detailed, so meticulous, that it is hard for me to believe that they are all now required. Certain restrictions and deletions may have been made. If so, I suggest that they be shown in some way so that they can be easily picked out and we shall understand what has happened.

I should like in particular for the Minister of Finance to comment on these figures to which I referred on page 55 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board and make whatever comment on them he wishes. I shall be glad if he would say whether he would have those further figures prepared, for which I have asked.

Mr. ABBOTT: I do not know whether my hon. friend intends me to comment on them tonight. He has called my attention to these figures and indicated his desire that at the appropriate stage, I take it, I should be prepared to comment on them. I shall be glad to do that. Probably the better time would be on the second reading of the bill or, better still, in committee on the bill, when I can have the controller here to elaborate and enlarge on any figures on which my hon. friend may want special information.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I was not expecting the minister to answer out of his head now, but I am suggesting that it is a reasonable request and might be convenient if these figures could be prepared and be ready for us when we are considering the bill, which I presume will be a matter of days yet.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, just as soon as we get through with this discussion we shall introduce the bill. It will have to stand a day before the second reading is taken.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): You will go right ahead with the second reading?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, unless there is a request for more time, which, of course, we would be willing to give.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Then my suggestion is this. We ought to be given these figures as soon as possible. I think they are relevant and they might be important. They are not easy for us to come by. There are different views as to how they should be made up.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am not quite clear as to what figures my hon. friend wants, but I had n mind reading his remarks in Hansard and considering them. If they are figures which are not in the report but are available they will, of course, be provided.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I will read the figures I have in mind. They are at page 55 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board. First of all, they are the figures in Canada and in the United States from August, 1945, to December, 1946. I will read two typical figures: general wholesale prices, showing a rise in Canada of 7·5 and in the United States of 32·1. Then you come to retail food, showing a rise in Canada of 6·8 and in the United States of 31·9. That retail food figure will be substantially raised if the food subsidies are taken into it, as I understood Mr. Gordon to say the other day. I find it difficult to understand these figures because they are quite different from figures that I have had prepared by competent persons who worked hard and who arrived, quite apart from the subsidies, at quite a different figure. I should like to know how these figures are made up. I think it is important that we should have them because we do not want to be asking about figures when we are in the midst of discussing the orders in council.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

WORK OF CANADIAN DELEGATION—DISCUSSIONS ON INTERNATIONAL CONTROL

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to table two copies of the first report of the atomic energy commission to the security council. While copies for distribution to all members of the house are not at present available, it is hoped to be able to obtain sufficient printed copies shortly.

The last occasion upon which a full statement was made to the house in regard to atomic energy was on December 17, 1945, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) described the events leading up to the Washington declaration of November, 1945. In view of the importance of the subject and the length of time which has elapsed, I thought it might be appropriate to make a statement to the house at this time. As this report is only of an interim nature and the discussions on the international control of atomic energy are still in progress, I should like, if it is agreeable to the house, to confine myself to a statement on the work of the Canadian delegation to the atomic energy commission to date, and to indicate the state of the discussions on the international control of atomic energy. I feel that I need hardly impress on the house the importance of the subject matter dealt with in this report and as I assume that the members interested in these matters will wish to read this document, I shall only pass in review the various phases in the deliberations of the atomic energy commission leading up to the completion of the report and its transmission to the security council. I shall also outline briefly the situation with regard to the discussions which have taken place on atomic energy in the security council.

As hon. members are aware, the declaration on atomic energy made in Washington on November 15, 1945 by the President of the United States, the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the Prime Minister of Canada urged that at the earliest practicable date a commission of the united nations should be established to prepare recommendations for submission to the united nations. Following a meeting of the foreign ministers of the U.S.S.R., the United States and the United Kingdom in Moscow in December, 1945, the atomic energy commission of the united nations was established by a resolution of the general assembly of the 24th January, 1946.

The first meeting of the commission took place in New York City on the 14th of June, 1946. The countries represented on the commission from June 14 to December 31, 1946, were Australia, Brazil, China, Canada, Egypt, France, Mexico, the Netherlands, Poland, U.S.S.R., United Kingdom and the United States. After December 31, Belgium, Colombia and Syria were elected to replace Egypt, the Netherlands and Mexico. The Canadian representative on the commission has been, and is, General A. G. L. McNaughton.

At the outset, the atomic energy commission was presented with two different plans. The United States government at the first meeting of the commission on June 14 put forward proposals for the international control of atomic energy closely resembling in many respects the plan as outlined in the Lilienthal report. The United States government's proposals included the renunciation of the atomic bomb as a weapon and suggested that when an adequate system of control had been established the manufacture of atomic bombs should stop, the existing bombs should be disposed of and the authority set up to administer the system of control should be placed in possession of the technological data necessary for the production of atomic energy. In addition, the United States government's proposals contained a statement which had no counterpart in the Lilienthal report "that there must be no veto to protect those who violate their solemn agreements not to develop or use atomic energy for destructive purposes".

At the second meeting of the commission on June 19, the Soviet government put forward its plan proposing the immediate outlawry of atomic weapons and the destruction of all stocks of atomic energy weapons within a three months' period. In addition, the Soviet government proposed an international convention for the prohibition of the production and use of atomic energy and the establishment of two committees; a "committee for the exchange of scientific information", and a "committee for the prevention of the use of atomic energy to the detriment of mankind".

Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, Egypt, France, Mexico and the United Kingdom agreed in principle that the United States plan might form the basis of discussion in the commission. The Polish and Soviet representatives considered the Soviet plan should be given equal consideration with the proposals advanced by the United States government.

In June and July four committees were established by the commission: a working committee or a committee of the whole; a committee described as No. 2; a legal and advisory committee; and a scientific and technical committee.

The discussions which ensued occupied the attention of the commission until July 31, at which time the commission went into committee to discuss in detail the question of whether an effective control of atomic energy was possible. The scientific and technical committee was instructed to report its findings with an indication of the methods by which it believed control might be achieved. In October the committee reported that "they did not find any basis in the available scientific facts for supposing that effective control is not technologically feasible."

The work of the scientific and technical committee coincided with the chairmanship of the Canadian representative from August 14 to September 14, and consequently responsibility for suggesting the next step which might be taken in the work of the commission fell upon the Canadian chairman. The Canadian delegation accordingly put forward a proposal that:

> Committee No. 2 proceed to examine and report on the safeguards required at each stage in the production and use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes, to prevent the possibilities of misuse indicated in the report of the scientific and technical committee; that the committee may hold informal meetings as it may decide, at which scientific representatives may take part in the discussions.

The informal discussions which ensued proved of value in clarifying both the nature and the degree of the control which it is necessary to apply. In the discussions on raw materials the Canadian delegation was able to make a useful contribution by having officials from the bureau of mines and from the Eldorado refinery describe the characteristics of the processes of mining and refining of uranium.

In November it was proposed that the commission should report its proceedings, findings and recommendations to the security council in a first report by December 31. It was agreed that prior to this, committee No. 2 should report to the commission in plenary session. This proposal was accepted by the majority of the commission with the Soviet representative reserving the position of his government and the Netherlands and French representatives accepting on the "understanding that the report would merely record the progress made in the commission to the end of the year without affecting the discussions in the commission."

At a further plenary session of the commission on December 5 the United States delegate introduced proposals for the inclusion of certain items in the findings and recommendations of the commission's report to the security council. These proposals cover some of the main elements of the United States plan as submitted on June 14.

During this time the general assembly of the united nations meeting in New York was debating the subject of disarmament, not only in relation to armed forces and their armament generally, but also specifically to the major weapons adaptable to mass destruction, including atomic weapons.

At a meeting of the commission on December 20, the Canadian delegation put forward a resolution which reads as follows:

> Resolved that the commission approves and accepts the principles on which the findings and recommendations proposed by the representatives of the United States of America are based and instructs the working committee to include these findings and recommendations in the draft of the commission's report to be delivered to the security council by the 31st December, 1946, having conformed the wording of such portions of these findings and recommendations as deal with the same subject matter to the wording of the relevant parts of the text of general assembly resolution of December 14, 1946, on the "Principles Governing the General Regulation and Reduction of Armaments."

The Canadian resolution was adopted by the commission by a vote of 10 to 0 and accordingly the proposals as contained in the findings and recommendations of the first report of the atomic energy commission to the security council were amended. The first report of the atomic energy commission was subsequently approved and adopted for transmission to the security council on December 31 by a vote of 10 to 0, with the Soviet and Polish representatives abstaining. That is the report I have tabled today.

In January and February the security council discussed the commission's report at a number of meetings in which the Canadian representative, General McNaughton, participated under the provisions of article 31 of the charter of the united nations. Important statements of the positions of the Soviet and United States governments were made by their representatives on the security council. It became clear that, while all the members of the council were agreed on certain of the proposals, there was disagreement on a number of other proposals, including those on international inspection and on sanctions. It was clearly impossible to attempt to reconcile these differences in the security council and the council, therefore, decided to refer the matter back to the atomic energy commission. The atomic energy commission has been instructed by the council to prepare and submit to the council a draft treaty or treaties, or convention or conventions incorporating its ultimate proposals. In addition, the security council has requested the commission to submit a second report to the security council before the next session of the general assembly—that which will take place in September, 1947.

Because the discussion has been in general terms, there has been a good deal of misunderstanding about the position, for example, of the United States government on the question of sanctions against violators of an international treaty on the control of atomic energy. The latest statement of the United States representative on this subject has done much to clear up these obscurities. In an address on March 4 before the Overseas Press Club in New York, Mr. Austin, the United States representative on the security council and on the atomic energy commission, had this to say about the vexed question of the veto:

> Nothing could be more dangerous than to act upon the assumption that a treaty or a voting system would operate automatically.
> Let me illustrate the point by a brief reference to the veto. The veto power in the security council is widely thought of as a protection to an aggressor nation. Actually the veto would be no protection at all to an aggressor if the other nations should act together in accordance with the purposes and principles of the charter.
>
> If any great nation possessing the veto power should ever embark on a course of aggression in violation of the charter, it would be committing an act of nullification, an act of rebellion against the united nations. It would forfeit its position under the charter.
>
> No veto could protect such a nation from the consequences of its crime. Only the failure of the other nations to act together against it could spare the aggressor from lawful punishment. The heart of the problem of building collective security is the strength and the will of the member nations to carry out their obligations, individually and collectively.
>
> Veto or no veto, the strength of the great nations in relation to one another is such that no one of them can safely go to war in violation of the charter if it is certain that the others would act together in the defence of the charter.
> If the United States demonstrates convincingly that all its great material and moral power would be used in support of collective security under the united nations, that fact would have far-reaching influence upon the will and capacity of other member nations to act together to maintain peace. On the other hand, if we should falter, if we should dissipate our strength, if we should act in blind or short-sighted selfishness, we would inevitably undermine the whole cause.

On March 10, Mr. Austin, speaking as the United States representative on the security council, in answering the Soviet representative's criticism of the United States government's position, said what the United States and the majority of the members of the commission were seeking was—and these are his words—"effective international control by a genuinely international cooperative development of atomic energy to which all nations would contribute their skills and their knowledge without secrecy, and in which all nations would share the benefits on an equitable basis. Our purpose is to assure that each nation can safely realize these tremendous benefits for itself without danger to its national security or the security of its own economic and social system." Mr. Austin went on to say: "The United States does not desire to impose its will, in questions of atomic energy, on other countries. The report itself proves the opposite. Ten countries united therein to forestall an atomic weapons race. The prohibition of atomic weapons in advance of a system of effective enforceable safeguards would not fulfil the mandate of the general assembly adopted unanimously, or prevent an atomic weapons race. My government has made it clear that we welcome all constructive suggestions which might advance the solution of our common problem and fulfil the mandate of the general assembly resolution."

It is to be expected that the studies in the atomic energy commission during the next four or five months will indicate precisely the safeguards which will be required to protect complying states against the hazards of violations and evasions of the ultimate international agreement on the control of atomic energy. As is stated in the introductory paragraph to section C of the report which I am tabling today, the commission hitherto has limited its examination of the problems of safeguards and measures of control "to the more technical aspects of the control of atomic energy".

It is the hope of the Canadian government that further examination by the atomic energy commission of the problems placed before it by the general assembly of the united nations may lead to a realization on the part of all governments represented on the commission of the manifest advantages to be reaped under a system of effective control of atomic energy. The establishment of such a system would not only make a great contribution to the peace of the world, but would also make it possible for the peoples of the whole world to share in the benefits to be derived from the peaceful application of atomic energy. Canada, as a member of the commission, will continue to do its utmost to resolve the difficulties which still confront the commission.

I shall keep the house informed, as occasion offers, of the developments in the work of the atomic energy commission, bearing in mind that the results of the work of this commission, when available in the form of a draft treaty or convention, will naturally be submitted to this house for its approval and for the usual procedures of ratification. The present report is an interim report only and the security council in dealing with it recognizes specifically that "final acceptance of any part of the report by any nation is conditioned upon its acceptance of all parts of the control plan in its final form."

There is no commitment until commitment to the treaty in its final form, and that can be made only by bringing the treaty to the houses of parliament for the usual processes of ratification. The ultimate treaty or convention should be one which governments of democratic states can readily commend to their parliaments and peoples for acceptance. It is hoped therefore that the treaty or convention will be accompanied by a full report from the atomic energy commission setting out in detail the arguments and considerations in support of the provisions contained in the treaty or convention. It is also hoped that in the work of the commission a due perspective is maintained, so that the system of international control which is submitted to the nations for approval, goes as far as it is necessary in the matter of controls to provide international security and the benefits to be derived from the peaceful applications of atomic energy, but goes no farther.

Mr. GRAYDON: Will copies of this report be available to hon. members, or is it the intention to have it printed in Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would be quite an undertaking to have it printed in Votes and Proceedings, because it is a document of some 85 or 90 pages.

Mr. KNOWLES: It is in Hansard anyway.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not the report.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, not the report from the atomic energy commission.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did the minister not say he was going to have copies tabled?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am informed by the secretariat of the united nations that the question is now being considered as to when they will print this report. We have asked them for sufficient prints to have copies available for those who are interested, in our parliament and even outside of parliament. The printing has not yet been undertaken by the secretariat. If it appears to be too long delayed it may be the desire of hon. members that we have it printed ourselves for circulation here.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think the public has had a good deal of difficulty in understanding the atomic energy reports. I have not read this one, but generally these reports are couched in such full-blown complicated diplomatic language that it is difficult for the public to know what is going on. Will the government consider having this matter referred to the committee on external affairs so that it may be dealt with by those qualified to deal with it, and if so, will they make our representative, General McNaughton, available for examination before the committee?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If I could count on the unanimous consent of the house I would have no objection to moving at once that the report which has been tabled be referred to the committee on external affairs. The committee could then examine the report. As to making General McNaughton available for examination in the committee, I am sure the committee would not wish to interfere with the sittings of the atomic energy commission; on the other hand, I feel it will be possible to coordinate the work in such a manner that if he is required for the proper information of the committee he can arrange to attend. Have I the unanimous consent of the house to move that the report just tabled be referred to the committee on external affairs?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move that the report tabled this day be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Motion agreed to.

MEAT RATIONING

DISCONTINUANCE AS OF MARCH 27

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I wish to announce that, effective tomorrow, the coupon rationing of meat will be discontinued.

The rationing of any commodity at the consumer level is a difficult and expensive operation. This is so both from the point of view of government administration and also in light of the burden which must necessarily be imposed upon the retail trade and consumer in the handling of coupons, and other routine requirements of the system. The difficulties have been increased in recent months because the wartime prices and trade board has not been able to retain the experienced staff which was recruited originally under the stimulus of a wartime emergency.

In the circumstances, the government has decided on a modification of control in this field which we believe will enable the system of coupon rationing, at the consumer level, to be abandoned, but will provide an alternative method which should not reduce exports of meat from Canada, particularly to the United Kingdom where food shortages are still acute.

By order of the wartime prices and trade board, existing regulations in regard to meatless days in public eating places will continue in force. Furthermore, in collaboration with the meat board, the wartime prices and trade board will continue an area distribution of meat in an effort to ensure an equitable distribution of the available meat supply to specified domestic areas. An effort will be made to hold the supplies going to each area at a level which will not reduce the amount of meat which would have been available for export if the rationing system had continued. Naturally this may not work out exactly. It will require the full cooperation of the public to prevent the supplies for each area from being too rapidly exhausted, thereby causing spotty or temporary shortages. With this in mind, the government will undertake certain publicity measures to inform the public of the need for restraint in this regard, and to invite their cooperation so as to keep this country's export contributions of meat at the highest level possible.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the Minister of Finance if this announcement will make any difference in the price levels of meats?

Mr. ABBOTT: It should have no effect on that whatsoever.

Mr. COLDWELL: The price ceiling is to be maintained in the future?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no change in the price ceiling. This is merely the abandonment of coupon rationing to the consumer.

Mr. SENN: I understood the Minister of Finance to say, in connection with the discontinuance of meat rationing, that certain regulations were changed accordingly. There is now a regulation that only a certain quota of hogs can be slaughtered in country slaughter houses, the quota being based on 1941 slaughtering. Is it intended that that shall be changed?

Mr. ABBOTT: There is no change in that for the moment, but I shall make inquiries and see what the situation is.

TRANSPORT CONTROL

MAXIMUM LOADING ORDER AND PENALTY DEMURRAGE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): On March 9, as reported on page 1512 of Hansard, I replied orally to the following question asked by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher):

1. Have the railroads filed with the board of transport commissioners an application to incorporate emergency orders T.C. order 04F (maximum loading order) and T.C. order 18F (penalty demurrage), in tariff CFA, No. 67?
2. Was this tariff an emergency order that came into being as a wartime measure?
3. Has the board of transport commissioners taken any action to make this measure permanent?

My reply was as follows:

I think I can reply orally to this question by telling the hon. gentleman that the railway association of Canada have filed with the board of transport commissioners an application such as is mentioned in the first part of the question to continue the emergency orders of the transport controller. In view of the extension which was given yesterday to the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act 1945 until May 15, the transport controller will continue to exercise jurisdiction over these orders during this extension.

After conferring with the Minister of Justice, I find that order in council P.C. 4487 of June 9, 1942, under which all orders of the transport controller were made, will not be included in the bill called the Continuation of Transitional Measures Act, and that this order in council and regulations made thereunder will be revoked in the general revocation of orders and regulations of the governor in council which the government proposes to make effective the first day of April, 1947. Consequently I wish to correct any impression which hon. members may have received from my statement of March 19 that the orders of the transport controller would continue beyond April 1, and to make the following supplementary answer to the hon. member's question.

1. The Railway Association of Canada has filed with the board of transport commissioners an application requesting the issuance of a general order of the board which would have the effect of continuing, after the cessation of the transport controller's authority, the provisions of emergency orders T.C. 04-F, 05-F and 18-F incorporated in tariff CFA No. 67.

2. Tariff CFA No. 67, which is based on said orders T.C. 04-F, 05-F and 18-F, has not yet been approved by the board and is not in force.

3. The board of transport commissioners has not yet dealt with the said application of the railway association but I expect will do so in the near future.

experimental stage. Small quantities were produced by the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited, Montreal, Quebec, the Independent Nail Company, Galt, Ontario, the Canada Tack & Nail Company, Morrisburg, Ontario, and Morrison Steel & Wire Company, Vancouver, British Columbia. Since approximately the first of the year the Steel Company of Canada Limited in addition to the aforementioned firms are in production of small tonnage of aluminum nails. The production of aluminum nails in 1947 will depend wholly on how much rod the Aluminum Company of Canada Limited can divert from other highly essential uses.

3. What quantities were granted to each firm or individual?

Mr. McILRAITH: 1, 2 and 3. OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. FARQUHAR:

What part does the Department of National Health and Welfare take in the actual administration of pensions paid under the Old Age Pensions Act?

Mr. MARTIN: In the Department of National Health and Welfare there is a division called the Old Age Pensions division. The records of the provincial pension authorities are examined from time to time and the decisions of the pension authorities reviewed. Officials of the division work in cooperation with the provincial authorities to improve the administration and, as far as is practicable, to develop uniformity in the procedure for dealing with applications for pensions under the Old Age Pensions Act. In addition to the examinations in the provinces the division verifies the amounts charged by the provinces to the dominion as the dominion's share of old age pensions and pensions for blind persons.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADAIR LIMITED

Mr. FRASER:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, contracts or agreements exchanged between the government or any agency of the government and Canadair Limited.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, I have made inquiries and I find that the documents referred to which are now in the possession of the Department of Munitions and Supply occupy fifty-two filing cabinets, and that would be only part of the documents because I am sure that the R.C.A.F. also have from twenty to thirty filing cabinets full of these documents. That is an indication of how much correspondence is required to build an aeroplane. I think my hon. friend would hardly wish to have all these documents copied.

Mr. FRASER: Perhaps the minister will let me have the documents in regard to the sale of the property and the contract, because I would like to know who signed the contract for the government.

Mr. HOWE: I shall be glad to furnish my hon. friend with those documents.

Motion dropped.

Mr. FRASER:

For a copy of balance sheet of the Canadair Limited, as mentioned in section C, page 1542, Hansard of March 20, 1947.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT OF NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERMEN AT LUNENBURG AND HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources, arising out of a telegram I received this morning, a copy of which I sent to the minister and so I do not need to read it. Is he aware of the fact that Newfoundland fishermen have been permitted entry to Canada and are being employed at Lunenburg and Halifax while 600 Nova Scotia fishermen are seeking employment, and can he do something about it?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of the question from the hon. member just before I came into the house. I am having inquiries made and will reply later.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF—STATEMENT OF SIR STAFFORD CRIPPS IN BRITISH HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on the orders of the day yesterday the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) referred to a statement made in the British House of Commons on Monday of this week by Sir Stafford Cripps on the subject of the British preferential tariff. The hon. member has asked me to make a preliminary statement to this house on the same subject.

In Hansard of March 17 last, at page 1415, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent) set forth at some length the position on the British preferential tariff shared by the British and Canadian governments having regard to approaching negotiations at the second part of the world trade conference, opening in Geneva on April 10.

This general declaration of policy is fully in line with the address I made to the Canadian Manufacturers Association, Ottawa Valley branch, on April 10, 1946, a copy of which the hon. member for Danforth very kindly sent over to me yesterday. I shall quote one paragraph from the statement I made at that time:

> The proposals to be considered by the world trade conference, I would like to emphasize, make it quite clear that all tariff changes are to be made on an agreed international basis. There is no question of any nation or group of nations being asked to make tariff reductions which will not be matched by tariff concessions from all the member countries.
> I know the historic contribution made by the system of imperial preference to the growth and expansion of our commerce. I am also ready to agree that this is not simply a question of trade, but is an issue which may affect the larger question of our relations in the British family of nations. Let me therefore emphasize as strongly as I can that Great Britain and Canada and the United States are all agreed that the one thing which has been decided upon is the procedure to be followed at the conference. There is no intention to abolish imperial preferences, or to agree to large reductions in imperial preferences in exchange for meagre or nominal reductions in the tariff of the United States and other countries.

What was said on Monday last in the British House of Commons by Sir Stafford Cripps does not, it appears to me, add to or subtract from this government's attitude on this subject.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted a supplementary question, does the minister say that his statement is in full harmony with the statement made by Sir Stafford Cripps? If necessary will the minister make a supplementary statement showing the difference between what was said in this chamber and what was said in the chamber at Westminster, inasmuch as the Westminster statement definitely said that in certain instances imperial preferences would be reduced to expand imperial trade?

Mr. MacKINNON: I read the remarks of Sir Stafford Cripps as reported in the press. I did not gather that there was a positive statement as suggested by the hon. member for Danforth, but rather that the statement was along the lines of our own announced policy on the matter.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The British Hansard report will be in the hands of the minister in due course.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

FORM OF CERTIFICATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. What progress has been made on the suggestion I made to him some weeks ago with respect to providing wallet-sized certificates for citizenship? I hope he will not be completely discouraged by the fact that only four hundred people have asked for and been granted citizenship papers.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): The hon. member was kind enough to lend me a sample of a birth certificate issued in Ontario. The citizenship branch is having inquiries made as to the possibility of using that type of certificate as an alternative to the large one which is being issued. Investigations are being made to find out what would be the cost of issuing certificates of that size, and the decision will be made known in due course.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask the minister a question—

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask a supplementary question?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mine is supplementary.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mine is super supplementary. Has the speed of dealing with applications and granting certificates of naturalization gone up since the last report was made to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker)?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): I should like to make a short statement in regard to that. A question was placed on the order paper asking what was the number of citizenship certificates issued since the first of the year. I may say that the number given did not include the number of applications which have been received by the citizenship branch. During the war the naturalization branch was very much understaffed and applications had piled up which were dealt with in the early part of this year. Consequently in the first months of this year the branch was dealing with applications which had been on file and which had been carried over from the previous year. Citizenship certificates are being issued, and while there had been a delay owing to a change in the forms which were being distributed across the country, considerable progress is now being made in issuing certificates.

MEAT RATIONING

INQUIRY AS TO ALLOWANCE FOR UNUSED TOKENS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I have been delegated by my colleagues around me to follow the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) with an emergent question. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether any allowance will be given on the turn-in value of meat coupons.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE IN COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTION PRECEDING MONEY BILL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the order of the day is called may I say a word on the matter of procedure on a resolution preceding a money bill. I have had occasion to refer to this matter of procedure each session because of the length of time that has been consumed in discussion when similar resolutions have been considered to an extent and in a manner which is entirely contrary to the rules. I am referring at the moment to what it would seem may come to be possibly the case with respect to the discussion in committee on the resolution which will be called as the first order. It always seems that the government may be taking the point of view it does because of some particular measure that is before the house. It is not that. I am raising the point at the moment in order that hon. members may follow the rules of the house which have been framed in the interests of all hon. members.

Last year, with respect to a loan being made to the United Kingdom, I spoke in regard to the procedure in committee on the resolution preceding a money bill. With the permission of the house I should like to read a paragraph from what I said at that time with a view to pointing out that it applies equally to any and every measure of a similar character. The statement I made will be found in Hansard of April, 1946, at page 761:

> The rule is that a resolution must precede a money bill, but the resolution is intended merely as a notice to the house that a money bill is about to be introduced. It is not intended that the notice should be debatable; rather, the correct practice is that the resolution should be allowed to pass, the house go into committee and that, in committee, a statement be made on essential features of the bill which is later to be introduced, this to follow if so desired by some brief discussion. It is not intended that a lengthy discussion should take place at that stage. The discussion on the bill should come after the bill itself is introduced.

That statement is entirely in accordance with the rules of the house. It was made, as hon. members will see, in relation to the bill in respect to the loan to Britain at the last session, but it applies equally to the bill which is before us at the present time.

I hold in my hand a copy of Sir Thomas Erskine May's parliamentary procedure, fourteenth edition, as edited by Sir Gilbert Campion, who is the recognized authority on parliamentary procedure. At page 732 hon. members will find the following statement with reference to the scope of debate on resolution:

> Debate in committee on a financial resolution is confined to the terms of the resolution itself and must not be extended to the related bill.

These are the words to which I wish to draw hon. members' attention. As I looked over the debate yesterday I observed that a good many questions did relate specifically to the bill that is based on the resolution. It is quite contrary to parliamentary practice that the discussion in committee on the resolution should be extended to the related bill. I mention this simply because among other things, the length of time this session is likely to run is going to be very considerable unless we all observe strictly the rules of the house.

If we had observed the rule with respect to the introduction of the resolution itself and passed it in a formal manner we should have saved a week of discussion already. There has been a week of discussion on the resolution. Practically all of that discussion will be repeated when we come to the bill itself. If the house is to take an indefinite time in debate in the committee on the resolution there is no saying when the house will be able to get through the work of the present session.

Let me mention to hon. members that if, through discussion on this particular measure, we run on to the end of April, three months of the session will have passed. There will remain practically all the business of the session still to complete. That will mean that at the end of April we shall up to that time have had no opportunity to discuss the budget; we shall not have had opportunity to discuss any of the estimates; we shall not have time for any of the ordinary legislation of the session. By the time we get on into the spring hon. members I am sure will be hoping that we shall not continue during the summer into the autumn. That is a consequence which must follow unless we do in some way seek to curtail unnecessary discussion. I do not wish to curtail anyone contrary to the rules. I do not want to suggest that there should not be the fullest and freest discussion. All I am asking is that hon. members shall follow the rules as they are set forth in the rules of the house. If the rules are not adequate, let us change them. So long as they are there, let us follow them.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): May I be permitted to comment on the Prime Minister's statement? There is no desire, as I think the Prime Minister will realize, on the part of our party to delay in any way the proceedings in connection with the matter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: I hope that kind of thing is not organized by the government. I wish to say to the Prime Minister that at the beginning of the resolution stage my leader made it very clear that this party was prepared to allow the resolution to go through on the basis that when we reached the committee stage there would be full opportunity on the part of opposition parties and others to examine the ministry, to ask and receive answers to questions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The committee stage on the resolution or the committee stage on the bill?

Mr. GRAYDON: The committee stage on the resolution. I am not complaining about the leader of the C.C.F., although immediately afterwards he made a speech which raised many questions, and of course it could not be allowed to go unchallenged. I am careful not to hold him or anyone else responsible, because everyone in the house must take his own responsibility. I do not think, however, that this is the kind of bill that the Prime Minister had in mind when he was reading the opinions he had. This is not an ordinary bill. It is not really one bill but fifty-seven bills, and it is impossible to apply even custom, let alone the rules, to a bill in which there are fifty-seven units. The house is struggling to get information on the legislation as speedily as possible, having in mind the relation of dispatch to the public interest in general.

The Prime Minister has said that normally the minister in charge of the bill should make a statement on the resolution setting forth the essential features of the measure. But there are fifty-seven essential features to this resolution. While the Prime Minister has had long experience in matters of this kind, I still think it really gets down to the question of how a matter of this kind should be dealt with. That is a matter of opinion and I think the circumstances in which we now find ourselves will have to dictate the time that may be taken. I have not had nearly as long an experience as the Prime Minister, but I suggest that most members feel that not much time is wasted in dealing with a matter at one stage rather than another, because what members have to say at one time will seldom be repeated at another stage of the proceedings.

I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, for having taken so much time, but I felt called upon to answer the Prime Minister, because I am afraid that what he has said cannot meet with full agreement on this side.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I add this? I believe I was responsible for the initiation of the debate last Thursday evening. Looking at Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms I find this:

> Minister moves that Speaker leave the Chair for house to go into committee of the whole on the resolution. Speaker puts question on motion. (Debate allowed.)

It may be that the Prime Minister is quite right that this procedure does prolong the consideration of a particular matter. A few moments ago he quoted from another authority. Sometimes we find that one authority is cited in this house for a particular procedure, and sometimes, another. But our own authority—I looked it up beforehand, I may say—does clearly state, though the rule may not be a good one, that the minister moves that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee of the whole on the resolution; the Speaker puts the motion, and debate is allowed.

That is why we began the debate last Thursday evening. If you turn to page 159 and look at 418, in the second paragraph you will find:

> The ordinary function of a committee of the whole house is deliberation, not inquiry. All matters concerning the imposition of taxes, or the grant of public money, must be considered in committee, as a preliminary to legislation; and any other questions which, in the opinion of the house, may be more fitly discussed in committee, are dealt with in that manner. The provisions of public bills are usually considered in a committee of the whole house.

It was on our own book of rules, Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, that we based both the speech and the amendment we moved last Thursday evening.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I enjoy listening to the Prime Minister, who has such wide experience in parliamentary matters, but he spoke about debating resolutions of this kind, and if I am not mistaken he said that the discussion should not be on the related bill. How could it be? We have not got it. I do not think we have the bill now, and therefore, as we have not the bill, we do not know what is in it and it is pretty difficult to discuss the bill itself.

There is a distinction between the procedure in England and procedure here. Naturally we have some of the principles of British rules, but we have custom according to our pattern, and the result is an entirely different stew. In the parliament at Westminster the purpose of the resolution on a money bill is to notify the members that the government has obtained royal assent to sponsoring a certain bill, and the purpose of the discussion—not the debate, mark you, sir, but the discussion of the resolution in the committee—is precisely to afford the opportunity to members of parliament to ask questions of the ministry and also to make suggestions in order to improve the bill with their own experience. This we may call debating, if we wish; but at the present time I presume that the bill is all cooked and is kept in the icebox of the Department of Justice and will be served to us on a silver platter a little later, as soon as we are through with this resolution. Therefore debating this resolution means positively nothing, because whatever bombshell we may find in the resolution will not affect the bill even if it explodes.

There is something more than the big book that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has quoted from. There is a very small book called Standing Orders of the House of Commons, 1936. One day a member of parliament of ten years' experience asked me, "What do they mean by standing orders?" I said, "They are the regulations of the house, the rules of the house." I have the standing orders in my hand, and at page 17, rule 38, paragraph 1, I read:

> 38. (1) The following motions are debatable: Every motion
> (a) standing on the order of proceedings for the day (except government notices of motion for the house to go into committee at a later date);

[Mr. Coldwell.]

This motion is on the order of proceedings for the day and therefore it is debatable. I am the more at ease in making these remarks, in all humility and candour, for the reason that I have not spoken on the resolution since it has been before the committee. But I am interested in getting some information; there is no man on earth who will prevent me from asking for it, and I will stand up again and again until I get it, because I want to be informed, even if the bill is cooked and is in the refrigerator of the Department of Justice. I want to get some information about this resolution. The denial of that right is antidemocratic, and I am sure the Prime Minister will not insist upon it. I am just as anxious as he is to get rid of the session and go home, although I enjoy the company of my colleagues. I find that my part of the country is the finest in the land; it is God's country, but I am here to do my duty. It is a great sacrifice for me to stay here, and my reward will be to get the information I ask for every time I ask for it. I am sure the Prime Minister is too fair-minded to insist otherwise. Therefore we must take with a grain of salt everything that is said regarding the interpretation of the rules. Campion is a famous author. For a long time he was assistant clerk at Westminster, and if I am not mistaken he is the clerk now. I know he is a great man; I know his book, but to quote from that book as against a standing order which is our rule of debate in this house—I do not say our rule of discussion, but our rule of debate—is not fair. We cannot quote Campion against rule 38, paragraph 1.

Therefore, sir, I suggest, not for your benefit but for the benefit of hon. members who were interested in that debate—because you are in the chair and it was a debate; when the chairman is in the chair, when the house gets into committee, it is discussion—that our rule is the contrary. The rule means debating. I am sure we shall be treated fairly in the future as we have been in the past, and we can take it that when we ask questions it is not done to delay proceedings but to satisfy our minds and get the information we think is in the public interest.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I would not venture, especially in the presence of so many experts, to offer an opinion on the rules, but I do wish to say something on what seems to me to be the reasonable common sense of this situation. We have here, as has been pointed out already, not one bill but in effect fifty-seven bills.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not yet.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Ordinarily when a resolution is moved by a minister he gives an explanation of the ambit of the bill to follow. Here, if I remember well, when the minister introduced this measure he gave an explanation or a reference to practically only one, or perhaps two or three, but certainly very few of these fifty-seven orders in council. If I remember well he confined himself almost entirely to the wartime prices and trade board. Therefore I submit that we are in a very special situation here, and that questions at this stage are on an entirely different basis from what they would have been had the minister in his opening statement referred seriatim to these fifty-seven orders in council which in fact we have before us and which we cannot ignore, because they have been placed in our hands.

Mr. CHURCH: Why not sit in the mornings?

Mr. ILSLEY: When a minister is introducing a new bill he explains that bill, but these fifty-seven orders in council are the law of the land, and have been for years; and they do not call for any explanation at the resolution stage.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My purpose in rising was to try to prevent two debates where one should suffice. It seems that I have succeeded only in provoking a third debate. However, I should like to say just this word to the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Graydon) and the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell), who referred to Beauchesne, or to his own experiences in the house as to the rules and as to what is permitted or involved in following them. In my hand I have what I might speak of as Beauchesne up to date. Before coming into the house this afternoon I rather expected someone on the opposite side would quote Beauchesne as against what I might wish to say, so I asked the Clerk of the House if he would give me a statement on this point which I could read to the house as authoritative. The statement given me is as follows:

> The adoption of the resolution is merely a formal matter and it is often allowed to pass without discussion. The stages of procedure where the principle involved and the details of the measure may be discussed are the second reading of the bill, committee and third reading. When this rule is not applied there is always a repetition of debate.

A moment ago my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition said his experience had shown him there was not much repetition. Well, the Clerk of the House has had a very long experience and close observation of these matters and he says when the rule is not applied there is always a repetition of debate, and I think that has been the experience of everyone. My purpose is none other than that of trying to economize the time of the house in having its rules obeyed. I cannot agree that because there are some fifty-seven orders in council attached to this bill, therefore the bill is not in the regular form. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) answered that question completely and satisfactorily in what he just said. Really there is in fact less justification or reason for asking questions in committee in connection with this resolution than is frequently the case, since, as the Minister of Justice has just said, these orders in council concerning which questions are being asked have been the law of the land right along for some time and should be and are known to every member of the house. All that is essential in the committee stage on the resolution is a general statement or statements in regard to what is of special significance in the bill based on the resolution. As to this bill, hon. members know much more about what it contains and involves than in the case of most other legislation. So I would submit again that if we wish to get through with the business of the house in a way that will accommodate hon. members most satisfactorily in the end we shall best do so by observing the rules of the house.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And reconsidering the Easter recess.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Hon. members will realize that there is nothing before the house. The Prime Minister asked permission to make a statement in reference to a resolution which is under consideration in committee of the whole. No one protested, so the right hon. Prime Minister made the statement; the acting leader of the opposition made a statement; the leader of the C.C.F. party made a statement, and something was said by other hon. members. I believe the house has been sufficiently generous, and I do not believe it would be the general desire to waste more time in discussing a way to save time on this resolution. I suggest that hon. members proceed with the business of the house.

Mr. HACKETT: May I say, Mr. Speaker, so far no one has protested, and unless you express in more formal terms your desire that I resume my seat—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Unless the hon. member has the unanimous consent of the house I would ask hon. members to proceed with the business of the house.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 25, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. members will kindly resume their seats. The house in committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war. We had considerable discussion in the committee last evening with respect to procedure, and further discussion in the house this afternoon. I am hopeful that the committee will discuss the terms of the resolution only, and not refer to the bill. The hon. member for Stanstead.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I was anxious to accept the invitation of the Minister of Justice and refrain from any comment on the resolution, but as matters now stand, and in view of the remarks that have been made to us this afternoon, it seems that further information is necessary, and I have no reason to think that the minister will not be glad to supply it.

The resolution assumes that a national emergency exists; it rests on the assumption that such an emergency exists. In the course of his remarks the minister told the house that the cost of living in the United States had advanced, since the close of the war, by eighteen per cent, while in Canada it had increased by but six per cent. I wanted to know if he would be good enough to tell us if in this computation of six per cent had been included all subsidies, all bonuses, all remissions of duties, all remissions of excise, and other sundry sources of revenue which are denied to the crown by reason of the alleged emergency.

[The Speaker.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer is no.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Therefore it does not mean anything.

Mr. HACKETT: Then if the minister tells us that the increase in the cost of living in Canada has been but six per cent, and in computing that six per cent he has not taken into consideration all the bonuses, all the subsidies, all the remissions of duties and all excises, as well as other gratuities which have been paid and sources of revenue which have been dried up, I submit with great deference that his statement that the cost of living in Canada has increased but six per cent is incomplete, and cannot be relied upon; and that it may very well be that in this country, where we have been operating under a system of controls, the cost of living may have increased quite as much as it has in that country which has been held up—I shall not say to derision—but as an example of great misfortune and of bad judgment, owing to the fact that it has released its citizens from these controls.

Mr. JACKMAN: The awful example.

Mr. HACKETT: I submit it is not appropriate that the chamber should be asked to pass the resolution until information is made available to us establishing that the emergency still exists. If the cost of living is as high here as it is elsewhere, then that ground advanced in support of incorporating into statute form these orders in council, which were resorted to for the period of the war, vanishes.

We have also heard something about the danger of inflation. I would be very much interested in knowing to what extent inflation is the actual result of government policy. We have been told, upon reasonable authority, that half of the war was paid for out of taxes, that something like two-sixths was paid for out of borrowings and that the remaining one-sixth was paid for by inflation, by the printing press. I am asking the Minister of Justice if he will say whether that is approximately true. I know he is not Minister of Finance today; but I am likewise aware that he knows probably better than any other member in the house, or indeed any other person in the world, the details of Canada's financing. I will ask him if it is true that relatively one-sixth of the cost of the war was paid for by Bank of Canada borrowings.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I would not dare answer that question without—

An hon. MEMBER: I would not think you would.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, now! I would not answer that question without verifying those figures from the Department of Finance. I do not know whether that is so or not.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not want to be unfair to the Minister of Justice because, in fact, he is not Minister of Finance at the present time. But knowing his mastery of the whole situation, knowing his knowledge of details and his gift for carrying them in his head, I would ask him if he would tell the committee whether a certain proportion of the cost of the war was not financed by that device known as inflation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not financed by that device known as inflation. There was some.

Mr. JACKMAN: Well—

Mr. ILSLEY: Let the hon. member for Rosedale answer, then. It was not financed by that device known as inflation. There was some inflation of prices, of course, during the war, in this country, as there was in every other country; and there was some borrowing from the Bank of Canada and some borrowing from the chartered banks. That borrowing from the Bank of Canada and from the chartered banks increased the volume of deposits and currency in the country.

An hon. MEMBER: Considerably.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. To the extent that the government availed itself of the money which it borrowed from the banks, that process assisted in the financing of the war. But that of itself is not inflation.

I presume the hon. member is talking about inflation of prices. Inflation of prices may follow from the borrowing by governments from banks. But the two things should not be confused. When the hon. member asks me whether we financed by inflation, I say no. We financed to some extent by borrowing from the banks.

Mr. HACKETT: What I am trying to get at is this: Whether we called it inflation or called it by some other name, did we not resort to practices which resulted in a greater issue of currency upon the same amount of security?

Mr. KNOWLES: Greater production of goods and services.

Mr. HACKETT: My question stands; you ask your own.

Mr. ILSLEY: The same amount of security?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: What kind of security is the hon. gentleman talking about? Is he talking about gold? The Bank of Canada divested itself of its gold and thereafter the Bank of Canada did not have gold as a basis for its issue.

Mr. QUELCH: Did we not go completely off the gold basis during the war?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: I should like to ask just one question of the minister, but it is a two-fold question. He may not have the information before him now but it should be easy for him to get it. In order to be able to discuss sensibly, not only the resolution but the bill, we should know what commodities are now affected by controls. I am not asking for information about the orders in council because they have been published in book form, but I want the minister and the committee to understand just what I wish to know.

There are a certain number of commodities such as butter, shoes, sugar, milk, hats, ladies' wear, et cetera, which have been rationed or which have been under control. I should like to know why these commodities have been placed under the controls. Certain controls have been lifted while others are still in force. I should like to know why certain controls have been lifted and why other controls have been kept in force. There should be a tabulation to indicate, on the one hand, why controls have been imposed and, on the other hand, why other controls have been lifted. It seems to me that that information is necessary if we are to understand the working of the controls.

I presume it will be impossible for the minister to supply this information now but it should be easily prepared and available tomorrow or on Friday. Then hon. members will know exactly what commodities are under controls at the present time, what commodities are not under controls and what was the reason for the imposition of the controls. I have been informed by some of my friends that the reason why such a large number of hon. members voted in favour of the resolution yesterday was the requirement that a special permit is necessary before a new business can be started and that trusts and cartels and others do not want any new businesses. Apparently that was one reason why such a large number of hon. members voted for the controls.

I was told also by reliable people that another reason for the large vote was the fact that retail, wholesale and manufacturers' prices are established and that some people who are close to the strings may pull them so as to keep the controls in force. That is not my opinion; it is just a rumour which has spread quite widely. Perhaps I could go a little farther in explaining my question because it is a serious question. I received one of the greatest honours I have ever received when the hon. member for High Park asked one of my questions the other day.

The argument in favour of price controls is that they are imposed to prevent the exploitation of the people, but I submit that the people are not being protected as they should be when the controls are lifted and even when they are still in force. I have not a complete list of the articles that are offered for sale, but from what has been said to me by big businessmen, during the war shoes were classified on the basis of samples which were submitted to the board by the manufacturers. These manufacturers used rubber and other material of a minor quality to make up the samples. The shoes were not as good but they were sold either at the same price or at higher prices.

Last year there was an increase in the price of agricultural implements. This came as a bolt from the blue. It was a surprise to all of us. It was announced by my right hon. friend the minister apparently as a matter of routine. Not a word was said to me about it, but I know that some of his colleagues looked surprised when the announcement was made in the house. It was decided that agricultural implements would sell at a higher price than before. There are all sorts of things like this that should be investigated. Does my right hon. friend think a pair of shoes is worth $16? Does he think a hat made from material costing $1, or perhaps only fifty cents, with from twenty-five to fifty cents worth of work on it, should sell for $15, $25 or $30?

An hon. MEMBER: It is the idea.

Mr. POULIOT: The idea is to exploit the people. If it was known that the people were being exploited, how is it that the prices board ignored that fact? I understand that is why some controls are lifted, to please a certain class of individuals, but the exploitation is that of the people.

What about shirts? Is it possible to buy a good shirt today for less than five or six dollars? And the price is rising. The information that was given to me by a man of considerable experience and by others, was that the shirts that we are now paying five dollars for are not worth more than a dollar and a half or two dollars. There is exploitation. If price control exists and is now in force the control must be incompetent. If price control has been lifted from these goods, the price control board is equally incompetent because it does not impose controls on things which should be controlled.

Mr. PROBE: What about baby diapers?

Mr. POULIOT: I spoke of them a long time ago, and the authorities did not know that flannelette was used for that purpose. They thought it was used only for nightshirts. I gave an interview to the press on that, and I have it upstairs.

The ambition of the working man who makes a pair of shoes or a shirt or a suit of clothes is to have enough wages to be able to buy what he makes. That is a natural feeling. But when there are middlemen who make an undue profit at the expense of the masses of the people by overcharging them, that should be stopped, and it is the duty of the government to tell the prices board definitely to stop those practices which make the common people lose all faith in our democratic system.

Is it possible today to buy a shirt of average quality for less than $5? It is impossible, and the shirt that we pay five or six dollars for is not worth any more than two dollars and a half. Why is that? Is there any man who will say that, even if we have a slight touch of inflation, it is reasonable to pay $16 for a pair of shoes? You can go into a store and you will see shoes marked at from twelve to sixteen dollars, and the shoes are not worth more than three or four dollars. Where does the difference go? Not only that but it is very hard to get a suit of clothes. The other day I met a colleague of mine in the house. He was very well attired and I said, "This is a new suit you have on?" He said, "Yes". I said, "You look very well in it," and he said, "Well, I must because I paid $120 for it." That is a considerable sum of money, and there is no interference from the prices board.

Mr. LOW: Was it worth $50 before 1939?

Mr. POULIOT: I am not a tailor but I know that before 1939 one could buy a first class suit for $45. If prices had doubled in the interval, that would be only $90 today. But that is how it goes all along the line, and the answer we have from the prices board is that they are protecting us.

Take chocolates, for instance. You go into one store and pay seventy cents a pound for a box of chocolates. Go into another store and you will pay $1 a pound, and in another store you will pay $1.25. How is it there are different prices like that for ordinary chocolates? It reminds me of a trip I made to the Magdalen islands some time ago. I was a young boy and I went into a store which had three different kinds of chocolates. One kind was twenty-five cents a pound; another kind, fifty cents a pound, and the third kind, seventy-five cents a pound. I was young; I was earning my first money, and I asked the storekeeper for some chocolates. The man sold me chocolates for twenty-five cents a pound, but that was a favour he was doing me. I said, "That is a very reasonable price," and he said, "Yes, but if you were a married man and you came in here with your wife wanting chocolates I would sell you fifty-cent chocolates. That is a little better than the ones we sell to children and a little less extravagant than the ones we sell to boys who call with their sweethearts." The price for children was twenty-five cents; for married men, fifty cents; for boys with their sweethearts, seventy-five cents—all for the same thing.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is private enterprise for you.

Mr. POULIOT: No. It was private enterprise uncontrolled by individual honesty. If there were more honesty in business I believe that the number of those who advocate control would be much smaller.

I wish to pay a special tribute to my hon. friend the member for Beauce (Mr. Dionne) for the excellent speech he made last week. He also spoke very well this week. He is a man of wide experience, and I am ready to support him in many of the things he said. He told me that there are people, even outside Canada, who go into a store to buy a definite thing costing such-and-such a price and if the article is marked for sale at a cheaper price they will not buy it. They judge the quality by the price, and naturally the merchants cater to their stupidity. We cannot prevent that; it is only human. But the public at large should be protected, and the necessary measures should be taken in order to protect those who go to buy anything so that no one will take advantage of their good faith or of their credulity.

May I say to the minister that I have made these remarks in the best possible spirit, so that if we are to have controls we shall have controls that really help. I am against the form of control that we have now because all or most of those who are in control are infallible; what they decide is the word of gospel; they accept no suggestions for changing anything from anybody. Their word is final. I should like to have the same recipe as they have, as those who succeeded in getting an increase in the price of agricultural implements. I should like to have their recipe for adjusting certain prices. Having said that, I hope something will be done for the betterment of present conditions so that the people will not continue to be exploited as they are. We are exploited; everyone is exploited. Take, for instance, the grain companies. They have an organization to sell flour; they have subsidiaries to sell bread and pastry. They sell pastry at a profit of 400 per cent. They may make lots of profit but there are others who cannot make any. It is not fair, and the people are exploited.

Some years before the war I read an article which was published in a magazine showing the exploitation of the people of the United States in the sale of drug store items. It was formidable. The items consisted of things that are in daily use in the home and they were sold at an extraordinary profit, an abnormal profit. All that should be corrected if we have an organization to see to it. Perhaps there are better systems than that. They may be explained sooner or later. I am sure that hon. members will give the minister their suggestions for improving conditions that are bad, and at the same time they may say what is good in the whole system. I am sure it will work well only when it is under the direct responsibility of the minister, at the same time the minister being responsible to parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member asked a few questions which I think I can answer now. He asked why certain goods were subject to rationing. I gathered from the nature of the goods he mentioned that he did not mean coupon rationing; he meant why they were subject to orders providing for their equitable distribution. I do not know whether there are outstanding orders in any number providing for the equitable distribution of goods at the present time, but there was a time when there were many orders providing for the equitable distribution of goods.

Mr. GREEN: Can we have that information at the present time?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I can get that. The reason for the orders, of course, was the shortage of the goods. When there were not enough goods to supply the trade and the public, the board provided for their equitable distribution.

With regard to rationing in the ordinary sense, there are just two articles subject to rationing since the announcement of the Minister of Finance this afternoon. The two remaining articles are butter and sugar. The reason there is the same one that I gave for the orders for equitable distribution, namely, that the demand is greater than the supply

The hon. member asked me to give the committee the names of articles that are controlled. In one sense the prices of all goods and services are subject to control, because one section of the wartime prices and trade board order starts with these words:

That no person shall sell or offer for sale or supply any goods or services at a price that is higher than is reasonable and just or withhold any goods or services from sale or supply for a price that is higher than is reasonable and just.

It will be apparent that that provision is an extraordinarily difficult one to enforce. The reliance for enforcement must be based mainly on ceilings.

Perhaps the hon. member meant to ask me what articles are still subject to ceilings. Nearly all goods and services were at one time subject to ceilings, but in the summer of 1946 I made a statement in the house in which I said that thereafter only those goods and services which were named in the statement would be subject to ceilings and that others would be free from the control of ceiling prices. The control there would simply have to be the control that is found in the provision I have read, namely, that the prices of these must be not greater than what is reasonable and just. I have not that list before me, nor is it material, because in January the present Minister of Finance made an additional statement. His additional statement is found at page 67 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board. At that time the list of goods and services remaining subject to maximum prices was reduced. The list is still a long one. That list, in condensed form, but nevertheless complete, was published in the papers last January. It is a long list of classes of goods and services rather than of specific goods and services. I have before me the notice which was published in the paper, but of course it is so long that it would be difficult for me to incorporate it in my present remarks. I am informed by the officer of the wartime prices and trade board that probably seventy or seventy-five per cent in volume of all goods are still subject to ceiling prices, although great numbers of categories have been released from the control of ceiling prices.

The hon. member asked the reasons for removing ceilings, for removing articles from control. These reasons were set out in the statement made by the Minister of Finance on January 11, and the part of the statement enumerating these reasons is found on page 68 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. HACKETT: For the year 1946?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The 1946 report. The statement was made on January 11, 1947, and it is in the 1946 report. The Minister of Finance said:

There are a number of reasons behind the choice of these items for release from price control.

Improvement in supplies. When supplies are good, and particularly when they are sufficiently ample to produce prices below established ceilings, as in the case of a number of fresh vegetables, there is every reason for decontrol. When supplies of goods which are not fully adequate show every sign of improving further and when competition is increasing, as in the case of many household articles, there is also strong reason to remove price control. When competition in world markets is becoming keener and supplies are fairly satisfactory, as is generally the situation with fish, removal of price control is justified, though in some cases it remains necessary to maintain control over the quantity of exports to assure sufficient supplies in the domestic market.

Administrative problems. The burden, expense and complexity of administration when viewed against the lessening risk of serious price advances threw the balance toward decontrol in some fields. To an increasing extent, the relationship of prices as between standard and new lines in some businesses appeared to be having the effect of encouraging the production of new lines at the expense of output in lower-priced standard lines. This problem existed in regard to furniture and some household utensils and could not, at this stage, be entirely met under the general price control policy. Then again, there were a number of fields in which necessary price adjustments were pending. When this was the case and when it was believed that competition was growing and consumer resistance likely to develop in any event, decontrols seemed to be the best course.

There was also the risk that ceiling prices might come to be regarded as minimum prices—as the prices which the government authorized sellers to charge. Accordingly, in some cases where the threat of sharp price increases was passing, the government was disposed to withdraw from price control and to let the trade consider its own longer-range position without any suggestion of government intervention.

In the case of some imports such as tapioca, arrowroot, and peanuts, it was necessary to choose between alternatives of letting the going world price be reflected in Canada, of maintaining ceilings by payment of substantial subsidies, or of going without such imported commodities. In these circumstances, the course of decontrol was chosen.

That constitutes a fairly complete statement of the reasons for decontrolling any particular article or class of articles. I am unable to deal with the specific commodities mentioned by my hon. friend, but one can imagine the difficulty of effective price control of articles such as women's hats, because it is not possible to relate them to the prices charged for the same kind of hat in the fall of 1941 when there was not the same type of hat. With the passage of time, the ceiling principle becomes more and more difficult to apply to the control of prices of certain goods. The same considerations apply to many other commodities. It is impossible in price control to do a scientifically complete or perfect job. There will be some undue profits, no matter how competent the officials may be. They can only do their best.

Mr. QUELCH: I wish to ask a question regarding the government's general policy on subsidies. I understand that during the war the government's justification for the payment of subsidies lay in the fact that they considered that the saving to the consumer would be greater than the cost of taxation, owing partly to the danger from a spiral of inflation. I think that is generally correct, and the spiral of inflation would not be due so much to the expansion of money but would be due to the fact that, although there had been a tremendous increase in production, somewhere in the neighbourhood of fifty per cent of that production was drained away from the channels of consumption for war purposes, and therefore the money paid out on that production would become a demand against consumption goods left in the country; that is, generally speaking. Then, coming to peace time, I understand the government's attitude toward subsidies is this, that they do not consider they would be justified in continuing the subsidy at a time when the cost in taxation may become as great as the saving to the consumer from the subsidy. Is that correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that I can state the view of the government in that regard. I should think it would be pretty doubtful whether the payment of a subsidy is justified when it is simply the transference of purchasing power from one group of Canadian citizens to a slightly different group of Canadian citizens. Other considerations might enter in. It might, as a matter of social policy or something of that kind, be desirable to make that transfer of purchasing power, that redistribution of wealth, but it certainly would not be a policy for the prevention of inflation under these conditions. From the point of view of inflation prevention, it seems to me that when that point is reached subsidies should be abolished, if they are being considered as an anti-inflation device.

Mr. QUELCH: On the other hand, if later on we reach a position such as the governor of the Bank of Canada indicates in the 1946 report, where we may have great difficulty in maintaining demand against our production, then it might be advisable to pay a consumer subsidy in order to expand demand within Canada. But, as the minister says, if that subsidy is paid from taxation, then the cost in taxation may be as great as the saving to the consumer and therefore you would not be increasing demand. The minister must admit that if that subsidy were paid from some other source than taxation it might be possible to expand demand in relation to production. It might be from idle savings, although, if you have to repay those savings at a later date you will still have the problem of a deficiency of purchasing power to deal with. You could finance the subsidy from the expansion of money through the Bank of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think we are getting too far from the resolution. We are getting into the realm of monetary theory.

Mr. QUELCH: But the resolution provides for the continuation of orders in council in relation to subsidies, and I was trying to get from the minister what the government's policy was on subsidies in peace time. He agrees that, generally speaking, so far as he himself is concerned—he may not be speaking on behalf of the government—in his opinion the consumer subsidy should stop when the cost in taxation becomes as great as the saving from the subsidy.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would have to add the qualification, unless it is desired for another purpose entirely, and I have used the term "social policy"—the redistribution of wealth. A policy of that kind, taking money from some people and giving it to others, might be desirable under certain conditions.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would not the cost in taxation always equal the amount of the subsidy? I do not see how it could happen that the cost from the tax with which the subsidy was paid would be more or less than the subsidy itself.

Mr. QUELCH: Less.

Mr. MacINNIS: We shall let the minister answer that later. It is a mathematical question that is capable of answer one way or the other. If you tax $100 million out of the taxpayers and pay that amount in subsidies, that amount of subsidies is equal to the tax.

Mr. QUELCH: But suppose you have a spiral of inflation?

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not talking about what it would prevent or would bring about. I am talking about the point that has been raised, that the tax would be more or would be less than the amount paid in subsidy, which cannot happen.

The other point I would ask the minister is this. There might be a great deal of money available for the purchase of goods, or normally in circulation, but that money would not reflect itself in the purchase of goods unless it were distributed to the people or were in the hands of the people who needed goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: Was that a question? I thought that what we were comparing was not the amount paid in taxes with the amount paid out in subsidy. Of course ordinarily that would be equal; but the amounts we were comparing were, on the one hand, the amount paid by the taxpayers in taxes and on the other hand, the amount saved by the consumers in prices. I am satisfied that the amount saved by the consumers in prices was many times greater than the amount paid in subsidies.

Mr. MacINNIS: That was a matter of the control of prices.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was not a matter of the subsidies.

Mr. ILSLEY: The subsidies made the control possible. The hon. gentleman is right; prices had to be controlled, too, but if there had been control alone without subsidies over a certain period there would have been no production.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister made a considerable point of the fact that the increase in the cost of living in Canada since the war ended had been only six per cent, whereas in the United States, where controls have been abandoned, the cost of living index has risen eighteen per cent. My colleague the hon. member for Stanstead asked the minister whether or not the matter of subsidies, on which we spend a good deal of money each year, was taken into account when the Canadian cost of living index was computed. The minister said it was not, and I believe he went on to say he did not have the figures available. I should like to follow that up with several other matters which I think affect the cost of living index in Canada, and I wish to know whether the minister is able to tell us if these have also been taken into account, or if they have been neglected.

First of all, I refer to the matter of exports. To give a practical example, we find that in the lumber industry of this country we are allowed to export about forty per cent of the total cut, of which a large part goes to the United States where there is no price control on that product. As a result, our mills in Canada receive a great deal more money for this lumber which is exported, and the Canadian price on lumber used in domestic construction, and in other ways where it enters into the cost of production and therefore the cost of living, is kept down. The proof of this statement lies in the fact that if a producer of one of these commodities, part of whose output is exported, finds that he is not making a satisfactory profit on his domestic sales and applies to the wartime prices and trade board for an increase in price, clearly showing that he is receiving, let us say, $50 per 1,000 board feet for his domestic output and $75 or $80 for his exports, he will be told, "Yes, but your overall profit is satisfactory. Therefore, even if you are losing on your domestic output you are making enough on your exports to give you a fair over-all return." I am not quarreling with that policy, but I wish to point out that our cost of living index is manifestly unfair because we are taking advantage of a free market in the United States, where prices are uncontrolled, in order that in Canada we may quote prices which are substantially below the cost of production. Perhaps the minister will look into this matter—he may have the figures available from the wartime prices and trade board—and tell the committee just how much higher the cost of living would be in this country but for the fact that we take advantage of the free market in the United States and perhaps other countries. Then we may be able to get a true picture of what the cost of living index really would be in this country and whether or not controls have been a good thing for us. I am suggesting that it is unfair for us to sell part of our product in a free market and use the profit in order to show an unfair comparison with prices in our own market.

Mr. ILSLEY: Unfair to whom?

Mr. JACKMAN: The comparison is unfair to the Canadian people if you are trying to show what controls have done, because you are taking advantage of an uncontrolled market across the line. I am not saying that is a bad thing for Canada, but a comparison of the costs of living in the two countries is unfair because our cost is artificially lowered by reason of the fact that we are taking advantage of a market where the price is higher as a result of the removal of controls.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): But it is lower; the Canadian purchaser does pay less.

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes. If the hon. member had been here when I began my remarks he would understand the point I am trying to get at.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I was following my hon. friend very closely.

Mr. JACKMAN: In the beginning I said many products were sold in Canada at less than the cost of production because part of the output of the particular factory or mill is sold in a foreign country where prices are uncontrolled, and that therefore our cost of living index has in it an element which is below the cost of production by reason of the fact that we are selling in a free market across the line.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is good government in Canada, I would say.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not objecting to that. It may be good government; I am not passing judgment on the policy, but I suggest that it is unfair to compare the cost of living in Canada with the cost of living across the line.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is the cost of living.

Mr. JACKMAN: I did not say it was not, but I am suggesting that we are selling many products in this country at less than the cost of production, which is obviously an artificial situation.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): The Americans are getting value for their money.

Mr. JACKMAN: The hon. member can make his speech later if he wishes.

The next point I desire to make is that I hear it said—and perhaps the minister can confirm my impression or disabuse my mind —that when price increases are asked for by manufacturers or producers they are much more likely to receive favourable consideration, if they have a just case, if the particular product on which they are asking the price increase is not included in the cost of living index. Perhaps the minister would be good enough to furnish the committee with a list of those products on which price increases have been granted, let us say since June 30, 1946, when the OPA went out of existence in the United States, and a list of those products in regard to which applications were made for increases but on which increases were refused, so that we might find out by a quick reference whether or not there is any truth in this assertion which is heard so frequently.

Another point which also affects our cost of living index is the fact that almost immediately after the OPA disappeared in the United States, or only five days later, we did away with the differential in our dollar exchange rate with the United States, bringing the Canadian dollar to parity with the currency of that country. I am not complaining just now about that action, but I wish to point out that there is an element of unfairness in our cost of living index by reason of that change, as compared with the United States index. What actually happened was that it was made ten per cent easier to buy a vast quantity of commodities in the United States because the Canadian dollar was raised to parity in place of a ten per cent discount as compared with the United States dollar. Undoubtedly that had an influence on the price we had to pay in United States dollars for orange juice, citrus fruits and all the great number of commodities we buy in the United States. That had an effect on the cost of living index which, I believe, invalidated it in reference to any comparison with the United States cost of living index. At that time we had an estimated $1,500,000,000 of United States exchange, and the change in the exchange rate cost this country, on paper at least, about $150,000,000, quite a substantial amount and which undoubtedly would have a real effect on the cost of living index.

What I suggest to the minister is that if he could answer these points which I have raised, and perhaps have his department calculate the effect which they otherwise would have had on the cost of living index in Canada, we might find that, in place of our cost of living index not having gone up as much as prices in the United States, despite the continuance of controls in this country and the arguments offered for further continuance, there has not been very much difference between the cost of living here and the cost of living across the border.

The minister has not mentioned the fact that under these price controls we have black markets, the extent of which is perhaps not as widely known to government agents as it is to people in various businesses, where it has been found that legitimate business, from which a reasonable profit is expected, is put out of operation because black marketeers can make large profits and cut into the trade. In fact, some of them are making so much money that they have firmly established themselves, and are likely to be with us, perhaps on a legitimate basis, for many years to come, all to the detriment of the ordinary trade and the ordinary Canadian taxpayer.

Furthermore, while we point to a comparison of the cost of living index here with that in the United States, nothing is said about the control of standards. It is well known by the wartime prices and trade board that, while a price may remain the same on a particular article, the standard of quality may bear no relation whatsoever to the pre-war standard.

As a matter of fact, very often these controls are nothing more or less than protection of inefficiency. Some businessmen like them because if they get a fixed price for buying and a fixed price for selling, with an adequate margin, they are content, and would like to see a continuation of that system. On the other hand, one of the greatest virtues of the whole system of free enterprise is that those who are inefficient disappear. If they cannot hold their own and render service to the people at reasonable prices, it is soon found that someone else takes their place and their business. As a matter of fact, when the government asks for the continuation of so many of these controls it should be remembered that during the war years we greatly increased our industrial capacity—perhaps by forty per cent—and managed to keep ourselves supplied. Furthermore, a million of our best young men and women were engaged in war industry, while another 800,000 of our best young people were in the armed services. Of that total of 1,800,000, at least 1,500,000 seem now to be employed, and engaged in turning out goods for peace time, in place of goods for war.

Surely the time has come when we can have competition, and when we can have goods available, if the free system is allowed to have its head and really get going. We had an example when only the other day the Ford Company of Canada reduced the price of its product, voluntarily; because all businessmen, and particularly those who really understand about business—I speak more particularly of the larger concerns—are united in thinking that the last thing they want is to see a run-away market, from which economic chaos would result.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What was the percentage of reduction?

Mr. JACKMAN: I do not know what the percentage of reduction of the Ford Company was, but one of my colleagues tells me it was $35 a car. Meantime, wages have gone up, and the reduction was most creditable.

One almost forgets that our economic system ever got along without controls. We had controls during the war, and many of us appreciate what they did to regulate the economy of this country, and to do a good job of concentrating our efforts on war production. But the impression is growing up, having been under the tutelage of controls for the last seven or eight years, that we cannot get along without them. We are almost afraid to venture forth into the water for fear of drowning. We have to hang on to a life-preserver, a rope, or something of that kind. Business is quite capable of taking care of itself. Supply and demand, production and consumption, are quite capable of adjusting themselves so that there will be a fair and equitable and, more particularly, a greater supply of goods than there would be under a controlled system.

I suggest to the minister that if he will give business its head he will find that there will be more production, and that competition will keep prices down. In fact, it is greatly to be questioned whether or not the government is of the opinion that we are heading for inflation or deflation. The consensus of the largest number of economists in North America at the present time is that we are facing at least a moderate price recession. If that is so, then it means that demand is being overtaken by supply. When that happens there will always be some manufacturers who will want to keep their factories going 100 per cent, with the result that they will lower prices in order to get the business.

I should like very much to hear from the minister whether he or his advisers expect that we are heading for deflation, with perhaps some unemployment connected with it, or whether we are heading for inflation. Certainly if we are heading for deflation it is hardly the time to inaugurate or to put into statutory form the continuation of these controls.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not inaugurating it. In putting them into statutory form, we are simply continuing them for as long as is necessary, thereby permitting our getting out of them in an orderly fashion, as I have explained. I do not know how much I should go into general considerations.

Mr. JACKMAN: I should be very much interested in having some light on the price index.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member mean a comparison with that of the United States?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: If that is what the hon. member wishes to have, I shall try to get some information along the lines requested by him. However I do not know whether it will be possible to get anything definite. I should think the revaluation of the dollar would have some influence, although not a very great one. It would not begin to account for the difference between the price rise in the United States and that in Canada. I shall also look into the subsidies situation.

Mr. JACKMAN: And exports.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not think my hon. friend's point about lumber is a good one, at all. I think he was making his case the other way around; that is, he has established that the existence of controls keeps prices down.

Mr. JACKMAN: I may be handing the government a compliment on that export matter. But surely the minister will agree that if lumber, which is taken only as an example, is being sold on the Canadian market at less than the cost of production, the government would have to allow the price to be increased in order to make ends meet in the industry, if it were not for the fact that in a sense the industry is bonused by high prices in the export market. I am suggesting that, in connection with the comparison of prices of commodities included in the Canadian cost of living index, there is some unfairness when a comparison is made with the United States index.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot see that point. I do not know whether domestic prices are less than the cost of production or not. I do not agree that they are; I do not know.

Mr. JACKMAN: Perhaps the minister will find out.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether I can or not; I do not believe I can.

Mr. JACKMAN: I could soon find out from the department.

Mr. FLEMING: Last night in the midst of some discussion, to part of which exception was taken by the Minister of Justice, questions were put by the hon. member for Vancouver South to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, which the minister said were perfectly proper questions. They had to do with Nos. 56 and 57 in this list of fifty-seven orders in council. The nature of the question was this: Why are they included in this measure?

Taking that as my starting point, from the point of view of relevancy and order, I should like to say a word concerning an order also included among the fifty-seven which, in my submission, clearly ought also to be the subject of a separate bill, and particularly in view of certain observations made in the speech from the throne. I refer to the subject of old age pensions.

We have among the orders in council a number which deal with the subject of old age pensions, the gist of which is to permit the addition of some $5 a month by way of subsidy to the present statutory rate fixed by the Old Age Pensions Act. In the speech from the throne, to be found on page 3 of Hansard there appears this sentence:

> Amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act will be introduced at the present session.

We have had it put quite clearly before the committee that some time at this session the government is to introduce a bill to amend the Old Age Pensions Act. Is there any reason therefore why this omnibus bill to be introduced should contain, presumably for a temporary period, the orders in council which relate to this very matter? It was indicated in earlier discussion in the house this session that the purpose of the amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act would be to increase the basic rate of the pensions above the present $20 monthly statutory rate plus the $5 provided for under the orders in council.

Would it not be sensible to drop these orders from among the group of fifty-seven in the omnibus bill and make them part and parcel of whatever bill the government may decide to introduce to amend the act itself? Why should we be taking two bites of the cherry? The effect of these orders has now been extended to May 15. We are no longer faced with the situation which the government might have stated earlier as a reason for continuing these measures. Certainly, with the extension of the effect of these orders to May 15 there is ample time for the government to bring in its bill to amend the act and increase the rates on a statutory basis, without asking the house to take time meanwhile to go over a number of these orders and to give them the effect of statutes for the meantime.

Surely the sensible and businesslike way to go about this is to say that in view of the extension of these orders to May 15 the government should bring in its measure to amend the act and increase the statutory rate. We heard something this afternoon from the Prime Minister about duplicating debate. Is there any better way of duplicating debate than the procedure the government is following in this respect? We all must seek to approach this matter in the most orderly way, in a way that will save time and bring us most directly to the meat of the problem. I submit that the government will be making a contribution in that direction if they will bring in their bill to amend the Old Age Pensions Act and increase the statutory rate. In that way they will dispense with any necessity for including the orders in council relating to old age pensions in the omnibus bill. Surely that bill will be loaded down enough without including measures that are to be the subject of duplicating legislation at a later stage in the session. Not only are we going to duplicate discussion, but apparently we are going to duplicate the legislation itself.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. FLEMING: I would ask for some comment on these remarks of mine. I was not making them just for the sake of talking; I made them in the hope that they would be a contribution toward an orderly approach to the problem.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know of any reason why the old age pensions legislation should not be brought in at as early a day as possible. It was quite obvious at the beginning of February that we would not be able to have the old age pensions legislation put through by March 31 and we attempted to avoid any hiatus. There are many considerations which I cannot outline to the committee. We had to keep in mind our dealings with the provinces. We had to have a little time on that and we knew we could not get it through by March 31. It might be possible to do it before May 15, but I do not know.

The same considerations apply to other legislation, such as the labour relations legislation. We have to get out of that field just as soon as we reasonably can and we have to have legislation about that this session. The existing orders in council are included under this measure although we are going to bring in legislation later in the session. That may mean duplication because it means making arrangements with all the provinces and giving them a chance to pass legislation. We knew we could not make the transfer to the provinces before March 31, but we might be able to do so before May 15. I shall have to speak to the Minister of Labour about that.

I would point out that we cannot do everything between now and May 15. We have not done anything yet except to deal with emergency legislation and the speech from the throne. We have quite a large sessional programme to go on with and we want to get a lot of this legislation through. If we start giving priority to everything, we shall not be able to do that.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister clear up one point? I take it that it is not the intention of the government to continue the orders in council in relation to old age pensions beyond the date when the amendments come into effect?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. FLEMING: In other words, the government is simply proposing to continue these four orders in council which relate to old age pensions until it gets the bill amending the act through the house?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

[Mr. Hackett.]

Mr. FLEMING: The bill to be introduced will cover all the matters that are within the scope of the orders in council?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister tell us what orders in council are to be replaced by statutes during the present session? In his preliminary statement he said that some of these fifty-seven orders in council were administrative, some were regulative, and some were legislative. It would be of considerable help if we knew which of the orders in council he considers to be legislative.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are three classes of orders in council. There are the orders in council relating to old age pensions; there are the orders in council relating to labour relations, and there are the orders in council relating to veterans preference. Those three classes of orders in council are to be replaced by legislation this session.

Mr. GREEN: There are five orders under the heading, Civil Service Commission; nine under the Department of Labour, and four dealing with old age pensions under the Department of National Health and Welfare. What orders in council are to be replaced by statutes? Will all those that I have mentioned be replaced in that way?

Mr. ILSLEY: What the hon. gentleman is really asking is which ones we are undertaking to revoke this session?

Mr. GREEN: I am asking which ones are to be replaced by legislation later in the session.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is ambiguous. I have had some experience in having my language examined rather closely and I am going to be somewhat careful. In a sense I cannot say that they will be replaced, if by replacing it means enacting the same language into legislation. The legislation may be a little different. What the hon. gentleman is asking is whether these are to be revoked when the legislation dealing with the subject matter is passed.

Mr. GREEN: That would meet it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I could go over them and mark them.

Mr. GREEN: I think we are entitled to know which ones are to be revoked after they have been replaced by legislation at this session.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there will be any difficulty about that. Of course, once we give an undertaking to revoke we have to revoke. Certainly it is clear in my mind exactly what we are intending to do. The principle of what we are intending to do is to enact old age pensions legislation, in which event these four orders in council relating to old age pensions would be revoked. That is No. 1. It is also our intention to introduce legislation providing for a preference to veterans in the public service of Canada, in which event the orders in council providing for that preference will be revoked.

Mr. GREEN: That applies to all five orders in council?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether it does or not. Do the whole five relate to the veterans preference?

Mr. GREEN: They say so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Cannot the hon. gentleman apply the principle himself instead of trying to pin me down here to numbers of orders in council. I am giving the principle of the thing, which is quite clear. Then, third, are the orders in council relating to P.C. 1003?

Mr. KNOWLES: Be extra careful on that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I should be. At any rate the principle of the thing is this. We have this labour code so-called which provides for collective bargaining between employers and employees. It was passed as a war measure. We are now moving into the period when the jurisdiction passes to the province because the war is over. The provinces, we assume, will pass legislation covering part of this field. The part occupied by ourselves will be greatly contracted, and our legislation will cover that contracted field. Then those parts of the order in council which are replaced by our legislation and by provincial legislation will be revoked. That is the principle of what we are going to do, and I think that ought to be sufficient.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): What we are getting into now is the bill itself.

Mr. GREEN: Oh, no.

Mr. HACKETT: Where is the bill?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member had the bill in his hand.

Mr. HACKETT: Where? Have you it?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Certainly.

Mr. GREEN: We do not have it.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I appeal to hon. members to deal with the resolution, which is a very simple one. These other matters can be dealt with when the bill is in committee, when all these details can be gone into. I think my hon. friend will find that if he will cooperate with the Chair we shall make better progress than we are now making.

Mr. GREEN: On that point, Mr. Chairman, this was all threshed out before. The minister himself said that certain of these orders in council were legislative, and I am simply asking him to explain which ones come in that category.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): That can be gone into in committee.

Mr. GREEN: No; we are entitled to have that information now. I submit that if the minister is not prepared to complete his statement today he should do so tomorrow and tell us which other orders in council are to be revoked because legislation is to be brought in replacing them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can do that. I can state what our intention is. I do not know just how rigid the undertaking should be.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member for Stanstead.

Mr. HACKETT: I thank you, Mr. Chairman. Some time ago I started to ask a question of the right hon. minister and it provoked so much discussion that I have not been able to complete it. The right hon. gentleman said that the financing of the war had been achieved roughly one-half by taxation and two-sixths—I said two-sixths by borrowing and one-sixth by inflation. The right hon. gentleman did not quite agree with my description of the method resorted to for the last one-sixth. It does not make much difference what we call it. It was a way of puffing ourselves up by resorting to the printing press or to borrowings from the banks. Since I embarked upon this inquiry earlier in the afternoon I have been fortunate enough to get a couple of documents which will possibly enable me—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder how the hon. member relates this financial aspect of our war effort to the resolution now before us.

Mr. HACKETT: I think, Mr. Chairman, that you had the good fortune to be absent when I started on this question. I said that the resolution took it for granted that there existed a national emergency. I am not convinced that such is the case, and inasmuch as the existence of a national emergency is the basis of the resolution I was inquiring into certain features of the emergency referred to by the right hon. gentleman in his address which I thought should be supplemented by some additional information in order that we might deal with the resolution, as they say in that part of the country from which I come, en pleine connaissance de cause, which means with a little more information than you have at the present time. What I wanted to say was that the right hon. gentleman in his budget of 1943 said:

> The plain fact is that this year we have had to depend too much on bank borrowing.

Then in the annual report for the year 1945 to the Minister of Finance and statement of accounts by the governor of the Bank of Canada I find this statement:

> The remaining one-sixth—

That was the one-sixth of the cost of the war which had not been paid for out of taxation or borrowing. It was accounted for in this way:

> The remaining one-sixth of the government's total requirements has been financed to a considerable extent by the chartered banks, which has involved a substantial increase in their holdings of government securities, and consequently in the volume of savings and demand deposits of the public with the banks.
> This increase in deposit liabilities has in turn given rise to a need on the part of the chartered banks for larger cash reserves. The policy of the Bank of Canada—implemented through its purchase of government securities in the market—has been to keep pace with these necessities, without trying to bring about expansion of credit for purposes unrelated to war needs.

To a neophyte like myself that means a type of inflation. The question I wish to ask the minister—and upon the answer I think I can base the remainder of my argument—is, has not that device, whether it be called inflation or whether it be called by a more euphonious name, resulted in a reduction in the purchasing power value of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Ask the hon. member to ask the question again.

Mr. HACKETT: What does the hon. Minister for Veterans Affairs say?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I suggested that the minister ask the hon. member to repeat the question.

Mr. ROWE: Does the minister not understand it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer to that question is not perfectly obvious, but my opinion is that the large increase in bank deposits during the war had an influence of driving the price level up; that what might be called inflation of credit and currency—

Mr. HACKETT: Is that different from currency circulation?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am talking about volume now; the volume of currency and credit in this country increased, and what might be called inflation of the volume of currency and credit in the country. My opinion is that that affected the inflation of prices; it caused some inflation of prices, but the two are different because perhaps one would not necessarily follow the other.

The reason I do not want to say "yes" to the question, did we resort to inflation as a device for financing the war is that it might be seriously misunderstood, it is so ambiguous. One hears about countries which pursue a policy of price inflation or might pursue a policy of encouraging price inflation so that their tax receipts will be much greater, so that they will get more money in that way, which might be a device of financing by inflation. I do not want to say "yes" to that at all.

Mr. ABBOTT: Would the committee allow me to move that we report progress in order that I may have a couple of minutes before six o'clock to table supplementary estimates?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I might say to hon. members that I had hoped this resolution might be passed before six o'clock.

Mr. GREEN: What a hope!

Progress reported.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table two documents, the first a Forecast of 1947 Investment by Canadian Business, and the second a Forecast of Production of Basic and Building Materials in Canada. The first is a forecast based on inquiries of the plans of 12,000 businesses in Canada, and I believe is a very important document. The second is an attempt to forecast the demand and production of building materials during the current year.

8. If so, how much has been received and from what sources did this money come?

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West):

1. Yes. The supplying of names would involve an examination of nearly 54,000 accounts. There is no separate category of corporations as distinct from individuals.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. Moneys transferred to the custodian were invested from time to time in dominion of Canada victory bonds, with the approval of treasury board, and interest was, of course, realized on these investments.

4. On general fund, from government of Canada.

5. As of December 31, 1946; $3,379,692.66.

6. Held to cover administration costs and subsequent disposition of funds after terms of peace treaties have been settled.

7. Yes.

8. See answer to No. 1.

NATIONAL DEFENCE DEPARTMENT—LADISLAUS BIBEROVICH

Mr. WINKLER:

2. If so, were any reasons given for this termination by the Department of National Defence?

3. What were they; who authorized them, and who signed the document of dismissal?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. General directive for a reduction of staff in connection with the re-organization of the department of national defence on a peacetime basis. Tht actual notice of release was signed by the director of civil personnel in the regular course of his duties.

CARBERRY, MAN., AIRPORT

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. Has any decision been reached as to the use of the airport at Carberry, Manitoba, either as an R.C.A.F. station or for civil purposes? If so, what is such decision?

2. Have representations been received since the end of the war, pointing out the advantages of this airport? If so, from whom, and are these advantages being given full consideration by the government?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. So far as the department of national defence is concerned, the R.C.A.F. station at Carberry, Manitoba, is now in process of being declared surplus to the crown assets allocation committee with the exception of: (a) twelve buildings being retained temporarily for the storage of R.C.A.F. reserve equipment; (b) five buildings being dismantled for use elsewhere; (c) a recreation hall being retained for air cadet use. The buildings specified in (a) above will ultimately be declared surplus to crown assets allocation committee.

[Mr. C. W. G. Gibson.]

2. Representation was received from Mr. B. W. Caldwell, mayor of Carberry, and the merits of continued use of this airport by the department of national defence were fully considered before the above decision was made.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. NIXON:

1. How many persons are employed in the dominion administration of old age pensions?

2. (a) What provinces pay supplementary amounts to pensioners in addition to their share of pensions paid under the Old Age Pensions Act; (b) what are the supplementary amounts paid?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. The old age pensions division of the department of national health and welfare employs thirteen persons and the division of blindness control employs three persons. Other departments of the dominion government including mines and resources, trade and commerce and secretary of state are required to provide information for use of the provincial pension authorities.

2. (a) and (b). British Columbia, $10 a month to each pensioner; Alberta, $5 a month to each pensioner; Saskatchewan, $3 a month to each pensioner; Manitoba, any amount up to $1.25 a month to a pensioner whose pension does not exceed $21.25 a month; Ontario, 15 per cent of the pension payable under the act based on a maximum pension of $20 a month; Nova Scotia, $5 a month payable at the discretion of the pension authority to any pensioner whose income including pension does not exceed $365 a year.

In addition to paying supplemental allowances the provinces of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia have plans under which certain medical or medical and hospital services are provided free to pensioners.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. McCUBBIN:

What steps are being taken by the government to bring into operation any changes in the Old Age Pension regulations recommended by the interprovincial board in November, 1946, pending amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act during the present session?

Mr. MARTIN: Subsection 2 of section 19 of the Old Age Pensions Act provides that no regulation by reference to which any agreement with a province has been made shall be altered except with the consent of such province or in accordance with the provisions of the regulations to which it has agreed. The changes recommended by the interprovincial old age pensions board in November, 1946 are now being considered by the governments concerned. They must be approved by the lieutenant governors in council of the provinces and by the governor in council before they can be brought into force.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. BREITHAUPT:

1. What provision has been made in the administration of family allowances to see that the money is spent for the purpose intended?

2. How many cases were investigated during the month of January, 1947?

3. How many family allowances accounts are in pay to administrators and trustees, as a result of information obtained through welfare investigations?

4. What steps have been taken to implement the requirement that a child must be in regular school attendance or receive equivalent training in order to receive family allowances?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Welfare supervisors are employed in each family allowances regional office. As part of their duties they are responsible for investigating possible cases of misuse of allowances. In some instances this is done by the regional office staff, in others through the provincial welfare department or through private agencies. Working agreements with the provincial welfare departments have been made with Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario. In New Brunswick the child caring agencies are dealt with directly. If the investigation reveals misuse of allowances arrangements are made to appoint a third party administrator who is responsible for seeing that the money is spent for the benefit of the child.

2. (i) through provincial welfare departments, 175; (ii) through other agencies, 41; (iii) by regional office staff, 100; total, 316.

3. As of January 31, 1947, there were 172 accounts in pay to administrators and trustees.

4. In each province arrangements have been made with the provincial school authorities to notify the family allowances regional office when the school attendance of a child becomes unsatisfactory. Upon receipt of this information appropriate action is taken to suspend allowances until attendance becomes satisfactory.

4. Was any interest paid to the federal government on account of this investment?

5. Has the property been sold?

6. If so, (a) to whom; (b) when; (c) how much did the federal government receive from the proceeds of its sale?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DIPLOMATIC APPOINTMENTS—AUSTRALIA, MEXICO, NORWAY AND DENMARK

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on March 25 I indicated that announcements of diplomatic appointments to Mexico and Australia would be made today, and I have pleasure in informing the house that Mr. Kenneth Alfred Greene, O.B.E. has been appointed as High Commissioner for Canada in Australia. Mr. Greene has been prominent in the business and community life of the capital for some years. During the first world war he served in the Canadian armed forces, and during the second he took a leading part in the organization of a number of bodies engaged in war work.

In addition, Mr. S. D. Pierce is to succeed Doctor Hugh L. Keenleyside as Canadian Ambassador in Mexico. Hon. members know that Mr. Pierce has had a distinguished career in academic work, in private business and as a war-time public servant. Until his appointment, Mr. Pierce was chief of the economic division of the Department of External Affairs.

In addition, Doctor Henry Laureys, formerly Canadian Ambassador in Peru, is to be Canadian minister in Norway and Denmark, with the personal rank of ambassador. Doctor Laureys in 1940 became the first High Commissioner for Canada in the Union of South Africa, where he served until 1944, when he was appointed Canada's first ambassador in Peru. Before entering the public service, Doctor Laureys had a distinguished academic career in the field of international economic and commercial studies.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the minister how many vacancies that now leaves in the senior diplomatic service abroad?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I believe the only one that could be called a vacancy is that in respect of Peru. I had hoped that that appointment might be announced today, but the agrément of the Peruvian government has not yet been received. It is expected at any time, and as soon as it is received the appointment will be announced.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understood the minister to say that one gentleman had been appointed minister to Norway and Denmark, with the personal rank of ambassador.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the difference?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The gentleman had been ambassador to Peru. He retains his personal rank of ambassador; but as our missions in Norway and Denmark are still legations, he can be accredited only as a minister.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does that mean any difference in salary?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I ask hon. members in the chamber to be kind enough to moderate their voices. At the beginning of every sitting there is so much conversation going on that it is difficult to follow what is being said by hon. members who are speaking. Hon. members will realize that we do not need so much a loud-speaker system in the chamber as we do silence.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is in line with the question I was going to ask, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the apex of the Liberal party. We are afraid our names may have been mentioned to some of these positions, because, without amplifiers we could not hear a word that was being said.

Mr. GRAYDON: You can take that for granted.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

CARTIER BY-ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice, of which I gave notice rather late. Will the minister inform the house what measures he proposes to take to ensure a free election in Montreal-Cartier?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have no reason to think that there will be any disturbances, or that if there were any they would not be properly dealt with by the usual law enforcement agencies.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

SUGAR BEETS

LABOUR TO ASSIST IN PRODUCTION OF 1947 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour with respect to a labour shortage in the sugar beet industry during 1947. I understand there have been discussions with the dominion authorities, the beet growers association and the Manitoba Sugar Company. Can the minister say what the prospects are for sufficient labour to assist in sugar beet production in Manitoba during 1947?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Conversations have been going on between the sugar beet growers and the departments of labour and immigration with respect to the labour situation in the sugar beet fields of that province during the coming season. Consideration is being given to using Polish veterans or other forms of labour. In addition a senior officer of the department of labour is en route to Winnipeg to open up conversations with the department of agriculture in that province.

INCOME TAX

APPRAISAL OF INCOMES OF FARMERS NEGLECTING TO FILE RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Revenue. Is it true that farmers who have neglected to file income tax returns between January 1941 and December 1946 are to have their incomes for those years appraised in a net-worth statement which must be filed before March 31? If so, on what basis will the department calculate the farmer's total income tax for those years?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I do not see any urgency in the hon. member's question.

Mr. GRAYDON: The farmers do.

Mr. ARGUE: Perhaps Your Honour did not note the full significance of the question. Returns must be filed before March 31. It will soon be March 31 and the farmers are anxious to know on what basis income tax will be dealt with.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): There are no regulations to that effect, nor have instructions been issued to take any such action. The matter as to the basis on which the department will calculate a farmer's total income tax for those years is one of rather complex accounting. I suggest that if the hon. member wants a detailed answer he should put his question on the order paper, and it will be answered.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 26, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war and to provide therein that the governor in council may appoint and fix the compensation of the officers, clerks and employees necessary for the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act and further to provide that certain officers, clerks and employees may continue to perform the duties for which they were previously appointed.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister provide the committee with a statement showing the total of all bonuses, subsidies, remissions of duty, remissions of other taxes and other benefits, direct and indirect, which the government has paid, in order that we may have a fuller appreciation of the cost of controls? I would ask that over and above the total of these bonuses, subsidies and remissions the statement show what has been paid out each year since controls went into effect. I am sure the government has this information and can make it available. I have spent more time than I care to admit in trying to work it out for myself, and I arrived at a figure which exceeded the billion dollar mark. I then asked myself whether I was wrong in my figuring, but I have been unable to find in any report a complete statement of these payments. It would be of great assistance to the committee to have a concise statement showing exactly what these contributions by the government have been.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): Some of the items would be debatable. For example, under the War Exchange Conservation Act, which was passed in December, 1940, the duties on goods imported from Great Britain in some cases were removed, in other cases they were reduced by fifty per cent and in other cases were reduced by twenty-five per cent. Undoubtedly the reduction of those duties had some effect upon the prices of the goods imported, yet those duties were not reduced or removed for the purpose of controlling prices. They were removed or reduced for another and entirely different purpose, namely, the encouragement of imports from Great Britain so that not so many goods would be imported from the United States to the end that our stocks of hard currency would be conserved. Such items would present a problem to any one attempting to compile a complete list of tariff reductions, taxation remissions and so forth.

I do not know what should be done with subsidies which were paid for the purpose of stimulating production, or encouraging the production of high quality goods, such as certain bacon subsidies which were graded in accordance with the quality of the product, and the cheese subsidies which were graded in a similar manner. It is impossible to say whether certain subsidies were paid for the purpose of keeping prices down, for the purpose of keeping production up, or both. The main class of subsidy is that which was paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited, and a statement of these subsidies is to be found on page 74 of the report of the board. This statement reads:

Appendix G

Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited summary of operations from December 1, 1941 to December 31, 1946.

The operations of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Limited, from inception to December 31, 1946, have resulted in a cost to the government of $410,864,133.02, made up as follows:

1. Subsidies paid (see detail below)		$348,538,612 60
A. import	$183,692,970 54
B. domestic	164,845,642 06
2. Losses on commodity trading (see detail below) ...		57,703,880 69
3. Administrative expenses and miscellaneous items		4,621,639 73
		$410,864,133 02

In addition to those subsidies there were, as I say, production subsidies and subsidies which were paid to encourage the production of high quality produce. Then there were customs duty removals which were motivated by the desire to keep prices down. I think there were some remissions, athough I do not recall any.

Mr. HACKETT: There was a remission on sugar, for instance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not remember just what form that took. Whether it was done by legislation or by order in council under the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act I do not remember. I could give all the information which is certain and make reference to some which is not so certain, and arrive at a result which probably would be more approximate than accurate, but it would take a little time. Perhaps something could be done about it between now and Monday.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister say whether the explanation he has given in detail in which the items add up to $410,000,000 include the production subsidies?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they do not.

Mr. HACKETT: I am going to ask a specific question which may convey what I am trying to get at. Can the minister give in round figures what the production subsidies amount to? I know that they obtain in a number of departments. He has made reference to those which refer in a particular way to items under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ILSLEY: The agricultural production subsidies are the only ones I can remember. Replying to the specific request that I give the information in round figures, the figure I have in mind is in the neighbourhood of $100 million over two or three years.

Mr. HACKETT: Per annum?

Mr. ILSLEY: Per annum, but the amount varied every year and it is much below that for the forthcoming year.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I would like to get information from the minister with respect to the subsidies provided for the production, distribution and control of prices of coal. Where does the authority obtain to expend the coal subsidies, which amounted to about $8,000,000 a year—$7,720,015—and to $28,000,000 for the entire period? I have looked through the omnibus bill for an order in council extending the authority for those expenditures. I think it is agreed that these subsidies must be continued for the time being on the production of coal; I do not think anyone disputes that. Disappointment prevails in many quarters because these subsidies have not been increased to enable the wages to be paid which have been asked for by the workmen in eastern Canada so that coal production would continue. Personally I wish the payment of subsidies could be avoided, but it is recognized that they cannot be avoided. What I want to know is under what authority they have been paid, and under what authority they will continue to be paid.

In the report of the Carroll commission on coal the commissioners unanimously agreed that the payment of these subsidies must be continued. A clear statement should be made with respect to that, so that the workmen and the operators in these coal fields may have the assurance that provision is being made for the continuance of the subsidies. I would ask the minister to tell the committee under what authority the subsidies have been paid and under what authority they will continue to be paid.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get that information from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, under whom these subsidies have been administered.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): They amount to a very large sum. Either they are being paid under the omnibus bill or they are not. Can the minister answer this question: Are these subsidies provided for under the legislation now before the committee?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so, but I had better get the information from the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. My impression is that certain subventions are paid.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): They are statutory and appear in the estimates.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, in the estimates. The production subsidies are paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and appear under that vote.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That was under the War Measures Act originally.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a crown corporation which works with and under the wartime prices and trade board, and my impression is that the production subsidies so-called are paid by that corporation. In the estimates there is a vote to the corporation of $35,000,000. Whether it includes the production subsidies on coal I cannot say. I would have to get information on that from the minister.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I should like to arrive at some understanding as to this debate. Most of us have been sitting here silent during the whole time this resolution has been under discussion, trying to make up our minds whether to speak on the resolution or to wait until the bill is before us for second reading. This afternoon a long discussion is being carried on with respect to most of the items covered by the resolution. If it is your intention, Mr. Chairman, to permit debate at the resolution stage on the subject matter of these orders in council I think we ought to know it so that we may have the opportunity of speaking. Or is it the intention of the house and the ruling of the Chair that this legislation should first be put into bill form, and that a regular debate may then take place upon it? I should like to have an understanding on that. I have a good deal to say on the orders in council, but I had intended to reserve my remarks until the second reading of the bill.

Mr. HACKETT: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on that. I am reserving what I have to say until the second reading. But this is a matter of some importance and I hope that the gentlemen to the left will not be too impatient with us. We have sat here many a long day when they were talking about things that interested them—and I am not at all questioning their right to information. But this is a very important enactment, and the attitude taken with respect to it will depend to a considerable extent upon the information that is made available. The minister is peculiarly fitted to give the information because of his long experience in another office. He has shown no disinclination to answer serious questions which come from people who are trying to get information so that the debate may be carried on on the facts and not on supposition. Until you, sir, detect some indication of frivolity or an attempt to waste time, I shall ask you to permit questions addressed to the minister to be answered. This is not a debate; we are seeking information on which our attitude on second reading will be based.

Mr. GILLIS: This is not a matter of great importance, because the information which hon. gentlemen are seeking has been in their hands for many weeks.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the hon. gentleman kindly tell the committee, for the benefit of those who are as ill-informed as the minister himself, just what are the totals of the subsidies, the totals of the bonuses, the totals of the remissions, and answer the questions which I have asked the minister, in connection with which he has been good enough to say that the information has not been assembled and that he will do his utmost to get for us? If the hon. gentleman who is objecting can supply this information to the committee with the accuracy that characterizes the information he vouches for here, we shall be grateful, and will wait for what the minister will give us later.

Mr. GILLIS: I said the information had been in the hands of hon. gentlemen for several weeks. They have only to read the last report of the wartime prices and trade board to get it.

Mr. MERRITT: We have read it.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. gentlemen will get in that report the information they are seeking.

Mr. MERRITT: No, not the information. What does the hon. member know about the information we desire?

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. gentlemen are just too lazy to do their own reading; they want someone else to do it for them. The hon. member for Cumberland just asked a question. I am just as much interested in these questions as my hon. friends to the right. I have had returns made to the house within the past few weeks on the coal subsidies, telling how much was paid, to whom it was paid, and why it was paid. That can all be found in Hansard. The only one that is outstanding is a separate agreement with the Dominion Coal Company. I have not that yet. All that other information is available. I happen to be Scotch and I hate to waste time. I hate to sit here and provide an opportunity for my hon. friends over there to obstruct the bill getting second reading and going into committee. That is all that is going on here. All the questions they are asking are nonsense.

Mr. HACKETT: On a question of privilege, I ask that the word "obstruction", so far as it applies to the person who had the floor when it was taken from him by the hon. gentleman who persists in standing while I am speaking to the point of order—

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member has the floor and he is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Stanstead is speaking on a question of privilege.

Mr. GILLIS: I have been waiting for you, sir, to give your decision.

The CHAIRMAN: With respect to the resolution which is before the committee, I would point out that it is my duty to endeavour to direct the committee on this resolution in accordance with the standing orders, precedents, customs of the house. It is clearly set forth that on a resolution there shall be nothing discussed but the terms of the resolution. The present resolution deals with controls. I think the only question for the committee is whether or not it is expedient to continue these controls. It would be irregular to take each order in council and go into it at this time. That can be done when the order in council appears in the bill. At the present time it is the desire of members of all parties that we get through with the resolution as soon as possible and proceed with the bill. There is a fine distinction as to what is and what is not in order when we are on a resolution. If we all endeavour to deal with the resolution with the idea of getting enough information to satisfy us that the resolution should be passed and that it is advisable to continue certain controls, then I am sure we shall get through with this stage of the proceedings soon.

Mr. HACKETT: I rise to a question of privilege and ask that the hon. gentleman be asked to retract the statement of obstruction which was directed to the person who was asking the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No; it was directed to the whole crowd, if my friend will look it up.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not understand the hon. member to refer to any particular hon. member as trying to obstruct. I understood that he thought that the continuing questioning was an obstruction.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are just trying to help the government again.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. I just heard the hon. member for Peel say that you were just trying to help the government.

Mr. GREEN: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He did not say that at all.

Mr. GRAYDON: I know that is what my hon. friend would like to have heard me say.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Again I rise to a point of order. I want that withdrawn at once.

Mr. GRAYDON: Who has the floor, I should like to know, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I have, on a point of order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think both of us should be standing at the same time.

The CHAIRMAN: I might say there was so much noise in the chamber I did not hear the remark of the hon. member for Peel.

Mr. GREEN: Neither did the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In accordance with the hearing of hon. members to my right, who heard the hon. member say distinctly that that is what I would like to have heard him say, may I say that it is a definite imputation upon me as an hon. member of this house, and I resent it. If the hon. gentleman—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for Peel thinks that he made the remark—

Mr. GRAYDON: After all, my hon. friend need not be so touchy about it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Again I resent that remark. I do not have to entertain any irreverent impertinence from the hon. member for Peel.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. GRAYDON: I cannot control what my hon. friend thinks.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You might try to control your manners in the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: I think we can leave it to the house as to who has the manners in this debate. I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, that what I said was this, and you and my hon. friends will have heard the thing clearly. I did not mention you at all, Mr. Chairman. What I said was that as usual this C.C.F. member was trying to help the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No, you did not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He did.

Mr. MACKENZIE: On a further point of order, when I made my objection to that remark my hon. friend made this remark: "that is doubtless what you would like to have heard me say."

Mr. GRAYDON: There is nothing out of order in that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I object to anyone using such irreverent language in this house and I want the remark withdrawn.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I rise to a point of order. Speaking as a Highlander I think it is most extraordinary to object to being called touchy, because I understand that Highlanders are touchy.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My hon. friend can speak for himself. As I understand it, recent affairs in Toronto have been exceedingly touchy. Mr. Chairman, I want the remark made by the hon. member for Peel with regard to me personally withdrawn, that I would like to have heard him say what I said he said, and what he said was made in regard to the hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have not been able to hear, and I am sure hon. members have not been able to hear, all that has been said. I think we have now come to a time when we should revert to the discussion of the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I want that remark withdrawn because it is a definite reflection upon me as a member of this house. It was heard by my colleagues around me, and I object to that remark standing on Hansard as a reflection on myself.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am anxious that we should get on with the discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: So am I.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre feels that the remark was offensive, and I think that under the circumstances the hon. member for Peel might withdraw it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. GRAYDON: —if you are really treating my hon. friend opposite seriously in this matter, then of course that is a different thing altogether. I made no statement that should be withdrawn; and I think most hon. members realize that I do not make statements in this house that I have to withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Every day.

Mr. GRAYDON: More than that, if I made a statement particularly referring to the hon. member for Cape Breton South, that he was helping the government again, surely there can be no objection raised to a statement of that kind. If at certain times I am referred to as helping the government, I have to take it; I do not think I can ask anybody to withdraw a statement like that, because there is nothing there to withdraw, and there is no rule in any way violated. I am amazed at the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, because if he reflects on the position he is taking, he himself will not ask for such a withdrawal; because after all I am afraid I cannot do it.

The CHAIRMAN: I think I should say to the committee that the hon. member for Peel has stated that he did not mean anything offensive.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There were two remarks, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

The CHAIRMAN: I think we must accept the statement made by the hon. member for Peel when he says that he did not intend anything offensive.

Mr. HACKETT: He says he did not say it.

The CHAIRMAN: He says he did not say anything offensive with regard to any hon. member. I think under all the circumstances we should proceed with consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, may I ask to have the record read?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: The other day you said it could not be done.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Mr. Chairman, may I get into this? I am from British Columbia and I am speaking to the point of order. I wish to make a suggestion to the hon. member for Peel, who has a man in his riding who won the M.C., D.C.M. and M.M., and we are proud of him. I suggest to the genial member for Peel that he withdraw the remark that he definitely did make. I do not know about the first one. In order to expedite matters, I am suggesting that the hon. member for Peel withdraw that remark.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Chairman, if I thought for a moment that there was anything unparliamentary in what I said, of course I would withdraw it. I may say to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre that I think on reflection he will realize that there was nothing unparliamentary in what I said. After all, in these cross fires in discussion if I were to rise and ask that the rules of parliament be applied to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, on some occasions I think the same thing would apply.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I think this is out of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GRAYDON: There must be a little good nature and a little good humour in the house, and we might drop this. After all, I should be the first one to withdraw if there was anything to withdraw, but there is not.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I rise again to a point of order. I say that my hon. friend made two statements, and I can speak very quietly about the statement that he did make. In the first place he said: "My hon. friend is, as usual, endeavouring to help the government." Whether he was referring to the hon. member for Cape Breton South or yourself is in my opinion immaterial. In regard to the second remark, when I was getting up on an interruption, I said, "You cannot make that statement," thinking honestly it was made in regard to the chairman of the committee. My hon. friend said, "That is what you would like to have heard me say." I say that is a definite reflection on me as a member of this house.

Mr. GRAYDON: What is the matter with that?

Mr. MACKENZIE: I want the record read.

Mr. GRAYDON: That cannot be a reflection on anybody.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word—

Mr. KNOWLES: As co-respondent.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not sitting very far from the hon. member from Peel and I heard everything that was said. I think that a man who makes a remark in the house should be big enough to stand behind it. This is what happened, and the record will bear it out. When I sat down the hon. member for Peel said, "Trying to help the government again." I figured that he was talking about the chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member for Peel has stated that the remark he made was not referring to the chairman at the time he made it. At the time the hon. member made the remark I did not take it that he was referring to the chair, and he has now definitely stated that he was not doing so. We must therefore accept his statement. Some other statements have been made. There has been a good deal of cross fire during this debate, considerable of it good-natured and a little bit of it otherwise. I do not think there has been anything serious. The hon. member for Peel and all hon. members have said that they had not intended to be offensive towards anyone or towards any party. It occurs to me that at this stage we should proceed with the resolution. It is possible, of course, to have the record read, but it will take some time to do that. I am in the hands of the committee. I would ask hon. members to consider if it is not in the best interests of the committee that we proceed with the resolution.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: This is more interesting than the other discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I give notice, Mr. Chairman, that at the opening of the proceedings tomorrow, I shall rise on a question of privilege and read the record as it stands, and we shall see what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. GILLIS: My name has been bandied about in this discussion, and I should like to clarify matters. I just wish to say to the hon. member for Peel that if saving the time of this house in getting the resolution passed, and getting the legislation to the point where it can be properly discussed in the best interests of the Canadian people, is helping the government, that will always be my attitude.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. KNOWLES: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that what I have to say will sound prosaic after the discussion which has taken place during the past half hour. I should like to say a word about the kind of information that the hon. member for Stanstead was seeking before we got into this wrangle. It seems to me that he is justified in asking the minister at this stage of the debate to provide us with information about the total cost of the government's price control programme. I would say that he has every right to list the various items which he feels should be included in such a total computation. But I feel that if and when that information is brought to the house by the minister, he should do his level best to give us the other side of the picture as well.

Mr. McIVOR: He does that all the time.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just a minute. The hon. member for Fort William I am sure will agree with the point that I intend to make. The other side of the picture is the question what the price control programme of the government has saved the Canadian people. After all, there is no point in having one side of it without the other.

My reason for pressing this with the Minister of Justice arises from the fact that I sought this information previously in the proper way, by placing a notice of motion on the order paper. The motion to which I refer was passed in this house on March 17, as recorded in Hansard at page 1416. I need not read the details of my motion, but it asked for two things: (a) the total cost of the government's price control programme; and (b) the amount saved by the Canadian people as a result of that programme. When the motion was passed in this house the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance stated that it would be possible to answer the (a) part of that motion but that no answer could be given to the (b) part.

Various guesses have been made on this matter. One appeared in the Toronto Daily Star some weeks ago, attributed to an unnamed government official, which went so far as to say that for every dollar spent on the price control programme the Canadian people had been saved $55. That would be quite a return. A much more modest statement was made by Mr. Donald Gordon a few days ago before a committee of this house when he said he thought the return was about ten for one. I must be fair to him and say that he added immediately that he did not want to be held to that exact figure, that it might be something less than ten. But even if it is five for one or two for one it is still a pretty good investment. My contention is that if the minister is going to meet the request of the hon. member for Stanstead, which I think is a justifiable request, he should meet mine as well, and try to get the other side of the picture. In other words I am not satisfied with the answer given to me by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance that it cannot be given, especially when Mr. Donald Gordon makes even the general sort of statement to which I have already referred. Accordingly I hope the minister will give us the complete picture with regard to this price control programme before we reach the point where we must decide as to its future course.

While I am on my feet there is another matter of a general nature about which I would like to say a few words, and in this I am pursuing a subject which was opened yesterday, at least as far as this debate is concerned, by the hon. member for Eglinton. That hon. member and I frequently clash, and probably will clash again, but in this instance we stand together and I commend him on the request he made of the minister yesterday. It had to do with old age pensions. The hon. member for Eglinton asked the minister if it would not be possible to take the old age pensions orders in council out of the legislation which this resolution forecasts, and instead bring in now the government's proposed amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act. In his reply the minister said that earlier this year it had been the feeling of the government that this could not be done before March 31, having in mind various considerations. He went on to say, however, that he did not know now of any reason why it could not be done before May 15. From that he went on to build up a basis on which the request might be denied, by saying that if you started to give priority to different measures soon there would be so many measures we could not get them all dealt with by May 15.

The general request—and I emphasize that to keep myself in order—made by the hon. member for Eglinton was that certain kinds of orders in council be not included in this bill, namely orders in council dealing with legislative matters. In reply the Minister of Justice admitted that there were only three subjects to be included in this legislation that are in the legislative field. Those three were labour relations, veterans' preference matters, and old age pensions.

Take a brief look at those three matters. Admittedly under the British North America Act labour relations come within provincial jurisdiction, and failing an amendment of the British North America Act, which I think is long overdue, one has to admit the validity of the government's claim that this requires consultation with the provinces. That is sometimes a slow process, and I shall have something to say about that when we come to that measure. Veterans' preference is a matter which we have been told is to be studied by a committee of this house. Well, if a committee has to meet and deal with it, perhaps that is a reason for some delay in that matter. But old age pensions do not fall in either of those categories. Old age pensions is a matter that can be dealt with by this parliament, a matter in which all members of this house are interested and toward which I know there is complete sympathy on the part of every member sitting in this chamber. So I feel it is not asking too much to suggest that priority be given that measure. I may say that I felt encouraged by the tone of the minister's remarks yesterday when he replied immediately to the hon. member for Eglinton, especially when he said he could not now see any reason why the matter could not be dealt with before May 15, and I am asking him when he replies to me if he will not admit that is a reasonable request, and will he not do his best as one member of the government to see to it that the proposed amendments are brought in just as soon as possible, certainly before May 15; for I am sure if the government's amendments provide an improvement in that legislation they will receive the ready approval of this house.

There is just one other point in connection with this whole matter of including old age pensions in this "ominous" bill, as my hon. friend to my right called it a few minutes ago. Does not the minister see the point I have tried to make several times, that we have reason to fear that if the amendments to the Old Age Pensions Act are not brought in now, but if instead the matter is taken care of in this omnibus bill which has a final deadline of March 31, 1948, there can be interminable delay in dealing with this matter? The minister said yesterday in reply to the hon. member for Eglinton that these old age pension orders in council would be revoked as soon as the old age pension amendments had passed through this house. I might hold him to that later on. There is always the possibility that it might not be quite that soon.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right; it might not be quite that soon.

Mr. KNOWLES: Those amendments would have to pass in the other place. I should hope that other place would approve increases in old age pensions for they have theirs. Even then we do not know what that legislation is going to be. It might still require the concurrence of the provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. KNOWLES: And that might require sittings of the legislatures in the various provinces, which might not take place until next year, which would mean that the benefit of any increases to be provided by these amendments might not reach the Canadian old age pensioners until some time in 1948. That is the reason I am afraid of this method of dealing with the matter. It provides a basis for delay, and for that reason I have been hammering away, trying to get under the skin of the government, or whatever you may call it, in the hope that the request made yesterday by the hon. member for Eglinton, which appealed to the Minister of Justice as reasonable, might be met. I would appreciate it if the minister would comment on this matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: The fear my hon. friend has expressed that legislation may require concurrent legislation by the provinces I think is far-fetched. Of course I am hampered by not being in a position to state anything about the provisions of the forthcoming old age pensions legislation. I cannot do that. But I do not think that in any previous old age pension legislation we have required legislative action by the provinces. Perhaps we have. At any rate, they have old age pension legislation now.

Mr. KNOWLES: It would probably depend upon the nature of the provincial legislation, would it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps so. But there is no idea of putting off old age pensions legislation so as to provide that it will not come into force for a year, or anything like that. The only question is whether we are to break into this emergency legislation with old age pensions legislation. As I asked before, to how many things are we going to give priority?

Mr. KNOWLES: Just this one.

Mr. ILSLEY: All right; and the hon. member would defer the budget until after this, would he not?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, he might defer everything.

Mr. KNOWLES: And I think you would get the approval of the house to do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I don't know—and take a chance on having to come back here to get another extension of time on the emergency legislation? My hon. friend would take that chance, too?

Mr. KNOWLES: To keep price control going, yes.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, we cannot be talking about this continuation of transitional measures all summer—or I hope we cannot. I hope that if we are going to continue these measures we can have them voted on and over and done with some time soon. And when we do, we can go into our regular legislation, the important measures, of which old age pensions legislation would be one. I believe that would be the proper course to take. There need not be a long debate on the continuation of these orders in council. If the house has the assurance that as soon as we can get to it old age pensions legislation will be introduced, there need not be two debates over the same subject matter. Of course I realize it is a subject concerning which many members like to make speeches. But they do not need to do so, because they can defer their discussion on old age pensions to the legislation we introduce. We believe that priority ought to be given this legislation. I do not want to have to come back here to try to have this date extended again—this date of May 15. But I fear we are going to talk so long on the resolution stage that we shall be late in having the bill brought in; and then when we get the bill in we may take so long again in a discussion of its provisions that we may crowd pretty closely that May 15 time limit. But to ask that we break into the middle with a substantive piece of legislation, the discussion of which undoubtedly would require a long time, is not fair. That would involve government policy in the matter of old age pensions, and would be of considerable importance; it is something to which we would have to give careful consideration. I said yesterday, in answer to the hon. member for Eglinton, that so far as I knew there was no reason for delay in the introduction of that legislation except that it conflicts with the emergency legislation; that is all.

The CHAIRMAN: It seems to me that the discussion which has taken place in the last five or ten minutes has not been strictly in order. If there is allowed a discussion on orders in council relating to old age pensions and whether or not they should be included in the bill to be brought down, there is no reason why there should not be a similar discussion on the other fifty-six orders in council. Some other member may think that each one of them should be the subject matter of separate legislation. A discussion was allowed yesterday afternoon on this subject, and for that reason I did not interrupt the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. But I do not think the discussion should continue on any particular order in council. What is before the committee for consideration is the question whether there should be continuation of these controls, whether it is expedient to provide legislation to continue them. If any hon. member does not think that certain controls should be included in the legislation which is to be brought down, when the bill is before the house he will have his opportunity to suggest that certain orders in council be excluded. At the present time however we should stay strictly within the terms of the resolution.

Mr. CHURCH: I shall take only a few minutes. We have seen the results of this resolution. Are we to sit here day after day, day in and day out, listening to the government trying to pacify hon. members to my left, the socialist party, the totalitarian party, and all that kind of thing? Several of them have got up and suggested that they are the same as the Labour party in England. I say that if they are, then God save Canada—when we consider what has been happening in Britain in connection with coal, electricity, power, food, and everything else.

The government of the day have at last awakened to the fact that if they are to follow the gentlemen to my left, the socialists, they are going away down deep into the sea, and they had better pause before they come to the brink—because the time is not far distant when there will be an election. They can call an election, if they want to, this year—and the sooner the better, in some ways.

We have to listen to all this kind of socialist talk. And I can tell you this, that so far as the function of the opposition in respect of this resolution is concerned, as I see it, I should have liked to see it passed on Friday night. It is not just enough to bark; to oppose is the function of an opposition. But since then a great number of extraneous matters have been brought in. Are we in the opposition going to sit here and do nothing about it? I can remember away back in March, 1939, when I asked the Minister of Justice a question along these lines. Are we going to go over the same story five or six times? That has been done here. For five or six days now we have allowed all kinds of irrelevant matters to be brought into the debate. I believe it was on April 24, 1939—it was either March or April, I am not quite sure—when I asked the former highly respected minister of justice if the War Measures Act of 1914 was still in existence. He said, "No". I said, "Yes, it is." He then looked it up, and later he found out that the War Measures Act was still in existence, that it had not been wiped off the statute books. It took a long time to declare that war at an end. That was the first matter.

I wish to stick to the text of the resolution, except to reply to one or two things which have been said. In the first place, this whole emergency measure, this War Measures Act, should have been cancelled and abrogated. The War Measures Act of 1914 has been on the statute books, with only some changes in phraseology. That is the first thing that should have been done. Then, second, I would rather see the Minister of Justice bring in separate bills for what he has left. Mind you, I sympathize with the minister at the present time, because he has a hard task to answer some of the questions which have been asked.

I am sorry the hon. member for Cape Breton South is not in his seat, because I was gonig to point out what Mr. Shinwell said. The Labour party over there has everything cut and dried. They are taking over the mines. Mr. Morrison said that nationalization of the mines would not in itself produce one extra truck of coal. And Mr. Attlee declared that the whole future of the Labour party depends upon the success of the nationalization of coal mines. Here are Herbert Morrison's words of December 1, 1946:

> Nationalization will not in itself produce one extra truck of coal.

Unfortunately the Labour government has not thought the matter out. Mr. Shinwell admitted on June 11, 1946, that the socialist party had paid little attention to the extremely difficult technical and administrative problems which nationalization involves. Notwithstanding all that, here we have gentlemen to my left trying to persuade the government of the day and the Minister of Justice to follow them on socialism. If it does, the government will get into the sea, and it had better stop before it is too late.

I believe the resolution should have been reported before this. We would then be in position to deal with the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means. We have spent five or six days on this resolution.

I would like to have the undivided attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He is always making speeches and taking time by raising points of order. He takes more time than anyone else and then he does not want to listen to anyone. I would like to have the attention of the minister for a moment or two. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does not like anyone to say anything that may affect his speeches. I am not in a hurry; I can wait, but I want the attention of the right hon. Minister of Justice. The hon. member has spent enough time over there; he should go to England and join the socialist party.

I have great admiration for the minister in many ways. In 1924 I asked the Minister of Justice a question when he got up to give an opinion on a matter concerning the Toronto Hydro Electric Commission which was before the privy council and with which I had something to do on this side of the water. The minister was asked by the head of what was then called the progressives to give an opinion, and he gave that opinion. After he had spoken I called his attention to the fact that the Minister of Justice should not do what was done last Friday night. It has been a rule since confederation that the Minister of Justice, who is the Attorney General of Canada, should not be asked to give a legal opinion. I raised this question in 1924 and his predecessor said that I was right.

When the minister was asked for an opinion he gave the opinion of his deputy, Mr. Varcoe. He is an able man, and he should be because he comes from Toronto. The minister gave the substance of the opinion of the deputy minister of justice. This particular resolution will be followed by a bill and the Attorney General of Canada may be brought into the matter. The War Measures Act was brought up in the courts across the country, and no doubt this bill will be brought up for interpretation by the courts. The courts will have to find what was the intention of the legislature when they passed this bill to be based on this resolution. There may be disputes and the Attorney General of Canada or the attorney general of the provinces may be brought into the matter by order of a judge of the high court of justice or of the county court on any action to declare the new bill ultra vires. For that reason I think it wise that the Minister of Justice, who is the Attorney General of Canada should not be asked to give an opinion to the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: What the hon. gentleman is saying is very interesting, but I should like to ask him this question: Is what any hon. member says in the house admissible as evidence before a court as to the intention of the house? I believe it is not.

Mr. CHURCH: I believe what the minister says is quite correct. But the courts can read Hansard to construe the intention of the legislature, so say the textbooks on construction of statute law. I may not have the exact words of the minister, but I do not think he gave any official opinion, but that of his deputy and others. I think it is far better that no opinion should be given at all. It only leads to the sort of debate we have had by hon. members to my left and by hon. members from our sister province.

Reference was made last Friday to decisions of the privy council. It is a blessing to this country that we have the privy council at the present time, otherwise everything connected with provincial rights would have been wiped out. It is the one court where the litigant can get justice and minorities their rights. You have only to read its decisions to know that that is the court that holds a system of checks and balances between federal and provincial rights under our federal system. It is a blessing to our country that we have that court.

When a war is on it is a different matter, but the war has been off for two years. The War Measures Act of 1914 should be repealed, as the hon. member for Lake Centre said the other night in his very able speech. The decisions referred to, including Snider and Toronto Electric Commissioners, do not relate to the war at all, and it is beyond me why the words "peace, order and good government" have been used as a basis for the resolution now before us. I would like to see the resolution reported. Silence in parliament, I take it, means that we are assenting to what has been done or to what has been said here for six days. A lot has been said here in the last five or six days. In my opinion the country is not going to stand much more of this socialism. The people in the constituencies are sick and tired of the increasing debt of this country and the over-taxation and over-government that we have. Lord Halsbury, Lord Chief Justice, once said:

> I think it is something new in the history of this house that it should be admitted that a bill is injurious and unjust, and that nevertheless your Lordships are not to protest against it.

The public is bewildered that no lead is given to them. On September 11, 1945, which I think was the third day after we met in this parliament, I objected to what had been provided for in the address. I said that in my opinion the country demanded certain measures for private industry and private enterprise and initiative. That is the key to the solution of our economic problems from Vancouver to Halifax. There should be an extension of the national policy, not only for capital but for labour, for coal and for all other industries. That should be the policy of the future as far as the government is concerned. I do not blame the hon. member for Vancouver Centre for getting sick and tired of all this business. He is supposed to be an astute politician and I know he is getting sick and tired of what he hears from that leftist corner. The people of this country want to know all about the bill. In my opinion we should change our rules and our way of doing business; for if we go on as we are doing now we shall be here all summer. I am against following the methods of socialism and destroying private enterprise and private capital and hamstringing private business as has been done in the past.

Mr. POWER: Mr. Chairman, just for my own sake at any rate, and to keep the record straight, I should like to call your attention to what you said a few moments ago, namely that there was only one question before the house, whether we were in favour of or against controls. I very respectfully wish to differ in opinion with you, Mr. Chairman.

There are fifty-seven bills before us, all in one bill. Only ten or fifteen of them, so far as I can gather, refer to controls. The rest refer to all kinds of other matters. The objection I raised earlier in this debate, and which since the debate started I have found no reason for abandoning, is to the method followed in bringing before the house fifty-seven money bills in one bill without explaining what each money bill involves, what specific or at least what readily ascertainable amount is involved. I do not believe that is the proper way in which legislation should be introduced. It may be a more convenient way, but democracy does not look to the convenience of ministers or rules but rather to the convenience and ease of the governed.

Certain suggestions have been made to the minister by the member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Eglinton, the hon. member for Vancouver South and others, to the effect that it would be possible to take about twenty-five of these orders in council out of this omnibus bill and introduce and pass them separately. The only answer I have heard from the minister is that he does not wish to give priority to these particular bills. But what would prevent him, for instance, from introducing a bill to amend the Civil Service Act to give a preference in civil service appointments to returned soldiers who served in the war of 1939-1945? I am not asking for priority for that bill. If it is not passed by May 15, I for one would be quite willing to have the order in council extend until such time as that bill could be passed. But do not get that mixed up with other things that have no connection with it. I may be all wrong, but I think it is throwing doubt in the minds of these veterans as to their right to have the same sort of treatment as the soldiers of 1914-18 received by providing for it in this kind of bill. It seems to me that everybody is agreed upon giving the veterans this preference. Therefore let us introduce a bill to amend the Civil Service Act accordingly and send it before a committee of this house, if you like, and if it is not passed by May 15 there will be no difficulty in granting an extension of these four orders in council. The same with respect to old age pensions and the same with respect to labour relations.

I have strong objections to having inserted in our statutes fifty-seven pieces of legislation in one bill, to be duplicated by other statutes. Look how ridiculous it will make us appear in the years to come. When people are looking over the statutes of this year of grace, 1947, they will see, in identical language, one piece of legislation appear as an appendix to an omnibus bill stating that the returned soldier of the war of 1939-45 will have certain preferences, and then twenty pages further on in the same statute book they will find a law to amend the Civil Service Act stating exactly, so far as one part of it is concerned, what is contained in an appendix to an earlier statute. It seems to me that it will only tend to involve people in confusion.

I should like to make reference to something else that has been said in the course of the debate. It seems to me that a debate on the resolution is perfectly proper. There is nothing out of order in it. I do not know of any rule of the house that would preclude members from discussing the financial provisions of any resolution. That is what the resolution is for. It seems to me it is going a little far to be repeatedly telling us we are out of order in discussing the financial provisions of the resolution that is before the committee.

The only precedent I know of, and I referred to it a week or so ago when I made a few remarks in the house, is the unemployment and farm relief bill of Mr. Bennett in 1931 and the Unemployment and Farm Relief Continuance Act of 1932. That bill was debated—I have not the exact dates but it looks to me as if it was debated from March 8 until the end of March or the beginning of April and then closure had to be applied to pass the resolution. At that time the debate was on the financial provisions of the resolution and the extraordinary powers being taken by the Bennett government. That was not so very long ago. It is the latest precedent of this kind of extraordinary legislation that I know of, and I can see no reason why there should be complaint if we try to discuss what should be discussed on a resolution introductory to a money bill.

I can see no reason why we should not ask the minister to withdraw from the appendix to this particular bill certain provisions and place them in a separate bill. I do not think that is out of order, with all respect, Mr. Chairman. I do not think it would be out of order to ask the minister to bring in a separate bill dealing with the regulations for the administration and distribution of naval, military and air force estates. Why put that in with timber control, or with the commodity prices stabilization fund, or with a new sugar control which is to be formed by changing the name of a corporation known as the Food Corporation or something of that kind, instead of setting up a new corporation? Surely the matter is involved enough already if we deal with only one matter, but it is rendered far more involved when we are asked to deal with forty or more bills which have nothing to do with controls or the principle of controls.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words about the position taken by the hon. member for Quebec South. As I understand it, one of his objections to this bill is that this is virtually blank cheque legislation and that the amount of the expenditures contemplated under these orders in council should be specified in the resolution. I want to point out that this resolution is not similar to the resolution to which my hon. friend referred as having been passed in 1931. The point of difference is extremely important. The resolution which related to farm and unemployment relief, and which will be found at page 4275 of Hansard of July 29, 1931, reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to confer certain powers upon the governor in council in respect to unemployment and farm relief; and for the maintenance of peace, order and good government in all parts of Canada; and to authorize the governor in council to expend for the said purposes out of the consolidated revenue fund such sums as may from time to time be necessary.

The position we took at that time was that authority to pay undefined and unlimited sums out of the consolidated revenue fund was in effect a blank cheque which should not be given to the government. The situation is entirely different if the money is to be provided out of money appropriated by parliament, as is the case in the legislation before the committee.

The other night the hon. member referred to the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. He pointed out the fact that one of these orders in council provided for the setting up of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and authorized that corporation to buy and sell goods, to import goods, and to pay subsidies on goods. He argued that when we do that the minister must certainly be in a position to come before the house and state the limits of the financial liability of the government in respect of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. The answer to that is that the limit of our financial responsibility in respect of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation is found in the estimates. The amount voted for the proposed Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation is $35 million. That is provided for in the estimates. It will be found on page 69 of the main estimates under finance, vote No. 499, "Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, $35,000,000". Just above that may be found vote No. 498, "wartime prices and trade board, administration, $6,410,000". If the amounts that were to be spent by boards operating under these orders in council were to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund without its being necessary for parliament to provide the money the hon. member's point would be perfect. It would be blank cheque legislation; it would be on all fours with the legislation we attacked in 1931. That is not the situation. As a matter of fact, the form of this resolution is the form which this house has passed repeatedly under similar conditions. For instance, when we propose to authorize the formation of any new department like the Department of Veterans Affairs, which dispersed as much as $700 million in the course of a year, we do not put any figure in the resolution. The reason we do not put any figure in the resolution is that we have to vote the money separately. When we do vote the money we have most specific resolutions. A great number of them go through with the amounts of each vote provided in these resolutions.

I have in my hand a copy of Hansard for the session of 1944, volume 2. On page 1638 may be found such resolutions as this:

> That it is expedient to provide for a Department of Veterans Affairs to replace in part the Department of Pensions and National Health and to assume the management and control of and to consolidate in such department all matters not by law assigned to any other department relating to the care, treatment, training or reestablishment of members and former members of the armed forces and other persons and all such other matters as may from time to time be assigned; and to provide further for the appointment of such officers, clerks and employees as are necessary for the proper and efficient administration of the act.

Generally speaking, that is the form of resolution which is passed when you are vesting a department, a board, a commission, or any other body, with authority to disperse money and employ officers, servants and agents. That is the reason for the form of this resolution.

The hon. member takes exception to the fact that we have combined these various orders in council dealing with disparate matters in one bill. I must say that we never would enact new legislation in this way. If there were any danger whatever that this was a precedent for bringing along new legislation and combining various subject matters in one bill and putting it in one schedule I would be alarmed. We never would do that. The schedule to this bill is a schedule of orders in council, all of which are the law now and have been the law for years, some of them for more than nine years. They are well known to people who have been interested in them. They are not new. All this legislation does is to prevent these orders in council from lapsing, while it allows everything else to lapse. That is all it does. It just prevents these from lapsing. Under these circumstances I do not think it is proper to describe it as a combination of fifty-seven different bills.

It must be borne in mind that when the house passed the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act and extended it in 1946 it gave sanction not to fifty-seven orders in council but to six or seven thousand. The house passed that legislation without hon. members having any of these orders in council before them on their desks. The orders in council were accessible to them; they could be consulted, but they were not put in a schedule to a bill. It is entirely inconsistent to swallow six or eight thousand orders in council without looking at them, by passing legislation, and then to object to passing fifty-seven orders in council which are before hon. members. That is the situation here. I thought this matter was given a great deal of consideration as to what was the proper thing to do.

I said that this had been done in Great Britain and in Australia, and I was told that it did not make any difference what they did there; that we have our own democracy and should follow our own rules. I wholly agree. I would not follow a certain course of procedure because it was followed in Great Britain, in Australia, or in the United States. But if the reasons for taking a certain course in Great Britain were sound, or for taking a certain course in the United States or Australia were sound, and the same reasons existed here, the fact that they took a certain course would raise the presumption that we were not very far wrong in taking the same course.

In Great Britain and in Australia they had the same problems before them. I have the bills before me. The name of the bill in Great Britain is the Emergency Laws Transitional Provisions Act of 1946. It has a long schedule with all kinds of regulations. They call them regulations over there. Our own orders in council are regulations by orders in council. Here are many pages of regulations dealing with all kinds of things. All this act did was to pick up what was the law of the land then by regulation and say that these that are appended to the bill shall not lapse. It is quite a different matter from initiating new legislation. They did the same thing in Australia. Provision apparently was made for amendment to them by the house.

I thought I tried to make it clear at an earlier stage of this discussion that the government is not taking power to legislate by order in council. The government has been accused of wanting power to legislate by order in council instead of legislating in the house. I made it clear, I thought, earlier in the session that by this legislation we were saying, "No longer shall we have any power whatever to make any changes in these orders in council or to pass any orders in the fields covered by these orders in council. We shall have no power to do that any longer. We shall retain the power to revoke the orders in council in whole or in part, but these orders in council are frozen." Parliament expresses its will in the matter. It places its imprimatur upon these orders in council and says, "Under that code you must operate during the remainder of the time and under no other."

I do not know whether I need to go over again the principles upon which these orders in council were selected. They are orders in council which are expected to be required for a short period of indefinite duration. I cannot put it any more briefly than that. Some of these orders in council will be revoked within a matter of weeks; some of them will be revoked within a matter of months; some of them will run the whole year; and as to some of them, we may need to come back and ask that parliament extend them further at the end of the year, depending upon what developments are. Provision will be made in the act for the presentation of an address, so that parliament can do that. But parliament will do it; it will not be the governor in council. In no sense will it be legislation by order in council. There do not seem to be any good or practical reasons why we should take orders in council which may last for only a few weeks or only a few months and pass separate bills regarding them.

My hon. friend speaks about the confusion that the reader of the statutes will have when he sees in the same statute book an act relating to veterans preference and an order in council appended to this so-called omnibus bill. The position will be perfectly clear. I think, to the reader of the statutes. Undoubtedly, when that statute takes effect, the order in council will be revoked. Perhaps the statute itself will revoke the order in council. That would make it clear beyond peradventure that there are not two acts but only one, under which the veterans preference is provided. The reason why we did not introduce a bill at the beginning of the session was that we were given to understand; or perhaps I should not say that we were given to understand, but rather that we thought, from the representations which we had received and the controversy which there had been, that this matter of veterans preference would create a great deal of discussion, and that the proper way to deal with it was to refer it to a committee. I do not know now whether that is to be done or not, but we did not think there was any reasonable prospect of that bill, if we introduced it, becoming law before March 31; and certainly it would not have, as events have proved, because so much time has been taken with other legislation such as the wheat board legislation. In that situation, where it ought to be incorporated in legislation, where you know you cannot get your legislation through before March 31, where there may be much controversy about it, and where a reasonable way of dealing with it, as we thought, was to refer it to a committee of the house, what was the sensible thing to do? Was not the sensible thing to do to continue this order in council until the legislation should be passed, at which time the order in council would be revoked?

The same or substantially the same considerations apply to the old age pensions legislation and also to the labour relations legislation. In those cases there were special reasons why we thought it was impracticable to have our legislation enacted before this emergency act lapsed, and therefore we decided that we should continue it and not let it lapse, but have our legislation introduced as soon as we could. If we break up this schedule now and introduce a number of bills, each with its first, second and third reading in this house and in the senate, it will immensely prolong our work during this session, and I do not see any reason for doing so. This case does not create a precedent for new legislation. This is a situation which arises once in a lifetime; perhaps it will never arise again. It is a situation which arises at the end of a great war, when you have many emergency orders in council, some of which must not be allowed to lapse; some of which will run for a short time and some for a longer time. In that case it appeared to us to be the practical and right course to gather them up and, if they were orders in council which would be required for a short period of indefinite duration, put them in one bill and then get rid of them by revocation from time to time as the occasion might require.

There was another class of orders altogether that we replaced by legislation, such as the wheat board orders. There was a large number of orders that we replaced by legislation, but the careful selection was made of these for the reasons I have mentioned. It is a course of procedure which parallels that taken by other peoples in other countries who were confronted with a similar problem. It is a course of procedure which economizes the time of this house in a session which promises to be very long anyway. It is not blank cheque legislation. It does not create any dangerous precedent. It affords the house an opportunity of discussing every one of these measures seriatim in committee of the whole when the bill is before the committee. In my judgment, it is a course which should receive the support of the house.

Mr. HACKETT: The minister's interesting point of view has done this, if nothing else: it has accentuated and proven to the house the first point raised by the hon. member for Quebec South. We are dealing, to quote the minister himself, with a bill the like of which has never previously been before parliament and is not likely to present itself again before this body. The point which the hon. member for Quebec South made—and one which I hope impresses itself upon the chairman as well as upon the committee—was that there is nothing unusual, nothing against the rules of the house in discussing at length a resolution of this type. The right hon. gentleman, in acknowledging that a resolution some fifteen years ago was discussed for a month in this house, and that he and the hon. gentlemen who surrounded him yielded only when closure had been imposed upon them, accentuated, I think, and endorsed the point which was made by the hon. member for Quebec South, to the effect that this is the way to elicit information necessary to the proper weighing and discussing of the bill on second reading.

So far as my observation has gone, I must say that the minister has not been impatient nor has he been unwilling to answer questions. I do not think any members on this side of the house can complain about his attitude in that regard.

As to the other points raised by the hon. member for Quebec South, I shall not deal with them; but I do ask you to recall, Mr.

Chairman, that matters very unusual in character are before the committee and information is being sought which at the moment is not available even to the ministry itself, information the committee needs in order to express an enlightened opinion upon this resolution.

I was interrupted earlier in the afternoon when I was asking the minister for information concerning certain subsidies. He was good enough to tell me where some of that information could be found, but he referred to some difficulty that might arise in putting into the form of a statement amounts paid in remissions of customs duties or excise taxes because, he said, it was possible that some of these remissions might have been enacted for one purpose and some for another. Whatever may have been the purpose, these remissions of customs duty and excise tax constitute a loss to the treasury. They are amounts that would have been available to defray the expenses of the government had it not been for their elimination, and I think the minister will agree that they enter into the total cost resulting from regulation. I am going to ask the minister if it would be possible to have a statement prepared showing the total amount of these remissions of customs duty and excise tax, and any other benefits which may have been conferred or other taxes or duties which may have been remitted, putting them into such categories as he deems fair, with such explanatory notes as he thinks would complete the information necessary for hon. gentlemen who are anxious to bring their best powers to bear upon a situation which as yet has not been fully disclosed.

The CHAIRMAN: I feel that I should make my position clear with respect to my view as to the proper procedure in regard to this resolution while it is in committee. The hon. member for Quebec South referred to the fact that I had said the purpose of the committee was to consider whether or not it was expedient to continue controls. Probably my language was not sufficiently definite, and I thank the hon. member for bringing it to my attention. I should have said the committee must decide, according to this resolution, whether it is expedient to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war, and also with respect to the other words in the resolution.

The hon. member for Stanstead suggested that I should allow full discussion on this resolution. I wish to assure him and all other hon. members that this is my view also; but I do suggest as strongly as possible that the discussion should be on the resolution, not on extraneous matters and not on the bill. When I was speaking the other day with regard to the point of order I referred to Sir Thomas Erskine May's Parliamentary Procedure, fourteenth edition, from which I read these words:

> Debate in committee on a financial resolution is confined to the terms of the resolution itself and must not be extended to the related bill.

This house has adopted a form of procedure. Briefly it is as follows. On money matters there is first a resolution. To my mind, discussion on the resolution, should be along the line of whether or not it is advisable to bring in such a resolution, instead of going into the details of what the bill will be. After the resolution is adopted, a bill is introduced and given first reading. Second reading is not given immediately; an opportunity is afforded hon. members to consider the legislation; and the following day, or some later day, when they have had that opportunity, second reading is moved in the house. At that time a full discussion of the principle is permitted. Then the bill is referred to committee, where questions may be asked as to the details of the bill.

What I am endeavouring to do is to direct the attention of the committee to the resolution, not to the bill. I realize that it is very difficult. I believe all information should be given hon. members to enable them to decide intelligently whether or not this resolution should be adopted and whether it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders, and so on. All necessary information should be given to enable hon. members to come to a conclusion as to whether it is desirable to provide for the continuation of the orders; but when we discuss the bill itself we are far from the resolution. A number of hon. members have mentioned certain regulations and suggested that they should not be included in the bill. I repeat what I said previously. If one hon. member mentions one regulation, such as old age pensions, and says that should not be in the bill, there would be no reason why another hon. member should not bring up and discuss some other regulation and say it should not be in the bill, there would be no reason why each of these fifty-seven regulations could not be discussed at this time. I submit to the committee that is not the purpose of the consideration of this resolution. I believe any discussion as to whether or not certain regulations should be in the bill should be left over until the bill itself is before the committee. If at that time the committee does not think certain regulations should be in the bill a motion can be made to have them eliminated. Nothing can be gained, as far as this resolution is concerned, by discussing these regulations now. We cannot amend the resolution in that way. A full discussion of each of these fifty-seven regulations would not allow us to amend the resolution, and it is the resolution we are considering. Therefore I feel that in the interests of the committee hon. members should remain strictly within the terms of the resolution and discuss the resolution only, not the bill.

Mr. HACKETT: I hope it is not suggested that the questions which I have asked, and which the minister has had no opportunity of answering are not within the strictest terms of the resolution. I have made no reference to regulations; I have made no reference to the bill. My questions are based upon the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not rule the hon. member's questions out of order. Indeed, I did not question them. I believe the minister said that at some time he would endeavour to get the information. He did not suggest that he would get it before the resolution carried, but that he would endeavour to get it at some time before the bill was introduced.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I believe I said earlier this afternoon that I would try to get that information for the hon. member, and I suggested that it would be impossible to get anything worth while before Monday. I said I would see if I could get as much as possible of the information for him by Monday.

Mr. KNOWLES: And an estimate on the other side, too.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, if it is possible to make that estimate. I will try to see if that can be made.

Mr. KNOWLES: Ask Donald Gordon.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister say if the supplementary estimates have been included in the cost which was considered, when he was comparing the Canadian cost of living index with that of the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the supplementary estimates do not increase the cost of goods, do they?

Mr. HACKETT: I did not know but what they might have something to do with payment for them, or with outstanding liabilities.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I understand what the hon. member means, and perhaps I do not. The cost of living index is just what the words imply. It is an index of the cost to the consumer of the goods he requires for living purposes. That is what the cost of living index is; and it should not be necessary for any hon. member to ask whether subsidies paid by the government are included in that index. The index is made up of what a buyer of goods has to pay for them.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, but whether he pays the merchant or pays in taxes does not make much difference, so long as it comes from him.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not hesitate a moment; and, as I say, I do not know why the question should be asked, or why anyone should ever hesitate to answer it. When we are giving information about what people pay for goods, we are not giving information at the same time in that statement about what they pay in taxes. Of course we are not.

Mr. SKEY: I wish to support the view taken by the hon. member for Stanstead, and to make some observations respecting the words "national emergency". I feel that I, like every other hon. member in the committee at this time, should be trying to balance two things: first, how much has the situation of emergency been caused by the policies of the government, and second, how much comes as a result of the war?

I can see exactly what the hon. member for Stanstead is seeking. He is seeking information which will permit him to weigh in the balance how much the government has paid for this policy of control it is now advocating; what is the cost to the country in subsidies, remissions of customs duties and excise taxes, and whether if we were to abandon the government's policy the resulting tremendous reduction in taxation would not be worth while.

I say in all seriousness that if hon. members wish to balance their views they are entitled to that information. I believe that probably many hon. members on the government side of the house would want to know the same thing. We are not in a position at the present time to assess the cost to Canada of the government's policies, and I believe that is why we are seeking this information.

It is perfectly easy for anyone to see—and I am sure my C.C.F. friends will agree with this—that without much trouble a cartel could be produced under the wartime prices and trade board. A price fixing agreement is made, and industry is brought in under one leadership. In turn the country may suffer from that. Therefore I contend that the committee should have this information before it. If this is the right stage at which to give it, then I hope we shall be able to have it fairly soon so that we may proceed with this discussion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Chairman, we have listened this afternoon to the discussion of a question which I believe is of great importance, namely the cost to the country of price control. As a result of propaganda that has been continued throughout the period of the war, and since, there has been embedded in the minds of the people a terrible fear of what will happen to them and to the country in the event of price controls being discontinued.

As a matter of fact, there has been propaganda—I am sure it was not intentional—which has consisted of building up a comparison between United States and Canadian costs of commodities. The result is that people are fearful of any change taking place in the whole matter of prices. I believe there has never been any fair comparison made by setting the cost of living indices of the United States and Canada alongside each other. That does not tell the picture at all. In order to have a proper picture it would be necessary to have the taxation levels of these two countries. And from information all of us have available to us it would appear that, on incomes under $3,000, the income tax in the United States is materially less than it is in Canada. In addition to that, with the exception of a number of states, in the United States they do not pay a sales tax such as we have in Canada. These are elements which must be taken into consideration.

I have the full information before me respecting our own cost of living index, as it is contained in a pamphlet entitled "Wartime Controls", issued by the wartime information board in Ottawa on September 12, 1944. This contains particulars as to how the index is made up. So far as that cost of living index is concerned today, based as it is in many instances upon commodities no longer in production—much less in consumption—the index gives a false picture in that it creates a delusion based upon the fact that non-existent goods do not rise in price. In other words, it is based on unrealities in that it is based on various commodities which are no longer being produced.

The hon. member for Stanstead raised a good point when he asked how much this subsidy system has cost the country. I have seen various estimates. According to the estimates contained in the reports of the wartime prices and trade board and the stabilization board, the total would be approximately $650 million, which would include some $54 million for administration. But those estimates do not tell the story at all, because they do not give the cost of some of the methods employed by the government, such as the suspension of customs duty, the remission of excise taxes and so on, all of which reduce the public revenue.

I should like to deal with a commodity which is in short supply, not only in Canada but in other parts of the world, a commodity which is controlled in Canada by international agreement. I intend to take sugar and the sugar control as an indication of how the picture revealed by the report of the wartime prices and trade board is not correct. On page 1505 of Hansard there appears an answer given to the hon. member for Lethbridge in connection with raw cane sugar. It is stated there that the government lost some $233,834 in a twelve months period on its operations in connection with sugar. However, a little later on it states that other revenues resulted in the sugar administration operating at a profit of $287,951. I ask the minister: What are the other revenues of the sugar administration? Has the sugar administration been permitted to run some other business? If so, what is the nature of the investment that it has made?

I go on from there to submit that, while the answer on March 19 states that there was an operating profit of $287,951 in connection with sugar, that statement does not reveal the story at all. Instead of there having been a profit, there was actually a loss of several million dollars. I am going to place certain figures before the minister in order that he may make an answer. If my computations be correct, instead of the sugar administration making an operating profit of $287,951 out of its sugar and other businesses, the loss in fact amounted to almost $7,000,000 in revenues to the people of Canada.

The figure given on page 1508 of Hansard show that the sugar administrator obtained thirty-five per cent of his 1947 supply of sugar from Cuba, Santa Domingo and other countries in connection with which there is normally a duty of $1.29 per hundredweight.

Mr. HACKETT: It is really forty per cent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It may be, but I am giving it approximately. It is estimated that 213,000 tons of sugar will be imported from the countries I have named, and normally the customs duties on that sugar would amount to $5,517,000. In other words, while the sugar administration claims that it made $287,951, it fails to show that in making that it lost $5,517,000 in customs duties.

I pass on from there to the other countries. Forty-seven per cent, or 287,000 tons, will come from other British countries, and the preference duty in these cases is twenty-nine cents per hundredweight. This represents a further loss to the country of approximately $1,665,000. In other words, as a result of sugar control there is a total of $7,182,000 lost to the revenues of this country during the current year. Subtracting what is given as the profit leaves a loss of $6,894,000, by reason of the remission or whatever you call it when customs duties are not charged. I might mention that Canada is the only country of the three countries in the sugar pool which is not collecting normal duties.

We come now to the local situation. Our domestic beet sugar production will be 222,000,000 pounds this year. If the domestic production of sugar were encouraged sufficiently to engage the full capacity of our factories there would be produced 320,000,000 pounds. We are in an international pool, but if the production of beet sugar were encouraged Canada's share would be immeasurably increased. If the other of the two large factories in Ontario were in production there would be an additional 50,000,000 pounds of sugar produced in Canada, which would make a greater supply of sugar available to Canada as well as encouraging an industry in this country.

The figures given in connection with the sugar control picture do not establish the true loss to this country. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said today that we want the whole picture, and that is what we are asking for.

Mr. KNOWLES: Both sides.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the purpose of the discussion at this time. We want to find out what the picture actually is. On the one hand, we have a statement showing the benefits of control, but that statement fails to place before the people the picture with reference to what it is costing the taxpayers to apply this control. I should like the minister to take up not only sugar but the various other commodities with respect to which duties have been remitted or withdrawn or postponed. We would then have the picture before us as to the real cost. The estimate of $650 million given in the reports of the wartime prices and trade board and the stabilization board covers merely one side of the question. It does not cover the tens, yes, hundreds of millions of dollars represented by tariffs, by excise not charged and by other matters to which reference can be made later. I ask the minister to give the committee, as I know he will, a full statement, so that for once we shall know in this country the actual position.

We hear so much about how much lower prices are in Canada than in the United States. But as a matter of fact within the past month, in the United States prices of commodities from which the ceiling has been lifted, after having risen in December and January last, and particularly in December, to a high level, receded gradually until today in most cases prices on comparative commodities are not any higher in Canada than in the United States; and if consideration were given to the difference in wage levels between the two countries and in taxes and other elements that go into the cost of living and to availability, to which I made reference earlier, the argument that we have heard so often used in the past that price control is placing us in Canada in an immeasurably better position than the people of the United States would be found not to be so applicable today. As a matter of fact, the "Letter Review of Toronto", in a very full review made in the latter part of January of prices of all commodities, clothing, food and all the things ordinarily used by the average household, as between the city of Toronto and the city of Buffalo, shows that, while there was an increase in prices in the United States when price control was removed, the increased production resulted in availability, and availability resulted in a return to more or less normalcy in the matter of prices. At the moment I am not advocating one thing more than another. I am just placing before the committee these comparative figures.

Further, Mr. Chairman, the Bank of Canada has put out various charts and graphs showing relative wage rates and commodity prices in the United States and Canada, but all these graphs that I have seen have been in respect of prices in the months of November and December, 1946. I have seen none for February or March, 1947. I would ask the minister to place before the committee on Monday, if it is possible for him to do so, a comparison showing wage rates and cost of living index as between the two countries as of today, for the graphs hitherto have been comparisons for November and December, 1946, when it is admitted that prices in the United States were high.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member refer me to the document from which he was quoting which referred to prices in Buffalo and Toronto?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I will furnish the minister with that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I gather, Mr. Chairman, that after what was said by the last speaker, the debate is now wide open, and that I can say the one or two things I wish to say.

The hon. member for Lake Centre stated that considerable propaganda was being spread in favour of price control. He said that he did not think the propaganda was being spread consciously but that the impression left by certain reports, and comparisons made in government statistics, was that price control was saving money for the people of Canada. I do not know whether propaganda has been spread either consciously or unconsciously in favour of price control, but I know definitely that there has been a great deal of propaganda against price control.

The cost of price control to the people of Canada was mentioned as being something over $600 million. But the people of Canada can only mean all the people of Canada, and if price control cost the people of Canada $600 million or whatever the actual figure was, that cost was reflected in lower prices to all the people of this country. It is just as broad as it is long. Whatever the cost may have been in taxes it was represented in the saving to the people when they purchased goods. In my opinion, there is not the slightest doubt in the world that, since price control came into effect in this country not only has it saved the people of Canada money in the cost of the things they had to buy, but because they were able to buy and because we had orderly rationing and stabilized prices we not only saved dollars and cents, but also saved in the health and strength of our people and in the orderliness of our society. These are gains that cannot be measured in dollars and cents, and there is no doubt that these gains have been made.

I imagine that the hon. member for Lake Centre is receiving letters from organizations and individuals in his constituency as I am from individuals and organizations in mine, protesting against any quick removal of price control. These letters come from responsible organizations. I am sorry I have not my file with me or I would mention their names. But propaganda is not necessary to convince the housewife of the value of price control when she goes to market and finds that, without price control, she has to pay ten, twenty or thirty per cent more than she had to pay last week for the same article when price control was in effect.

An hon. MEMBER: Fifty per cent more.

Mr. MERRITT: Why not make it eighty per cent?

Mr. MacINNIS: It might have been eighty per cent because, once you take control off the increase in the price will be whatever the traffic will bear and whatever the greed of the seller determines to make it. You can get it for a while. You can get it if there is a scarcity of goods, and when you come to the time when supply more than equals the demand artificial scarcities will be created, as they have been created in the past, in order to maintain prices.

Mr. JAQUES: It is not necessary.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know whether it is necessary or not. It would not be necessary in a properly organized society, but it is done in the cut-throat society we have today. That is what I am saying. We should be clear about what we decide here.

If price controls are removed those of us in this house will not feel it much. A family getting $6,000 a year is in the middle or high income brackets. But take the thousands and hundreds of thousands of families in Canada who are receiving $1,500 or $1,000 a year. The removal of price controls is an important factor in the lives of these people where every cent has to be counted. I know these people. They are people who have to consider whether they will take a street car or walk and save six cents. These are considerations in the lives of the common people of this country. When I hear people talking for big business which is interested in exploiting the people of Canada, and not their social welfare, I feel that there is something radically wrong with our outlook on life.

I suppose controls will go within a brief period of time, but when they do, there will be organizations and delegations, many of them, on the doorstep of the government—and I do not care who that government will be—insisting that controls be imposed in order that they may make a living. Controls will be imposed.

I read in the Ottawa Journal yesterday that report of a debate in the Ontario legislature. In that debate Mr. Acres, a Progressive Conservative member, suggested a pretty complete control over the distribution of milk. He suggested that cities and towns in the province should be divided into zones and that certain deliveries be made only in those zones. According to the same report, the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario said that although there was a scarcity of dairy products, dairy farmers of Ontario had difficulty in selling their milk. Surely there is something wrong in a society of that kind.

As controls go, and as we get back to the so-called economy of supply and demand, these conditions will be accentuated as they were accentuated in the years between 1930 and 1939.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Lake Centre made certain general references to prices in the United States. I was surprised at some of the statements he made because they are at variance with my information. I shall await with interest the document to which he referred with regard to comparative prices. My purpose in rising is simply to read into the record a dispatch from Washington dated March 26, which has been called to my attention by my colleague.

Mr. HACKETT: What paper is the minister quoting from?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Ottawa Evening Journal. The dispatch reads as follows:

> Washington, March 26—(BUP)—President Truman today expressed concern over high prices and advised business to make reductions wherever possible.
>
> Mr. Truman told a news conference he hoped prices would not continue to rise, lest a serious inflationary spiral set in.
>
> The President added that he hoped business would see the handwriting on the wall so this spiral would not take place.
>
> He pointed out that some major industries already have cut the prices on their products. He expressed the hope that other businesses would follow suit.
>
> Mr. Truman was asked to elaborate on his phrase—handwriting on the wall.
> This meant, he said, that he did not want to see a spiral in prices which would cause inflation and lead to another round of new wage demands. This process could be endless if prices continue to rise, the President said.

My information is that the hope of lower prices in the United States has been largely disappointed. I shall get the figures so that I shall not be talking generally; I hope that the hon. member for Lake Centre was not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I told the minister I would give him the document.

Mr. ILSLEY: We shall eventually get the facts of the situation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is the letter of January 19, 1947.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to give the hon. member for Vancouver South a little information which he asked me for yesterday. He asked me to state what orders in council would be replaced by legislation. The orders in council which will be replaced by legislation are the four orders in council relating to old age pensions, the order in council P.C. 1003 relating to wartime labour relations and the five orders in council relating to the civil service commission, on page 1 of the table of contents. That is the lot.

Mr. GREEN: These are the only ones?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is my intention at the present time, and I think I can say pretty positively that these are the only ones which will be replaced by legislation.

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. member for Lake Centre has made some reference to sugar. The international food council has, I believe, allotted to Canada some 504,000 tons. Is it true that the excise tax of $1 per 100 pounds has been abolished or eliminated on refined sugar?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry, I am not in a position to answer that question. The history of these excise taxes has gone out of my mind. It seems to me that there was a tax of two cents at one time and that it was divided in two. The hon. member is asking whether there is any tax at the present time. Is that the question?

Mr. HACKETT: The hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out that there has been a hidden subsidy in the form of a remission of import duty which he has figured out to amount to about $7 million per annum. I have been under the impression that there is or was an excise tax of $1 per 100 pounds on refined sugar, and that that tax has been remitted or is no longer exacted as a condition of control.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be so. I will get the information.

Mr. HACKETT: I was trying to get that information. If that be true, it means that 504,000 tons of sugar, yielding something over one billion tons of refined sugar, would yield an excise tax of something in excess of $10,000,000. So that if my information and belief be correct, there is a small item of $10,000,000 a year to be added to the $7,000,000 to which the hon. member for Lake Centre has referred. It would be of some interest to the committee to know if this excise tax amounting, as I say, to about $10,000,000 a year has been absorbed.

Mr. ILSLEY: We should not get it in our minds that when a duty or tax is removed we are thereby giving a subsidy to anybody. The hon. member has almost got into the state of mind where he believes that is the case. For instance, if we took the excise duty off sugar permanently, I would not admit that we were subsidizing the sugar users of Canada. I would say we were just taking a tax off. While I think the request for the information is legitimate—how much more would our revenue be if we had higher taxes; that is what it amounts to—I would almost be tempted to say plainly, as is the fact, that we have taken some duties off and some taxes off and thereby kept down prices to the consumer. And why not?

Mr. HACKETT: That may be the point of view of the minister, and undoubtedly it is if he says it is. This dominion will be eighty years of age if it holds together until July 1 next, and for fully three-quarters of that time the chief sources of revenue, the chief sources of money to pay the expenses of running the country were two: they were the import duties and the excise taxes. There was a blessed day when there were no income taxes, believe it or not, and when we relied almost entirely upon duties collected at the customs ports and upon taxes collected by excise officers. It is submitted that any remission of these duties and taxes means that they must be made up in other ways or by other taxes, and that where they have been remitted as a part of the system of control they constitute part of the cost of control. If the dollar a hundredweight, which was collected in excise on the refining of sugar, is not there to pay for some expenditure of the dominion, the Minister of Finance must find that dollar somewhere else. It merely means that the control has cost us that dollar, and in my point of view it is part of the cost of control just as much as a direct subsidy.

I should also like to ask the minister if any figures are available as to the cost, not only of administration of the wartime prices and trade board and the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, but of the cost of enforcement by the police, by the special agents, the cost of prosecutions in the courts and the whole range of supervisory and incidental expenses which are necessary for the enforcement of these controls.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think they are all included in the cost of administration, but I will verify that fact.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the cost of administration include the cost of prosecutions?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so, but I will verify that fact. I think all the costs are included.

Mr. HACKETT: Where would that be reflected? Would it be in the Department of Justice?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the wartime prices and trade board; the cost of administration is here. It is not small, by any means. I think it includes the cost of enforcement. There is a report here somewhere. It is in that appendix which I read, administrative expenses and miscellaneous items.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not think that includes the cost of prosecutions.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I am sorry, it does not. I will get the cost of administration. I will see whether it does not include the cost of enforcement. I think it does.

Mr. HACKETT: I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, to declare it six o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. HACKETT: No.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. GREEN: The minister is not here yet.

Mr. HACKETT: Possibly I might direct my questions to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I find him always most responsive to any questions directed to him. At the six o'clock recess the Minister of Justice had said that he thought I was possibly confused in asking for the cost of these controls, because he considered that prices were one thing and taxes were another. In my submission, the cost of living includes the cost of the commodities a person has to purchase to maintain himself; and it does not make much difference whether the initial cost is high or whether that cost is low, later to be supplemented by a subsidy paid out of taxes, the result is the same. If the ordinary laws of supply and demand were permitted to operate, the vendor of the goods would get his price at once. Now, if the purchaser gets the goods at a low price and the government supplements it by a subsidy, then it seems to me that taxes are a part of the price of these goods though it may be filtered through two or three hands on its way to the vendor.

On that basis I wish to ask the minister if all the housing being provided at present contains any contribution from the government, or whether it is all self-liquidating. I should like to know if these different projects for housing to which the government is advancing money, either to the private individuals, to the builder who is going to rent, or to a corporation organized by the government for the purpose of supplying this housing, are self-liquidating, or if in these various housing projects there is a disbursement that will not come back to the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: The housing plans of the government are remarkably free from government subsidy as compared with the housing plans of other countries, as members of this house know. For years the most extraordinary pressure has been brought to bear on the government to go into a system of state subsidies to housing. It is fair to say that these housing schemes are not wholly devoid of possible subsidy, nor have they ever been. Under the National Housing Act there was a guarantee by the government within limits against losses on loans, though I do not think the government was ever called upon to make good any of those guarantees. The housing enterprise scheme is, I think, devoid of subsidy. The interest rate may be low; I am not just sure about that, but I do not think there is any subsidy there. The wartime housing plans through the war may have had some subsidy to some extent, partly by municipalities and partly by the federal government. It is not possible to make a generalization, a comprehensive reply, without examining the present housing act and without examining in detail the schemes or plans under that act. But the proposition I stated at the outset is true, that the housing plans in Canada are remarkably free of subsidies as compared with those of other countries.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, I rise because I am rather confused. My parliamentary experience is limited to about eleven years. Yet I have never known a resolution to be debated as long as this one has been.

Mr. GREEN: Rubbish.

Mr. McIVOR: When Mr. Speaker was in the chair it was debated loud and long by hon. members. When Mr. Speaker left the chair we have had it again. My question now to the minister is: How long? I have some questions I should like to ask, but I shall not ask them at this stage. The resolution has been debated long enough. I do not want to be like the lady, and have the last word, but I do want to say that.

Mr. LOCKHART: Notwithstanding what the hon. member has just said, may I inquire of the minister if in his last remarks he referred to the municipalities having been brought in. Their contribution was, I think, mostly by way of lands and services.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. LOCKHART: Almost entirely.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then there was quite a cash outlay, I would imagine, so far as the government was concerned, because I know of instances where there was a considerable outlay in actual money. I mention that in connection with what the hon. member for Stanstead has said to the effect that if the matter were carefully scrutinized we would probably find there is a large amount involved.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not large, at all. With most of the wartime housing, the question as to whether the government make a substantial contribution or not depends upon how much they get for the houses when they sell them.

Mr. LOCKHART: For instance, in connection with staff houses, and that kind of thing, there would not be much reclaimed.

Mr. MacINNIS: Those were wartime.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am talking about wartime houses. Undoubtedly there would be losses in some sales, and there may be some contracts to sell to municipalities, under which contracts the government would take a loss. The municipality would forgo certain taxes in some instances, or collect less in taxes than they collected on other properties. There was some contribution by various governmental bodies at different levels to the wartime housing scheme. But you do not have a comprehensive system to subsidize rental housing, which we have been so urgently pressed to adopt. And my hon. friend has not a very strong point in that regard. If he is seeking to develop the argument—and I assume he is—that subsidies are coming in here and there, and that those should all be brought out in the open in order to make a complete picture, then he has not a very strong point on the housing end of it.

Mr. BENTLEY: What I have to ask the minister has a direct bearing on the matter before the committee. This afternoon, in reply to the hon. member for Lake Centre, or Stanstead, I have forgotten which, the minister quoted from the Ottawa Journal, indicating that, at times, he does place some credence in newspaper reports.

On the front page of tonight's Journal there is a brief item, two paragraphs of which are as follows:

> A timetable for full decontrol of the Canadian economy is expected to be announced shortly by the prices board.
> The coming decontrol order will contain future dates for the lifting of price ceilings from the greatest part of consumer commodities still subject to restriction.

If the report is correct, are we to understand that the government, or the wartime prices and trade board, proposes to announce to vendors of consumer goods the date ahead when prices will be lifted, and allow them to hoard between now and then those goods which are in short supply, and then take advantage of increased prices?

I gave an example of what is taking place at the present time when I referred to Kleenex, in speaking the other day in another debate. If one wants some things, he finds it almost impossible to get them, while other things that one does not require he can get in abundance.

One can go to Woolworth's or Kresge's, or any of those stores, and buy the flat connections for flatirons or toasters, by the bushel. No one wants them. Everyone has them. However they probably have a large quantity on hand, and want to sell them. But if one wants an ordinary little plug to plug into a wall socket for a lamp, he cannot buy it. Both of these articles are made of exactly the same material, and both must be made all the time. The ones one cannot get now must have been made during the war for the various military offices and for industrial establishments. They must be in existence. Why are they being held up?

If these things are in short supply, or anything from which they are made—I believe there is some metal in them—as is indicated in the newspaper article, does the government propose to tell manufacturers and sellers when they can expect a rise in price, and then take the public for another little ride, such as we have had in the last two years?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no knowledge of the newspaper report from which the hon. member read, or as to the truth of it.

Mr. BENTLEY: It is in tonight's paper. I do not know whether it is true, either.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a slight presumption there might be something in it—but only slight.

Mr. HACKETT: Do not ask what newspaper it was.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether there is anything in it or not. All I can do is to bring the hon. member's warning or representations to the attention of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BENTLEY: I am sure the minister must know whether the wartime prices and trade board proposes to commit this action, or not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not.

Mr. BENTLEY: You do not know that? That is the answer, that you really do not know?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. BENTLEY: But you agree there might be slight truth in it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, perhaps I was a little facetious. The only point I was making about the report was that newspaper reports may or may not be correct. I just do not know. I admitted there was a slight presumption that, if there was something in the newspaper, perhaps there was something in it. But it is so slight that it cannot be taken for a fact.

Mr. BENTLEY: Then I should like to express the hope that the government will not permit action of that kind in connection with goods in short supply.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not wish to ask the minister anything concerning the opinion he read to the house the other day, and his comments on the Canada Temperance Act case. I understand he has told the house that in so far as this legislation is concerned, it rests on what it has pleased the government to describe as an emergency.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: And I am not going beyond that for the present. I am now anxious to know just what constitutes the emergency. I believe our purchases from the United States exceed substantially in dollars the amount of our sales to that country, and that settlement is becoming more and more difficult for us because we have not the dollars necessary to make settlement. Through many years we used to sell goods to the United States; but never—and I am not speaking of the war years—in normal years did we sell goods in value anywhere equalling the value of goods we bought from that country. We made settlement with the proceeds of the sale of our commodities to other countries, principally to Britain. At the present time our sales to Britain are not yielding us a return which enables us to meet our obligations in the United States. I am quite aware that the Minister of Justice has escaped from the burdens of the high office which he held for many years, but I know he is familiar with the financial and fiscal situation of the country. I should like him to tell the committee if this shortage of dollars to meet our United States obligations constitutes any part of the emergency with which the government says we are confronted at the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Whether the shortage of dollars constitutes any part of the emergency relied upon?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should not like to say anything more about the emergency than what I said in my speech. I set out the nature of the emergency there and I think that is as complete as I can make it.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not wish to contradict the minister; I did not understand that he attempted to enunciate in his speech all the causes of emergency upon which he was relying. He referred to the disparity between the rise in the cost of living in the United States and in Canada since the war. I do not wish to press that point unduly, but I think any fair person is bound to admit that that example is totally without value. We were told that the rise in the cost of living in the United States had been eighteen per cent and in Canada but six per cent. Nothing was put before the committee to show what were the taxes paid by a man in the United States, earning $2,000, $3,000 or $4,000 a year with one, two, three or more children, nor was that set opposite the taxes paid by a man in Canada who was similarly situated. The minister told us quite candidly that he had not taken into consideration any subsidies, bonuses or tax and duty remissions, so I submit that in so far as that example went it was totally without value.

The minister went on to talk about housing and the disorders he anticipated were the restrictions on tenancy removed. He did not dwell extensively upon the person who might find himself accommodated by the lifting of these controls. Nobody wishes to dispossess anyone in order to leave a house vacant; decontrol would have the effect of putting someone else into the house and frequently it would be the owner who by some accident, absence at war or some other cause of that kind, is denied access to his own home and prevented from the enjoyment of that which is his own.

The minister gave some other instances in connection with prices. I do not think we can rely upon that information until we know to what extent the taxpayer in Canada pays for what he buys over and above the purchase price in the form of taxes which are given to the vendor to make up for what he loses through the control. A number of the instances which the minister gave vanished before the inquiry which has gone on while this resolution has been under consideration.

I do not think the minister was attempting to give a full list of all the causes of the emergency. Many people who are familiar with national affairs and who are deeply interested in the prosperity of the country feel that the unbalance in our trade which has resulted in a shortage of dollars to pay the obligations becoming due in the United States is a cause for grave alarm. Some consider that it is one of the most alarming questions which confront the government and the nation today. I should like the minister to say if, in his opinion, the fact that there is a shortage of dollars to pay debts that are accruing in the United States is a matter of grave concern to the government and if, in consequence, it constitutes a part of what it has pleased the government to call the emergency which is being dealt with in this legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It did not occur to me that that was part of the emergency which is the basis for this legislation. This afternoon the hon. member for Broadview pointed out the dangers of a Minister of Justice outlining too fully the exact legal grounds upon which the government relies. For instance, if we were taken into the courts on this we would define, I presume with considerable clearness, exactly the nature of the emergency being relied upon, but I do not think the House of Commons is the place to do that. I consider that the speech I made on March 20 was sufficient to indicate the emergency which would serve as a basis for this legislation and the economic controls. My considerations are set out on pages 1584 and 1585 of Hansard.

Mr. GREEN: Yesterday the minister promised to give us a list of the outstanding orders covering the equitable distribution of goods. Has he that list this evening?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I have not.

Mr. GREEN: When could we get it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I communicated with the wartime prices and trade board and asked them to read yesterday's Hansard and get as much information as was available at the earliest possible day. I have not got that yet.

Mr. GREEN: There was some other information which the minister promised this afternoon he would get on Monday. Will there be any possibility of getting that information before the bill comes up for second reading?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot tell. Hon. gentlemen are asking for a vast amount of information. I thought I would make as complete a statement as I could on Monday on the question raised by the hon. member for Stanstead. I should not think there would be much trouble in getting the orders tomorrow respecting equitable distribution.

Mr. GREEN: The bill will not be up for second reading before Monday in any event?

Mr. ILSLEY: It could come up for second reading tomorrow if we got the first reading tonight, but we would not bring it up tomorrow.

Mr. GREEN: There are five of these orders in council which deal with people of the Japanese race, and I would ask the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of Labour for some explanation about these orders. One of them is listed as under the Department of Fisheries; there are two under the Department of Labour and two under the Department of the Secretary of State. The one under the Department of Fisheries is an order in council prohibiting persons of Japanese racial origin from fishing on the Pacific coast. I should like to know whether this order is included in this bill because that restriction is to continue only until this bill expires, or whether the government has not yet decided what its permanent policy will be with regard to allowing Japanese to fish on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MITCHELL: Would my hon. friend make his question more specific? What does he want to know?

Mr. GREEN: I want to know with regard to this order in council, in fact with regard to all five of them, whether they are included in this bill because they are to continue in existence only for a period of one year, or whether it is because the government has not yet decided what its permanent policy is to be with regard to the matters covered by these orders.

First of all, as regards the order in council preventing Japanese from fishing on the Pacific coast, I would point out to the committee that for many years it has been the policy of the Canadian government that all the fishing on that coast shall be done by white British subjects and Canadian Indians. I have in my hand the annual report of the Department of Fisheries for the year 1925-26—that is twenty-two years ago—and at page 53 I find this statement under the heading "Reduction in Orientals":

> The department's policy of eliminating the oriental from the fisheries of the province—

That is the province of British Columbia.

> —with a view to placing the entire industry in the hands of white British subjects and Canadian Indians appears to be working out well as is shown by statement No. 10.

Further on, under the same heading I find this statement:

> It is the intention to continue this percentage—

Referring to the percentage of reduction of oriental licences each year.

> —each year until these industries are entirely in the hands of whites or Canadian Indians.

Those are the fishing industries on the Pacific coast. They have been in the hands of whites and Canadian Indians since the evacuation of the Japanese from the Pacific coast during the war. I want to know with regard to this order in council whether the government intends to continue that policy which has been in force for many years, or whether the policy is to be allowed to lapse with the lapsing of this omnibus bill, and then the Japanese will again be permitted to fish on the Pacific coast.

I have much the same question to ask with regard to the second order in council, which is under the Department of Labour, P.C. 946, and deals with the evacuation and relocation of persons of the Japanese race in Canada; and a similar question with regard to the next order in council, P.C. 7355, which deals with financial assistance to voluntary repatriates to Japan and for liquidation and transfer of their assets to Japan.

Then I should like to hear from the Secretary of State with regard to the other two orders relating to the Japanese. One is P.C. 1665, and is described as "Administration by the custodian of property of persons of the Japanese race"; the other is P.C. 469, "Transfer to the custodian of the property of Japanese evacuees". It seems to me that the two last orders in council are in a different category from the first three. The last two deal with the property of the Japanese in the hands of the custodian.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What were the first three orders?

Mr. GREEN: The number of the fisheries order is 251, relocation 946, financial assistance to repatriates 7355. I would ask the Secretary of State why the provisions of the last two orders in council were not included in Bill No. 22, which is "an act to continue the revised regulations respecting trading with the enemy". There may be some good reason for not including the orders in council in that bill, but I should like to know what the reason is.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What was that one?

Mr. GREEN: It is P.C. 469. I should like to know why these two orders were not included in Bill No. 22 and put in statutory form, because it will take some time to work out and complete the closing of the transactions with the property. I would like answers from the ministry on these questions.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can answer in a few simple words. The policy with respect to the relocation of the Japanese is to be continued during the life of the bill which the hon. member referred to as the omnibus bill. During that period no Japanese will be permitted to return to the protected, security areas.

Mr. GREEN: Did the minister say that no Japanese or that some Japanese will be permitted to return there?

Mr. MITCHELL: I said that no Japanese would be allowed to return there. I think the policy that we have been pursuing in the relocation of the Japanese across the dominion is in their own best interests. With respect to the return to Japan of anyone who desires to go there, that policy will be continued. Already about 4,000 have returned to Japan. I think that answers my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: No. The question I asked was whether the policy as represented by these orders in council was to continue in effect only for the life of the omnibus bill, which will be for a period of one year with the possibility of an extension for a further year; is it the final policy of the government that this restriction will apply only for the life of the bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I say at once that that certainly would be a matter for further consideration.

In reference to the question raised by the hon. member with regard to fisheries and not referred to by the Minister of Labour, may I say I can speak with exactitude in regard to the nature of the order in council. Steps have been taken to prohibit absolutely and completely fisheries along the Pacific coast, at least for a certain period. My hon. friend's problem and mine is not during the period of this legislation; it is the establishment of a certain amount of security for our people over a period of five or ten years, and the protections that this house has seen fit to take and keep for the security of our own people along the security zone of British Columbia. I think that is the worry of my hon. friend. He may feel that this may lapse possibly with the effluxion of time. When these things lapse—I am speaking only for myself as an individual—

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister had better.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Perhaps even then I can speak with greater authority than the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because I think the chances are if I want to be here that I have a far better opportunity of being on this side of the house than the hon. member who has interrupted me so unnecessarily. May I say that, even though the hon. member for Vancouver South and I disagree on many problems, we disagree with my hon. friend on this problem. This is the problem of British Columbia, and we are as one in our viewpoint with regard to future legislation. There are two great issues—

Mr. REID: There is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The pioneer behind me says that there is nothing wrong with that, because when no other voice was heard in the Commons with regard to what we look upon as a vital problem in British Columbia, the voice of the hon. member for New Westminster, now joined by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, the hon. member for Vancouver North, the hon. member for Kamloops, the hon. member for Nanaimo and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, was heard. We are all as one; we are no longer a lone band of fighting forces for the cause of British Columbia. In regard to this issue in this house we are a united body. We have to face certain difficulties—and my hon. friend knows that—in regard to our obligations and to the united nations charter, especially under sections 55 and 56. I believe these things can all be worked out satisfactorily. But there is one thing; if I know my province which I have represented now for nearly thirty years, and which my hon. friend has represented for a long time; if I know my province, which had only one lone voice in these halls for many years in regard to this oriental problem, the members from British Columbia, regardless of their political affiliations will stand as one in regard to the maintenance of these principles they have had in regard to the security of our people. It is a question of security in British Columbia. On the establishment of that security we stand together. We want to tell our good friends from the other provinces that we shall stand together upon this issue, come what may.

Mr. GREEN: The Secretary of State has not answered my question.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): In regard to the Japanese nationals who were moved from British Columbia, their assets were taken over by the custodian of enemy property under the provisions of the orders in council which are published in the schedule to the bill which will be introduced. I shall be prepared to discuss the orders in council when the bill comes up for second reading. But I may say it is not considered that these orders in council will be required beyond the period of the one year, in view of the fact that the custodian expects to have these assets distributed or returned to the Japanese before the year has expired.

Mr. KNOWLES: May I ask the Minister of Justice a question on this same subject? Will he give me the assurance—let these British Columbia gentlemen express their views if they see fit—that these orders in council are being continued so far as this legislation is concerned only for the period of this bill?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Who can tell?

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the meaning—

Mr. KNOWLES: I am not trying to put the minister on the spot.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the meaning of the expression, "so far as this legislation is concerned"?

Mr. KNOWLES: The answer is so obvious the question is hardly necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why ask it, then?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: To waste time.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member wants to pit one minister against the other.

Mr. KNOWLES: Taking all these other factors into consideration, I am interested in Canada getting back to a basis where we do not make distinctions on the basis of race.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am anxious for that.

Mr. KNOWLES: Oh? I have some pretty strong views on this matter, but I am sure my views are shared by the majority of the Liberal members of the house. I should like to be sure that in passing this particular bill we are extending these orders in council with respect to persons of the Japanese race, and that includes Canadians of Japanese origin, for one year only.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Can the hon. member not read?

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to be courteous, but the remark the hon. member for Fraser Valley has made is the answer, I think.

Mr. KNOWLES: That it is obvious. That is fine. I want that to be said to the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He is quite capable of looking after himself.

Mr. KNOWLES: He wants it extended beyond the year.

Mr. GREEN: No; the hon. member must not put words in my mouth. I was simply—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order.

Mr. GREEN: Surely I am to be allowed to speak when an hon. member raises a point against me like that. All I wanted from the ministry was the information as to whether or not this order in council expressed their permanent policy or whether there was some further policy to come afterwards. The Minister of Veterans Affairs has answered that question and I do not know why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should try to muddy the waters.

Mr. KNOWLES: I do not think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre expresses the view of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE: If he did not he would not be in this seat for two seconds. At least he has a conscience, which some day my hon. friend may discover.

Mr. KNOWLES: Then the hon. member is expressing the views of the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE: His views on the question so far have been the views of the government. If it should come about that the views on these things change the member for Vancouver Centre will no longer be a member of this government.

Mr. KNOWLES: I am glad to have that on the record.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member will never be on this side; do not worry.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice with regard to the observation he made this afternoon in connection with those particular orders in the volume which will be the subject of bills introduced later in the session. As to the bill dealing with labour relations, the Minister of Justice indicated that it would be a bill to replace order in council 1003. I wonder whether the bill will include those orders on the same subject appearing on page 6 in the volume which follows the one the minister has referred to, particularly the half dozen orders in council which deal with administration of P.C. 1003 in various provinces.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can answer that. On the 31st day of the month it will be possible to say that only the main order will be necessary. These four or five orders my hon. friend speaks of arise out of arrangements made by different provinces to suit their approach to labour relations. When this bill goes through we shall be able to eliminate these orders. Ontario takes over jurisdiction on March 31, a few days hence. On May 15 all the other provinces take back their original jurisdiction.

Mr. FLEMING: These particular orders to which I have referred will be allowed to lapse at that time?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. FLEMING: So far as I am concerned, this is my closing observation and I address it to the Minister of Justice in terms of an appeal for a reasonable procedure which will save the time of the house in the long run. I for one had looked forward to the sittings of this committee in the hope of deriving from the ministers a great deal of information which would be of considerable assistance to myself and, I believe, to other hon. members on the later stages of the bill. In view of the ruling that was made, information of a detailed nature has not been forthcoming and discussion has been confined to more general questions.

We have had it made clear during the course of this discussion, quite apart from the opening statement of the Minister of Justice, that the orders were of three kinds: regulative, administrative and legislative. A further break-down is possible. We have had a statement from the minister that there are certain of these orders which are themselves to be the subject matter of bills to be introduced at this session: the old age pensions orders, P.C. 1003 dealing with labour relations, and those dealing with veterans preference in the civil service. I am urging on the Minister of Justice that the course which ought to be taken even at this hour is a course which will lead the government to bring in separate measures. I urge him now, once this resolution is reported, to bring in the bills which they have indicated they intend to bring down at this session on these particular matters, so that at least these matters may be dealt with apart from the omnibus bill and be considered on their own merits.

The difficulty we have been up against—and it was, I think, quite apparent from the time the ruling was made in the committee confining discussion—is that there is bound to be a great deal of confusion and it is confusion which will take up the time of the house. That confusion will not be lessened by simply being told by the government, "Oh, well, you will have an opportunity of getting the information in detail in committee after second reading." It is all very well to assume that the house is just going to slur over the matter of second reading in order to get into committee again. I ask the minister in all fairness and reasonableness to ask himself how members of the opposition, who are here to do their duty as members of this house, are to be able to discern the principle of a bill of this kind, which proposes to extend the life of fifty-seven orders in council—because they have not yet been reduced in number—of three distinct kinds, and containing some orders which are to be the subject matter of bills to be introduced later this session. As the hon. member for Quebec South put it, some of the fifty-seven orders are good and some of them are not good. How can a hodge-podge like that fail to create confusion in the house and prolong debate? I urge on the Minister of Justice even at this late hour that the course of expediency is not that indicated in the resolution, namely, that one bill be introduced for this general purpose, but rather that the government ought to break this measure down into a number of bills so that there can be an orderly approach to them, both on second reading and in committee of the whole, on the part of members of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HACKETT: Oh, wait a minute.

Mr. FLEMING: I can assure hon. members in the corner yonder that they are not contributing anything to speeding up proceedings or to clarifying the confusion which has been created as a result of the course which the government has followed to date on this bill. I am appealing to the Minister of Justice on the basis of reason, on the basis of what his own leader had to say in 1931; because, with all respect to the observations made this afternoon by the Minister of Justice, I think the distinction which he sought to draw between the resolution before the house today and the one which was before the house when the present Prime Minister spoke in 1931, as reported at page 1274 of Hansard of that year, was a superficial distinction. The essence of the objections to the resolution which is now before the committee is the same as that of the criticism in 1931 by the right hon. gentleman who is his leader and other members opposite at that time. The whole point raised by the present Prime Minister, when leader of the opposition on that occasion, was that the course followed was one which was bound to create confusion, that the house would not be able to deal with these matters as it should be able to deal with them, separately, inasmuch as they were matters which were widely divergent in their nature. What would the Prime-Minister of today have said in 1931 if he had been faced with this galaxy of orders in council of all possible hues and varieties? The minister himself has indicated three varieties into which the fifty-seven are broken down; and there are other sub-varieties into which they in turn have been broken down. That is my appeal, and I make it on the basis not only that it is in keeping with the stand taken by hon. members opposite in 1931 and 1932 but that it is the course which will contribute to the most orderly procedure and will save the time of the house in the long run.

Mr. TUSTIN: I have a problem which I should like to put before the minister so that he may give it consideration before the bill is introduced. I have had a good many complaints about the eviction order under the wartime prices and trade board, not with regard to housing but with regard to commercial properties. These complaints have been particularly from men who have served five and six years overseas. In some instances these men were in business before they enlisted in the armed service. They closed up their places of business. They spent five or six years fighting for this country. They came home, and when they endeavoured to get a place in which to do business and rehabilitate themselves, they were unable to do so. In several instances, these men bought properties, but up to date they have been unable to get possession of them.

I should like to cite one particular case, that of a young man who was in business up until 1940. In that year he closed his business and enlisted in the navy, serving five years, four and a half of which were on the high seas. He came back home in the fall of 1945 and endeavoured, as I say, to rehabilitate himself. He was not able to get a suitable place. He purchased a store on the main street of the town. That store had been rented from month to month by a man who had an opportunity during the war to cash in on a first-class business. This young man, in order to get started, finally was able to lease the back part of a small warehouse at one end of the town, for which accommodation he had to pay twice the rent he is getting for his own store, which is situated in one of the best business sections of the town.

I am bringing this forward at this time, for the simple reason that I hope the minister will give it consideration and will see to it that one particular order is eliminated from the bill—which in my opinion would not cause any hardship on any person—and that at least veterans who have served this country for a number of years may be able to secure possession of their own commercial properties and get themselves back into business again. I trust that the minister will give this matter his earnest consideration, and that he will take it up with the Minister of Finance who, I am sure, will consider it with him.

Mr. C. C. I. MERRITT (Vancouver-Burrard): I think there is one field which has not been covered by the Minister of Justice in any statement he has made so far and which ought to be covered by some member of the government, since it has an important bearing on this whole question. I am very glad to see the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply in the chamber because this is a subject with which he is particularly fitted to deal.

I wish to talk for a moment about the subject of production. We have had a great deal of talk about controls, their effect in maintaining present prices and in preventing inflation, and all the other very worthy objects, and of course we are all in favour of preventing inflation. But the question of production has been giving many of us on this side of the house a great deal of concern, and before we come to consider this legislation it might be fitting for the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply to make a comprehensive statement as to the difficulties he must have found in getting production of building materials under way in view of the policies of the wartime prices and trade board. For instance, I have the statement of the Prime Minister on January 31, 1946, with which I wholly agree, when he said:

> The one satisfactory answer to the danger of inflation is more and more production.

Many of us in the house would be much more content to grant continuation of the controls for which the government is asking if we could believe that such continuation, at least under present policies, would lead to increased production and, what is more important, if we could believe that it would not lead to a decrease in production. I have here the report of the wartime prices and trade board up to February 1, 1947. I wish to refer to a few statements made in this report, because they bear closely on the question of how controls affect production.

First, I want to point out to the committee, as I have pointed out before on the question of housing, that last year the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who had just started and, I think, most energetically, to stimulate building production, stated in this house what he had to do in order to get increased production of various lines of goods. In every case he had to go against the price control policy of the government. He will remember that he had to get more bricks, and that necessitated a price increase of bricks. He will remember that, in order to bring about an increase in the capacity of plants producing plumbing fixtures and materials, he had to give those plants an incentive subsidy. He will remember that in some cases he had to guarantee a market for excess production in order to induce some manufacturers to increase their productive capacity at prevailing price levels. I could go on and on. Of course he has given double depreciation and tax relief, all in order to carry out the same good purpose. That is what concerns me tonight, and I wish to refer to some of the statements in this report of the wartime prices and trade board which bear out what I say. First, I want to refer to page 39, where the production of lumber is being dealt with. I find this paragraph:

In the course of 1946, there were a number of price adjustments applying to lumber and lumber products. They were necessitated by increased costs of production, inadequate output of certain lines, and by difficulties in distribution and grading.

There we have a direct statement of inadequate production. Again reference is made to the increase of twenty per cent made in October, 1946, in the price of red cedar shingles. I remember, as I know the minister will remember, the circumstances under which that increase was granted, after a regular outburst by the people producing those shingles which simply could not be denied. Again on page 40 I find this:

In November, 1946, ceiling prices of doors, screen doors and windows, and door and window frames were increased twenty per cent and a twenty-five per cent increase was authorized in the price of sash . . . In the previous April the timber control had made arrangements for the production of a substantial quantity of these doors which had been off the market for some time because of the low basic period prices established for them.

At this juncture I wish to point out that in every case the price advance which brought these goods back into production followed the building up of such a pressure that the wartime prices and trade board could no longer withstand it. That must inevitably be so, and I am not criticizing the officials of the wartime prices and trade board for it. I wonder for how long before the minister got on the job this holding down of production of the things which he stimulated had been going on, and how much production had been lost. If we are to continue these controls is there a policy which will see to it that any ill effect of the controls in regard to production is met before it becomes so acute and so obvious that action must be taken? If I turn to the paragraph on other construction products, on pages 40 and 41, I find exactly the same sort of statement made by the person who prepared the report. For instance, I see this paragraph:

The maximum prices of builders' hardware were also raised during the year. Some companies had discontinued the production of loss lines, while those manufacturers who had maintained production were in a position to demonstrate financial need.

Then comes this significant paragraph:

Towards the end of 1946 an additional criterion was admitted in pricing supplies which were urgently needed for the housing programme. When the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply advises that a particular building product is in critically short supply, the board is prepared to consider authorizing an increase in prices to induce additional production, even though the increases may not be warranted on the basis of over-all financial need.

In reading those words, it will be seen that the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply, who, as we all know, is an energetic man, in order to carry out the task laid upon his shoulders of stimulating the production of building material had to get in there and get production going. When he found himself blocked by the then rigid policy of the board he had to bring about a change in that policy, and it is a change that hon. members on this side of the house in this party, suggested long before the minister actually brought it into effect. It would give me much more assurance that these controls eventually would come off, and much more assurance that, while they are on, they would be doing us some good, if I could feel that the policy which was introduced by the minister of reconstruction could be carried on generally, and not only in respect of building materials.

It seems to me that there must come a time in the decontrol programme when production becomes more important than holding prices at an artificial and unrealistic level. The choice of that time may be, as the minister has said, a matter of judgment; but there is a point before complete decontrol which is certainly a matter of judgment and when production must be considered. Perhaps I might give one other example as to what can happen, one which will be within the memory of all hon. members. They will recall a time, I believe it was at the beginning of April last year, when, for about four or five days, one could not buy a pound of butter in Ottawa. Then the four-cent increase was granted, and along came the butter. That is the tendency I am warning about.

As I have said, I would feel more sure of decontrol, and the policy of the government in connection therewith, if I could feel that the policy being followed was one of making the board the conscious instrument of the production of useful goods which, as the Prime Minister has said, is the only real cure for inflationary tendencies. I might go farther and say that if I could feel that the controls were being administered so as to be the conscious instrument of their own quick destruction, then again I think we would be better off.

I want to pass on for a moment to another matter vitally connected with this whole question of production and the maintenance of controls. It is this, that you have a much better case for the maintenance of the control of prices if, in fact, you control prices. But if you are not going to maintain the price level, and if prices rise, despite the maintenance of those controls, then it is questionable whether the maintenance of the controls is in the interests of the country, or that they are serving the purpose for which they were designed, which, as I understand at the present time, is the negative principle of maintaining price levels and not the positive principle of inducing production.

Let me give an example of what I mean. The hon. member for Swift Current has already mentioned it. This evening he read from a newspaper report a rumour to the effect that prices were going to rise very shortly. I read the same thing some time ago in a Canadian Press dispatch, and it suggested that because subsidies on many articles would be coming off on March 31, and for other reasons, there would be a considerable increase in prices in the period April-May. It even went so far as to suggest that it was planned to decontrol about half the food items which are now controlled. The report to which I have referred was as specific as that.

If that is to be so, then the case the government makes for these controls becomes less and less useful. Let us not fool ourselves. If we are to maintain the machinery, and not maintain the prices, then hon. members to my left are not getting very much out of the simple maintenance of the machinery, and neither will the people of Canada.

I have referred to a report to which the hon. member for Swift Current directed the attention of the committee. I have another one, which I believe appeared in yesterday's Ottawa Journal. Apparently a delegation of property owners went to see the Minister of Finance. This is a report of what was said by Mr. W. J. LeClair, president of the Property Owners' Association. They presented their brief on rent control to the Minister of Finance, and Mr. LeClair had this to say to the press:

> Mr. Abbott made no comment, but he said he was faced with a decision on the problem very shortly, and that the brief came at an opportune time.

He said he was faced with the decision on the problem of whether or not to increase rents very shortly. Yet in the house the other day, when the hon. member for Eglinton asked the Minister of Finance that very question, and other questions of a similar nature, the minister gave no indication that very shortly he would have to make a decision as to whether or not rents would be increased.

There is one other important point. What was the significance of the resignation of Mr. Donald Gordon and of other senior officials, the picture of one of whom I saw in the paper only the other day—one who had resigned after having given good service during the war emergency? Can one believe Mr. Donald Gordon would have resigned his post had he not felt his job was over? Surely his job was that of protecting against inflation. Must he not feel that his job is virtually over?

When I was in Vancouver just before coming to Ottawa I talked to a house builder who told me it was impossible for him to enter into any contract for construction at a fixed price, because he did not know what was going to happen. This particular builder who was talking to me thought there would be decontrol on March 31, and that after that date he would be able to figure out his future business in the way he had prior to the war.

My suggestion to the government is this, that there will be a time when it will be better to make a clean break than to go on and try to ease it off, meanwhile not succeeding in your intention of releasing controls gradually.

I should like to refer to another matter which has amused me very much, and which again has to do with the question of production, and whether or not the government can justify the keeping on of controls if it is not going to make them serve the purpose for which they were intended. My hon. friends to my left have taken up a week of the time of the house, when we could have been discussing more important matters—and I do not suppose they will like my saying this to them—in trying to put over what the Minister of Justice has referred to as their social policy. The very reason we in this party say that controls endanger freedom is that, no matter what the Minister of Justice may be trying to do, we know that the members of the party to our left want to maintain these controls as an instrument of social policy, and not as an instrument of getting this country going, and of expanding its production—which, after all, is the only means of producing wealth. They want to do it to further their socialist aims.

Mr. NICHOLSON: They extended production during the war, did they not?

Mr. MERRITT: But the government might play into the hands of the party to my left, if it does not take into consideration the needs of increased production. In their anxiety to shove the government along socialist lines, they go off into rhapsodies on the evils of big business, and the fact that if you take off controls you play into the hands of big monopolies.

Mr. KNOWLES: You said it.

Mr. MERRITT: Hon. members to my left are not really an opposition at all because they are just trying to further their own doctrine. They never try to criticize the policies of the government in order to improve them. In trying to further their own policies they are, in fact, playing into the hands of big business. I want to protect them from playing into the hands of big business. I want to bring to my support some important men whose names are household words among my hon. friends to my left. I am referring to the two officials of the government whom I think they love the best, Mr. Donald Gordon and Mr. McGregor, commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act. I do not think they are helping Mr. McGregor or Mr. Gordon in their work by the way they attempt to use them to further their own socialistic aims. I should like to tell the committee what Mr. Gordon said in 1945, I believe in January, with regard to the removal of price control. This is quoted with approval by Mr. McGregor in the report of the Department of Labour for the year ending March 31, 1945. Mr. Gordon said about price controls:

> In some cases the continuance of such controls beyond the emergency would have the effect of restricting competition and production, and of strengthening the position of established businesses. I think you will agree that this would be most undesirable. To create a healthy and prosperous economy more competition and more freedom for newcomers to start up in business is needed—not less.

Then follows a sentence which I commend particularly to the Minister of Justice:

> That is one of the principal reasons why such controls have to be eliminated as soon as feasible and before the emergency is quite gone rather than after.

That was an important statement by Mr. Gordon. He gave it as his opinion that the controls should be removed before the emergency is quite gone, rather than after. Strangely enough he has said this to protect the people of this country from the monopolistic position which big corporations might be able to obtain during the period should decontrol be held off too long. I often think that if hon. members to my left paid more attention to facts, particularly to facts of production, rather than trying to change the social system and not caring what happens to the country while they are doing it, we would all be much better off.

I referred to that passage not only for the benefit of hon. members to my left, but I commend it to the government as something they should keep in mind when they are considering decontrol. What is the emergency that we are facing? How is the government to decide when we have reached a point just before the end of the emergency when they should decontrol? Above all, do not let us go on maintaining controls as a heavy weight on production while at the same time we do not succeed in keeping prices from rising continually and perhaps to not very much less heights than they would rise if there were no controls at all?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HOMUTH: It will be carried when we are ready to carry it.

Mr. MERRITT: I understand the tone of the committee and I am not surprised that they would like me to take my seat. However, I want to say to hon. members opposite who are calling "carried" now that, had they called "carried" last Thursday, a week ago tonight, when my leader said in half a paragraph of Hansard that he was prepared to see the resolution go into committee right away, my speech could have been made last Friday. Since all this delay is the direct result of an attempt by hon. members to my left to make this into a tremendous political issue without regard to the rights or wrongs of it economically, I cannot apologize to anyone in the committee for taking up time now, and I do not.

Mr. KNOWLES: We certainly seem to have bothered the Tories.

Mr. MERRITT: I do not think you bothered the Tories very much. My hon. friends to my left thought they were going to, but they have been slapped down so many times during the week that they probably wish the week had never happened. Do you want me to go on?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Certainly.

Mr. MERRITT: I had just about finished everything I wanted to say.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): Your vote is enough; we do not need your opinion.

Mr. KNOWLES: He did not vote.

Mr. MERRITT: That was a significant remark from the other side, "Your vote is enough; we do not need your opinion." Hon. members have the duty to express their opinions in this house and other hon. members have the duty to listen to the opinions expressed by hon. members who are on the other side.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Anyone from British Columbia is good; go on.

Mr. MERRITT: I wish the committee would remain silent so that I can sit down.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Order. I ask hon. members to remain quiet while the hon. member is speaking. If we want to make progress on this resolution we hshall not make it by interrupting in this way.

Mr. MERRITT: The final paragraph on page 41 of the report of the wartime prices and trade board is very important. It reads:

> While price increases may follow in the case of some of the other products released from control, they will frequently not exceed the advances which would have been necessary if price control had been continued. At the same time, producers will be free to correct anomalies in their price structures which may possibly result in some improvement in the pattern of production.

That is a significant statement and it is one which should be considered carefully by members of the government. Perhaps I have got a long way from what I was saying at the beginning of my remarks. I think it would be most helpful to members of the committee, including the hon. member who does not want my opinion, to hear that of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply on the effect of controls on construction material. I have just received from his department a pamphlet dealing with building materials and, even though he has stimulated construction considerably, in some cases he estimates that for 1947 the production of cement will be below the production in 1929. It is estimated that the production of building brick will be no less than 330,000,000 bricks below the 1929 production. It is estimated that the production of structural tile will be about 80,000 tons less than the 1929 production. It is estimated that the production of steel pipe, tubing and fittings likewise will be below the 1929 levels. It might be that if the minister's policy of giving price increases as an incentive to production were followed generally he would be able to do much better than these figures. If that policy were followed throughout the whole range of articles under control we might all benefit from the increased production, which the Prime Minister says is the only real remedy for inflation. I wonder if we might hear from the minister.

Mr. HOWE: The primary question that was asked of me was whether controls had hampered production. I can conscientiously say that since I have been associated with controls, which is from their inception, controls have never been permitted to hamper production. In fact, controls at the moment are greatly stimulating production in several important lines. In my opinion the over-all production today would not be improved by the immediate removal of controls. If the control of lumber were removed today—and lumber shows the greatest discrepancy between export and domestic prices of any commodity—I doubt if one additional tree would be cut. If the control of steel were removed, the over-all production of steel today would drop by at least twenty per cent. The reason is that under control we are able to take the surplus primary production from Sault Ste. Marie and move it to the finishing mills at Hamilton, Toronto and Montreal. We are able to bring billets from Sydney, Nova Scotia, something that is never done under ordinary conditions, and move them to Montreal and Hamilton and convert them into finished steel. Were this not possible, the over-all production of steel in this country would be at least twenty per cent less than it is at this moment.

There are certain commodities such as brick which are influenced by price. There are brickyards which are closed down and some which have been closed for years. One price will cause certain brickyards to open, and a higher price will perhaps bring into production one or two more yards. Then it becomes a question of what the public should pay for that increased production. It may be expensive. If the ordinary production at one price is three-million, is it worth a substantial price rise to bring the production to three-million-one? That is a matter of judgment.

Then we have the effect of price on diverting production from one line to another but not affecting the over-all production. Price differentials will cause a manufacturer to go into one line of production which returns a higher profit as against another line which he is equally well able to make but which shows a lower profit. Maladjustments of that kind are, of course, corrected by price adjustments. The production situation is studied carefully by the officers of the wartime prices and trade board and by the officers of my department who are associated with production. Adjustments have been and are being constantly made as we find overproduction in one side of an industry and underproduction in another side. That is particularly true of lumber, where we may find that an undue amount of rough lumber is reaching the market as against finished lumber. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has spoken of trim and finish. The reason for that increase was that we found that that particular side of the industry was falling behind in the requirements, and a price adjustment was made to stimulate that side of the industry as against the other side.

Mr. MERRITT: How long has that been going on?

Mr. HOWE: Since the beginning of price control.

Mr. MERRITT: I mean the non-production of doors?

Mr. HOWE: Doors is a case in point. The planing mills may find that another type of production is more profitable than doors and they may swing in that direction. If we find ourselves short of doors our remedy is to grant a price increase in doors and stimulate that side of the industry.

Mr. MERRITT: Was there any considerable delay between the time those circumstances arose and the time when a price increase was granted.

Mr. HOWE: Under a free market how would that be adjusted? It would be adjusted by supply and demand ordinarily, but where the demand is far in excess of supply that adjustment does not take place, and there would be further discrepancies in my opinion in a free market.

I have heard a great deal about ideologies, about the forces of freedom as against the forces of control. But it seems to me there is no principle of that kind involved in this bill. The policy of this goverment is for an orderly return to a free economy, and the bill before us is simply a measure to provide the machinery for effecting that orderly return. It seems to me that the word "freedom" is being used entirely outside its proper context. Someone, for purposes of illustration, spoke of a man falling off the deck of an ocean liner in mid-ocean. That man would have freedom of the seas, freedom to sink or swim, but still he would not be very happy. Freedom involves a certain price—how much can the community afford to pay for that freedom? In the case of lumber, if we decontrolled lumber today the cost of that to the people of British Columbia who buy in the retail market would be about $50 a thousand. It would be very fine to have a free market in lumber and no one would desire it more than myself, but that is a high price to charge the people of British Columbia for the privilege of buying in a free market in competition with the present export demand.

That is the case with many commodities. As I say, steel is today controlled, and it is being moved in an abnormal way to meet an abnormal demand, which is partly the result of Canada's inability to buy steel outside its own boundaries. That is a unique situation; it does not ordinarily apply. But that has been the situation for the past year and probably will be for another year. It is necessary for Canada to get the last ounce of production from its own facilities and to control the price, which otherwise would be a runaway price. For the first time in history, I presume, steel is selling in Canada below the price of steel in the United States. The price of steel in Hamilton, is below the price of steel in Pittsburgh.

Mr. HACKETT: That is a subsidized price, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; the movement from Algoma and Sydney is a subsidized price, but the price of production in Hamilton is not a subsidized price. Suppose we removed control from steel. Steel is the basis of all industrial costs; if the price of steel went up five dollars a ton every product that uses steel would rise in price, and one of the principal items would be a rise in the price of agricultural implements. We control steel in order to control a vast list of commodities against an abrupt change in price which would be entirely out of proportion to the cost to the government of control. That, I believe, is the desirable thing to do at this time. It is a thing we hope we shall not have to do for many months. We hope that there will be an easing of the world situation in steel; but, until that easing comes, it is very much in the best interests of the buyers of Canada to have steel control continued.

We are freeing commodities as fast as we can, and we do not always wait for them to get in easy supply. For example, cement was freed from control last summer when cement was a very tight commodity in this country. Why was that done? It was done because the production of cement is in a few hands, and we were able to get the assurance of industry that removal of control would not result in price increases; that is, we were able to get that assurance with regard to many articles even though they may continue to be scarce. Of course, articles that come into free supply can be freed immediately so that the law of supply and demand may operate.

It has been said frequently that the removal of price control would play into the hands of monopolies and great corporations; but I can tell the committee from experience that there is less price fluctuation and less taking advantage of removal of control by monopolies and big corporations than there is by a great group of smaller producers. You get a more disorderly market where you have a great number of smaller producers selling on the market than you do on a market that is controlled by a small group of producers.

A great deal has been said about aluminum in this country. I may say the price of aluminum was twenty-one cents a pound at the beginning of the war; it was fifteen cents a pound at the end of the war, and it is now 11½ cents a pound. That is not a controlled commodity. That price is established because responsible producers believe that a lower price stimulates demand and is a wholly desirable part of their merchandising.

This government is moving to a return to a free economy as rapidly as it can. It seems to be perfect nonsense to cross-examine the government on the meaning and intent of this bill. It is a simple bill; it asks that certain regulations which have been maintained in the orders be allowed to remain for a period of not longer than another year.

Mr. GREEN: No; it can be two years.

Mr. HOWE: No; it cannot be two years.

Mr. GREEN: It can.

Mr. HOWE: It cannot be two years.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not without further parliamentary action.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Justice knows better than that. He told me last night or the night before that—

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. GREEN: —the bill can be kept in effect until March 31, 1949.

Mr. ILSLEY: By further parliamentary action.

Mr. GREEN: The government will still be the government.

Mr. HOWE: This bill can be kept in force until March 31, 1948.

Mr. GREEN: And then extended a year.

Mr. HOWE: It cannot be extended a year. Another bill can be brought in.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is wrong there.

Mr. HOWE: Or addresses by both houses of parliament.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is wrong. We should like to get that cleared up.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It has been cleared up.

Mr. GREEN: That is not the answer the Minister of Justice gave me the other night.

Mr. HOWE: I happened to be here. I heard the Minister of Justice give the answer last night. I give it now and I suppose we shall be giving the same answer next week. Perhaps by that time my hon. friend will believe it.

Mr. GREEN: This is not the first time the minister of reconstruction has been completely wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: Now wait; the minister of reconstruction is not wrong. This bill expires a year from now unless extended by further parliamentary action.

Mr. GREEN: Unless extended by addresses from both houses.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is parliamentary action.

Mr. GREEN: That is in the control of the government which has a majority in the house, so that in effect the bill can be continued in force until March 31, 1949.

Mr. ILSLEY: That parliamentary action is no more within the control of the government than new legislation would be, not a particle.

Mr. MERRITT: I asked another question which was brought up first by the hon. member for Swift Current. I have referred to the statement that the Minister of Finance made about rents. It seems to me that if a lot of these subsidies are coming off on March 31 we shall inevitably be faced with a price increase in April or May, control or no control. The press, which is often accurate on this kind of thing, seems to be speculating considerably on this matter. Do not let us keep on discussing this thing on the basis that the success in keeping prices levelled off which existed during the war can go on. If, in fact, the result of the ending of the subsidies is to mean a price increase anyhow let us hear about it now and not because some president of some association or the press speculates on it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly cannot nor can any minister state what time and on what articles decontrol will take place. Our policy has been made clear; it is the policy which was reiterated by my colleague, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Our policy is to make an orderly decontrol, an orderly return to a free economy. That will take longer for some commodities than for others. With rents it may take quite a while longer than with any commodities. I cannot tell about that, and we cannot announce these things in advance. We do not know when this will take place. There are many reasons why it should not be announced in advance even if we could announce it in advance. The position of this party and of this government is clear. I think the soundness of that position is pretty well demonstrated by the fact that we have been assailed first from one side which says that we should decontrol perpetually and at once and then from the other side which says we should continue controls indefinitely. That is a very good indication of the soundness and moderation of the position we are taking.

Mr. HACKETT: One party believes in perpetual controls; whereas your party and mine do not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There is very little merit in either extreme position. The position that we are taking here is the moderate position. The trouble with the C.C.F. position is that it seems to assume that controls will be possible indefinitely under our constitution. That is not so. We have to get back to a system of decontrol whether we want to or not. The trouble with the Tory position, if I may say so, is that they talk about this being a disorderly decontrol, and the control they advocate a more orderly decontrol. They are flying in the face of the experience of the United States, and they are flying in the face of probabilities. To listen to the speeches which were made this afternoon, one would have thought that marvellous results accrued from the decontrol in the United States; that prices went up slightly and that that stimulated a vast volume of production and that that volume of production brought prices down again. That is the theory of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and the theory that some of these hon. gentlemen are putting forward. But it is pure theory. It was not fact. It was not the factual development. I heard one hon. member this afternoon talk about the dip in United States prices, and one hon. member over here was good enough to hand me the last copy of "Business Week", the issue dated March 22, 1947. On one of the early pages are to be found these prices averaged for the week: "spot commodity index, Moody's; December 31, 1931, equals 100". That is the base, par if you like. These are the figures today and for recent dates: last week, 428; that is very nearly four times as high as they were on December 31, 1931.

Mr. HACKETT: Wheat was worth twenty cents a bushel then.

Mr. ILSLEY: The preceding week, 423·2; a month ago, 396·3; a year ago 271·2; the 1941 average, 198·1.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Going down.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: You are comparing it with the depth of the depression.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not the point. I am comparing with a week ago; I am comparing it with a month ago; I am comparing it with a year ago; and I am comparing it with 1941.

Mr. HARKNESS: Will the right hon. gentleman tell us—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You cannot understand it.

Mr. ILSLEY: This theory which is held by so many members of the Conservative party, that controls can be thrown off and then there will be a great increase in production suddenly—which is not the case at all—is pure theory again. The theory that there will be an increase in production and that that, in turn, after a slight rise, will mean a drop in prices and the avoidance of inflation is completely denied by the experience of the United States.

An hon. MEMBER: Not by the way they fell.

Mr. ILSLEY: These are facts and not theories. They are so serious that the president had to call in this group and have a conference, the report of which I read from the Ottawa Journal this afternoon. I would ask hon. members to consider quite seriously what is the sensible position to take when we are talking about the extension of controls. It is not the extreme position of the hon. member for Stanstead who has inveighed against controls so vehemently in speech after speech. It is not the position of the C.C.F. which talks about our headlong decontrol and playing into the hands of the big interests, and so on, with the mistaken view apparently that we can perpetually have controls when, under our constitution, we cannot do that. Those are the extreme positions, and they are not positions which will appeal to the common sense of the people of Canada. I do not see why there should be so much delay about this resolution. I think it ought to go through and that we ought to get on with the bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SKEY: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Not again?

Mr. SKEY: The Minister of Justice has spoken about the common sense of the people of Canada. I want to say that in a great many cases the common sense of the housewife tells her that there is not much control of prices in this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman wants less, apparently.

Mr. SKEY: The minister has spoken of an orderly return to a free economy and orderly decontrol. I wish to quote to him what appears in the Globe and Mail of today's issue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Give us Dick Tracy, too.

Mr. HOWE: If the Globe and Mail stopped publishing, the Conservative party would stop; they would have nothing to talk about.

Mr. SKEY: This is the financial page.

An hon. MEMBER: That is worse.

Mr. SKEY: As a matter of fact, I am quoting the words of a staunch supporter of the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER: George McCullagh?

Mr. SKEY: No. This is the president of the Robert Simpson Company, Mr. Burton. Will anybody deny that he is a supporter of the Liberal party?

Mr. HOWE: We do not know; he has not told us.

Mr. MITCHELL: I should like to ask the hon. member a question. Will he call that the workingman's advocate?

Mr. SKEY: No. But I am answering the minister's charge that we in this party want disorderly control. This is what one of their supporters says about it, in the second column of the financial page:

Decontrol serious.

Mr. ISNOR: What is the date?

Mr. SKEY: Today's date; March 27.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SKEY: The minister quoted from the issue of March 22. This will be a little more recent.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Hon. members opposite are talking themselves out tonight. They will not have anything for tomorrow.

Mr. SKEY: Under the heading I have indicated, the quotation is as follows:

No less serious in its effect on the Canadian economy is the price decontrol policy of the government. The authorities have initiated a policy of piecemeal and so-called orderly decontrol, whereby some prices are adjusted by the prices board while others are removed from the ceiling. The policy of so-called orderly decontrol is in fact one of disorder. It distorts the situation as we change from a controlled to a buyers' market. An over-all and immediate lifting of ceilings would quickly react to the benefit of customers.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What did Mr. Stevens say about that firm?

Mr. SKEY: I think they are an excellent firm, and I admire the policy of the man who has, in seventy-five years, built up the business which is a model of merchandising in Canada.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Stevens gave it a very rough ride.

Mr. SKEY: As I say, I admire that man's policy and I admire his opinion, too.

I wish to go one step farther, Mr. Chairman. In this paper there are other comments about how disorderly the decontrol is, but I will not quote them. I shall just return to the point about production which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard brought up. Production is the thing we need today. If controls are not hampering production—and I must say the silver tongue of the minister of reconstruction was very effective when he rose just now and said that controls had never been permitted to hamper production—what we on this side of the house want to know is, what is hampering production?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Too much talk.

Mr. SKEY: Mr. Chairman, I must say that the hon. member for Fraser Valley is pretty productive, too. In this same paper this session taxes are charged as being a thing that is hampering production.

Mr. HOWE: I thought it was controls.

Mr. SKEY: Heavy corporation taxes, individual income taxes and the denial of purchasing power to the small man in the small income tax group.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not think a discussion of taxes—

Mr. SKEY: We are discussing controls.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Who pays for the controls?

The CHAIRMAN: Will hon. members kindly allow the Chairman to make a few remarks with respect to the procedure which is to be followed in this committee? I think the discussion at this time should refer directly to the resolution, and I hope that we shall not get into a discussion of taxes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I speak on the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I am again speaking from the apex of the Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the point of order?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Just a minute and I will come to it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): You are a long time in doing so.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am going to suggest that we realize that there is a large audience here from various parts of Canada. My point is, Mr. Chairman, to give hon. gentlemen opposite every break; let them talk tonight.

Mr. SKEY: I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I am not talking for the benefit of any large audience.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Have you not any delegation here at all?

Mr. SKEY: Nor am I talking for the strawberry growers, the fruit growers or anyone else. I am trying to get from this government an answer which will be for the good of Canada. I am prepared to argue that if this national emergency, which is referred to in the resolution, is not produced by controls, it is produced by taxes.

Mr. HOWE: Let us abolish both.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us abolish controls, definitely.

Mr. SKEY: The heavy taxation which has been imposed on corporations and individuals in Canada is the cause of lack of production. I have good authority for that, and with this I will sit down, having been charged by the hon. member for Fraser Valley with trying to get publicity.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I may ask a question, have we not by far the largest volume of peacetime production we have ever had in Canada?

Mr. SKEY: I can answer the minister in a moment. If we have the largest volume of production in Canadian industry it still does not seem to suit the Liberal party, because when they had their national conference their first resolution read as follows:

[The Chairman.]

That "further substantial reductions" in taxation be made as quickly as possible, to "stimulate consumption at the levels required to support high production and employment."

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Mr. Chairman, I would not have spoken, but I realize that the Tories are going to speak all night anyway, so that I might as well say a word.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: You may not enjoy it over there, but at least it may have more sense to it than what has been coming from my right. I have listened to this debate with a great deal of interest, especially to the remarks of those lawyers who have said that if controls continue they will interfere with the constitution. That bogey has already been dragged up in human society since the day of the first man; yet constitutions have been changed and they will be changed in the future. They tell the story of Thomas Carlyle—

An hon. MEMBER: Going literary?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Yes, going literary for a purpose. He was once at a banquet and observed the gentlemen attending that banquet laughing at some of the political ideas being expressed at that time. He stood it as long as he could and then said, "Gentlemen, there once was a man named Rousseau, who wrote a book called "The Social Contract." The gentlemen of that day laughed at the ideas contained in that book, but their skins went to bind the third edition." The people of this country are going to demand fair wages and a high standard of living, and if the constitution gets in the way it will be brushed aside. It is a man-made institution, and it can be changed.

An hon. MEMBER: That is revolution.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: That is revolution, my hon. friends say. I noticed that the other night the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard did not have enough sand in his craw to rise in his place and vote, because he said it might be construed as a vote for a socialist resolution. He said it was the responsibility of a member to speak in this house. It is also the responsibility of a member to vote in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, nobody is going to tell me that the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, of all people, has not sand about anything.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKERAM: Especially somebody who did not fight in the war.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member for Fraser Valley the fact that there are various types of courage. There is physical courage and there is moral courage.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to tell you he has them both, as compared with anybody over there.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: At least we have enough sand to stand on our own feet and vote for the principles in which we believe.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It is very necessary at this time that the discussion be confined strictly to the resolution, and that hon. members do not refer to previous votes in this house.

Mr. MERRITT: With all deference to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I believe I should have an opportunity of referring to what the hon. member has just said.

The CHAIRMAN: I will not deprive the hon. member of that. I hope, however, the discussion will not continue.

Mr. MERRITT: I shall be very short. I shall not say anything about what the hon. gentleman said about me, but I am glad he raised the point. I am glad to have an opportunity to explain the matter to the house once more, because the other day I did not have enough time to explain fully why I did not vote during the division on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for the house to go into committee on this resolution. That vote was forced by the members of the C.C.F. party for no purpose whatever except that they thought they could get some political advantage out of wasting the time of this house by bringing on a vote which they should have known would be resolved 100 per cent for the motion.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think probably both the hon. member for Skeena and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard have been out of order, and I would ask them to speak to the resolution. I am not going into any discussion as to why I think they are out of order, but I believe we have had enough of this discussion. Does the committee not feel that we should get back to a discussion of the resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COCKERAM: On a point of order—

Mr. MERRITT: Mr Chairman, I am not content to leave this unanswered. I want my opportunity, if necessary on a question of privilege, to answer my hon. friend, and I shall be but a moment more. I simply want to say that in the first place that vote was silly and unnecessary. I would have voted for the resolution; until it came my turn to vote I had determined to support the motion that the Speaker leave the chair. Of course I would have done so, because even the most ardent opponent of all controls would want to go into committee to discuss the matter. But when I heard the catcalls and laughter from members of the house to my left, in the C.C.F. party, and across the way on the government benches; when I even heard ministers suggesting that because we voted for a simple motion to go into committee we were voting in a different way than we had been speaking, or voting for socialism, or for something other than the resolution itself—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MERRITT: I had to come down here when the division bell rang, but I determined that I did not have to stand up and be dragooned into voting on a silly division, if hon. members were going to take it that we were voting on something other than the motion that the Speaker do leave the chair.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: On a point of order—

Mr. MERRITT: I hope I have made myself clear on that point.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has explained his position. As I said before, this evening a good deal of unparliamentary language has been used. I do not believe it should be necessary for the Chairman to rise every few minutes and call hon. members to order. I believe most hon. gentlemen know when they are using unparliamentary language, and I hope they will desist. The resolution before the committee is with respect to the expediency of introducing a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MERRITT: In conclusion, may I just say to the hon. member for Skeena that I will look after my vote if he will just look after his.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Well, Mr. Chairman, I had a friend in the old country who had a dog. He used to say, "I'll kick you if you bark, and I'll kick you if you dinna bark." It doesn't matter what you do; that is the Tory attitude.

Mr. FRASER: And you sneer all the time.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Don't strain that pipsqueak treble tone or you'll ruin it.

Mr. COCKERAM: Why didn't you put on the uniform during the war?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: You're a liar; I had it on.

Mr. COCKERAM: Yes, in the home service, or something like that; and don't say that.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Don't you tell me what to say.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I ask hon. members of the committee to assist the chairman in maintaining order, and proceed with the business of the committee. The hon. member for Skeena has the floor.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I was doing all right. It is said the C.C.F. has advocated controls for the sake of controls. Nothing comes about, even in the economic field, because people will it. It comes about through necessity. Certain conditions will come up which will force control by this country or any other country, whether it likes it or not.

For example, I have a clipping here from one of the daily papers, which refers to planning for economy, and it states that because of the absolute misery in Europe they have been forced to plan on an international basis. We here shall have to recognize, in governing ourselves, that we must trade with this country or that country on an international basis of planned economy.

I have here an article from the Montreal Standard of last Sunday called "Nature Limited." It points out what is happening to our natural resources, and deals chiefly with natural resources in the United States. But in that respect it highlights what could possibly happen here within a few years, inasmuch as United States capital is moving into this country in tremendous amounts, and exploiting our natural resources. Let us read about what is happening in the United States:

> During the war the United States mined more than five billion tons of minerals. Included in this total are over 516 million tons of iron ore—far in excess of anything produced by one nation in a similar period. As a result of this enormous drain, twenty-one United States minerals have now dwindled to the point where there is less than a 35-year peace-time supply left. Among them are petroleum, copper, lead and zinc, in the production of which the United States led the world for many years.
> W. E. Wrather, director of the United States geologic survey, recently released the following estimates for the lifetime of reserves of these metals now remaining in the United States. Copper, 13 years (based on present proved reserves and the present rate of consumption); lead, 4 years; zinc, 10 years. When these are gone, United States industry will be forced to rely on imports and her defence potential in the event of a future war would be seriously affected.

It goes on to point out that the Americans will be coming up here hunting for lead sinkers for fishing lines. They will be souvenirs in that country. In his closing paragraph, he had this to say:

> We have been lapping the cream off the earth's resources and now the cream is almost gone. If wars and waste continue, we may some day discover that the pitcher itself is dry.

In a few years, sir, we shall be forced to recognize that we have not unlimited resources, and that we will have to conserve them. We shall have to plan the development of our resources on a national scale.

Mr. LENNARD: What is the hon. member reading from?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I read it from the Montreal Standard of last week.

Mr. LENNARD: What is the date?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: It was the Sunday edition.

Mr. LENNARD: What date?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: It is the magazine section; there is no date on it.

Mr. LENNARD: That is ten years old; not this year.

Mr. COCKERAM: He is reading the funnies now.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: The government is seemingly taking great credit now for the fact that it is going in for orderly decontrol. But the fishermen on the coast do not think the government is going in for orderly decontrol. The price of halibut gear has gone up—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is that the Japanese fishermen?

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Mr. Chairman, I will put my position quite clearly on this Japanese issue right now.

An hon. MEMBER: You would lose an election on it.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: Wait a minute, now.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I feel it would be out of order to discuss the Japanese question at this time. There will be other opportunities to discuss that.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I will abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. The price of halibut gear here—

An hon. MEMBER: Stick to fish.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: —has gone up seventy-one per cent.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Tell us about the Japs.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: And the fishermen on the coast are finding out who the real Japs are.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Tell us about the Japs.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: That is what I am telling you.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. COCKERAM: He is a great supporter of the Liberal party, this fellow.

Mr. ARCHIBALD: According to the report in the Calgary Daily Herald of February 1, 1947:

> Prices and trade board officials commenting on higher cotton prices: In the case of cotton products, the subsidy has gone down nine cents a pound, which means an increase of from 17 to 20 cents a pound for cotton yarns and fabrics. Although this means a 60 per cent jump in the price of raw cotton to primary mills, retail prices of the finished products will be held to a 25 per cent increase.

Cotton is a basic material in halibut line, and it went up seventy-one per cent. But the price of fish has not gone up seventy-one per cent; it has gone down. And the fishermen are going to get caught in the vise. They do not want to be driven back to the poverty-stricken level they had during the depression. And that is the effect of this decontrol. It is precipitous. This seventy-one per cent is having its effect on those men. I want to bring to the attention of the government the fact that decontrol, as advocated by the government, is having a detrimental effect on the standard of living of the workers in this country.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Chairman, with infinite patience I have been sitting through this rather undignified performance this evening, because I wanted to ask one simple question, to see if I could get some assistance in helping the returned men of this country who are trying to establish themselves in business. I have had quite a number of cases brought to my attention, where men have set up some little business where they have got assistance, or hope to get assistance from the new act which has been passed to assist them in starting up business, only to find that they have not been able to get the required quantities of the various commodities to start business, simply because they were not in business in 1939—or possibly it was 1941.

I could give a number of instances, but I am thinking at the present time in particular of three men from the Royal Edmonton Regiment who started up a steam laundry and who, after operating for a couple of months or so, found they were unable to get their ration—if I may use that word—of soap, because they had not been in business in 1939, or 1941, in each of which years they were overseas. Is there any way in which that form of control—and I do not necessarily mean price control, but use the word in its broader sense—can be removed in order that assistance may be given to veterans who are anxious to reestablish themselves in small businesses, so that they will be able to get the commodities which will enable them to carry on whatever business they are going into.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question is one which would have to be answered by the Minister of Finance. I am sure he will be prepared to answer it when we get into committee on the bill. Commodities which are subject to equitable distribution must be very much limited in number. I would be surprised to learn that that is the situation at the present time so far as soap is concerned.

Mr. PEARKES: This happened in either December of last year or January of this year, before the house assembled.

Mr. ILSLEY: The complaint is usually about sugar.

Mr. PEARKES: I am talking about soap.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are very few commodities in connection with which that situation arises. It might very well be that if there were no controls those men could not get anything. Certainly, if they were able to get anything it would be at the expense of somebody else; somebody else would go short. In those circumstances it seemed the fairest thing to do was to make an order for what is called equitable distribution; that is, distribution on the basis of the business done at a certain period.

Mr. MacNICOL: The soldier could not do anything when he was overseas.

Mr. PEARKES: I want to put in a special plea for the men who were overseas when this deadline was set. They have returned, and the reason given is that they were not in business in 1941 and therefore cannot get allotments of the different commodities they require.

Mr. LENNARD: Following what the hon. gentleman has said, I do not know anything about sugar, but I do know there are many chaps in the district from which I come who were butchers in the army. When they came home they applied for butchers' licences, but they were refused because they had not been established butchers before they went overseas in 1940 or 1941.

Mr. COCKERAM: I listened this afternoon to the hon. member for Quebec South and, in substance, I am entirely in agreement with him. I believe the minister is doing something today which this country will not approve in the days to come. He is putting fifty-seven bills, some of which we can approve and others which we disapprove, in one bucket, and he is saying, "You will take them all or you will leave them".

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COCKERAM: That is what the minister is doing. I am one of those who believe that the future development of this country is dependent on private enterprise. The minister may be one of those who come from Nova Scotia who does not think that, but I happen to be interested in the development of the north country. I believe the minister and the Minister of National Revenue should take stock of what they are doing. If we want to do something for this country in the days that are to come we should not be confining our development to the settled areas; we should be pushing our frontiers back to the north, if necessary, right to the Arctic circle.

There are many hon. members who know that industries in their cities and towns derive a great deal of benefit from the great mining industry which has been developed in this country. In Labrador, possibly one of the greatest iron mines in the world is being developed today with Canadian capital and Canadian labour. In Quebec and Ontario, many low grade mines which had been developed have been forced to close because of the action last June of the Minister of Finance. In northwestern Ontario there is considerable new development in mining. In Manitoba you have the Snow lake area and the new Lynn lake area. That is likely to develop into another major nickel area. Then you go into Saskatchewan, Alberta and the northwest territories where you have the Yellowknife and many other mining areas being developed. These different developments are not taking place because of the good graces of this government. By means of orders in council and the manipulation of exchange this government has apparently decided that it does not want any more new mining areas in the country.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. COCKERAM: Do you think I should?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not interrupt the hon. member for York South and I think I gave him a good deal of leeway. What I am doing now is to draw the attention of the committee once again to the resolution and to the rule that the discussion in committee must be in accordance with the terms of the resolution. Is it the pleasure of the committee that I should report the resolution?

Mr. COCKERAM: No. I have a definite idea in my mind—

An hon. MEMBER: No!

An hon. MEMBER: Impossible!

An hon. MEMBER: Get it out.

Mr. COCKERAM: This industry meant much to this country during the depression. If the country should again come to a period of depression it will mean much in the future. While there may not be any special section of this resolution under which I could speak, I felt that I should say that.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not think what I have to say will infringe the rules of debate or will cause ill-will or bad temper on the part of anyone. The Minister of Justice, in language to which I take no exception, has characterized me as an extremist. I wish to say that I have been consistently against controls. I believe that during war, controls were necessary, but, when the war was over, their usefulness came to an end. I have always believed that the sooner we were rid of them, the better it would be for Canada. Approximately eighteen months have elapsed since we emerged from the war, and, roughly speaking, we still have all the controls we had when hostilities finished. I draw to the attention of the minister the fact that quite possibly he has the votes of the committee with him. But if I am an extremist I would have him know that I speak the feelings of a vast majority of the population of the province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: Prove it.

Mr. HACKETT: Just a moment. I will prove it in this way. I will ask any member for a rural riding in Quebec to stand up and say his people favour controls. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen to jeer, but where are the members from rural ridings who stand up and say that they favour these controls and that they believe an emergency exists.

The minister is entitled to his own views. As I am probably the only member from the province of Quebec who is not more or less under the influence of the whip of the party of the right hon. gentleman opposite, it is my privilege to express a view which is prevalent and, I believe, dominant in that province.

I wish to remind the minister of another fact: between the two German wars there has completely vanished from Europe the forms of parliamentary government which existed before the first German war, and most of those parliamentary governments have been dissolved by following the path that this parliament is following. First, there was control; then, there was a dictatorship, and then, parliamentary government disappeared. If I appear to be somewhat reluctant to cast in my lot with hon. gentlemen opposite it is because I cherish, revere and respect the parliamentary institutions which we have inherited and by which we have become a vigorous and important people in the world, although our numbers may be somewhat small.

I hope that the right hon. gentleman will not take amiss what I say now, even though it be somewhat personal because I can assure him that I have a great regard for the services which he rendered during a most trying period, and I hope I have a measure of his respect. But I believe that the ordeal through which he passed when he was galvanizing Canada into great financial effort, when he stood solid against a horde of influences that might have caused him to waver, has totally unsuited him in mind, in outlook and in bearing for the period of reconstruction. I believe that the right hon. gentleman is convinced that the system which he struggled so manfully to maintain during the period of the war is one which must endure, and in that, sincere though he be, I believe that he is in error and is inclined to be a little harsh in his judgments of those who do not see eye to eye with his point of view.

Mr. MARQUIS: I wish to say to the hon. member that the farmers and the working men of my constituency are ready to accept those controls which are necessary to protect them against the abuses of capitalists.

Mr. FLEMING: May I ask the hon. member if the working men and farmers to whom he refers support all fifty-seven of these orders in council?

Mr. MARQUIS: We will discuss that in due time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Minister of Justice when he expects to bring on the second reading of this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: It will not be tomorrow. We expect it will be on Monday. If there is any change in that we shall announce it tomorrow.

Mr. GREEN: Is the bill available now?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

COMPENSATION FOR DISEASE, DISABILITY OR DEATH ARISING OUT OF EMPLOYMENT

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to provide compensation to government employees who have suffered death or disability by accident arising out of or in the course of employment or by reason of an industrial disease out of or in the course of employment and to the dependents of such employees; such compensation and costs as may be awarded and the costs of administration to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund. With provision also empowering the Minister of Finance to require employers to pay the compensation awarded their employees together with expenses of administration.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister not going to make a statement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, the principle contained in this resolution is to recognize and extend the principle of compensation. The Government Employees Compensation Act enacted in 1918 provides for compensation to those who are injured or whose death may be caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of their employment. That act is known as chapter 30 of the revised statutes of 1927, as amended by chapter 9 of the statutes of 1931. The principle recognized therein is one which has been asserted over the years. This resolution is the forerunner of a bill which will extend the principle materially. The compensation which will be provided is that which is already provided under provincial legislation for persons other than employees in the service of His Majesty under the law of the province in which the accident occurs.

The liability and the amount of compensation are also provided under that legislation. Since 1922 compensation for the employees of His Majesty has been in the hands of and administered by the Department of Transport. Claims arising from accidents or otherwise are handled differently according to the provinces. I think it is safe to say that in all provinces except Quebec the application is made directly to the workmen's compensation board of the province in which the accident or death occurred. The Department of Transport, by agreement with the provincial boards, is able to deal with the accidents through the boards and to grant compensation in accordance with the schedule of tariffs set out in the provincial acts.

In Quebec the procedure is somewhat different, in that the department deals directly with the individuals, except in cases which I shall mention when we come to the bill.

The resolution extends the principle of compensation, in that it would include disabilities and deaths arising from industrial diseases.

The resolution's main features may be summarized under the following heads: (1) it continues the Government Employees Compensation Act as it now stands; (2) it provides compensation in cases of disablement by industrial disease, as I said a moment ago, according to the law of the province in which such disease is contracted; (3) it empowers the governor in council to declare employees of government companies, corporations, boards or agencies to be employees subject to the act; (4) it provides compensation for employees residing in the northwest territories in accordance with the law or ordnance of the Yukon territory; (5) it provides compensation for employees ordinarily resident in a province who are injured or disabled while performing the work in the Yukon territory or northwest territories, according to the law of the province where such employee is ordinarily resident; (6) it provides compensation for employees who are injured or disabled while employed outside Canada; (7) it empowers the governor in council to make regulations providing compensation for employees who contract pulmonary tuberculosis in government hospitals. There are several extensions of the principle of compensation as outlined in the original act, and I shall be glad to discuss them in greater detail when the bill is before the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had something to do with the first compensation act, which, I believe, was enacted in Ontario, because I have always been a firm believer that workmen should have the utmost compensation when injured in the work in which they are engaged.

I have some memory of what we have passed in this house before. I can understand why the government would pass a Workmen's Compensation Act pertaining to the northwest territories. The minister also included "outside Canada", presumably where our men are working. There is probably some good reason for that; but I was always under the impression that workmen were adequately protected under the present compensation acts of the provinces.

So far as Ontario is concerned, it has a number one workmen's compensation act. I am not 100 per cent satisfied with the details of the administration of it. The act is a first-class one, and I shall explain in a moment why I am not satisfied with the administration of it.

If the government passes an act along the lines indicated by the minister it will have to set up some considerable staff. The administration of the northwest territories will take—

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not a larger staff than now exists.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the provinces the workmen's compensation administration have on their staff experts all along the line. The minister mentioned industrial diseases. If this new legislation is to consider industrial diseases I presume that it will be something new in the northwest territories. They have not been long enough in the mining business in that section of the country, and certainly not in the manufacturing business, to have had much experience in industrial diseases. Thus the department will require a staff of experts competent to decide what particular industrial disease has caused the sickness or death of an employee. That will mean a large increase in staff.

What I am worrying about at the moment —and I am not finding any fault with it—is that we are to set up another big department.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt the hon. member. Perhaps I should have covered this when I made the original statement. The Ontario act and the provincial acts do not cover government employees. It has been the policy in the past to use the service of provincial boards. That is what will be done in this case except in one or two instances which may be mentioned when the bill is up for discussion. Generally, I think I am safe in saying that it will not mean an increase in staff. It may be that, because of government regulations which will have to be enacted to cover pulmonary tuberculosis, one or two more may be needed, but certainly nothing in the nature of what my hon. friend has in mind. I can assure him of that.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a good explanation. I want the minister to believe that I am in support of the bill. I am just seeking the widest information that I can get.

The minister particularly mentioned industrial diseases. That is something with which I am familiar because of my many years' connection with a large industry. I have seen many men lose their lives as a result of industrial diseases, and that is what I had in mind a few moments ago when I said I was not 100 per cent satisfied with the operation of the Ontario act in that regard. I may say that many many cases have come to my attention in the last twenty-five years, cases of employees of industry who lost their lives because of industrial diseases.

I had one case brought to my attention not so long ago, that of a man whom I knew. He was a moulder in a plant. It is not necessary to mention the name of the city or to specify the plant. He contracted a disease which caused his death. I am certain that he contracted the disease because he worked under a skylight which was unprotected. There was no glass covering between him and the skylight. In due course he died. In spite of anything I could do to obtain compensation for his wife—I was certain he died through a disease contracted from the unprotected skylight—I could make no impression on the board because they stated they had to take the decision of the medical staff. I hope that in the bill which the minister is going to bring in, under such circumstances, if a workman in any plant over which the government has control contracts an industrial disease and the medical staff say that the disease was not contracted through his employment, he or his family will have an appeal from the medical staff. If the minister has not that in his bill, then I hope, when the bill is brought down and I bring the question up again, he will be able to assure me that the workmen will have an appeal from the medical staff. I do not think for one moment that the medical staff of any compensation board should have the last word on whether a workman has come to his death through disease contracted in a plant, if they say he has not. Doctors know a great deal, I admit, but there are some industrial diseases they do not know to the extent of 100 per cent, in any event.

I myself worked in industry for approximately a quarter of a century and, as I said a few moments ago, know of many men dying from having contracted industrial diseases. They died from that cause, in spite of what the medical staff of the compensation board said. If I were in the Ontario house or had any connection whatever with the workmen's compensation board in Ontario, I would do my best to have the Workmen's Compensation Board Act amended to such an extent that the report of the medical staff in reference to an industrial disease would not be final until the workman or his family was allowed to appeal to a judge or a court. I would take the decision of the judge more readily than I would take the decision of the medical branch of the compensation board. I hope that when the minister brings his bill in he will, having in mind what I have said, be able to assure me in any event that a workman in any government plant, or a miner, in the Northwest Territories, who contracts an industrial disease, will have a court of appeal above the medical staff of the board.

I do not know that I have much more to say about the matter tonight. I am not opposing introduction of the bill. I shall be prepared to discuss it when it does come in, and its various clauses. I have no doubt that I shall be in a position to support the bill very generally. The reference I have just made to the medical branches of compensation boards is a result of many contacts with them in contests for compensation to families of men who, I knew, died from an industrial disease. I hope that there will be some provision in this bill to give the workman an appeal above the medical branch of a board.

Mr. ISNOR: There is just one question I desire to ask the minister before the resolution is carried, and it arises out of the wording of the resolution where it says "employees who have suffered." Does that mean that it is retroactive and will take into consideration employees' cases which are now being considered?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. That is covered by a section in the bill which will protect any cases which are now pending.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister mentioned two compensation acts, the act of 1918, I think, and the act of 1931. Is this a bill amending those acts, or is it a complete bill in itself?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is a completely new bill repealing the old acts and extending the principles contained therein.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Chevrier thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 105, respecting compensation for government employees.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE: Tomorrow the Minister of Finance will ask for interim supply, as he has already informed the leaders of the various parties and groups in the house, and also ask that we deal with further supplementary estimates for 1946-47, which amount to approximately $55,000,000. Then we shall continue with the discussion of the bill in the name of the Minister of Transport; then second reading of Bill No. 26, also in the name of the Minister of Transport; then there is a bill in the name of the Secretary of State in regard to trading with the enemy. I think that will probably be sufficient.

Mr. MacINNIS: In what order will they be taken?

Mr. MACKENZIE: As far as possible in the order I have mentioned.

Mr. GREEN: Will the house be sitting tomorrow night?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. On account of certain obligations elsewhere, I understand that the house will not sit tomorrow night.

Mr. MacINNIS: What are the particular reasons why the house is not to sit tomorrow night? It seems to me that we have all the time in the world, judging from the way we are carrying on.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 28, 1947

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Third and fourth reports of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Cleaver.

First report of special committee on Dominion Elections Act, 1938.—Mr. Cote (Verdun).

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): On behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) I desire to move, seconded by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe):

That Mr. William Henry Golding be appointed as deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

The essential reason for this motion is one of procedure. If the records of 1938 are referred to, all the precedents will be found. Section 3 of the Speaker of the House of Commons Act provides that whenever the house is informed by the Clerk at the table of the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, the chairman of committees shall take the chair and exercise the authority of the Speaker for twenty-four hours. It follows from this that the Speaker only, or the Deputy Speaker if the Speaker is unavoidably absent, can open the sittings of the house. If they were both absent at three o'clock the sittings of the house could not be opened.

In order to avoid such an occurrence the house added in 1939 the following provision as section 5 of standing order 56:

At the commencement of every session, or from time to time as necessity may arise, the house may appoint a deputy chairman of committees who shall, whenever the chairman of committees is absent, be entitled to exercise all the powers vested in the chairman of committees including his powers as Deputy Speaker during Mr. Speaker's unavoidable absence.

After this new standing order was passed the leader of the house moved that a certain hon. gentleman be appointed. I understand that Your Honour has consulted with the leaders of the various parties and groups in the house.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I am delighted that this motion has been sponsored by the right hon. gentleman. On two occasions I had the honour of visiting the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding) and his constituents. He is one of the worthiest members of the House of Commons. He is a wise man; he is a good Liberal; he is a true Liberal; he is broadminded; he is devoted to his duty; he has judgment and tact; he has determination. He acquired these attributes because of his long experience in the municipal life of his community, first as councillor and then as alderman. I am delighted that the merits of the hon. gentleman are being recognized. He is the chairman of the Liberal caucus—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: —and he deserves everything he is getting. When a member of parliament shows judgment as the chairman of a party caucus he is eligible for any good post.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I want to pay my tribute to my good friend the hon. member for Huron-Perth, but I speak of him from an entirely different point of view, as a workman. He has been a workman for many years. He was trained in foundry and machine shop practice in an old pioneer company in his town which I myself knew of for many years. I take this as a tribute to the working class—I mean the sensible working class, men like the hon. member, men who work, not just talk. All the time he has been in the house he has demonstrated that he possesses good old fashioned common sense and I congratulate him.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think I should say to the house that it is at the suggestion of His Honour the Speaker that the government is making this provision for a deputy chairman of committees for the purposes mentioned a moment ago by my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie). When I spoke to the hon. member for Huron-Perth about accepting the position, it was pointed out to him that we had had a similar post some years ago. That position was filled by an hon. member of this house and an additional remuneration of $1,000 was attached to the position. The hon. member for Huron-Perth told me that he would be very happy to render any service he could to the Commons, but he felt that he did not wish to be remunerated for anything in the way of extra service that this position might involve. I just want to add my word of thanks and appreciation to the hon. member for accepting these duties in so patriotic a manner.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, there are few men in the House of Commons with whom I have been more closely associated in a personal way than the new appointee of the government to whom reference has been made this afternoon. I hope that by now he is no longer infringing upon constitutional amenities and that his resignation so far as the Liberal caucus is concerned will be taken care of before he continues with our work.

I should like to add my word of congratulation to the hon. member. He has always been most fair with me in the House of Commons. He has assumed a great load in carrying on his duties, and I suppose he has been in the chair more often than most private members; at least my experience in the house would so indicate. May I conclude by saying that his generosity and the sacrifice he is making in rendering this additional national service is something for which he should be commended most heartily by all sides of the house. If after leaving the chairmanship of the Liberal caucus he continues to carry out his new duties as he has in the past, we will welcome him with open arms.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have asked my leader, who usually speaks on occasions of this kind, to be permitted the honour of congratulating the hon. member for Huron-Perth upon his elevation to the position indicated in the motion. I have known the hon. member since shortly after I came here for the first time, and our friendship has increased with the years. It is not very often that I find myself in complete agreement with the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), but I do want to say that I agree with everything the hon. member has said, and this goes for all the members of this group.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it would be wise to multiply words. I simply wish to say that we all agree with all that has been said with respect to the hon. member for Huron-Perth, and we will support the motion.

Mr. R. M. WARREN (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, I think if there is any member who has a right to say a word on behalf of the hon. member for Huron-Perth it should be the member for Renfrew North. The hon. member was my room-mate for many years, and you cannot live with a man for that long without getting pretty well acquainted with him. Some time ago I took it on myself to write an article outlining his history and sent it to the local papers. It was a fine story. I doubt if you could find a more hardworking member of parliament, a more honest type of citizen or a better citizen than will be found in the person of the hon. member for Huron-Perth.

Motion agreed to.

EMERGENCY POWERS

ORDERS IN COUNCIL TABLED

Hon. JOSEPH JEAN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the other day the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) told the house that when the emergency powers bill was introduced he would lay on the table copies of the orders in council and the amending orders as they appear in the schedule to the bill. Office consolidations of these orders have already been circulated but hon. members will notice that the list of orders which appears in the schedule to the bill does not refer to the office consolidations but to the orders and amending orders as they were passed. So I now beg leave to table copies of the orders, in English and French.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

CARTIER BY-ELECTION—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Maurice-Lafleche (Mr. Hamel), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the illegal striking of at least 1,500 Canadian citizens from the electoral list of the electoral district of Montreal-Cartier, who will be deprived of their right to vote in a federal by-election which will take place on March 31, in the electoral district of Montreal-Cartier, because of the government officers' failure and refusal to discharge their duty and of their striking from the electoral lists the names of those persons without any affidavit or through affidavits given under fictitious names in violation of rule 27 of schedule A of section 17 of the Dominion Elections Act, and their closing of the revision offices, while hundreds of persons were waiting to have their names maintained on the list, and the refusal to extend the time for such revision and increase the number of revising officers as provided by section 99 of the Dominion Elections Act, with the result that those citizens will suffer a great injustice.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that while we have rules in this house which give to hon. members the privilege of asking leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance in the hope that the discussion may lead to some correction being made, the question which is raised by the hon. gentleman is not of such urgent public importance as to attract the interest of the house, nor could any correction be made by the house at this time. If some people believe that they have not been properly treated in the matter of the right to exercise their vote I believe the proper thing would be to appeal for a remedy to our civil courts. I do not think I can permit the hon. gentleman to move to adjourn the house to discuss this matter, as we have already before the house several important matters to be considered. I am therefore obliged to refuse the motion of the hon. member.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, before you give your final decision, may I say a word?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but hon. members know that the ruling of the Speaker is not debatable, and I have already refused the hon. member's motion.

[Mr. Jean.]

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): But Mr. Speaker, the rule is that a member has the right to give the reasons why he is entitled to present his motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will admit that his motion is long enough for us to understand what he wants. I am satisfied from a reading of it that it is not a question of sufficiently urgent public importance to move the adjournment of the house, and so I have refused his motion.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Then, Mr. Speaker, I appeal from your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that I did not declare his motion out of order. I followed what has been the practice in this house for many years, that of refusing his motion, not declaring it out of order, because I did not consider it of sufficiently urgent public importance to be considered on a motion to adjourn the house. It has already been decided many times by this house that there is no appeal.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): We have the right of appeal from the ruling of the Chair. That is the privilege of members of this house. We are never bound by a ruling of the Chair unless a majority of the members approve it. So I appeal from your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COLDWELL: With due respect, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the hon. gentleman should be given an opportunity to give his reasons for his motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: On the point of order, this question was decided by the house—I am sorry I have not the reference before me—on an occasion when Mr. Ralston raised the very same question and was seconded by myself. The Speaker had ruled that there was no appeal, and the question was whether there was any appeal from the Speaker's ruling. The house sustained the Speaker's decision that there was no appeal from his ruling.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does that bind the house forever, Mr. Speaker—just one Speaker's ruling

Mr. SPEAKER: There is nothing more binding on this house than the majority approval of his ruling by its members.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is not the procedure of this house always under its own control except when the matter is covered by a standing order? There is no standing order covering this point.

Mr. MACKENZIE: There is the rule at Westminster and here that the Speaker's decision, especially when sustained by a majority of the house, is always binding.

Mr. COLDWELL: Only for that parliament.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I recall distinctly the ruling to which the Minister of Veterans Affairs referred, when Mr. Ralston, sitting to the left of the Speaker, proposed the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. The Speaker declared his motion out of order and Mr. Ralston appealed from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I am not mistaken, the rule with respect to bringing up a matter of urgent public importance is that the hon. member presents a copy of his motion to the Speaker before the house assembles, so that the Speaker may have the opportunity of considering whether the time of the house should be taken up in discussing that particular matter as a matter of urgent public importance. The Speaker, when he comes into the house and the motion is proposed, gives his ruling and that ruling is not debatable. That is one of the matters that is left in the hands of the Speaker of the house in order to assist in the procedure of the house, in the expedition of its business. It stands in a different category from the ordinary matters that come before the house.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Are we denied the right to appeal from the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call attention of hon. members to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, page 747, a ruling given by Hon. George Black, Speaker, February 19, 1932:

> The Speaker's refusal to permit an appeal from his decision that it is not urgent to adjourn the house for the purpose of discussing an urgent matter of public importance being appealed from was confirmed by the house.

Hon. members will recall that during last session—I do not remember the date—I myself gave the same ruling based on that precedent. Some hon. members appealed and the decision was sustained. I suggest that the house proceed now with its business.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, may I have the floor for just a moment? It seems to me that the ruling you have just read further confuses the issue from the point of view of the hon. member, because as I read it, the Speaker's—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that the Speaker's rulings are not debatable. There will be no confusion at all if hon. members accept the rules and the precedent which has been given.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I invite the house to proceed with its business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: On a point of order, the Speaker's refusal to allow an appeal in the reference given by Your Honour was put to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must realize that he is not speaking on a point of order; he is debating the ruling given by the Speaker. Even if the Speaker wished to permit the hon. gentleman to do so he could not, because it is against the rules. Therefore I ask the house to proceed with its business.

And some hon. members having risen:

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have brought to the attention of hon. gentlemen the ruling given by a former Speaker. I could give other rulings along the same lines, given by former Speakers. Hon. members should be satisfied with that decision. I do not see why they rise in their places to appeal, because there is nothing before the house.

Mr. P. E. COTE (Verdun): By leave of the house I move that the first report of the special committee on the Dominion Elections Act, 1938, presented to the house this day, be now concurred in.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I maintain we have the right to appeal from the decision of the Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

And some hon. members having risen:

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to resume his seat. I have already given my ruling and I hope that hon. members will realize that the Speaker is doing everything possible to be fair to the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is his duty not to permit any hon. member or hon. members to cause confusion in the house. If hon. members do not wish to abide by the rules of the house, the Speaker, with regret, will be obliged to apply the sanctions which he can apply in such cases.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Speaker, we have difficulty in hearing in this section of the house. Has Your Honour ruled that this is not a matter of urgent public importance?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Moved by Mr. Cote (Verdun)—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: —that the first report of the committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member has not the unanimous consent of the house I cannot put the motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Introduction of bills.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EMPLOYMENT OF NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERMEN AT LUNENBURG AND HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Let us act grown up for five minutes.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): When do we start having a dictatorship?

Mr. MITCHELL: Sometimes when I look at my hon. friend I find that he looks like a dictator. Let us break this up for just five minutes.

Referring to the question raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) on Wednesday, March 26, arising out of a telegram from Mr. B. Mackenzie, president of the Canadian Fishermen's Union, objecting to entry into Canada of Newfoundland fishermen to engage in the Nova Scotia fishing industry, I would like to make the following statement.

For many years Newfoundland fishermen have been allowed entry each season at Canadian Atlantic ports to assist in operating ships engaged in deep sea fishing. The fishermen who enter Canada under this arrangement are checked out at the close of the season.

In years past it has been necessary to supplement the number of Nova Scotia fishermen to maintain full operation of the industry. Men with the particular skill, coupled with the desire to engage in deep sea fishing—

Mr. BENTLEY: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: It will be on the record; the hon. member does not need to worry about it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. BENTLEY: We want to hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is the first time anybody has said that he could not hear me.

In years past it has been necessary to supplement the number of Nova Scotia fishermen to maintain full operation of the industry. Men with the particular skill, coupled with the desire to engage in deep sea fishing, are relatively scarce. The Newfoundlanders have the special knowledge and are available and the result is that they have served to play a helpful part in the industry. These Newfoundlanders fish on exactly the same basis of sharing in the catch as do Nova Scotia fishermen.

The number of Newfoundland fishermen entering Canada for the purpose indicated is small: ninety-three have been admitted to date for the 1947 season. Owing to the recent fishermen's strike the immigration branch of the Department of Mines and Resources temporarily suspended the entry of men from Newfoundland for this operation.

It is understood that fishermen from Newfoundland will be employed only where Nova Scotia fishermen are not available and that their employment will accordingly result in no aggravation of the unemployment situation.

BANANAS

INQUIRY AS TO REIMPOSITION OF CUSTOMS DUTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PARK MANROSS (London): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. So far as customs tariffs are concerned, will bananas be on the free list after March 31, or will they be dutiable?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Speaking from memory, Mr. Speaker, I think the exemptions from tariff duties on bananas lapse on March 31 with the lapse of the War Measures Act, and the usual customs tariff provisions will apply.

INQUIRY OF MINISTRY

THE "GLOBE AND MAIL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Is the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply sitting there in the heart of the Liberal party reading that excellent paper, the Globe and Mail?

Mr. HOWE: I want to anticipate the debate of this afternoon and see what charges we have to meet.

Mr. SKEY: It must have great influence towards conversion.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

CARTIER BY-ELECTION—CHARGES OF IRREGULARITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has the attention of the government been drawn to charges of serious irregularities in the preparation of electoral lists in the Cartier by-election, and what action has been taken by the government to correct them?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): A telegram came in just after lunch today and a reply is being sent to the sender in Montreal.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the answer?

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS

CHARLOTTETOWN—APPOINTMENT OF SUPERINTENDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. CHESTER S. McLURE (Queens): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. If not already made, when will the appointment of a superintendent for the experimental farm station at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, be made?

Right Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): It has not yet been made but is under consideration, and of course it will be made by the civil service commission.

SUPPLY

The Clerk Assistant having called order No. 1—House again in committee of supply:

And Mr. Speaker leaving the chair:

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The order of the day has already been read.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Hon. members will realize that the Speaker, being close to the table, knows what is going on. The assistant clerk has already read three times the item which has been called, to go into supply. As no motion should be put on Thursday and Friday, I left the chair.

Mr. COLDWELL: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as far as I could hear, no motion was put, and after all, the motion to leave the chair must be approved by the house before the Speaker leaves the chair.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not on Friday.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are no departments in supply. The house has not gone into supply yet.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the hon. member's attention to standing order 28, which reads:

On Thursdays and Fridays when the order of the day is called for the house to go into committee of supply, or of ways and means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without putting any question—

Mr. MacINNIS: That applies only to departments that have already been put into supply, and no department has been put into supply so far.

Mr. SPEAKER: The standing order is very clear, that on Thursdays and Fridays when the order of the day is called for the house to go into committee of supply, or of ways and means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without putting any question.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is in the event of departments being in supply, when we can discuss the estimates of the departments that have already been put in. There are no departments in supply and I contend that the motion to leave the chair should be put to the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but it is the practice.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I read it all, Mr. Speaker:

On Thursdays and Fridays when the order of the day is called for the house to go into committee of supply, or of ways and means, Mr. Speaker shall leave the chair without putting any question, provided that, except by the unanimous consent of the house, the estimates of each department shall be first taken up on a day other than Thursday or Friday.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. member that that applies when we know in advance what is going to be taken by the committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: We do not know today what is going to be taken, and I would go further. It is the practice for the Speaker to leave the chair without putting any motion, and the Speaker bases his rulings on the advice of the Clerk of the House, who is fully conversant with the rules.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, may I refer you to citation 232, which reads:

This standing order sets aside Thursdays and Fridays for the house to go into committee of supply, or ways and means, without the Speaker putting any question. The committee cannot take up the estimates of a department on those days unless that department has already had part of its estimates considered in committee on some other day. But this course can be changed by the consent of the house.

It requires the unanimous consent of the house to do, Mr. Speaker, what you suggest doing this afternoon, and I suggest that the motion should be put.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will realize, having read what he has just read to the house, that unanimous consent is given in committee and not in the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

An hon. MEMBER: Nonsense.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think I have given enough latitude since the beginning of this sitting to discussion of the attitude of the Speaker.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice there is an ominous silence on the other side of the house. I should like to have the opinion of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) on this ruling, because usually he discusses matters of this kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry, but I will not permit any discussion. I had already left the chair when an hon. member rose.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then I must respectfully submit that your ruling is wrong. I dislike doing this, but I will appeal from the ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I wonder if the following are not the facts—that there was an agreement among all parties in the house, I think, that we would take up interim supply as the first order of business this afternoon. That is my recollection anyway, and my understanding. I quite agree myself, and I am often very wrong—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE: —that the motion should be formally put, as well as any announcement by the Clerk, because the announcement might not be heard by some of our friends in the far corner of the house. But I do say this. Seeing that we had a general agreement yesterday that we would take up this item, I think that once the house is in committee unanimous consent will be necessary if anyone wishes to speak to something else. That was my understanding last night, and there must be some mistake if we depart from the gentlemen's agreement we had then.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister puts an entirely different complexion upon it. On those grounds the matter has a different light. I am anxious however to preserve the right of this house to do certain things which it is given the right to do under the rules. If the minister makes an appeal of that kind he does so on a different basis and it must not be considered that if we allow it to be done we are establishing a precedent. It must be understood, with all due respect to you, Mr. Speaker, that the ruling you attempted to make is not accepted by the house.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): The minister has referred to an agreement. I was not a party to the agreement and I did not agree.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put the motion.

Mr. Speaker having left the chair, the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The house in committee of supply—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Hon. members will allow the chairman to read the resolution:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $190,921,733.56, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, and in addition thereto the sum of $1,246,374.91, being one-twelfth of the amount of items 15, 19, 120, 123, 124, 127, 137, 138, 160, 162, 163, 165, 175, 384 387, 389, 485 and 489 of the said estimates; and the sum of $1,016,666.66, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1948, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1948.

Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the resolution?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): As a back bencher of the Liberal party I wish to rise to a question of privilege. I cannot sit here in silence and give assent to the Speaker refusing to allow the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie to stand up—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I insist on finishing my point of privilege, and I have not finished yet.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member cannot, when the house is in committee, raise a point of privilege on what took place in the house. The point of privilege must be taken when the Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I had no opportunity, because the Speaker walked out of the chair. The Speaker would not listen to the hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. member to observe the rules of the house.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): We are having no opportunity to observe the rules of the house this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think every hon. member will agree with me that what has taken place in the house cannot be discussed when we are in committee. There will be another opportunity.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. QUELCH: I wish to point out that we did not agree to the Speaker leaving the chair. He walked out of the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That criticism should be directed to the Speaker when he is in the chair.

An hon. MEMBER: Page the Speaker.

The CHAIRMAN: The house is now in committee of supply. There is a resolution before the committee. The committee will direct me whether or not I shall report the resolution. Shall I report the resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, we were given to understand that, because we had gone into committee without the formal passing of the motion, any hon. member had the right to take exception to it in committee; and unless the unanimous consent of the committee were given, the matter could not be discussed. That was the ruling which the Speaker gave. Is that the position now?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that an hon. member moves that the committee rise?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. POULIOT: No. The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie was just standing up when the chairman was sitting down.

Mr. MACKENZIE: In order that no hon. member of the house may properly say that he was not seized of the intentions of the house today, may I recall what was stated on the last page of Hansard last evening in regard to the business of the house today. Interim supply and the supplementary estimates were referred to specifically. So that when the hon. member says that he was not notified, it is possible that he was not consulted with regard to the arrangements for interim supply—

Mr. QUELCH: He did not give his consent. It was agreed that only by unanimous consent would we go into committee without a vote being taken. This hon. member did not give his consent to that procedure.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That may have happened. I do not know anything about the facts with regard to the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie. I know that was the general agreement of the house.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, if I may say a word—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have a suggestion to make which may solve this difficulty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. ABBOTT: It may.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. Minister of Finance.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: I am only trying to expedite matters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will sit down then. But if the committee would just listen for a moment, I should be obliged. I take it that the desire of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie was to discuss some matters arising out of the situation in the electoral division of Cartier. In the supplementary estimates which I had hoped we could consider this afternoon there are estimates relating to legislation in the House of Commons. If I may make this suggestion, I think that any question which he would care to discuss on the motion to adjourn the house could be discussed on that item. I am not insisting on it, but I wish to point out to the house that it is important that interim supply be voted today; otherwise it may prove impossible to pay the civil service salaries and wages as usual.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is all right. I do not press it. I understand we had hoped to adjourn at six o'clock, not to meet the convenience of myself or my colleagues, I may say. I am simply making that suggestion. I do not wish to curtail the discussion of the election in Cartier or anything else. I am anxious to get interim supply through today.

I discussed it with the leaders of the parties, it was announced in the house last night, and I had counted on being able to do so.

Mr. QUELCH: Will you call that item first?

Mr. HANSELL: Call the item under which the matter can be discussed.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes, do that.

Mr. ABBOTT: I should be very glad to do that, only we are in committee of supply. There would be no objection to doing that.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No. After all, there is a fundamental principle involved, that every hon. member of this house has the right to ventilate grievances before supply is voted. Inasmuch as that was not done at the previous stage in the procedure, I suggest that we do it in committee, and that the hon. gentleman be given the opportunity to ventilate the grievances which he feels he should ventilate before we vote supply and interim supply in this committee.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time that we have had occasion to refer to the electoral methods used in the constituency of Montreal-Cartier. There was an election in 1943 and another one in 1945. Previous to the 1943 and 1945 elections there had been a provincial election where Mr. Cohen had been elected. In some polls when the box was opened at six o'clock it was found that although the list contained only 100 or 150 names, more than 200 voters had registered. In 1943 the electoral lists were prepared by the enumerators. At that time hundreds of people were disfranchised. The same thing happened in 1945. Now we see a repetition of what took place in 1943 and 1945. The only difference is that it has been aggravated. In 1943 and 1945 the names of hundreds of people were omitted from the list. This time not only were names omitted from the list, but after receiving certificates stating that their names would be inscribed on the electoral lists, people received notices that because of affidavits made by unknown people, affidavits not sworn and in some cases not even signed, their names were to be removed.

What took place? Let me give just one example. In one poll in Montreal there is a man who is well known all over the province. I refer to Doctor Stephen Langevin, who has been living on Sherbrooke street for the last thirty years. He is a property owner. He was visited one day by the enumerators who, mind you, were appointed at the suggestion of the two candidates, communist and Liberal. He received a certificate stating that his name would be inscribed on the list. A few days later he received notice stating that his name would be omitted because he had moved. He is there; he is a property owner. He has never lived anywhere but in that block; he has been practising there all the time. On the last day or second last day he went to the office of the revising officer because he wanted his name on the list. Several hundred people were waiting to get into that office. He could not get in, but while he was waiting he made up a list of I do not know how many names of people who were also waiting because they had received similar notices. They were waiting, but they could not get in either. Now this gentleman and all his family will lose their votes on March 31; and that is just one example.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the primary right of a man in a democratic country is the right to register his vote when an election is held to return a representative to the House of Commons. In this election some 1,500 people in Montreal will be deprived of that right on March 31 because of these irregularities. I hold the government responsible for this because these officers are employed and paid by the government, with the money of the public.

In this instance three persons, Paul Rioux, Charles Frechette, and Roland Beaudoin alias Beaudin, swore to affidavits that Doctor Langevin and others had moved or were unknown. I have a list here of the names of some of the people: Anna St. Vincent, Madame E. Parent, Madame E. Brisebois, Mademoiselle Florida Gagnon, Madame Ernest Parent, Omer Gagne, Samuel Brisebois, Madame Eugenie Alarie, Madame J. Roch, Monsieur J. Roch, Mr. N. O. Lacelle, Madame O. Lacelle, Monsieur A. Arsenault, Miss M. Provost, Mr. Roland Guay, Madame Jacqueline Alteben, Mademoiselle Cordelia Gagnon, Madame Pineault, Mademoiselle Clarice Langevin, Mademoiselle Antoinette Dionne.

These are a few of the names of the people who are going to be deprived of their right to vote on Monday next. Other persons have been struck off the list because of declarations which do not contain any reason why this should be done. According to electoral law such affidavits must set out the cause for which it is asked that these people be struck off the list.

It has been said that there was no recourse, no remedy for this situation. There was one, a very clear remedy. I quote section 99 of the Dominion Elections Act:

If during the course of any election it transpires that insufficient time has been allowed or insufficient election officers or polling stations have been provided for the execution of any of the purposes of this act, by reason of the operation of any provision of this act or of any mistake or miscalculation or of any unforeseen emergency, the chief electoral officer may, notwithstanding anything in this act, extend the time for doing any act or acts, increase the number of election officers, including revising officers, who shall however, be appointed by the appropriate ex-officio revising officer, who has been appointed for the performance of any duty, or increase the number of polling stations—

The chief electoral officer had the right to increase the number of revising officers when hundreds of persons were waiting at the office to answer these false affidavits. The door was closed at ten o'clock, however, and they were given no hearing. This was known by everybody, because these facts were published in the newspapers. The chief electoral officer knew about it; he was called here but he did not want to do anything, and there the matter stands.

I said some people have been struck off the list at the instance of people who have not even sworn to the notice they have handed the revising officer. In this connection I could quote many names. I have here a copy of the notice served on an elector. What happened? The elector received a notice that somebody had sworn in an affidavit that he was unknown, or that he had moved. This notice was delivered by registered mail. Who delivered that registered letter! It was delivered by employees of the post office department. They knew these people were there, because the letter was delivered, but in spite of that fact no one said anything and the government did nothing. More than that, the names of electors which already had been inscribed by the enumerators were struck out even before affidavits were given the revising officers. I have the proof here. Some notices were sent under date of March 14, while the affidavits were not signed until March 15.

I do not want to delay the business of the committee more than is necessary, but this is an important matter. I think I have said enough to convince the people that although we are supposed to live in a democratic country, we are not in fact living in a democratic country. As I said, the primary right of anyone living in a democratic country is the right to register his vote when an election is held to elect representatives to the House of Commons.

At the present time we are complaining that the people have no more confidence in public men, but what confidence can you have when you see all these things going on, I would not say with their consent but at least with their benevolent knowledge?

An hon. MEMBER: Blessing.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): "Blessing", somebody said. They say that they are fighting communism, but if the Liberal candidate in Cartier is fighting communism he and his representatives are adopting the communist method. There is no difference between what is going on in Cartier during this election and what has gone on in Russia or Poland.

I thank you, Mr. Chairman, for having allowed me to give a few facts. Before concluding my remarks may I say that I think there is still time for the government to act. The election is going to take place on Monday—

An hon. MEMBER: Postpone it.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): No; the election is going to take place on Monday. The chief electoral officer could appoint some revising officers, or he could increase the number of officers to receive these complaints.

An hon. MEMBER: That is the law.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): The law is there; the law is clear. Section 99 gives the chief electoral officer the power to extend the time for anything which is included in the act.

Mr. LALONDE: Was that asked for?

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): It was.

Mr. LALONDE: By whom?

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I called up personally. I did not speak to the chief electoral officer, but I spoke to his son who is in the office and he told me that he could not do anything.

Mr. LALONDE: That is hearsay evidence.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I am told that they called his attention to that. Even if his attention was not called to it, these things are known all over the country. People know what is going on in Cartier at the present time. I appeal to the government to be fair and to do what they can do before March 31.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with much interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie. I am sure that everybody in this committee agrees that there is nothing that should be conserved as a more precious privilege than the right, of those who are entitled to do so, to vote. Parliament has provided an elections act which I think in a general way contains all the safeguards which members of parliament felt could be devised to assure that individuals might properly exercise that right. The act provides for the office of chief electoral officer. From the knowledge I have had of what has been going on I am sure that everyone has confidence in our chief electoral officer. I think everyone feels that he endeavours to administer that act in a fair, impartial and judicious way and to carry it out in the spirit in which it was passed.

Parliament has provided that enumerators shall be appointed. These enumerators are appointed by the returning officer, but I understand that they are designated by the representatives of the two parties who obtained the largest number of votes at the preceding election. There is possibly a weakness in the act with respect to the remuneration of enumerators at the rate of so much per name. I do not think that is the best way in which the remuneration of enumerators should be provided for. It may prove to be an incentive to gather as many names as possible for which they are paid, I think at the rate of seven cents per name, as part of the election expense.

However that may be, the act provides that the chief justice shall be ex-officio the revising officer and that he shall appoint his assistants. That is what was done in Cartier. I am sure that all those who have the privilege of knowing Chief Justice O. S. Tyndale will be confident that he would not be a party to nor would he tolerate anything that might amount to interference with the exercise of an elector's franchise. Presumably the chief justice appointed revising officers. The act provides that when the lists are drawn up the electors in the constituency may object to names. The hon. member says that objections were filed to some 1,500 names and that in accordance with the terms of the act they were stricken from the list. Notice was given to those whose names had thus been objected to.

The hon. member says that the revising officers closed the offices at ten o'clock at night before an opportunity had been given to all those who had responded to the notices to state their cases. I do not know about that personally. I do know that there were complaints of offices having been closed and that application was made to the courts in that regard. That is not something with which the government has to do. It is not something that it would be tolerable to have a government deal with; it must be something under the control of the judicial authority.

The revision was performed under the control of the judicial authority. Application was made to the courts alleging that there had been irregularities. I have not the record before me, but the newspapers report that application was made to the courts and that the justice who disposed of the application was one who formerly occupied the chair of this house. I think he is known to a large number of the members of the house. He heard the application, he considered the facts which the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie has mentioned, and he dismissed the application, saying that there was nothing under the act which he could do or order.

The hon. member says that there is something that could be done by the chief electoral officer. I should be glad if he would suggest what could be done by the chief electoral officer.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): There is section 99.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Is that the section which says that the chief electoral officer can extend delays? What is the suggestion of the hon. member? Does he suggest that the chief electoral officer should postpone the date of the election? I should be glad if the hon. member would make a concrete suggestion, because I am sure there is not a single member in this house who would not concur in the adoption of any practical suggestion that might be made. It may be that our law, in spite of our best efforts—when I say "our best efforts" I mean the best efforts of the members of parliament—to make it a good law, is deficient in some respect. If it is and there results any kind of prejudice there could be a contestation and an invalidation of the election. If the hon. gentleman feels that there is anything at this time that can be suggested to the chief electoral officer that would take care of what he says are grievances I would be glad if he would make the suggestions and I am sure that, if they are practicable, there is not a member of this house who would not applaud his suggestions and recommend, so far as the members of this house have authority to do so to the chief electoral officer, that he implement them.

I am sure that no one wants to see a single elector deprived of the right to cast his vote. I have been told that there are some 37,000 names on this list. It is unfortunately one of the consequences of the greater congestion of population that we know less about each other. The closer we live together in large cities, the less we know about our immediate neighbours, and it is quite possible that affidavits may have been filed by people who said So-and-so is unknown. I am sure that there are people living probably within one hundred yards of me in Ottawa who are unknown to me. That is one of the unfortunate circumstances which arise in congested districts. In the rural districts we all know each other. It may very well be that there is a deficiency in the act. It may very well be that it should not be possible to strike a name off a prepared list on the simple affidavit of some other elector that that name is unknown. That operates satisfactorily in rural parts, but I am not at all convinced that it should be possible to strike a name off a list in a congested area merely because some elector comes along and says, "That name is unknown to me".

Mr. JOHNSTON: But 1,500 names is a different thing.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is not a very considerable number in a population of 67,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: In a close election it might be.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not trying to defend anything. I am merely saying that in that congested area it is quite conceivable that 1,500 names would be unknown to a very large number of those residing in that constituency. But that is something that does not take care of the present grievance. That is something we shall have to consider when we have the committee operating to improve the provisions of the electoral act. What is important at this time is to find if some practical method can be found to take care of what the hon. member mentions as the grievance of 1,500 people whose names have been struck off the list. If there can be found anything practicable I would be glad to have the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie or any other member suggest it, and I am sure that the electoral officer would be only too glad to implement any practical suggestion that is made.

Mr. HEON: Mr. Chairman, I was very glad to hear the right hon. minister say that this house under no circumstances either directly or indirectly would approve any procedure which would deprive any elector of his right to vote. After all, that is one of the sacred rights which are left to us, the right to vote.

I listened carefully to what the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie said. I for one consider him to be a gentleman and a man of great experience who would certainly not come before the house at this time and delay its ordinary business just for the sake of putting before the house something he could not substantiate. But whether the revising officers acted in good faith or in bad faith—and I assume it was in good faith—the fact remains, if my hon. friend's figures are correct, that 1,500 voters are being disfranchised. That is the problem with which they are faced. I am not prepared to say that this house can solve that problem today; I agree with the minister there, except possibly that the documents which my hon. friend has could be submitted immediately to the chief electoral officer. If the chief electoral officer is satisfied that there has been disfranchisement, whether in good faith or in bad faith, revising officers could be appointed today and ordered to sit tomorrow and Sunday and hear these 1,500 cases and find out whether they have been disfranchised rightly or wrongly. I have not scrutinized the act but certainly justice should be done. We are faced with affidavits and charges that fellow Canadians have been disfranchised. I have before me two of these affidavits which have been handed to me by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie and which tell the story. I am sure that no hon. member with legal training would be able to explain why these documents were prepared in this way. It is known that ways and means are provided in the electoral act of denouncing, if I may use that word, to the electoral officer an elector whose name should be struck off the list. There are forms provided by the chief electoral officer in which the denouncing person can insert the name of a person who, he thinks, should be disfranchised, and giving the reason therefor. On the first page of this affidavit which I have in my hand appear these words: "Avis A L'Electeur Visé Par La Contestation". That is signed by the revising officer. This particular notice was sent to Mr. Gagne Omer, 270 Deboisbriand, Montreal, who is the elector threatened with disfranchisement. The notice is addressed to him, signed by the revising officer, and it is dated March 13, 1947, which is the day when the notice was sent out over the revising officer's own signature to the elector who was being threatened with disfranchisement. On the second page there is an affidavit to be made by the denouncing person, and this affidavit is dated one day after the notice was sent out. I am prepared to let the minister look at it. I am not trying to allege anything I cannot prove.

The other notice was sent to Mr. Jean-Paul Coctu—I shall not attempt to analyse the name—residing at 4381 St. Dominique, Montreal, and was signed by the revising officer on the 14th day of March, 1947. The affidavit which should precede the notice is dated after the notice was sent which, of course, does not make sense either. Therefore I am suggesting to the minister—I am not attacking any of the officers; it is quite possible, the law being complicated as it is, that mistakes are made and can be made—that when these kinds of mistakes are being perpetrated it is time for parliament to correct the situation or amend the law.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It would appear from the documents which the hon. member sent me that there is something irregular there. The dates the hon. member has mentioned appear to be those on the document, but I do not know that that constitutes anything that the house can do anything about at this time. Since we are revising the election act we should probably consider whether the onus should be on the person whose name is on the list to prove that he has a right to stay there or whether we should put the onus on the one who is contesting. It seems to me that it might be preferable, in order to strike off a name that has been put on the list by presumably independent enumerators, to have a hearing and not merely a filing of an affidavit. At the present time it appears to be the other way around. It is not in accord with the usual practice that a judgment goes against the elector unless he proves affirmatively that it should be given in his favour. Apparently that is the way the law reads at the present time.

The hon. member has suggested that it might be possible for the electoral officer now to appoint revisers to sit tomorrow and Sunday. I am not sure that that can be done. However the suggestion is one that the chief electoral officer will consider, and I am sure that anything that he can do he will be only too happy to do, because I think we all feel that that is his attitude with respect to the administration of the act.

Mr. HEON: Will the minister agree with me that, not only for next Monday but for any future election, we should not disfranchise a man on the strength of an affidavit unless the man who is threatened with disfranchisement has a hearing?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I think the burden on the one contesting the right to have a name on the list should remain with him, and that he should not have the name struck off until he has appeared before the revising officer and established that it should be struck off.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not going to take any part in the argument now before the committee. No one can condone striking names off the list, if they should be on. I merely rose to explain how names are put on the list. According to the act at the present time in a city subdivision two enumerators go together to call on householders and ask for the names in a house. Unquestionably enumerators have not always done what they should. I have known enumerators to say to each other, "You take that side of the street and I shall take the other." In that way irregularities creep in. Of course they get through the subdivision much quicker. They get seven cents a name, and they earn their seven cents much more rapidly.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I should like hon. members to keep order. It is most difficult for the hon. member who is trying to speak; I can hardly follow him.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am sure that the committee which has been appointed to make some revision in the election act will take into consideration what has been said by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie. The chief electoral officer himself, who is thoroughly qualified and eminently honourable, will be of great assistance in assisting the committee to make the changes that should be made. It is a serious offence to strike names off the list. On the other hand, it is the simplest thing in the world to put names on. It is no trick at all to put names on which should not be there, because the enumerators are paid seven cents a name. They are not compelled to make certain that the names which they are writing down are names of people who actually reside in the house or in the apartment. They put the name down. Every hon. member, particularly those representing city ridings, know of many names which have been put on the lists and which should not be put there. On the other hand, there is no defence for striking off names that should be on the list.

The suggestion made by the hon. member for Argenteuil is a good one if it can be carried out. Certainly the house should see to it—if it is at all possible to do it, and surely it is not too late to do it—that every man and woman entitled to vote in the riding of Montreal-Cartier should be given the privilege of voting.

Mr. HACKETT: That there is opportunity for discussing and improving the election act goes without saying, but really that is not the matter that is before us. The question is, can we do anything to ensure an honest and fair election in the riding which is voting on Monday next? I have not the election act before me. I have taken a hurried look at the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, and if the power to correct this hateful situation is not found in that act, it is the only power that is missing therefrom. I think anyone with the ingenuity of some of my hon. friends who sit on the front benches opposite and who develop emergencies with a facility that challenges all rivalry should be able to give us just a wee emergency and do by order in council whatever is necessary to enable the people of Cartier to elect the man of their choice.

Elections, as they are conducted in some parts of the city of Montreal have been a scandal for a long time. That is no secret; it is a source of regret to many people. Those people are not restricted to those who sit on the left of Mr. Speaker. I know that hon. gentlemen who sit to the right of Mr. Speaker regret the practices which are indulged in, and I certainly hope that some way will be found between now and Monday morning to make these lists complete.

Extraordinary powers are given to the chief electoral officer. Whether or not they extend far enough to enable him to revise these lists in the emergency which has been set forth by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie, I cannot say, but here is an opportunity for an excellent piece of work if it be undertaken expeditiously. I am sure that all members of the house as well as the population of the country at large would rejoice if they knew that the practices which have prevailed in the past could not be indulged in with success and impunity.

Mr. ABBOTT: May I say a word before the hon. member for Yorkton gets up. An undertaking was given yesterday evening, or there was an understanding, that we would adjourn at six o'clock today to meet the convenience of certain hon. members, but I think I must point out that we may have to sit this evening. I take it that the house would be prepared to do so, because it is important that interim supply should go through today.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It seems to me that if governments make mistakes we shall be a little better off if they do not make the same mistake twice. I refer to the Montreal elections, which are gaining quite a reputation in Canada. This is not the first time that things have happened in exactly the same way in the same constituency. In 1943 the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar brought up similar charges on the floor of the house, and it would seem to me only the part of wisdom that great care should be taken by the officials to have special provisions made in order to ensure that this kind of thing shall not be repeated. It appears to me at any rate that there are persons in that constituency and that part of Canada who are interested in preventing the democratic processes from operating, and that is a serious offence. After the suggestion made by two hon. members, offices should be immediately opened to make it possible for every resident eligible to vote to be given an opportunity to vote on Monday next. If that is done we shall have gained something. I seriously suggest that in the future the house undertake some changes in the election act which will make it a serious offence for persons to interfere with the operations of democracy in this way.

Mr. GRAYDON: If we have had enough of Cartier, we might come back to finance. May I ask the minister why there is a distinction between the estimates calling for one-twelfth in interim supply and those which call for one-sixth?

Mr. ABBOTT: The bill which will be based on this resolution is in the usual form. We are asking for one-sixth of all items to be voted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1947-48, which begins on Tuesday next, and one-sixth of the two items in the supplementaries for 1947-48, tabled in the last couple of days, and an additional one-twelfth for certain special items which are listed in schedule A of the bill. These are items totalling almost $15,000,000, included in agriculture, legislation, mines and resources and trade and commerce. They are items such as experimental farms, legislation—that is, the House of Commons and the Senate—mines, and geology branch of mines and resources, and trade and commerce, where an unusually large portion of the total year's vote is expended in the early months of the year. For instance, in geology, they send out surveys early in the year, and in the case of experimental farms expenditures for seeding are made early. A substantial part of the votes is required early. The total is relatively small, $19,000,000 in all, and we ask there for sufficient supply for three months, and in the other case for two months.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Secretary of State for External Affairs is in the house but not in his place. I wish to ask one question in connection with the estimates of 1947-48 in his department. I have tried to find an estimate which covers the organ formerly known as Canadian information services, but I do not find it in the estimates of 1947-48 in external affairs, nor have I found it in any other item. Can the minister enlighten me?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would have to ask the officers of the department to give me the information in that regard. When the estimates for the Department of External Affairs were made up the transfer had not been accomplished. They were made up at a time when the Canadian information service was not a part of the Department of External Affairs. My impression is that in the ordinary estimates for 1947-48 of external affairs there would not be an item applicable to Canadian information service. There must be in some other chapter of the estimates something that had been prepared for them and I shall have to find out where that is and give the information.

Mr. GRAYDON: In the order in council of February 5 of this year, when the Canadian information service was finally transferred, or when its function was transferred to the right hon. gentleman's department, there was a provision that the money which was provided for the old Canadian information service should be used for the information services now to be controlled and directed by the Department of External Affairs. My understanding at the time was—I have not the order in council before me at the moment—that it applied to the year ended March 31, 1947. It would seem that the money voted for the Canadian information service for 1948 must be on the loose, so to speak, and perhaps the minister is quite right in suggesting that his officials should look into the question and on another occasion he could advise me where that money is, the amount, and why for the coming year it is not part and parcel of the external affairs estimates.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The hon. member is quite right. The order in council provided for the transfer of such money as had been appropriated for the service up to March 31, 1947, but of course it could not affect the fiscal year 1947-48 because there had been no money appropriated by parliament for 1947-48. However I will find where provision is made in the estimates now before the house for 1947-48 for that service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is an item I should like to secure some information on. I asked certain questions on it three weeks ago, to be exact, on March 7, and as yet no information has been forthcoming. I am not going to refer to any previous debate; I am just going to bring to the attention of the minister the questions I then asked. I refer to the question regarding the further expenditures to be made by the federal authority to the provinces in connection with the dominion-provincial offers of December last. Your Honour will recollect that the original offer made to the provinces in 1947, or rather the original cost, was $86,200,000, making, together with statutory subsidies and moneys collected by the provinces, $124,900,000. The last offer that was made in the month of December raised the offer to the provinces by approximately $100,000,000 in excess of the original proposal made to the provinces in 1945.

From 1945 on, from the time of that offer, until December, 1946, from time to time the ante was raised or the amount of the offer to the provinces was increased. All throughout the piece the attitude taken by the dominion government and its representatives was that social security measures to be provided by the federal government would remain the same as under the offer of 1945; in other words, that social security measures and public investment measures as comprised in the original offer of 1945 would continue to be the basis. Then certain settlements were made with the provinces; certain of the premiers of the provinces settled with the government on the basis of the offer in December, 1946. It was generally assumed that the social security measures originally promised in the 1945 plan would be the same, but when the minister spoke in the city of Toronto on January 27, 1947, he said:

> I wish to make it equally clear that the overall commitments of the dominion are not being increased.

That is under the December, 1946, offer.

> As a result of increased rental payments from the dominion, the provinces will be able to assume, and must expect to assume, a somewhat greater financial responsibility. The dominion government will be able correspondingly to reduce some of the burden which it was prepared to assume for a public investment and social security programme.

Through you, sir, I say to the minister that, as far as I am able to see, this was the first time any suggestion was made that the original offer of 1945 to the provinces covering public investment and social security was being altered. I ask the minister this question: Is it intended that some change be made in so far as public investment and social security is concerned? On the proposals that were made initially in 1945 certain of the provinces signed. Were they given to understand—and we will take Saskatchewan and Manitoba as an example—

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend knows the agreements were on the basis of the budget offers of 1946.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: They signed on the basis of the budget offers of 1946?

Mr. ABBOTT: Of June, 1946.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then did any other province sign in December, 1946, or January, 1947, on any other basis than the budget offers of 1946?

Mr. ABBOTT: Nobody has signed yet. I will answer my hon. friend in a minute. I will answer in one piece.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right. In answering that, I would ask the minister to explain what he meant on this occasion when he spoke in the city of Toronto, because certainly the speech was carefully prepared.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And delivered.

Mr. ABBOTT: As all my speeches are.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, as all my hon. friend's speeches are.

An hon. MEMBER: They are eloquent.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, that is true. What did the minister mean by that? Is it intended that the provinces shall assume a larger share of old age pensions in return for the larger grants that are made in the offer of December, 1946? And in respect of what will the provinces be required to assume, to use his own words—

Mr. ABBOTT: "Somewhat greater financial responsibility".

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, "somewhat greater financial responsibility". Sir, the minister was able to quote those words, which indicates that particular emphasis must have been intended in the use of the words, particularly as he remembers them.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not necessarily. I have an excellent memory, and I heard my hon. friend read them just two minutes ago.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, I read the same excerpt three weeks ago, and it is a matter which is of great interest. I should like to hear what the minister has to say.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to answer. Unfortunately I was not in the house when my hon. friend made his speech, and I had really thought I might discuss this matter in some detail, as I shall no doubt be called upon to do, when I bring in a bill to authorize the execution of agreements with those provinces which have decided to enter into them. However I am prepared to answer my hon. friend now.

I make the obvious statement first, that I meant exactly what I said in the speech in Toronto and in a statement which I think I gave to the press a bit earlier. If I may paraphrase what I said or elaborate what I said, it is this. As my hon. friend has pointed out, the social security and public investment proposals which were put forward in 1945 were of a sweeping and comprehensive nature. They included old age pensions, public investment, a proposal for health insurance, health grants, assistance in building hospitals and so on. They covered a wide field. My hon. friend has mentioned that the increase in the dollar cost of the offers originally made by the dominion in 1945 to the final alternative options in 1946 was something of the order of $100,000,000, and I think that is about right. I think the minimum payments under the original green book proposals were of the order of $124,000,000; and I think the estimated payments, not the minimum payments, in 1947, if all the provinces came in, would be of the order of $224,000,000, although I think the minimum would have been about $206,000,000. However the minimum payments provided in the budget offers of my predecessor in June of 1946 were of the order of $188,000,000 if my memory serves me aright; the increase involved in the revised or alternative options of December, 1946, was something of the order of $26,000,000. I meant in my speech to which my hon. friend has referred that this additional $26,000,000 which was being added to the minimum payments to be made to the provinces under the terms of the revised offer, would have to be taken into account when we came to sit down—if we do sit down, as I hope we shall—to consider these wider proposals. I do not say they will be taken into account in old age pensions; I do not say they will be taken into account in public investment; I do not say they will be taken into account in health insurance, health grants or any other of the wide variety of proposals. But I do say that the approximately $26,000,000 should be taken into account when we sit down with the provinces to discuss these various measures and to decide the apportionment of the cost of them.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may say so, Mr. Chairman, that does not quite cover the situation. The minister has given a very good and lucid statement, but certain provinces have agreed to accept the offer of December, 1946. All right. Now, when those provinces agreed to accept that offer, which included $26,000,000 over and above what had previously been offered, at the time they agreed to the acceptance were they advised that because they were going to receive more than some had agreed to accept earlier, by the agreements they signed, they would thereby be expected to assume a somewhat greater financial responsibility for the public investment and social security programme that was originally brought to their attention? That is the simple question; were they advised of that?

Mr. ABBOTT: I would not say they were formally advised. Of course all the provinces which discussed entering into these agreements brought up the question as to what was the position of the government with respect to the other proposals, social security, public investment and the like. That position was made perfectly clear first, I think, if my memory serves me right, in a telegram sent by the Prime Minister to the Premier of Saskatchewan sometime in July. Of course I cannot quote the terms of the telegram, but no doubt my hon. friend is familiar with it. The gist of it was that the dominion adhered to its original plan, but that of course it could not be implemented until a sufficient number of provinces had evinced their willingness to enter into the taxation agreements. When the dominion increased its original offers by about $26,000,000, if my memory serves me right, and I made the statement to the press—the house was not sitting at the time—that statement was in approximately the same terms as the speech I made later in Toronto. I am speaking from memory and I would not be sure; it could be easily verified, but I think it will be found I made that statement at the same time.

Mr. HACKETT: Was the statement in January?

Mr. ABBOTT: I cannot say from memory; perhaps it was.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is just one thing more. As far as the communication in July, 1946, to the government of Saskatchewan is concerned, that really does not enter into what happened at the time the government of Saskatchewan and the government of Manitoba and the other governments agreed, in December, 1946 and January, 1947, to accept the new offers amounting in all to an increase of $26,000,000. What I want to get from the minister is not what he told the press, because, as I remember it, what he told the press and what he said in the city of Toronto in his speech to the board of trade on January 27, both occurred after the provinces agreed to accept the new offer.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That being so, what my hon. friend said to the press and what he said in Toronto would not have been communicated to the provinces that agreed to accept the new settlements, unless he so advised them.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then the simple question is this. When the various provinces agreed to the new proposals in December or January, were they advised before they agreed to accept those proposals that, since they were getting this extra amount, they must realize that they would be able to assume and must expect to assume a greater financial responsibility in reference to social security and public investment than was contained in the original proposals, which in turn were confirmed as far as Saskatchewan was concerned by the telegram of the Prime Minister in July, 1946? That is all I am asking.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, and I answered that by saying no, they were not formally advised; that is in relation to social security, public investment and the whole field of proposals in that category.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, were they informally advised?

Mr. ABBOTT: It was taken for granted, of course, that they would have to do that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what I am trying to get at. The provinces agreed before the minister made his statement to the press in January.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is perfectly right; they have agreed to enter into certain taxation agreements, and I answered my hon. friend by saying they were not formally advised, that when we sat down to consider these wide and comprehensive proposals, the extra $26,000,000 would have to be taken into account in apportioning the extent to which a province, for instance, would participate in health grants or health insurance or any of the other proposals. That is perfectly right.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister is very frank, and I thank him.

Mr. ABBOTT: I thought my words were perfectly clear in the statements I made in both places.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, but that is exactly the point. The statement as to the conditions in respect of the payment of the extra $26,000,000 to the provinces is not communicated to the provinces at the time they agree to the new proposals, and no reference is made to it until some two, three or four weeks after the provinces have agreed to accept those proposals. That is the point I am making. Certain provinces agreed to accept the new proposals in December and January, 1947.

Mr. ABBOTT: That is right; and they are in the process of authorizing them in the various legislatures now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes. Thereafter the minister took the position that in return for the extra $26,000,000 they would be expected to assume larger responsibilities in connection with social security and public investment than had been accepted as their responsibilities from 1945 on.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, but which had not been accepted, if my hon. friend will forgive me.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is so, but which had been founded as the basis of the dominion proposals.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The point I am making is this. The basis of the dominion proposals was that the provinces, in return for certain rentals, would have certain social security and public investment responsibilities assumed by the dominion government.

Mr. ABBOTT: No; I must correct that. The revised budget proposals were these; that in consideration of certain rental terms the provinces were to surrender certain tax fields, and the Prime Minister assured them that if and when a sufficient number of provinces entered into that agreement the dominion would be prepared to reopen the discussions with the provinces at another conference, or otherwise, in regard to the social security, public investment and other proposals of the original conference of 1945. The dominion is still ready and anxious to do that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And willing to found any representations or plans it puts before the provinces at this new conference absolutely on the original proposals regarding social security and so on?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, in simple language what it means is that in sitting down to discuss these wide and varied social security proposals, public investment proposals and the like, the dominion government says "The taxpayers of Canada are not putting up the $26,000,000 twice. That has to be taken into account." I think that is a perfectly fair position to take, and one which should be taken. The amount obviously is not very large. It does not bulk largely, for instance, in a comprehensive contributory old age pensions plan payable to all persons at the age of seventy. But even in these modern days an additional $26,000,000 is an appreciable sum of money, and the provinces will have that amount over and above what was contained in the budget proposals of 1946.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then this is clear, to make it equally simple; that in return for this extra $26,000,000 the original proposals of the dominion as to social security and public investment will be reduced by that amount?

Mr. ABBOTT: Well, I will not say they will be reduced by exactly $26,000,000, but I will say that in the wide and sweeping programme which, if it were fully implemented, I am told would involve something in the nature of $400 million a year—perhaps I had better not quote figures too glibly, but I believe it is something on that order—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I thought it was $600 million.

Mr. ABBOTT: It depends on what basis you put it. In any event it involves some hundreds of millions of dollars a year, covering various and varied activities such as old age pensions, health insurance, health grants, assistance in the building of hospitals, and so on. My statement was that this $26,000,000 would have to be taken into account. If a province is in a better position, as a result of these increased offers, to provide assistance for the building of its own hospitals—I take that as an example—it could be a sweeping and comprehensive programme, but in essence my statement is that the $26,000,000 must be taken into account so that the taxpayers of Canada do not have to provide it twice.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As regards the provinces which are to be expected to take that $26,000,000 into consideration, those which have agreed to sign did not know that that was a condition before they agreed? That is correct, is it not?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that is probably correct.

Mr. HACKETT: I understood the minister to say that the second offer included about $100 million more than the first; is that correct?

Mr. ABBOTT: Which offer is my hon. friend referring to?

Mr. HACKETT: I am referring to the one which was made, as I understand it, in December.

Mr. ABBOTT: Is my hon. friend referring to the budget offer? I will put it in that way.

Mr. HACKETT: I am taking the budget offer as a basis.

Mr. ABBOTT: The second offer was about $26,000,000 more.

Mr. HACKETT: To what extent would the $26,000,000 be reduced by the conditions which were attached to it, at least in the minister's mind?

Mr. ABBOTT: I am afraid my hon. friend will have to elaborate his question. I may be stupid, but I do not understand it.

Mr. HACKETT: I understand from the discussion which has been going on between the minister and the hon. member for Lake Centre, that the basis of the second offer differed from that of the first and that, as a consequence, there would be deductions which would be made from the second offer.

Mr. ABBOTT: No, I did not say that. Perhaps I had better make clear what I was trying to say at any rate. I said the offer of December, 1946, differed from the budget offer of June, 1946, only in the manner in which the minimum payments to the provinces were calculated; that was the only difference between the two offers. There was no difference in principle; it was simply a difference in the method or manner by which the minimum payments to the different provinces were arrived at. As a result of adopting that different method of minimum payments to the provinces, there was an increase of some $26,000,000 over the original budget offer. I answered the hon. member for Lake Centre by saying that if and when we come to sit down to discuss this wide field of social security, public investment and other proposals, that $26,000,000 will have to be taken into account in arriving at the basis upon which the costs of these proposals will be shared by the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. HACKETT: If the first offer had been accepted, the $26,000,000 would not have been taken into account?

Mr. ABBOTT: That is correct.

Mr. FLEMING: It begins to appear that the provinces which have signed agreements on the basis of the acceptance of either the second or the third of the three offers made by the government are no farther ahead by reason of having done so, if there is to be an agreement eventually with respect to full social security and public investment. The minister has used the expression "if and when" in referring to the time when the provinces might be called into meeting again to discuss these other questions. Will he be a little more explicit as to the "when"? When is it the intention of the government to call the provinces into meeting again to discuss these matters of social security and public investment, and on what conditions will it be done?

Mr. ABBOTT: I think that question has been answered already by the Prime Minister who is the appropriate one to answer it. In essence—and again I have to paraphrase because I did not come prepared to debate dominion-provincial relations and I must speak from memory—it would be when a sufficient number of the provinces have evinced a willingness to enter into taxation agreements. Then the dominion will, without delay, convene or invite the provinces to confer on these questions of public investment and social security. I think it should be fairly obvious to most hon. members that it is hardly feasible to do that so long as the two largest and wealthiest provinces feel that it is desirable and in their own interests to arrange their fiscal affairs in their own way. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. FLEMING: If the minister will pardon me, his last answer leaves two questions still open. First, he said when a sufficient number of provinces have indicated a willingness, and he elaborated on that. As I interpret his remarks, he would not have a sufficient number of provinces as long as Ontario and Quebec do not accept the proposals.

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes, that is inevitable. I do not know that the Prime Minister said all the provinces because he might have had in mind, for instance, the possibility of one of the smaller provinces not coming in for one reason or another, and that that would not prevent the holding of a conference to discuss these other proposals. In my judgment, such a conference could produce no useful result unless the greater number, if not all the provinces, were in agreement on the taxation question.

Mr. FLEMING: There is another question that still seems to be left in the air. How many provinces will you call in when the dominion government considers that enough provinces have entered into agreements and that there is to be a conference of the provinces?

Mr. ABBOTT: My hon. friend is asking me a question which should more properly be addressed to the head of the government. If he wants my own view I would think that all the provinces would be called to such a conference, or at any rate all the provinces which had entered into agreements. It is difficult, in fact it is almost impossible to embark on a social security scheme on a provincial basis. The whole plan which was put forward to the conference in 1945 was for national social security measures and old age pensions on a national basis.

Mr. FLEMING: I think the government should be absolutely explicit in connection with this matter. The Minister of Finance has indicated that some of the questions which I have asked and which are troubling many people in this country can be answered only by the Prime Minister. The fact of the matter is that we have been trying to obtain information on these important points and we still lack essential information. I draw the attention of the committee to the language of the speech from the throne. We have had occasion already to complain about its ambiguity, and I quote from page 3 of Hansard as follows:

Once suitable financial relationships have been arrived at with the provinces—

We are not told how many, whether it has to be all or just some.

—my ministers have undertaken to seek, in a general conference or otherwise, to work out satisfactory arrangements with the provinces—

Presumably all, but we are not told.

—in regard to public investment and social security measures.

I put it to the Minister of Finance that the government owes an obligation to parliament and to the people of Canada to make it perfectly clear right now as to the terms upon which it is prepared again to summon a general conference of the provinces. I do not think the people of Canada are prepared to wait indefinitely for action in this respect and action cannot be taken until the dominion government participates. It has to take action. These matters of public investment and social security cannot just be left in the air. These problems will not be solved until such a conference is called. It is implicit in the remarks of the minister today and it is implicit in the speech from the throne that a conference must be called by the domnion government. The responsibility for our not having arrived at the necessary decisions with respect to these important fields of social security and public investment rests squarely upon the shoulders of the dominion government.

Mr. ABBOTT: I will answer that and I will answer it at once. In the first place, this house will have full opportunity to debate dominion-provincial regulations when the bill to authorize taxation agreements with such provinces as have evinced a desire to enter into such agreement is introduced. As to the duty of the dominion government to convene dominion-provincial conferences, there is no such duty. There is nothing in our constitution about convening or convoking dominion-provincial conferences, and no province is compelled to attend one. All that the dominion government can do is to invite the provinces to attend a conference. The dominion government has invited the provinces to attend conferences to settle this question of taxation, social security and the like on two occasions, first in 1941 and second in 1945, and every member of the house is familiar with the results of those two conferences.

My hon. friend says there is a duty in the dominion government to state when it will convene a conference to discuss social security proposals. He quoted from the speech from the throne, which is fairly specific, and if I recall correctly, the Prime Minister, when asked a question, answered along the same line. I am not in a position to speak for the government on that point, but I will say this, that I can see no purpose that can be served, nor do I think the dominion government should take the responsibility of calling a conference—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Who else could call it?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can see no purpose in calling a dominion-provincial conference until at any rate the majority of the provinces and most certainly the two wealthier provinces have indicated that they are prepared to enter into taxation agreements, because otherwise any such conference would be perfectly futile. The dominion government could not possibly assume the responsibilities which are involved in the social security and public investment proposals unless it had these great fields of income and corporation taxes. That is the answer to my hon. friend. If I may say so, the responsibility for the failure to reconvene the conference, if any opprobrium attaches to anyone, rests on the provinces which, no doubt for excellent reasons of their own, have not seen fit to enter into taxation agreements.

Mr. FLEMING: Does the minister suggest for one moment that the provinces or any province could call a dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. ABBOTT: Why not?

Mr. FLEMING: Is the minister serious? This is a serious matter for the people of Canada who are looking for some settlement of these questions of social security and public investment, which are important for the future of this country. Does the minister seriously suggest that a province could call a dominion-provincial conference, and will he go farther and say that if any province or provinces call a dominion-provincial conference now, the dominion government would attend to discuss questions of social security and public investment?

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps it would not be appropriate for a province to call a dominion-provincial conference. Perhaps that is right. But I answer my hon. friend by saying this. I will repeat what I said a moment ago, but let me preface it by saying that I am just as conscious as any other member of the house of the importance of getting what I believe to be a sound fiscal structure in this country. I have spent a good deal of time in the past few months trying to accomplish that purpose, without complete success, I must confess. I feel that the fault is not entirely mine at any rate, but that is a matter of opinion. I say this, that in my view the dominion has discharged its full obligations in this regard. It has tried on two occasions by the conference method to arrive at a solution of these fiscal problems, but for reasons which were stated by my predecessor in his budget speech of last year in far better terms than I could use, we were not successful. So we took the other method and made our own proposals to the provinces. Those proposals were optional. Any province which felt that it could do better for itself by not accepting them could follow that course. The result has been that so far certain provinces have felt that it was in their interests to enter into taxation agreements. Others have not. I do not quarrel with that position. But I do say that the dominion government has done its share, and until there is greater evidence on the part of some provinces that they feel a plan of this kind is satisfactory and desirable I can see no purpose in calling another conference.

Mr. FLEMING: It seems to me that there is a conspicuous flaw, if I may say so, in the reasoning which the minister has offered to the committee. He said that a conference was called and that it did not succeed. He will well recall that at that conference certain proposals were made by the dominion government. The conference adjourned. And now what the dominion government has done has been to change drastically its own proposals on at least two occasions.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just by increasing the amount.

Mr. FLEMING: The proposals which were put before that conference and on which the conference did not reach agreement are vastly different from the proposals which have been made from time to time since by the dominion government. Yet the excuse—I cannot give it any higher name—which is offered by the dominion government for its failure to reconvene a conference that is vitally necessary in the interests of the nation is that the proposals submitted to the conference nearly a year ago were not accepted. The dominion government has departed far from its own proposals made to that conference, and yet it persists today in refusing to reconvene the conference to consider other proposals when it itself has drastically changed the proposals it made to the conference at that time. I do not hold the present minister entirely responsible in this matter. The failure to arrive at a necessary decision at that time was attributable directly to the inflexibility of the proposals submitted by his predecessor—

Mr. ABBOTT: No such thing.

Mr. FLEMING: —and the rigidity with which his predecessor approached this question, not in any spirit of compromise, not in the kind of spirit that brought about confederation, but in a rigid, uncompromising, take-it-or-leave-it attitude. Quite frankly, those of us who know the present Minister of Finance do expect of him something better than the rigid and uncompromising attitude taken by his predecessor in this matter, and we are going to be sorely disappointed if the present minister follows his predecessor's rigid and uncompromising refusal to reconvene the conference on up-to-date terms when his government has departed so drastically from the terms which it submitted to the conference last year.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I am sick and tired of hearing people talk of the uncompromising rigidity of my predecessor. It is nothing but a catch-cry, and it is used by people, I regret to say, for political purposes. There was no uncompromising rigidity about the present Minister of Justice. He made concession after concession during the course of those negotiations from August, 1945, until the conference broke down in May, 1946, and anyone who tries to contradict that is simply not talking in accordance with the facts. I am also sick and tired of hon. members opposite trying to picture me as the little fixer who will concede everything.

After that outburst, Mr. Chairman, although I should like to go on debating dominion-provincial relations and conferences and so on for an unlimited length of time, I would point out that at the moment we are trying to get through interim supply. I am in no hurry. I do not know whether the house wants to sit after six o'clock tonight. But I have to get this interim supply and the supplementary estimates through. I should have said in my preliminary statement that in voting this interim supply and the supplementary estimates I give the committee the same undertaking that has always been given, namely, that it is without prejudice to the rights and privileges of every hon. member to discuss any item in the estimates which will come up for discussion from time to time throughout the session. The usual undertaking is hereby given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be restricted in any way as a result of the passing of these supplementary estimates. That is the usual undertaking, and of course I renew it now.

Mr. GILLIS: We have been talking all afternoon about dominion-provincial relations. Has the government come to any understanding with Nova Scotia with regard to signing an agreement?

Mr. ABBOTT: Not yet.

Mr. GILLIS: Then you have a Tory premier down there.

Resolution reported, read the second time, and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the committee go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. ABBOTT: Mr. Chairman, I desire to move the following resolution covering the amounts dealt with a few moments ago in committee of supply.

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1948, the following sums be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada, namely, first, the sum of $190,921,733.56, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the estimates as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1948; second, an additional sum of $1,246,374.91, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of several items of the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1948, as set forth in the resolution concurred in this day in the committee of supply; third, the sum of $1,016,666.66, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the items as set forth in the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1948.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 107, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1948.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ABBOTT moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: I just wish to elicit from the minister the usual undertaking that this bill is on all fours with similar bills passed in previous sessions. In the limited time we have at our disposal it is not necessary to go over it in detail so long as the minister gives us that undertaking.

Mr. ABBOTT: It is in the same terms as bills passed in previous years save, of course, possibly in the amount granted. It is in exactly the same terms as other bills.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Administrative service—

611. Departmental administration — further amount required, $3,200.

Mr. KNOWLES: Just before you start with these items, Mr. Chairman, and in view of the misunderstanding we had earlier today, can it be clearly understood that dealing with these items does not constitute the opening of any of the departments so far as the main estimates are concerned?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I give that assurance readily, Mr. Chairman. I give the same undertaking with respect to these items, that passing them does not preclude discussion of each item on the main estimates. They are the final supplementary estimates for last year.

Mr. GRAYDON: That does not apply to this item, because it will not be in the estimates this year. Last year's estimates have been passed.

Mr. ABBOTT: I can make an explanatory statement.

Item agreed to.

Special—

616. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration—further amount required, $42,500.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is this all in western Canada?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: The suggested extension of the act has not been passed by parliament and does not yet apply to the east.

Mr. GARDINER: This is for prairie farm assistance.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Canadian contributions to international commonwealth organizations—

621. Commonwealth communications council, $6,100.

Mr. GRAYDON: What does this comprise?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The commonwealth communications council is the administrative body for the commonwealth network of cable and wireless. It has been estimated by the United Kingdom government that £40,000 will be required to cover expenses.

Item agreed to.

622. United nations organization working capital fund, $201,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have other nations made their full contribution to this fund or are there any nations in arrears?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I would not like to say that there are no nations in arrears. At the time of the general assembly there were some small sums in arrears, but a very insignificant portion. The reason for the supplementary estimate is that when the original working capital fund was set up it was intended that it would be used for the first year's contributions to the united nations. At the general assembly, however, it was decided to continue that fund at least for one year more, reducing it from $25,000,000 to $20,000,000, so that our portion of the assessment requires this further additional sum. But it remains to our credit for future contributions to the costs of the assembly.

[Mr. Abbott.]

Item agreed to.

625. International commission on air navigation—further amount required, $2,400.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Within the last few days there has come from Washington word that a bilateral agreement in regard to passenger airways has been negotiated between the Canadian government and the state of Peru whereby certain airways will operate between Canada and Peru, and the Peruvian airways will have the right to enter Canada. Has an agreement been negotiated or completed whereby airways will operate between Peru and Canada, and what concessions if any are being granted to the Peruvian company?

Mr. HOWE: To the best of my knowledge no agreement has been entered into as yet with the government of Peru. Negotiations are taking place. The proposal is with regard to the fourth freedom. There will be mutual exchange under the fourth freedom and the Peruvian airways will have the right to land in Canada and deliver passengers from Peru destined for Canada and to pick up in Canada passengers destined for Peru. That is the fourth freedom agreement, and that is the basis of the agreement at present under discussion.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it intended that airways between Peru and Canada will be operated by the Peruvian government or by a company organized under the laws of Peru?

Mr. HOWE: It is a company organized under the laws of Peru. The question of ownership has been examined both by the United States and by Canada and we are satisfied that the position of ownership complies with the Canadian regulations.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under the Canadian regulations, as I understand, it is necessary that a company coming into Canada be owned seventy-five per cent by the nationals of the country under which it is incorporated. Am I correct in that? Is that not a matter of agreement between the nations?

Mr. HOWE: No. The exact wording is that it shall be substantially owned and effectively controlled, but the seventy-five per cent is not mandatory. There is flexibility in that. In the case of Peruvian airways, we are satisfied that it is substantially owned and effectively controlled by the state of Peru.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The information given to me was that the arrangements had been entered into and approved and that all that remained was the commencement of the communications. Can the minister say when, under the tentative plan, this international airways will commence operations?

Mr. HOWE: I think I would have been informed if negotiations had arrived at anything near that stage. It is possible a temporary permission for a single flight might be granted before the treaty is completed, but so far as I know there will be no operation until the treaty is completed, and I do not think negotiations have been advanced to the point where there is certainty as to when the treaty will be completed.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly the Minister of External Affairs will be able to say what the situation is with regard to the treaty between Peru and Canada in reference to this matter.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There are at the present time no commitments of any kind, and my understanding is that these arrangements are covered by an exchange of notes after the technical arrangements have been worked out by our department in charge of air navigation. There has not yet been any commitment between the governments. The technical features are being discussed between the Department of Transport and the representatives of the Peruvian company. It has not yet reached the stage where it will be dealt with on a diplomatic basis between the two governments.

Item agreed to.

628. Intergovernmental committee on refugees, $8,400.

Mr. KNOWLES: Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs comment on this item and tell the committee what progress is being made by this intergovernmental committee on refugees?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The intergovernmental committee on refugees is not the international refugee organization but a committee that was set up in 1938 to deal with displaced persons prior to the last war. I can give the hon. member the figure. At the sixth plenary session of the intergovernmental committee on refugees held in London from 16th to 21st December, 1946, final approval was given to the administrative estimates for the year 1947.

The estimated expenditure for 1947, as approved at the plenary session amounts to £94,000. To provide this sum and the necessary working balance, a sum of £117,500 was assessed to the member governments. The total number of units allotted to member governments for 1947, in accordance with the intergovernmental committee's scale, is 792, on which basis the value of a single unit is approximately £149.

The full contribution for 1947 of our government on the normal basis will therefore be £5,215.

It was agreed that, in view of the uncertain duration of the life of the intergovernmental committee, a first contribution of half the amount should be requested, and that is being provided for at this time. It is expected that the international refugee organization will take over all the responsibilities of this previous committee, and it is hoped that may be done before the year is more than half over.

Mr. KNOWLES: That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: So that there is only one-half of the amount assessed which is being called for at this time.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many nations have already signified their approval of the I.R.O. up to the present time?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I have not had any information in the last three or four weeks, but the last information we had was that there were thirteen which had approved, and that they were nearing the seventy-five per cent of the amount required to have the organization become effective.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): How does this committee relate to the human rights commission set up by UNO? Where is the connection?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There would be only a vague connection. The human rights commission deals with principles and recommendations as to human rights in the various countries. This was a committee set up in 1938 to deal with the problem of persons who had become displaced before that date. The problem has become a very much larger one as a result of the war. There has been set up by a certain number of members of the united nations the international refugee organization which is to become operative when signed by fifteen nations, representing seventy-five per cent of the estimated contribution. Although it has not yet become effective, a preparatory commission has been preparing the way. As soon as it does come into effect, it will absorb the responsibilities of the pre-war international committee.

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Does this expenditure on the work of this intergovernmental committee on refugees foreshadow the bringing of refugees into Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Canada has taken the position that it favours the coming into operation of the international refugee organization, and I think, although it has not yet come into operation and there has not been any quota distributed, it would be safe to say that Canada is quite prepared to do its share in proportion to what will be done by other members of the organization.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

629. To provide for deficits on certain accounts of the Canadian wheat board, pursuant to guarantees given by the government of Canada, as detailed in the estimates, $20,562,264.11.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I know what the particulars are regarding this; they are set forth on page 12 of the further supplementary estimates; but I do not quite understand how it is that certain of these items are before us by way of supplementary requirements. Is the minister in a position to explain how it is that the wheat board accounts are separated.

Mr. ABBOTT: I shall be very glad to do that. During and since the war, the Canadian wheat board has been engaged in a number of operations in grain and seeds under the authority of various orders in council under the War Measures Act and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. In the early stages of the war, deficits arising out of these operations were met out of the war appropriation. Since there is no longer any war appropriation, these deficits must now, of course, be met out of moneys specifically voted by parliament for that purpose.

At the moment, these deficits are being carried by the Canadian wheat board and appear as an asset in the accounts of the board under the heading "Due from the dominion government." I should perhaps add, so that there may be no misunderstanding, that these deficits have nothing to do with the wheat board's ordinary business of buying and selling farmers' wheat. They arose out of emergency operations which have already come to an end.

When these sums are voted and paid over, the government will have settled its accounts with the wheat board as at July 31, 1945, which is the latest date for which the year-end accounts are available.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

631. Annuities Act—To authorize payment from the government annuities fund to the original purchaser of all payments received for the purchase of Canadian government annuity contract No. 38420 together with interest thereon at 3 per cent per annum for cancellation of said contract, $1.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Would the minister give an explanation of this most unusual item?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not so unusual. I do not need to make a speech about it. There was a person who had an annuity of her own, and also an annuity purchased by another, which was not discovered until later. Under the law you may have only one annuity, and there must be a refund.

Item agreed to.

LEGISLATION

633. The Senate. General administration—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask if it is possible to pay this in kind instead of paying $5,000 cash? Could we give them oleomargarine instead?

Item agreed to.

634. House of Commons. General administration—estimates of the Clerk—further amount required, $71,500.

Mr. KNOWLES: I should like to say a word about this item.

Mr. MACKENZIE: May I intervene for a moment? What would be the will of the committee with regard to sitting after six o'clock?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Come back at eight o'clock.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think it would take us only about fifteen or twenty minutes to finish.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Eight o'clock.

Mr. FLEMING: Suspend the six o'clock rule.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Golding of the committee of supply reports that the committee have considered certain items and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. When shall the committee have leave to sit again?

Mr. ABBOTT: Later this day.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Is this being done by motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE: If my hon. friend objects to it he may say so. I would move that the house resolve itself into committee of supply.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): This is my opportunity to speak to this motion, I presume. Certainly, when the arrangement was first mentioned we hoped that we would be through by six o'clock. The reason we are not through is the obstruction, mainly of the Conservative party, for whom this concession was made. So I see no reason at all why we should not sit tonight. In view of the impending recess, I think we should sit again at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My resolution should have been that the Speaker do not leave the chair at six o'clock this day.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): My remarks apply, anyway.

And Mr. Speaker having left the chair:

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, the motion has not been put to the house. The Minister of Veterans Affairs moved that you do not leave the chair, but surely that motion must be carried.

And Mr. Speaker having resumed the chair:

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call attention to the fact that if it is the wish of the house to go into committee of supply it is not necessary that any motion be put. If hon. members wish to sit after six o'clock there should be a motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I did move that Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair at six o'clock.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I rise to make two points. In the first place, it is not after six o'clock, so that the motion is clearly out of order. My second point is that this was a concession to the Conservative party for their own benefit. To my mind, they could have speeded up the debate this afternoon, but they did not do so. The western members are most anxious to get the debate through and get home, so I suggest that the motion be defeated and that we go on and sit at eight o'clock as usual.

Mr. ABBOTT: Perhaps I might say a word, though possibly it has no bearing. I agree with what my hon. friend has said, that there has been perhaps a little delay this afternoon, but if we could conclude our proceedings before eight o'clock we could get the legislation over to the other place and push it ahead there. I do not know whether this will have much influence.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Are they sitting at eight o'clock?

Mr. ABBOTT: I could not say as to that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not sure of the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE: My motion would require unanimous consent, and evidently that is not being given.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not rising to oppose the motion, but I am wondering why we must finish these further supplementary estimates tonight. If it were the supply bill I could see some point to it.

Mr. ABBOTT: I think I can answer my hon. friend. It is partly to accommodate those in the other place, and to enable us to make the necessary arrangements for the royal assent before the adjournment on Tuesday. It is quite true that this is not so essential as in the case of the other bill, but I think it would be a convenience to some of those in the other place if we could get this bill over there. That is the principal reason. I want to get this bill over there before the adjournment Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the bill not through as far as this house is concerned?

Mr. ABBOTT: No; this is a second bill.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: I suggest to the house that I put the motion, or if that is not the wish of hon. members I can call it six o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

Mr. FLEMING: Was the motion withdrawn by the leader of the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE: The motion was withdrawn because, as far as I could see, there was no chance of its passing.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call attention to the fact that the Speaker did not put the motion.

Some hon. MEMBER: Put it.

Mr. GRAYDON: As far as our party is concerned, it is immaterial what the house decides. It is a straight question of courtesy, and if the house does not desire to extend that courtesy and consideration we have nothing to say, and no objection to sitting again at eight o'clock. We can sit from eight until eleven o'clock, and it will be quite all right with us.

Mr. GOLDING: I think it only fair that if, as a matter of courtesy, we arranged to adjourn at six o'clock, we should try to carry that out. Hon. members opposite are having their dinner, and I do not think it is fair to sit tonight.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I might ask one question, personally I am in favour of sitting until eleven o'clock, but on the other hand I would go this far, that if the leader of the government gave that assurance to the leader of the opposition I believe we should carry it out.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call attention to the fact that there is nothing before the house, so that we cannot have any discussion.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the wish of the leader of the house that I put his motion I shall do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Put the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Mackenzie, seconded by Mr. Howe, that Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair at six o'clock. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): To get back to this matter of courtesy, courtesy works both ways. For the last few days in connection with the control bills we have seen little courtesy displayed in the house. The agreement, which I heard expressed, was that the business would be speeded up so that we would be through at six o'clock. We are not through, mainly because of the attitude of and the questions asked by hon. members opposite. Therefore I see no reason to extend courtesy where courtesy is not extended. So I say no.

Mr. GRAYDON: Might I say one word?

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps hon. members would permit me to make a suggestion. The Speaker should be the voice of the house, and I do not want to impose any point of view on hon. members. If it were the desire of the house that the motion be put, then hon. members would have an opportunity of saying "yea" or "nay," or we could have a standing vote, so that we would know what we want to do.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): As I understand it, there must be unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion will please stand.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What is the motion?

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion that Mr. Speaker do not leave the chair at six o'clock will please stand.

Motion agreed to: Yeas, 47; nays, 3.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

634. House of Commons. General administration—estimates of the Clerk—further amount required, $71,500.

Mr. KNOWLES: I wish to say a few words on this item. I regret having to raise a matter like this under these conditions, but it is a subject in which many hon. members are interested, and unfortunately the main estimate covering it is not reached until late in the summer, when it is always difficult to raise the matter. I refer to certain matters in connection with the stenographers who work for members of this House of Commons, and stenographers of this house generally, who are paid out of this vote. There are three points I feel the government should take under consideration.

First of all, something should be done to work out a pension plan for these people. I know the argument that will be advanced from the other side. It will stem mainly from the fact that they are brought in on a temporary basis, that they work for only part of the year, and that some of them do not work very many years. However there are others who have been here for quite a number of years, and I think it is most unfair that people working for the parliament of Canada should in some cases give the best years of their lives and have no opportunity to participate in a pension plan of any kind. As examples of other kinds of government employees who originally were not included in a pension plan I mention the employees of the printing bureau—these are prevailing rates employees —and also the charwomen in the public buildings.

The CHAIRMAN: I think we should stay within the item; the printing bureau has nothing to do with this item.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was merely citing these other cases to make my point that some people who are not full-time civil servants are brought within government pension regulations.

Mr. MITCHELL: What about the members of the House of Commons? Don't you think they should be included? Be logical about it.

Mr. KNOWLES: Most members of the House of Commons hope to stay here for a long time.

Mr. MITCHELL: Very few of them do. You are due to walk the plank yourself.

Mr. KNOWLES: The minister knows how ridiculous that statement is with regard to Winnipeg North Centre. I am serious in my appeal to the government that they take this matter of a pension plan for House of Commons stenographers under consideration.

The second point I wish to make in connection with the stenographic staff is that provision should be made to pay their travelling expenses at least once a session from their homes to parliament. The general understanding in connection with the stenographic pool is that members are supposed to have an opportunity to have stenographers from their own part of the country, but so long as no travelling expenses are paid, the effect is to limit these jobs to people from the Ottawa area. I suggest that consideration be given to that point.

The other point is of more immediate concern; I refer to the conditions under which the stenographers are working in this building at the present time. Part of this is due to an appeal which was made on the floor of this house, namely, that more rooms be provided for members. That was a justifiable appeal, and it still needs to be met as a matter of fact, but in an attempt to meet that need I understand that the stenographers were crowded into fewer rooms than they had before. This means that a greater number of typewriters are being pounded in one room, and to have to work within such limited space is hard on the stenographers, from the point of view of both efficiency and health. I think consideration should be given to trying to improve the working conditions of these people.

Incidentally, one of the things that we are faced with at the present time is the necessity of having to answer the many letters we are receiving to have the tax taken off soft drinks. One thing that could be done to help these stenographers would be for the government to take action on this matter and relieve members of parliament from the necessity of answering these scores of letters on one subject.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member left out the kitchen sink.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is speaking about a pressure cooker.

Mr. KNOWLES: I have made three points: A pension plan, railway fares, and better working conditions for the House of Commons stenographic staff.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I wish to support the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Last year I had occasion to refer to some of the matters the hon. member has mentioned, including the status of the stenographers. I referred also to the lack of amplifiers and the lack of library assistants. I had a little difference with the Speaker today, but I must compliment him upon the action he took during the recess to make more offices available to the members. After making that speech, I received considerable protests from the secretarial staff of the house because they claimed that my remarks reflected upon their ability when I said that it was difficult to get good stenographers. One of the difficulties in getting good secretaries is that mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We want to bring girls from our own ridings, but we cannot do that at the present time. Consideration should be given to improving the working conditions of our secretaries. They should be provided with a proper civil service status. For our own personal convenience, arrangements should be made to permit us to bring secretaries from our own ridings.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to say a word in this connection. Conditions in the stenographic pool would be improved if the eastern members in particular did not use it to conduct their legal, mining and other businesses.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to support the remarks of the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre and Vancouver North. I have made a little personal investigation in connection with the space provided for the stenographers at the present time. I wanted to make a comparison with what window and floor space was considered proper for chickens, horses, cows and things like that. I wrote to the Department of Agriculture and asked them what window space they considered was necessary for a chicken. About three days ago I received word that the minimum for health and proper working and functioning was one square foot of window space per bird. There is one room in the House in which seventeen stenographers are working, and yet there are only twelve square feet of window space. That is less than the window space required for a hen, according to the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have a solution to offer, and I am serious about this. We are not supposed to refer to the senate. I am not saying anything at all against the staff of the other place, except that they do not do one-tenth the work of the girls who have to work for the members of the House of Commons. Why cannot we take over some of the space used by the other staff? Before I came to Ottawa, I understood that parliament was supreme, that the members ran Canada, and if that is the case—

Mr. BROOKS: You were very naive.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Maybe I was. I come from the far west where we are innocent, honest, young and pure.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): That is before we came east.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: True. I can see no reason—I think hon. members from Saskatchewan and Manitoba will bear me out in this—why arrangements cannot be made to take over part of that space. If necessary, one of the committee rooms or some other room could be taken over and made available for the stenographic pool of the House of Commons. In most cases these girls are working long hours and, as the hon. member for Kootenay West has said, under conditions which would not be permitted in British Columbia for a rooster, let alone a hen.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. KNOWLES: I think the minister or someone on the part of the government should make some comment.

Mr. ABBOTT: As my hon. friend knows, the government is not responsible for the administration of the House of Commons.

Mr. KNOWLES: We get that all the time. A private member is not permitted to make any motions involving the expenditure of money. How can we have this matter dealt with?

Mr. ABBOTT: Make representations to the Speaker.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Could the Minister of Public Works say a word? Surely somebody is responsible for alloting space and seeing that proper conditions exist.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I have no authority over the allocation of space in the House of Commons. The House of Commons is under the control of Mr. Speaker, but very often he consults with public works and a parliamentary committee as to changes to be made. All I can say is that I am ever ready to help in satisfying the requests made by members of the house and in cooperating with Mr. Speaker, if it is at all possible to meet the wishes of hon. members.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Again, in order that the record may be straight, our Speaker is not to blame. He has no authority, as I understand it, over that other place which is standing vacant ninety per cent of the time. Somebody must have control over that. It is no use passing the buck to the Speaker because he has no authority over the senate, but somebody must be supreme in parliament and somebody should see that space is not left vacant over there when our staff has to work under conditions as they are at present.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Minister of Finance said we would have to address our appeal to the Speaker. Is it in order for the Speaker to speak now as the hon. member for St. Mary?

Mr. FAUTEUX: With the permission of the house, I would say this, as I have been invited to take part in this debate. Naturally every member wishes to have an office to himself, and the Speaker knows how many members visit him in his office seeking better accommodation. That applies to all parties, but I would say to the house, as I have said to all visitors, that the Speaker can give only what he has. There is no doubt that we have not sufficient accommodation for the members in this House of Commons, not even for the ministers. The Speaker knows to how much trouble he went before the opening of the session to find accommodation to please every member.

I agree with hon. members who have criticized the quarters in which the stenographers are obliged to work just now. I believe that hon. members are right. But again it is impossible for the Speaker to provide better accommodation for these girls because we simply have not the accommodation. Hon. members may know that during last session it happened about a dozen times that a committee was supposed to meet and the chairmen of different committees standing around in the corridors of this House of Commons came to the Speaker to find accommodation because all the regular committee rooms were taken. So I would take this opportunity to call the attention of the minister concerned to the situation to see if it would not be possible to provide more accommodation for the need of members of the house.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Speaker, before he sits down, a question having to do with another matter? Has any consideration been given by the Speaker or by the government to changing the hours of sitting of the House of Commons? I have a suggestion to make which is strictly personal and informal, since I have not discussed it with anybody except in an informal way. But I think consideration might be given to the House of Commons relegating its old tradition of sitting from three o'clock in the afternoon until eleven o'clock at night. The difficulties of the staff of the house have been mentioned and no one has more sympathy with them than I have, but I think our own position should also be carefully studied. I suggest that we should sit from one o'clock to seven o'clock and then call it a day. In that way we would gain three hours on Wednesday. While my suggestion is purely a personal one, I think it would meet with a good deal of approval from the members generally and it would allow us to live more normal lives in this city. We cannot live an absolutely normal life as members of parliament, but it does seem to me that it is hardly fair to ask anybody to work until eleven o'clock at night, no matter how young or how old he may be.

Mr. HOWE: Dinner time is not such a good time to consider that.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister looks pretty well fed. I trust that some consideration will be given by the government to that suggestion because I believe there is something in it.

Mr. KNOWLES: I deeply appreciate Mr. Speaker's answering one of the questions I raised. Would he also indicate whether he or the government is giving consideration to the other two points I raised, first, a pension plan and, second, travelling expenses for the stenographers to Ottawa once a year.

Mr. FAUTEUX: If the hon. member will read standing order 89 he will find that it says:

> No allowance shall be made to any person in the employ of this house who may not reside at the seat of government, for travelling expenses in coming to attend his duties.

Mr. KNOWLES: The rules can be changed. That is the answer to that. The other point was the pension plan.

Mr. FAUTEUX: It is up to the house to change the rules.

Mr. KNOWLES: The circle is complete.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to say a word in this connection because I think the Speaker sometimes had his fair share of criticism. Last year the hon. member for Vancouver North brought up the question of office accommodation, and I wish to give the Speaker credit for making the best possible use of the office accommodation he had at his disposal this year. I am sorry that the hon. member for Vancouver North did not share in my delightful good fortune, but certainly the Speaker is entitled to credit for the effort he has put forth on behalf of all hon. members.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Since my name has been mentioned and since I brought this matter up last year, while I did not have the good fortune of my hon. friend the hon. member for Fraser Valley of getting an office to myself, I think the Speaker has done more to satisfy members of parliament with the office space that was available than Speakers have done for some time past.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Lands, parks and forests branch—

638. Government of the Northwest Territories —Airports, roads, buildings and water systems —construction and improvements—buildings—further amount required, $27,400.

Mr. McCANN: The explanation for the additional amount required is as follows: due to expanded mining activities in the Yellowknife mining district and administrative responsibilties in the Mackenzie district as a whole, it is necessary to provide increased living and office accommodation, also additional quarters and guardroom for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The construction of buildings was commenced in 1946 but difficulties in purchasing materials and transporting them to various posts prevented the buildings being completed in 1946.

In 1945, the sum of $140,000 was allocated from the war appropriation and subsequently voted as a supplementary estimate for the government of the northwest territories. These funds were made available to the Department of Public Works for dismantling American buildings and salvaging materials for the construction of new buildings. A considerable amount of materials, including over 1,000,000 f.b.m. lumber was salvaged from these buildings at Waterways, Alberta, and Fort Smith, northwest territories. The dismantling of these American buildings was continued in 1946. The sum of $375,700 was provided in the 1946-47 estimates for the construction of departmental buildings.

In 1946-47, the Department of Public Works carried the following building programme for this department:

(a) continuation of the dismantling of buildings at Waterways and Fort Smith. The materials salvaged were bundled, labelled and shipped to Fort Smith, Yellowknife and other settlements for building purposes.

(b) construction of administration building, three residences, and garage at Fort Smith.

(c) construction of administration building, two double duplex apartment buildings and a new liquor store building at Yellowknife. The erection of several Dallas huts and igloos for living quarters and storage of materials at Yellowknife. The construction of wardens' houses and erection of prefabricated warehouses at Fort Resolution, Fort Simpson and Fort Norman. These buildings, although occupied, are not completely finished.

(d) shipment of building materials to Aklavik for the construction of a warden's residence next summer.

(e) distribution of building materials to the Wood Buffalo Park for use by the park wardens in the construction of new dwellings.

The Department of Public Works, which is in charge of actual construction, has reported that this further amount is required to take care of obligations incurred during 1946-47. The cost of building in the Mackenzie district has been much greater than anyone anticipated, but it was necessary to proceed with the programme to house essential departmental activities due to rapidly increasing developments.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise divisions—

640. Ports, outports and preventive stations, including pay for overtime of officers notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary buildings and rentals—further amount required, $211,000.

Mr. HAZEN: Did the customs officers who met at St. Stephen, New Brunswick, last summer make any representation to the Minister of National Revenue about their uniforms?

Mr. McCANN: I have no knowledge of any representation being made.

Item agreed to.

Taxation division—

641. District offices—further amount required, $191,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have a question to ask on this item which has to do with taxation. Farmers in western Canada who delivered grain in 1944 find that they are now taxed on the grain which they delivered in that year, which has increased their income to the point where they become taxable, some of them rather heavily. The grain which they delivered in 1944 was grown in 1942 and 1943. Under the government quota system and regulations, they were not permitted to deliver grain at that time. When they delivered grain in 1944 it put them in an income tax bracket. Because of their desire to help win the war in 1944 and because they held back their grain in 1942 and 1943 they are being heavily penalized. There is an injustice there which the minister should look into and try to rectify. I do not find these people objecting to paying taxes when there is income taxable in a particular year, but when they are compelled to pay income tax on income earned on work which they did in 1942 and 1943 it is discrimination. Farmers in other parts of the community and other taxpayers in Canada are not taxed in 1944 on income earned in 1942 and 1943. What is happening is that the whole thing is lumped together in 1944 and tax is assessed on it. These people are being taxed on grain grown in 1942 and 1943 which was not marketed, nor did they receive any money for it until 1944. They were not allowed to deliver the grain which they had. Had they been allowed to deliver the grain, they would not have been taxable because they did not have taxable income. Government regulations prohibited them from getting money for their work in those years.

Mr. ABBOTT: There was no space in which to put the grain.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is right. They had to go to the extra expense of storing that grain on the farms and building granaries. Government regulations prevented them from delivering the grain. As a result, income rightly belonging to 1942 and 1943 was lumped together and put in 1944. It would be equivalent to members of parliament not being able to get their income for 1942 and 1943; then having the whole thing lumped together in 1944 and being charged income tax on that income for that year. I think there is an injustice there, but I shall not take up the time of the committee to discuss it any farther. I should like to have it looked into.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In this connection I should like to ask a question which has reference to a similar case. Some individuals in my province were unfortunate enough to invest in bonds of the province of Alberta. A certain government came into power and repudiated them and for years—

Mr. LOW: They did not repudiate them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Wait a minute until I get through.

An hon. MEMBER: The hon. member is stupid.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It may be stupid to you, but these are the facts. Certain farmers in my riding—I shall put it in this way for the benefit of the minister—purchased these bonds and they did not draw any interest on them for a number of years. When the province of Alberta reassumed their responsibility for the interest it was all paid in one year. One farmer had an income of $2,240. If he had been paid yearly, without repudiation or delay, as he should have been, he would have received $660 a year. I hope that is clear to my hon. friends across the way. It is absolutely shameful for any government in Canada to adopt such an attitude. They are responsible. Is it not possible to make provision for a case such as that I have outlined? If the interest which had accumulated had been spread over the years when it was due this farmer would not have been liable for taxation.

Mr. LOW: I am sure the hon. member would like to be set right. In the first place, I think he is wrong in asserting that the interest was not paid. The interest was tendered and it was there for the bond holder who wished to take it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): How much of the interest? The full interest?

Mr. LOW: At a reduced rate; that is right. That does not say he could not get it if he wanted it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): If he took it he was then committed not to ask for the rest.

Mr. LOW: No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is not so. These excited gentlemen are the same gentlemen who perpetrated a lot of injustices that they will not admit.

Mr. LOW: Hon. members have said a lot of things that they do not want to have thrown in their faces.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Start right now; we can start.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I ask hon. members to address the Chair?

Mr. LOW: I am trying to set the record straight. If these people had wanted to accept the interest which was tendered by the province there was nothing in the world to prevent them from participating in the benefits which were to be given to all holders of bonds.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Benefits? Their rights.

Mr. LOW: That is right; call it "rights" if you like. If they did not then accept the interest which was tendered and which piled up from year to year, I realize quite well that it did create a problem, and I am quite sure that the Minister of National Revenue should take it into consideration and adjust the whole income tax payment. I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley has raised a good point. I am not objecting to that at all. I simply want to set the matter straight.

Mr. HACKETT: It may take an amendment to the income tax act.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I also have a couple of farmers in the same position who held some province of Alberta bonds. When the leader of the Social Credit party says they could have drawn their interest, may I say it was not interest in full. If they had taken that they would have committed themselves and they would never have got their full interest. To ask, as the hon. member for Peace River is suggesting, that the federal government should now bail out the province of Alberta's obligation is sheer nonsense.

Mr. LOW: Of course it is sheer nonsense to say that I made such a suggestion. That is just about the size of the hon. member. Once more I want to set the record straight. Those people who held bonds were not committed. They were given an undertaking that any adjustment made in the future would apply to them. They knew that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: In order to keep the record straight—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have allowed the discussion between the hon. member for Peace River and other hon. members, in regard to what took place in Alberta, to go far enough.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: But the hon. member for Peace River made an incorrect statement.

The CHAIRMAN: What was done by another government is not before this committee. I gave all hon. members wide latitude, but now we should revert to the vote.

Mr. POULIOT: I would call the attention of the minister to a few articles that have been published recently, the last of which will appear tomorrow, about the abolition of the income tax and its replacement by a one per cent tax on bank clearings, which amount to $85 billion. This would dispense with the necessity of taxpayers making any reports, which would be made by the banks. Would the minister be kind enough to study that question during the recess?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will do that with pleasure.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I have a few words to say on this vote, and I am sure the member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) will support me. I refer to the question of the location of these district offices. When the committee were appointed to investigate the question they suggested that one office should be maintained in the southern part of British Columbia. Naturally the Okanagan district requires an office. I say emphatically that the people of southeastern British Columbia are dissatisfied with the present situation, and I suggest that an office should be established at a central point so as to serve both districts. Here we have a district in the Kootenays producing nearly $100,000,000 worth of industrial and agricultural products and this government does not take steps to establish a district office in that area. The office in Kelowna is of little advantage to us. I wanted to say these few words in order to express the attitude of the great majority of the people I represent.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

648. Departmental administration — further amount required, $4,000.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Possibly I shall be called to order, but on the offchance that I shall not be I wish to say a word in connection with the trouble which the public works department and other people as well are having in British Columbia, and particularly in the Fraser valley, through not being able to secure nails.

The CHAIRMAN: The vote under consideration is No. 648, public works.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And I am discussing the fact that public works cannot get nails in British Columbia.

An hon. MEMBER: Wait until your vote comes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Listen; one chairman is enough.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member is discussing public works he is in order.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Public works and other projects are held up in British Columbia because nails are not available. I understood the minister to say in this house that a large supply of nails was now available, or that more nails were being made available. My information from British Columbia today is—and I believe that other members have received the same information—that nails are not available. In British Columbia, even with our wonderful climate, we are not going to use aluminum nails all the time when other nails are kept in eastern Canada and the maritimes. I should like the minister to explain why these nails are not available, in view of the statement he made the other day.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): I wish to support what the hon. member for Fraser Valley has said. In my constituency there is a community of ten thousand people, who have had only fifteen kegs of nails in the last month, and we have used more in chicken coops than that.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I may say that the Minister of Public Works has been generous to my district, but the engineer cannot build wharves because he cannot get spikes. I suggest that the minister raise the matter with the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply so as to make sure that the Department of Public Works will get sufficient nails for the projects that have been appropriated to ridings including mine.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): In my riding, in Campbell River, there is a project that will not require nails. It is a complete rock breakwater and is one of the projects that will not call for nails.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I was glad to see the Speaker rise in his place today and speak briefly and to the point all the time. The question I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works is whether he has found all that furniture that we were trying to find out about last year. Perhaps he will take this as notice of a question and answer later.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I wish to call attention to the fact that Canadian Pacific railway officials in Kootenay West have informed boards of trade that they are unable to carry on the present restricted boat service because of the presence of sandbars. Dredging can be done only at low water in the narrows at Arrow lakes and the dredges have been held up for some time because of lack of funds.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): I will look into that phase of my estimates, but I have not the data on the dredging of Arrow lakes. When the ordinary estimates come up I shall have the information.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—construction, repairs and improvements of public buildings—Nova Scotia—

651. Brooklyn—postal accommodation, $4,500.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I do not want to be critical of the extra appropriation for postal accommodation in Nova Scotia, but I would call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that the Post Office Department in British Columbia says that there is no place in greater need of proper postal accommodation than North Vancouver.

Mr. WINTERS: And there is no place in greater need than Brooklyn, Queens county, Nova Scotia.

Mr. HAZEN: What does this item mean, postal accommodation?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): We tried to find space all through the war and even expropriated part of a restaurant, and now we are trying to put up temporary accommodation to have the postal service operated.

Mr. BENTLEY: I want to remind the minister that we are very short of post office space in Swift Current. We shall have a big crop this year and a lot of mail. There will be a good deal of money coming to the Department of National Revenue in income tax, and I would ask that we be given enlarged space.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We want post office accommodation, but sites are hard to get in the Fraser valley owing to the inrush of people from Saskatchewan. We are prepared in the Fraser valley to finance the undertaking. We will advance the money to buy sites if the minister will take them over whenever he gets the money. There is no other riding that will make that offer. I would ask for consideration therefor.

Item agreed to.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Pensions and other benefits—

663. To compensate members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for injuries received in the performance of duty—further amount required, $240.

Mr. PROBE: Last session I asked the Minister of Justice if he would reconsider the present attitude taken by the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with respect to the payment of marriage allowances for those members of the force who enlisted for overseas service but who did not enlist with No. 1 provost company which was the body in the service to which they were directed at the time of enlistment. To my current knowledge, nothing has been done on this matter. I believe that the federal government is setting an improper example to the Canadian people generally with respect to the reemployment of veterans without disadvantage to the veterans themselves. I have great sympathy for those young men who enlisted because they felt they could be more useful to their country on the field of battle than by doing the usual police duties, and the fact that they married during that period I do not think should serve as a restriction on their rights to be considered as married men for the purpose of receiving marriage allowances. The Minister of Justice is not in his seat at the moment, so I am just talking for the record, but I hope that this matter does come up.

Mr. KNOWLES: Maybe another minister would make a statement.

Mr. PROBE: I do not know whether another minister would reply or not. Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who occupied this portfolio last year, care to comment on that matter briefly?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No. I think it will be preferable for the right hon. gentleman now occupying the office of Minister of Justice to tell the committee what the intentions in that regard are at the present time. Up to the time I left the department it was felt that it would be detrimental to the discipline of the force.

Mr. PROBE: That is all poppycock.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It may be poppycock, but that was the decision which had been made. If the present minister is prepared to make a decision that will not be regarded as poppycock, he had better have the privilege of announcing it himself.

Mr. PROBE: Without any personal aspersion on the minister, may I ask that this item just stand?

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: The hon. member will have an opportunity of discussing this matter on the main estimates.

Mr. PROBE: Very well.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Canadian government travel bureau—

670. To assist in promoting tourist business in Canada—further amount required, $175,000.

Mr. HACKETT: I should like some information as to the nature of the assistance. Is it advertising?

Mr. McCANN: This amount of $175,000 is for advertising and publicity. It is to assist in promoting the tourist business in Canada, and the further amount required is as stated.

Mr. HACKETT: It is all for advertising?

Mr. McCANN: Yes. There is a reason for it, though, which we can give.

Mr. ABBOTT: Give it.

Mr. McCANN: Canada is in competition with many states of the union in the tourist trade, and it is essential that Canadian tourist attractions and conditions be brought to the attention of the travelling public of the United States.

It has been deemed advisable to place a considerable amount of advertising in United States papers. It is difficult to obtain advertising space in United States magazines at the present time, and reservations for space must be made at a very early date. United States publications are in the happy position of being able to insist upon cash with the order at least two months before the date of publication. While, therefore, provision has been made for this amount of $175,000 in the 1947-48 estimates, it will be necessary to pay these accounts before the end of the present fiscal year.

There would ordinarily be a decrease of this amount in 1947-48, but it will be necessary to provide for it again.

Mr. HACKETT: To advance it?

Mr. McCANN: To advance it to meet these commitments.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask if this sum of money is being spent in cooperation with the provinces? I understand that most of the provinces have publicity departments of their own. Is the minister working through the publicity departments of the provinces, or is he working independently of them?

Mr. McCANN: My understanding is that the provinces have tourist bureaux and tourist departments of their own. The federal tourist bureau works in close cooperation with the provincial tourist publicity departments, and the provinces reap the benefit of the expenditure which is made by the federal authorities.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is as it should be.

Item agreed to.

DEMOBILIZATION AND RECONVERSION

Finance—

686. Advances to Canadian wheat board for payments to millers and other manufacturers of wheat products—further amount required, $8,000,000.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Can I get a statement as to how this $8,000,000 is recoverable? We just passed a $10,000,000 item of the wartime prices and trade board. What does this $8,000,000 refer to?

Mr. ABBOTT: I can give that information in a moment.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: How is it recoverable? Can the minister give us the same information for the item on the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation?

Mr. ABBOTT: The committee is no doubt familiar with the system by which millers receive payments equal to the difference between 77⅞ cents a bushel and prevailing domestic prices in respect of wheat used in products sold under the price ceiling. Payments are made by the Department of Finance through the Canadian wheat board, and any payments that would contribute to excess profits are required to be refunded.

This additional $8,000,000 is required for three reasons: (1) payments which were not claimed in the last fiscal year have come forward in the present fiscal year and have increased the amount beyond expectations; (2) domestic sales of flour have increased somewhat; and (3) most important of all, the domestic price of wheat was advanced recently from $1.25 to $1.55, thus substantially increasing the rate of drawback.

Item agreed to.

Vocational training—

688. Vocational training for discharged members of Canada's armed forces, including undischarged commitments of previous years—further amount required, $750,000.

Mr. PROBE: Will the Minister of Labour indicate whether or not this is straight training cost which is being asked for, or whether it includes capital equipment?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is just straight training costs.

Item agreed to.

Unemployment insurance commission—

690. General labour transference to industries and agriculture—further amount required, $100,000.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Some time ago there were reports on the radio and other information, on the basis of which I asked the minister a question, that some of these former members of the Polish forces were holding meetings and asking to be released from their agreement to work on farms for two years. At that time Mr. MacNamara had officials attend some of these meetings, but I have not heard of a report. Is the minister in a position to make a statement to the committee with regard to how many of these men have left the farms, and is it the intention of the Canadian government to see that those who leave the farms are returned to the country of their origin?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can give the answer in two words. I do not know of a movement of men which has been more successful than the movement of these Polish veterans to Canada. We did have some trouble with two or three around the city of London, but that has all been straightened out. Personally I have received but one letter of complaint.

Item agreed to.

Transport—

692. To provide for facilities and operations under the administration of the director of merchant seamen, and to authorize payment to the unemployment insurance fund of contributions to cover certain merchant seamen entitled to the benefit of part IV of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1946, under regulations approved by the governor in council and as provided in item 620 of the main estimates—further amount required, $1.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): Will the Minister of Transport endeavour to keep before the civil service commission the necessity for some addition to the wages of lifeboat crews on the Pacific coast? I believe he has that under advisement now.

Item agreed to.

Transport—General—National harbours board—

694. Halifax harbour—reconstruction of immigration quarters in shed 21—further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is the weather down there sufficiently warm now that construction can be proceeded with?

Mr. ABBOTT: I understand that they have had an early spring.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Mr. ABBOTT moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1947, the sum of $55,839,512.54 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Shall I be in order now to speak on some general matters?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may speak on the resolution, but his remarks must be confined to the terms of the resolution.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish to refer to a matter coming under the Department of Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN: This money already has been voted, and the committee is dealing with the ways and means of raising the money, not ways of spending it.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Abbott thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 108, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1947.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. ABBOTT moved the second reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Before we give the bill second reading, may I ask for the same undertaking that was given in connection with the previous bill?

Mr. ABBOTT: Yes; it is in the same form as the earlier appropriation bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish to say a few words in connection with the payment of subsidies on oats and barley. I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture has left the chamber, but I am sure the acting leader of the government will relay to him what I have to say and the advice I have to give. My information from the province of British Columbia today is that the farmer gains very little by the subsidy which has been granted on oats and barley because the feed companies in British Columbia, working under what I honestly believe to be a monopoly, have raised their prices to such an extent. As a result, the egg producers will have to produce eggs at a loss unless some action is taken by this government to increase the subsidies, either through the Department of Agriculture or under the omnibus bill.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, it is not carried yet. I supported the government on the omnibus bill the other day, but on Monday I am going to say something about the control bill. If there is to be a control bill it must be made to work; otherwise it should be withdrawn entirely. I want to make sure this matter is brought to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. The subsidies have been of little benefit to the egg producers of British Columbia; and unless some action is taken, I definitely intend to deal with the matter under the control measure.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I should like to support what has been said by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I have received letters from my part of the country expressing the same view.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. SPEAKER: It can be taken to be six o'clock now, so I leave the chair, and the house will resume its sittings at eight-thirty o'clock this evening. Since the house will have to go to the senate for royal assent, I would ask that there be at least twenty members in order to have a quorum.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest to the government that they protect us in this respect?

Mr. ABBOTT: We will do our best.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will pair with you right now.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at 8.30 p.m.

UNITED NATIONS

REPORT ON SECOND PART OF FIRST SESSION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the report on the second part of the first session of the general assembly of the united nations which was held in New York from October 23 to December 15 last year. Copies of the report are being circulated to all members of the house. The present copies of the report are in English; a French edition is in preparation.

Though the report is formally a report on the New York meeting of the assembly, it is in fact more than that. The discussions of some issues in New York were part of a process of study and discussion which had gone on in various bodies of the united nations since the end of the first part of the first session of the assembly in London. The report therefore covers many of the developments in the united nations during the whole period from the close of the London meeting on February 14, 1946 until the close of the New York meeting on December 15, 1946. This is indicated in the title of the report, which is "The United Nations, 1946".

The report is the third in the series of reports which the Department of External Affairs has issued on the united nations. The first report was on the San Francisco conference and the second report on the London meeting of the assembly. Together, those three reports describe the progress of the united nations and Canada's participation in it from the opening of the San Francisco conference to the end of 1946.

In many ways, this report is a departure from ordinary practice. It is not merely that it is more extensive but it is more explanatory and more outspoken.

Frankness is, I think, appropriate in a report of the united nations from the government of Canada to the parliament and people of Canada. The charter of the united nations begins with the words "We, the peoples of the United Nations". The charter thus recognizes a very direct relation between the united nations and the individual citizen of the member states. It is, therefore, fitting that the Canadian government should give to the citizens of Canada a full account of its stewardship in respect of the united nations.

The report contains not only a summary of the discussions and decisions of the assembly but also the text of the more important resolutions adopted by the assembly. It tells how Canada voted on about forty of the more important or the more controversial issues and gives the reasons why the Canadian representatives voted as they did. It also gives the text of the more important speeches made by Canadian representatives at the plenary meetings of the assembly and in the committees.

The report is a lengthy document and perhaps the members of the house would allow me to draw attention to some of the sections which might be of particular interest.

The preface to the report explains the structure of the united nations and of the various bodies linked to it. We thought that this might be useful because the structure is somewhat complex.

This is followed by a general survey of the work which the assembly was able to accomplish in New York. Perhaps I might mention some of the conclusions set forth in that survey.

More was accomplished in New York than could reasonably have been expected when the assembly opened. The assembly demonstrated that, when it had delicate political questions to deal with, it would usually deal with them with moderation and restraint. Usually, not always. It would be too much to expect of any deliberative body, when it is dealing with questions which arouse deep feelings, that it should always act with moderation and restraint. Appeals to passion and prejudice were made, for example, in the debates on the Spanish question and on the treatment of Indians in South Africa. These appeals were not confined to the advocates of any particular resolution.

Under present conditions issues like the Spanish and South African issues cannot be properly settled in a deliberative body such as the assembly by counting heads. Unfortunately this truth was not always recognized in the discussion of these issues but it was recognized in the discussions on disarmament. What appears to be the most important accomplishment of the assembly in New York was the unanimous adoption of the resolution on disarmament, and this unanimity was made possible only by the joint and sustained efforts of many delegations to reconcile the separate proposals which each had advanced. These efforts were based on a common recognition of the fact that, if an assembly resolution on disarmament was to have practical results, it had to be concurred in by all the heavily armed powers and by the great majority of all the other powers.

One encouraging feature of the assembly was that in voting on important questions there were few hard and fast blocs of states. To demonstrate this, we have included in the report an appendix showing how each of the 54 members of the united nations voted on ten significant issues. This table is worthy, I think, of careful study.

The general survey of the work of the assembly is supplemented by a somewhat similar survey of the work of the economic and social council. The structure of organized intergovernmental cooperation on economic and social questions is more complex today than before the war. In addition to the economic and social organs of the united nations itself there are at present seven, and there may soon be twelve, international organizations which are specialized and functional and to which large areas of international collaboration have been entrusted. It is hoped that this great series of organizations will provide for comprehensive and varied attack on those economic and social problems to the solution of which international collaboration can contribute. The range and complexity of the system, however, carry with them certain dangers. The report sets forth some of these dangers as we see them and some of the ways in which they might be minimized.

One of the dangers is that, because of the increasing number of international meetings and their increasing length, governments may find it difficult to send adequate delegations to all the meetings. It was for this reason that the Canadian government had included in the agenda of the assembly in New York an item entitled "measures to economize the time of the general assembly". Our views on this question, to which we attach considerable importance, are set forth fully in the report.

The general survey is followed by sections dealing with each of the main issues which arose in New York. These are grouped under six heads—political, economic and social, trusteeship, administrative and budgetary, legal, and other questions.

I shall not attempt to list these questions. I would, however, like to draw the special attention of the members of the house to the section on disarmament.

We feel that Canada was able to make a valuable contribution to the discussions in New York. On this question and in order that the record may speak for itself, we have included in the appendix to the report the text of the final disarmament resolution together with the various preceding drafts including the Canadian proposals. We have also included the speeches given by Canadian representatives in explanation of the Canadian proposals. It seems clear that, had the assembly adopted a disarmament resolution which contained the imperfections and ambiguities present in the original proposals, the debates, which would have been precipitated in the security council and the atomic energy commission on the precise meaning of the words of the resolution and exactly what the assembly had recommended the security council and the atomic energy commission to do, would have been long, harassing, and probably sterile.

As members of the house who have attended international conferences know, a great deal of the most useful work of a delegation does not appear on the surface of events. Perhaps the proportion that rises above the surface is very much the same as the proportion of an iceberg which is above the surface of the water.

As an indication of this, we have thought it wise to include in the report the text of the "working paper" on disarmament which was prepared in the Canadian delegation over three weeks before we formally submitted to the assembly our resolution on disarmament. We have also printed for the first time the memorandum on sanctions and the veto which the Canadian delegation to the atomic energy commission circulated to the commission on December 19.

Questions have been raised about Canada's attitude on the various issues which have arisen in the united nations concerning relations with the present regime in Spain. I think that hon. members will find that these questions are fully dealt with in the report. There is, for example, a statement of the position which Canada took on each of fourteen votes on the Spanish question.

In the hope that it might be of assistance to the special committee of both houses which is to be set up to study the question of human rights and fundamental freedoms, we have included in the report the statement of essential human rights which was drawn up by a committee appointed by the American Law Institute, the resolution of the assembly referring that statement to the commission on human rights, and the resolution of the economic and social council establishing the human rights commission.

During this session of parliament, the house may be asked to consider various questions relating to refugees and international relief. There are sections in the report dealing with these questions which might provide useful background material for the members.

The same applies to the sections in the report on the budget of the united nations and on the scale of contributions to those budgets.

The Canadian delegation to the assembly in New York contained members not only from the government side but also from the Progressive Conservative and C.C.F. parties. I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to express on behalf of the government our appreciation of the contribution which was made to the work of the delegation in New York by the leader of the opposition in this house and the leader of the opposition in the Senate and by the leader in this house of the C.C.F. party. We worked together as a team in New York. We discussed fully and frankly at daily meetings the problems with which the delegation was confronted.

This policy of sending to the general assembly of the united nations a delegation representing all the major political parties of Canada is an experiment. Under our system of government, the government of the day must accept full responsibility for every action of a delegation at an international conference.

That responsibility must be ours and we do not ask the opposition parties to share it. We do feel, however, that it is of immense value to the people of Canada to have leading members of the opposition parties participate at the united nations assembly in the discussions which lead up to decisions on the attitude which the Canadian delegation should take.

Pending the time when we may be able to have a discussion in this house of Canada's relations with the united nations, it might be appropriate to have this report considered by the standing committee on external affairs and, if I have the unanimous consent of the house, I should be glad to move that the report now tabled be referred to that committee.

Mr. CHURCH: The UNO is nothing but a tower of Babel. We should send missionaries over there instead of politicians.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the members of the house will welcome the receipt of this report from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). I rise to make one observation and to ask one question. The observation I wish to make is as a member of the Canadian delegation to the general assembly of the united nations which met in New York last fall. As a member of that delegation I wish to pay tribute to the man who was honoured in having been chosen as chairman of the delegation. We found not only the chairman of the delegation but the technical advisers well prepared for the heavy task which they had to perform. We found the minister always courteous and thorough and one in whom we could take pride as chairman of the delegation of which we were all members. While I am speaking of the chairman of the delegation I want my words to apply equally to all of the members, including the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar who sits to my left.

After glancing at the report which has been tabled, and from what the minister has said, I take it that it is not a report of the general assembly of the united nations but rather a report of the Department of External Affairs on what took place at that gathering.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: That is correct; it is a report of the part taken by the Canadian delegation in the activities of the assembly.

Mr. BRACKEN: It is a report of the Canadian delegation, or rather of the Department of External Affairs, dealing substantially with what took place at the general assembly in New York during the months of November and December last?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Yes.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Since the leader of the opposition has referred to the chairman of the delegation at New York I should like to associate myself with his remarks in that regard. Canada and the Canadian delegation were fortunate indeed in having the present Secretary of State for External Affairs as chairman of the delegation. As he said, we met every morning, and while sometimes we did not see eye to eye with him in every particular, through his ability he was always more or less able to bring us together to present something of a united front. I think that was a great tribute, both to the chairman and to all of the members of the delegation. I should like to associate myself with the leader of the opposition in paying this brief tribute to the work of the chairman.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I be permitted to ask the minister one question? I did not hear the minister mention the work of the security council. I realize that we are not on that council yet, although I have hopes that at some time we shall be. That council of course has been doing important work and is the one organ of the united nations which is heavily endowed with power. I wonder why in the report there was no reference by some of our observers in the Department of External Affairs to the work of the security council, which is of tremendous interest and concern to all Canadians.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This was intended to be a report of the Department of External Affairs on the participation of the Canadian delegation in the work of the united nations and the Canadian representative on the atomic energy commission who participated in the work of the security council on the atomic energy question. He was called in under I think it is section 31 of the charter of the united nations. Our participation to that extent was covered by the report I tabled the other day on the work of the atomic energy commission.

As to the activities of the security council, the hon. member will find that they are indirectly referred to in the discussion of the matter of the voting procedure in the security council, but that is the only portion that was covered. There will be available to hon. members copies of the report of the security council. There was a report of the security council to the general assembly, which served as the basis for much of the work of the general assembly on this second part of the first assembly.

Mr. GRAYDON: Have we an observer constantly at the security council gathering?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, we have not an observer. We have not appointed a representative to be permanently at the site of the united nations, and we have no permanent observer at the security council. Though I shared with my hon. friend the disappointment we experienced when we were not elected to the security council, I must confess that had we been there we would not yet have any accomplishment to be proud of.

WHEAT

SEASONAL DELIVERY QUOTAS ON BASIS OF SEEDED ACREAGE

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I wish to make a brief statement in regard to the basis of wheat deliveries in western Canada. Members of the house will recall that since August 1, 1941 wheat delivery quotas have been based upon what was known as the authorized acreage. An authorized acreage was established covering each farm unit in western Canada and delivery quotas were established on the basis of so many bushels per authorized acre. Authorized acreages were more equitable than seeded acreages whenever there was a possibility of a final limitation on producers' wheat deliveries in any crop year. Because it is not the intention of the government finally to limit wheat deliveries, it has been thought advisable on grounds of equity to use a seeded acreage basis in 1947-48.

Under the conditions which now exist the government is of the view that for the crop year 1947-48 and until further notice, any seasonal delivery quotas necessary for wheat and other grains in western Canada will be based on seeded acreage.

I am making this statement at this time in order that grain producers in the west may understand that any seasonal delivery quotas which may be established in the coming crop year will be on a seeded acreage basis for wheat and other grains.

VETERANS GUARD OF CANADA

DISBANDMENT—EXPRESSIONS OF THANKS ON BEHALF OF CANADIAN PEOPLE

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if the house will permit I should like to make a statement with respect to the veterans guard.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

Another stage has been reached in the demobilization of Canada's armed forces. We have already said good-bye to such fine war-time organizations as the Women's Royal Canadian Naval Service, the Canadian Women's Army Corps and the Women's Division of the Royal Canadian Air Force, better known with affectionate respect as the WREN's, the CWAC's and the W.D.'s. Now it is with feelings of pride that I call the attention of this house to the work of that splendid body of men, the veterans guard of Canada, due for disbandment today.

The veterans guard was authorized during the dark days of May 1940 to give the veterans of the war of 1914-1918 their chance to serve in the defence of the home front. They stood on guard for Canada in the front line trenches of 1914-1918 and in the second world war they stood on guard for Canada on the frontiers of their native land.

Amongst the tasks which their country asked them to undertake during the recent war was the protection of many lonely but important places on both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and many vital and vulnerable points in Canada where sabotage or any form of enemy attack might have been a national calamity. These men, too, willingly undertook one of the most wearing, tiring and thankless of all tasks with the firm discipline which they themselves had learned as Canadian soldiers, and, with the tact and humanity which they had learned as Canadian citizens, they guarded the enemy prisoners of war and escorted them back to Europe when the war was over.

In October 1941 the first members of the corps proceeded overseas for duty at Canadian military headquarters, in London, and other companies soon followed. A special detachment was sent to Newfoundland early in 1942 and companies were sent to the West Indies and British Guiana.

In the ranks of the veterans guard were men who had gallantly led their comrades into successful action in the great war of 1914-1918. Their ranks were decorated with the ribbons of two Victoria Crosses, 65 Military Crosses and bars, more than 75 Distinguished Conduct Medals and over 300 Military Medals.

At the peak strength in August 1945, nearly 9,000 veterans were serving in the veterans guard. Some of these men spent ten of the last thirty years serving their country in two world wars. Those thirty years should under happier circumstances have been the happiest and most productive of their lives, dedicated to peaceful tasks and the joys of family union. The fact that ten out of thirty years should have been spent in this way is a challenge not only to us but to the whole world of men to work with each other and with all nations, in order that such devotion and unselfish service can hereafter be dedicated, not to the harassing duties of war but to the advancement of national, international and human welfare.

On behalf of the Canadian people, I extend to the Veterans Guard of Canada heartfelt thanks for a good job well done, and a grateful farewell.

With regard to the demobilization of the remaining men in the three services who enlisted for the duration of the war or for interim service, a relatively small number are being retained, with their consent, until the end of September of this year to assist in putting the armed forces on a post-war basis. As this phase is completed, the men so serving will be progressively reduced and all will be out of uniform by September 30, 1947. This is the date by which every man who joined up for the duration of the war will have returned to civilian employment or enlisted in the post-war active forces.

This termination date will be marked by appropriate ceremonies, particularly to recognize the part played by Canada's reserve forces in our total war effort and to emphasize the great part that the naval reserve divisions, the Canadian army reserve force and the air force auxiliary squadrons can, and we trust, will, play in the post-war forces which should the need arise again will be available to serve our country. Every fit young man too young to serve in war should join one of Canada's citizen services. The reserve forces are proceeding with their organization and their essential place in Canada's national life in peace and war calls for strong support in every community.

Mr. G. R. PEARKES (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add just one word, if I may, to the remarks which have been made by the Minister of National Defence, because I had a large number of these old soldiers serving under me.

In the minister's statement three words stood out. The first was thanks, the second was farewell, and the third was challenge. Thanks and farewell are not enough for these old soldiers who have given up so much of their time to the service of this country. The challenge—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PEARKES: —is to this government to provide some sort of employment for these old soldiers and to make some sort of provision for them so that they may be reestablished in civilian life. Under the present regulations they are trying to get certain benefits—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think all members of the house, regardless of party, would like to associate themselves—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I thought the hon. gentleman had resumed his seat.

Mr. PEARKES: I had not. I wish to point out—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have allowed the hon. member to make a few remarks but I would point out to him that it is not permissible for him to make a statement or start a debate.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely he has the same right as the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAYDON: Oh, yes. He has just the same right and perhaps more.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): A shadow minister?

Mr. PEARKES: I am not playing politics—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. PEARKES: —I am merely speaking up for some men who served under me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. PEARKES: —and I have the right to do so. I want to say one more word regarding some old soldiers who have received notice that they are to be discharged on the first of April of this year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to be brief. He cannot make a speech. The statement made by the minister is not debatable and I would ask the hon. gentleman to be brief in his remarks.

Mr. PEARKES: I will be very brief, sir.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PEARKES: May I ask whether those permanent force soldiers who have done more than nineteen years' service and who hope to get a pension for twenty years of service, and have now received notice that their service will terminate on the thirty-first day of March, today, can also receive the thanks of the minister for the services that they have given, and also receive the consideration which the minister is giving to assist these old soldiers of the veterans guard?

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I think that all members of the house would like to associate themselves with the thanks expressed by the minister to the men of the Veterans Guard of Canada who have served their country so well. May I say that I should also like to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) and to express the hope that this country will do more for these old soldiers than merely to give them a vote of thanks.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): The members of this group, Mr. Speaker, would also like to associate themselves with the remarks made by the hon. member for Nanaimo. It can be truly said, I think, that the men who served in the first world war and the men of the veterans guard are Canada's forgotten men.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, speaking for the apex of the Liberal party, we would like also to associate ourselves with what has been said; only we hope that we shall have the same privilege of making speeches in favour of the veterans as has been accorded to the hon. member for Nanaimo.

Mr. LESLIE A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact you have permitted a debate on this question—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would call the attention of hon. members for the second time to the fact that I cannot permit a debate.

Mr. MUTCH: I shall be satisfied, Mr. Speaker, if you will afford me the same facilities as have been accorded to other members.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why don't hon. members over there yell "order" now?

Mr. MUTCH: In the beginning I should have been content to allow the Minister of National Defence, in what I thought were well chosen words, to pay tribute to these men for me as a supporter of the party. But I have had some opportunity to serve with the men who are being disbanded today, and as a comrade of theirs in two wars, speaking for myself and everyone on this side of the house —if we are going to do it in this way—I wish to pay my tribute and to express the hope that in view of their doubly difficult rehabilitation they will have not only equal but special consideration. I am sure that is the hope of this house.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. D. F. BROWN (Essex West) moved:

That the second report of the special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons appointed to continue and complete the examination and consideration of the Indian Act, presented to the house on Wednesday, March 26 last, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PRECEDENCE OF GOVERNMENT NOTICES OF MOTIONS AND GOVERNMENT ORDERS

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would ask for the consent of the house to move at this time the motion of which notice is printed on page 27 of the routine proceedings and orders of the day. When the house took recess some time after six o'clock on Friday, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who was then acting for the leader of the opposition, asked the leader of the house to indicate the programme of work for today; that was done, and it seemed to me to meet with pretty general satisfaction as being a proper programme for this day. But it so happens that that programme cannot be carried out in accordance with the standing orders of the house unless this motion printed on page 27 of the routine proceedings and orders of the day is considered at this time. There had been a motion made that government notices of motion have precedence over all other matters, but the introduction of bills, questions, notices of motions for the production of papers. But the effect of that resolution expired on Friday the 28th, and we would therefore, under normal procedure, revert to the standing orders which would be in accord with the proceedings as printed in the orders of the day.

I discussed this with several members of the house and it was suggested, amongst other things, that in making this motion at this time, the exception providing for the introduction of bills, questions and notices of motions for the production of papers should be extended and should include, from eight to nine o'clock in the evening on Tuesday and Fridays, private bills and public bills. That seemed to be a reasonable suggestion, and if I have the consent of the house to make the motion at this time I should be disposed to include that exception in the motion, so that on Tuesdays and Fridays from eight to nine o'clock private bills and members' public bills might be considered in accordance with standing orders so long as government business has precedence over other matters.

There is another feature which was pointed out to me, which I in turn discussed with my colleagues, and which we found was quite proper. I do not think any member of the house considers it to be entirely fair that private members should be deprived of the opportunity of bringing before the house matters which might not be on the routine proceedings and orders of the day. Having discussed that with my colleagues I am prepared to give the undertaking that so long as government business would have precedence under a resolution such as this, the government would as the first order of government business on each Monday move the house into committee of supply so that all hon. members would have at that time a full opportunity to air any grievances which they might have or to bring to the attention of the house anything not on the routine proceedings and orders of the day which they felt was of sufficient importance to engage the attention of the house at that time. I think it would be well if each Monday that is to be taken for government business, as the first order of government business there were a motion to go into committee of supply, so that every hon. member would have an opportunity to bring up at that time anything which he felt was of sufficient importance to warrant its being discussed. The intention of the government would not be to go on with the consideration of supply when the house got into committee, but rather to call two or three departments and have them opened so that they might on any appropriate occasion be dealt with in accordance with the standing orders.

If that arrangement seemed to be suitable, it might be taken as an undertaking of the government to move, on every Monday when government business would have precedence over other affairs, to go into committee of supply as the first order of business so that any question not on the order paper but about which any hon. member was concerned, could be discussed. We have now only today, tomorrow and a short day on Wednesday before taking recess and I think it was the general feeling that we should continue with the emergency legislation before the house. I would therefore request leave to move at this time:

That on Monday, March 31 instant and every sitting day thereafter until and including Monday, April 28 next, government notices of motions and government orders shall have precedence over all other business except introduction of bills, questions and notices of motions for the production of papers, and except, from eight to nine o'clock in the evening on Tuesdays and Fridays, private and public bills; and that standing order No. 15 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): The acting leader of the government has indicated the position in which we find ourselves today as a result of the way in which our programme is printed in the routine proceedings. The procedure allows private members' business to have priority over government business. The minister has suggested that we reverse that order and put government business before private members' business. As he has indicated and as we all know, in order that the change may be made now, notice not having been given before, the arrangement must have the unanimous approval of the house.

Speaking for the official opposition, when requests of this kind have been made to us, as has been the case several times this session, we have raised no objection, and we raise no objection now. I think it only fair, however, to point out what the minister himself indicated, namely, that particularly during this session private members have been asked to make sacrifices, and there should be some recognition of the position in which they have been placed. We have no desire to take advantage of the technical position in which the government finds itself today. I do not think we should. And I do not mean to urge the government to grant any more concessions to private members than their judgment would suggest. But the minister has said that from now on the government is willing to move to go into supply each Monday. To that extent private members will be permitted to discuss questions they feel should be dealt with. I think that is a good suggestion, and I support it. It is an ill wind that blows no one good, so if the situation confronting us today is a little difficult, I believe some good may come out of it for the private members of this house.

We are agreeable to the suggestion reversing the order of business today, provided that free discussion is permitted each Monday when the motion is made to go into supply, and provided that we are not denied the right to discuss matters mentioned in private members' resolutions, which under a narrow technical interpretation of the rules I understand might be denied us. I do not think that right should be denied. I would respectfully suggest to the minister that his proposal should not be limited to the period mentioned, but that he undertake that this motion be made every Monday from now until the end of the session.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I say that we too approve the suggestion of the minister, which I understand to be that on Mondays hereafter until these motions run out private members will have the right on going into supply to state any grievances or raise any questions they regard as of urgent importance. It is an improvement on the procedure we have followed in this house up to the present, and after trying it out we might consider making it a permanent part of our rules of procedure. We also approve the proposal to devote the usual hour from eight to nine o'clock on Tuesday and Friday evenings to private and public bills. That is something we appreciate, for it does give private members an opportunity of doing things which otherwise, under the resolution we have adopted this session with regard to procedure, they might not be able to do. Therefore I support the proposal of the minister and express the hope that we may be able to facilitate the business of the day by adopting it unanimously.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): The members of this group will be prepared to support the minister's proposal. I take it that on Mondays when the government does move into committee of supply, only one or not more than two departments at the most will be called. With that understanding we will certainly give our support to the suggestion.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I shall not ask to open more than two departments unless at the time I have the consent of the house to open more. With respect to the other suggestions that have been made, during the whole session Monday is a private members' day, and if we applied this rule during the whole session it would mean that Monday would not again become a private members' day; but that we can further consider. For the present all I am asking is that while we are taking something from the private members on Mondays, we call supply as the first order of government business so that there may be an opportunity of airing any grievance that may have arisen.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Mondays the minister has mentioned are the Mondays until April 28, or whatever date was mentioned by the minister; it was not the Mondays until the end of the session?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not beyond the time covered by the motion. We may have to suggest that the motion be extended at another time, but if that were done another undertaking would be given.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the minister to comment on the suggestion I made with respect to the possible limitation of debate on this motion to go into supply? Are we to be denied the right to discuss matters which may be mentioned in resolutions now on the order paper, but which have not come up for discussion? I think we should have the utmost freedom of discussion on Mondays.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I am not as well informed as I should be about the standing orders of the house. I was under the impression that we could not move the adjournment of the house to anticipate a discussion on something already on the order paper, but that on going into supply hon. members were not limited, and I would not like to see them limited, in anything they might feel it was proper to bring before the house at that time.

Mr. COLDWELL: But is that not a matter for His Honour the Speaker? No member of the government can possibly commit the Speaker to something which contravenes the rules of the house. That is the way it stands, at least on the face of the rules.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: So far as I am concerned I shall be prepared to rely upon the sense of responsibility of each hon. member, at a time when there is urgent public business to be attended to, not to raise anything he does not feel is of sufficient importance to warrant taking the time of the house.

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the house to the fact that this discussion has been agreeable and pleasant, and the motion probably will be adopted unanimously, because the acting leadership of the house is different. We do not any more hear anyone being called "irreverentially impertinent", which was something rather tough in reply to the word "touchy." When one feels that he is the lord spiritual because he has been appointed right honourable, it cannot cause anything but trouble. The discussion today has been very agreeable, between humble men, some of whom have titles and others of whom have not, and it is rather admirable. Last year I brought the attention of the Prime Minister through Hansard—I did not do it in any other way—to the fact that it was quite necessary to change the acting leadership of the house, and now that it has been changed we are at peace. I hope the acting leadership will remain under another sky for a very long time.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) referred to the possibility of having a trial of this proposal. I do not want to take much time just now, but I should like to bring up a matter which has to do with the business of the house, and I think this is the appropriate time to do it. At the risk of being accused of having repeated something I said on Friday night I want to say that I feel keenly about this. Will the government consider making an experiment after we return from the Easter recess with a view to changing the unearthly sitting hours with which we now have to put up and arriving at something that would be more satisfactory? If we sat every sitting day of the week from one o'clock in the afternoon until seven o'clock in the evening it would give us three more hours of actual time for debate. There would be no question of reducing the hours of sitting; it would simply be a matter of trying to find a more convenient and satisfactory, and shall I say a more humane arrangement for the House of Commons. I should like the government at least to try it out; if it did not work, no great harm would be done. After the Easter recess I suggest that for the first week the government consider sitting from one o'clock until seven to see if the proposal I am making will not work out in the interests of all concerned.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I can assure the hon. member that the government will give serious consideration to the suggestion he has made and will endeavour to have it considered by the chairmen of the special committees set up by the house to see if it will be possible still to have time to do that part of the business of the session which has to be attended to by the select committees. The select committees might have to meet somewhat earlier than eleven o'clock if the house were to meet at one. I think that is an aspect of the matter that should receive consideration. I can assure the hon. member that if arrangements can be made which will be more conducive to the convenience of hon. members and will allow the work of the session to be accomplished, it will be a great pleasure to me personally.

Mr. COLDWELL: I presume that the house itself will be consulted on this matter as well as the chairmen of committees?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Of course the government would not attempt to do more than to bring a motion before the house for the determination of the house, but I think the chairmen of committees should have an opportunity to consider the work they have to do and how they might have to arrange the sittings of their committees to fit in with any new arrangement for the hours of sitting of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: If it is adopted we will call it the Graydon rule.

Motion agreed to.

CRIMINAL CODE

ORGANIZATIONS ADVOCATING OVERTHROW OF CONSTITUTED AUTHORITY

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 133, to amend the criminal code (illegal organizations).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. LaCROIX: The communist party of Canada and the Labour-Progressive party of Canada and organizations with similar objectives and advocating the use of similar means of overthrowing constituted authority as developed in Canada under our constitution are a menace to the safety of the state and should be outlawed by an adequate provision of the criminal code. The government, with the approval of parliament, thought it necessary and expedient for the safety of the state to outlaw the communist party during the war. Such organizations constitute a great threat to the safety of our national institutions in peace time and should be suppressed in like manner. With this object in view it is proposed by this bill to declare the named parties illegal organizations under the criminal code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILL

QUEBEC NORTH SHORE AND LABRADOR RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. SARTO FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont—for Mr. Rinfret) moved the first reading of Bill No. 106 (from the senate) to incorporate Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Are we to have no explanation? I should like to call the attention of the house to one fact about this bill. It will take ten years to build this railroad and the company is to be permitted to build pipe lines, carry on shipping and ocean services, operate hotels and many other things —light and power developments, air lines, etc.

It gives them the right to do almost anything in Labrador, provided that authority is first obtained from Newfoundland. It is clearly ultra vires of the dominion.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

3. When will the principal be repaid?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1 and 2. After these advances had been outstanding for several months and no agreement had been reached on the terms of a long term credit to cover these and other purchases then contemplated, Canada proposed to the U.S.S.R. that the advances should bear interest at three-quarters of one per cent if paid off in cash within a relatively short time, or should bear interest at whatever rate was later agreed upon for a long term credit if they were covered by such a credit. As yet it has not been possible to secure the agreement of the government of the U.S.S.R. to the payment of interest at these proposed rates.

3. When the U.S.S.R. requested these advances, immediately after the end of hostilities in the Far East in order to purchase food for the U.S.S.R. troops which had been fighting the Japanese, the government of the U.S.S.R. undertook to repay them either by cash or on the basis of a long term credit agreement then under negotiation. As yet it has not been possible to secure the agreement of the government of the U.S.S.R. to a definite date for the repayment of these advances.

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Yes.

2. and 3. The expenditures including capital and operating on the Chalk river pilot plant have been as follows: For the fiscal year 1944-45, $2,830,106.82; For the fiscal year 1945-46, $14,202,466.82; For the fiscal year 1946-47 (to 28 February 1947), $6,504,828.26.

CENSUS—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. HAMEL:

1. As concerns the 1946 census in the prairie provinces, under whose authority was section 19 of the Statistics Act, chapter 190 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, which provides that the census shall be so taken as to ascertain the racial origin, religious denomination, etc., of the population, departed from?

2. If such deviation from the act was authorized by order in council (a) what is the wording of such order in council; (b) under what authority was it passed?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Minister of Trade and Commerce.

2. Answered by No. 1.

Note: It is the policy of the bureau of statistics to restrict the questions in the census schedules to those which supply essential information. For 1946 it did not appear to be essential that a question be asked on ethnic (racial) origin, in view of the fact that the question is asked at every decennial census.

The question on religion has not been included in a quinquennial census since 1916. It is sufficient to ask the question in the decennial census when the whole dominion is covered.

ARCHBISHOP STEPINAC

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie):

1. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs received any protests following the statements made recently by the Consul General of Yugoslavia, Mr. Popovitch, with reference to the Sovereign Pontiff, His Excellency Bishop Stepinac and the Roman Catholic church?

2. Has the Secretary of State for External Affairs taken any action in the matter?

3. If so, what action?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.

2. I have studied with great care the representations which have been made to the government concerning the statement which Mr. Popovitch was reported to have made in an interview published in the Montreal Standard on March 1, 1947. It is clearly the right and the duty of a diplomatic or consular representative of a country to use his best efforts to explain the policies and actions of his government and to clear up misunderstandings. Since we expect our representatives abroad to do this for Canada we should be the last to deny the same right and privilege to representatives of foreign governments in Canada.

The existence of the right is one thing and the way in which the right is exercised is another thing. A foreign representative is guilty of an impropriety if, in the course of defending the actions and policies of his government, he uses language which is clearly offensive. Part of the language reported as having been used by Mr. Popovitch we would regard as clearly offensive. If such language had been used in similar circumstances by a Canadian representative abroad, we could not object if the government to which he was accredited complained. In fact, we would reprimand him ourselves for having overstepped diplomatic propriety.

I understand that at the interview Mr. Popovitch spoke in French and that his remarks were translated into English for the benefit of the representative of the Montreal Standard. It is therefore possible that the account of the interview may not have conveyed precisely what Mr. Popovitch meant.

We are making inquiries about this.

3. Answered by No. 2.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What are the total amount of undue allowances of family allowances and the number of accounts affected?

2. Of the amount shown, how much is recoverable through suspension of the family allowances account?

3. What part of the total undue allowances is considered recoverable by other means of repayment?

4. How much of the total undue allowances is considered uncollectable?

Mr. MARTIN:

As of January 31, 1947:

1. $165,920.83; number of accounts affected, 4,644.

2. $102,860.00.

3. $48,826.83.

4. $14,234.00.

2. How much of each correspondent's material was published in the Labour Gazette in each of the years 1944, 1945 and 1946?

3. How much of the expenditures, if any, was cost-of-living bonus and for what reasons was bonus paid?

2. The material furnished by correspondents is of a general nature in reference to wage trends and employment and labour organizational matters in their respective districts, and while it does not lend itself to direct publication in the Gazette in the form communicated to the department it is a fact that the reports are useful in many ways in keeping the various branches informed on matters in which they are concerned and are of aid in preparing periodical data.

3. Of the expenditures in answer to question number 1, the payment of cost-of-living bonus yearly was: 1944—$992.07; 1945—$911.67; 1946—$585.94. The reason for payment of cost-of-living bonus to these employees is that they qualified therefor under the regulations laid down for payment of such increment to members of the public service.

UNITED NATIONS—PRESS OFFICER IN GREECE

Mr. JAQUES:

1. What is the official position of Stanley Ryan, reported as press officer, UNO, in Greece?
2. Where was his birthplace and what was his original name?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Perhaps I might answer this question orally. It has to do with one who is said to be an official of the united nations. We would not like to establish the precedent that the government should answer in the house questions about the personnel of the united nations. If the hon. member wishes me to do so I shall be glad to communicate with the secretary general of the united nations and secure the information and pass it on to him. I should not like to have it made part of the records of the house because although we are one of the united nations we do not think we should be required to answer in the house questions about the administration of that body.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask of what interest it is to anyone where this man was born or what his original name was? That is something that should not be taken up with the secretary general of the united nations.

Mr. JAQUES: Will the minister tell the house if this man is employed by the dominion government?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: This man is not in the employ of the Canadian government.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister's statement of the position with respect to questions on the united nations organization may be correct; I have not given it any consideration, but as no doubt from now on a number of questions on vital matters will be asked about the organization the government should consider seriously how far they can go in giving information.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Surely a member can stand up and ask a civil question.

Mr. SPEAKER: No debate is permitted on questions.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, if you are going to take the position that every member is to be put in a strait-jacket I am going to protest, and I do not mind telling Your Honour that I will.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WHEAT SUPPLIED TO CANADIAN DISTILLERS

Mr. FAIR:

1. During the period January 1, 1941 to March 1, 1947, what quantities of wheat were supplied to Canadian distillers?
2. At what price per bushel was this wheat sold?
3. Did the Canadian government contribute to the purchase price by way of subsidy?
4. If so, what was the amount of such contribution?
5. For what reason was the contribution made?

INCOME TAX—FARMERS

Mr. FAIR:

1. During each of the fiscal years 1939-40 to 1945-46, how many farmers were assessed for income tax in each province?
2. How many filed returns in each province each year during the above period?
3. What is the amount (a) levied; (b) collected in each province in each year during the period above?

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What materials, and what quantities of each material, capable of being used as foodstuffs were allocated or used by (a) distilleries; (b) breweries; (c) wineries, during the year 1939 and each subsequent year as far as the figures are available?
2. How far were the wartime regulations, passed on December 16, 1942, effective in accomplishing their ostensible purpose of reducing the amount of alcoholic beverages consumed in Canada as regards spirits, beer and wine?

PUBLIC BUILDINGS—POST OFFICES

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

1. How many new post office buildings have been built by the government since January 1, 1945?
2. Where have they been built?
3. What was the cost of each?
4. What was the gross revenue of each such post office at the date when replacement construction was commenced?

MEDICAL SERVICES—INDIANS AND ESKIMOS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What has been done by the government since the discussion last session on health estimates to provide relief measures in medicine and hospitalization services and medical assistance to Indians, Eskimos and those in outlying districts of Canada, either federally or with the assistance of the provinces, or municipalities?
2. What moneys have been spent on this work since then?
3. Did any deputation of clergy or medical men or others wait on the cabinet herein recently and what was the reply given to them, if any, by the government?

CANADIAN OVERSEAS FIRE FIGHTERS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has anything been done since last session to give a volunteer medal to the Canadian overseas fire fighters?

2. Have any other measures of equality of status been given to them in the same manner as those who served in the forces in the late war?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INCOME TAX—FARMERS

Mr. FAIR:

NAILS

SHORTAGES IN RURAL AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. WHITE (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the serious shortage of nails in rural areas, will the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply assure the house that farmers will be able to get sufficient nails to repair and maintain their buildings?

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am not in charge of the distribution of nails in this country. Certain priorities have been set up for housing requirements and those entitled to priorities will receive guarantees of supplies. I do not know that I can go beyond that. My hon. friend is a great advocate of private enterprise, and I can assure him that private enterprise is in charge of the distribution of nails.

Mr. STEPHENSON: If I may ask a supplementary question, an advertisement appeared in the Toronto Evening Telegram of March 22 indicating that nails could be bought, but only in carload lots, delivery to be made in from one to three weeks. Will the minister explain how that advertisement appeared?

Mr. HOWE: I did not see the advertisement. How would I know how the advertisement appeared? Perhaps my hon. friend can explain.

Mr. STEPHENSON: Our hardware stores are without nails and here is an advertisement offering them in carload lots.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. FRASER: On March 4 the minister told me that no nails had been exported from Canada. The export order went into effect February 2, 1946, but it was not fully carried out because permits had been issued before that date good for six months and many hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of Canadian nails were exported last year.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What is the question?

Mr. FRASER: I would like to know why it is that Canadians who want nails have to buy them from the United States, nails made by Canadian firms here in Canada.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has made a statement of fact. I hope he can prove it; I think he should. I say it could not possibly happen.

Mr. CASE: The minister mentioned priorities for housing. What about nails that are required for public schools? Is there any priority for them?

Mr. HOWE: The only priorities I know of are certain priorities for veterans' housing, and military establishments such as hospitals and occupational centres.

CANADA—U.S. BORDER

WITHDRAWAL OF UNITED STATES CUSTOMS PATROL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Is the Minister of National Revenue aware that today the customs patrol at the Canada-United States border has been withdrawn by the United States government? What complications are apt to arise involving the minister's department, and what steps are being taken to counteract them?

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we do not think that from our standpoint any complications will ensue. Our patrols will continue to operate as usual. We have never depended upon the United States for enforcement of our laws. I think it is perhaps a matter that is none of our business.

FREIGHT RATES

PRESS REPORT AS TO EFFECT OF INCREASE ON PRICE CEILINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, a Canadian Press dispatch today reports officials of the wartime prices and trade board as having said that the granting of a thirty per cent general increase in railway freight rates asked for by the railways would blow the lid off prices altogether. I shall not refer to the pros or cons of the railway rates case, but on a question of privilege, it seems that in the House of Commons we are denied the right to discuss railway rates, while in a bureaucratic assembly outside of this house they are allowed to talk all they like about it. Some move ought to be made by the minister to make sure that whatever privilege is given to them should at least be given to hon. members of this house.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the item in question, and of course I cannot control the newspapers. I do not know whether an official of the wartime prices and trade board made the statement which is attributed to him. If he made the statement it is no doubt an improper one for him to make; but I question whether any senior official of the board made the statement or would be quoted as making it.

HOGS

PRESS REPORTS OF SLAUGHTER OF BREEDING STOCK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, who is not in his seat at the moment. Perhaps he will take notice of it and answer as soon as he gets back. With respect to a Canadian Press news item of March 29, which states that thirty-one sows, nine with pig, were killed in two days at one processing plant in Winnipeg, is the government taking any steps to stop this wholesale slaughter of breeding stock? Unless something is done at once, our commitments to Britain will prove even more of a dismal failure.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MOTOR VEHICLES—COMPLIANCE WITH PROVINCIAL REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): On February 24 an answer was given to a question of mine by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence. I shall read only part of the question:

Do all national defence motor vehicles carry provincial licence plates?

To that part of the question the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence answered as follows:

All wheeled motor vehicles carry provincial licence plates.

The answer is partly correct; they carry provincial licence plates, but the parliamentary assistant did not say that they were 1943 licence plates, not 1946 and 1947 plates.

Hon. BROOKE CLAXTON (Minister of National Defence): I think I ought to correct my hon. friend. At the time his question was asked it was ruled not in order; therefore I do not see why it should be permitted now.

Mr. FRASER: What does the minister mean by saying it was not ruled in order?

Mr. CLAXTON: The question was not put at that time.

Mr. FRASER: The answer I have read was given to a question that I put on the order paper. That was the answer I received.

Mr. CLAXTON: I am sorry; I thought the question was as he had put it at a previous time when the question was not allowed. The situation is this. In all provinces except Ontario motor vehicles of the Department of National Defence carry licence plates of the current year; but in Ontario, at the request of the Ontario motor vehicle authorities, made in a letter dated December, 1943, we kept the 1943 plates in order to save the government of Ontario the expense of replacing plates from year to year.

Mr. FRASER: Further in regard to that, a check of twelve motor vehicles last Tuesday showed that three of them did not carry licence plates at all.

POSTAL SERVICE

RATES ON FOOD PARCELS TO UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): The Postmaster General is not in the house at the moment; perhaps I can put this question in the hope that he will be able to answer it tomorrow. Will the government now give consideration to reducing the present high postal rates on food parcels going to the United Kingdom?

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

COMPENSATION FOR DISEASE, DISABILITY OR DEATH ARISING OUT OF EMPLOYMENT

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 105, respecting compensation for government employees.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to say a word or two on this section. I realize that in the main the compensation boards of the provinces, particularly Ontario, with which I am best acquainted, do give first-class satisfaction. If a man's leg or arm is cut off or his eye is out or he is otherwise disabled and that disablement is quite easily seen, he is taken care of without any difficulty. But many men are injured and have industrial diseases which are difficult to observe. I do not wish to say anything that would in any way reflect on the medical boards of the compensation boards, but I am not satisfied with all that they do. For instance I know of the case of a man who had worked in a foundry for eighteen years. Knowing, or at least I used to know, all about foundry practice—and I have not forgotten all of it—I am convinced that he could not work steadily in a foundry for eighteen years unless he were fit. This particular man had the misfortune to bump his knee into some obstruction, a truck, or a wheelbarrow or some other such obstruction which is all too frequently in the way of people working in factories.

As I said, he had been working in the foundry for eighteen years. Because of that accident he was knocked out. He received compensation for some length of time; I have forgotten how long, but that is neither here nor there. The compensation board had their medical men examine him, and they declared that the reason he could not work was that his heart was affected and that he had an arthritic condition which caused his leg and knee to swell, thereby making it impossible for him to work. He is in bad shape. I believe he is on the road to his grave. In my judgment his condition is an industrial disease. How can it be proved that it is not? He was healthy for eighteen years; made his living for that length of time and all of a sudden he bumps into a truck or some other obstruction. On being examined some time after—I do not know how long after—the medical board stated that he had an arthritic condition as well as a heart condition. If he has, who is to prove that it is not the result of his accident? He could not possibly work steadily for eighteen years in the foundry business unless he had been 100 per cent healthy.

A moulder uses his knees all the time. He must be strong and healthy or he could not stand the smoke, soot and dust of a foundry. The particular man to whom I have referred has been discharged by the board. In my opinion he is suffering from an industrial disease. When the medical board states that a man who is now unfit to work because of an injury received while at work has no more claim for compensation, I do not agree with them. I believe, as I tried to say the other night, that workmen who now have no appeal, should be given that right.

I believe there is provision for appeal in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. Elsewhere there is no appeal from the medical decision of the board. The medical staff of the compensation board are not, in my opinion, to be put in the same class as the family doctor, who does his utmost for his patients, and is sympathetic at all times, whereas a member of a medical board under the compensation law is a government employee and does not need to care a fig whether he satisfies the workmen or not. As a result, I am sorry to say, in my opinion, too often the workman does not receive what he is entitled to. I have known quite a number of men who afterwards died from the injury or disease they contracted while working in a factory. All I wish to say is that if the act does not allow any appeal—I believe it does in certain provinces—

Mr. CHEVRIER: The three provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: —I would urge upon the minister that provision be made in the bill for any government employee or anyone working for any branch of the government, whether in a factory or elsewhere, who has the misfortune to be injured or to contract an industrial disease, to have the right to appeal. I think the act should apply to such people so that the workmen will have the benefit of appeal in all the provinces and not only in three. If it is right in three provinces it is right in all. I am concerned about this because I have seen such regrettable things. I do not find fault with the board. In the great majority of cases they give satisfaction. They do excellent work and, after men recover from accidents, try to provide jobs for them. There is much that I could say complimentary to the compensation boards. As I said before, years ago I was one of those who strongly advocated the system because my association with large numbers of working men was such as to suggest to me the necessity for something of the kind, and I was happy later on to see provincial governments passing compensation laws. In the operation of the law, however, I have not been 100 per cent satisfied. Am I asking too much when I suggest that the same treatment should be meted out to all working men throughout Canada as is given those in the three provinces mentioned?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I was going to say to my hon. friend that if there is appeal in the three provinces I mentioned—Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Yukon and northwest territories—it is because of provincial law. The point which he makes is the same one he raised the other evening when we were discussing this question. The Government Employees Compensation Act has proceeded on the basis of utilizing the services of provincial boards, and my hon. friend raised a point the other day when he said, "I hope the minister will not set up a whole new department". That is exactly what we do not want to do, but if we are to have an appeal court, then we must set up a whole new department.

As I understand compensation, it is a matter of property and civil rights to be dealt with by the provinces under the British North America Act. Not so, however, as regards government employees, and we in the Department of Transport have always proceeded on the basis that, while we had jurisdiction under the British North America Act, we should not undertake to set up a separate and different administration but rather should use the experience of the provincial boards which have existed. We have done that in Ontario and Quebec and in all the other provinces and have got along fairly satisfactorily.

In Ontario there is no appeal from the decision of the compensation board, and I presume the same position obtains in the province of Quebec. If we were to set up our own machinery in Ottawa, and proceeded to deal with these cases in the manner in which the boards deal with them across the provinces, then we would be doing exactly what my hon. friend the other evening did not want us to do when he expressed the fear that this would mean the establishment of a whole new department. I fear I have to tell him that, so long as we use the media which are at our disposal in the form of the provincial boards, we shall have to deal with the law as it exists in those provinces.

In the three provinces where there is an appeal court the decision of the officer or the board is subject to appeal, and in the other provinces, where there is no appeal court, unfortunately there is nothing under this act that we can do apart from what I have said, namely, setting up separate machinery, which would be costly.

Mr. MacNICOL: I appreciate what the department is up against and I am not in favour of setting up a whole new board. I know a lady who worked in a munitions factory during the war. I presume that would be a government plant?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: She had the misfortune, while operating a shell machine, to drop a shell on her foot, which was crushed badly, so that it was impossible for her to stand on that foot for more than a moment or two at any time. The board were very kind from the beginning. They gave her compensation for what they would call the usual length of time, but the fact is that she was unceremoniously discharged. Her own doctors were strong in their protestations. They said that she should receive compensation indefinitely because her leg was almost useless. If that happened in a government plant today, what would be the status of such a person under this bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: What province?

Mr. MacNICOL: What province?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think there would be any difference in the disposition of the case—it was under the order in council—provided that it was an accident. If the disability were an industrial disease, there is provision for that in this bill, which is not covered in some of the provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: All I can hope for is that some members of the legislatures in Ontario and the other provinces that have workmen's compensation acts, where there do not exist the facilities that are provided in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Yukon, will stand up in their assemblies and appeal for equal treatment for all workmen. I have seen too many workmen in my time who, in my judgment, were unceremoniously discharged when they should have been kept under the care of the compensation board.

Mr. ISNOR: I was pleased the other evening when the resolution covering this bill was introduced by the Minister of Transport, and on that occasion I asked him whether it would be retroactive and would take into account cases which were then under consideration by the department. The minister was good enough to advise me that such was the case.

It is not often that I bring up any individual case on the floor of the house, because I have found that the officials of the various departments are generally quite cooperative and I get results without having to appeal from the floor. But after reading section 2 of the bill dealing with employees, and the definition of "employee," "compensation" and "industrial disease", all covered in section 2, I am uncertain whether the provision is as broad as I had hoped it would be. Taking, first, paragraph (b) it seems that compensation will be dealt with along the lines provided in the province in which the accident occurs or in which the industrial disease is contracted.

Another point I would mention is the question of wage. It applies to an employee who is paid a direct wage or salary. I am going to ask the minister to explain later whether that direct wage will cover an hourly wage to a temporary or casual employee.

In order to bring this individual case to the attention of the minister in the hope that it will receive more consideration and more direct attention I must go back over correspondence which began in June, 1945. I will give the details as briefly as possible. The case received the support and attention of the Canadian Legion, Halifax branch, and many letters have been written by individuals in connection with it. I have had it before the Department of National Defence for Naval Services, as well as the Department of Transport on more than one occasion. I refer to the case of Murray Leonard Bowser, naval civilian employee, who was first employed in Halifax as time and material recorder. He entered the employ of the government on November 9, 1942. After serving in Halifax, he was transferred to Quebec in February, 1943, and I wish the minister to make a note of that. He remained there until he was brought home sick in January, 1944.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I interrupt the hon. member to ask if this man was a member of the Royal Canadian Navy?

Mr. ISNOR: No, he was not a member of the Royal Canadian Navy. I will enlarge on that. He received his call-up on February, 1942, if I remember rightly and, finding that he was in category "E", he felt he would like like to enter some type of war work. He applied to H.M.C. dockyard, Halifax, where he was taken on as a civilian employee, as I stated, and engaged as time and material recorder. During the time he served in Quebec, while working on shipbuilding materials, he broke out with some type of skin disease; and several doctors claimed that the basic cause came from the work in which he was engaged.

Bowser has been confined to either hospital or his home since January, 1944, and during that time has been in a pretty serious condition. He is covered with sores from his feet to his head. He is unable to lie in bed without suffering great pain. His mother, who is a widow, has exhausted all her means and impaired her own health in caring for her son.

I hesitate to go into such details, but I know the minister will bear with me; I feel the case is so important, of such a serious and distressing type that I must go into details to a certain extent.

When Bowser was first employed he was to serve for the duration of the war and in any part of the world where his services might be required. While in Quebec he was admitted to hospital, but a few days later released, the doctors advising him that his disease would clear up in a few days. Remember, that was in 1942 and he is still suffering. Since then his condition has grown steadily worse. Today I am informed he has become totally blind and requires to be bandaged from feet to head.

As I stated, I have had his case repeatedly before the Department of National Defence; there was correspondence from September 7, 1945; a reply was received on October 9 of the same year. The Canadian Legion had the case before the deputy minister for naval services since June 22, 1945. The department is not willing to accept responsibility, and that is why I am pleased that this bill was introduced, because I thought this was likely a bill covering this special case, one that did not seem to come within the scope of the province of Quebec workmen's compensation act. By the way, the workmen's compensation commission of the province of Quebec would not accept any responsibility in this case, and that is why Bowser paid his own expenses, or rather his family were obliged to pay his expenses and transportation charges back to Halifax so that he could receive proper treatment there. What I want to know, if the minister will be good enough to tell me, is this. Will this bill cover a case of this type; and what will be the procedure to be followed to bring about the results desired, namely, a recognition of the liability of the government to deal with a case of this kind?

Bowser's illness, as stated, started in Quebec while he was on duty. He was transferred home at his own expense. His doctor bills, board and hospital charges have cost his aunt and mother something like $3,000. His mother is a widow, is not in good health and can ill afford to meet this heavy burden. The Quebec workmen's compensation commission rule that this disease is a form of eczema, and eczema is not covered under the workmen's compensation act. I am questioning the minister whether it is covered in the term or interpretation mentioned in section 2 (b).

My late colleague, Mr. W. C. Macdonald, had the case reopened in October just prior to his passing to the great beyond, but a settlement had not been made up to the time of his death. Since then, the Department of National Defence for Naval Services has placed it before the Department of Transport. I think the date of that was November 4, 1946. I am giving the minister all the information possible in order that he may follow this case through, and I am hoping that he will find some way whereby justice may be accorded to this young man and to his widowed mother.

I think I have placed the details of this case before the minister as briefly as I could, while at the same time giving fairly full coverage so that the minister may trace it. I would appreciate it if, on the information placed before him, the minister would advise me whether he considers the act as framed today is sufficiently wide and broad to cover a case such as this?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am grateful to the hon. member for having gone into such detail in connection with the case of Mr. Bowser, which is apparently rather serious and to some extent unusual. The first question asked by the hon. gentleman was whether a person who is in receipt of a direct wage or salary, although a casual or temporary employee, is covered by this act. The answer to that question is, yes.

The next question asked was whether this particular case is covered by the bill or, in the alternative, whether this bill will afford any assistance to this particular individual. All I can say to the hon. member for Halifax is that this act makes use of the services of provincial boards. There are one or two questions which arise in connection with the case he has mentioned. The first is whether the accident, if it was one, or the disease, if it was a disease, happened or was contracted in the province of Nova Scotia or the province of Quebec. The second is whether the province of Nova Scotia or the province of Quebec pays compensation in connection with industrial disease, if it was a disease. I am informed that in Quebec compensation is paid for certain industrial diseases, but the hon. gentleman says this is a form of eczema which is not covered by the workmen's compensation board of Quebec.

I am afraid I would have to say to the hon. gentleman that we would be bound by the law of the province of Quebec, under section 2 and also under section 3. However I want to make sure such is the case, and I shall be glad to ask my officers—in fact I ask them now—to investigate this case to ascertain whether some assistance cannot be rendered this young man.

Mr. ISNOR: I thank the minister for his reply. If he should find that the Quebec compensation act does not cover a case of this kind I suggest that he is duty bound so to broaden the regulations and definitions that in future such cases will be covered, and I think such provision should be made retroactive to cover the case now under consideration. It is a national responsibility, as the hon. member for Vancouver North points out.

Mr. CHURCH: The object of the bill, as set out in the explanatory note, is to bring the act up to date. I should like to say a word with respect to the definitions. In the first place, this bill does not revise very much, as it should, the Government Employees' Compensation Act, which is chapter 30 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended. There has been a great war since that time, and these definitions are not nearly broad enough. Under this measure a man has to go to the workmen's compensation board, and follow through the whole procedure. Many of these men are among the lower paid government employees. If a man has a serious accident he may find that he is not covered by the workmen's compensation board act of Ontario; if he dies his family may be put out on the street. Many of these men have given long service. Some were with the old Grand Trunk which was taken over by the Canadian National. During the last war many of these employees were working night and day on trains going to and from Halifax. Some contracted diseases; many were overworked. They were not paid any war bonus. So I should like to see this statute broadened to include Canadian National railway employees of this class, who should be given some recognition for the fact that they often worked in demobilization eighteen hours a day. Many were injured; many contracted diseases, throat trouble, lung trouble, and so on, which could be definitely traced to their long hours of toil by night and by day, in all kinds of weather, both during the war and during demobilization. I do hope the government will consider these railway men, because they should be given some consideration.

In regard to the other features of the legislation, I believe the time has come when some appeal should be provided. As hon. members know, the workmen's compensation legislation is administered by a board, whose proceedings are very largely in private, with no one appearing for the applicant.

The CHAIRMAN: I believe this discussion would be more appropriate under a subsequent section.

Mr. CHURCH: I understand that, Mr. Chairman, but I am trying to harmonize it with the definitions given on page 7 of the bill. I believe those who come under the workmen's compensation act should have some court of appeal to which they might apply. I do hope the act will be broadened to include war workers, not only on the railways but in the other branches of government service.

Mr. CHEVRIER: As far as the employees of the Canadian National Railways are concerned they are covered by the provinces and not under this legislation.

Mr. BLAIR: I should like to ask some questions by way of an explanation of this bill. I understand that the regulations are different in the various provinces, some of which recognize industrial diseases while others do not. I should like the minister to say how he is going to equalize this situation. In one province a man who contracts an industrial disease is paid compensation; in another province he is not. As far as the compensation board is concerned, how does the minister intend to regulate the difference paid men in different provinces while off duty because of injuries? The point is that, as this legislation reads, compensation is payable under the compensation board of the province in which the accident happened or the disease is contracted, and I think we should have something broader. I believe something further should be in this legislation to take care of these men. I have had to deal with compensation board cases from other provinces, and I know there is a marked difference in the regulations as between one province and another. It would not seem fair that if a man contracted in one province a disease which was not recognized by the compensation board in that province, he should receive payment in another province.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman raises two questions. In the first place, he refers to the equalization of payments for industrial disease in the various provinces. It is a fact that the law operative under this bill is that which exists in the province where the industrial disease was contracted, but my information is that the compensation for industrial diseases in the various provinces is pretty much the same, that there is not a great deal of difference in the amounts paid. I am also informed that the acts of Ontario and Quebec, where there are perhaps more of these industrial diseases than anywhere else in Canada, do not differ greatly with respect to not only the number of industrial diseases recognized but also the kind of industrial diseases for which compensation may be claimed. To equalize the situation, as my hon. friend suggests, would mean setting up a separate administration, which would be a costly matter. I agree with the hon. gentleman that this might be the best thing, but if the Department of Transport were to do so the cost would be increased tremendously. As it is now, we are able to look after our employees in a manner which thus far has proven satisfactory, and the costs have not been too high because we have been able to use the administration already established in the various provinces. We deal with the administration. To equalize it would be a costly matter and I do not think I would be prepared to recommend it.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. BLAIR: As I understood the case presented by the hon. member for Halifax, there was something wrong that was not allowed in the one province as compared with another.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The case referred to by the hon. member for Halifax arose through the movement of a person residing in Nova Scotia to the province of Quebec. If I understood him aright, he stated the disease was a form of eczema and that is not allowed under the Quebec compensation act. It has been the practice of the Department of Transport to accept the rulings of the provincial boards. It is true that we could widen the scope and say that eczema should be included as an industrial disease, but in order for it to have effect it would have to be enacted by all provinces.

Mr. BOUCHER: Paragraph (e) of section 2 defines "minister" as meaning the Minister of Transport. Could the minister explain why that definition is confined to the one minister? Then, under section 12 the minister, meaning the Minister of Transport, may require any company, corporation, commission, board or agency to make contributions out of their payrolls. This act is not restricted to the Department of Transport, although the main intention may be to bring in the employees of that department.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Many years ago it was decided that the Department of Transport should be entrusted with the administration of this act for and on behalf of all other departments. Section 12 simply means that the minister may make regulations in so far as other departments are concerned as to how their employees should apply for compensation in the case of injury, death, industrial disease or otherwise.

Mr. FRASER: Section 12 refers to companies, corporations, boards and so on. The Canadair company, which is out now, was set up by the government as a privately owned management company which was to act as an agency of the crown. Would a company of that kind be covered?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not know just what the position of Canadair is.

Mr. FRASER: It acted as agents of the crown for the production of transport aircraft.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The charter setting up a company such as the Canadair company could contain a section stating that it be covered. I do not know what the circumstances were in connection with that company, but all that such a company would have to do would be to ask that it be covered and it could be done by order in council. In that way no one would be left out.

Mr. FRASER: Has the minister a list of corporations and crown companies that are covered?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have not it here.

Mr. FRASER: Is there a definite list?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There would not be a list.

Mr. FRASER: Should there not be one because of the position we are in at the present time with these different companies?

Mr. CHEVRIER: None of the employees of crown corporations, companies, et cetera as mentioned in that subsection will suffer in any way. If they are not covered by the act of incorporation, they can be covered by this section.

Mr. FRASER: I understand that the employees of the Canadian National Railways are checked, either annually or semi-annually, as to their physical condition. Is any provision made to have other government employees checked in a like manner?

Mr. CHEVRIER: This act does not cover the employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. PROBE: In supporting the argument he was making a few moments ago, the Minister of Transport said that the workmen's compensation acts in the various provinces did not vary substantially. My impression does not bear out all that the minister said.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think you will find that they do not.

Mr. PROBE: Will the minister be good enough to put on the record the compensation laws of the various provinces of Canada in support of his statement?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I can do that if my hon. friend insists but it would be a lengthy document. I presume what he would like me to put on the record is the position in Saskatchewan. If that is what it is, I shall be delighted to do so.

Mr. PROBE: I was not referring to that specifically, but I believe there is a fairly wide discrepancy.

Mr. CHEVRIER: With reference to temporary and permanent disability as well as benefits paid to widows and children, I think it can safely be said that the compensation payable is substantially the same in all the provinces. I am sure that the bill which we are bringing in contains greater benefits than any of them. Ontario, Quebec and Saskatchewan provide for advantages which are pretty much alike. There are some things done in Ontario which are not done in Saskatchewan, and vice versa. I presume my hon. friend is interested chiefly in the payments. In Saskatchewan, seventy-five per cent of the earnings of an employee are paid, whereas in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and the other provinces the percentage is 66⅔. In Saskatchewan the minimum compensation is $15 a week or the full wages if they are less than $15 a week, and in Quebec the minimum compensation is identical. In Saskatchewan the maximum compensation is based on a maximum salary of $2,500 a year, and this obtains also in Ontario and British Columbia. The maximum compensation in the other provinces is based on a maximum of $2,000.

Mr. PROBE: That is not in a form that can readily be put on the record?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No; it would be most inconvenient to do that. As I said a moment ago, there are some things that are done in the various provinces which are not done in Saskatchewan, but taking it all in all, the acts are substantially the same.

Mr. PROBE: That seventy-five per cent figure has been amended recently. I presume the minister is aware of that?

Mr. PEARKES: The government, including the Department of Transport, have entered into an agreement with the corps of commissionaires to supply guards for the various government buildings, and I believe the government deals with an organization known as the corps of commissionaires. Will the members of the corps of commissionaires when employed by the corps of commissionaires in guarding government property come under the provisions of this act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, for the reason they are not employees within the meaning of the word in section 2. I understand that they enter into a contract with one of the departments to do the work of guarding certain public buildings, and the interpretation of the Department of Justice is that they are contractors and not employees, so that they would not be covered.

Mr. PEARKES: According to a return which was tabled in answer to a question I asked a few days ago in connection with this matter, several departments are employing these men and dealing with the Department of Justice to which the minister referred. The return submitted by the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police shows that the members of the corps will be covered by the dominion unemployment insurance regulations, whereas the replies I got from other departments indicated that they would not be, because they were hired through the organization rather than direct.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman said unemployment insurance?

Mr. PEARKES: Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We are dealing with compensation.

Mr. PEARKES: Will they be covered by this act as well?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, for the reason given a moment ago.

Mr. FULTON: If the Canadian National Railways employees are not covered by this bill, would the minister say whether he proposes to bring them under it and whether the arrangements now covering them are as generous as the terms of this bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are covered by the acts of the provinces. The answer to the last question is that they would be given the same treatment as if they came under this act because we are governed by the compensation regulations in the various provinces.

Mr. LOCKHART: A man worked for the Department of Transport for a few years and paid five per cent annually into the retirement or superannuation fund, and then he was injured and retired from the government service but he was not allowed to withdraw the five per cent he had paid in. Would he be covered by this act? He received hospitalization and is no longer an employee of the government. He is asking for the return of the five per cent he paid into the retirement fund, but through some regulation passed in a certain year he has not been able to get it. Is he entitled to anything under this bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: The minister in reply to the hon. member for Kamloops said that Canadian National Railways employees were covered by the compensation acts of the provinces. In my province we have no compensation act. What provision is made for the employees there?

Mr. PROBE: You should have an act put through your legislature.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I drafted one some years ago but it never got through.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In Prince Edward Island there is no compensation act. What is done in that case is that the compensation act of New Brunswick applies.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Compensation and persons eligible.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood the minister to say that the railway employees are not covered by this act. Then what is the meaning of these words in line 24 on:

> Provided that the benefits of this act shall apply to an employee of the government railways who is caused personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment or is disabled . . .

And so forth.

Mr. CHEVRIER: This act applies to the employees of the government railways but not to the employees of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Canadian National Railways employees are not included with the government railways employees in this bill?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. The difference is this. There are some railways the title of which is still in the crown. For instance, the Prince Edward Island railways, the old Intercolonial railway, the National Transcontinental railway are known as the government railways and their employees are covered by this act. But the employees of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are covered by the various provincial acts.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that mean that the employees of the Canadian National Railways running west on the main line from Winnipeg are covered?

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are all covered whether they are Canadian National Railways or government railway employees. The Canadian government railways employees are covered by this act, but the Canadian National Railways employees are not. The Canadian National Railways pay their own compensation under the various provincial acts. If my hon. friend were to look at the workmen's compensation act of Ontario he would find that in schedule 2 of the act provision is made for the railway companies paying their own compensation individually.

Mr. FRASER: The minister said that the Canadian National Railways employees are not covered by this act but that the government railway employees are. Do they receive an annual check-up to see whether they are in good physical health?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes; there is a physical examination of railway employees, but I do not know how often it is made.

Mr. FRASER: Does the minister not think it would be wise to have all the government employees checked once or twice a year to make sure they are in good health?

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is a difference between health insurance and compensation. This deals with compensation, the other with health and sickness.

Mr. FRASER: I know this is compensation, but if a man is not in good health he is more likely to have an accident. That is what I am getting at.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not think it follows.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Would the minister elucidate one point arising out of an answer he gave a moment ago, pointing out that government railways is a phrase of different significance from Canadian National Railways. I appreciate that. When we get the annual report of the Canadian National Railways am I correct in assuming that it includes the operators of the old Intercolonial?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does that mean that the railway employees of the old Intercolonial have a different system of compensation from those who work on the old Canadian Northern, which became the Canadian National, or is the difference purely technical?

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is purely technical. The rate of compensation and the amount paid are the same in both cases, the only difference being that the Canadian National Railways, by virtue of an entrusting order, operates the Canadian government railways.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): In other words, the distinction is, so to speak, purely a history of the railways. It has no significance in respect of the actual operating conditions or the conditions of this compensation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It has no effect with reference to the amount of compensation, if that is what my hon. friend means. In other words if an employee of the Canadian government railways was entitled to compensation he would not get less than an employee of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Unfortunately he gets it under a different scheme, which is a matter of inconvenience to the operators.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It has worked out satisfactorily over the years.

Mr. McIVOR: I do not know whether this is the proper place to ask the question or not. Take a man who has served with a company for many years and is within two or three months of his pension time. If he leaves he does not get any pension. I know of one example of a conductor who served thirty-two years with the Canadian National and was not eligible for pension. It is true that the officials of the Canadian National gave him consideration, but it was not the same as a pension. At the moment, quite a number of Canadian National Railways employees are planning to do away with the railway pension and put it on a national basis in order that every man would contribute to a pension scheme from his earnings, so that in his old age he would get something or, if he passes on first, his wife would have something. Has this bill anything to do with that?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No.

Mr. BLAIR: Following up the questions of the hon. member for Peterborough West, may I say that I have been a railway surgeon for quite a few years. He suggested that there should be an examination. There is among employees on the railway one bone of contention which has to do with the question of hernias. I understand that the Canadian Pacific have instituted a regular check-up so that, when one of these things occurs, the compensation board have something to go on. It is a long and disabling condition. I would suggest that the minister who is speaking for the government railways institute a check-up. Even for the sake of that one injury alone it is worth while to have a check-up of the employees. The same thing would apply to the employees on the canals or any other employee because, as I said, it has been a bone of contention all through the years. I have had cases where it was difficult to prove where you knew the man quite well, but when you came to make up the forms you could not say that this man did not have the hernia before the accident happened. You could say that on a certain day when he was examined he was quite all right. If you could do that you would have something, and invariably the compensation board would allow it. If the workman had to come back and prove it somehow it would be exceedingly difficult. For the sake of the workmen of the Department of Transport, the group for whom the minister is speaking, I would suggest that it would be a good idea to have a yearly checkup for the sake of that one injury alone.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not able to speak for the Canadian Pacific; I do not know what the position is there, but I do know that in the Canadian National Railways there is a clinic where the employees have an annual check-up. There is the main clinic in Montreal, and I understand that there are other smaller clinics in other parts of Canada where their employees receive an annual check-up. So far as the Department of Transport is concerned, there are no facilities for annual examinations, but I should be glad to have a look at it.

Mr. LOCKHART: I raise this point again under this section. I am thinking of the employee who receives a personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. I have one case in mind and another one which has recently arisen. An employee was injured about six months ago and had to leave his employment. Is there any retroactive feature about this bill so that an employee can come under the benefits of this act?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Under circumstances such as I have described?

Mr. CHEVRIER: If his case has not been disposed of, section 10, subsection 2, would authorize the department to continue proceedings and award compensation if compensation is awardable.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Compensation to employees of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MacNICOL: Subsection 3 reads:

> An appeal shall lie from the decision of any board, officers or other authority determining the right to and the amount of compensation payable under this section to a judge of the supreme court of judicature of Prince Edward Island . . .

That is what I had in mind. If a workman is injured in a plant in Prince Edward Island or has an industrial disease contracted in a plant in Prince Edward Island he or his estate, if he died, would have an appeal from the decision of the board which said that this man had the condition before he had his accident, which is the usual term applied when a man is turned down. He or his estate has that right in Prince Edward Island, and I should like to see the same right granted in other provinces. In Ontario there is no appeal. If a workman is injured in Ontario and another one injured in Prince Edward Island the treatment accorded to these two individuals would not be the same in each province.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I do not want to add anything more than what I have already said. There is an appeal in Prince Edward Island because there is no compensation law in that province. They follow the law of New Brunswick which grants an appeal. I presume that is why the appeal was granted. Likewise in the Northwest Territories and in Yukon, a workman injured in the Northwest Territories is subject to the law of the Yukon ordinance which provides for an appeal, and that is why there is an appeal there. The remaining provinces do not provide for appeals. In order to cover the point raised by my hon. friend there would have to be an amendment to that part of the workmen's compensation act in the province where no appeal is granted.

Mr. MacNICOL: Can we not put it in this act so that a workman who is injured in Ontario and in New Brunswick would be treated in the same way? If a workman were injured in New Brunswick and he died from that injury his estate would have the right to appeal, but no such right is granted in Ontario.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That applies not only to appeals but to other matters, because there is a difference, although not a substantial one, between compensation as awarded by the various provinces.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: Will the minister elaborate on the necessity for the last two lines in subsection 3 which says:

> But no appeal shall lie from the decision of a judge in the first instance . . .

I cannot see the necessity for that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I presume that was put in there so that there would be an end to appeals. The section provides for an appeal from the decision of the board or the officers awarding or determining the compensation to the supreme court of judicature of Prince Edward Island whose decision shall be final. In order to have some finality, I presume it was decided not to have an additional appeal to a higher court.

Mr. MacNAUGHT: I think that is already provided for. It may mean that in New Brunswick probably on some occasion a judge has jurisdiction. If he has, then there is no appeal from him. Possibly there should be the same appeal from that judge as there is from the board.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I understand that is the case.

Mr. POULIOT: If I may be permitted, I do not think this applies to the employees of the former Intercolonial.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, it does.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister for that information. May I call his attention to some cases that are not satisfactorily considered by the provident fund. For instance, there is the case of a man who, alone, had to fire the furnaces of three boilers at Rivière du Loup. There were six doors to those boilers; they were fairly wide, and naturally there was an intense heat. One man had to do that work and it affected his health considerably. He went to the provident fund for superannuation, and the answer was, "Take liver pills; they will cure you at once".

I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, that most of the doctors of the Canadian National Railways are not humane and they treat some of the employees of the C.N.R. much worse than if they were dogs. Moreover, they are infallible. Those doctors are the scum of the profession, notwithstanding anything that can be said in their favour. Let me bring to the minister's attention the case of J. C. Beaulieu, fireman at Rivière du Loup. I have received no justice in this case. I wrote to the president of the provident fund and his answer was far from satisfactory. He told me he would submit the matter to the next meeting of the board in the first days of March. That was done and still the answer was negative. I know Mr. Beaulieu very well and he has been doing the work of three men when acting as fireman.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I ask the hon. gentleman whether this is the case in which a railway worker was injured?

Mr. POULIOT: His health was injured. Of course he did not suffer visible burns on his hands, arms or legs, but the exposure of his body to the six doors of this furnace affected his system. His complexion is bad. He cannot do that work. He had no assistants. I am sorry to have to bring this case here, but I took every means I could to have a satisfactory arrangement made, and it is impossible to get a satisfactory answer from the compensation fund. There they are, and their duty seems to be to refuse to consider reasonable and justifiable requests from the men. I see my hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) nodding, I hope in agreement. Probably he has had some difficulty in the central region. I am not speaking of the Atlantic region.

I will tell the minister more than this. I have said it was impossible to get satisfaction from the provident fund. When I saw that, I wrote to the Quebec minister of labour and asked him to investigate the case, to send some competent man to see what could be done to improve conditions, because I did not want that man to die on duty. There are cases where men have been told that they were well when as a matter of fact they were ill. The doctor says, "You are well; you are well", and the first thing you know, the man dies on duty. He was so well that he was ready for heaven. This should not happen in a civilized country.

These doctors are the scum of the profession, even worse than the bureaucrats we have here. They should be fired and we should have decent men. There are many men who are competent and we should have competent doctors there.

I complain also of the Canadian National doctors in Montreal. They are awful. And in Quebec we have Delaney, who is a monstrosity. We hear something about the progress of the profession, but Delaney was put there by Borden years ago, and he is a procrastinating Tory and an ignorant doctor. He is there in charge of the men who go there and he makes the examination. There are others I could name, but I forget the names of some of them in Montreal. They are awful, and it is impossible for the railway employees to have their cases considered favourably by the doctors in charge of the provident fund in Montreal, Moncton, Levis and elsewhere. Therefore, before compensation is paid to the men, I think the provident fund should be fair to those who are entitled to their superannuation and who have paid their dues. They should get some advantage from that fund when they are in need of it.

I hope there will be provision in the bill. I know the minister is himself sympathetic to these poor fellows, who do not receive the consideration they deserve. I hope he will arrange it so that the bill shall provide to have these men treated fairly. I want to see them treated with justice in the future.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know under what item the hon. member for Temiscouata was discussing the provident fund of the Canadian National Railways. I believe that is what he was discussing and I do not think it is covered here, but with all due regard for the hon. member, may I say this. I have no great veneration for the medical profession, but I do not think it is proper to call the doctors connected with any institution the scum of the profession. We should make such statements only when we have those men here so that they can defend themselves. Perhaps this item should be taken up in the railway committee when we are dealing with the affairs of the Canadian National.

However, the point raised by the hon. member for Temiscouata is something that everyone finds who is dealing with people who come under boards of this kind, and it arises from the fact that, after a short time, professional men dealing with so many cases come to regard not the individual—he disappears—but simply a case; and when they have a case it is not necessarily a human being but simply a case. The result is that the human relationship which exists between your family doctor and a member of your family does not exist here. We should try to get away from that sort of thing. The hon. member, however, is not quite fair—I hope he will excuse me for saying so—in the terms he has used. After all, if you sit in a smoking car and hear what the general public think of members of parliament, it is not a bit flattering either.

Mr. CHEVRIER: May I have a word in connection with the case raised by the hon. member for Temiscouata. What the hon. member was dealing with—and I say this with respect to him,—was not a case of compensation under this act. It was a case of pension under the provident fund, which is an entirely different matter. The case of the fireman whose health was affected I have reason to believe is such as my hon. friend says it is. But this act as it is framed deals not with the health of individuals but with accident which causes injury or death or with industrial disease or with pulmonary tuberculosis as we shall see in a moment, I hope. The case my hon. friend deals with is not one which I think is covered by any of the sections of this act, as I understand it. With reference to railway employees, discussed a moment ago, I told the committee that the Canadian National employees and, I presume, the Canadian Pacific employees were not covered by this act. The only employees covered by this act are those of the Canadian government railways. The medical men of the railways with whom the Department of Transport has to deal, have certainly been found by us to be competent in every way.

Mr. POULIOT: I have just one word to say. Of course the hon. member for Vancouver East is entitled to have his own opinion; but he is not familiar with the condition in eastern Canada, which is very bad. I would not condemn all doctors of the Canadian National Railways, but the exception confirms the rule. There may be someone who may be good, but when we have a case that we know is a worthy one, and when it is impossible to get a satisfactory answer from the learned faculty, the only thing to do is to realize that there must be a nigger in the woodpile. I will explain the point to the minister. There is, of course, a difference between a man who breaks his arm, breaks his leg or loses an eye in an accident, and a man whose health is destroyed gradually because of his work for the railway or for any other organization. But in both cases the result is the same. The only difference is that in the former case the result of the accident is seen at once, and in the latter case the health is destroyed gradually. It may take years to affect the man to the point that he is unable to continue his work satisfactorily. What I want to tell my hon. friend is that no one can argue with those doctors. Their decision is final and they never make a mistake, according to themselves. When it is established to them that they have made a mistake, they will never admit it, and the report goes out that the man is well. This I find to be wrong and unjust. It is impossible to discuss the thing with them. Even with certificates from independent doctors establishing that the man has lost his health in doing a certain kind of work under abnormal conditions, it is impossible to make them change their opinions. Against such a condition I protest strongly; and I will tell the minister that it would not be fair to these men not to incorporate in the bill provision for those who suffer gradually but who suffer more than those who happen to be the victims of an accident and may be cured of a disability.

Mr. McLURE: Is it because Prince Edward Island has no compensation act of its own that it is attached to New Brunswick?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. McLURE: In that case anyone meeting with an accident in our province would, in the minister's opinion, have just as square treatment as if Prince Edward Island had an act of its own?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. McLURE: He would come under all the conditions provided under the act in New Brunswick?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. HAZEN: Is there provision in this bill for an appeal in the case of an employee?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In New Brunswick?

Mr. HAZEN: No, in any other part of the country.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. What guides the Department of Transport in the administration of this act is the provincial law. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island rose to point out what the position is in that island. The law of the compensation board of New Brunswick applies, and, as I understand it, New Brunswick has an appeal. That being so, there would be an appeal from a decision of the board not only in Prince Edward Island but also in New Brunswick, but not in any other province save the Northwest Territories and Yukon.

Mr. HAZEN: They are the only others who do have an appeal?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is the meaning of the words in the second last line of subsection 3, "but no appeal shall lie from the decision of a judge in the first instance"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That means that there is not more than one appeal. There is an appeal from the judgment of the board or the officer determining the compensation; but, after that, there is no appeal.

Mr. MacINNIS: But if that officer should be a judge in the first instance, there is no appeal from his decision. Is that what it means?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Northwest Territories.

Mr. JAENICKE: I read recently that the residents of the Mackenzie river region protested about having been included with the Yukon Territory in connection with representation in parliament. Have they been consulted as to whether the law of the Yukon Territory should apply with regard to the Northwest Territories rather than that of some other province?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No, they were not consulted. There is no law in the Northwest Territories or no ordinance governing compensation. What is done in this case is the same as is done in the case of Prince Edward Island. There is in the adjoining territory of Yukon an ordinance covering compensation; and what this act does is to make that ordinance applicable to the Northwest Territories.

Mr. JAENICKE: Would it not be more convenient to have the Alberta law apply rather than the law of the Yukon Territory?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The officers of the department thought otherwise.

Mr. JAENICKE: Would residents of the Northwest Territories not require to go to the board of Yukon in order to make their representations? That would in my opinion be inconvenient as far as travel is concerned.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There is no board in Yukon. It is done by means of an officer of the department who deals with the cases and who puts into operation the tariff and the compensation as covered by Yukon ordinance.

Mr. MacINNIS: My understanding of the workmen's compensation act in Yukon is that it is inferior to the acts in at least some of the provinces, such as British Columbia, Ontario and perhaps the other western provinces. I think it is unfair to the residents of the Northwest Territories, when the provisions of the provincial acts do apply, that they should be put under Yukon law where the compensation law is inferior to that of some of the other provinces. I think there is a great deal of merit in what has been said by the hon. member for Kindersley. While I am not very familiar with the compensation act in Alberta, I think it is superior to the compensation law in the Yukon Territory, so that it would seem only fair that the Northwest Territories should be placed under the Alberta law or the Saskatchewan law, whichever would be most convenient.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If that argument were carried to its logical conclusion, then I suppose any province in which a workman was insured could say that the employee should be entitled to the benefits paid in that province which was most generous. For instance, British Columbia pays compensation for pulmonary tuberculosis, which is not done in any other province. If the argument of my hon. friend were carried to its logical conclusion, a person suffering from tuberculosis in Nova Scotia would be entitled to claim the benefits paid under the law of British Columbia. In a sense it is perhaps unfortunate that it is not possible for the federal government to set up a separate organization. I dealt with that matter a short time ago in answer to a question raised by the hon. member for Davenuport. If we were to accept the argument of my hon. friend, however, the same point could be raised in Yukon. However, I can tell the hon. gentleman that there are very few cases in the Northwest Territories or in Yukon. I do not know the number, but I am told that over the period of a year there would be very few, and that there are still less now that the war is over.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not believe the minister is using his usual good logic in this matter. Government employees in Nova Scotia would be covered by the compensation law of that province.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That would be the case with government employees in the Northwest Territories, also.

Mr. MacINNIS: But in the Northwest Territories there is no compensation law, and you are placing them under the compensation law of Yukon. I say you are putting them under an inferior compensation law when there is a superior law just as close, if not closer. I am suggesting to the minister that he reconsider this and put government employees in the Northwest Territories who come under this act under the law of Alberta or Saskatchewan, whichever may be most convenient.

Mr. HERRIDGE: In support of the argument advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver East, I wish to say that in this case I do not believe the minister is as logical as usual. The other provinces and Yukon have compensation laws. In the case of the Northwest Territories the government is in the position of being able to make a choice, because they have no compensation law. We are pleading with the minister to make the best possible choice for the men in the circumstances.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): In support of the hon. member for Vancouver East, I would point to the physical difficulty of getting mail into Yukon, where I presume the headquarters of the compensation board would be located. That would be very difficult, and would take a long time.

Mr. JAENICKE: With great respect to the minister, I do not think his argument is valid. Prince Edward Island does not have a compensation law, and you provide that the law of New Brunswick shall prevail. Why not apply some provincial law to the Northwest Territories?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is exactly why we apply the law of Yukon to the Northwest Territories.

Mr. MacNICOL: On the question of the Northwest Territories being associated with Yukon, I may tell the minister there are two high ranges of mountains between the Mackenzie territory and Yukon. I have flown over them, and they go as high as 9,000 feet. There is no transportation between Yukon and the Northwest Territories unless you go away down to Fort Nelson and then back up again. I think the hon. member for Vancouver East has a point there, and it might be better to put these people under Alberta or British Columbia instead of Yukon, where it is difficult to maintain contact.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think there is some misunderstanding on the question of transportation. There is no difficulty in dealing with cases arising in the Northwest Territories because the law applicable is that of Yukon. Any accidents that may occur are dealt with by an officer of the Department of Transport in Ottawa. If hon. members will look at the act they will see a provision that, where no board exists, or court or officer or other authority to determine the amount of compensation when an accident occurs in the Northwest Territories, the compensation payable is determined by an officer of the Department of Transport in Ottawa, so that no difficulty arises in connection with the dispatch of mail, or because of geographical obstacles.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But is it not the case that the settlement is made on the basis of the lower compensation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is right.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is there any reason why the minister should not reconsider this point? I do not imagine many workers are involved; and the minister might decide that for the purposes of this act settlements will be made on the basis of the compensation paid in Alberta. Would he not consider the matter during the dinner recess?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have given this point serious consideration, and I do not believe any reconsideration during the dinner hour would change the issue. I thought the hon. member for Vancouver East was raising the point that the government pays lower compensation in the Northwest Territories, including Yukon, than it does in other provinces; and in order to give him satisfaction one would have to amend the workmen's compensation ordinance of Yukon. That authority is administered by the commissioner of Yukon, and the suggestion would have to be considered by that department.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would there be competent medical men in the Northwest Territories well versed in industrial accidents and diseases who would be able to make a thorough report to Ottawa for the information of the officer of whom the minister spoke?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that there are, that we get the usual reports from them when an accident occurs or a disease is contracted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am afraid the minister's information is entirely wrong. I should say it would be out of the question that there should be medical men at Yellowknife, for instance, as competent to survey industrial accidents and diseases from that point of view as other medical men elsewhere might be.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Does the department use the machinery of the compensation boards already established in the provinces?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes.

Mr. HERRIDGE: Then I think that gives added validity to our argument. A man in Yukon would not have his case studied by medical men having long experience in dealing with compensation cases.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: We were discussing section 5 when the committee rose at six o'clock. It seems to me that the minister was trying to create difficulty over the point that I raised, difficulties which to me are not inherent in the statement I was making. I think all that is necessary to be done is to change the last words in the section, "Yukon Territory" and substitute therefor the province of Alberta or any other province that the minister would care to insert. If a person was seriously injured in the Northwest Territories and he was covered by this bill I imagine that the obvious thing to be done would be to fly him to Edmonton, Prince Albert or some other nearby city where the doctors and staff of the provincial board would be available.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reason why accidents which might occur in the Northwest Territories were made subject to the laws and ordinance of Yukon Territory is that conditions of employment in Yukon and the Northwest Territories are alike. The question of treatment which has been raised by my hon. friend has nothing to do with the matter of compensation. It might be that the injured person would have to be flown to Vancouver, depending upon the nature of the injuries, or he might be flown into Edmonton or some other place, but he would be subject to the laws of Yukon. I asked my officers to find out the number of accidents that had occurred in the Northwest Territories and Yukon, and I find that in the fiscal year 1944-45 there were no claims from either of those territories; in the fiscal year 1945-46 there were two claims which were settled, and thus far in this fiscal year there have been no claims. In view of the small number of claims I think we were justified in drafting the section as it has been drafted.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think the number of claims is at issue at the moment; we are dealing with a principle. The government has seen fit, and I congratulate it, to cover government employees in Yukon, but I am looking forward to the day when, under the progressive policies of my Liberal friends there will be a large population in the Northwest Territories and then most likely more accidents will occur, although we do not look forward to that result. Seeing that the government is placing the employees in each province under the compensation act of that province, I think the logical thing to do, when there are no compensation laws in a district, is not to put the employees of that district under the antiquated compensation laws of another district. I submit that the compensation laws of Yukon are certainly not good.

Mr. CHEVRIER: They are not antiquated.

Mr. MacINNIS: Maybe they are not old enough to be antiquated, but they are not satisfactory to the workers in Yukon. I had a long brief from the miners in Yukon less than a year ago and I have a fairly good idea of the laws in that district.

Section agreed to.

Sections 6 and 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Disability or death from pulmonary tuberculosis contracted in government operated hospital or sanatorium.

Mr. HAZEN: It seems to me that this section is good and proper in view of the way in which the bill has been drafted, but in my humble opinion the bill has not been drafted properly. I should like to go back and refer to section 3, which provides that an employee who is caused personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment will be eligible for compensation. There is no definition in the bill of the words "injury by accident". As I read the bill, "injury by accident" by this section would mean only industrial disease. The bill does not provide that infectious disease is necessarily injury by accident. It is provided under the British workmen's compensation act—and this was decided by the courts over forty years ago—that an infectious disease not classified as an industrial disease may be an injury by accident. This bill contains no such provision, and it seems to me that the words "injury by accident" should be interpreted in the interpretation section in order that the boards which will administer these matters—there is no appeal from most of these boards—will have something to go by when it comes to interpreting those words.

We had some discussion about this matter last year when the bill to compensate merchant seamen was before the house. I do not want to go through all that again and I have not looked up the English cases since, but it does seem to me that there should be an interpretation of the words "injury by accident" which would be wide enough to include infectious diseases which are not classified as industrial diseases. It has been held in English cases for over forty years that the words "infectious diseases" come within the meaning of the act. I think we are not doing justice to the employees and workmen whom this bill is intended to protect unless we have a definition of that kind and unless we go so far as to provide in the act that infectious diseases in some cases at least are industrial diseases.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I remember the discussion we had of this question on a previous occasion when it was raised by the hon. member for St. John-Albert. He states that there should be a definition of "injury by accident". It goes back to the discussion we had this afternoon and the other evening. If we are to accept the decisions of the provincial boards of what is an accident and what is an industrial disease we have no alternative but to do as we are doing here. If we do not do that; if we were to set up a new and entirely separate body, as was suggested this afternoon, I presume that we could cover cases such as those to which my hon. friend has referred. But in order to save a great deal of expense we have decided to use the machinery already set up in the provinces, and in doing that we do not define what the diseases are. We simply define what an accident is and leave it to the provinces to say whether an infectious disease is an industrial disease within the meaning of the act. I think that is the proper procedure to adopt; at least it is what I have been informed should be done.

Mr. HAZEN: The only point I wish to make is this. As the act is worded, some employees at least who should get the benefit of the act will not benefit by it. They may suffer an infectious disease owing to and in the course of their employment. Nevertheless the interpretation that has been put upon the words "injury by accident" by the boards in many provinces is not wide enough to cover them. It is not what I consider the just interpretation that has been given to these words by the British courts. The boards have limited the meaning of these words, and the consequence is that some men who will come under this act will be deprived of the benefits which they should receive under it.

Mr. MacNICOL: Section 8, from line 34, reads:

> . . . where an employee is disabled or his death caused by pulmonary tuberculosis due to the nature of his employment and contracted within twelve months previous to the date of disablement while employed in a hospital or sanatorium operated by the government of Canada wherein tuberculosis patients are treated . . .

That is all very well for employees who contract tuberculosis in hospitals, but tuberculosis also occurs in plants and in other places. It may occur in some of the many plants which the government are now operating. I have known many men in my time, as I am sure the hon. member for Huron-Perth has too, with his wide experience in foundry machine-shop practice, who contracted tuberculosis perhaps through working in a damp part of the plant. The dampness and dust sometimes bring on tuberculosis, but it is impossible to get the boards to agree that the tuberculosis which these men contract is a result of their employment. I have known a number of them myself who contracted tuberculosis, as the family physician would certify. I have the highest regard for the family physician. His heart is with his patients. I agree to a large extent with what the hon. member for Temiscouata said in words much better than I could use in reference to medical boards set up by governments and doctors working on government staffs. Obviously the family practitioner would be much more sympathetic to his patient than a government doctor would be because, as the hon. member for Temiscouata wisely said, he would have a personal interest in the patient, whereas a government doctor does not need to care particularly because he has an assured position anyway.

I want to be sure that section 8 covers those workmen who contract tuberculosis in a government institution outside a hospital, because they can contract tuberculosis working in a plant, and I can assure the minister that it is next to impossible to prove before any compensation board that the tuberculosis was contracted during the course of their employment. It is not much use trying. I have tried several times on behalf of men who, I firmly believe, contracted tuberculosis during the course of their employment in a plant, but it was a sheer waste of time to try to convince the board that that was the case.

I should like to feel that this bill would cover the government's own workmen working in its own institutions other than hospitals. Take, for instance, the work the government is constructing on Snare river north of Yellowknife. Men there may fall into the water and contract tuberculosis through exposure. Those men should be protected by compensation just as much as the employees who contract tuberculosis through working in a sanatorium. I am interested in this matter because of a long association with working men. I commend the government for what it is doing for the working man in this bill. The bill is wide and even goes outside Canada to protect government employees, and the minister deserves credit for that, but I should like to see it wide enough to cover the case of a workman, no matter where he may be, who contracts tuberculosis while working in any government plant, and if he dies his estate should have the right to compensation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The object of this section was to protect any government employee who might contract tuberculosis in a hospital through contact with patients. It was thought advisable to cover cases of that kind. The hon. gentleman asks if the bill covers employees who have contracted pulmonary tuberculosis in the course of their employment in government plants. The answer is no, unless they are covered by provincial legislation. The experience thus far has been that there have been no claims, at least that have come to my attention, of employees contracting tuberculosis in government plants. For that reason it was felt that this section would cover the situation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What about hospitals?

Mr. MacNICOL: In some cases it is impossible to get them past the compensation boards because they have made their decision; they have taken their stand against the man and are determined not to let him get compensation. Once the compensation board have given their decision they think it is like the laws of the Medes and Persians; their decision cannot be changed. In New Brunswick they have the right to appeal to the judge. I would take a chance before a judge because he would not be interested except in giving justice. He would call all kinds of medical men to give evidence and advice. Once a compensation board have come to a decision that tuberculosis is not caused in a plant, they will not change their decision and that is why nothing has come to the minister's attention in that regard.

Mr. CHEVRIER: In answer to the hon. member for Lake Centre, there has been one case.

Mr. BLAIR: The minister has taken a step in the right direction in introducing this legislation, but I doubt whether it goes far enough. It all gets back to the question on which I spoke this afternoon. Employees in a tuberculosis sanitarium will have to be examined before they go in. It should be necessary that they be X-rayed before they are taken on employment by the government.

That brings up another question. Some times before the disease is noticed these people live with their families, and after they are admitted to the sanitarium as a patient we find that several of the children are infected. The children then have to be dealt with according to the legislation for tuberculosis in that province.

Would the minister consider putting in a section which would make it necessary for these people to be tested before they are employed in tuberculosis sanitaria and also something for the protection of the families of these men who might be infected afterwards?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that the regulations will cover periodical examinations, not only examinations of these employees before they enter the hospitals and when they are discharged but also periodically while they are there.

Mr. FRASER: That brings up the question I asked earlier this afternoon. Why not have all the employees checked at least once a year?

Mr. CHEVRIER: That would be a matter for the provinces.

Mr. FRASER: I do not know; they are all employed by the government.

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. This legislation uses the services and the administrative offices of the workmen's compensation boards in the various provinces, in so far as section 8 is concerned, because section 8 introduces a new principle and extends the principle of compensation to cover tuberculosis as an industrial disease. For that reason regulations have to be authorized under this section. That is why I gave the answer I did to the hon. member for Lanark.

Mr. FRASER: Here we have a bill to pay compensation after something has happened; but we have the national health department spending millions of dollars. Surely they should step into something of this kind and give examinations at once to the men and women, and at least once a year. It is preventive.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Section 8 endeavours to achieve a laudable object with which I am in agreement, but I am afraid that the wording of this section will defeat the intention of the draftsman. The section reads:

> The governor in council may make regulations prescribing conditions under which compensation shall be payable, the amount of compensation payable and the manner in which compensation shall be determined . . .

Why the words: "prescribing conditions under which compensation shall be payable?" This leaves wide power to the governor in council. As a matter of fact it does not provide for payment to persons who are disabled or suffer death through pulmonary tuberculosis contracted while employed in a hospital or sanitarium. It leaves power to the governor in council to prescribe the conditions under which compensation shall be payable. I think these words are unnecessary. The minister should reconsider the redrafting of the section to provide, first, that compensation shall be payable under these circumstances to each and every employee who is disabled or whose death is caused by pulmonary tuberculosis while employed in the hospital or sanitarium; then, second, that the power to make regulations shall be available. This is simply a permissive section. It in no way provides that compensation shall be paid.

It provides further that the governor in council shall make reservations prescribing conditions under which compensation shall be payable. That is a peculiar term. I do not know what it means. Possibly there may be some explanation as to its meaning, but in any event it does not first create the absolute right of the individual who incurs this disease to compensation; it provides only that the governor in council may make regulations providing for the payment. I suggest reconsideration and redrafting that part of the section. As a matter of fact, as I look over the act—and I have looked over the workmen's compensation acts of the various provinces—I know of no case in which such a section has been provided. It merely creates a permissive condition; it does not obligate the government to compensate an individual suffering from this disease; it merely provides that the governor in council may prescribe the conditions. The governor in council might say, you have to work there for a certain length of time; if you did not have an examination when you first went in you are not entitled to compensation. All kinds of possibilities are there.

As I said a moment ago, I suggest that the section should be reworded to provide that an employee who is disabled or whose death is caused by pulmonary tuberculosis because of the nature of his employment, and contracted within twelve months prior to the date of disablement, while employed in a hospital or in a sanatorium operated by the government of Canada, and so on, shall be entitled to compensation within the meaning of this act.

Then subsection 2 would provide power to the governor in council to make the necessary regulations as to the amount of compensation payable and the manner in which such compensation shall be determined.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I say to the hon. gentleman that there was a clear intention when this section was set up. The intention was to cover something which is not already covered by certain of the provinces.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is right.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I think the intention is clearly set out in the section as it reads, namely, that the governor in council may make regulations prescribing conditions under which compensation shall be payable. There is therefore the intention in the section that regulations should be made under which compensation shall be payable.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Regulations prescribing conditions.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I shall deal with the other point afterward. My understanding of the section is that it sets out the intention, which is to pay compensation under the circumstances set out in the section.

Then my hon. friend says that the governor in council may make regulations prescribing conditions. There are no conditions under which employees suffering from tuberculosis may claim compensation, save in one province I know of. That being so, someone has to set out the nature of the conditions under which compensation shall be determined, whether it shall be under the law of the province of British Columbia or under conditions such as may appertain in another province. The Department of Justice, who have looked at the section feel that it answers the purpose and that it means exactly what it was intended to mean, namely, that the compensation for these cases shall be payable. To add weight to what I have said, I would ask the hon. member to look at the last words of the section: "and compensation shall be payable in accordance with such regulations." There is therefore a repetition not only of the intention but of the enacting power to pay compensation in that case.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But suppose regulations are not made; then there is no compensation payable, none whatever, to those suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis contracted while working in a hospital. In other words, parliament is leaving it to the governor in council to determine the right to make provision in that case. I would ask the minister to answer this question. Does he suggest that different conditions would attach to the right of an individual to be paid compensation in Ontario from those that would obtain in Nova Scotia? He said a moment ago that, as far as British Columbia is concerned, that province already has provision for it under the British Columbia workmen's compensation act, and he said that in other provinces the conditions might be different. Is it intended that the conditions shall be different in each province outside British Columbia?

Mr. CHEVRIER: No. It is intended that the regulations shall be uniform.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, but the minister made that statement.

Mr. CHEVRIER: When I made the statement what I meant to convey was that there were already regulations in British Columbia, and while it might be found that they were the best and those regulations might be followed, it did not necessarily mean that they would be, and there might be an improvement on the regulations as enacted in that province.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Possibly it would clarify the matter if the minister would inform the committee of the nature of the conditions in respect of which the governor in council would make regulations. What are the conditions under which compensation shall be payable? I thought compensation was to be payable when a person working in a hospital became disabled one year after commencing employment. What other conditions will determine the right of an individual to compensation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am afraid I cannot give my hon. friend the conditions under which regulations would be made, because they have not yet been made, and, further, the conditions would have to be determined in consultation with another department, the Department of National Health and Welfare, which is vitally interested in this section. What we are asking for here is the power to enact regulations to take care of cases such as are covered in section 8. My hon. friend asks, what assurance have we that that will be done? The only answer I can give is the similar assurance we have in other cases, namely, that the governor in council will not thwart the will of parliament but will enact regulations under the power we now seek.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister allow me to ask from another angle the question which the member for Lake Centre has asked. Turning to section 2, paragraph (c), are any of the companies, corporations, commissions, boards or agencies referred to in this paragraph under benefits prescribed by provincial acts?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Perhaps I can answer that in the way in which I answered the hon. member for Peterborough West, who asked the same question this afternoon. Some of these corporations, bodies and companies mentioned in paragraph (c) are already covered by the charter which incorporates them as a body corporate. Some are not, and those that are not can be covered by this paragraph. Does that answer the question?

Mr. HACKETT: Yes, it answers it, but I thought that possibly if section 8 which is under discussion were amended to make it clear that all that escaped from the section are the companies in paragraph (c) which fall under provincial legislation, the loophole which the hon. member for Lake Centre has pointed out would have been closed and there would be certainty that everyone was covered.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Section 8 will apply to the group mentioned in paragraph (c) of section 2.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would it not be a simple matter just to have the statute provide that compensation shall be payable in the case of persons becoming disabled or dying from the disease within a given time, and then give the government authority to make regulations carrying out the wish of parliament as expressed? With great respect, sir, as I read it now—and I do not think I am wrong—it simply says that the governor in council may make regulations prescribing conditions and so on. If we pass it now, in view of the minister's answer that he has no idea what these regulations are, then we are passing something which is completely in the air and must be entirely meaningless. This is parliament speaking, not the regulations speaking, and if we simply said that, in the case of persons being disabled by this illness within twelve months, or dying from an illness contracted within twelve months after entering employment, compensation would be paid, we would know exactly what we are doing and we would be content that the government should make regulations carrying out the direct will of parliament. It is, I think, a matter of some moment. It is not merely a matter of wording, because we as a parliament should say that they shall be entitled to the compensation. Then we could go ahead and make the regulations and no one would complain about it. But it is the indefinite way in which it is worded that bothers us.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed by those who drafted the bill that that is exactly the meaning of section 8; that what my hon. friend advocates now is in effect what section 8 says.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am awfully sorry, but whoever is advising the minister should take another look at it.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am not a legal man, but from the point of view of the words it is a matter of confusion as between the terms "regulations" and "conditions." To my mind, the condition under which this compensation shall be paid is the condition of the person contracting tuberculosis, and the regulations should be made to fit that particular condition. But that is the condition as I see it.

Mr. FRASER: If the employee is disabled he is out. I think the words "contracted pulmonary tuberculosis" should be in there, because if a man has it he might only have been checked up by the medical officers and found to have a mild case of it and he would not want to continue until he was disabled. I think the whole section should be cleaned up and that put in there. If he has contracted tuberculosis, it should be in that act.

Mr. HAZEN: Might I ask the minister a question?

Mr. FRASER: I think the minister ought to answer that.

[Mr. A. L. Smith.]

Mr. CHEVRIER: I feel that I have answered my hon. friend. He has asked that question now on more than one occasion.

Mr. FRASER: I know, but the minister has not made it clear whether a man must be absolutely out, unable to work, before this operates.

Mr. CHEVRIER: My hon. friend wishes me to give a legal opinion on this section, and I do not intend to do that.

Mr. FRASER: No. I desire to see that the man gets a fair deal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: All that I can tell my hon. friend is that section 8 provides something which no other provincial act, save perhaps one, does. It extends compensation to government employees who contract tuberculosis in the course of their employment in government hospitals and sanatoria. That is what the section does, and I am afraid I cannot go any farther.

Mr. FRASER: It does not say "contract". It says "disabled". Therefore the man, even if he did have tuberculosis, would continue until he dropped before he would get compensation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If my hon. friend reads the section correctly he will see that it says:

> . . . where an employee is disabled or his death caused by pulmonary tuberculosis due to the nature of his employment and contracted . . .

Within a certain period prior to the date of disablement. There are the words.

Mr. FRASER: Yes, but he must be disabled before it is proven that he contracted it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: He certainly must be disabled before he can claim compensation.

Mr. HAZEN: Why is the compensation to the employee limited to within twelve months prior to the date of disablement? I can well visualize a case where a man contracts this disease and where he may continue working in the institution for six or eight months or more before anybody realizes that he has the disease. He may continue working there, or he may have worked there for a considerable time. He may have contracted the disease, say eighteen months prior to the date of disablement. He may have been working there for eighteen months and then it is discovered that he has this disease. In a case like that, why should the man not receive compensation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reason why the twelve months is put in there is that in most of the provincial enactments there is a limitation of twelve months for contracting an industrial disease; and this tuberculosis is in the nature of a disease and is so considered under that section.

Mr. HAZEN: Does the minister not agree with me that a man might work in an institution for eighteen months before it was discovered that he had this disease and before he became disabled? In a case like that he would not be entitled to compensation, the way this section is worded. It hardly seems to me that that is fair or right. If he is engaged and has worked in the institution, say for eighteen months, and then becomes disabled, as this section is worded he is not entitled to compensation. The disease must be contracted within twelve months prior to the date of his disablement. He may have worked there for eighteen months before he became disabled, and he may have contracted the disease prior to the twelve months and yet not be entitled to compensation if the disease is not discovered and if he is not unable to work. Suppose he has worked for eighteen months and nobody knows he has the disease; then, as I read this section, he is not entitled to anything. Surely that was never the intention. While I am on my feet, may I ask one more question? Why is this section limited to pulmonary tuberculosis? Are there no other forms of the disease that a person may get while working in one of these institutions?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will answer that question later. I am trying to find out whether there is any other kind of tuberculosis in our hospitals.

Mr. POULIOT: Before the minister answers, I wish most sincerely to thank the hon. member for Davenport for his kind support. He has proven once more that he is the friend of the underdog; that he wants to protect the humble and the poor who suffer in this country, and he deserves the highest praise for that.

With regard to section 8, this is most progressive legislation and the minister should be given credit for it. I read in the previous section something about one who is disabled by a disease due to the nature of his employment. This is exactly the case that I referred to this afternoon. It was an industrial disease due to the nature of his employment, and it was not acknowledged by those who should have noticed it and should have granted what the man was asking for. If this law does not apply anywhere else than in Yukon and the Northwest Territories, I hope that the same spirit will prevail throughout Canada and that instructions will be given to the doctors of the Canadian National Railways to be more careful in examining the men who come before them.

Mr. MacINNIS: I, of course, cannot add anything to all the legal lore that the lawyers have woven into this section up until now. I do not suppose it matters a great deal, but whenever a lawyer looks at a section, I always think he looks for ways in which he could get a litigant out of it if it came before him. I think the important thing here is that the government has recognized pulmonary tuberculosis as a compensable disease, and is making provision for it in this act. I think, if the section is as satisfactory as the minister says it is, the regulations under the act should provide for examination not only before the person was engaged, but for periodic examination; because it would be much easier for the government, with an examination every twelve months, say, to take a case before the person was disabled than it would be to wait until after it had found the incidence of tuberculosis, and then leave it until the person could not work. I do not suppose the government would do that sort of thing, but that is the important thing in regard to the regulations. If care is taken to see that the regulations are drafted accordingly, I have nothing further to add to this part of the discussion.

Mr. BLAIR: I think this should be drafted more clearly, because a man who is a tuberculosis suspect will receive the same treatment under the compensation board as though he actually had the disease. Suppose they X-ray a man and find a suspicious shadow. He will be given bed rest and treated as a tuberculosis case, and will be eligible for compensation. As far as "pulmonary" is concerned, it must be assumed that if he contracts any kind of tuberculosis while working in a sanatorium he will be eligible for compensation board treatment. There is no other place he could get the disease. I think it would be well to strike out the word "pulmonary". A man may be a suspect and given bed rest for perhaps six, eight or nine months. During that time I believe he should draw compensation.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The reason the word "pulmonary" is put in before "tuberculosis"—and this also answers the question of the hon. member for St. John-Albert—is that in these hospitals and sanitaria we have only patients suffering from pulmonary tuberculosis. Therefore the employees, male or female nurses in the employ of the government, working there are liable to contract only that kind of tuberculosis.

Mr. BLAIR: Because a man is working in a sanitarium, it does not follow that if he contracts tuberculosis it will be pulmonary; he may get it somewhere else. It is the same bug, as far as that goes. It does not follow that, because he is handling a case of pulmonary tuberculosis, he will contract only pulmonary tuberculosis himself. He may get tuberculosis in some other part of his body. As far as compensation goes, suppose he gets tuberculosis of the bone; a pulmonary tuberculosis patient may be the source of the infection. I think the Minister of National Revenue will agree with me.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Of course I am not a medical man like my hon. friend, but before we drafted this section we consulted the medical men of the Department of National Health and Welfare, and after a great deal of discussion with them and with the officers of the Department of Justice this is the section it was thought would best cover all these circumstances.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Does the minister not think he should let this section stand so that it might be redrafted? Consider the point raised a moment ago by the hon. member for St. John-Albert. I am not a doctor, but we all know persons contract tuberculosis over a long period of time, as we have seen in the case of some of our friends. It is only at a much later time that the disease is actually discovered. My hon. friend suggested eighteen months. I have seen people finally disabled with this disease who probably suffered from it over a matter of years, let alone months. So my suggestion to the minister would be that he permit this section to stand, and consult his two departments and perhaps redraft it. I believe we are all aiming at the same result; I do not believe there is any real controversy, because we are all trying to assist these people. While the hon. member for Vancouver East may say the lawyers are finding holes in the legislation, it is better to find them now than later on.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I should like to accede to the request of the hon. gentleman, who, I know, is an accomplished lawyer, but again I wish to assure him and hon. members opposite that a great deal of time was spent in drafting this section, and it was not put in here without a great deal of study. It was submitted to experts in the Department of Justice who say that the section as drafted covers the case. In any event, I do not think it is suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite that this section, as now drafted, does not make compensation payable once the regulations have been set up. It is certainly the intention to set them up the moment this section is approved.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I suggest that no lawyer in the Department of Justice will tell the minister that, under this section as it stands, it is mandatory to compensate anyone who has contracted tuberculosis in one of these hospitals. That is a pretty broad statement, but I will stand by it.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to see the scope of this act extended, because it is supposed to be a revision of the statute of 1927 concerning the compensation to be paid in these cases. As I said this afternoon, I should like to see the interpretation section broadened to define an employee as any officer receiving a wage or salary from the government of Canada or from any board or commission connected therewith. That would make these people eligible for whatever compensation is provided under this legislation, not only as a matter of right but as a matter of health.

I might refer to just one department, the Post Office Department, where there are cramped, crowded conditions. I have seen nearly a thousand men and women working night and day under intolerable conditions at the postal terminal in the union station in Toronto. Then take the postmen, who have to go out on the streets in the dead of winter, with snow waist high, to deliver the mail. Many of these men contract this disease. Under this legislation, compensation is limited to those who contract the disease in a hospital. I received a letter in this connection one day, from a man who could not get any relief from the workmen's compensation board. I wrote and told him that I was sure the taxpayers of Canada did not want to see the government act like a dead-beat toward their own employees who might contract this disease. If they die their families are given no consideration unless the death occurs in a hospital, or something like that. Why it should be limited in this way I do not know. So I believe the section should be revised and rewritten to include all government employees, as well as employees of outside boards and commissions, who suffer from this terrible scourge as a result of their work or services. Finally, I believe it should be extended to the employees of the Canadian National Railways, which is a commission connected with this government. I believe the definition of an employee should be broadened to include these workers. Some of the men on the demobilization trains running from Halifax right through to the west coast worked at times eighteen and nineteen hours a day after the war. They should have some reasonable compensation for disabilities they might incur, as well as a war-time bonus for the hours they spent for nearly seven years in this work.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am not going to offer any opinion on the points under discussion, but I am going to express surprise at the attitude of the minister, and for this reason. Here we have competent lawyers suggesting that this clause does not do what it is intended to effect. The minister's answer, as I understand it, is not that he disagrees with that suggestion, but that he is of the opinion that the clause has been considered already by competent lawyers who have assured him that it will do what it is intended to do. I have had some experience with the legal profession, though I am only a reformed lawyer myself, and I suggest to the minister that if this were referred to the competent people who have considered it, together with the point which has been raised by, I suggest, perhaps equally competent lawyers on this side of the house, they might quite conceivably take a different view. Why the minister is not prepared to do that is something I find it difficult to understand.

Mr. CHEVRIER: There are many things my hon. friend does not understand.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Do not get rough; we are trying to be helpful.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am not getting rough at all, but my hon. friend is trying to be smart, and I am talking about the hon. member for Calgary West now. Do my hon. friends on the other side say that there are no competent lawyers in the Department of Justice?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): No, we do not say that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: That is exactly the impression my hon. friends are trying to create.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): If the minister will permit me, I will restate what I said.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman need not restate what he said because I understood him perfectly well.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I want to restate what I said because the minister stated it wrongly. I will restate it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: We have a new lawyer now in the person of my hon. friend.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am acting in the quality of a client; I am quite an expert client, if that does the minister any good. What I am saying is that we have lawyers here whom on the minister's own statement, he considers to be competent and who have questioned this. The minister does not say that he disagrees with them; he does not say that I must be prepared to accept his opinion as a lawyer. All he says is that this has been considered and that it must not be reconsidered, as the hon. member for Calgary West suggested, by those gentlemen who have already considered it. My hon. friend is not asking that their view be not taken; he is asking that this point, which has been raised and which so far as we know has never been before them in exactly the way mentioned, should be reconsidered by them. That is quite different from what the minister said I said.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I will tell my hon. friend that the manner in which the section is now drafted is no different from the manner in which many sections of this kind have been drafted before. The words "the governor in council may make regulations" have been used from time to time in legislation, but what my hon. friends would like to do is to insert the word "shall" in place of the word "may".

An hon. MEMBER: We were told it means the same.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would refer my hon. friends to the words "and compensation shall be payable in accordance with such regulations" at the end of the section. What the hon. member for Calgary West wishes to have in this section is, in fact, what is already in it. My hon. friend does not agree with that interpretation, which is his right and privilege. However, I say that the section as it is drafted now does exactly what it is intended to do.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Apparently the minister and I have a slight disagreement, but I hope he will accept my word that we are trying to be helpful. I have no intention of replying to him in the angry manner in which he replied to me, so we shall just pass that over. I merely suggest a redrafting, not just for one reason but for the additional reason of the words, "contracted within twelve months previous to the date of disablement." Surely there is some merit in that and when the minister has cooled out, as we say with regard to race horses, I am sure he will consider that it is at least worthy of his consideration, even though that consideration takes place, may we say, on what the government regards as a very high level. There is nothing wrong in that.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not the slightest. I may tell my hon. friend that I prefer his discussion when it is in that vein. However that is somewhat different from the point raised by my hon. friend at the outset.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I raised both.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The point being raised now is similar to the point raised by the hon. member for St. John-Albert.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The same; I followed him.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sorry, I did not understand that. I was directing my attention to the first one. The hon. member says there is merit in the point he raises. When I looked at the section I realized that the words "within twelve months previous to the date of disablement" might cause some difficulty. I have no objection in reconsidering that part of the section and putting in "six months" or "three months" or taking out that phrase altogether if that is the wish of the committee. I have to admit that I was in a quandary as to the exact meaning. I do not think it would make any difference to the legislation as it now stands if the words were taken out.

Mr. BLAIR: While we are considering that, let us go back to tuberculosis for a moment. The section states that compensation shall be payable to employees employed in a hospital or sanatorium wherein tuberculosis patients are treated, but the compensation applies only to pulmonary tuberculosis. Would the minister consider eliminating the word "pulmonary"?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I answered that a moment ago, but my hon. friend disagreed with me. He is a medical man and I am afraid I cannot satisfy him on that. I said that the word "pulmonary" had been put in after consultation with the medical men of the Department of National Health and Welfare and I would not wish to take it out.

Mr. BLAIR: Does it not seem fair in the minister's own opinion?

Mr. HAZEN: Is it not possible that those medical men did not appreciate the point raised by the hon. member for Lanark? It seems to me that an employee in an institution of that kind might be able to contract other forms of tuberculosis. An employee might contract tuberculosis of the bone and not pulmonary tuberculosis. In a case of that kind should he not be entitled to compensation?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am informed that in a hospital where there are tuberculosis patients those who are liable to contract tuberculosis are liable to contract pulmonary tuberculosis. That is the information I have and I feel that I must be guided by it.

Mr. HAZEN: Can they not contract other forms of tuberculosis by reason of the fact that they are working where tuberculosis patients are?

Mr. CHEVRIER: I have nothing more to add to what I have already said.

Mr. HAZEN: I would move that the words "and contracted within twelve months previous to the date of disablement" in line 36 of the section be deleted.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I imagine my hon. friend would prefer to leave in the words "and contracted". I do not think he would want to strike out those words.

Mr. CHEVRIER: If I understand the hon. member aright, he is moving that the words "within twelve months previous to the date of disablement" be struck out.

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am prepared to accept that.

Amendment (Mr. Hazen) agreed to.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I move that the word "pulmonary" be struck out.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I would have to object to that.

Mr. FERGUSON: Upon what grounds? Is it because of the medical advice of the department, whether right or wrong? Could the minister not refer it back and check on his information for the benefit of these people? He is just objecting to it, but here is a medical man who is held in high esteem in his community who says that it should be struck out. Why not go back to the department and see whether he is right or wrong and give these men a chance?

Amendment (Mr. Smith, Calgary West) negatived.

Section as amended agreed to on division.

Sections 9 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Mr. Chairman, may I revert to clause 10, subclause 2, to ask my colleague to move an amendment to correct what is merely a clerical omission. It is to insert the words "order or regulation," to make the last part of the clause conform with the first part thereof which refers to "any statute, order or regulation."

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I move, Mr. Chairman, to amend subclause 2 of clause 10 by inserting the words "order or regulation" after the word "statute" in line 1 on page 6 of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 10 as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: May I take this opportunity of reminding the committee that amendments should be in writing. It is difficult to keep a record of the amendments unless they are in writing.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPOINTMENT OF GEORGE A. TOUCHE AND COMPANY AS AUDITORS

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 26, respecting the appointment of auditors for national railways.

Mr. JAMES SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, in rising to oppose the second reading of this bill, I realize that I am taking a rather unusual course because in the last ten years the bill has been passed not only without opposition but without even discussion. It passes this house just as automatically as divorce bills.

The other evening the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) in his capacity as house leader, referred to the bill as a very short and easy bill. The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) a little earlier this session made some passing reference to it. My attention was drawn to it a year ago when the bill passed through the house so quickly, in just a minute, that I did not have a chance to ask a question which was in the back of my mind. The question was, why should the government, by a government act or order, appoint a private auditor to audit the Canadian National Railways? Why does the auditor general not do this? During the past year I have had an opportunity of studying this matter at some length, and the completion of some study convinces me at least that the auditor general should do this job. I do not suggest that the firm of George A. Touche and Company do not do a good job. They do probably as good a job as any ordinary firm of auditors could do. But I am informed by auditors that there are two firms in Canada with a world-wide reputation which undoubtedly could do a better job. On the other hand, many firms undoubtedly could not do as good a job. I intend a little later to read a glowing testimonial to George A. Touche and Company made by Doctor Manion when he was minister of railways. My point is not that the firm of George A. Touche and Company are not capable. My point is, first, that the auditor general should do the job; second, that he can do the job, and third, that he can do a much better job than any civilian auditor appointed by the government.

As far as the first point is concerned that he should do the job, I should like to touch briefly on the whole position of the auditor general. Here in parliament we have three principal servants of our own, men who are our servants and not the servants of the government—the Clerk of the House, the auditor general and the chief electoral officer. The former two are appointed, not by the governor in council, but by the governor of Canada under the great seal, and they can be removed, not by order in council, but only by an address of both houses of parliament. Beauchesne, the book not the Clerk, says that these two servants outrank any deputy minister in the government service. Of these two servants I think undoubtedly the auditor general is the more important. After all, taxation without representation has been the cause of most of the dissatisfaction, discontent and rebellion in our history, and certainly the control over public money is an important part of our system of government. It is to account to parliament that we have this watchdog of our own who is responsible only to us. It has not always been that way. Certainly the development of the position of the auditor general has gone step by step with the development of responsible government in Canada. In the days of the family compact there existed neither appropriations by the elected representatives nor the accounting to them of those appropriations. Back in 1835 the house set up the famous committee on grievances and William Lyon Mackenzie, in presenting its report in 1835, made one or two remarks that I should like to repeat. He said:

> I would impress upon the house the importance of two things: first the necessity of getting control of the revenue raised in this country, and second a control over the men set out here to govern us by placing them under the direction of responsible advisers.

You will note that even in those days William Lyon Mackenzie put control of public money first.

At page 19 of the report of these grievances, a copy of which is kept under lock and key in the library, there is an elaboration of what was meant by control over revenue—not only a control over the passage of appropriations out of the public revenue, but a satisfactory audit of those expenditures.

The report would not recognize an audit by the government, or by auditors appointed by the government whose reports were described as "complex, obscure and unsatisfactory". An independent audit board was asked. It was not given, however, until 1855. Between 1835 and 1855 we had the rebellion, and then the Durham report and the beginnings of responsible government. But in the old Canada it was the minister of finance, known as the inspector general then, who actually did the auditing and told parliament everything was all right. However, in 1855 after a long debate the government of the day agreed to set up an independent audit board composed of the deputy ministers. This went along until 1878 when Alexander Mackenzie was premier, when the auditor general as we know him today was first set up independent of the political parties of the day and responsible only to parliament. The first auditor general was also comptroller general. Not only did he audit the final accounts for parliament, but before any appropriation could be spent he certified that the method of spending was in accord with parliament's will. This act of 1878 made the auditor general, in effect, an officer of parliament for the more complete examination of public accounts of the dominion and the reporting thereon to the House of Commons.

By 1931 it was agreed that it was not satisfactory to have our auditor general also comptroller, because he was checking up on his own work in that he had authorized the appropriation he was later auditing. Therefore the Consolidated Revenue Act was revised and the two duties separated, the comptroller general now being an officer of the Department of Finance and the auditor general being responsible solely to parliament and responsible for the audit of public accounts. This naturally resulted in a great improvement. The duties of the auditor general are listed in part V of the Consolidated Revenue Act of 1931. He is appointed by the governor general under the great seal and can be removed only by a joint address of both houses. His duties are listed in section 50 and are as follows:

> In reporting the result of his examination and audit to the House of Commons, the auditor general shall call attention to every case in which
> (a) a grant has been exceeded;
> (b) moneys received from sources other than the grants for the year to which the account relates have not been applied or accounted for according to the direction of parliament; or
> (c) a sum charged against a grant is not supported by proof of payment.

And so on. And finally, "or to any other case which the auditor general considers should be brought to the notice of parliament." He is given the widest powers.

There is further comment on that actual provision in the auditor general's report of 1943. In 1943 we went one step farther. It was found that, with the enormous increase in government departments and spending, the auditor general's staff was spending much too much time in checking on petty accounts and duplicating the work already done by internal audits. Therefore there was a further change agreed upon by the auditor general, the deputy minister and the comptroller general. The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) was then Minister of Finance, and he referred to the matter in the house in 1942, as reported at page 5082 of Hansard, as follows:

> Our desire was to draw from all possible sources lessons and suggestions as to the best possible way in which to present to parliament the information necessary to enable it to exercise wisely and efficiently its control over financial matters and assure itself that the executive arm of government is properly carrying out its stewardship.

That, to my mind, summarizes very well the responsibility of the auditor general to this parliament. We only have to compare the reports of the auditor general from 1943 on with the previous reports to realize how that lightened the burden of petty detail and gave the auditor general the opportunity of doing the splendid job he now does.

I have traced this development to show how the position has grown in power and responsibility. The people of this country do entrust us with the public funds. We in turn entrust them to the government of the day, and the auditor general is our watchdog to assure us, the members of the House of Commons, that the money which we have voted for appropriations is properly spent.

Since the Canadian National Railway involves the expenditure of public funds—last week, for example, we voted another $8,960,000 to make up the deficit of the Canadian National Railways—it is my submission that we should have the auditor general, our auditor, report on the Canadian National Railways.

My next point was the fact that the auditor general can do this. There seems to be some question whether or not he or his department is capable of doing the audit of the Canadian National Railways. There was a time when the department of the auditor general was very small. The national budget was small; his department was small. They were engaged mostly in routine matters. But in the last ten years there has been a great increase in the status of the auditor general, in the staff and in the qualities of the staff. I need only remind the house that two years ago the auditor general audited a $6 billion budget of this house. I need only read the list of the crown companies which he audited in his last report to show the scope of his audits as far as business is concerned. They are as follows: Aero Timber Products Limited; Allied War Supplies Corporation; Board of Grain Commissioners; Canadian Arsenals Limited; Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; Canadian Wool Board Limited; Citadel Merchandising Limited; Commodity Prices Stabilization Limited; Eldorado Mining and Refining (1944) Limited; Exports Credits Insurance Corporation; Federal Aircraft Limited; Federal District Commission; Foreign Exchange Control Board; Inspection Board of United Kingdom and Canada; Melbourne Merchandising Limited; National Battlefields Commission; National Harbours Board; National Railways Munitions Limited; Northern Transportation Company Limited; Park Steamship Company Limited; Polymer Corporation Limited; Research Enterprises Limited; Small Arms Limited; Sorel Gun Plant; Sugar Administrator; Turbo Research Limited; Veterans Housing Project (Ottawa) Limited; Veterans Housing Project (Toronto) Limited; Victory Aircraft Limited; War Assets Corporation; War Supplies Limited; Wartime Food Corporation Limited; Wartime Housing Limited; Wartime Metals Corporation; Wartime Shipbuilding Limited and the Yukon Council, together with many other smaller government agencies. When you read that list it is obvious that the auditor general must have the staff and the knowledge to perform an audit of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. FULTON: That is why taxes were so high.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): I shall deal with that in just a moment. The auditor general audits all public expenditures and crown companies except the Canadian National Railways and the Trans-Canada Air Lines; therefore the actual bigness need not dismay us. Last year, for example, the Canadian National Railways had a revenue of $434 million and operating expenses of $305 million, a business which was very small in comparison with other public expenditures audited by the auditor general.

Let us turn and see how the firm of George A. Touche and Company does this audit. After the revision of the Canadian National Railway Act in 1933 by the Bennett government, an excellent internal audit was set up within the Canadian National Railways, and what the auditing firm of George A. Touche and Company did was what any auditing firm would do under such circumstances. They turned a flock of juniors loose to take a spot-check on the internal audit of the Canadian National Railways auditors, and then the material was correlated by the heads of the Touche Company in this report. I have been unable to find the cost, but I shall ask that question later. In 1934, the cost was $50,000 plus undetermined expenses. I submit, therefore, that the auditor general could certainly do the job.

My third point is the most important one. I feel that the auditor general could not only do the job but do a much better job. First, let us examine the report of George A. Touche and Company. I doubt whether there is one member in twenty who has read it through. I know, after seven years in parliament, that this is the first one I have ever read through and, after having read it through, I must confess I was not much wiser than when I started. It is a proper business report such as would be made to any big corporation; it is lacking in detail, and throughout it all we have the feeling that anything which is legal is quite proper so far as the firm of George A. Touche and Company is concerned. They are not going to question policy. Compare that with the auditor general's report, one part of which is a proper business report, and then the other part of comments which I think every member of parliament reads and studies; certainly a great number use it as the source of speeches. Look at his critical comment, very fair and open and complete comment on all government expenditures. In every way there is full detail given, going far beyond the actual routine of figures and presented in a form we can digest. More than that, the auditor general is able to bring to parliament the things in which hon. members are interested. It is not hard to find the reason for this. To begin with, the auditor general is the servant of parliament. He is in touch with parliament. The second thing I find is that Hansard is compulsory reading for each of the different audit supervisors in his department. So that not only when they come to the audit do they know what they are auditing, but they have some idea in the backs of their minds of the desire of parliament which prompted the legislation and the appropriation. They know, too, of matters which are of special interest to members of parliament, and their attention is directed to these matters when they do the audit. I shall give an example of that. We know that since the end of the war there has been considerable discussion of pensions, and service pensions in particular. I refer to page 26 of the auditor general's report of this matter on which he comments. He has audited militia pensions, and he has commented on a pension paid to an admiral in the north Atlantic. He says:

The computations for pension are certified as correct, subject to the following qualification.

My argument is that a civilian auditor would end there. The pension is calculated on the man's pay and retirement, and the calculation was correct. But the auditor general knows the attention which is paid in parliament to these pensions. So he went behind the figures to see how they were built up, and he found a shabby thing. He found that this admiral commanding, who had left the command in May, when he went on retirement leave in September had himself posted back on command at command rates of pay, although doing nothing, thus receiving an extra $4.50 a day for six months of retirement leave and thus, because of his pay having been swollen up in that way, henceforth he would receive from the people of Canada $509 more in his pension annually than he would be entitled to except for this action on his part. The auditor general comments upon that and properly so, as not being within the intent of parliament when it passed the Militia Pension Act, and no doubt when the Minister of National Defence brings his estimates before the house the soldier members will have something to say on the question.

The auditor general's report abounds in things like that. On the previous page there is something in connection with housing. There have been long discussions in this house on this question. Indeed, there is no subject which has occupied the attention of parliament more than the question of housing, and the auditor comments on a number of matters, some of them raised by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) with respect to the improper expenditures of funds in connection with housing. Many cases are covered by the auditor general in his report.

Last year I had a resolution on the order paper for some time with reference to the question of crown taxation, my feeling being that the crown should pay municipal taxes. I am concerned about this, because there is in my riding a city which is very hard hit. The auditor general found, on going through the reports, that a great number of crown companies made payments to municipalities in lieu of taxes, and he properly pointed out, for the information of members of parliament, men such as myself, that this was, to all intents and purposes, payment of municipal taxes. He did not comment upon it, but he called attention to the fact that the crown was actually, by this method, paying taxes in certain instances on crown land, without acknowledging the principle everywhere, a thing which I certainly intend to discuss when my resolution comes up, if it ever does see the light of day.

There are other good uses of the auditor general. For example, there is the comparison of salary scales, since he is the one man who can check all departments of government and see whether each department follows the same procedure in the payment of salaries. There is great value in consistency.

In my own service in the air force we always felt that we were in a preferred class receiving better pay, better treatment, billets, transportation and so forth. I mentioned this in the conscription debates, when I pointed out that it was unfair to the army and the navy to have such a situation existing, and urged that they should be brought up to our level. So in the civil service there is also a feeling of resentment if one branch is treated better than another. I say therefore that the auditor general, by his searching comments on all branches, exercises an excellent effect.

I need only refer to the annual report on salaries. One or two examples close to parliament have been turned up by the auditor general. For instance, there is the payment to John Grierson of expenses after he had left the film board, and the payment of expenses to judges' wives while the judges were on duty in Ottawa. These matters were properly drawn to the attention of parliament. In the latter instance, what had been done was legal in that the government had authorized the payment. A civilian auditor would have gone no farther than that; but the auditor general, our servant, knowing our attitude on the question, drew attention to it. The firm of George A. Touche and Company cannot do that. The only Hansard that will be read by the firm of George A. Touche and Company for some time to come will be this Hansard. Such a firm, I maintain, has not the knowledge of other departments which the auditor general has, nor does it know the conditions as members of parliament do, who are the trustees of the public.

The best test that I can put to the House of Commons is the comparison between these two reports. One member in twenty may have read the report of the Canadian National, but every member without exception has read the last part of the comments of the auditor general on the public funds of Canada. There was an interesting confirmation of this last week in the freight rates inquiry, when Colonel Ralston, a member of this house for many years, and at one time minister of finance, complained that he could not get necessary information with respect to the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways from their reports.

The auditor general can also be called on at any time—for extra information by any member of parliament during the session, not as in the case of Touche and Company, only before the railway committee.

I have another and far better and deeper reason for the contention that the auditor general can make a better report than any civilian auditor, and that is his independence. Once appointed under the great seal of Canada, he is responsible only to parliament. He can feel as free as he likes to make criticism of what he thinks is wrong, and it would take a very great dereliction of duty on his part for both houses of parliament to pass an address requiring his removal. Because of that independence, he can make the sort of reports he has made for the last four or five years.

Compare that with the appointment of a civilian auditor by act of parliament—not by resolution of parliament but by act of parliament. He must be very grateful to the government of the day for that appointment. I of course, as a supporter of this government, have every confidence that the present civilian auditor appointed by the government is doing a responsible job. But if the time ever comes, and it may, when I sit over there in opposition, and a Conservative government appoints another auditor, or a C.C.F. government appoints one, I might not have the same confidence in that auditor. The auditor of public accounts should be like Caesar's wife, above reproach.

Having perhaps a suspicious mind, I thought I would look up the record, because I was quite sure that when the Tories were in power they did not employ this firm of Touche and Company, and so I turned to the first appointment in 1934. I was disappointed because I found that Touche and Company were the first auditors appointed by act of parliament to be auditors of the Canadian National Railways in the time of the Bennett administration. That was when Doctor Manion made such a glowing reference to the abilities of this firm, which I said I would read in fairness to the company. Doctor Manion's remarks are to be found in Hansard of 1934 as follows:

> It has been decided, after a good deal of consideration, that the auditors who have been doing the work for a good many years—I do not know exactly how long, but eight or ten years at any rate—are so well trained in the work and are so capable that it would be wise to appoint them at least for this year. I am informed by the railway people themselves that it would take quite a long time for any group of auditors to learn the method of auditing such an immense system of books and accounts as are contained in this vast business.

It was a vast business by the standards of those days, but small compared with public business today.

> For example, I am told that there are no other chartered accountants in Canada who are familiar with the interstate commerce commission's type of accounting, and the accounting of the Canadian National Railways is carried on under the same rules as those of the interstate commerce commission for the railways of the United States.

The manner of this appointment, however, was challenged, and I was delighted to find that my own leader, at that time leader of the opposition, suggested that it was not proper to have the government of the day make the appointment by act of parliament. He suggested that it should be done by resolution of both houses. Quite casually I looked ahead to the 1935 debate and, to my surprise I found that the Conservative government in 1935 had dispensed with indispensable George A. Touche and had appointed a new firm known as Clarkson, Gordon, Dilworth, Guilfoyle and Nash. There was a touch of humour on that occasion, because one member suggested that in the broken-down condition of the Canadian National at that time it was doubtful whether the railway could carry all that as one load. The charge was made by the opposition—and there was a long and bitter debate—that the firm of George A. Touche and Company had been removed because they had been too critical in the report submitted. They had criticized the debt financing of the Canadian National Railways. The charge was taken up by the national press of Canada. Doctor Manion answered it by saying that he thought a great deal of the agitation had been started by the firm of George A. Touche and Company themselves because they were angry at losing this valuable contract.

Doctor Manion was reminded about the glowing recommendation he had made in the previous year and was asked by members whether the firm of George A. Touche and Company had not been satisfactory, had not been efficient, but he pointed out that that was not the issue at all. He said that the appointment was for one year and that the question was not one of dismissal but of change. When finally challenged, he said something, one sentence which I think is pregnant with meaning, so much so that I will read it. I cannot find it at the moment, but he said that he did not doubt that the firm was satisfactory but that, and I quote, "The firm of Clarkson, Gordon, Dilworth, Guilfoyle and Nash would be more satisfactory," more satisfactory, of course, to the government of the day.

That brings home to me more than anything else the dependence of an auditor appointed in such fashion. Naturally an auditor so appointed will be grateful to the government supporting it and would not be likely to make embarrassing comment. The significant thing about this is that the next year we find, with the Liberals in power, that George A. Touche is back. The significant thing about it is that there was no question at that time of the right of the government to change auditors. That precedent had been established the previous year, so no explanation was now necessary. But once again it is interesting to see how consistent the opposition was, despite the change in membership. At this time R. B. Bennett, as leader of the opposition, got up and said he thought this should not be done by act of parliament, but should be done by resolution of both houses. That is why I take the stand that, because of this complete independence from the government of the day, our auditor general can do a better job, a freer job, than any firm of civilian auditors whose appointment is made by an act of parliament sponsored by the government of the day. Because of that, I think the best comparison again is for members to read the two reports. It is also significant that the firm of George A. Touche and Company have never again been as critical in their reports as they were in that one unfortunate year of 1935, on which they lost the job.

I wish to revert to this debate of 1934, because nowhere in that debate was the suggestion made that the auditor general do the job. Why was that? There were two reasons which I thought appeared in the debate. The first was that there was great political sensitivity, if I may use that phrase, at that time over political interference with the management of the Canadian National Railways. The Canadian National Railway Act had been passed, and it was hoped to have the railway completely removed from any political control. Undoubtedly there was the feeling that, by having an ordinary civilian firm of auditors do the job, that objective might be strengthened. The second thing was that I do not think the auditor general's department of that day were capable of doing the job. After all, the Canadian National at that time was almost as big business as the government. More than that, the auditor general's department had no opportunity to do business audits as they have now. That situation, of course, has changed greatly since that time. The enormous wartime budgets of the government, the multitude of crown companies and other agencies which the auditor general does audit, have given him and his department that experience. Part of that is also because of the character of the man who is now auditor general, Mr. Watson Sellar. He was originally with the Department of Finance; for ten years he was comptroller general of Canada; and when he came to the department of the auditor general in 1940, as auditor general, he made great improvements throughout the branch in the quality of the staff, in the work, and in the type of report presented. Perhaps the greatest tribute to the staff is the fact that private industry and crown companies have steadily robbed his staff of keymen by paying them two or three times the wages they get as chartered accountants with the auditor general's department.

Mr. JACKMAN: Where did they go? Did they go to private accounting firms? Did these expert men who had been trained in the auditor general's department go to private auditing firms?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Not to private accounting firms, but to private industry and as comptrollers of crown companies.

Mr. JACKMAN: Is the hon. member sure they did not go to private accounting firms?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): They may go to private accounting firms, because the training they get here is training which cannot be equalled anywhere else. The robbery which I resent the most is the crown companies taking them from the auditor general's department and paying them $7,000 and $8,000 in two cases for auditing jobs and comptroller jobs with these crown companies, salaries which the auditor general's department cannot equal. But here I think a tribute should be paid to the men who stayed with the auditor general's department, despite these attractions; and one of the reasons they stayed was undoubtedly the esprit de corps built up in that department by our present auditor general, Watson Sellar. Perhaps, as one last tribute to him, I might say that two days ago I telephoned to Mr. Sellar about this matter and I found that he was absent in New York. He is now, I suppose the phrase could be used, auditor general for the united nations. Until 1950 he is senior of the three auditors appointed to audit the accounts of the united nations, which is certainly another tribute to the ability of the man.

Aside from those arguments, there is one last argument which I should like to make because I am a Liberal, not a socialist. This matter of crown companies is coming very much to the fore in the development of government here in Canada. Certainly one of the reasons why the auditor general was not suggested in 1933 was that crown companies were unheard of then. We got the Canadian National Railways by accident. It was forced on us through the collapse of the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk. The words "crown company" were not used at that time, but now we are in this crown company business very heavily.

I have one or two observations to make on these crown companies. I do not object to crown companies as such. I think they have a rightful field in natural public monopolies. I also think there is no reason why the crown should not go into competitive private enterprise, and I use that word "competitive" because I do not believe they should move in a field in which free competition exists and monopolize it to themselves. For example, I see no reason why the C.C.F. government should not go into the slaughterhouse business or the brick business in Saskatchewan, with, however, these reservations. First of all, they must continue free competition against the people who are in that business themselves; and, second, they must pay the full taxes which every other company in competition with them must pay. The argument is, of course, that for a federal company to pay federal taxes is just taking money from this pocket and putting it in that pocket. But when that is done, however, and an audited statement is submitted, the people of Canada are able to see whether or not this company is efficient and whether it can stand on its own feet as compared with private competition which pays the same taxes. Certainly when it comes to provincial and municipal taxes of a federal crown company, they certainly are doubly obligated to pay them rather than to take advantage of the provincial and municipal taxpayers in one community of the country in order to build up an unnatural balance sheet.

The second point is that these crown companies must be responsible to parliament. It is not a matter of political control. Certainly it would be difficult for a crown company to compete with private industry if there was political patronage all through the crown company. But since these crown companies are started with and employ public funds, and since those which are not successful come back to parliament for more public funds, as the Canadian National did this year, it is most important that this parliament should have control over crown companies in that respect. It is quite true that in all of the crown companies but the Canadian National and Trans-Canada Air Lines we do have that control. One obvious suggestion which I make is to have the auditor general do them all.

But more than that is needed. There must be, in this parliament, some item in the estimates under which each crown company could be discussed. I suggest—and my colleague, the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) mentioned this—that, if needs be, an item of $10 could appear in the estimates of each minister responsible for crown companies. The hon. member for Quebec South suggested that the $10 could be spent if needs be, if the company does not need the money, on a big picture of the House of Commons, to be hung in the head office with the title "Our Bosses"; and in the present state I would say "Our Bosses" question mark. Then perhaps these crown companies would realize that the parliament of Canada in the end is being held responsible by the people of Canada for what they are doing. They are not in the position of private companies who must report directly back to their shareholders, to the people who put up the money. The route is too long, from the taxpayer of Canada, through the House of Commons, through the government to the crown companies to have that feeling of responsibility. That feeling of responsibility would come, however, if somewhere in the estimates each year there were an item under which the conduct of each crown company could be discussed, and if as the basis of discussion, we had the full report of our own auditor general on that subject. That is why I feel this bill should not pass in its present form. I feel that the work started by William Lyon Mackenzie in 1835, with his report on grievances to bring not only the appropriation of all public funds into parliament's hands but also the accounting of those appropriations into parliament's hands, should be completed by the inclusion of this last crown company within the scope of the auditor general.

If this bill is put to a vote immediately I will vote against it, because I feel I have shown that the auditor general is certainly the proper person to do the work, and I have demonstrated, at least to my own satisfaction, that he can do a better job. These things, however, are open to discussion, so I suggest to the minister that, instead of this bill being referred to the committee of the whole house after second reading, it be referred to the railway committee, and that the railway committee summon before it the auditor general and the firm of George A. Touche and Company, if needs be, and there settle whether or not the auditor general of Canada, who certainly should do the job, can do it. Therefore, if the minister gives the assurance that this will be done I will vote for second reading. Otherwise I will vote against the second reading and make that motion when we get into committee.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) on the excellent speech he has delivered. I feel sure that hon. members in all sections of the house will support the hon. gentleman, in view of the fact that the adoption of his recommendation would save the taxpayers of this country a considerable sum of money. I believe those who are familiar with the operations of the Canadian National Railways in recent years will agree that the accounting system has been maintained in satisfactory fashion. Mr. Cooper, the vice-president, who is also the comptroller, has taken a keen interest in presenting each year a balance sheet as favourable as possible, and I am sure all the directors have been concerned about making this publicly owned railway as efficient as possible. Last year, when the committee was meeting, I noticed in the balance sheet an item of some $12,000,000 on the asset side in connection with insurance. When I questioned Mr. Cooper regarding this item he mentioned that at the time of the amalgamation they took over some insurance funds to the extent of about $1,500,000. Then they decided that, rather than pay out premiums to privately operated companies to carry risks on stations here, there and everywhere across the country, there was no reason why the Canadian National should not set up its own insurance fund. However they charged the prevailing rates, and by 1930 had built up a surplus of about $10,000,000. Then they reduced their premiums by $1,000,000 a year, and a year or so later found that it was unnecessary to charge any premiums at all. So, for some fifteen years the Canadian National Railways have been able to provide for all their losses resulting from fire out of the interest on the accumulated amount that has been built up.

I submit that if the accounts of this corporation had been audited throughout the years by a firm like George A. Touche and Company, they probably would not have given any attention to the payment of high premiums each year to privately operated insurance companies. There would not have been anything irregular about it; but since the directors of the Canadian National have the interests of the public at heart, they are concerned about economies of this kind.

Last year, when the committee met, the president presented us with a memorandum in connection with the operations of the Canada-West Indies Steamships branch of the company. Mr. Vaughan pointed out that the company was incorporated in 1927, to implement the Canada-West Indies trade agreement of July 6, 1925. Under the first agreement of 1912, the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company had operated four ships on a fortnightly service between Canada and the eastern group of islands, for which the company was paid an annual subsidy of $340,000. In the 1920 agreement, Canada also undertook to provide a service to the western group of islands, and this service was assigned to the Canadian government merchant marine. The memorandum mentioned the amount asked by privately owned corporations for this service. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company put in a tender for a fortnightly mail, passenger and freight service with four new 12-knot passenger vessels, in accordance with the trade agreement, for which they asked an annual subsidy of $582,000. They also offered to perform the service every twelve days with smaller ships for an annual subsidy of $534,000. An agreement was not reached, however, with this company. The Canadian National Railways went into this field, but for some reason or another—perhaps it was the change of government which occurred in 1930—the subsidies which previously had been paid privately owned companies were not made available to the publicly owned company, and as a result this operation was not profitable. The balance sheet of the company at the end of 1945 shows that for the whole period of operation there has been an over-all loss of $4,963,000. The statement, however, goes on to say that the balance sheet is not necessarily a final summation of all the gains or losses resultant from the operation of this service. The president explained that it was not unreasonable that the Canadian National might have been compensated on a basis similar to that under which the privately owned company would have been compensated if they had performed the service.

In the committee the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) reviewed this matter in some detail, and made what I think everyone would agree was a very fair and reasonable case. Later, a motion was presented to the committee by the hon. member and myself with a view to giving the Canadian National Steamships relief from this deficit of $5,000,000 which had accumulated through the years, but we were not successful in getting a majority of the committee to agree to recommend that the government take some action which would relieve the Canadian National of this item. When Mr. Matthews, who represented George A. Touche and Company, was before the committee I asked some questions regarding what would be his personal opinion concerning the carrying of this item in the balance sheet of the Canadian National for fifteen years or more. He replied:

I would not consider that would be part of our function. I think it is a matter of government policy, and our job we regard to be the setting out of facts. As long as the Department of Finance regard it as a liability, we have no alternative.

I asked whether he would make some comments if he were auditing for a privately owned corporation. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) came to my assistance and said:

May I ask this question of Mr. Matthews? Are there many companies which your firm audits, and with which you are familiar, where a deficit has been carried for fifteen years or more and interest has accrued each year and piled up there?

Mr. Matthews: No.

Mr. Jackman: Do you know of any?

Mr. Matthews: No. It is in the same category as the Canadian National railway system was in 1937 when the Capital Revision Act was brought in; the same principle.

Then the minister said:

Do you audit any other railway company besides the national system?

Mr. Matthews: Not in Canada. But we regard that as a matter of policy outside our function. Our job is to set out facts to the committee and not matters of policy.

Mr. Nicholson: I appreciate that very much. But if you were auditing for a private company, would you not have some comment to make?

Mr. Matthews: If we were auditing a commercial corporation with a deficit of $5,000,000 and which owed the bank or anyone else the same amount, that would be set out in the balance sheet as it is in the case of the West Indies steamships; and it would again be a matter of corporate policy as to reorganization.

Mr. Nicholson: Would you not have some comment to make regarding the carrying on of this for fifteen years?

Hon. Mr. Chevrier: Has not that matter been disposed of pretty much by the committee?

Mr. Nicholson: I think it is quite relevant.

I wish to contrast the position of George A. Touche and Company with regard to a matter of that sort with the comments made by the auditor general in connection with the operation of crown companies, and of several departments. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) that this sort of statement by George A. Touche and Company is quite unsatisfactory when compared with the statement made by the auditor general regarding the year's operations.

Several ministers of the crown have been embarrassed by remarks made by the auditor general. Apparently George A. Touche and Company remembered vividly what happened while the Bennett government was in office and when they made some comments regarding matters which I think come within the purview of the auditors' administration. I have been reading Hansard, and I find in Hansard of February 22, 1935, at page 1092, there is reported a speech by Mr. Manion, in which he referred to an article which had appeared in the Toronto Star. That article reads:

Far from welcoming the proposal of the auditors that the grossly inflated debt of the Canadian National Railways be pared down the Bennett government is demanding that the auditors be dismissed.

The explanation that will be given for the proposed dismissal of the auditors no doubt will be that the firm has its headquarters in England, but so it had a year ago when Mr. Bennett and Dr. Manion were loud in praise of its work.

Apparently a firm such as George A. Touche and Company run a certain risk when they make comments regarding a problem as important to the Canadian people as the inflated debt of the Canadian National Railways. I submit that it would be in the best interests of the Canadian National Railways, and certainly it would be in the best interests of the taxpayers of Canada if the auditing of the financial position of the Canadian National Railways was carried out, as the hon. member for Vancouver North has suggested, by the auditor general.

In the last report which the auditor general submitted to parliament, he makes mention of some matters which hon. members of the opposition are certainly going to use before this session is over. On page 22 there is reference to vote 426, which refers to some tenders which were invited by the director of the Veterans Land Act for the construction of nine houses at Boucherville, Quebec. Bids ranging from $45,884 to $70,200 were rejected as excessive and then, later on in the paragraph, it is stated:

In the fiscal year $87,018.10 was paid by way of progress payments. Administrative officers advise that this contract is under investigation; consequently the payments have been accepted in the audit subject to that qualification. Further claims of $103,820.85 with respect to the contract were, at the time of audit, in the department.

I think any auditor who will embarrass the administration by putting down in black and white details in connection with tenders being rejected because bids ranging from $45,884 to $70,200 were rejected as excessive when actual vouchers in excess of $190,000 have been taken in is a pretty satisfactory auditor for the Canadian National Railways. Then on page 24 reference is made to the director of housing being retired with three months' retiring leave as of March 1. The position was abolished and he was given an annual allowance of $1,174. As of that date he was fifty years of age with ten years' service. I am sure my deskmate, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, (Mr. Knowles) is going to have something to say about an order in council that provides a pension of $100 a month for life for a man fifty years of age when we cannot get legislation before parliament to do more for our old age pensioners than we have up to date.

Another reference on page 29 is to the de Havilland contract for $6,445,025, representing shipments made to various R.A.F. and R.C.A.F. depots. He states:

> Proof of delivery was established by the records for invoices approximating $1,000,000, but no proof of delivery on the balance was produced in the course of audit.

There we have a matter of $5,500,000 which apparently was not accounted for to the satisfaction of the auditor general. I am sure that all members of parliament realize that is the sort of audit we require rather than the type of audit carried out by George A. Touche and Company, although I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver North that this is a well recognized and reliable firm, and I have no quarrel with Mr. Matthews who has been before our committee for several years.

In conclusion, I should like to move an amendment along the lines of the argument advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver North, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to page 228 of Beauchesne, third edition, citation 657, which I think is my authority for moving the following amendment:

> That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this house the government should give consideration to the making of provision for the auditing of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways to be done by the auditor general of Canada.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, as one of those who during the last war urged in the province of Ontario that the government of the day should take over this system, I wish to say a few words tonight. I addressed meetings along with the late Sir Adam Beck, but we found very few supporters of our policy to nationalize the Canadian National Railways and its various subsidies. After a success had been made of public ownership and the provision of cheap light and power in Ontario, we addressed meetings at St. Thomas, London, Kingston, Belleville and many other points in the province.

The component parts of the road were taken over to form what is now known as the Canadian National Railways. The mistakes of private ownership had been apparent for many years prior to that. There was evident useless duplication and waste, and the result was that a royal commission was appointed, known as the Drayton-Smith-Acworth commission. This was made up of Mr. Smith, the president of the New York Central railroad; Mr. Acworth, a prominent British engineer and Sir Henry Drayton, then chairman of the board of railway commissioners, now known as the board of transport commissioners.

As a public ownership man, I have always taken a consistent stand in connection with this railroad, and I wish to compliment the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) on the splendid address he has given tonight in support of what I have proposed ever since I have been a member of the house, namely, that we have our own auditor general as an independent audit. The bill recommends that the Touche chartered accountants be appointed as independent auditors for the year 1947 to make a continuous audit of the accounts of national railways as defined in the act. The auditor general is an independent auditor because he does not take work from other private business concerns. the way some of these auditing firms do.

The auditor general is the auditor of public ownership in general; he is the auditor of all the departments of this government. We have had some very good men in this position. I believe a public ownership venture should be administered by those who believe in public ownership. I cannot find one person on the board of directors, either past or present, who has been well known as a supporter of the principle of public ownership. In Ontario we had experience with private companies in the providing of light and power and the hydro system as a public venture was begun after 1905. The hydro started and took over the remaining water powers of the Niagara river and reduced the costs to domestic and commercial users of light and power to one-third.

I believe the time has come when a change should be made in the practice of appointing auditors for the Canadian National Railways. Last week the directors of the railways made a report to parliament in which they estimated the deficit for 1946 at nearly $9,000,000, and an item of $8,961,570 appears in the supplementary estimates to make up that deficit. But the annual report of the railways is not out yet. The appointment of private auditors is a violation of the recommendations which were made in the Drayton-Acworth report after an investigation which cost this country a huge sum of money. They reported that there was duplication and waste all over the country in the construction of branch lines and in other ways which cost a huge expenditure of money and they recommended that no new ventures or new lines be started without the recommendation of the railway commission from the commercial aspect. That report has not since been implemented at all by this house.

The scope of the audit made by George A. Touche and Company is set out on pages 6 and 7 of their report to parliament for the year ended December 31, 1945, the last report made by this company. The system includes the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, and the Trans-Canada Air Lines. I believe that the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) is quite right in proposing that we should substitute the auditor general to audit the Canadian National Railways system. Under the old act, from 1924 on, it was the board of directors of the railways who appointed the auditors. The act was amended in 1932 requiring an address from both houses of parliament to appoint an auditor for the system. The auditors have failed to make any recommendations for improving the efficiency of the system. After all is said and done, the railway in part is not run from the commercial aspect. In the first two and a half years of world war II the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways made more money than they made in the whole period of the first great war. A return was made to the house, showing that down to the end of 1941 one of these railway systems made $27,000,000 and the other, $25,500,000 more than it made during the whole of the first world war. In addition to the railway itself, there are the hotel services, the land and ocean services and now the Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the expenditures of the system are going up by leaps and bounds. The road is not run from the commercial aspect. Its headquarters never should have been transferred to Montreal, and money should never have been wasted on that hole in Montreal. There has been useless duplication and waste in the hotel system. In towns where there was business for only one hotel the railway insisted on building another, even though the materials were wanted for building small houses all across the country.

Furthermore, there has been no proper inspection or control of the United States subsidiaries of this railway system. In Ontario the railway makes more money than in any other part of its system, yet the province of Ontario has been completely ignored in connection with betterments, its requirements of rolling stock, locomotives, box cars and things like that. But the railway is spending money on its United States subsidiaries. It gets rolling stock, passenger trains and other equipment for its subsidiaries in the United States. Charity should begin at home.

I believe that the directors do not direct. The directors are appointed from one political party.

Again I believe that the free transportation system should be revised. I am not referring to anybody connected with the government or to members of either house of parliament; far from it. But I say that the railway commission does not supervise properly that particular branch, with the result that we are not getting the revenue we should get from the operation of this railway.

I am a real public ownership man myself, and public ownership must succeed. I believe that we have a faithful able president and faithful officers and rank and file working for the system. They have worked hard at small pay and a large majority of them are efficient, but in some cases in the past exorbitant pensions have been paid to retired officials, and parliament has lost all control over the system. When you ask questions in the house about it you cannot get an answer but are told to go to some committee which was appointed, and largely whitewash the operations of the system. In the report you find very little about the workings of the system. I will give one example. They brought up from the maritime provinces to Toronto an old tub, which is known as the Northumberland and now runs between Toronto and Port Dalhousie. It is not fit for lake traffic. The boat has been condemned. The predecessor of the minister wrote me a letter about it. My hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) had a picnic on this boat; and at times it got stuck out in the lake. It is a wonder he ever got home. What was not good enough twenty years ago for Prince Edward Island is shipped up to Toronto; an old tub not fit to run down there is good enough for Toronto, a public ownership city. Yet they can afford to spend $2,500,000 at Sorel for a new car ferry for Prince Edward Island.

Mr. MacNICOL: Five million.

Mr. CHURCH: When it gets up to $5,000,000 it is beyond me. When the railway is dealing in these astronomical figures money is much more likely to be wasted. I am not complaining about Prince Edward Island getting its due in public ownership, because I have been a real genuine public ownership man all my life. We should have some known public ownership directors on this board instead of some of those who are appointed for political purposes. I am not saying that we do not do this when our party is in power, but if we are to have efficient administration of a large publicly-owned utility, particularly with the expansion that is going on, we must use some degree of economy and run the road as a commercial proposition.

I believe that the auditor general, who is now making an elaborate report to parliament on our own departments, should be appointed to audit this system. We have had the experience in Ontario of large expenditures on publicly owned light and power. The city auditor of our city inspects the system daily, inspects the large taxpayer, the Consumers Gas Company and all the other activities of the system. The auditor general has a very fine department now, and he should be appointed to audit this system and make a study of the various proposals which have been made. The scope of the audit should be enlarged, instead of being simply a check-up of the system, an examination of major expenditures and audit tests as set out on page 6 of the Touche report for 1945. It is just a test audit that is made, not a daily audit of each office, but just a test audit here and there. It puts me in mind of a Gallup poll. They have a few people meet in an office, and they size up by such tests how the country is going. It is the same here. It is just a test audit. They pick out a piece here and there. You will find it all on page 6:

> (a) Examination of major expenditure authorities in conjunction with the recorded resolutions of the directors, which in turn are related to corporate by-laws, orders in council and acts of parliament;
> (b) audit tests in the offices of regions, separately operated properties and system headquarters, limited to a cross-section of the major expenditures so authorized;
> (c) Examination into the adequacy of the internal audit control in general as exercised by the accounting staff of the system. In this connection we work in collaboration with the executive accounting officers at headquarters having as a common objective the securing of maximum internal protection to the system in the control of cash receipts and expenditures, securities held, material stores, accounts receivable, et cetera, and through the carrying of fidelity bond insurance with outside underwriters, and . . .

Then we come to the securities trusts and the other systems, but I shall not continue reading it any further. I believe the time has come, as I said in my opening remarks, when the auditor general should have control over all these outside boards. We would get better results in the work which has to be done.

In conclusion, may I say I believe that, ever since the start, the system has had big eyes in building branch lines. They built duplicating branch lines all over the country. A great many of them had to be ripped up and scrapped because their development has been a waste. The road was not run in a commercial way, and there has been duplication of branch lines, to which I have already referred. In the interests of the country, in the interests of the system and in the interests of getting some efficiency in the system I believe that the auditor general of Canada should audit the accounts. It should not be an official auditor who is described in the bill as an independent auditor. He is not an independent auditor at all, because he is doing work for other privately owned agencies.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I rise to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair). In my opinion, the house is indebted to him for an informing and instructive speech, one of those speeches which will be well worth reading tomorrow in Hansard. I am quite sure, Mr. Speaker, that his native ability, his academic training, his parliamentary and administrative experience, and shall I say his British Columbia environment, fitted him well to make a speech such as he made this evening. I think it was one of the most lucid and informative speeches that I have heard in the house this session.

I was particularly interested in the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver North gave us a clear historical review of the situation. He then made his criticism and, in addition to that, put forward his suggestions and his constructive proposals. That is what I consider as evidence of a worth-while debate. I was very much interested in the illustrations he gave to us this evening of the deficiencies of the present system of auditing. As a relatively new member of the house, I must say that I was greatly informed this evening. I learned a lot from the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver North. I am not going to repeat any of the things he said; the hour is getting late. I wish to say that, as a result of listening to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver North, I realize now the great importance of what appeared on the surface to be a rather unimportant bill, and I urge other hon. members to give support to his proposals. Because of his arguments and the illustrations he gave this evening, I for one extend the strongest support to his suggestion that this bill be sent to the railway committee for further consideration before receiving third reading.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): The bill which is before the house at the present time is an annual bill dealing with the appointment of auditors for the Canadian National Railways. It is not a new bill. The form in which it is now is not at all different from the form in which it has appeared in previous years. In fact, ever since 1932 the manner of appointing auditors for the national railway has been the same in effect as the bill which is now before the house.

This year the bill seeks to appoint the same firm of auditors, namely George A. Touche and Company of Toronto and Montreal, to make a continuous audit under the provision of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act. That act deals with the manner in which auditors shall be appointed and sets out that the auditors shall be appointed by resolution of parliament.

The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. Sinclair) dealt with the resolution stage and suggested that it should be done in that manner now. To my mind, there is no difference in the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman and the wording in section 13 from what is in the bill which is now before the house. If it is done by a bill rather than by resolution it is because the other method is more cumbersome. But, in fact, down the years the procedure has been to do it by bill as we have sought to do it this year.

The hon. member for Vancouver North asked a number of questions. He asked, first, why should the government appoint a private auditor? The answer will be found in section 13 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act which was passed in 1933 and amended in 1936. Section 13 (1) reads as follows:

> A continuous audit of the accounts of national railways shall be made by independent auditors appointed annually by a joint resolution of the Senate and the House of Commons, and annually reporting to parliament in respect of their audit. Their annual report shall call attention to any matters which in their opinion require consideration or remedial action. They shall be paid by the national company such amounts as the governor in council shall from time to time approve.

Therefore, in answer to his first question, why should the government appoint a private auditor? I say that ever since this act has been in force it has been the practice to put into effect the intention of this act, namely, that there should be appointed an independent firm of auditors. By "independent" I mean not only independent of the Canadian National Railways but, I think, independent of the auditor general. If that had not been the intention I think the act would have clearly stated that the auditor general should be appointed.

The hon. member asked two or three other questions. He said that the auditor general could do the work. I agree with him in that respect. I think the auditor general could do the work and could do a good job, but I do not agree that he could do a much better job; and I certainly cannot agree with the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) who states that it would be a great saving of money to the taxpayers of Canada if the auditor general were appointed. I think I can disprove that point as I go along.

The Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act clearly states that this shall be a continuing audit, which means that the auditors must be in office and in operation all the time. Continuity of auditors is not only advantageous to the national railways, but also necessary because of the nature of the business of the Canadian National Railways. Frequent changes of auditors in the Canadian National Railways would, I believe, be objectionable. Take, for instance, the position of the railways. They have over one hundred thousand employees. It is extremely big business, the railway comprising a large number of subsidiary companies, and there is a considerable diversity of operations. A considerable amount of time is spent over an extended period in auditing the accounts. There are no less than fifty people who are assigned to work on the auditing of the books of the Canadian National Railways, not in permanency it is true, but temporarily, while there are from five to ten men who are assigned to do that work permanently.

Does anyone in this house think for a moment that if the auditor general were to be assigned to do this work he could do it without having the same number of men? Unquestionably he could do it, but he would have to set up a staff of experts such as the firm of George A. Touche and Company employ, and if the auditor general were to set up this staff it would cost the country every bit as much money, and somewhat more, as I shall prove.

Because of the operations of the Canadian National in the United States, it is necessary to have accounting firms that have units in Duluth, Detroit and St. Albans, and the firms that do the auditing work for the Canadian National must have United States branches, or at least connections in the United States. George A. Touche and Company and some other auditing companies in the dominion have auditing units in the United States cities I have mentioned. The auditor general of Canada has not. It is true that the auditor general could employ auditors who would be contacts in those United States cities, but I submit that he would have to pay them far more money than the company which does the work for the Canadian National Railways.

There are not many auditing firms in Canada who, apart from having the necessary experience to do railway work, also have these accounting units in the United States. Then there is the great advantage in continuing one firm of auditors. I presume the house itself might be tempted to raise some objection to appointing the same firm, and I confess that I did not like the idea when I came to the department and saw this. But when I realized what a tumult and chaos would follow if the auditor were changed each year, I came to the conclusion that it was good business for the railways to keep in operation the same firm of auditors.

I said a moment ago that Touche and Company assign about fifty individuals to do the work, some of them only intermittently; but there are at least ten men in the city of Toronto who are assigned to do the work permanently, and four or five in the city of Montreal. If the auditor general were given this assignment he would have to work up a staff, a group of experts to do railway work. In other words, he would have to add to his staff the same number of men; no, I say a far greater number of men than that already employed by this firm of auditors.

There is another point I should like to make. The present firm of auditors also do the work of T.C.A., and under the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act the minister has discretion to appoint auditors. The minister under that act, as far as I can remember, has always appointed the same firm of auditors as the Canadian National. By doing that, he has saved the country money, because the one firm is able to do the work of the two corporations and thereby to do it far more cheaply.

It has been suggested that the auditor general is an excellent person; that he has qualifications to do work of this kind, and with that I certainly would not disagree. On the contrary, I am entirely in agreement with my hon. friend when he says that Watson Sellar is a fine type of individual and one who is doing an excellent job as auditor general. With everything that the hon. member has said in that regard I am in full agreement. But where I differ with my hon. friend is on the statement that it would save the taxpayers of the country a substantial sum of money if we were to appoint the auditor general of Canada to do the auditing of the Canadian National Railways. I am informed that it would take the auditor general from two to three years to develop a staff to do this work properly. It is a fact that any new auditor who might be put in the position of auditing the books of the Canadian National Railways should move in early in the year and be able to start from the beginning. The present auditors, George A. Touche and Company, as stated before, are doing continuous work and therefore have already started to audit the books for the year 1947. They are already in operation. That is by virtue of a practice which has existed over the years.

So that I must say to the house and to my hon. friend—and I agree with those who say that he has made an excellent presentation of his case—that the government cannot appoint a private auditor, because it is bound by section 13 of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Railway Act. I agree with the hon. member that the auditor general could do the job, but that the auditor general could do a much better job I have grave doubts; and certainly when the auditor general should find himself in the position of doing the job it would cost the taxpayers as much as, if not far more than, it costs the country at the moment through the appointment of this firm of auditors.

For that reason I must tell my hon. friend, if it will be of any assistance to him, that for the year 1948 I would be willing to inquire from the officers of my department, and at the same time consult the directors of the Canadian National Railways to ascertain whether it would not be possible to have the auditor general audit the accounts, but I am sure that if I were to discuss it with them they would place before me the reasons which I have now put before the house For these reasons I ask the house to approve the bill.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): In rising to speak to the amendment, I am conscious that this gives me the most unusual chance for a private member to rebut the argument of a minister, but there are two or three points about the answer that has been given which strike me immediately. To begin with, the minister's first point was that I had asked for private auditors by resolution. Hon. members will realize that certainly that is not what I asked for. I asked for audit by the auditor general. I did not ask why private auditors did it, because I knew that was provided under the Canadian National Act, but I asked why the auditor general did not do it.

Because it has been done since 1933 by a private auditor is not a sufficient reason. The reason why I traced the development of the auditor general's position was to show that if perhaps he could not have done the job in 1933, he certainly was in a position to do it now.

The minister's comments about a resolution of parliament being the same as an act of parliament I find difficult to understand, and I can tell him I am in good company because the leader of the opposition in 1934, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), advocated appointment by resolution of parliament and not by act of parliament submitted by the government. In 1936, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, then leader of the opposition, advocated exactly the same thing. So that I am at least in good company, no matter what side of the house you judge my company from.

The second point was that the appointment of different auditors would result in an unhappy situation and that there would be no continuity of auditors. That was one of the points I was trying to make most strongly, because just as long as we have the Tory party appointing the firm of Clarkson and Company, the Liberal party appointing the firm of Touche and Company, and the C.C.F. government in some year far hence appointing some Saskatchewan firm, we shall not have continuity. We shall, however, have it if the auditor general is for all time appointed auditor for the companies.

The next point was one which fascinated me. It was to the effect that it would cost the government more to do that audit through the auditor general's department than through the firm of Touche and Company. Am I to understand that the firm of Touche and Company do that at no profit? Or more than that, am I to understand that they do it at a loss because of their public spirit?

Mr. JACKMAN: They are more efficient.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): No one has denied that the auditor general is efficient. And no one can deny that the auditor general does not pay the salaries that George A. Touche and Company pay. The point about George A. Touche and Company and their record is the very fact that they, according to the minister of railways in 1934, were the very ones who stirred up the agitation against the Clarkson firm so that they might have this apparently unprofitable audit.

The next point was with regard to staff. If there ever was a time when the auditor general's department had a qualified staff, it is now. They have the staff which did this enormous war work, although it is now being cut down. But they have a qualified staff at this time that they never had before. A point which I found out on inquiry was that, in the firm of Touche and Company, the great bulk of this work is done by juniors, either accountants in training or accountants just qualified. The thing in the minister's speech which shocked me a little was to find that in this day and age, under a government led by the grandson of William Lyon Mackenzie, there should still be one place in the expenditure of public moneys in which the appointment of an auditor was left to the minister's discretion, because in this report I quoted from a little earlier there is case after case in which William Lyon Mackenzie comments in the most scathing terms about the minister's audit and certifying to parliament that this audit is proper, because in those days ministers of the crown either did the audit themselves in the department or appointed an auditor to do it.

The next point was that it would take two or three years for the auditor general's staff to get on to the job of auditing railway accounts. Again let us look at the record. In 1935, without notice, Doctor Manion changed the firm of George A. Touche and Company to the firm of Clarkson with the long name, and nobody on the Liberal or Conservative side in 1936 contended that this firm as Clarkson, without two or three years' experience in railway auditing, did not do just as good a job as George A. Touche. There was just the old joker, that from our point of view, probably the firm of George A. Touche was more satisfactory, just as Doctor Manion had said that the Clarkson firm was more satisfactory to his government than the firm of George A. Touche.

I did not ask for a change of private auditors. My point was simply that this audit of public funds should be done by the auditor general; and most certainly this parliament should see that no minister is left with the right to appoint an auditor for Trans-Canada Air Lines in this day and age, as apparently the Minister of Reconstruction is. Definitely that auditor should be at least appointed by parliament, preferably by a resolution of parliament, and, best of all, should be the auditor general. For these reasons I see very little cause to change the stand which I took when I delivered my main address on this act.

RATES ON CONSUMER GOODS TO UNITED KINGDOM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, of which I have not given him notice. Will the minister sympathetically consider the advisability of remitting all postage on consumer goods sent as a gift by any Canadian to any citizen in Britain?

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): I shall take the question as a notice and answer it either tomorrow or after Easter.

FREIGHT CARS

SHORTAGE OF ROLLING STOCK FOR TRANSPORTATION OF FERTILIZER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN LESAGE (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). In view of the shortage of railway cars for the transportation and distribution of fertilizer in the south shore districts of the St. Lawrence, mentioned in the telegram which the Coopérative Fédérée de Québec sent to all the members representing those districts and a copy of which I submitted to the Minister of Transport, could he tell us whether any action has been or will be taken in order to improve the situation?

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet sent me a copy of the telegram which he mentioned in his question. The hon. members for Champlain (Mr. Brunelle), Matapedia-Matane, (Mr. Côté), Lotbinière (Mr. Lapointe) and others from the lower St. Lawrence district have received similar wires. I must say that the situation, with reference to freight cars, remains critical. The railways must ship wheat to the ports of Saint John, Halifax and even Vancouver; they must also carry the grain which Quebec and Ontario farmers as well as those of the Eastern provinces need for their cattle. Industry also has its claims. This wire informs me that the farmers of that district need fertilizer. When the telegram reached me, I asked the railways whether there was any way of increasing the number of freight cars available. They promised me their immediate cooperation.

(Text):

Mr. HACKETT: I have received a telegram in terms identical with that received by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet. I have directed it to the Minister of Agriculture and I should like to ask that right hon. gentleman or whoever is replacing him to give to the communication the same attention and active support that the Minister of Transport has given to the telegram received by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet.

RADIO BROADCASTING

LABOUR-PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has now been instructed that the Labour-Progressive party of Canada is no longer entitled to free time on the C.B.C. national network.

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): I shall take the question as a notice and give an answer tomorrow.

"CANADA 1947"

DEVELOPMENTS IN FIELD OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I have not been able to give him notice of this question, so perhaps he will not be in a position to answer it today. "Canada 1947" has just come into the hands of hon. members. On May 29 of last year I had some criticism to offer of "Canada 1946" because there was nothing in it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: This is serious business. If my hon. friends want to indulge in merriment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order; question, question.

Mr. GRAYDON: —they may do it outside.

Mr. ABBOTT: Just our daily speech.

Mr. GRAYDON: At least it is not an hourly speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: In 1946 no reference was made in "Canada 1946" to the progress and development of Canada in the field of external affairs. At page 1980 of Hansard last year the minister indicated that there would be this year, but I can find nothing in the index or in the details of "Canada 1947" to show that there is anything—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON:—on external affairs. I have a perfect right to ask this question. I am not going to be howled down by any organized effort of the government; do not worry about that. I am going to ask the minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: —whether he will give consideration to it and look into the matter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MUTCH: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, as a private member of this house, day by day on the orders of the day we are subjected to various distinguished members, chief among them perhaps being the hon. member for Peel, taking the opportunity to turn what is ordinarily routine procedure into a forum for the purpose of making a speech.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MUTCH: I do not suppose—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. You cannot take it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to state his point of order and be as brief as possible.

Mr. MUTCH: The point of order is that the whole proceeding we have just listened to today and which we have been subjected to repeatedly is out of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MUTCH: The question period was designed to get information, not to give it. The present practice violates the rules and wastes our time.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I thank my hon. friend for his daily lecture, because it happens almost daily. I ask the minister whether he will look into the matter and give an answer as to why external affairs are not included in "Canada 1947".

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I ask a supplementary question? Why is Fraser Valley not mentioned specifically in this book?

Mr. GRAYDON: This is a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Mr. DORION: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 104 contains an explanatory note on page 1 which says:

For the convenience and information of members, the orders and regulations of the governor in council specified in the schedule to this act are printed separately and are available to the members in the form of an office consolidation.

About three weeks ago we received this digest or orders in council which is entitled:

An act to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Since then I have asked many times, and once again this morning, for a French copy of these regulations and of these orders in council which form part of the bill, and I have been told that there was none. According to section 133 of the British North America Act, which is still in force—

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of the parliament of Canada . . .

There is no doubt that when we discuss a bill in this house we must have at our disposal both the French and the English versions. Therefore my point is that the second reading of this bill should be postponed as long as the French copy of this consolidation is not printed in French.

To support my contention I would refer Your Honour to standing order 72, which says:

All bills shall be printed before the second reading in the English and French languages.

I refer Your Honour also to page 228 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, paragraph 655, which reads:

When the bill comes up for a second reading in its proper course, one of the clerks at the table will read the order aloud, and the member in charge of the measure will then move its second reading. The member should take care to inform himself whether the bill is printed in the two languages, as that is absolutely necessary at this stage. The letters E.F. on the order paper will show whether that has been done. If any objection be made on that ground, it will prevent the bill being taken up for its second reading on that day.

I refer Your Honour, further, to a decision by the Speaker in 1903, which will be found at page 454 of Beauchesne's, third edition. May I quote what the Speaker said:

I think the question as to the printing of the translation may be taken up only when the bill is being called for its second reading. Should the French translation not be printed at the time of the second reading, then the point of order may be raised.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that this bill should be postponed.

Mr. HACKETT: May I support the point, Mr. Speaker, adding that there is valuable information which I understood the minister was going to make available to the house before second reading. The information asked for was set forth in Hansard. It has to do with a broad category of questions, but I refer in particular to the statement embodying cost of bonuses and subsidies, duties remitted and taxes remitted.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) would seem in principle to be well taken, but the hon. member is in fact in error. The bill has been printed in the two languages, and the orders in council mentioned in the schedule to the bill have been tabled in both languages. There was distributed for the convenience of hon. members an office consolidation, which has no probative value whatsoever but is a compilation of the orders as they exist now, with the amendments made thereto. That consolidation is not a part of the bill. It is merely a document and one that could not be received in court, that would be no evidence of the orders in council. As I say, it is a convenient document, just as are the other office consolidations of statutes made from time to time.

It was desired to have this convenience—it is merely a matter of convenience—printed in the two languages, but the hon. member probably knows that ever since early in the war the King's Printer has been overburdened with work and has had to let to other printing houses much of the work to be done, and the French translation of this booklet has not yet been received. If it were an official part of the bill the hon. member's point would be well taken, but it is not. It contains, not the orders in the form in which they were tabled, but a compilation of the original orders inserting at the proper places the amendments made by subsequent orders, and it was distributed merely for the convenience of the members so that they might not have to take the originals and themselves put them together to know what was the present form in which an order and its amendments were in force.

The hon. member is perfectly right in saying that everything that is a part of the bill should be in the two languages, and that has been done. The bill has been printed, the schedule has been printed, in the two languages and the orders in council have been tabled in the two languages, but the compilation made for the convenience of members has been received only in the English text and has not yet been received from the King's Printer in the French text. But that is not a necessary document. It is an aid which it might have been convenient to the hon. member to have, but there is no principle involved in the fact that we now seek to proceed without having this additional document in the French language.

I should be quite in accord with my hon. friend if a violation of the principle consecrated by section 133 of the British North America Act were being attempted, but that is not so. The requirements have all been met, and it so happens that the hon. member has not got the two texts of this compilation. But he is fully competent to get the information he wants out of the English version if he wishes to use it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would refer the hon. member to standing order 72, which reads:

All bills shall be printed before the second reading in the English and French languages.

The speaker has to decide, on the point of order raised by the hon. member, whether the bill which is before the house is printed in both languages. I have in my hand Bill No. 104, printed in English and printed in French. Having regard to the standing order I have quoted, I do not think the point of order raised by the hon. member concerns the bill itself. It concerns documents which may help the house to do its work. The hon. member will realize that the Speaker has to decide whether the bill which is before the house is printed in the two languages, and since it is, I must rule that the house may proceed with its work.

Mr. DORION: Then I must appeal from your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER put the question as follows:

On the question of the second reading of Bill No. 104, intituled an act to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war, the Speaker decided that the fact that a certain document distributed to members for their information with regard to the bill was not printed in both languages, was not sufficient to prevent second reading of the bill as long as the bill itself is printed in both languages. From that decision the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) appealed.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

The house divided on the question: Shall the Speaker's decision be sustained? And the decision of the chair was sustained on the following division:

Mr. HACKETT: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I should like to declare that I would have voted against the Speaker's ruling being sustained. In a moment of inadvertence, and due to some confusion in the house, I voted to uphold the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state, as did the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), that I also, through the confusion in the house and by inadvertence, voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling, but I intended to vote against it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Apparently this is the new policy after the convention; vote both ways.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I was paired, Mr. Speaker. Had I voted I would have voted to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. CLEAVER: I was paired with the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). Had I voted I intended to vote to sustain the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the house to proceed with the business, which is the motion for second reading of the bill.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Justice): In the first place, Mr. Speaker, in moving second reading of this bill, perhaps I should refer to a few remarks made by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) just before I rose. I was not sure whether he was raising a point of order, but he did—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members in the chamber and behind the curtain to moderate their voices so that we can follow what is going on in the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: He did refer to certain requests for information which were made when the measure was in the resolution stage. At the time that information was asked for I said that it would take at least until Monday to get it; thinking, from the circumstances existing at that time, that probably we would still be in committee on Monday. However the bill was reported back on Thursday night; and the next stage is the one we have now reached, namely the motion for second reading. Therefore I propose in the remarks I make this afternoon on second reading to give the main parts of the information asked for on the resolution stage.

I do not know just to what extent it is necessary for me to remind the house of the nature of the measure now before it. I should however point out, I believe, that the orders in council appended to the bill before the house are in no sense new legislation, that these orders in council are now the law of the land, and that they have been the law of the land for years—some of them for many years.

In 1945 this parliament passed the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, which had the effect of extending into and through 1946 powers which theretofore had been exercised under the War Measures Act. At the time the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act was passed there were outstanding a very large number of orders in council—several thousand, in fact. At that time we asked parliament for an extension of powers involving a validation of all these thousands of orders in council, and parliament passed that legislation. It was appropriate legislation for the circumstances of that time. Provision was made for the questioning of any new orders in council that might be passed. Those new orders in council were to be and have been tabled from time to time since.

But when we were preparing the legislation for this year, we felt that we should not ask for an extension of powers to the governor in council, that the time had come when we could rely on the powers already extended to the governor in council by preexisting orders in council, and that if those orders in council were placed before the house, and received its approval, we would not require again any power to legislate for new orders in council. The principle I have just enunciated is the principle of this new legislation.

It is incorrect to call this legislation an extension of emergency power. It is correct to call it a continuation of transitional measures; and that is the reason for the selection of the title of the bill.

I believe I should also refer to the fact that this is a greatly contracted list of orders in council, that the overwhelming majority of the orders in council passed during and after the war are being allowed to lapse. The committee which considered these orders in council from the beginning of 1945 has made an earnest and successful endeavour to keep our wartime order in council legislation—because, in effect, that is what it was, under the War Measures Act—down to very small dimensions, so that the public by picking up the statute, or the readily available documentary material, will know just how much is outstanding. I believe the officials are entitled to congratulations upon the effective and thoroughgoing way in which they have boiled this wartime order in council emergency legislation down to small dimensions.

It may be possible, before the bill is through—it is not possible yet—to delete a few orders in council from the schedule. If so we will move that they be deleted from the schedule. At the present time, however, the need is for the fifty-seven orders in council reference to which is made in the appendix.

It was suggested in the debate on the resolution that we should break into this schedule and take out of it the old age pensions orders in council, the veterans preference orders in council and the labour relations orders in council and now make them the subject of bills. As I understand it, the reason for the suggestion is that the government has given an undertaking that later in the session it will introduce legislation of what may be described as of a permanent character with respect to these particular matters.

The government has given consideration to this suggestion, and I feel that this is the stage at which I should point out certain relevant facts to the house. Today is the first day of April. If we count today and tomorrow as two days, and if we also count May 15 as a day on which it will be possible for parliament to consider this emergency legislation, parliament will have twenty-six working days to devote to this work. That is the very limit of the time—for both houses. During that time it will be necessary to secure the passage through both houses of the measure now before the house the consideration of which, if it is examined at all carefully, will take many days of the time of both the House of Commons and the other place. In addition there is the other legislation which must be enacted before May 15, unless there is to be a lapse or hiatus. There are nine measures which are at various stages of incompleteness, before one or other of the houses. First, there is the act to amend—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, do you think you could get order in the house? I am anxious to hear the minister. I cannot hear him, although I can hear somebody else.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an act to amend the Inspection and Sale Act, 1938. That is at the stage of third reading in the senate.

An act to amend the Immigration Act and to repeal the Chinese Immigration Act. The second reading has been moved in the house but the discussion has not proceeded very far.

An act respecting export and import permits. This bill has not yet been reported back to the house from the banking and commerce committee.

Mr. FLEMING: It is on the order paper.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been reported back?

Mr. FLEMING: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Then it is before the house for consideration by committee of the whole.

Then there is an act to amend the Militia Act. There will be a motion for concurrence in the senate amendments to this measure.

An act to amend the Patent Act. That has been reported back by the banking and commerce committee and will next be considered by the committee of the whole house.

An act to continue the regulations respecting trading with the enemy, 1943. This has received first reading but not second reading.

An act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935. The second reading has been moved in the senate.

An act to provide for the sale and export of agricultural products. The second reading has been moved in the senate.

The Government Employees Compensation Act. The bill has gone over to the senate.

That is the volume of legislation which, unless there is to be a very serious lapse or hiatus during which important matters will not be covered as they should be by legislation, must be through both houses by the 15th day of May.

Mr. COLDWELL: If they are not, will the minister again ask for an extension of powers to protect the consumers of the country?

Mr. ILSLEY: If they are not through by May 15 I shall have to do so. I speak subject to correction, but I do not think I could do it by way of address next time. I think it has to be done by act of parliament, which is a considerably more serious matter.

If we took out the three classes of acts to which I have referred and introduced bills and gave them priority over this legislation, I am afraid that we should not be able to complete this legislation by the 15th day of May, in which case we should have again to go through the process of getting an extension if we can, but by act of parliament instead of an address. All we are concerned with is to get these bills through in time. We have given the matter a great deal of consideration and we do not think we dare drop these measures out of this act. There need not be much discussion on them, because we shall be ready with our measures as soon as this measure is enacted. We shall be ready with all three of them; there will be no delay whatever; we will bring our measures in right away. An undertaking has been given with regard to the budget. I do not know which should come first, these measures or the budget, but we shall be ready with all of them as soon as this legislation is through. There will be no delay at all. Unless we follow the course we are taking, I do not know how to arrange the business of the house or to suggest arranging it without running the risk of something lapsing that must not be allowed to lapse.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the government considered sitting on Saturday and on Wednesday evening?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, the government has not considered doing that.

Mr. MacNICOL: We could do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to put in a plea for ministers, but it is easier for private members to do that than it is for ministers, because they have a large volume of work to do apart altogether from their attendance in the house.

Mr. KNOWLES: Can these measures not be put on the order paper so that we shall know what the score is?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will consult my colleagues as to the time at which they can be put on the order paper. I am not sure that all three measures will be ready until shortly after the end of the Easter recess, but they will be ready then. The question is whether to have them put on the order paper and perhaps complicate the discussion of this measure.

Mr. KNOWLES: It might shorten it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It might. I will discuss that with the acting leader of the government. It is a suggestion worth considering.

Mr. KNOWLES: Thank you.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am just placing the problem before the house because I think it has reached the stage where it should be placed before the house and the reasons given why the government is proceeding in this way.

As I said in moving the resolution, we are taking what I consider to be a moderate course in asking for an extension of the economic controls, a course not satisfactory by any means to those who believe in the indefinite continuation of controls, and not satisfactory either to those who think that controls should be abruptly abandoned. It may have been that in the discussion the other night I tried to summarize the attitude of parties or of groups in parties. I regret it if I did, because I do not see any reason why this should get into politics at all. It is simply a matter of cleaning up, of easing ourselves out of the wartime controls. I know we are accused of having a power complex and of desiring to perpetuate our power, and that the civil servants who are administering these controls are accused of the same thing. There is not much that a person can say by way of disproof of such accusations. We can deny them, which I certainly do. The whole course of our action shows that we are letting go of these powers and getting out of these controls as quickly as it is possible for anyone to do it. I hope we are not getting out of them too rapidly. I know there are members who think that is the case.

Mr. HACKETT: There is a whole party feels that way.

Mr. COLDWELL: And we are not ashamed of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would remind the house, as I did the other night, that the government of the dominion cannot maintain these controls indefinitely. It is a matter which undoubtedly reverts to the jurisdiction of the provinces, and we have to get back to that sooner or later. We must continue to adjust ourselves to that inevitable retransfer of the field of jurisdiction from the dominion to the provinces. We have to do it, we ought to do it, and we are doing it. It seems to me that there should not be very much difficulty in the house accepting the principle of this measure on the second reading. I am ready to admit that in the committee stage suggestions may be made for changes here and there in these orders in council. I do not think that they necessarily should be combed with a fine-tooth comb, for this reason, they are so temporary; they are going out. They have worked well and there has been no abuse of these orders in council during the past few years.

Mr. FERGUSON: They do all their damage in a short time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, my hon. friend and I will not agree on this, but I think they have done immeasurably more good than harm. As I say, I do not think there should be much disagreement in the house about the principle of this measure, but whatever tinkering is done with the provisions of the order in council should be done when we get into committee of the whole.

On the resolution stage a number of questions were asked about the cost of the control policy and also about the benefits of that policy. I have had some inquiries made and I shall try to give that information in a few minutes. Before I do that, however, I want to refer to one passage in the speech which I made on the resolution and which can be found at page 1586 of Hansard:

> The timing of decontrol in the months ahead will be related to economic developments both at home and abroad. Production in Canada and in the United States is now expanding rapidly. In these circumstances, I believe that decontrol is likely to proceed quite rapidly but, as I have emphasized, it is the government's intention to avoid disorderly price fluctuations and confused markets which abrupt abandonment of all controls would be certain to produce.

That sums up I think as best I can the policy of the government with reference to decontrol, the avoidance of abrupt abandonment of all controls and of the disorderly price fluctuations and confused markets which this abrupt abandonment will be certain to produce, while proceeding with decontrol as rapidly as possible under all the circumstances.

Later this afternoon my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) will announce a further measure of decontrol. It will not go as far as those who are opposed to controls are urging, and it will certainly go too far to please those who think there should not be any lifting of price ceilings at all. It is based upon the principles to be found in the quotation I have just read. It will free from price ceilings a further list of commodities which the government and the board feel can safely be fixed at this time. But—and I should like to emphasize this—the volume of goods still under price ceilings will be important, far-reaching and substantial. It will still include a large proportion of the essential requirements of the Canadian people.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister has gone this far; will he now tell us what articles the controls are to be lifted from? He has whetted our curiosity and caused us some misgiving as well.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Minister of Finance will make a statement later this afternoon.

With regard to the request for the total cost or the average cost per year of the stabilization policy, I was asked to make a compilation of wartime prices and trade board subsidies and trading losses, the cost of administration of the wartime prices and trade board, the Department of Agriculture subsidies, other subsidies, such as wheat and flour subsidies, the amount of the remission in duties and taxes and other subsidies such as the coal subsidies paid by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply; that is, the subsidies, the tax and duty remissions, and the costs of administration connected with our stabilization policy. I said I doubted whether I should be able to obtain an accurate computation of the tax and duty remissions. As a matter of fact that is so. These removals or remissions of duties and taxes fall into three broad categories: first, removal or reduction of intermediate and general rates of duty where normal preferential sources of supply were cut off by war or surrendered by Canada in the interests of economy in shipping. These are a number of examples: anthracite coal in the maritime provinces where United States supplies had to replace British supplies; crude rubber—Malaya being cut off, we had to rely on United States stocks and South American production; tin—Malaya being cut off we had to draw on United States stocks and South American production; copra and palm kernels—Belgian colonial supplies replaced in part British colonial supplies; sugar—the removal of full duties because we gave up more distant empire sources, for example, Australia, South America, Mauritius and even part of the British West Indies, and drew supplies from Cuba and Santo Domingo; oranges—seasonal duty which conferred a preference on empire sources was removed, since these were unavailable; rice—with the loss of Burma we had to take United States supplies; combed wool—we had to rely more heavily on United States combing mills because United Kingdom facilities were not available.

I should like to point out that with regard to that type of importation it would be completely unfair to add up the remissions of the general rate of duty and say that that was part of the cost of the stabilization policy, because very little was imported from these sources before the war. They were imported from British preference countries where the rate of duty was very much lower. For instance, we switched to some extent in our importations of sugar from British preferential sources to Cuba and Santo Domingo where the rate of duty was $1.29 instead of 29 cents, but we did not pay the $1.29. That was taken off. Therefore it would be unfair to reckon the cost to the country of that policy by taking $1.29, because the situation was entirely abnormal. It had not been paid before the war, and probably it will not be paid after the war. It was just a new situation.

Mr. HACKETT: Before the minister leaves sugar, will he say something about the excise tax on refined sugar?

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to refined sugar the situation before the war was that there was a tax of one cent a pound on refined sugar, or $1 on 100 pounds. We raised that to two cents in 1941, and then we took half the increase off in 1942 and the other half of it off in 1943, bringing our tax on sugar back to exactly what it was before the war. The excise tax is the same as it was before the war.

Mr. HACKETT: Was there not an excise tax on sugar before the war?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was one cent, and it is the same now. One cent has been taken off, half at one time and half at another. My hon. friend had really no point there. The point that he had was on the British preferential rates of duty on sugar which were remitted. He had a point there. That was part of the cost of our stabilization policy, and I am told that it amounted to about two and a half millions a year, but not these big sums.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister allow me—

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a minute. I am making a speech on the second reading and I am sorry I have to deal with this mass of facts at this stage, but I am obliged to because my hon. friends wanted it at an early stage. The second class of duty and tax removal was of special wartime taxes imposed at an early stage in the war and removed at a later stage, examples of which would be the extra or additional tax of one cent per pound on sugar imposed in April 1941 and removed in two stages in 1942 and 1943, and—to take another example—the special taxes on tea and coffee imposed in September 1939 and removed in 1942.

Is that part of the cost of stabilization policy? I do not think so. They were not traditional, long-standing taxes at all but were put on and taken off again, and I do not think they should be reckoned in it. Where the removal or reduction of the tax was primarily to protect the stabilization policy, this was part of cost. Examples would include the remission of the preferential duty on sugar and the suspension of the duty on bananas and of the seasonal duties on certain fresh fruits and vegetables.

It would be impossible to calculate exactly the theoretical loss of revenue by reason of these removals or remissions of duties and taxes. Had these duties remained on and the prices of the commodities been increased by the amount of the duty, the quantity imported might have declined, that is to say, less of these commodities might have been purchased. But even if this very real difficulty be ignored, it would take a great deal of time to compile the kind of table which the hon. member requested. In some cases the duty was suspended for only a short period of weeks, at a time of seasonal shortage in Canada—for example, on onions in the spring of 1944 and on new potatoes for a few weeks in 1945. In other cases the duty was suspended only for a particular use, for example, coke when used for cooking or heating. In still other cases the duty was suspended in the middle of a month and reimposed in the middle of another month, and it would be almost impossible to ascertain the quantities imported free of duty in broken months.

I cite these points as an explanation of why I cannot give my hon. friend the exact detail for which he has asked. Even to prepare as full and accurate a statement as might be possible would take a great deal of time and labour. I am advised, however, that a quick check of the list of tax removals or suspensions indicates that the amount of revenue forgone would be of the order of $5 million or $6 million in the full year, excluding remissions of duty on account of changed sources of supply dictated by war conditions, and excluding the removal of taxes imposed at an earlier stage in the war. The true figure might be a little below or a little above this. I cannot be exact without having a great deal of statistical work done on this question.

But let me come to the larger question of the total cost of this policy. The following figures give a rough approximation of the annual averages for the five years from 1942 to 1946 inclusive: wartime prices and trade board administration, $12 million; wartime prices and trade board subsidies and trading losses, $84 million.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Yearly?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. This is the average of five years. Department of Agriculture subsidies, $65 million. I am not at all sure that they should all be charged to the stabilization policy, because I believe some of them were quality subsidies to encourage production of higher quality. To continue: Wheat and flour subsidies paid by the Department of Finance, $15 million.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mainly to bakers and millers?

Mr. ILSLEY: Millers.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; that is what I meant.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was paid to millers for the purpose of keeping the price of flour and bread down, the subsidies being repaid in part when the profit position justified it. Next, remission of duties, et cetera, $5 million. That is a rough, a very rough estimate. Then there were coal subsidies paid by the Department of Reconstruction and Supply amounting to $5 million. The total is $186 million per annum on the average.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) put a question and pressed me to answer it, and I will do this as best I can, although it is almost impossible to give an answer to the question. He asked for an estimate of the benefits to the citizens of Canada as a result of the price control policies; that is to say, the saving in prices to the consumer—the amount by which consumer prices were made lower than they otherwise would have been.

The following estimate gives some indication of the strain and difficulty which would have developed in the Canadian economy without price control. It is based on the assumption that in the absence of price control prices would have risen in recent years to the same extent that they rose in world war I and its aftermath. Nobody knows whether they would or would not, or would have risen higher.

Mr. CASE: It is an impractical question.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to point out that we never devoted more than 15 per cent of our resources to the war in any year of world war I, whereas in world war II, in some years, we devoted approximately fifty per cent of the production of the country to the war. And economists have always told me that that is the main factor in driving prices up—the proportion of output that you shoot away and send away, leaving in the country the purchasing power that was paid out to produce it, and nothing to spend it on. That is a powerful inflationary influence. It must be remembered that in many countries where there existed no effective control, prices were going up 100, 200 and 300 per cent, and I am not talking of wild inflations such as occurred in China and other places. But if we assume that prices would have risen, and the inflationary factors were more powerful in the last few years than in the years between 1914 and 1920, much more powerful—if we assume, I say, that prices would have risen, without control, just to the same extent proportionally, year by year, as they did in the period from 1914 to 1919, then these are the results you get: the consumers would have had to spend an average of nearly $8 billion between 1942 and 1946.

Mr. MacNICOL: How many millions?

Mr. ILSLEY: I said, nearly $8 billion a year between 1942 and 1946, to buy goods and services, which in fact cost them on the average not quite $6·5 billion a year. If hon. gentlemen want to know how that is arrived at they can procure table 11, gross national expenditure at market prices, 1938 to 1946, issued by the bureau of statistics, which shows the personal expenditure on consumer goods and services for each of the years from 1938 to 1946; and if the amount spent had increased proportionately to the increase in prices in the first great war, the amount spent would have averaged $8 billion in those years instead of the $6½ billion which the consumers actually did spend.

Mr. QUELCH: Does that take into consideration the higher taxation?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it does not take that into account. Taxation was part of the stabilization policy. High income taxes were probably the most powerful factor in the anti-inflation policy. In short, if prices had risen as they did in the last war and its aftermath, the consumers would have had to spend $1½ billion more than they actually did.

It should also be noted that the general stabilization programme held down the cost of munitions and other military expenses, thereby saving a further large addition to the already heavy national debt. It is estimated that government expenditures averaged $4 billion a year between 1942 and 1946. Without price control this cost might have been at the very least twenty-five per cent higher. I think that twenty-five per cent is based upon the other figures which I have given with regard to the additional percentage which the consumers would have been obliged to pay; and the stabilization programme has thus meant a saving of another billion dollars a year. From these estimates it is possible to see that the cost of the control programme was under $200 million a year, while the savings to the consumer purchasers and government as a buyer were on this hypothesis possibly $2½ billion a year. The figures are tentative but do give some idea of the relative magnitude of the cost of and the savings effected by the government price control programme.

The validity of the cost of living index figures was questioned. I cannot go into the basis of the cost of living index. It has been thoroughly debated in previous sessions and exhaustive material has been placed before the house. The trouble is that the material is so exhaustive that it does not make popular reading. It takes a good deal of work to go through it. But the bureau of statistics assert and appear to be able to establish that their cost of living index is a very reliable one, and that there is no better cost of living index in any country.

Mr. BENTLEY: But the minister will admit that it does not put milk into the mouths of babies, and that it does not put into the homes other things which the housewives need.

Mr. ILSLEY: The cost of living index is not an executive body. It is information. I do not know what my hon. friend means.

Mr. BENTLEY: The information that the householder has or that the housewife has—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I should like to remind the hon. member that the house is not in committee and that the minister or any other speaker must not be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. BENTLEY: I thought when the minister sat down he had given his consent.

Mr. ILSLEY: Ask the question.

Mr. BENTLEY: What I was trying to point out was this, that in spite of—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BENTLEY: I will ask the question, if it has to be a question, although it is difficult to frame it.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member wishes to make a speech, he can make it later.

Mr. BENTLEY: All right.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I say, the cost of living index is, I think, a good index. Somebody said that articles no longer being produced are in the index. That statement is flatly denied. They are not left in there at all if they are not available in Canada.

I hesitate to get into this question of the validity of the comparison of the price rise in Canada and the United States. I have a good deal of material on it, but it is detailed, and it is mainly estimates. The points were made by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), mainly. He said that we had paid subsidies and that the Americans had taken their subsidies off during the period, that we continued to pay them. The weakness in that is that the Americans had taken most of their subsidies off before the period began. They had only two subsidies that we can find out about, the meat subsidy and the flour subsidy. The other answer to the argument is that most of our rise in the cost of living during that period has been due to the removal of our subsidies; so there does not seem to be much of any point left.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) does not perhaps understand what I am saying, but if we had a situation like this, where we had at the beginning of the period full subsidies on in the United States and full subsidies on in Canada on a comparable basis and then six months later the United States subsidies had gone off and the Canadian subsidies had stayed on, the taking off of the United States subsidies would obviously be the cause of several points rise in the United States index; and there would not have been a comparable factor in Canada. But the situation was altogether different from that. Most of the United States subsidies were taken off before that period began; many of the Canadian subsidies were taken off during the period, and most of our price rise was due to the fact that we took those subsidies off.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Will the minister permit a question while we are on this point?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I see the point the minister has made, but I still ask him this question. When we have been using comparative figures between such and such a rise in the United States and such and such a rise here, which was an over-all figure, and when we have been using, as I understand, during the same period, which was from the middle of 1945 to the middle of 1946, figures which did not include subsidies, does the minister not agree that in order to get a comparison during these periods it is necessary to carry in, if he can carry in, the proper figure of our subsidies which were being paid by the taxpayers of Canada to assist in keeping down that price? In other words, does he not agree that these figures, unless we carry in our subsidy payments, are not comparable?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not talking about comparative prices, and I did not think hon. gentlemen opposite were talking about comparative prices. They were talking about comparative increases, and they were saying that the comparison between the increases was an unfair comparison because we have maintained our subsidies and the Americans have taken off theirs. Now what I am saying is that they took off most of their subsidies before the period began, and our subsidies have been coming off since, so the validity of the comparison holds.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is always possible that I may not have understood the minister, but let me come back at the point. One of these figures given is the figure of the rise over the period of 1935 to 1939—in other words, just before the war—until, I think, the end of 1945 or 1946. Surely the minister will agree that in order to make a comparison between what happened in the United States and what happened in Canada we must take in the Canadian subsidies in order to show what the actual cost of living in Canada was. After all, these United States comparisons are relied on, I think, as the strongest argument of any in pointing to the success of our own control of costs.

Mr. ILSLEY: Our comparisons have been in the increases. We have said that when the Americans decontrolled in the middle of last year, their cost of living shot up by about eighteen points in six months and ours stayed down to four or five, or something like that.

An hon. MEMBER: Six.

Mr. ILSLEY: Six, during that same period. We are not talking about price. Price is a different thing entirely. That is another argument; I cannot get into that question of the comparison of the price levels in the two countries. We are talking about the validity of the comparison of increases, and the government is virtually accused of putting up something here which is very misleading, because the Americans have taken off their subsidies. The removal of hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies would, of course, put up their prices, and if we kept our subsidies on that would indicate it was purely the subsidies which were doing the work, or very nearly that. But we have quite a different situation. When they had their subsidies off very largely at the beginning of the period, it could not have been the removal of the subsidies which put up their prices; and when we were taking off our subsidies during the period it was largely the removal of the subsidies here that put our prices up.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I do not want to press the point, but on the other hand, since the minister has brought me into it—I did not do it myself—I think I should say that I still believe the minister has overlooked one point. These comparisons, which are constantly made, are made as a result of what is alleged or taken to be the figure given as to the cost of living in Canada. I still maintain that when that cost is given without including the subsidies it is not a complete figure, and that when used as a comparative figure it gives an unsound picture. For the life of me I cannot see that this is not so.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend is now arguing that when you compile a cost of living index that should not be done by putting into it only the cost of the articles the families of Canada buy, that is the cost to those families, but that some tax feature should be carried into it as well, some income tax or something like that.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes; a subsidy which is used to pay part of the cost. I do argue that, definitely.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have answered that by presenting the complete cost and the estimated savings to the consumers.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): But I suggest—

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a moment, now. I am making a speech on second reading, or was a short time ago.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Very well. You brought me into it and now I shall get out.

Mr. ILSLEY: After all, we are not in committee yet. The other point was the revaluation of the Canadian dollar. Any change in an exchange rate will, of course, affect the cost of imports. Again it is not possible to be precise, but I am advised that the direct effect on the Canadian index of the return to parity with the United States dollar would have been about one-half of one per cent. Return to parity of course reduced our subsidy costs considerably, and by reducing the cost of certain imported raw materials and industrial fuels it eased some of the upward pressure on production costs in Canada. After all, Mr. Speaker, I am answering points here directed mostly to the validity of certain arguments we have put forward on behalf of price control, and I do not think we should get too far away from the principle of the bill and the simple question as to whether or not these economic controls should be allowed to lapse. That is the simple question: should they be allowed to lapse or not?

Mr. CASE: Is the minister going to say why we revaluated the Canadian dollar, or is that too big a question to answer?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I dealt with that last summer, when I made a statement on the matter, and I do not want to go into it again. I have not very much more to say this afternoon because so much has been said at previous stages.

Perhaps I should say something about the constitutional basis of the bill. This bill is based upon the existence of a national emergency arising out of the war. One of the clauses in the preamble reads:

> And whereas the national emergency arising out of the war, in certain aspects, has continued since the unconditional surrender of Germany and Japan and is still continuing . . .

The emergency in its military aspects has, in the opinion of some, largely disappeared, but in its economic aspects has continued since the termination of hostilities and still continues, for the reasons and in the way set out in the speech I made in this house when I introduced the resolution.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Perhaps I might ask the minister one question before he concludes, and I think it is on the principle of the bill. He has just said, as I understood him, that this is an emergency matter largely having to do with prices. In view of the fact that labour matters automatically go back to the provinces; in view of the further fact that all ceilings have been removed from salaries and wages, can the minister tell me where there is any emergency in connection with that matter? I can see the emergency argument elsewhere, but I am utterly unable to see it with respect to the dominion government maintaining its position in reference to labour matters. Perhaps the minister would answer that point.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is pretty difficult to dissect an emergency, but the labour legislation is in the economic field, an important sector of the economic field. If, as I allege, this emergency in its economic aspect still exists, I would submit there is basis for legislation in that field, perhaps only for a limited period; and that legislation is to be replaced by other legislation just as soon as we can get to it. But I would submit that the economic emergency is pervasive enough to justify continuing, for this short additional period, the labour relations order in council to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the minister one question before he sits down. It has to do with his statement that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) would make a speech later in the afternoon with respect to certain changes which have been made since this bill was introduced, which might have a bearing on the discussion. I should like to ask whether it is the intention of the Minister of Finance to speak now, or later in the debate.

Mr. ABBOTT: I had intended to follow the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), who, I understood, was going to speak next.

Mr. BRACKEN: My only point was that it would help in the debate if we had the immediate situation before us now.

Mr. HACKETT: I was going to ask a question.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are we in committee now? If not, I do not think we should go on with a discussion of this kind.

Mr. HACKETT: May I ask a question which I did not ask when the discussion was under way because the minister requested me to wait until he had finished his speech. I was going to ask if at the present time there is an excise duty of one cent a pound or $1 per 100 pounds on refined sugar.

Mr. ILSLEY: So the officials inform me. I was not sure the other day, but they tell me there is.

Mr. DONALD M. FLEMING (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is clear now that the appeals made to the government and to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) during the resolution stage for a different procedure, which would offer the house an opportunity to approach this question in an orderly way and which would save time, have been rejected. By reason of the course chosen by the government the house is now left to flounder in what can only be called a legislative morass.

This is a measure of the highest importance. I do not suppose any legislation to come before the house this session will equal in importance the measure now occupying our attention; and the stage we have reached now is, I submit, of prime importance. At the resolution stage we were invited by the Minister of Justice to defer discussion until after the introduction of the bill. That invitation was accepted and endorsed by my leader. Others did not follow it, however, and discussion took place. Now the Minister of Justice is proposing that the house defer intensive consideration of the measure in its leading aspects until second reading is given and the house is in committee. We have had a number of requests, always to defer consideration, and I think the reason is quite obvious. The government invites the house to pass over those aspects of the consideration that the house ought to give this bill which are likely to give them the greatest difficulty. In view of the fact that we are now at the stage of second reading, and that it is necessary at this stage to deal with the principle of the bill, I ask the house now to endeavour, by examination of the provisions of the bill, to find the principle of it, if there be a principle in it.

I am not going to discuss the terms of the measure in detail. But I wish to refer to enough of the contents of the bill to try, if it be possible, to find the principle of it. As the Minister of Justice has indicated, the preamble purports to base the bill upon the continuing existence of a national emergency arising out of the war. Hon. members will find that language repeated in the preamble. And they will find a qualification, in one of the references, in the expression "in certain aspects". Finally it is said that the bill is put forward in order to ensure an orderly transition from war to peace.

What follows? We have, first of all, the provision that certain orders and regulations, referred to in the schedule to the bill—and referred to by number, name and date only—are to be continued. They are to continue and be in force while the act is in force.

Then we have the provision that the governor in council may appoint such persons in connection with the administration of any order or regulation continued in force by the act as he considers necessary, and may fix their compensation. It is further provided that all persons who have been appointed under the War Measures Act or the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act in connection with the administration of any of these orders or regulations are deemed to have been appointed pursuant to the provisions of the act. Parliament will never have any part in making such appointments, but automatically they are deemed to have been appointed pursuant to the provisions of the act.

It provides further that the governor in council may revoke in whole or in part any order or regulation continued in force by or made under this act. The operation of the act is to be limited so as not to extend beyond March 31, 1948, but it may be extended by resolution passed by both houses of parliament.

It is further provided that all orders and regulations continued in force under the authority of the act shall be deemed to be regulations, under the provisions of the Interpretation Act.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the bill. Attached to it is a schedule containing references—and only references—to some fifty-seven orders in council, orders in council under which vast numbers of other orders have, in turn, been made. Where is the principle of the bill? I submit to the house that, so far as a solemn legislative act on the part of the house is concerned, the full knowledge and appreciation of what is involved in the step parliament is asked to take is lacking. There is, in that sense, no principle in the bill.

The only principle that can be found in it, in the manner in which it has been presented to the house, is this, that a government which has grown accustomed during time of war to treat parliament with something between tolerance and contempt, has decided that it will ask parliament to give legislative sanction, willy-nilly and holus-bolus, to a whole volume of legislation, in a manner which absolutely precludes any detailed examination by parliament of the language of the orders to which it is proposed that statutory effect shall be given.

We are asked to swallow the measure on second reading—and in one swallow.

We are not given an opportunity of looking at certain of these measures and saying, "Some are of a temporary nature, while some in their subject matter obviously relate to subjects requiring permanent legislation." Parliament is not permitted to say, "We approve some of these measures; we disapprove others." No, we are asked on second reading to accept the bill and, in effect, to give blanket endorsement to a measure which, I say, is lacking in any principle upon which parliament can pass intelligently. To isolate the principle of the bill so that parliament may apply its intelligence to that principle is impossible under the circumstances created by the government. Parliament has been invited to stultify itself.

The method followed by the government is such as to thwart any attempt on the part of parliament to do its duty, to examine in every letter and detail the legislation it is asked to enact. The explanation is, of course, that our appeals to reason have fallen on deaf ears. Rigidity, again, has triumphed in the government.

The Minister of Justice has made reference to the situation which confronted the government and parliament at the outset of this session. He referred to the fact that the powers conferred upon the governor in council by the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act would come to an end on March 29, and that therefore the government found it necessary to secure from parliament specific legislative sanction for orders in council it deemed to be essential, or to ask for a general extension of the power to make such orders.

He has professed a desire for decontrol. Other members of the administration have professed a desire for decontrol. Most confusing statements have come from the government benches on this subject of its attitude toward decontrol. Sometimes there have been expressions in terms of advocacy of decontrol, and at other times there have been held up to parliament threats of national chaos if any further measures of decontrol were proposed. In this, parliament has not enjoyed clear leadership from the government; it has had only confusion thrown in its way.

At the outset of the session there were suggestions from the government—as a matter of fact one finds reference to this in the speech from the throne—to a desire on the part of the government to depart from the method of legislation by orders in council. It will be recalled that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, paused for one fleeting moment to do an act of devotion at the shrine of the supremacy of parliament. But we have been looking in vain for some indication on the part of the government that it really means seriously to restore to parliament the full supremacy of parliament which it lost in time of war at the hands of this administration, and which must be returned to it, now that we are in a time of peace.

The Minister of Justice did not repeat today the expressions he used on March 20, when introducing the legislation. I should like to remind the house of the test which the minister proposed to apply to all measures affected by the present bill. At page 1583 of Hansard he is reported in these words:

> Only the extreme nature of the emergency with which the country was faced justified the vesting of such powers in the executive.

And, Mr. Speaker, only measures passing that test—and it must be a severe and acid test—can, in my submission, be considered by parliament as worthy of continuance now—nearly two years after the conclusion of the war—under the guise of a continuing national emergency.

What did the government do? I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to recall the course which the government itself followed at the outset of this session. It introduced from time to time into the house no less than fifteen specific bills, bills in each case arising out of the fact that the orders in council which owed their validity to the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act would be coming to an end on March 29. Every one of these fifteen measures arose out of the termination of these orders in council. Some of these measures are of a permanent nature; some of them have time limits contained within their terms. Here they are, and I ask you, sir, and I ask the house to consider them in comparison with many of the orders in council to which reference is made in the schedule to the bill now before the house: the Immigration Act amendment, containing provisions permanent in their nature; Export and Import Permits Act, a measure which is given the life of one year; the Canada Grain Act amendment; Militia Pension Act amendment; Customs Act amendment; Foodstuffs Act amendment; Inspection and Sale Act amendment; Fertilizers Act amendment; Militia Act amendment; Patent Act amendment; Supplemental Payments on Mail Contracts Act; Department of National Defence Act; Trading with the Enemy Act; Wheat Board Act amendment; Agricultural Products Act. All these are permanent in their effect, with two possible exceptions. Most of them are amendments to statutes of parliament. Two of them are of a limited duration as appears by their terms. One to which I have referred, the Export and Import Permits Act, is given by its own terms the life of one year, and the Trading with the Enemy Act seems, if one can make anything of the language of that bill, to be intended to have a limited duration. You will have seen, Mr. Speaker, that most of these measures are in the form of permanent legislation. In the light of that fact and the fact that the government has already introduced measures of a permanent nature in at least thirteen bills and two others of perhaps a semi-permanent or interim nature, I ask why it was that when the government came to measures of the kind we find in the schedule to this bill it stopped short and did not proceed to introduce bills of a permanent nature which it indicates it intends to introduce at a later stage of the present session. It just does not make sense.

There is no distinction in principle between measures of the kind that the government has already introduced and a number of the orders in council in the schedule to this bill. Instead, the government has seen fit to present to this house in their full variety fifty-seven measures rolled into one, in my submission the greatest hodge-podge of legislation ever presented to this house. I ask the house—this is not new—to have regard to the variety of subject matter contained in the measures referred to in the schedule to this bill. Think of it! Rolled into one measure we have this infinite variety, this hodge-podge of subject matter: Recovery of subsidies on food and the payment of such subsidies; preference in the civil service for ex-service men; exemption of imported anthracite coal from customs duty; exemption of coke made from coal from the war exchange tax when used for certain purposes; exemption of bagging material from customs duty when imported; tariff provisions with reference to well-drilling machinery; the whole broad scope of the powers and jurisdiction of the wartime prices and trade board, the most powerful body ever established by any government in Canada; the whole group of orders dealing with rent controls in Canada; those dealing with the incorporation and powers of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation and the regulations made by it; the repayment of subsidies under the authority of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation; the banking of ration coupons; the Government Employees Compensation Act—another act already introduced at this session; the consolidation of supplementary regulations; the order dealing with the power and jurisdiction of the Canadian Sugar Stabilization Corporation; regulations for the control of salt fishing; pelagic sealing regulations; the canned fish allocation regulations; prohibition of fishing licences to persons of the Japanese race; the authorization of appeals in cases involving breaches of the wartime regulations; wartime labour relations regulations, involving the whole scope of collective bargaining and the procedure consequent upon it; the protection of certifications granted under the Ontario collective bargaining act and the establishment of wartime labour relations boards in certain of the provinces; financial assistance to voluntary repatriates to Japan of persons of the Japanese race; the reservation to the crown of radioactive substances in the Yukon territory; the reservation to the crown of similar substances in the northwest territories; post-discharge benefits to the members of the armed services serving in the interim forces; regulations relating to naval, military and air force estates; regulations involving claims by or against the crown involving members of the armed forces serving overseas; salvage services by His Majesty's Canadian ships; payment of old age pensions and pensions for the blind; the regulation of the distribution of construction materials; emergency shelter regulations—sweeping powers conferred first on the minister and now on the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation; orders dealing with wartime industries control, steel control, timber control; administration by the custodian of enemy property of property of persons of the Japanese race; transfer to the custodian of the property of Japanese evacuees; compensation to seamen for damage to their effects; authorization to the chairman of the board of steamship inspection to relieve ships from certain provisions of the Canada Shipping Act; a measure dealing with permission to Canadian chartered ships to clear on a voyage with masters, mates or engineers not holding appropriate certificates; and, finally, regulations dealing with an allowance to merchant seamen who are out of work.

I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that if you take down every volume of legislation enacted by parliament and scan the subject matter embraced within the enactments in any one session you will look in vain for any volume containing such a tremendous variety of subject matter as you find in this one measure that is before the house today. There has not yet been on the part of the government any attempt to assist the house by breaking down this legislation and taking out of it, in the first place, the measures which the government frankly admits to be legislative in their nature. We made a plea for a breakdown because it would assist orderly procedure and save the time of the house, but the government has not seen fit to do that.

The Minister of Justice said that the orders were of three kinds, regulative, administrative and legislative. Of the legislative we have some requiring permanent legislation. In the first place, we have the orders dealing with old age pensions. By the government's own statement they are to be replaced by legislation this session. We have those dealing with labour relations and with the civil service preference.

Mr. MARTIN: There is to be old age pensions legislation.

Mr. FLEMING: That is what I thought I had said.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member said "replaced."

Mr. FLEMING: There is to be old age pensions legislation, and we were also told by the Minister of Justice that the bill to be introduced by the government would have the effect of replacing, so that the orders which now deal with old age pensions and pensions for the blind would be revoked.

These would be replaced by legislation. They will be done away with when this legislation comes into effect.

Mr. MARTIN: That will be one of the consequences.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes. We hope they will have more consequences, because more is needed today in the field of old age pensions. The orders that I have enumerated in these three categories number ten; but there are still other orders the need for which will come to an end as soon as the new legislation has been adopted. I refer particularly to six orders under the heading of the Department of Labour, which are attached to the bill. There are at least sixteen which, in my submission, are quite unnecessary and illogical to have included within the scope of the bill. The others could be regrouped in a way which would assist the house greatly, for example, those of a permanent nature such as the two dealing with radioactive substances in the territories, and those which are of a strictly temporary nature. Hon. members wish to be sure that there is no hiatus in the matter of these orders relating to old age pensions and pensions for the blind. I am sure that there would be strong support throughout the house for the continuation of rent control regulations, not necessarily in the precise form in which they appear today, but in general, and particularly in urban centres. But we are asked today to vote on second reading of the bill, without any opportunity to say which of these measures in this great vast volume we are prepared to support and which we are not.

The procedure which the government is following cannot fail to make it impossible for a clear expression of opinion to be given on the measure at this time. The Minister of Justice touched on the point that the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act will expire on May 15. Hon. members have told him, and I am sure it would be a matter of general consent, that as to these orders which ought to be the subject of permanent legislation there will be no objection, if the house has not had all the time necessary by May 15 to complete its detailed review of these measures, to permitting these particular orders to be continued for any necessary period. But the method followed by the government, without regard to the fact that, since it has proposed to introduce this measure, there has been an extension of time to May 15, precludes parliament from giving effective expression of opinion on the second reading of the bill.

I wish to speak briefly on the subject of emergency. The Minister of Justice said today that he supports the bill on the ground of emergency. The resolution which the house passed gave the government leave to introduce a measure to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war. Yet the government in almost the same breath tells us that a number of these orders are to be replaced by permanent legislation covering the same subject matter and having no relation whatever to the national emergency referred to in the resolution or in the preamble to the bill. We are being asked to legislate in this respect what is nothing but a fiction. If the Minister of Justice proposes to ask this house to support the continuance of orders which are to be replaced later this session by permanent legislation, on the ground that they must be continued because of a national emergency, if there is any emergency with reference to these orders it is not attributable to the war; it is attributable to the policy of the government in not bringing down legislation at the proper time, which is early in the session.

The house has not been assisted by what the Minister of Justice has had to say on the subject of the constitutional position of parliament in purporting to legislate under emergency powers. What the Minister of Justice has done is only to succeed in adding to the confusion in the house by the manner in which the bill has been presented. I again recall the opinion of the law officers of the crown submitted by the Minister of Justice to the house on this very point on March 20, which may be found at page 1553 of Hansard. I shall quote first from the opinion itself, which was read with approval by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. ILSLEY: The opinion as to the validity of what bill?

Mr. FLEMING: We are dealing with the powers enjoyed by parliament on the subject of national emergency. This is the opinion in part.

Mr. ILSLEY: On what bill?

Mr. FLEMING: In this connection.

Mr. ILSLEY: On what bill?

Mr. FLEMING: The opinion, as the minister well knows, was headed: "Memorandum for Minister of Justice re Bill 25." But the principle which the minister was enunciating at that time is the principle which has a direct and inescapable bearing on the question before the house today. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that the contribution of the Minister of Justice on this subject has simply added to the confusion of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman cannot read from a previous debate on another bill.

Mr. FLEMING: I will remind you, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of Justice—apparently he has forgotten it—that this same opinion and his comments on it were discussed in the house last Tuesday afternoon in the debate on the resolution preceding the introduction of this measure. So far as I am concerned, the Minister of Justice may have it read from the original text of Hansard of March 20, or he can have it read from Hansard of a week ago today where the same extracts from his speech of March 20 were read to the house in the debate on the resolution preceding this bill. He may have it either way; it makes no difference to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not care whether the hon. gentleman reads it or not. I am raising a point of order which is based on the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to the rules of the house, the hon. member cannot refer to a former debate, but of course, if he is referring to a speech which was made on the question which is before the house, that is different.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister's point of order was in regard to a previous debate. Was the statement made by the Minister of Justice a part of his speech in that debate or not? If it is a statement made by the minister it is a different matter altogether. My impression is that it is a statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only point I am raising, Mr. Speaker, is that any speech or statement that I made on the debate on the agricultural products bill cannot be quoted in this debate. Let me make it clear. I do not care whether it is read or not. The point of order I am raising is that we cannot go back to previous debates. The matter of precedent is important.

Mr. FLEMING: Perhaps that is the Minister of Justice's idea of trying to save the time of the house. He can have it either way. If he wishes to stick to his technical point, then I shall read the same passage which I was going to quote from Hansard of March 25 in the debate on the resolution preceding the bill. It will be found at page 1716 of Hansard of March 25 in the speech of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). He is quoting from the speech of the Minister of Justice to which I have referred. Here we have the quotation from the statement made by the Minister of Justice on March 20:

> Our emergency legislation is based on the existence of a national emergency arising out of the war, on the emergency doctrine . . .

And further on:

> However I shall add my own opinion. I think on most occasions it will be the same as that of the deputy minister.

Again referring, Mr. Speaker, to the opinion of the deputy minister of justice that it is no longer necessary to rely strictly on the doctrine of emergency, that the effect of the recent decisions of the privy council has been to extend the power of parliament, so that parliament in these cases is not held down strictly to the four corners of the emergency principle as interpreted in the Fort Frances case of earlier days. And here we have a further quotation:

> I am not going to venture into an opinion on the matter.

These, again, are the words of the Minister of Justice:

> I am not going to venture into an opinion on the matter. However I have read the Canada Temperance Act case and the subsequent case, that of the Japanese reference, and it appears to me that the true effect of the decision in the Canada Temperance Act case is that there does not have to be an emergency to found jurisdiction on the part of the dominion; that the dominion may have the power even when there is no emergency to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, even though its legislation touches upon matters ordinarily regarded as solely within provincial jurisdiction. In other words, the judgment of the judicial committee of the privy council as given by Lord Simon extends rather than narrows the powers of the dominion as they had heretofore been conceived.

Again we find these words from the statement of the Minister of Justice:

> As I say, these cannot be the only aspects of the emergency but these aspects are, I submit, sufficient to occasion a valid exercise of the powers under the peace, order and good government clause.
> To sum up: We do not need, under the Canada Temperance Act case, to establish a national emergency.

Could anything be more thoroughly calculated to confuse this house in its endeavour to measure the extent of any national emergency which is alleged to exist in certain aspects, necessitating some fifty-seven orders in council? The fact of the matter is that the insertion by the government of these words "in some aspects" in relation to the alleged national emergency shows conclusively that it is incumbent upon the government to establish, with reference to each of these orders, with reference to each subject matter dealt with within the broad scope of the fifty-seven orders, the existence of a national emergency in that particular aspect, the aspect relating to the subject matter of each of these orders in council. And that cannot be done. It is an impossibility to do it on the second reading. In the light of the confusing statements made by the Minister of Justice on this subject of jurisdiction, how can it be expected that parliament, with this hodge-podge thrown at it by the government, can give a proper and intelligent expression of opinion on the alleged principle of this bill?

Then, Mr. Speaker, I offer this observation just in passing from the subject of emergency. It is, of course, the habit of the government to refer to the emergency that existed during the time of war, and the function that was fulfilled in time of war by certain of these controls. We could admit all that sort of thing, and it would not advance us one iota towards an orderly consideration of the problem presented by the bill.

We are not now considering what happened during the time of war, when this country faced a grave crisis, the greatest in its history, along with the forces of freedom throughout the rest of the world. What we are dealing with today, nearly two years after the conclusion of hostilities, is the situation we find ourselves in at the present time, a situation in which the government must, in my submission, prove with respect to each of these fifty-seven measures the existence of a national emergency with relation to that particular subject. There must be proofs on these fifty-seven aspects if the government is to have a sound constitutional foundation for legislation of this kind, and that goes to the root of the whole question. It establishes, it seems to me, the utter impossibility of the government justifying the principle of a bill like this when the constitutionality of the measure can be established only by reference to each of the fifty-seven orders and proving that, for the special subject matter of each order individually, there exists a national emergency.

We had hoped, during the consideration in committee of the whole, at any rate, on the resolution, to have received from the government some clear statement of its objective with reference to decontrol. I am afraid we have just about as clear an idea now of the government's objective as we had when we started.

Mr. MARTIN: Is my hon. friend not happy to be a Canadian citizen?

Mr. FLEMING: I seem to hear the tones of citizen Martin, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MARTIN: Are you not a citizen?

Mr. FLEMING: Yes, but I am not citizen Martin.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he cannot mention a member by name.

Mr. FLEMING: Then, Mr. Speaker, I will refer in passing to the interjection offered by the minister in stentorian but mellifluous tones.

Mr. MARTIN: Good.

Mr. KNOWLES: Explain.

Mr. FLEMING: On his voice alone he should win the leadership of the Liberal party in a walk.

Now, Mr. Speaker, has the government no objective with reference to this alleged emergency? We have asked the government for a clear statement of its position. Is there no objective in terms of a desire to approach at least some semblance of constitutional normalcy in this country? We have not had a statement in that regard. Surely the government must see that at some time there must be a return to constitutional normalcy.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the hon. member mind defining that word?

Mr. FLEMING: I do not know that I should take up the time of the whole house to answer that question. I do not expect a socialist, who does not want to see an end of emergency, who wants to see the dominion going on trampling upon the rights of the provinces, to desire a return to normalcy. I do not expect him to want to see the country return to normalcy, and a resumption by the legislatures of the provinces of their normal rights under the constitution. I fully expect him to be opposed, as he and his party have shown themselves to be opposed, to the provinces recovering the rights given them under the constitution. They have gone on preaching the doctrine of centralization, because they know that centralization of power at Ottawa is necessary if they are to fasten the yoke of socialism upon the people of the country.

Mr. KNOWLES: We know what the hon. member means by normalcy.

Mr. FLEMING: No wonder the socialists in this house do not want to see us get back to the terms of the constitution.

Mr. KNOWLES: Back to the conditions in 1930.

Mr. FLEMING: No wonder they prolong the fiction of a national emergency, in order that centralization of power at Ottawa may continue. They support it; it is their policy.

Mr. GILLIS: Take a look at Nova Scotia since they lifted the coal controls. Explain that, will you?

Mr. FLEMING: I am sorry I did not hear what the hon. gentleman said. Probably it was not worth hearing anyway.

Mr. GILLIS: I said—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member who has the floor must not be interrupted.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question if he would permit me.

Mr. FLEMING: Yes; I will do so with pleasure.

Mr. GILLIS: Does he think the relinquishing of coal controls has improved the economy of Nova Scotia on the basis of the present upheaval down there?

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes or no.

Mr. FLEMING: If the hon. member will tell me—

Mr. KNOWLES: Yes or no.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the hon. member tell me what possible use there would be in continuing powers in the hands of this government when they will not even use their good offices to try to bring about a settlement of that disastrous coal strike? What is the sense of giving them power? If the hon. member wishes to make his speech on the question of opposition to the relinquishment of control powers, then he had better go the whole way and tell the truth to the people of Nova Scotia and of Cape Breton, that he would have opposed measures of decontrol and, with them, that measure of decontrol which did away with wage ceilings and salary ceilings.

Mr. COLDWELL: If you shoot the cost of living up, people must receive decent salaries.

Mr. FLEMING: I submit that, until there is a clear definition of an objective set by the government, and which parliament must be able to endorse before it can give approval to the alleged principle of this bill, we simply cannot assume that there is somewhere an orderly plan of decontrol. The government must have some objective, because the legislatures of the provinces must know when the dominion intends to step out of the field now occupied by the government under the guise of the existence of a national emergency. The people, who have their own individual problems—landlords, tenants, farmers, business men, employees—must know what objectives the government is aiming at, so that they can be prepared for the day of decontrol or for the day of partial decontrol. We must know. There is today the greatest uncertainty in the country as to what the government is really driving at with reference to decontrol. Nobody knows, and I suspect the reason is that the government itself does not know.

Mr. KNOWLES: Where does the hon. member's party stand on price control as a result of their convention?

Mr. COLDWELL: What was the resolution that was passed over the week-end?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Speaker, I should be delighted to read, for the enlightenment and instruction of our socialist friends to the left, the very desirable recommendations submitted by the recent annual meeting of the Progressive Conservative Association of Canada for the good of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Let us have the resolution on control.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is a secret resolution.

Mr. FLEMING: Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to read the resolutions. If some hon. member would furnish me with a copy, which I have not in my possession at the present time, I would have the utmost pleasure in putting them on the record of the house. It would be a signpost to guide all parties in the house to the desirable end, for the good of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Read back to 1931.

Mr. FLEMING: I come now to the terms of the bill and the important schedule to it, Mr. Speaker. In the first place, I submit to you that the bill is quite improper in its composition or in the form that it takes as submitted to this house. What we have is simply reference to a number of these measures by order, by subject and by date. The Minister of Justice makes a big play of his claim that when the house resolves itself into committee of the whole an opportunity will be provided for all members to scrutinize these orders and to amend them. Let us have some regard to the facts. What have we in the bill before us? Suppose, when we come to the order dealing with rent control, I wish to make an amendment to the order to provide that veterans who have purchased houses in good faith for their personal occupancy should not be denied occupation of them; how am I to do that? Apparently, I must, in committee of the whole, make reference to an order which is some pages in length, and somehow try to put before the house some particular provision. I do not know how I am to refer to it unless I say page number so-and-so, line number so-and-so in this volume which we are told is not before the house. We were told as much this afternoon by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent). How on earth is the house, in committee of the whole, to apply its intelligence to deal with these measures individually, seriatim, and pass upon them line by line and page by page? The method followed by the government will just defy any effort to bring order out of chaos, even in committee of the whole. An insuperable problem has been created in the procedure which has been adopted.

I wish to make this further observation in conclusion. I suppose it is not to be wondered at that many of us in this house approach with a measure of suspicion a proposal from the government that vast, sweeping powers be conferred on bodies outside the house, when we have regard to the fact that, over the period of years during which some of these orders have been in effect, we saw the eclipse of parliament while the strength of the controllers grew; when we saw orders in council being passed even while parliament was in session; when we saw necessary information denied to parliament on the ground that it was not in the public interest; when secret orders were made and information concerning them was denied to this house. And when today we see no objective toward which decontrol could move on an orderly basis; when we see rather on every hand the continuation of the bureaucratic complex; when we see an attempt made on the government side—and joined in, of course, by their allies, the socialists—to perpetuate this centralization of power at Ottawa into the time of peace, small wonder it is, in the light of all these facts, that we approach a measure of this kind with a certain degree of suspicion.

We do not look for a too frank interpretation on the part of some parties of the stand we are taking on this measure. We are taking a stand to this effect. In the light of the way in which the government have presented this measure, the way in which they have created confusion by the procedure which they have followed, the way in which they have prevented parliament from trying to bring any order out of the chaos of government creation, we say that there is no principle which can be isolated from this bill and on which parliament can be asked to pass an intelligent opinion. And we say that, until there is clear justification, we do not wish to put parliament in the position of simply abdicating great powers in favour of bureaucratic boards outside parliament. Let it not be said that we are opposing these orders in council holus-bolus, because that cannot be said honestly by anyone. What we say is that, on a measure framed in the terms in which this one is framed, and following the procedure on this bill which the government insists should be followed in the face of appeals to reason, it is impossible for this house to pass on the principle of this bill; and that is not to be taken as opposition to all these orders in council, because we simply say that we are not prepared to swallow everything holus-bolus. Whatever is good and whatever is bad have been mixed together here in such a way that it is impossible to extricate the one from the other.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in order that the position taken by the official opposition may be clearly before the house and before the people, and in order that the position we take may not be open to misinterpretation by political adversaries, let me now present to the house an amendment which I offer, seconded by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling):

> That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
>
> "While recognizing that the said bill deals with some matters such as old age pensions and veterans in the civil service which do not depend for constitutional validity on the existence of an emergency and some other matters which can only be dealt with by this parliament on the basis of an existing or apprehended emergency; and while willing to support properly drafted legislation dealing with such matters:
> This house is unalterably opposed to the enactment of a measure to continue indiscriminately the sweeping powers of the presently existing boards outside the control of parliament."

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) has intimated, I am entering this debate mainly for the purpose of announcing another step in the government's programme of orderly decontrol. Before doing so, however, I should like to make a few general observations with respect to the bill before the house. There was a good deal of discussion on the resolution which preceded the introduction of the bill, and I have no doubt there will be a good deal of discussion both on second reading and when the bill is in committee, so that I do not intend to prolong the debate unduly at this time. However, as the minister responsible for the administration of some of the controls covered by orders in council included in this bill, I wish to say a few words at this stage.

My colleague the Minister of Justice, who had the responsibility of administering the stabilization programme during all the war years, and who, if I may say so, discharged that responsibility effectively and with courage, has stated the reasons which impelled the government to seek an extension of these emergency controls over certain prices, supplies and rentals for a limited period. With the reasons he has advanced I am in full accord, and I am not going to take up the time of the house by attempting to cover the ground again.

There are, however, two points I should like to make. The first is that the government seeks an extension of its powers to control these prices, supplies and rentals for one reason and one reason only, namely to continue to give the ordinary people of this country, the farmers, the fishermen and the workers in the cities and towns, a fair break in this transition period. During the war our policy was to prevent inflation and to provide and enforce a fair distribution of goods which were in short supply. Prices were held under a pretty rigid price ceiling; but that policy worked. We are more than ever convinced that this over-all price ceiling policy was the only policy which could have worked successfully. When the war came to an end, however, we felt that a rigid over-all price ceiling was no longer appropriate, that sooner or later Canadians would have to adjust themselves to the realities of the post-war world, so that we began to adjust ceilings and to remove controls steadily and carefully, trying to avoid dislocating adjustments.

Of course we could have taken another line —and I gathered the impression, in the course of this debate and in the discussion on the resolution preceding this bill, that the official opposition would have favoured such a line—that is, the sweeping removal of all controls at once. From some points of view, of course, that would have been the easier course, and it certainly would have afforded some excellent opportunities for making nice speculative profits. But whether or not the abandonment of all controls was the easier course, it certainly was not the wiser course, and, in my opinion, it could not have been followed without involving the government in an act of bad faith toward the people of this country. Canadians have, I think, been led to expect a responsible and careful policy of decontrol, and I for one am not going to be party to the sort of panic-stricken retreat from controls that is advocated in some quarters.

The course that has been taken has naturally led to accusations that the government is control-minded; that it likes to order people about, and that it is reluctant to let go its wartime authority. I can speak for myself, and I believe I can speak for all my colleagues, when I say there is nothing we would like better than to be able to announce today that all remaining controls could now be safely withdrawn; but we cannot make any such announcement. The government is convinced that to remove such controls now would have the most serious consequences, particularly for those least able to protect themselves. Our policy therefore is and has been one of what we believe to be orderly decontrol; and I am certain that in following such a policy we have the overwhelming support of the people of Canada.

My second point is that the government has already made substantial progress in the direction of decontrol. If any evidence were needed of the government's desire to get rid of controls as soon as that could be safely done it is to be found in what has happened since the end of the war, and particularly in the record of the past few months. There are some, I know, who feel that we have moved either too quickly or too slowly in some directions. I do not think we have, but such questions are, of course, matters of judgment, and there can be differences of opinion. I do say, however, that every item in the important list of goods and services which will remain under control after today is in that list for very good reasons.

In accordance with the government's decontrol policy, I wish to inform the house that, effective tomorrow, a substantial additional number of goods and services are to be released from price control. Today the wartime prices and trade board has issued a new order in which the specific list of goods and services which continue under price control is set out; but for the information of hon. members I should like to give a summarized statement of the significant items in the main categories which are now being removed from control.

Mr. FLEMING: It is already in the Ottawa Evening Journal.

Mr. ABBOTT: Not all of them. In the section dealing with foodstuffs the release from ceilings includes candy and confectionery of all kinds, cocoa beans and their derivatives, and beverage preparations made from cocoa. Soft drinks are being removed. An amendment is being made to the list of processed meats, under which certain of the non-standard kinds of sausage and some of the canned and cooked meats are being released. Hon. members will recall that eggs were removed from the price ceiling a short time ago, and we are now removing turkeys, ducks and geese in live or dressed form.

With regard to fuels, all coke, coal, charcoal and fuelwood are being removed from the price ceiling. In the case of coal and coke, however, this will not become effective until midnight, April 15. The reason for this is that we are concurrently cancelling all subsidies of every kind on either imported or domestic fuels. There is, however, a complicated structure of subsidies on different types of fuels, so that it is necessary to withdraw them at different intervals. Consequently the subsidy on imported anthracite coal and briquettes made from the coal will cease at midnight tonight. In the case of imported bituminous coal and briquettes made from bituminous coal, the subsidy will cease on April 15. Special subsidies paid to coal producers will cease on April 15, and sundry emergency subsidies, covering certain transportation costs on coal or coke diverted or allocated to markets not usually supplied, will be cancelled on April 8. Any other emergency subsidies not included in the foregoing will be cancelled as from April 15. By following this procedure, we are adopting the most equitable method open to us in dealing with the problem of inventories in the hands of coal dealers, and at the same time ensuring as far as possible that consumers will get the major benefit of subsidized inventories, particularly in the case of imported anthracite, where the inventories on hand represent the larger part of the current available supply.

In textiles there is a lengthy list of specific garments which are affected; but, speaking generally, the step now being taken in this group removes from price control wool in all its forms whether as yarn, fabric or clothing. Again speaking generally, and with some exceptions in point of detail, I may say this means that textiles consisting wholly or chiefly of cotton or rayon will remain under price control, having in mind that a substantial subsidy is still being paid on raw cotton going into process.

The ceiling is removed from footwear of all kinds. I should point out, however, that leather itself, as well as hides, remain subject to price control. In the section on household equipment, cooking ranges, refrigerators of all kinds, domestic washing machines and domestic sewing machines are freed, as well as all plumbing and sanitary equipment and a fairly lengthy list of construction products. All motor vehicles are being removed. The list of containers and packing materials still subject to price controls has been reduced to those made from textile fabric only and including bags, cases, envelopes, folders and sacks. All chemicals and plastics are removed, and in the paper and paper products field, while the list of end products has been substantially reduced, price control is retained on basic materials such as wood pulp, paperboard and waste paper.

As I said earlier, detailed particulars will be given by the wartime prices and trade board; but for the convenience of hon. members, I am tabling a supply of the new order of the board which gives the revised list of goods and services still remaining under price control. For the convenience of the general public, an advertisement will also appear in the daily newspapers giving particulars of the new order.

Before completing this statement, I should like to add a brief comment about the meaning of the step now being taken. Hon. members will recognize that the decontrol measures now announced, together with the announcement made last January, represent a further step toward the final elimination of wartime price control. As far as possible, the release from ceiling control has followed the pattern for an orderly readjustment, to which I have already referred, and which has been outlined by the government on a number of previous occasions. Maintenance of control up to this point has avoided the violent fluctuations which are so disrupting to trade and industry, and which have been so apparent in many other countries. Any price adjustments which follow the present step will, we believe, bring us smoothly to the levels which are now appropriate.

The list of goods and services which remain under control covers many of the basic necessities of life in food, clothing and shelter where uncertainties, which we hope are of a temporary nature, are still sufficient to require the retention of that control. In some cases, as I have mentioned, subsidies are still being paid, and some pricing adjustments may be found advisable as a stabilizing influence before the commodities concerned are entirely freed from control. These matters are under close study, and announcements about them will be made from time to time.

Hon. members will recognize the significance, for example, of our leaving the whole range of agricultural machinery and implements under price control. Our general view is that price control in this field should remain until most of the products of the farm are released. Apart from this special class, however, our plan is to remove end products or fabricated commodities from the ceiling as their production reaches the point where a major shortage does not exist. But to ensure stability until markets find their levels after some five and a half years control, we think it wise to continue for a further period many of the basic materials.

Finally, in the question of shelter, acute difficulties remain, so that rental and eviction controls must be continued. Some amelioration in the present regulations has been under active consideration by the government for some time, however, and I hope shortly to make an announcement of what changes are considered feasible in this field, while still giving tenants the necessary protection under existing conditions of shortage of dwelling space.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Would the minister permit a brief question. When he referred to subsidies with respect to coal, I take it he did not include the freight subventions?

Mr. ABBOTT: No. Those are statutory subsidies.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we are witnessing a most peculiar procedure here. We have before us a bill dealing with control; and while we are debating the bill, it is being chiselled away, so that by the time we finish with it we have no assurance as to whether there will be any controls.

I have not been critical of the government, but I do say it should have more respect for the House of Commons than to ask the house to acquiesce in that sort of thing. I should like now to draw the attention of the house to the nature of the price controls which have now been removed. So far as I could gather from what the minister read, it would seem that controls on consumer goods are removed, while controls on manufacturers' goods are maintained.

That means that in respect of the things the manufacturer has to buy in his business controls will be maintained. But when the manufactured process is complete and the goods reach the consumer there will be no further controls. The consumer is not protected, the big business man is. That is a serious situation.

Leathers and hides are controlled, shoes are uncontrolled. Woollen products are treated in the same way. The manufacturer buys leathers and hides, but the consumer buys shoes. We find that in the first instance we have controls, and in the other no controls at all. We are not protecting the people who need protection; and the people who do not need protection are receiving it.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre) moved:

That Bills Nos. 28 to 58 inclusive, Nos. 60 to 71 inclusive and Nos. 74 to 103 inclusive be now read a second time.

Mr. FREDERIC DORION (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, if we look at the number of divorce bills that are already coming to this house at this early stage of the session from the divorce factory of the other place we can easily foresee that the flood of divorces will be much greater this year than in any previous year. Since this is the first time during this session that we have been asked to pass a certain number of these bills, I take this opportunity to protest once more against the too great facility with which these divorces are granted and to record my objection to the granting of divorce altogether by this house.

We are reminded every day, and I believe it to be true, that we are proceeding through a period of readjustment after the miseries and the hardships and conflict of the last six years. Nearly half the world is still living under harsh conditions, and even in the victorious countries people are struggling to get out of the entanglements in which we have been living for many years. Every day we are receiving numerous requests from all kinds of organizations, social clubs, labour unions, et cetera for the passing of social legislation to raise the standard of living and to help our fellow citizens enjoy a comfortable life. But, Mr. Speaker, my contention is that it is not by the enactment of numerous laws, social legislation, et cetera, that we shall find a proper cure for the present situation. Even if we were to sit here all the year round passing law after law, our country would not be in any better shape if the morality and behaviour of the people were not what they should be. We must face without fear the situation as it is and endeavour to correct the evil at its very root.

It is a well known fact that the family is the essential element of society. It cannot be denied that if you destroy the family, society will collapse, and that if you have good, healthy and solid families, society itself will be strong and prosperous. Therefore, if it is our duty as legislators to provide the nation with the necessary physical needs, our mandate will be fulfilled only if at the same time we enact the necessary legislation to prevent the moral decadence from which the people may suffer. Let us save the family and then we can face the future of our country with confidence.

Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to quote from an article published in the last issue of the magazine New World and entitled "What makes people happy?":

A Harvard professor recently stated that if the basis of civilization, the family, is to survive, it must be sold like soap flakes on bill boards, four-coloured advertisements and the radio, by a firm to be called Hucksters (International) Inc. Another news report from Los Angeles which shows that there are five divorces for every six marriages in California, adds point to his suggestion, particularly when we realize that the Canadian divorce rate is rising every year.

In contrast with Britain we rate money above family life. A comparison between findings of the Canadian institute of public opinion and the British institute when the question was asked, "Will you tell me in your words what the word 'Happiness' means to you?" showed the following returns:

Happiness First

	Britain Per cent	Canada Per cent
Family life	33	19
Sufficient money, et cetera	13	38
Contentment	20	32
Health	13	18
Friends	3	7
Religion	1	2
Dont know	7	6

The article goes on to say:

While the above table makes comparison a little difficult, in that the total percentage exceeds 100 per cent because some people listed more than one reason for the meaning of happiness, the comparison does, however, show that our standard of values in Canada badly needs overhauling. If we teach our children that happiness consists in having sufficient money, they will be forever chasing a will-o'-the-wisp, because no one ever has sufficient money—we can always use another ten dollars. And our children, when they grow up, will feel that their marriages are unhappy because they do not have sufficient money, and that they are, therefore, entitled to a divorce.

The function of a woman after marriage is to be a good wife and good mother. This is one of the most difficult jobs in the world, and skill in this task is not an accident. It demands everything that she's got. Therefore, since 95 per cent of women get married, it would be as well to teach girls in the last grades, in addition to Romeo and Juliet and quadratic equations, something about child care, sex, budgeting, and household economics. It is true that a few women's ambition might be to work in a factory or office, but they will always represent a small minority.

Why don't we teach boys and girls the meaning of marriage so that they will not, in increasing numbers, have an emotional let-down after marriage and seek the divorce courts?

Thus it goes without saying that divorce is the most direct menace to the family. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, when I speak of divorce, I have in mind not only the bills that are before us, but also the situation as it now exists throughout nine provinces; because, if our attention here in this house is especially drawn to the divorces from the province of Quebec, we must not forget that it is still the province in which there is the smallest average number of divorces. I have here some figures from the Canada Year Book 1945, page 151, showing that in 1943 there were 3,263 divorces in the whole dominion, of which ninety were in the province of Quebec.

When one speaks on questions like this we are often asked, and rightly so: Well, what do you suggest to correct the situation? I believe, Mr. Speaker, that, first, our laws are such that it is much too easy for people to obtain a divorce. People get married without enough precautions, because they know that if they cannot get along with each other as smoothly as they wish, it will be very easy for them to quit and start anew with somebody else. Therefore the federal law relating to divorce, as well as the laws of the provinces where there is such legislation, should be modified so as to restrain as much as possible the granting of divorce.

But there is another means much more effective. This would be to direct those who are responsible for the education of our young people, to educate their pupils more fully on the gravity of marriage and the responsibilities that are attached to the union of man and wife, which must always be regarded as sacred.

I know, as an example, that in my home town, in the parish in which I live, our parish priests have organized once a week lectures for the young men and women on preparation for marriage. And nobody can deny that, in the province of Quebec, let alone the city of Montreal, there is not one divorce per 100,000 of population.

Permit me, Mr. Speaker, to quote from a declaration of the Bishops of Canada dated January 18, 1945, the following passage:

Marriage and family. If it pleases us to realize that public attention is drawn towards the economic security of the family, we cannot but deplore the forever renewed attempts to loosen the sacred bonds of marriage. We condemn without hesitation all measures originating sometimes even in the midst of public organizations, of whom we would have a right to expect more clear-sightedness, to introduce divorce in provinces who still reject it or to render it more frequent and easier than in others. We particularly invite the Catholic associations to voice their protests against these enterprises of de-Christianization of marriage and family and to claim that the legislative and judiciary authorities treat this double institution in line with Christian teaching and the best traditions of our country. It is also our hope to see as soon as possible the family, broken up and disjointed by the sad necessities of the war, find once more its integrity and equilibrium wanted by God, and to see the prompt return of wives and mothers to the home of which they are the guardians. We sincerely hope for a true family policy, a policy of protection and of assistance to the family, living cell of all social corps.

It seems to me that what is most needed is not only modified divorce laws, but an opening of the whole question of family relationship and responsibilities, with a view to creating fitting institutions, both legal and social-advisory, to deal with them in a more inclusive manner, with the object of decreasing hasty and ill-considered marriages, and hasty and ill-considered divorces, with the welfare of the children as the central social concern.

Divorce is a primary Canadian problem if only for the close relation it bears to another leading problem, juvenile delinquency. The experience of the juvenile courts shows that a large majority of young delinquents come from homes broken by divorce or otherwise.

The only normal life for a child is in the family, and the minimum description of a family is a father, a mother and a child. When the father goes, the chief element of security goes with him, whether actual or psychological. If he goes by death the child at least retains the image of the father as a memory and an example. If he goes by an act of his own will, or the will of the mother, the child feels bereft and cheated, and this feeling awakens in him unnatural and unsocial instincts. Therefore, for the sake of the child, for the sake of the society, for the sake of morality, let us save the family by all means, and for that purpose, let us endeavour to raise the strongest possible barriers against the flood of divorces which is, for a country, worse than any other means of destruction.

I had occasion to read many reports of the senate committee on divorce, and I was amazed to notice the lack of real evidence that is produced in every case. Truly, Mr. Speaker, one cannot conceive that such important decisions be taken on so meagre evidence.

As I said at the outset of my remarks, I am opposed to the granting of any divorce. I submit also that there still is another duty for any member; it is not to accept for presentation before this house any bill that does not comply with the following elementary principle: "The most insignificant contract cannot be broken by either one of the parties to it, when there is not the faintest shade of evidence that this can be done."

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): This matter has been up every session and illustrates the fact that the House of Commons should have a legal committee to consider these legal bills and matters. All provinces but Quebec have a divorce court. After the last war we were faced with the same state of affairs. The situation is not local. Every country on earth is confronted with this problem. It has today become a canker in almost every state in the world.

The government of the day is responsible for the law. The enforcement of the law lies with the provincial attorneys general. Nobody wants to force a divorce court on Quebec; it is largely to be left, as formerly, a matter of their own selection. After every war there has been a great dislocation. Pitt was faced with it. The Addington administration was faced with it. They had the same thing in 1815 and after the first great war. The same thing happens after every war. Since the recent war there have been many applications for divorce. There has been talk of widening the grounds of divorce; at the present time the only grounds for divorce in Canada is substantially adultery. A few years ago we had a learned discussion about the matter. After the last war is was decided to establish divorce courts in Canada. The high court judges are getting sick and tired of it. I do not see why the high courts in the provinces should be saddled with this work. In my opinion, the state must have some responsibility because, as you know, Mr. Speaker, a husband deserts his wife and children, leaving them to charity, and goes abroad. It is an outrage. Nobody knows where he is. In many cases that has grown out of the war. The husband has come home and a divorce has been obtained, or he leaves his wife and children. Sometimes there are faults on both sides.

The government of the day should lay down the divorce policy of this country. The system which is now in force is costing a great deal of money at every assizes. There are thousands of cases in the county of York. The list now requires, at certain times of the year, non-jury sittings of three or four high court judges. Three or four judges were sitting a few weeks ago at the court house in Toronto dealing with divorce. The applicants do not all live in our city. They come from all parts of the country. Our judges are sick and tired of it. The cost of parliamentary divorces in Ottawa is out of all proportion to the services rendered. Lawyers have to be engaged; railway fares paid; hotel bills; witnesses are brought down and all that kind of thing. This is not the only place that is confronted with this problem. We know nothing about the subject matter of all these cases now before us. There is not one hon. member who knows very much about any of these cases. I do not know anything about them. It is time that parliament laid down a new policy. It is also the duty of the state to look after the children and the wife who are not guilty in these cases. The state must have some duty to these unfortunate children, because the first duty of a government is to look after the health, wealth, peace, happiness and prosperity of its citizens.

The province of Quebec seems to want to have parliament saddled with this burden. Prince Edward Island has, I believe, got at last, or has now applied for a court. Nearly all the cases that come before parliament claim domicile in Quebec. We have now received some 132 applications from the other place, but that is only a partial solution. It is the duty of the government to lay down a policy on this matter. Second, there should be a legal committee; third, these cases in the various provinces should be transferred from the high court of justice to the county court. The county courts are local, whereas our high courts are not. The judges of the high courts go out on circuit. These divorce cases prevent the proper administration of justice, particularly when the lists are crowded with these cases. The high courts are held once or twice a year in some counties. Some of the counties are now united in high court work and the judge appears only one or two times a year, when there is a murder trial. Sometimes the lists are all congested with divorce cases. You know from your experience of the law, Mr. Speaker, that the lists are congested in every county in Ontario. It is the same all over the world. In the United States it has become a canker on the state, and that is going to take place in this country unless the government takes hold of it and lays down some kind of policy. Certainly it is a burden on municipalities when you consider the costs of relief for the individual family, and deserted wives and children who are a charge on others of the same family and left to charity with a lot of misery and suffering.

This is the forty-fourth day of the session and, while we have dealt with all sorts of material things, we have not seen fit to spend five minutes of our time considering more important matters affecting the welfare of individuals in relation to this most important question in which all humanity is concerned. The human side of our work has been forgotten while we have dealt with material things. We have forgotten, it seems, that we are living in a civilized country. As I listened to the proceedings the other day in a committee which was considering the affairs of Indians, Eskimos and people in the northlands, and after hearing the evidence given there, I began to doubt whether we were really living in a Christian country. I think the time has come for action.

So far as the cost of divorce is concerned, it is simply fabulous. People have to come all the way to Ottawa and appear before another part of parliament meeting in another place. There are lawyers and witnesses, hotel bills, railway fares and all that sort of thing, and the cost is far more under the parliamentary system than it is in the law courts. Remember, the local courts are closer to the people and I am sure the fees would be limited to $50 at the outside, whereas under the present system it runs into hundreds of dollars. I think we can compare the costs of parliamentary fees with those in the high court of justice. In the county courts, on the other hand, the cost would not be so high.

I submit that it is the duty of the government to solve this national problem. A large number of medical men take the view that the grounds for divorce should be widened. As opposed to that, certain churches do not believe in divorce. The bishops of the church of which I am a very humble member are opposed to divorce, as was the Lambeth conference, on the ground set forth in the text, "Those whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder." But a large body of respectable public opinion has asked and is asking for some better solution.

There is no doubt that in England a large body of public opinion is departing from that principle, but when we see the suffering of women and particularly the suffering of children; when we consider the broken homes and all the tragedy involved, I think it is the duty of parliament, instead of devoting its time exclusively to the consideration of material questions, morning, noon and night, to set aside at least a part of its time for the consideration of human rights and privileges, and the health and welfare of the population.

I hope there will be a scale of fees recommended by the learned Attorney General of Canada. He has not been long in the department, but he is a man with a practical mind, and I would appeal to him to help solve this great question and to lay down a scale of fees to be charged.

Mr. W. GARFIELD CASE (Grey North): I think it might be well, Mr. Speaker, for me to add some words to what has been said, since I have interested myself in this phase of our national life. I doubt whether we can legislate people into happiness, and therefore I am not in any sense taking exception to divorce as a principle. I feel, however, that much could be said regarding the method employed.

I have it on good authority that these divorces are dealt with at the rate of four an hour in the other place, and sometimes the rate is even more rapid. A firm of detectives in the city of Montreal—practically the same firm of detectives—supplies all the evidence, which is apparently written according to form and submitted no doubt to save time.

My principal objection is that not sufficient time is available to deal with the various phases of the applications, and to deal with them conclusively. No provision is made for the ones who are likely to suffer most; that is, the children in the family involved. If my memory serves me correctly, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. St. Laurent), when Minister of Justice, promised that the government would give some consideration to the possibility of setting up a central court of a character that would deal with these divorce bills.

I feel that local autonomy must be respected, and since the province of Quebec does not care to have divorce courts we find that the bulk of the divorce applications come from that province.

I think there is some point in what the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said, that if this is to go on we should seek to set up a legal committee of the House of Commons to review these divorce bills. After all, I question very much whether many hon. members read the evidence. If you read the evidence in one or two bills you will find a certain resemblance between them and each of the others. We are not in the position of a jury. We have not heard the evidence; we have had no opportunity of cross-examining witnesses. In other words, we know absolutely nothing about what has taken place. We are simply treated as rubber-stamps and are supposed to give our approval to something of which we know little or nothing. This puts the emphasis in the wrong place.

I suggest that if this system is to continue, the final disposition should be made by the other place and should not be referred to this chamber at all. They are the ones who hear the evidence and who enjoy the right of cross-examination, and therefore they are the ones in the best position to approve or disapprove.

I wish to leave that thought with hon. members, because something must be done to cope with the situation, which certainly is not in the best interests of those families that are bound to be affected, particularly the little children whose fate is to be decided by a civil action at some later date. I hope the government will even yet give some consideration to a more practical plan of dealing with the hundreds of divorce cases that come from our sister province of Quebec.

Mr. J. A. DION (Lake St. John-Roberval) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a few words only in support of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion). I do not always share his opinion, but tonight I am in complete agreement with his views and I have no hesitation in saying so.

I believe that the present procedure in divorce bills is highly unsatisfactory to the members of this house. As the hon. member said a moment ago, we are faced with a number of bills which we know nothing about and we are asked to vote on them although we are entirely unaware of their purport. The makers of our constitution vested in parliament the right to legislate on divorce cases arising in provinces where no divorce courts are established. Divorce cases in such provinces must come before parliament to be settled by a bill. This method was meant to render divorce less frequent and more difficult to secure. But with the present practice, parliament has become a divorce mill and, as a result, divorce is much easier to obtain. We are thus defeating the very ends which the authors of our constitution had hoped to attain.

It is our responsibility to devise a more efficient procedure as regards the consideration of such bills. We must know on what we are expected to vote before coming to a decision. May I suggest that a committee of this house be appointed to consider, amend and improve the present procedure in that respect.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I shall add only one word in support of the hon. member for Charlevoix-

Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) and the hon. member for Lake St. John-Roberval (Mr. Dion). I have already expressed my views on divorce during the last session. I believe that all hon. members in this house should leave no stone unturned to prevent this undesirable increase in the number of divorces in Canada.

Motion agreed to on division and bills read the second time.

BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 59 (Letter G of the senate) intituled: "An act respecting British Columbia Telephone Company."—Mr. Reid.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, would the sponsor of the bill this evening explain it to the house? This bill originated in the other place, and when it was read in this chamber for the first time there was, of course, no explanation. Unless the sponsor this evening is prepared to give an explanation of it, I think the bill had better be left over until the hon. member for New Westminster, whose name is on the bill, is present.

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): In view of the fact that the hon. member for New Westminster is absent at the present time, and I know that he is familiar with all the features of the bill, I would suggest that the bill stand.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Stands.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 73, respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Mr. Cleaver.

Bill No. 106, to incorporate Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway Company.—Mr. Rinfret.

PENITENTIARY ACT

INSPECTION OF PENAL INSTITUTIONS BY GRAND JURY, ETC.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of Bill No. 12, to amend the Penitentiary Act, 1939.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the object of this particular bill is to allow the grand jury in each of the provinces to visit these federal institutions twice a year and to make a presentment in the public interest. It is no way to be taken as a criticism of the existing system of official inspection. On the contrary, the object is to assist in the satisfactory administration of these institutions.

In the first clause of the bill there is provision that the grand jury may inspect penitentiaries and make presentment, without cost to the country. It is one of the cardinal principles of magna carta that the people should take a large share in the administration of criminal justice. These institutions, whether they are rightly or wrongly managed, are managed by crown officials; and to carry out the principles of magna carta it is available to have the grand jury go into these institutions. At the present time what is the inspection? There is no inspection at all except by crown officers, some of whom have had no training for the work. They learn only by experience.

In the next place, there are many complaints. We seem to have made no progress in this work over the last thirty or forty years. Men are shut up in small cells or in cages against all the known laws of public hygiene. Some of these provincial gaols and prisons in the cities and towns of Ontario and in other parts of the country were built before confederation against all the known laws of public or private hygiene and public health, and the result of that can be seen. In another case the jury visited an institution in one of the cities in Ontario and found some men who had been quite sane incarcerated in an asylum. How are the public to know? The cost of these institutions is going up by leaps and bounds. From the report here the number in these institutions is increasing, especially among those not of age, and it is a serious social and economic problem. I hope that the new minister will see to it that the first clause of this bill is adopted. I remember when the late Chief Justice of Ontario, R. M. Meredith, on circuit for forty years, and an able judge, was addressing the grand jury of the county of York, he suggested that it would be in the public interest that in each of the cities or towns of a province the jury should be allowed to go into these federal institutions twice a year, and he said he was anxious to remedy some of the crooked paths in the administration of justice.

The next clause of the bill relates to a matter which has been recommended, I think, to the Department of Justice, especially in important cases, namely, permitting the visiting, under escort, by prisoners to dying relatives.

The third clause relating to offenders under the age of nineteen is one of the matters which should be taken up immediately by the provinces and the Borstal system adopted at once.

There are one or two others who are to speak on this bill. I do not see the minister present at this time, but I do not like to move the adjournment of the debate. The habit has been, when the bill has been reached in other sessions, there is no minister present. I hope that the minister will be here. I should like to have the opinion of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) on it. He was here a minute ago. I do not wish to lose my priority because I believe this is a matter that should be looked into. It is really too bad that we have no time here to devote to a serious problem like this, when we can spend forty-four days on purely material things, and not have five minutes for human rights and remedies.

I should like to mention the board of visitors. How many members of the House of Commons have seen one of these institutions? I have not for years. Have you, Mr. Speaker? I am told that certain people are appointed to visit the institutions but never visit them. The official board might just as well be abolished. What I suggest is that after we reassemble, there should be a visit to two or three of those institutions near Ottawa by a committee of the House of Commons. It just illustrates the necessity of having a legal committee which would go into these matters. I venture to say that if the high court of parliament knew what was going on in some of these institutions, there would be a revolution. We are spending a lot of money on these institutions. There is one sign which should be put up over the door, while we do nothing about the matter, namely, "Abandon hope all ye who enter here."

We discuss the price of wheat and many other material things sometimes for days, and when I first came here such discussions went on for weeks, but we do not seem to have five minutes to devote to these questions of human rights. I am very sorry the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) is not here. He was in his seat a moment ago, and there is no reason why he should not have waited to hear the discussion.

If no other hon. members wish to speak I should like to move the adjournment of the debate, but I am afraid that under the rules I could not speak again when the minister is here, and I do not want to go to the foot of the list.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I understand that when the order is called the next time the hon. member will be permitted to continue his speech, but that the total time allotted to him will not exceed forty minutes.

On motion of Mr. Church the debate was adjourned.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The business under private and public bills having been disposed of the house will revert to the business under consideration at six o'clock.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Right Hon. Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited time during the national emergency arising out of the war.

Mr. MacINNIS: This afternoon, speaking in this debate, the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) stated that it was difficult if not impossible to find the principle in this bill. I do not think the principle is hard to find. That principle is to extend for a limited time certain controls now exercised under orders in council. As I said before the dinner recess, that is the principle now; but if the government continues to do away with existing controls, both the controls and the principle of the bill will have disappeared by the time it has reached third reading.

To my mind, however, there is another principle in this bill, that is, that we should try and deal as fairly with our people in time of peace as we did in time of war. There is not the slightest doubt that these controls, instituted in war time, in a time of emergency, were of tremendous advantage to the people of Canada. I do not think anyone in this chamber is anxious to maintain controls merely for the sake of control. We all object to interference with our freedom. I do; indeed, if there is anyone who likes to have his own way more than I do, I should like to meet him.

Mr. JACKMAN: Some people like to be controllers.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not so sure that is the case. In any event, speaking for myself, I have no desire to be either controlled or a controller. But order and regulation is the penalty we pay for community living; and the more complex our social order becomes, the more necessary order and regulation will become. As I said, the control orders attached to the measure before us were made necessary by the emergency of war, and they served a useful purpose. The question we have to decide today is: is the emergency over, and has the time arrived when we can throw all our controls into the limbo of dead and forgotten things? As was stated by the leader of this party when speaking on this measure during the resolution stage, though the fighting stage of the emergency is over, we do not believe that the disruption of the world economy caused by the war has been anything like overcome; and until that disruption is repaired and the economy is restored, we shall continue to be in a state of emergency. Therefore, regardless of what may be said to the contrary, and what sneers and slurs may be cast in the direction of this party, we do not hesitate to say, and indeed we proclaim, that if we were back—and it appears that this is where some people would want to bring us—to where we were in September, 1939, certain government controls and certain government planning would still be necessary, and I am satisfied that I can prove that point before I sit down.

In my opinion, those who claim that the need for controls has disappeared fail to take certain things into consideration. They fail to realize the extent of the disruption of the world economy during the war. They fail to realize the sick state of the world at the present time; and, most serious of all, they do not seem to realize how inadequately their so-called private enterprise functioned in the decade before world war II. I was in this house during that decade, the ten years between 1929 and 1939, and every hon. member who has any understanding of that period realizes that during those years we were exercising emergency controls. The Conservative government in office in 1931, brought in a measure known as the Unemployment and Farm Relief Act, which took amazingly wide control; and with very little change that act was enacted each year from 1931 to 1940, when the war rescued us from the mess into which private enterprise had gotten us.

I would suggest to hon. friends to my right, who are so much opposed to controls, that they should read an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of some few weeks back. That editorial was entitled "Storm Clouds Ahead", and dealt with the serious consequences to this country of economic collapse or a long drawn-out recovery in the United Kingdom. It said, in part:

> Britain in her economic illness cannot be quarantined.

And that is equally true of the other countries in Europe.

> If economic woe should befall her, or if recovery from her existing desperate straits should take years, then the repercussions for this country would be hard indeed. What is ahead of us in this. That unless by some miracle which we have no right to expect, unless by some tribute from fate which only fools should expect, Britain should recover quickly and Europe arise from chaos within the next few years, we are heading straight for grave trouble, with our only hope a greatly accelerated trade represented by Canadian exports to the United States.

I maintain that we must take into consideration not only conditions within this country, because conditions within this country alone are not sufficient for our prosperity and our safety as a nation—so I would say that, unless we can disprove the correctness of the diagnosis made by this editorial, then we should hesitate before we eliminate controls and a certain amount of planning from our economy.

Because of my experience during the last fifteen years, I was disturbed when I heard both the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) state, earlier in the debate on this measure, that the government's policy is to return as quickly as possible to a free economy. To talk about a free economy at the present time is, in my opinion nonsense. There is no such thing as a free economy today. In other words, what my hon. friends want to return to is the status quo before the war. A darky once was asked what the status quo was, and his reply was, "It is the same damned old mess." When my friends talk about a return to a free economy, that is what they want us to return to, the pre-war mess.

But let me say that that is not what those right hon. gentlemen and their party promised the people of this country during the election campaign of 1945. It was not what we were promised in the first speech from the throne following the return of the government at that election. In the speech from the throne at the first session of the twentieth parliament, I find these words:

> In the building of a new order—

A new order is not a return to a free economy, because that was the old order. And it was a pretty miserable one for a great many people.

> In the building of a new order my ministers are determined to seek above all else the promotion of peace, work and health in domestic and international relations. To further these great objectives the government has received a definite mandate from the people of Canada.

I suggest to the government that, while I do not say the controls we now have are sufficient to bring us into a new social order, I do say that, while the government is preparing its plans, these controls should be maintained; that is, those of them that are necessary.

As I have said, to go back to a free economy is not building a new social order. It is slipping back to the old order—the order of unemployment, the order of low prices, the order of insufficient food and the other evil things which were the lot of hundreds of thousands of men and women who suffered during the depression years, under the so-called achievements of a free economy.

I am going to remind the Minister of Justice of something. In 1935 he was a member of a royal commission which investigated conditions in Canada which had developed through the years, and manifested themselves during the depression. That commission on price spreads issued a report which was signed by W. W. Kennedy, Chairman, and by H. H. Stevens, J. L. Baribeau, Thomas Bell, O. L. Boulanger, A. M. Edwards, Samuel Factor, James L. Ilsley, D. M. Kennedy and Mark Senn.

There are only two of the signers of that report now in the house. Before the Minister of Justice rises to correct me, let me point out that he, along with three other Liberals, dissented from some of the findings. Nevertheless he put his name to the report. I shall read briefly from it to indicate the free economy to which the government is to bring us. At page 5 I find this:

The depression has furthermore demonstrated that the strong and the organized are attaining an ever-increasing position of dominance in our economic life, that economic power is becoming concentrated. With this concentration old theories of economic control are proving inadequate.

I will tell my hon. friends that the concentration they observed in 1935 has made considerable progress in the twelve years since then. And what was bad in 1935, what was oppressing the people then, is much worse in 1947.

Then, turning to page 6 I find this:

Fundamentally the problems which confronted the commission are those of a transitional economy in which simple competition still prevailed in some parts, monopoly had succeeded it in others, and monopolistic or imperfect competition characterized the rest.

There is not much of free economy there. Quoting again from page 9 of the main report:

It is, furthermore, a tragic delusion that the solution for these economic problems can be left to automatic forces—

Automatic forces are the regulators in a free economy; do not let us forget that.

It goes on:

—because the conditions which once permitted the easy and equitable operation of such forces have ceased to exist.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Then at the bottom of the page I find this:

From 1929 to 1933 farm prices fell 50 per cent but the production of farm crops actually increased 4 per cent. This is "simple competition"—

One would almost say, with simple people taking part in it.

—with flexible prices. On the other hand the prices of agricultural machinery and implements were allowed to fall less than 7 per cent, but their production in number of physical units decreased as much as 91 per cent.

That is the world in which we are living today; only it is much more so now than it was in 1935. What nonsense to talk about going back to a free economy, something that does not exist and has not existed for a good many years!

I have here some of the literature issued by the national Liberal federation during the election campaign of 1945. This particular leaflet was used in the election of the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton). It is not badly got up. The title on the front in large letters is, "Building a new social order in Canada". That was in 1945. Now in 1947 we are going back to a free economy. I find in this leaflet several quotations from the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Here is one:

. . . we intend to see that the new order expresses a new social concept altogether of industry as being in the nature of social service and the obligations and rewards that grow out of that conception.

Is there any suggestion by my hon. friends opposite that today we are planning to make industry a social service? No. Industry today is just as much a profit-making cut-throat system in so far as it is competitive, and an exploiting system as it ever was.

Here is another election leaflet which was used in the election of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). It has the same title; only in this case it is at the bottom of the page instead of at the top. Whether that signifies anything I do not know. The title again is, "Building a new social order in Canada". On the back page I find more quotations from the Prime Minister. Here is one:

Next to the fear of war the greatest fear today to most men is the fear of unemployment. It is one of the bitter ironies of our time that full employment has been achieved only as the result of war.

When I have mentioned that in this house I have heard groans. But the statement is correct. We have had two periods of full employment in this country in my time, and in both of those periods we were at war. The quotation continues:

Men everywhere are asking the question: Why, if there is no lack of work in war time, is work not to be had at a time when men, instead of devoting themselves to the work of destruction, might enjoy the fruits of their labour?

I believe the war is teaching us that the obstacles to full employment were not real obstacles; that a partnership of management, of workers and of the community can make useful work available in time of peace no less than in time of war for all who need or want to work.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is that all the one quotation?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, it is a complete excerpt. I, too, at one time thought the war would teach us something, but looking at what is happening in this house today I fear that the war has not taught us anything. I fear that we are intent on going back to those conditions which left such tragic results in their wake in the ten years before the war.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley), in replying to criticism of this bill, did not take much time with the point of view of this party. As a matter of fact I think he put it all in one short sentence, when he said, I think on Thursday last:

The trouble with the C.C.F.'s position is that it seems to assume that controls will be possible indefinitely under our constitution.

The C.C.F. does not assume anything of the kind. The C.C.F. realizes that controls are not made just for the Dominion of Canada but that the controls have benefited the provinces as well as the people of the dominion, for, of course, they are the same people. There may have been cases, but I have not heard of any province asking this government to relinquish its price control policy. There may have been such requests from the provinces, and if there have been they have not come to my attention. We believe that, with proper cooperation between the dominion and the provinces, a policy will have to be worked out so that the people can in peace as well as in war, provide themselves with the good things of life. But there is no hope at all that that can be done under a free economy.

I should like to quote a news item that appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of March 18, 1947:

Edwin G. Nourse, chairman of the federal economic council, said yesterday the removal of wartime controls alone cannot restore sound relationship of wages, prices and profits in this day of big corporations, banks and labour unions.

I think that is quite true. Today we have not small economic units competing with each other in the economic field and having approximately equal strength. Instead, we have large aggregations of economic power, economic power both in industry itself and in labour unions. I continue the quotation:

"Under these conditions of business organization, the process is not one of impersonal competitive market or system of markets," he said in an address for the controllers institute of America.

"Over large areas of the economy, prices and the course of business are determined by highly personalized administrative decisions made by officials of business organizations and affecting large blocks of capital resources or labour resources. I think it is quite clear to everyone that the decisons of these responsible executives have not, since V-J day, mutually added up to anything like a workable solution of the nation's business problems in terms of well sustained production and the prosperity that goes with it."

I think that is the experience in Canada. I do not think anyone can say that business organizations in Canada are working up to anything that will add up to a long continued period of steady employment and full production. Indeed, everyone you talk to is expecting a depression, some within six months, some within a year, some within two years. All are expecting a depression under our present system.

I am now going to show what happens when controls are removed. On May 1, 1946, the wartime prices and trade board suspended its allocation and price control on newsprint in the Canadian market. I am told that the decontrol took place after discussion with the newsprint manufacturers and publishers. Under the agreement or understanding arrived at existing Canadian customers were to receive not less than the individual quotas established on January 1, 1946, which was about seven per cent of the total Canadian production, or approximately 17,500 tons out of 247,500 tons. No provisions were made to supply new customers. I am told that a cooperative publishing company in a Canadian city, which has upwards of ten thousand members and wants to get newsprint to start publishing a paper, cannot get it, although Canada is exporting a great deal, as a matter of fact, exporting all we produce except about seven per cent.

In my own city of Vancouver there are an estimated ten thousand citizens who cannot buy the paper of their choice because the publishers of that paper cannot buy the newsprint to supply their demand, and yet there is plenty of newsprint even in Vancouver. The president of the Sun Publishing Company Limited, Vancouver, British Columbia, in the annual report of his company had the following to say in regard to newsprint:

The newsprint shortage is our greatest problem. The present concrete demand for unsolicited Sun subscriptions is estimated at 10,000.

We increased the daily press run by degrees until the end of August when it was frozen at an average net sale of 125,000.

Seeking information on this subject, I put four questions re newsprint on the order paper. I shall read the last two. They are as follows:

Has a request been received from the Vancouver Sun at Vancouver, British Columbia, for an increase in its quota because of increased circulation? If so, what action has been taken?

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance answered them as follows:

Requests have been received from the Vancouver Sun for an increase in supply but since newsprint is no longer allocated, no action has been taken. The Vancouver Sun has been told that the matter is entirely between themselves and the newsprint manufacturers.

As far as newsprint is concerned, we eliminated the bureaucrats at the wartime prices and trade board, but that did not eliminate the bureaucrats. I am told now that those who want more newsprint do not approach the government or a member of parliament; they go to Chicago and there they talk to people who are not even Canadian citizens.

Let us see what happened to the price. In 1938 the price of newsprint in Canada was $44 a ton. The current price in Montreal and Toronto—at least a few days ago; it may have gone up since—is $80 a ton. I hold in my hand a news item from the Toronto Star which says:

Newsprint companies operating in Canada have reported startling increases in the net profits for 1946. Of twenty-one companies listed eleven increased their net profits from 100 to 265 per cent over 1945.

The article went on to say that the outlook for 1947 is substantially better than it was for 1946. That is going back to free enterprise with a vengeance!

Here is another article from the Ottawa Journal of March 26, dated Washington. It is a report by Senator Lister Hill of a statement made to him by the assistant attorney-general of the United States, and reading as follows:

"For the past several months we have been investigating complaints of a conspiracy among newsprint manufacturers operating in Canada to restrain trade into the United States. These manufacturers, including subsidiaries of American firms, supply approximately eighty per cent of the United States newsprint demand.

"The complaints have alleged that this conspiracy restricts production, fixes prices on exports to the United States and allocates the available supplies to favoured newspaper publishers. The federal bureau of investigation has been conducting the investigation to date, but we expect in the near future to proceed further by means of grand jury subpoenas."

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Hill said that "monopolistic practices of the newsprint industry are forcing small publishers to the wall," and that he was pressing for thorough and vigorous investigation by the anti-trust division. "If there are violations of the anti-trust laws," he continued, "there should be immediate prosecutions."

This is the general picture of our so-called free economy. All that this adds up to is that in removing newsprint from the control of the so-called bureaucrats of the wartime prices and trade board, who at least exercised control in the interests of the Canadian people, we have handed over controls to other bureaucrats who are controlling newsprint, not for the benefit of the Canadian people, but for the benefit of a few people most of whom do not live in Canada and are not even Canadian citizens.

My hon. friends to the right and to the left asked for the removal of controls, and in asking for that the wildest statements have been made. For instance, on March 21, as reported at page 1606 of Hansard, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) said:

Surely every straight-thinking Canadian can see that it is the high taxation, the centralized state controls . . . the regimentations introduced under war conditions that have landed Great Britain, the United States and Canada into the mess in which we are floundering today. I do not think there can be any question about that at all. If we continue to adopt that policy, surely it can lead only to disaster and dictatorship.

The conditions may not be just what we would like them to be in Canada, and they are certainly not what the people would like them to be in Great Britain and perhaps not in the United States; but as a matter of fact, compared with the time when we had no controls at all, conditions in this country are prosperous. And even in the British isles, their living conditions, taking the population as a whole, are better than they were prior to the war. The proof of that is the fact that their infant mortality for 1946 is the lowest it has ever been in the history of that country.

An hon. MEMBER: So is the birthrate.

Mr. MacINNIS: As a matter of fact, that is just where the hon. member is wrong. The birthrate is the highest since 1922.

An hon. MEMBER: Give us the figures.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe the figure for infant mortality was 43 per 1,000 live births and the birthrate, about 19·1 per 1,000 of population.

Mr. MARTIN: For 1946.

Mr. MacINNIS: And it is so because, through controls, it is the business of the government, the business of the country, to see that food goes where it is needed and not where there is the largest purse. It is quite true that the large purse can still even today get a larger share, but with the controls that are provided there is a better and more equitable distribution of the national income in Great Britain today than ever before, with the possible exception of the war period.

I would suggest to the house, to the opposition as well as to the government, that if we are to avoid what this country went through between 1930 and 1939 we shall not avoid it by a return to a free economy. We can avoid it only by learning the lessons of those terrible years and applying them in an orderly and democratic fashion.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): During the resolution stage of this measure I listened to a number of members rivalling each other in an attempt to attach this or that name to this bill. I was reminded of the fact that a rose by any other name would smell just as sweet, and therefore I think that in dealing with this measure one must deal with it entirely on its merits. So far as I am concerned, I am not interested in what names certain people may attach to it.

Some hon. members have blamed the government for conditions being such that it is necessary to continue certain measures of control today. The important point to keep in mind is that we have to face the facts as they are. We have to face conditions as they are today. It is not a question that conditions should be better or that certain action should have been taken to make conditions different. The point is that certain conditions exist today requiring the continuation of certain measures.

I would agree with some of the criticism made by some hon. members, that these conditions should have been different by now. Some of that criticism was justified. Nevertheless we have to face the conditions as they are and not as they should or might have been. Therefore, if the minister can prove to our satisfaction in the committee stage that all these measures are necessary I shall have no hesitation in supporting the bill.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) suggested that we in this group are opposed to all controls. At no time has this group taken the stand that we are opposed to all controls; but we are not in favour of controls for the sake of controls, and the speech delivered by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), and quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver East, certainly did not indicate opposition to all controls. The hon. member for Peace River was criticizing certain controls that were being maintained.

We realize that unless you curb the abuse of capitalism you will have jungle law, the survival of the fittest, the dog-eat-dog system, and we are not for one minute advocating that we go back to that type of system in this country. The alternatives that face us today are capitalism controlled in the interests of the people—and we in this group believe that the social credit system is the way in which capitalism may be controlled—and communism on the other hand. In the final analysis, we do not believe that there is any alternative to these two things because the people will never again agree to return to the laissez-faire form of capitalism. That might have been regarded as the alternative years ago, but that day has gone by.

When the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) spoke on the resolution stage he chided the farmers of western Canada for directing their wrath against the former Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) rather than against certain corporations. Speaking as a farmer, I think the hon. member for Cariboo entirely missed the grounds upon which the farmers are complaining. It is the result of the culmination of a number of things that have happened of recent years, and it is necessary to go back to the thirties to see why the farmers are feeling so critical of the government's policy today.

In the thirties agricultural prices fell to a very low level. At that time we did not hear any propaganda by consumers that prices of products should be increased so as to give the farmers a fair return. The consumers were apparently quite glad to be able to buy goods at very low prices, even though it might mean the bankruptcy of agriculture, and whenever agriculture demanded higher prices they were told that the government could do nothing about the matter because this was an international situation. They were told that they would have to be willing to accept world market prices, and while it is true that from 1935 to 1939 certain modified controls were put into force, they were not effective in dealing with that situation.

After a few years of war, prices rose and then ceilings were placed upon prices to prevent the farmer from getting the full benefit of world market prices. Unfortunately, during the time that farmers had been obliged to produce at low prices, they had been forced heavily into debt, and the only way they could possibly pay their debts was by receiving for their products prices that would return them, not merely cost of production and a fair remuneration, but a fairly high profit. That is the only way that debts can be paid, debts of the size of those accumulated during the years of depression. Unfortunately, just about the time the government allowed prices to rise on agricultural products they also imposed very heavy taxation, with the result that when the farmers started to pay off or to try to pay off those debts, they found that the debts had increased by reason of the fact that they were called upon to pay income tax around thirty or forty per cent, and that made it that much more difficult for them to pay off the debts they had incurred. To a large extent those debts represented unpaid expenditures and therefore I thing the government would have been justified in eliminating all taxation on the repayment of those debts which had been incurred prior to 1942 because, as I say, they to a large extent represented unpaid expenditures and we do not tax expenditures.

Then today, of course, farmers are having difficulty in meeting their taxes and are being handled in quite a rough manner by some of the income tax inspectors. It is only natural that they should be feeling critical of the government. That is why today you hear the common expression, "I am not going to milk cows for Ilsley", or "I am not going to slop pigs for Mr. Ilsley". As I say, that is the result of the culmination of a number of things. It is not just because the farmers are required to pay high taxes today. I think they are fully justified in that attitude. I am not saying they are justified in attacking the former Minister of Finance, but I say they are justified in criticizing the past policies of the government in regard to agriculture.

Our main opposition to many of the present controls is that, by their very nature, they become self-perpetuating. We are told that they are required in order to deal with conditions resulting out of the war; that is, to a large extent to deal with shortages of consumer goods. But, unfortunately, many of these controls help to restrict production and thereby delay the day when they will no longer be needed. We believe that it would be advisable to remove all controls which have any tendency whatsoever to restrict production and which result in a reduction of goods for distribution in Canada because of higher prices in the export market.

We hear a great deal today about the need for keeping prices of goods down. I would say to the minister that it is of very little help to an individual to keep the price of an article down if, as a result of that action, you make it impossible for the individual to buy the article. So I would say that there can be no compensation for a loss in production. A loss in current production is a total loss; and, no matter how much you may increase your production in the future, you can never make up for a loss of production today. If prices are being held down at the cost of production, then I would say that the cost is too great. I think you need only go to an auction sale today to see the truth of that statement. What do you find when you go to an auction sale? Are people refusing to buy goods at the sale because the price is too high? No. They will bid against each other, and they will buy at a higher price than that paid for the article when it was new. That is the condition to be found at farm sales. You will find that a farmer will pay more for a second-hand piece of machinery than that piece of machinery will cost on the market new, for the simple reason that he is so greatly in need of that machine that he is willing to pay whatever price is necessary in order to get it. That is why I say that the government is not justified in keeping prices down on any article if, as a result of that action, it curtails the production of it.

During the war, emergency powers were necessary; and I think the government will agree that the people of this country conscientiously supported the controls passed under those powers. They did so because they recognized that those controls were essential for a maximum war effort. But when hon. members go on to say that, just because we had controls in war, we should have similar controls in peace, then I disagree; because the situation is entirely different in peace time. In war time, somewhere in the neighbourhood of fifty per cent of the production had to be drained away from the channels of consumption and used for war purposes, with the result that there was tremendous pressure on prices. Today the situation is entirely different. Today we should be encouraging maximum production in order to give the Canadian people the highest standard of living that the country can supply, not for the purpose of maintaining a maximum war effort. To my mind, the people of this country are not willing to barter their freedom for a mess of pottage, or for so-called security.

In the past the people have always been willing to defend their freedom, no matter what the cost might be. I recall that Hitler promised the world one thousand years of peace, but we preferred to go to war rather than be made the slaves of nazism. The people of this country have no love for regimentation.

During the war it was necessary to safeguard a fair distribution of a limited amount of production. In the future the total production of the country will be available to satisfy the needs of the people, less whatever contribution we decide to make to the war-stricken areas of Europe. However I think we must be on the watch to see that those contributions do not endanger the efficiency of our productive plant; that is to say, we want to be careful that we do not ship so many goods abroad that we reduce the standard of living in this country and cause discontent which, in turn, could very well reduce our productive efficiency. If the workers become discontented, production is bound to fall; and if your production falls, you will not be able to make as great a contribution to the war-stricken areas as you would if you maintained your production at a high level.

The government's policy of price and wage control is undermined by the fact that the people resent these controls in peace time, and the government should lose no time in removing them as soon as possible. I believe that, generally speaking, the government is removing them as fast as it considers they can be removed. I am not criticizing the government on the ground that it is not removing controls fast enough. There are some controls which it will be necessary to keep in operation and which, in my opinion, should be kept in operation permanently. In that category I place the foreign exchange control board. But there are other controls which unnecessarily interfere with the freedom of the people and which should be removed.

The government emphasized that, in order to prevent inflation, it is necessary to maintain a certain degree of price control; but it seems to me that the policies of the government are to a certain extent creating inflation in this country today and will likely lead to a depression in the near future if that policy is not changed quickly; that is, by discouraging production through price control and by confiscatory taxation discontent is being caused amongst the workers—the farmers and labour—causing a slow-down in production and causing strikes; and then again it is further discouraging production by the over-export of consumer goods abroad. I think our peacetime policy must aim at giving the people the highest standard of living that the country is capable of producing. In order to assure high production, we must assure a steady demand for it by the people; and in order to assure this, we must take steps to maintain the purchasing power of the people at a level sufficiently high to buy the total production of the country and the imports brought into the country in return for our exports.

I think the various control measures proposed must be viewed in the light of that situation. Our policy must be such as to encourage the full development of the resources of the country and to maintain effective demand against them by the people. One may well ask: Does the government policy of price control tend toward the full development of the resources of the country? I think in many ways it has had the opposite effect. Labour has demanded higher wages. Industry has insisted that if higher wages are paid, higher prices must be paid. Then, when higher prices are charged, the purchasing power of the consumer has been reduced, and you go round and round in that vicious cycle. However we believe that is a solution to that difficulty. In order to expand our production, we believe that it will be necessary to remove price ceilings so that the full cost of production may be recovered out of prices. Then, in order to assure that the people's purchasing power will not be reduced by an increase in prices, the price to the consumer should be adjusted so that the price of goods to the consumer will bear the same relationship to their financial cost as the total national consumption bears to the total national production. In this way prices would be regulated by the actions of the people themselves, instead of in an arbitrary fashion by some board of directors.

I referred to this matter during the debate on the speech from the throne. If, for example, demand was only eighty per cent of supply, then a discount of twenty per cent could be allowed. The retailer would discount the prices of his goods by twenty per cent and would be reimbursed by the state, so that he would not suffer any loss. The question is often asked, what is there to prevent a producer from raising prices sky-high before the discount is applied? I would agree that competition alone is not sufficient to maintain prices at a fair level. Therefore there would be a danger that producers might raise their prices too high. But under our proposals, to obtain the discount business concerns would have to register with the government and agree to maintain their profits at a fair level based upon their turnover. If any industry refused to work on that basis or refused to maintain profits at a fair level, they would not get their discount, and as a result those firms which did cooperate with the government by maintaining profits at a fair level would be able to undersell those who did not, by the amount of the discount, so that in that way industries would be forced to maintain their profits at a fair level or be undercut by those who did so.

That type of control would not be subject to the whim of a bureaucrat, but would be the result of a scientific formula; and with such a policy, since industry recovers cost out of prices, adjustments could be made in wages when they were out of line. If an increase in price occurred and this reduced effective demand, an increase in the price discount would restore the balance between demand and supply. The result would be a steady expansion in production with prices actually reduced to the consumer, and in a short time prices of most products of secondary industry would find their own level.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) stated that during the war subsidies were maintained because it was considered that the saving to the consumer would be greater than the cost in taxation, in view of the fact that they prevented a spiral of inflation. The minister has stated also that in peace time, if the cost in taxation was as great as the saving to the consumer, then the payment of a subsidy might no longer be justified except in so far as it would help bring about a fairer distribution of the income. It seems to me that the important point to keep in mind in future, then, is this. If in peace time the saving to the consumer through the payment of a subsidy would not be any greater than the cost in taxation, you would not be able to finance your subsidy by taxation if you were trying to increase the purchasing power of the consumer. For example, if the situation develops in a short time that we are warned by Mr. Graham Towers, in his 1946 report, may very well develop, that is a lack of effective demand, and if we considered that in order to increase the purchasing power of the people so that we might maintain an effective demand against the production of the country we should pay the consumer a subsidy, then obviously that subsidy would have to be financed by other means than taxation because, as the minister has pointed out, the cost in taxation might very well be as great as the saving made by the subsidy. Therefore we suggest that if subsidies are paid in future they will have to be financed by debt-free money issued by the state. In order to do that, of course, first you would have to establish effective control over the issue of currency and credit in order to prevent such an issue of money from creating inflation because, as the Minister of Finance has suggested on several occasions in this house, if we issue debt-free money there is the danger of inflationary action on the part of the chartered banks. Therefore I suggest that that is another control measure we shall have to maintain in peace time; that is, effective control of the issue of currency and credit so that the government could issue national money without any danger of the chartered banks expanding loans at the rate of ten to one on the money so issued.

While it is true that secondary industries set their prices at a level at which they will recover their costs of production, that is not true of the primary industries, which have never been in the position where they were able to set their own prices in order to recover the cost of production. That is why today the primary industries are advocating marketing legislation which will make it possible for them to control their own prices. However, that goal has not been reached, and at the present time they are still at the mercy of whatever prices may be established by world markets or by the government on behalf of the producers. Therefore, in the future, certain controls will have to be maintained which will make it possible for farmers to obtain prices which will enable them to meet their costs of production and obtain a fair profit for the work they have done. I mention that fact because I have heard hon. members to our right say, "If you are against controls in regard to secondary industries, then you must also be opposed to controls in regard to primary industries." I would point out that primary and secondary industries are on entirely different bases. Secondary industries have control of their prices, but primary industries have not.

The Minister of Justice warns of the danger of inflation if price control is lifted. I would point out that we already have a degree of inflation, and I think the minister admits that in all probability prices in this country will have to rise in future because, generally speaking, prices throughout the world are higher than in Canada. If we try to maintain prices in Canada at a lower level than in the rest of the world, what we are actually doing is subsidizing the other nations of the world, and I cannot see any justification for the people of Canada having to subsidize the rest of the world. The minister keeps referring to the price level in the United States. I am glad he clarified that point today. I have always understood him to say that the price level in the United States was so much higher than the price level in Canada, but apparently what he really meant to say was that the increase in the price level in the United States during the war was much greater than the increase in Canada. I think he will admit that in many lines the price level in the United States is actually lower than in Canada. I was in that country during December and January, just before coming here for this session; and while we found that prices of most agricultural products and many foods were quite a bit higher than prices in Canada, on the other hand we found that prices in many lines were considerably lower than in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was more so before the war, was it not?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes; unquestionably it was more so before the war. Their prices have risen, but, even so, prices in many lines in the United States are still considerably less than in Canada. Take tires, radios, electrical supplies, cigarettes, gasoline, cottons, shoes and many other commodities, we found we could get them far cheaper there than here. The net result is that, as far as agriculture is concerned, in the United States the farmer is considerably better off than the farmer in Canada, because he is getting prices for his products considerably greater than prices the farmer in this country is receiving, and he is able to buy the things he wants at considerably less than the prices in Canada. So that the farmer in the United States is twice better off than the farmer in this country; he gets higher prices for his products and buys his goods at lower prices. Therefore I doubt very much if there is as big a danger of prices rising as some people seem to think, if price controls are lifted. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) apparently thinks that himself, because price controls are gradually being taken off. It is true there may be an immediate rise, but just as quickly as production can expand to its full level, those prices, generally speaking, will fall.

As I said before, curtailed production cannot be justified on the ground that prices are being kept down, because then the cost is too great. It would be far better to have a slightly increased price, if in so doing we can have greater production; because with the production increased, the pressure on the price levels will decrease, and the price will fall.

Of course I agree there are certain concerns which will not reduce their prices. I pointed out that under social credit we would take action against them, by paying the discount only to those which did reduce prices. Those concerns which cooperated would get the subsidy and therefore be able to undersell those that refused to.

If we want private enterprise and initiative to succeed and to expand, we have to do everything in our power to encourage it, rather than to strangle it. The minister has said in the past that in Canada we lack venture capital. I would say that one of the reasons we lack venture capital is that we are continually urging people to invest their money in bonds. If it were not so easy for them to invest in bonds, that is gilt-edged securities, they would be a little more venturesome in investing their money in industry, where it should be invested. And if they were to invest their money in industry it would not be necessary for us to get capital from the United States, thereby placing the country further in debt.

In closing, may I say that we will support any controls the minister can prove to our satisfaction are necessary for the well-being of the people of Canada. But we definitely refuse to support any controls which we consider restrict production, or which may reduce the consumption of goods in Canada which may be made available in abundance.

Right Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say in speaking on the motion for second reading of the bill, the purpose of which is to extend the period during which a return to a normal economy can be accomplished.

I shall speak with particular reference to the list of commodities the decontrol of which was announced this afternoon. It was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) that the list was confined to consumer products—which is largely true. But he also suggested that its effect would be to remove protection from the buyer, but to continue protection for the manufacturer. That, I suggest, is an entire misconception of the pattern of decontrol. The reason the articles named were included in the list announced today was that it is the belief of those responsible for price control in this country that the removal of those articles from control would not materially increase the price of the articles—with one proviso, and that is that prices of the raw materials entering into those products will remain reasonably stable.

As I remember it, the list decontrolled boots and shoes, but continued the control on hides and leather. The production of boots and shoes has reached a point where those commodities are no longer in short supply. There is no reason visible to those responsible for price control as to why, assuming a stable value for the hides and leather entering into their production, there should be an increase in price in the finished product.

In respect of automobiles, efficiency of production has reached a point where one manufacturer has reduced the price of the finished article below the ceiling. It is expected that other manufacturers will be in a similar position. That being so, there seems to be no purpose in continuing the ceiling on automobiles.

Then, we had to recognize the situation in respect of used automobiles. The fact of the matter is that the black market in used automobiles has grown to an extent where it is probable that more second-hand automobiles are reaching the public through the black market than through legitimate channels. Therefore we believe that the effect, on the public, of removing the ceiling on used automobiles, will not in general require the public to pay a higher price.

Wool and wool products were mentioned. The world price of wool is stable today, and has been for some months. Wool supplies are adequate for all requirements. Pressure for woollen goods is not such as should lead to any material price increase in that commodity.

Following this general pattern, the wartime prices and trade board have from time to time removed a considerable number of articles from the list of controlled items, with every expectation that their removal will not affect the price level in this country. It should be remembered that, assuming that this bill passes, the power of control has not been lost. If for any reason prices are forced up to a level which cannot be justified, then price control can be reestablished. But it is also notable that of all the considerable number of articles subjected to decontrol since the process of decontrol was undertaken, to date it has not been found necessary to reimpose controls on any of those articles.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is one exception.

Mr. ABBOTT: Jute bags.

Mr. HOWE: I am told that jute bags is one exception. They were decontrolled; but later the price advanced to a point where control had to be reimposed.

One of the commodities decontrolled by today's list was coal. Coal is in a special category. During the period of the war the government controlled the price of coal; in fact, the coal control was the first control to be imposed shortly after the outbreak of war. Coal prices have been controlled, while production has been stimulated by subsidies. It was felt that during the period of the war the need for coal in Canada was such that the country could not afford to permit any source of coal to go out of production. The result was that higher cost mines, or less efficient mines, were subsidized so that they could produce at a price that could properly be allowed to the high-grade low-cost mines.

Over the years a system of subsidies in the coal industry has been built up, which has more or less levelled out the value of good mines as against poor mines, and of efficient operation as against inefficient operation.

About two years ago parliament appointed a coal commission, consisting of a member nominated by the operators, a second member nominated by labour and a chairman chosen from the judiciary of this country. That commission spent nearly two years in investigating the coal situation and presented a voluminous report recommending ways and means of handling the industry in post-war years. The commissioners were unanimous that production subsidies should be suspended without delay, and the action taken today implements that recommendation of the commission. The Cape Breton situation was recognized by the commissioners as a special problem. Two of the commissioners recommended that, instead of an abrupt cessation of production subsidies in the Cape Breton field, there be a tapering off of production subsidies to give time for readjustments in the industry. The announcement today ended production subsidies in the Cape Breton area as well as in all other parts of Canada. But I should like it understood that the government is willing to reexamine the needs of the production of coal in the Cape Breton area and to reintroduce subsidies in that area, provided that there can be a settlement of the present labour dispute on a basis that promises that the industry will ultimately be restored to a healthy condition.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has objected to the present form of subsidy in that area, which is based on a guarantee against loss to the producing company. That, of course, is wholly inappropriate at the present moment when no production is being obtained in that area, and therefore it is appropriate at this time to suspend the present production subsidies in Cape Breton, as well as in other parts of Canada. But I do want to say that the government is ready at any time to sit down with the union and with the operators and work out a form of subsidy which will permit that section of the country to resume the production of coal on a healthy basis.

The price of coal in western Canada has dropped below the ceiling price in some instances. There have been sales of coal recently at below ceiling prices, and it is believed that the removal of the subsidy will not have the effect of increasing prices in western Canada.

The eastern situation is too obscure at the moment to be capable of assessment, since the industry is not operating.

So far as coal imported into Canada is concerned, domestic coal has been subsidized for a considerable time, and the removal of the subsidies will cause an increase in the price of imported domestic coal. There again we are facing realities by recognizing the fact that those who are not users of coal should not be called upon to subsidize those who are users of coal.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may ask a question at that point with regard to the payment of subsidies in Cape Breton, from what date was the subsidy which the company receives as a protection against loss discontinued?

Mr. HOWE: It was discontinued as of March 31.

Mr. COLDWELL: So that for the past two months the company have been getting that subsidy while the strike was on?

Mr. HOWE: That is right, under an agreement which the government undertook to continue until the end of the last fiscal year.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is virtually a payment of its strike losses, is it not?

Mr. HOWE: The result has been that for the last two months. The government, in making the agreement, did not anticipate the strike.

The hon. member for Vancouver East suggested that in its plan to return to a free economy the government has abandoned all its plans for a new social order. That, of course, is wholly untrue. The government has laid the foundations for a new social order and will continue to develop its further plans in that direction as conditions may require from time to time. However, I will not pursue that subject further tonight.

The government has by no means abandoned its stabilization policy. To indicate that its policy has been effective, I would point to the last annual report of the Steel Company of Canada. A diagram in that report shows what has been accomplished in the control of the one raw product that is more basic than any other to production in this country. In December, 1939, the cost of steel can be considered as 100; the cost of labour, 100, and the price level, 100, for purposes of comparison. At the end of December, 1945, the price of the product had risen two per cent; the cost of living in Canada had risen seventeen per cent, and wages in steel had risen thirty-one per cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the report show the increased productivity per man-hour?

Mr. HOWE: No; but that, of course, is the answer. At the end of December, 1946, the price of the product had risen fifteen per cent; the cost of living in Canada had risen twenty-three per cent, and wages in steel had risen fifty-four per cent. Price stabilization has been made effective in that particular unit of the steel industry without resort to subsidy. The result has been achieved by increased efficiency of operation and increased productivity of labour. Price control in steel has contributed a sample that explains why Canada today has a sounder economy than any other country in the world, and why we are better able to compete abroad than is any other country in the world. The basic industries in this country have recognized the necessity of keeping prices in line with value. That, I think, is fundamental to any continuing prosperity. The countries that have lost sight of that relationship, and have let prices get out of line with value, will be the first to suffer when competition becomes the determining factor in prices. I believe that the Canadian economy is founded on a sound level, and that Canada in its decontrol programme is not changing that basic situation.

I should like to remind hon. members that the one and only purpose of this bill is to give the government a reasonable time to accomplish decontrol. I will also remind hon. members that this bill is the only order of government business that has been discussed since this parliament assembled. I would remind hon. members that the businessmen and the taxpayers of this country are anxious to know the kind of tax structure they are working under and the tariff proposals of the government for the current fiscal year. Obviously it will be quite impossible to bring down the budget until this bill has been disposed of.

I would also remind hon. members that the legislation programme of the government is being postponed until this measure is disposed of. Hon. gentlemen seem to think that, after some six years of controls administered by the government it is now necessary for various members of the opposition groups to examine each item of control and give their opinion on whether the government is doing the right thing or not. It seems to me that the government which has had experience over six years in the administration of controls should be capable of deciding the appropriate time to abandon them. Therefore I would urge that this session be not prolonged by debate that can have no real effect on the situation. In the end, I presume that the extension desired by the government will be granted. I notice that whenever the matter comes to a vote, the men who oppose it most vigorously in debate are glad to vote in support of the measure which is before the house. I have also noted that hon. members of the official opposition who a year ago were demanding the immediate abandonment of all controls have modified their position and are now ready to say that all controls should not be abandoned; nevertheless they are sure that, given unlimited time and unlimited discussion, they can find one or two controls that should be abandoned now instead of a few months hence.

I would earnestly ask a return of sanity in the discussion of this problem, and a shortening of the debate which has contributed and is contributing nothing of value to the economic life of this country.

Mr. HACKETT: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: It was stated that the government had laid the foundation of a new social order. Following that statement, the minister told of the achievement of the Steel Company of Canada. I want to know if there is any association between the foundation of a new social order and the practices which brought about the desired results in the Steel Company of Canada, as the minister mentioned.

Mr. HOWE: No, Mr. Speaker. The fact is I started to develop a subject and decided it was not worth developing at this time, and then I dropped it; but at some time I should like to talk about the progress that has been made on laying the foundation for a new social order. I decided that tonight was not the appropriate time. Perhaps it is something similar to the vote which my hon. friend cast this afternoon.

Mr. HACKETT: It was wholly unintentional and without malice.

Mr. EUGENE MARQUIS (Kamouraska): At the beginning of my remarks I wish to say that actual controls are extraordinary remedies for extraordinary conditions. They cannot be accepted as such in normal peace time. Such legislation may be implemented as a result of the scarcity of commodities caused by an emergency situation. In normal times, controls cannot be maintained by this government on matters pertaining to the jurisdiction of the provinces. Constitutionally the federal government must avoid legislating on subjects under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments unless "the safety of the dominion as a whole" is really concerned, and in such a case there is no infringement on provincial rights, because it is the duty of the dominion government to secure order, peace and good government for the whole country and for each of the provinces as well when there is an emergency arising out of the war. Such is the gist of the judgments of the privy council which may apply to the present bill. The Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Company and the Manitoba Free Press case decided in 1923, after world war I, and the Japanese reference, in 1947 after world war II, dealt with questions "which arose by reason of the special circumstances of national emergency, which concerns nothing short of the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole" as stated by Lord Haldane when rendering judgment in the Fort Frances case. When there is such an emergency the dominion government is in duty bound to legislate so as to ensure the security of the provinces and of the people of the whole country as well. I venture to say that the extraordinary powers given to our government under such circumstances need not be prolonged any longer than is necessary for the stabilization of the economy disrupted by war.

On the other hand, since the provincial governments have no right to legislate for the whole Canadian economy, it seems imperative that some powers should be exercised by the only government which has jurisdiction over these matters of general interest. Consequently, on the constitutional point of view this government has not only the right but the duty to make such laws as will secure economic stability and a normal way of living in the provinces and in the country when there is an emergency arising out of the war.

This bill proposes, for the period of one year only, the continuation of certain controls which were introduced during the war and which seem necessary for the stabilization of our national economy. Its purpose is to fill the gap between war time and peace time. We cannot deal with this legislation as if it were a permanent measure. It is required for urgent and temporary matters only. I am of the opinion that such legislation would be unconstitutional if it were of a permanent nature.

Is it not apparent that we are now struggling with serious post-war difficulties and that a great number of commodities will not be available for some people unless there were some appropriate way of distributing them? These commodities would be hoarded by the wealthiest people to the prejudice of farmers and working men. It is only by an appropriate legal mechanism that the distribution can be made equitable. Are hon. members of the opposition really anxious to get rid of all the legal provisions adopted in order to take care of the national emergency arising out of the war? We have seen hon. members of the opposition speaking against the resolution but voting to bring it before the committee of the whole. If they were against it, it seems to me that that was the proper time to vote against it. Is it not indubitably clear that the Progressive Conservative party has a twofold view on this problem. Probably the Progressive group favours some controls, while the old Conservative group prefers the controls already exercised by finance and would rather have legislation of that kind defeated. We have only to refer to the Ottawa Morning Journal, edition of March 28, 1947:

The resolutions committee of the Progressive Conservative Association of Canada last night gave the final touches to resolutions which will be presented at the annual meeting opening today, and it was learned that a great deal of argument developed among members during a two-day sitting. A resolution on government controls, for instance, is said to have engendered a wide difference of opinion. The old-line Conservatives wanted a resolution which would put the party on record as demanding that all controls be dropped forthwith. The Progressive element favoured a resolution supporting controls on rent, foreign exchange and essential goods. It was also learned that the question of housing caused a temporary split, with some desiring houses for medium income people and others wanting the government to keep out of housing altogether.

Mr. FLEMING: That is just newspaper conjecture.

Mr. MARQUIS: It is a good Conservative newspaper. It is obvious that the party has no control over the newspaper, and it is also obvious that the division of opinion among hon. members brought to an end the three-day filibuster against the government's present legislation. But before closing the debate on the resolution, the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett), in an atomic outburst of eloquence, challenged the rural representatives of the province of Quebec to stand up and declare that their people favour controls.

Conscious that this electoral appeal could not improve the conditions of the farmers and labourers of Canada, I did not hesitate to answer that the farmers and workingmen of my constituency were ready to accept those controls which are necessary to protect them against the abuses of capitalists.

Mr. Speaker, I was born and brought up and I worked on a farm. I remember too well those years when the farmers were obliged to accept ridiculous prices for their products and the working men received famine wages, and during that period of time there was no such scarcity of commodities as at the present time. When I was elected as a member of this house I pledged myself to advocate any sound policy which would put the farmers and the labourers of my country on the same level as any other classes with respect to prices and the distribution of commodities.

In the present emergency period, if there were no legislation to guarantee fair prices for farm products and to prevent the disproportionate price increase of manufactured products, the farmers would again have to suffer from the discrepancy between their sales and their purchases. Under the circumstances is it not the duty of the government to secure for Canadian citizens an equitable distribution of essential commodities, the scarcity of which is well recognized? In fact, no control has to be maintained on those commodities available in the country and the whole world.

When dealing with this point we have to consider some commodities such as sugar, which is apportioned through an international allocation committee, so that the quantity of sugar allotted to this country in 1947 amounts to ninety-three pounds per capita, which is supposed to take care of the industrial and domestic needs of the people. In order that each family shall get its share, it is necessary that a just and fair distribution should be made. If such allotments were not made, what would happen? A few wealthy and powerful firms would immediately buy the whole quantity of sugar and themselves determine the prices, which could reach a peak inaccessible to farmers and labourers, and God knows that farmers and labourers with large families vitally need that commodity. In assuring an equitable distribution, the government does more than protecting the economy of those families; it does take care of national health. Some people say that a certain quantity of sugar was sold on the black market, which means that somebody infringes the law in subtracting sugar from the whole quantity and reselling it at an illegal price. This objection is not a serious one. If a relatively small quantity of sugar is sold in contravention of the law, what would be the situation in this particular matter when capitalists would exercise control and be free to sell that commodity at thirty, forty or fifty cents a pound? It would mean that black market would be established as the general rule and that farmers' and labourers' families would be deprived of that essential commodity.

With respect to commodities which are under the control of a foreign government, I wish to quote Mr. M. W. Mackenzie, deputy minister of trade and commerce, at page 204 of the report of the standing committee on banking and commerce:

> Now the next point I wish to deal with has to do with the question that has been raised by several people, as to why it was not possible to enumerate in the law the items that we had under export control. There was one very good example of that last year, steel. Steel appeared to be coming into fairly good supply and export control was withdrawn. Then, as you will remember, there were a number of upsets in the American situation which in turn created an extraordinary demand on Canadian supplies, and without export control tremendous quantities of steel would have moved to the United States. Now, that is a situation that arose entirely outside of Canada, but it is illustrative of the sort of thing that happens and can happen so long as Canadian prices are below world prices and so long as there are over-all world shortages. When a particular demand is created in other quarters it can very readily result in an instantaneous demand on Canadian supplies. It is so developed that export control on steel items had to be reinstated in order to protect the domestic supply.

And further:

> As far as imports are concerned, it became necessary during the war to impose import control for a variety of reasons. One of the reasons was that the united nations got together and agreed on an allocation of foodstuffs that were in short supply. Oils and fats is a very good example of that. Canada is far from being self-sufficient in edible oils and fats.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has not the right to refer to what is going on in a committee before it has reported to the house.

Mr. MARQUIS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I bow to your ruling. In the case of commodities under the control of a foreign government, import control must be maintained in order to be sure that we shall get our supply and that a fair distribution may be made among the people. Otherwise the biggest and most aggressive users of some commodities would take the amount available to Canada.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, order No. 711 on maximum prices for goods and services. May I put on the record some of the articles greatly needed by farmers and labourers. In schedule A, part I, under group A, foods, there are listed wheat flour, yeast, bread, processed cereals, prepared flour mixes for pastries, biscuits, rice other than wild rice, pot and pearl barley, shelled corn, dried peas, soya beans, starch, sugar, molasses, corn syrup, honey, tea, coffee, malt, black pepper, butter, cheddar cheese, concentrated milk products of all kinds, salt. These commodities are greatly needed by farmers and labourers, and if there are no ceiling prices, the prices of these commodities will increase to such an extent that the farmers will be required to pay a very large amount of money for them or go without. Later on in the schedule, there are also mentioned corn, peas, tomatoes, canned soups, pork and beans, jellies, marmalades.

In group C, textiles and clothing, there are listed men's, youths' and boys' garments; men's, youths' and boys' furnishings such as collars, shirts, underwear, pyjamas; women's, misses', girls', children's and infants' garments. I need not enumerate all these articles. Then there are textile products as follows: bath mats, bedspreads, blankets, curtains, dish cloths, dish towels, napkins, pillow cases, sheets, table cloths, towels, window blinds and so on.

In group D, household equipment and supplies, there are soap, household heating equipment and fitttings; household water heating equipment and fittings and accessories therefor.

In part II, agricultural machinery, implements, equipment and supplies, there are hand garden planter, corn planter, grain and fertilizer drill, seed box for one-way disc or tiller, manure loader, horse or tractor drawn garden planter, bean drill, grain drill, lime or fertilizer sower, manure spreader; ploughs; tillage implements and cultivators as follows: horse-drawn disc harrow, horse-drawn scuffler, hand cultivator and weeder, tool frames, land rollers, combination planter and cultivator, horse hoe; haying machinery as follows: mowers, sweep rake, hay loader, hay stacker and so on. These articles are used by the farmers. They must pay for them. What would be the result, when they are in such great need of these articles, if the farmers are required to pay fifty, one hundred or two hundred per cent more than they pay today? Those are articles, the price of which must be protected by this house and by this parliament for the benefit of the farmers in my constituency and in the country at large. In the list also are mentioned fertilizers of all kinds. Now is the time for the farmers to buy fertilizers, and they need them in order to grow their crops, in order to bring in a large and rich production during the current year. If there is no ceiling price on those products or on those commodities, the farmers will be in the position of paying a very high price, and probably they will not be able to pay it.

The same thing is true with regard to seeds and so on. There is in this order a list of a large number of articles, all of which are necessary to the farmers; and I submit to the house that we must have some kind of regulation to protect the price for farmers and for labourers in this country. We must also keep in mind that in the past the prices of farm products were not always on a par with those of manufactured products.

I wish to put on the record a list showing the index of the wholesale prices, prices of manufactured goods and of farm products compared with one another. I would ask the permission of the house to put that list on Hansard without reading it, because it is only a matter of statistics and it is not lengthy.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member leave to put this list on Hansard?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. MARQUIS: The list is as follows:

This list proves that, for the years 1943 to 1946, on account of controls, prices of farm products compare advantageously with manufactured products.

On behalf of the farmers and labourers I wish to support the principle of this bill in order to avoid a disproportionate increase in the price of manufactured goods and in order that reasonable prices for farm products may be maintained. What would be the situation of farmers who are having difficulty in securing help for their farm work if prices of farm products cannot be maintained? What would be their situation if they were to be called upon to pay from fifty to one hundred per cent more for agricultural implements or the numerous other articles which they are obliged to buy? On the other hand, at what price would they sell their production? It is obvious that monopolies would do their best themselves to control production and to determine in a relatively short time prices of their own choice. However I do not like controls for the pleasure of having controls, but I prefer to see them exercised by the government rather than by monopolies.

Mr. R. H. WINTERS (Queens-Lunenburg): In the light of the trend this debate has taken to date, I should like to say a few words as a member from Nova Scotia. May I say, at the outset, that one of the most striking points in the debate on controls is the use of the word "bureaucrat" by opposition members. The same people who are spoken of so sympathetically by those hon. members when civil service matters are under discussion suddenly become power-hungry bureaucrats when the government policy on controls is being debated. One is led to believe that these otherwise reliable civil servants have the sinister faculty of changing character to conform to the particular fancy of this house.

The arguments for and against controls and their continuation have followed the pattern that has been established in this house on previous occasions. On the one hand, there are the vocal champions of the cause of abolition of all controls, and almost invariably these hon. members are Progressive Conservatives. At the other extreme are those who speak out strongly for the maintenance of controls and even for increasing them, in accordance with their policies of socialism or controlled economy. Neither of these extremes presents a practical solution under present circumstances, as their supporters well know and as the Progressive Conservatives have indicated by their votes on many occasions.

Time and again Nova Scotians have indicated their satisfaction with the steady course this government is steering between the shoals of economic extremities on either side. This afternoon I was interested and amused by some parts of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming). When he said this house was floundering in its treatment of this bill it must be presumed that he was expressing his own views or the views of his party, since, as far as I have been able to determine, they certainly are not the views of this country. His arguments were not sufficiently persuasive for this party, even though they were generously buttressed by such magic words as "willy-nilly", "holus-bolus" and many others.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Are you sure you have an open mind?

Mr. WINTERS: As Nova Scotians see it, Mr. Speaker, there are two broad classes of economic controls. The first and much more far-reaching class will not be affected by this legislation, since it is not involved one way or the other. I refer to those controls or restrictions which seem to be Nova Scotia's birthright as the result of her geographical situation; economic controls that act in restraint of the flow of a free supply and demand economy. When one considers the freight rates, long, slow rail hauls, the distances from centres of population, and other factors which act to our disadvantage it must be clearly evident that Nova Scotia has been operating under a system of the most severe type of economic controls since the days of confederation. The same can be said of the other two maritime provinces and, to some extent, of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. It is these controls, not the temporary controls with which we are dealing at the moment, that give us our greatest concern.

I am sure many hon. members do not appreciate the significance of this position, and there is a tendency to dismiss it as the old bogey of maritime rights; but I can tell hon. members that it is discouraging indeed to be told time and again by buyers in central Canada that they are not interested in products manufactured in Nova Scotia because almost invariably it goes without saying that, even though many items may be manufactured more cheaply in Nova Scotia, they cannot be placed on the big markets at competitive prices because of freight rates. It is this obstacle in restraint of trade with the rest of Canada that controls maritime economy to our disadvantage. This is a real problem, which merits full consideration, but I need not take the time of the house to discuss it more fully just now.

The second class of controls to which I referred are in the category we are discussing at the present time. The statement presented this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) is pregnant with significance, as one hon. member said last evening, as far as it applies to coal subsidies in particular. The removal of subsidies will be viewed with decidedly mixed feelings in Nova Scotia. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) said he saw no reason why Canada should subsidize the rest of the world. To go one step farther —many Canadians feel that Nova Scotia is over-subsidized, but in many respects the reverse is true. When one considers the normal flow of wealth from Nova Scotia to Ontario and Quebec, the disproportionate amount of foreign loans returning to industrial Ontario and Quebec through the bulk of orders being placed in these provinces, and other factors, it appears to Nova Scotians that in many ways we are subsidizing these other provinces of Canada; and to quote once more from the speech made earlier this evening by the hon. member for Acadia, we often wonder why this must be the case.

Under the circumstances, though we strongly believe in private initiative, we do not consider some subsidies, such as that paid on coal, to be as iniquitous as many people would have us believe. In this matter of controls we have only to refer to the position of western farmers with respect to wheat to realize something of what we maritimers feel with respect to subsidies of this kind. I wish to make it perfectly clear, however, that we do not believe in subsidizing to the point where industry and/or labour feel they do not have to exert their maximum and most efficient efforts to achieve full and profitable operation.

The controls with which I am now dealing were imposed to smooth out and regulate our economy during the critical years of the war; and it is to the credit of those responsible, those usually referred to by the opposition as bureaucrats, that they did the job and did it well. We in Nova Scotia are proud to give a full share of this credit to the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley). Other countries seem much more appreciative of the results of Canada's programme of economic controls, and they are much more ready to acknowledge a job well done than many people within the dominion itself. The very factors which make controls necessary make them bothersome, because they restrict or restrain. In many cases individuals are required to make sacrifices for the over-all good; and by nature none of us likes to suffer more than is necessary.

The people of my constituency of Queens-Lunenburg are anxious to return to a free, uncontrolled economy at the earliest possible day, but they do not want to run any risks of having their present economy jeopardized. The control over the sale of lumber seems to draw more fire than any other, and I would request the minister concerned to give special consideration to the adjustment of the domestic retail price at the first opportunity. We are satisfied, however, that in general the government's policy of gradual decontrol is good. We are confident that, wherever possible, controls are being removed, when this can be done without endangering costs of living. This is clearly and abundantly evident more than ever, from the statement tabled this afternoon by the Minister of Finance.

One does not need to seek far for the basis of the government's policy in this matter of controls. It is a policy of common sense; it is one that will ensure the continuation of the sound economy which has been the envy of almost all foreign countries. We are satisfied that the authority this bill seeks, that is, to continue in effect a limited number of economic controls for a short period of time, is in the best interests of the country. What we want is orderly and gradual decontrol, and we are satisfied this government is doing just that.

I can tell this house, therefore, that the citizens of the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg are heartily in favour of this bill.

On motion of Mr. Macdonnell (Muskoka-Ontario) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MATTHEWS—EMERGENCY POWERS BILL—OMISSION OF NAME FROM DIVISION LIST ON APRIL 1

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): On a matter of privilege I wish to point out that neither in the Votes and Proceedings nor in yesterday's Hansard does my name appear as having voted in the vote which was taken yesterday. I was in my place, as I usually am, and I had no hesitation in voting to sustain your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

NEWFOUNDLAND

DELEGATION FROM NATIONAL CONVENTION TO VISIT CANADA

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I should like to inform the house that the national convention of Newfoundland recently passed a resolution expressing a desire to send a delegation to Ottawa to ascertain from the Canadian government what fair and equitable basis may exist for federal union of Canada and Newfoundland. The resolution requested the Governor of Newfoundland to inquire whether the Canadian government would receive a delegation for this purpose.

Through our high commissioner in St. John's, the government has now received this communication from the Governor of Newfoundland. We have replied that we shall be happy to receive a delegation from the national convention of Newfoundland at a mutually convenient date. We said that the Canadian government is of the opinion that the questions to be discussed with the delegation are of such complexity and of such significance for both countries that it is essential to have a complete and comprehensive exchange of information and a full and careful exploration by both parties of all the issues involved, so that an accurate appreciation of the position may be gained on each side.

Yesterday, upon being informed that the Canadian government is willing to receive a delegation, the national convention elected six of its members in addition to its chairman to serve on the delegation which, in due course, will proceed to Ottawa. The chairman of the national convention is the Honourable F. G. Bradley, K.C., and I understand that the other members elected are: Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne; Mr. C. H. Ballam; the Reverend

L. Burry; Mr. G. F. Higgins, K.C.; the Honourable R. B. Job; and Mr. J. R. Smallwood.

The national convention has also elected a delegation which is to proceed to England to discuss with the government of the United Kingdom the question of the financial and fiscal relationships which may be expected between the United Kingdom and Newfoundland under various possible forms of future government. This delegation is to be received in London on April 29. We understand that the national convention desires that the visit of its delegation to Ottawa should take place after the convention has received replies to the inquiries which it proposes to address to the government of the United Kingdom. It is therefore expected that our meetings with the delegation from the national convention will take place at a mutually convenient date subsequent to the conclusion of the discussions which are to take place in London.

The government is confident that the friendship and cooperation which have marked our relations with Newfoundland will provide a firm basis for discussions with a delegation from the national convention. The delegation will, I feel sure, be warmly welcomed in Ottawa. I will endeavour from time to time to keep the house informed of developments.

WITHDRAWAL OF NOTICE OF MOTION FROM ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. BAKER (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, there appears on the order paper of today, as No. 24 under notices of motions, the following proposed resolution under my name:

That, in the opinion of this house, if the constituent assembly of Newfoundland desires to enter into discussion with the government of Canada as to the terms on which Newfoundland might enter confederation, the government should at once proceed to enter discussions to explore the conditions on which Newfoundland might enter confederation.

I was delighted to hear the statement which the Secretary of State for External Affairs made to the house, and since the matter has been completely covered I would ask leave to withdraw the motion. Taking the long term view, I consider that it will be in the strategic, economic and political interest of both countries if this union can be brought about.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is a speech. That is not the way I was treated yesterday.

Motion withdrawn.

2. How were such materials disposed of?
3. What quantity of each item was destroyed?

Mr. McCANN:

1. No statistics are kept and to answer the question would entail drawing 4,482 files, the number of customs seizures for the calendar year 1946. It would take at least six weeks to compile such a statement.

2. (a) Cigarettes: destroyed in those cases where persons involved refuse to take release on payment of amount demanded.

(c) Liquor: destroyed.

(d) Other commodities: sold by tender when release not taken on terms offered.

3. No statistics kept.

PENSIONS TO THE BLIND

Mr. MATTHEWS (Brandon):

1. How many blind pensioners were there on the rolls as of December 31, 1946?

[Mr. E. Bertrand.]

2. What is the total number of blind?
3. Is there compulsory registration of blind persons in Canada?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. 7,288.
2. Approximately 14,000.
3. No.

DOMINION COUNCIL OF HEALTH

Mr. DIONNE (Beauce):

1. What is the Dominion Council of Health?
2. What groups or associations are represented on the said council?
3. How often does such council meet?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. The Dominion Council of Health was established under the Department of Health Act, 1919, to consist of the Deputy Minister of National Health as chairman, and the chief executive officer of the provincial department or board of health of each province, and such other persons, not to exceed five in number, as may be appointed by the governor in council to hold office during good behaviour for a period of three years. The council, as originally composed, was perpetuated by the Department of Pensions and National Health Act, 1928, and by the Department of National Health and Welfare Act, 1944.

2. No statutory provision is made regarding the selection and appointment of the five additional members on the council. However, by custom it has evolved that they are chosen to represent the following groups: English-speaking women's social welfare groups; French-speaking women's social welfare groups; Agriculture; Labour; Scientific public health.

3. The act provides that the council shall meet at such times and at such places as the minister may direct. Usually it meets twice a year, in the spring and in the fall.

GRANTS TO VOLUNTARY HEALTH ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. MacLEAN:

What voluntary organizations working in the field of health receive grants from the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. MARTIN:

The Canadian National Committee for Mental Hygiene; The Health League of Canada; Canadian National Institute for the Blind; L'Association Canadienne Francaise des Aveugles; L'Institute Nazareth de Montreal; Montreal Association for the Blind; Canadian Tuberculosis Association; Victorian Order of Nurses; St. John Ambulance Association; Canadian Red Cross Society.

DOMINION COUNCIL OF HEALTH

Mr. GOURD (Chapleau):

1. Does the Dominion Council of Health rely on other persons or groups for technical assistance concerning specific problems?
2. Are the proceedings of the said council made public?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. Yes. The following committees or councils established under section 6 of the Department of National Health and Welfare Act are looked to by the council for advice on specific problems: (a) the Canadian council on nutrition; (b) conference of venereal disease control directors; (c) technical advisory committee on industrial health; (d) technical advisory committee on public health laboratories; (e) the vital statistics council; (f) the conference of mental health directors; (g) the conference of health education directors.
2. No.

DOMINION COUNCIL OF HEALTH

Mr. LAURENDEAU:

What are the powers and functions of the Dominion Council of Health?

Mr. MARTIN:

The duties and powers of the council, as prescribed by order in council P.C. 583 of the 19th of February, 1946, are twofold, namely:

1. The consideration of matters relating to the promotion or preservation of the health of the people of Canada and the initiation of recommendations and proposals to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and other appropriate authorities in regard thereto; and
2. The furnishing of advice to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in respect to the matters provided in section 5 of the Department of National Health and Welfare Act, relating to the promotion or preservation of the health of the people of Canada, over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction.

WORLD HEALTH ORGANIZATION—INTERIM COMMISSION

Mr. DECHENE:

1. What is the status of the interim commission of the world health organization?
2. Is Canada represented on the interim commission?
3. Is the world health organization officially constituted at the present time?

Mr. MARTIN:

1. The interim commission of the world health organization is still in existence. The third session of the commission is now taking place at Geneva.

The interim commission is continuing the health functions of UNRRA and is gradually taking over the health section of the league of nations and office international d'hygiene publique in Paris. This is all preparatory work, and will have to be confirmed by the executive board when the world health organization comes into being. See paragraph 3.

2. Yes.
3. No.

2. If so, what is the total cost of this programme for each broadcast?
3. What is paid the artists or their agents for each broadcast?
4. How long is each broadcast?
5. Over what Canadian stations does the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation broadcast this programme?

Mr. McCANN:

1. The "Fine Arts Quartet", a sustaining programme from the American Broadcasting Company.
2. No cost to the CBC.
3. No information.
4. Half hour.
5. CJFX, Antigonish, N.S., CBH, Halifax, N.S.; CBA, Sackville, N.B.; CKNB, Campbellton, N.B.; CHSJ, Saint John, N.B.; CHGS, Summerside, P.E.I.; CBO, Ottawa, Ont.; CFJM, Brockville, Ont.; CJBC, Toronto, Ont.; CKSO, Sudbury, Ont.; CBJ, Chicoutimi, P.Q.; CBV, Quebec, P.Q.; CBF, Montreal, P.Q.; CHNC, New Carlisle, P.Q.; CHGB, Ste. POSTAL SERVICE

RATES ON PARCELS TO UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. ERNEST BERTRAND (Postmaster General): Yesterday a question was asked by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and on Monday a similar question was asked by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), with respect to parcel post rates. I should like to give the answer now.

Parcel post rates on parcels from Canada to the United Kingdom are based on three factors: (1) cost of handling and transportation in Canada; (2) charges paid for transatlantic conveyance, and (3) credits paid to the United Kingdom postal administration for handling and delivery in the United Kingdom. The latter two charges are the actual amounts which the Canadian postal administration is required to pay out.

As regards the charges for handling in Canada, the amount which is included in the postage rates is less than that which is charged for handling a similar parcel in the domestic service. Parcel post rates will be reduced whenever conditions permit.

Furthermore, the department is not in a position to waive postage, as this would cost more than $3,000,000 per annum.

RADIO BROADCASTING

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ANNUAL REPORT AND REVIEW POLICIES OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved:

That a select committee to be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Beaudoin, Bertrand (Prescott), Bowerman, Coldwell, Diefenbaker, Fleming, Fulton, Gauthier (Portneuf), Hackett, Hansell, Knight, Langlois, Laurendeau, Maloney, Maybank, McCann, Mullins, Nixon, Pinard, Robinson (Simcoe East), Reid, Ross (Hamilton East), Ross (St. Paul's), Smith (Calgary West), and Winters, and that the presence of at least nine members shall be a quorum of the said committee and that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto.

[Mr. Zaplitny.]

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): I intend to support the motion and I will only take your time, Mr. Speaker, for a sentence or two. I wish to express the hope that the house at this session will find time, as we did not during the last session, to deal with the report of the radio committee, and particularly to find out whether or not this House of Commons is in favour of handing to any corporation complete power of regulation and control over concerns in opposition to it. We did advocate and will continue to advocate that some independent body shall stand between the corporation itself and its opposition, who are in competition in the advertising business. I wish to express to the minister my appreciation of the setting up of the committee. With that I hold my peace.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR-PROGRESSIVE PARTY OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Skey) asked a question as follows:

I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has now been instructed that the Labour-Progressive party of Canada is no longer entitled to free time on the C.B.C. national network.

My answer is that under the Canadian Broadcasting Act the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is itself responsible for its own broadcasting activities, and in connection with them it does not take instructions from the government. I might interject too that the government does not presume to give instructions to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The corporation last September adopted an amendment to its own white paper on political and controversial broadcasting providing that a party which has no representation in the House of Commons shall not be provided free political time on national C.B.C. networks between election campaigns.

UNITED NATIONS

JOHN GRIERSON—QUESTION AS TO APPLICATION FOR DIPLOMATIC PASSPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Mr. John Grierson applied to the Canadian government for a diplomatic passport, as adviser to the director of UNESCO, or has he made any approaches to any department in that regard? If he has, what will be the government's attitude with respect to such application?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The answer is no. There has been no application for a diplomatic passport, but it is customary to accord diplomatic immunities to officials of the united nations, and Mr. Grierson will be treated in that regard in the same way as other officials of the united nations.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION AT MOSCOW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is there any change contemplated with respect to Canada's representation at Moscow? I ask the question because the Under Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that he was hoping for an appointment very soon either to China or to Russia, and I should think the latter is the only one which might conceivably be open.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am not sure that the words "very soon" were in the statement made by the under secretary of state. I understood it to be the expression of a pious hope. I am afraid that the under secretary will have to resign himself to the position he now occupies for some considerable time; at least, that is my hope, if I am to remain in the office.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

DATE OF HALIFAX BY-ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I wish to direct a question to the acting leader of the government. It arises out of some anxiety in Halifax as to whether the government is in a position to indicate approximately on what date the Halifax by-election might take place.

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Although I do not like to use this form, I think I shall have to use it on this occasion and say that the intentions of the government in that regard will be made known in due course.

Mr. GRAYDON: Can the minister indicate whether the government has had a late meteorological report on the conditions of the weather in Halifax?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The answer is, no.

RENT CONTROL

PRESS REPORT OF TEN PER CENT INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. STANLEY KNOWLES (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has his attention been drawn to a report in today's issue of the Montreal Gazette to the effect that a ten per cent increase in rent is to be announced on Thursday? Is that report true or false?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of Finance): I have not seen the report.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is it true or false?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ABBOTT: This is not a radio programme.

EMERGENCY POWERS

CONTINUATION OF CERTAIN ORDERS AND REGULATIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of Bill No. 104, to provide for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Fleming.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, while this bill we are considering deals with certain controls set out therein, nevertheless I think it has been clear from the course of the debate that the whole principle of control and the attitude of members of this house toward the controlled economy is an important element, and at the outset I should like to make some rather general observations on that point.

I have the feeling that at the present time there are two views which, like the parallel lines we learned about at school, if produced ever so far both ways will not meet. My own feeling is that that should not be so, that these differences are not absolute. It is my hope to say some things which might enable those parallel lines to come a little closer together. Of course one hopes that when the parallel lines come closer, the line which inclines will be the other one and not one's own line. However, that is as may be.

Mr. KNOWLES: Is that what you were doing yesterday?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yesterday is past and we are down to serious things again. Yesterday was All Fools' day, and that includes everybody.

Mr. COLDWELL: Particularly those who voted the wrong way.

Mr. WRIGHT: Both ways.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): It is natural I suppose that I should seem to address some of my remarks mainly to the gentlemen on my immediate left. I do that with great respect, and I do it with the feeling that while our views differ very greatly, nevertheless we are pursuing the same objective, although we sometimes forget that. It is with that in mind that I begin.

I wish to begin by referring to certain views expressed by the leader of the C.C.F. party, because frankly I am puzzled from time to time as to what his actual view is on this important question. I want to read this sentence from what he said on a previous occasion—and I hope this will not be an infringement of the rules. I quote from Hansard of February 3 last, page 69:

> The struggle today is really between those who believe in social ownership and cooperative endeavour and those who believe in the continuance of the exploitation of the people by powerful groups of vested interests.

I regret the word "exploitation". I have looked it up in the dictionary in order to make quite sure what it means. The word "exploitation" has a sinister sense. It means that certain people are trying to take unfair and oppressive advantage of other people, and I shall have more to say about that. I wish to make it clear that I am not trying to gloss over the defects and dangers and failures of the system I believe in. Nevertheless I regretted that word.

I propose now to refer to another statement which the hon. gentleman made and which I suggest to the house and to him is a very different statement. I think I have him almost word perfect if I recall that he said in this house: "I do not object to private enterprise, but if they take the profits they must take the risks." I approve of that. I am not objecting to a single word in it. I wish to appeal to the hon. gentleman—and I shall not ask him to answer now—as to which of these two voices I should listen to. I am going to recall to him a saying which I looked up the other day. I have often heard the saying "to appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober", but I never knew what it meant until the other day.

Mr. COLDWELL: Until yesterday.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I allow the hon. gentleman to have his score. I looked it up the other day and found that it refers to an evidently famous incident in literature where Philip of Macedon had given a judgment on a certain woman and she said, "I appeal." The king, who apparently had been dining not wisely but too well, said, "You appeal to whom?" She said, "To Philip when sober." And apparently her appeal made when he was sober was successful. I am now going to appeal to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell); and when I say intoxicated of course I mean merely with the exuberance of his own thoughts, but I am going to appeal to him in that quality, to what I consider the sober quality in which he uttered the words, when he said he did not object to private enterprise but if they took the profits they must take the risk.

I now wish to come to his colleague, who is not here today but at present is flying somewhere on the way to Vancouver, and I hope high up in the air over the Rocky mountains. He spoke last night and I think he made too good an argument against freedom; and when I say "freedom" may I there say freedom cannot be absolute. What we want is as much freedom as we can have. We start from that point of view, recognizing at the same time there must be some regulation. I take it also that when we talk about a fully planned economy what we have in mind is the people who would like planning and want as much planning as possible and will only leave that area of freedom which is over after there is as much planning as they consider wise.

As I was saying, I think the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) last night made too good an argument. First of all, he talked about "cut-throat competition"; then he went on to talk about "exploiting". I suggest you cannot have it two ways. If you are going to have cut-throat competition, surely that very phrase means that you are going to get the advantage that we say comes from competition. You are going to get low prices. I am not forgetting that cut-throat competition can in the end by a process that sometimes happens lead to monopoly, and I will have something more to say about that later. But I still say the hon. member made too good a case when on the one hand he decried cut-throat competition and on the other hand went on to talk about exploiting. You cannot have it both ways at the same time.

Then he went on to another thing which I do not think he really meant. He said that we in this party—and this is often said—are intent on going back to those conditions which brought tragic results before the war. I think that is what he said; I took it down at the time. I do not think he meant that. I do not think anyone in the group to my left means that we, more than anyone else, want to go back to those conditions. We admit the evil of those conditions; but that is being used as a convenient thing to throw at us, and therefore I am going to make just two comments about it. I am going to remind people of two things, first of all that we were not responsible for those conditions. I am not going to suggest who was responsible. Perhaps it would not be unfair to say that in the gay twenties governments were inclined to believe that booms could go on forever, just as private individuals did.

I am not going to say anything more about that except that I think during those years the leader of this party, Lord Bennett, who was in power then, tried courageously to meet difficult and unprecedented conditions and did devise schemes which, though perhaps not perfect, in the years succeeding were in effect followed, with adaptations if you will, and that he did break the ground with courage and energy in trying to deal with a situation which had never been foreseen and which was extremely difficult. While commenting on that point I should like to say that when people say we want to go back to the conditions of the thirties, that is a very unfair thing because we accept, as everyone accepts, the fact that there have been great changes since that time.

What have been the changes since then? I shall mention two or three. In the first place we have grown to accept a measure of social security and social services that was not accepted then. Second, we have grown to accept the measure of taxation which is necessary to maintain those social services. Third, I would point out—and I go back to what I said about freedom—that freedom is never absolute. The other day our own party went on record in favour of certain floor prices. We recognize that in the thirties the farmers were left exposed to the full force of the blizzard while other people were able to get some shelter, at any rate. Therefore, as I say, when anyone suggests that we are prepared to go back to the conditions of the thirties, in my opinion that is a very unfair statement and one which should not be made.

Mr. KNOWLES: We claim that would be the effect.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I doubt if everyone to my left is quite as careful as my hon. friend in the statements he makes, or rather in the statement he makes now.

Then I should like to turn to this question of planning, because I think I can understand why planning is attractive. But let us bear in mind that it is planning for other people that is attractive, that there is not so much attraction in having other people plan for us. I think it very important to remember that. Last evening I believe the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) had that in mind when he made what I think was a very wise statement in regard to planning. At page 1946 of Hansard he said:

> We all object to interference with our freedom. I do; indeed, if there is anyone who likes to have his own way more than I do, I should like to meet him.

I thought that was a very sound observation on the part of the hon. gentleman. I was reminded of the story with which no doubt all hon. members are familiar, of the Irishman who was having the judgment day expounded to him. After it had been explained he asked, "Well, will the Murphys be there?" He was told, "Yes, they will be there." He asked, "Will the O'Flahertys be there?" He was told, "Yes, they will be there." "Will all the Finnegans be there?" "Yes, they will be there." Then he said, "Well, I'm thinkin' there'll be mighty little judging done the first day." I thought that might be said in regard to planning and regulating the hon. gentleman, who today is absent.

I said I wanted to see if there was not some area of agreement, to see if these parallel lines could come together at all, because when we are talking about these matters which go to the very root of our economic welfare in the future I think it desirable that we should try, as far as we can, to talk the same language. I suggest that there is an area of agreement. I suggest, for example, that we will all agree and are all agreed that the tremendously important thing now is production. That is becoming a terribly commonplace expression, but let us remember that it was not always commonplace. Let us remember that we were suffering, or thought we were suffering years ago, from over-production. In that connection I want to read a sentence or two from the British white paper, because it is interesting I think, to have the case as set out by Mr. Attlee to the British people, and it is interesting to read the remarks he made which I think mutatis mutandis apply to us here. At the end of this long paper he has this to say:

> Apart from these special dangers—

Which he has outlined.

> —the great difference between our economic conditions today and those between the wars is that, for as far ahead as we can see, there will be a high demand for the products of industry. It would appear that there is no danger for many years to come that industry as a whole will have to work below capacity because of a falling off in the general demand for its products.

And later he said:

The problem of today is to increase production to fill the gap between the quantity of goods on the market and the amount of purchasing power available to buy those goods. We must remove the idea of spinning out production in order to avoid unemployment, or of restricting output in order to safeguard earnings. On the contrary, industry, employers and workers alike, must be ready to adopt every possible means of increasing production, secure in the knowledge that this does not carry with it any threat to employment.

I say I think we can agree on the question of production, and I come next to the question of incentive. That is not so easy; nevertheless I feel—and I have now in mind particularly hon. gentlemen immediately to my left—that particularly when you are talking to those who are farmers you are talking to people who do understand incentive, because after all if there is any man in the world who has an incentive it is the farmer, who works and gets the fruits of his own labour under his own vine and fig tree. Therefore I suggest that when farmers are thinking about this question of incentive they must have very much the same attitude as the rest of us; and I suggest also that when farmers are thinking about controls they should realize—and I think this is very important—that by far the greater part of their own economic life is lived entirely free of controls, that the only controls they seek, as far as I know, are controls in connection with prices and in connection with their own marketing. The great part of their life is entirely free of controls.

In connection with this matter of incentive I should like to read an extract from an article appearing in the London Economist, that great English liberal weekly. I always object to the fact that this fine word "liberal" has been appropriated by a political party. Today I was wondering if one could not accuse the Liberal party of something like grand larceny for having chosen this word, which is a fine and noble word, and put it to uses which even the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) would not suggest are always fine or always noble.

Mr. MARTIN: May I respectfully point out that the hon. gentleman belongs to a party that once used the word "Liberal", but for some reason best know to itself, dropped it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We found ourselves in bad company, and thought we had better get away from it.

Mr. KNOWLES: You took the word "Progressive" from them.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Oh, no; I think they took it from us. On this question of incentive I should like to read from an article called "The Carrot and the Stick", which appeared in the London Economist. I recommend it to everyone who has not read it, because it seems to me to go to the basis of these matters, and the paragraph I am going to read at least has this advantage, that it criticizes everybody right across the board, the government, employers and employees. It ladles out criticism indiscriminately. It says:

But the whole drift of British society for two generations past has been to whittle away both at the carrot and the stick, until now very little of either is left.

Hon. gentlemen will appreciate, probably, that the carrot is the incentive which comes from profit and one's own earnings, the stick is the incentive such as you have in Russia, which comes from fear of unemployment, or some other kind of fear.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is the donkey?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We are the donkey. The article continues:

The rewards of success have not merely been shrivelled, they have been poisoned, since commercial success itself has been turned, in the eyes of wide circles of society, into a positive disgrace.

I should like to interject at that point a quotation from an English farmer. And I should think that my quoting from a farmer would commend itself to some extent. He has one or two things to say about industry which I have found most interesting, and which I should like to interject right here. This is what he says:

In fact, for some years now if a man dared to risk capital in any private enterprise he has been popularly and officially looked upon as a blood-sucking parasite, a regrettable but necessary nuisance, whose task should be made as difficult as possible. In short, the employer, as a member of the "boss class," must be hated and scorned, whereas the reformer or anyone whose job it is to inspect the employer's methods, is nationally applauded and respected. Yet I doubt very much whether a life spent in inspecting the work of other men is so wholly admirable.

And later on:

My point is that while the old system runs it is the members of the much despised and hated "boss class," who at their own risk finance, start, run, maintain and worry over productive enterprise; and that the reformer neither starts any business, runs one, nor risks any of his capital in one.

And I think at that point I might quote Mr. Churchill, who once made, as he so often did, an apt remark in this connection. He said what we should complain about was not the man who makes a profit, but rather the man who does not. Because, he said, after all his business goes broke and he ceases to be an employer.

And now I go on from the Economist:

There is a conspiracy of labour, capital and the state to deny enterprise its reward. The state takes it away in high taxation. All economic progress is, by definition, labour saving; yet the attitude of the trade unions, successfully maintained, is that they will permit labour-saving devices only provided that they do not in fact save labour. Nor is the attitude of organized capital any better. The embattled trade association movement has had great success in building up a code of industrial good manners which puts any attempt to reduce costs and prices by greater skill or enterprise under the ban of "destructive competition." The industrialist who discovers a way of making better things more cheaply (which is what he is sent on earth to do) is deprived by the state of all pecuniary return and by his own colleagues of any social reward. Instead of a carrot he gets a raspberry.

And there is one further quotation from the Economist I wish to read:

Britain finds herself today between two great competitors both of whom, in their different ways, keep a sharp edge on the motives that lead to action. In the United States, glittering prizes have always been offered to the ambitious, and they glitter no less today. Some attempts have been made in America to encase the stick in velvet, but they have not gone very far. The difference in welfare between employment and unemployment, between success and failure, is still unmistakably sharp, and to offer to the incompetent the protection of restrictive practices is (with the time-hallowed exception of the tariff) contrary both to the law of the land and to the prevailing morality. The Soviet economy made an original attempt to do without incentives or sanctions, but it has long ago re-introduced them. Nowhere in the world today is a bigger premium paid for skill or intelligence or effort or (within the limits of a planned economy) enterprise. And nowhere, certainly, are the penalties of incompetence or laziness more sharp.

I want to come back now for a few minutes to these two kinds of economy, the so-called planned and the so-called unplanned. In the first place let me say that the idea that an unplanned economy is unplanned is sheer myth. Nobody believes that a business could last for one week if it were not planned. Every business is planned. The difference between the fully planned and what is sometimes called the unplanned economy, or what I call the private enterprise economy or the free enterprise economy, is this: it is the difference between a few people planning for all, with thousands and thousands of officials and people planning for themselves—and it will be noted that I am not using the word "bureaucrats".

Mr. ILSLEY: It is an improvement.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): They have thousands and thousands who come under them to carry out their will.

I should like to give some figures I have here to show what has happened in England in that respect. In England apparently civil servants increased in number from 1,450,000 in 1939 to 2,130,000 in 1946. And I should like to remind hon. members of the remark made in the house not long ago by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) when he pointed out that this huge mass of officials has invaded office buildings in a flood, so that not only are they themselves withdrawn from useful work, but they are actually an obstruction to other people who hope to do productive work.

Mr. COLDWELL: How many of those officials are there because of the war?

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I cannot answer that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Because our own figures have gone up, too.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Yes, and I am glad my hon. friend mentioned that, because our own figures have gone up enormously. I believe they have gone up, roughly speaking, in the civil service, from 75,000 to 150,000. And I think that does not include special boards.

Mr. McCANN: It is 133,000.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): We should have had that figure before, because we have not heard it up to now.

Mr. McCANN: That is the official figure from the bureau of statistics.

An hon. MEMBER: It does not take into consideration crown companies.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): As I said, in the fully planned economy we find a few people at the top and a mass of civil servants to carry out their will. That implies two things; it implies, first of all, that you have comprehensive wisdom at the top, which, I maintain, just does not exist. And secondly it means that when you have that planning at the top, you must have your planning carried out.

For instance, if certain decisions are arrived at regarding labour, then I think it is quite clear you cannot have collective bargaining in force. There may be some question raised as to that, but that is my belief.

From what is happening in England, a country which we think of as the home of freedom, I think it is clear that you have there today a situation under which, unless you are a member of a trade union—and not only of a trade union, but one of the trade unions which is right inside—you are in an invidious position. I note that an hon. member shakes his head. I must frankly admit that I was greatly surprised, and I cannot give proof of what I say. All I can say is that I have asked serious people if that is so, and they have told me it is so, and that we have now, even in free England, a situation which we think of only in those states which we regard as the home of tyranny.

I might digress by referring to the fact that an unprecedented thing happened in England a month ago during the crisis when the weekly papers were—I will not say banned, but they were told to stop publication. I hold in my hand the New Statesman and Nation. I believe it can fairly be said that it is a very strong supporter of the government. I would say it is far to the left, but this publication read the government quite a lecture. As to the ban it said:

> This suggests an attitude infinitely remote from present day realities. Lord Salisbury could afford to be as aloof as this; Mr. Attlee certainly cannot But even Lord Salisbury would not have gone as far as Mr. Greenwood—

One of the ministers.

> In reply to a question about the suspension of weekly periodicals he said: "I would not have thought that serious and enlightened opinion would suffer by having a fortnight in which to think for itself." The remark could scarcely have been worse. In the first place, it showed a remarkable indifference to the principle of the freedom of the press, and secondly, it implied that it did no harm to leave educated people without the facts and arguments on which to form an intelligent opinion.

I have rather digressed there, because it seems to me that when you will certain things, you will the consequences of those things. And when we start out with planning, it takes us a long way.

Let me give an illustration we ran across the other day in the banking and commerce committee. Incidentally I might say that the officials I met created a favourable impression. I should like to give an instance of just what happens and how far people can go. We had a case raised there where steel was being rationed for export. There was not enough to go round and the companies were being given only enough to make a kind of token export in order that they might be in position to keep their foreign connections. One company was denied steel, and the basis of that denial was perhaps plausible. It was considered that their form of manufacture was not likely to be long continued because they were selling to Holland and it was thought that purchases by Holland might not continue very long because we had made a loan to Holland and they were buying with the proceeds of that loan. Another company was allowed to export. The officials were quite frank about it, as I say, and they put forward an argument which was interesting and which you could not brush aside.

My only point is this: When you start planning, where do you go? It seems to me that inevitably you drift into the position where you must begin to play the part of Providence. Several times within the last couple of days we have heard the phrase "orderly decontrol". I think that is a reasonable phrase, but we have also heard the phrase, "we must not decontrol until all risk is removed." I do not think the minister used that phrase, but it has been used. The officials get that idea and I think it is inevitable that they should. I am just pointing out that when we start this planning business we start on a path which takes us far.

I want to mention another place where it takes us, and in this connection I intend to read an extract from the report of the war-time prices and trade board. We come to the point where we are making criminals out of our citizens. That is another thing we should have in mind. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) ruined one basic part of this speech by announcing yesterday the decontrol of prices on used motor cars. I sent him a note of remonstrance and told him that I thought he should delay it. However, I am not going to hold a grudge against him but I admit this part of my speech would have been much better if they were still under control. However, they were under control at this time yesterday. At least, we did not know that they were being decontrolled; only the press knew that.

I want to read this, and I am very serious about it because it just shows where we go when 51 per cent of us undertake to invade the rights of the other 49 per cent. People will say, "Do we not invade their rights in the matter of education; do we not invade their rights in the matter of tariffs?" My answer is, "Yes, we do; you have to have a tariff. You cannot have every one making his own tariff." The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) shakes his head there, but we do have to have a tariff. While you and I may not agree about it, we have to work under the same tariff. If 51 per cent vote for it, we have to have it.

Then we have to send our children to school. No one will object to that except a few cranks. I suggest that the reason free institutions have been maintained in British countries so much longer than anywhere else is that we have not invaded the people's rights any more than we have needed to. We have left them as much freedom as possible. I would commend this argument to you by just reading a paragraph from the report. I suggest that this shows what happens or what may happen every time we begin to control. Every step we take in the way of control leads us into so much of this sort of thing. This reads:

> The price ceiling on used automobiles has proven extraordinarily difficult to enforce.

I would think it would. I think I am a law-abiding man and I am a rather timid man. I think even if I had wanted to sell my old car I would not have done it, and that would have been partly out of fear. But I can imagine the ordinary citizen asking himself why in heaven's name he should not be allowed to sell his used car. Why it should be regarded as a necessity which should be controlled has never been clear to me. However, it is not controlled now and I will say no more about it. This continues:

> The demand for automobiles has been exceptionally heavy and the production of new vehicles to supply that demand has been so beset with shortages and other difficulties that the demand has pressed heavily on the existing supply of used automobiles. Enforcement problems here are concerned not only with organized gangs but also with the irresponsible "fly-by-night" type of illegal dealer and with the private individual who attempts to obtain an excessive price for his own automobile.

I suggest that hon. gentlemen consider where they have to go once you get into controls. Let me quote the last sentence, which reads:

> All types of alleged offenders must be checked if the prices of used cars are to be controlled, yet the number of sales of such vehicles is so great that it is almost impossible to keep up with the work of investigation and prosecution.

I was going to say persecution, but it is prosecution. I submit very earnestly for the consideration of this house that that is a relevant matter. I go back again and say that when you have these controls, they have to be enforced or it makes a fool of every one. That is a matter for consideration.

I want to say a word about the planned economy I have tried to picture, this over-all planning with its thousands of thousands of officials which enter into the people's daily lives. I understand that Mr. Strachey said the other day that this justified the use of something like agents provocateurs in order to find infractions of the regulations. It is reported that he said that that was justified I suppose when you get into this business you have to be efficient. If you are going to control people, you have to control them and you have to do the things that are necessary. No doubt that is the answer that will be given. That is one side of the question.

The other side is that people are trying their best to produce. I was shocked the other day when the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) made the remark that he did not think the manufacturers were interested in production, they were just interested in profits and money. He gave a very harsh and unflattering picture of our manufacturers. I put it to hon. members here in this house; is that a true picture? Is this a group of people who somehow or other are so different from the rest of us, who are so wicked that they are pursuing a life which is reprehensible to all the rest of us? I suggest that that picture is exaggerated.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I did not call them wicked.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I am only interpreting what the hon. member said, but he did say that the manufacturer was not interested in production. I have had a fairly considerable experience with business men and I would say that the ordinary business man is interested primarily in doing a good job. He is interested in making profit, of course. I remember one business man who was doing a very good job. He was turning out the best article he could at the lowest price. He used to say that profit was a by-product, that if a man did a good enough job and did it well enough, he would make a profit. That man was interested primarily in doing a good job, and I suggest that that is true of most manufacturers.

Another great advantage in carrying on privately is that they find out if they are wrong. These men are checking each other. We talk about the profit system, but it should be called the profit and loss system. It has been said in this house that the manufacturer fixes his own prices. He does nothing of the kind. If he fixed his own prices, would there be the failures we see at every turn? Of course there would not. As long as there is competition he does not fix his own prices. I will come back to this question of competition, but I see my time is running out and I must hurry on.

I do not want to sit down without doing justice to the point which I said I would try to do justice to, and that is the failures on the part of the private enterprise system. I know that competition is often blunted; I know that there are such things as price agreements; I know that there are such things as near-monopolies. I say, and I wish that every business friend of mine could hear me say, that we who believe in the private enterprise system have to see that there is real competition, and we should be prepared to say that in these cases—there are some, such as the telephone business where a monopoly or a near-monopoly is probably the sane and sensible thing—there should be regulations. We cannot have it both ways.

I wish to say also that I think we should be assiduous, astute and careful to find every way we can to produce real competition. I am not denying that it is not difficult. I am saying that those of us who believe in competition, must accept what I think Herbert Morrison once said in England: "We want private enterprise, not private unenterprise." Those of us who believe in competition should agree with that. I agree with it.

The other day I was struck by a speech of the late Sir Alfred Mond, which he made in the British House of Commons twenty-five years ago in an interesting debate with the late Right Hon. Philip Snowden. I commend it to hon. members. He said he had been told by an American business man when speaking of the efficiency of large combinations, that when one of them was unscrambled into its relative parts the relative parts had been able to do a more profitable job than had been done before; they were more efficient because they got rid of the deadening red tape and the overhead which were involved in the huge combinations. I was interested in that; and the other day I was interested and pleased to read that cost figures do not show that the largest companies have the lowest cost figure. I read a responsible publication—I am sorry I have not it here today—which showed that cost figures would indicate that it was the companies of moderate size which had the lowest cost. Therefore I say that there is no reason for those of us who believe in freedom, those of us who desire the largest possible area of free economy in the country, to feel that it cannot be efficient. If you look back on the record I suggest that any fair-minded man will admit if it can be kept free, if we can have competition, if we can have a system whereby individual energy and all the other incentives that can be applied, can be brought to bear and put to the fullest use along with regulations where they are necessary, that is where we get the incentive; that is how we shall get the production; and then we shall get the social security that we all desire.

[Mr. Macdonnell.]

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): We have listened to an able speech from the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), but I am afraid that it is pretty hard for me to share some of his views on the subject. Last week the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett)—I am glad to see him in the house this afternoon—challenged Quebec members representing rural constituencies to accept the control policy of this government. I am proud to say that I was one of those who rose and accepted the challenge, and I am glad to be permitted today briefly to express my view on this measure which provides for the continuation of certain orders and regulations of the governor in council for a limited period during the national emergency arising out of the war.

In spite of what we have just heard from the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, I am one of those who firmly believe that the Canadian people do not want to go back to the year 1921 and its wholesale price index of 225 with the cost of living index at 200. The Canadian people know that we cannot go back to 1929 and its miserable crash; that we cannot go back to the thirties and that awful period of economic crisis, of total unemployment and of shameful starvation for tens of thousands of Canadian people in a country of plenty. The Canadian people know that we cannot go back even to the year 1939 with its 700,000 unemployed Canadians. Therefore I am one of those who firmly believe that the horse and buggy days are over. If we are not to go back to these tragic years, then the hon. member for Stanstead or any of his colleagues who oppose this measure will have to devise a better means than that provided in this bill in order to protect the interests of the common people of Canada before I am convinced—and that also applies to my constituents—that I should not heartily support this bill. Whether we like it or not, that means holding on to the controls, and holding on to them as long as is essential for the common good of the Canadian people.

I will go farther than that. Not only does it mean the retention for the time being of such controls as we know to be beneficial to the Canadian people in order to hold and stabilize our post-war economy, but in many cases it also means the reimposition of some of the controls which have been lifted. I shall go still farther—and I am in good company, along with the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) and many other hon. members—and say that I believe it is possible—it should be possible—to devise some means whereby we shall never return to the old system of control by private enterprise to the detriment of the common people of Canada.

What is worrying me today? It is not the control bill; not at all, but the very fact that this government is shifting too fast from second gear to high gear in its decontrol policy. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that there are too many obstacles on our economic highway to justify too much speed. What is worrying the householders of Canada today is not this bill, but the very fact that a higher cost of living is around the corner. And higher costs of living will follow decontrol measures such as those announced in the house yesterday. I am afraid that a further rise in prices is inevitable. In many cases decontrol means higher prices and higher prices mean hardship, particularly in the lower income bracket.

Hon. members are aware of the fact that that is a consequence which may follow in years to come. World-wide shortage of basic materials and foodstuffs limit the supplies of commodities available in Canada. The immediate removal, such as suggested by some opposition members, of such controls would ensure inequitable distribution of goods and foodstuffs throughout our country and would overnight create dissatisfaction, confusion, if not disaster, and chaos in Canada. The needs of thousands of Canadians would not be met, could not be met. Hardship and a sharp reduction in living standards would follow. Of course, big business would speculate on the necessities of life as they did in the past, to the detriment of our farming, working classes, white-collared workers and other fixed wage earners. For example, if today rent and eviction controls were lifted, what would happen? We all know that there would be almost a revolution in Montreal and in other large cities of Canada.

It seems perfectly clear that the immediate removal of controls on a great number of commodities and manufactured goods would involve a disastrous price increase, which perhaps would meet the approval once again of big business but would surely not be to the advantage of the Canadian consumers. Scores of examples could be given, but I do not want to delay unduly the proceedings of the house. Take, for instance, milk. Milk was under government control and has now been transferred to provincial jurisdiction. That very fact contributed to a rise in the price of milk from ten to fifteen cents a quart in the province of Quebec, which means from $8 to $9 a month for every working-class family in the cities of Quebec using from six to seven quarts of milk a day. Nine dollars a month means something to the working man's budget when the cost of living is already so high.

What is happening in gasoline? The government had control of this commodity and it was transferred to provincial autonomy. The automobile owners of the country entertained the hope that the three-cent war tax would be lifted, that they would be relieved of that burden, but that was just wishful thinking. That tax will remain. The government have not even withdrawn from that field. The provinces jumped on it and made it not a temporary wartime tax but a permanent tax. Federal respect for provincial autonomy, I contend, at least with regard to milk and gasoline, did not bring much relief to the Canadian people in the form of dollars and cents.

What about maple syrup? When this government controlled maple syrup you could buy the syrup last year at $3.15 a gallon, and now we are asked to pay from $6 to $9 a gallon, an increase of from 100 to 200 per cent. These are not bed-time stories; they are the plain truth. This is the situation as we size it up today. And what is the result? Instead of contributing to the relief of thousands upon thousands of Canadian families, who are suffering from the sugar shortage, the bulk of our production of maple syrup is exported to United States tobacco manufacturers and candy shops.

Mr. HACKETT: Does the hon. member deny the farmer of the province of Quebec the high price he is getting for his maple products?

Mr. ARSENAULT: That is beside the point. I certainly do not deny the farmers of the province of Quebec a fair return for their product, but I will deny anyone, whether it be a farmer or a trust of any kind, the right to take advantage of the present situation; and, as regards maple syrup, I think that if the price is not stabilized at around $4.50 a gallon very shortly, then this government should step in and impose a ceiling so as to regulate the export of that commodity.

Mr. HACKETT: Don't worry. They will not do it. There are too many constituencies that produce maple syrup.

Mr. ARSENAULT: Do you think they should do it?

Mr. HACKETT: No, I do not.

Mr. ARSENAULT: All right then. I will give one more example before I resume my seat. The automobile retail trade is passing through a crisis at the present time, particularly in the city of Quebec, in the district of Quebec and throughout the eastern part of the province of Quebec. As the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) admitted last night, there is a black market with wide ramifications throughout the province of Quebec and throughout the country, and it has reached the point where they are controlling the sales of used cars and, I will add, of new cars, which item was overlooked by the minister yesterday, more efficiently than the manufacturers and the dealers themselves. The way to secure a new automobile promptly is not to go to the dealer and have your name put on a waiting list, but to go to the black market and pay $500, $600 or $800 more for a new car. If you do that you can come back with a new car. Priorities on retail sales of automobiles have been abolished by the government, having been left to the good will of the automobile dealers and manufacturers, with the result that today we are at the mercy of a huge black market.

I heard the other day in this house that if this government lifted all controls overnight the law of supply and demand would work out all right. Well, it just does not work. It is the law of the jungle that prevails in too many instances. Automobile manufacturers find it more profitable today to export a substantial part of their production, leaving the Canadian people in a mess. The official figures show—and I have them here—that during 1946 Canadian exporters shipped abroad over $78 million of new passenger cars and trucks. Where were these cars and trucks shipped to? To British East Africa, British South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, Gambia, the Gold Coast, Nigeria, British India, Hong Kong, Australia, New Zealand, Belgium, France, China. The Netherlands, Portuguese Africa and a dozen other places.

I know many veterans wearing medals on their chests who are denied the right of purchasing a new car, in our district at any rate, in the eastern part of the province, notwithstanding that a car is the only means whereby they can earn their living. Over 40,000 trucks and over 25,000 passenger cars, have been shipped to these countries, but you cannot get a car in Quebec city, nor can you get one either in my constituency or anywhere throughout the district of Quebec at the present time. Almost two years have passed since we emerged from the war, but there is not an automobile available for any Canadian who needs one in order to earn his living, unless he is prepared to pay hundreds of dollars above the ceiling price, or is willing to have his name placed on a dealer's waiting list bearing already 500, 600, 700, or 800 names.

[Mr. Arsenault.]

It is time these conditions were put an end to, and there is only one agency in Canada that has the right to put an end to them. That agency is this government. If the automobile manufacturers—and this is my last example—continue to disregard the interests of the Canadian people to the extent indicated, then here is another field where this government should obviously step in and again reestablish some sort of system of priorities, or apply a rigid control over automobile exports, if not an embargo, until this trade is brought back to normal. It should take the necessary steps to stop what I would call the shameful and harmful exploitation and profiteering which now exist in automobile marketing as a result of the lack of control.

The hon. member for Stanstead challenged us the other day. Would he or any of his colleagues now rise in the house and declare that there is not any more need for beneficial controls such as those covered by this bill? I do not think he will. My job here, Mr. Speaker, is not to fight the case of automobile manufacturers, to fight the case of Canadian manufacturers or to fight the case of monopolies or big business. My duty is to further the interests of my constitutents and, in a general way, those of the Canadian people at large, which I am doing in supporting the government's control policy provided by this bill.

Mr. JOHN T. HACKETT (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, the bill which we are considering is a trespasser upon provincial jurisdiction unless a national emergency can be established. That is, I believe, common ground to the Liberal party and to mine. It raises an important question, the existence of a national emergency. I do not wish to draw into the debate the statement made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) the other day, for other than one purpose. In the course of the debate the Minister of Justice said, as reported at page 1554 of Hansard:

> . . . it appears to me that the true effect of the decision in the Canada Temperance Act case is that there does not have to be an emergency to found jurisdiction on the part of the dominion; that the dominion may have the power, even when there is no emergency, to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada, even though its legislation touches upon matters ordinarily regarded as solely within the provincial jurisdiction.

It is true that on March 24, in answer to a question addressed to him by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret), the Minister of Justice did say:

> Our emergency legislation is based on the existence of a national emergency arising out of the war, on the emergency doctrine, to which no one takes any exception either in this house or outside it.

I agree with the minister that the existence of an emergency doctrine is admitted, but whether or not a national emergency exists on to which the doctrine may be fitted, is another question. The statement of the minister is relevant to the discussion because it establishes that, in his opinion, a national emergency is not necessary for the invasion by the dominion of the legislative field which, in normal times, is reserved to the provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: That statement would have to be taken with all the qualifications appearing from the deputy minister's opinion, because that was part of my statement.

Mr. HACKETT: I do not wish to put anything into the mouth of the minister. I do not wish to draw from anything that he said any inference which might even savour of unfairness; but I understood the minister to say that it was his interpretation of the Canada Temperance Act case and his belief that the dominion might invade the provincial field of legislation for reasons other than an emergency.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not any reason.

Mr. HACKETT: I will agree that he did not say "any reason".

Mr. ILSLEY: All I am saying is that to take one sentence out of its context is unfair, and that the whole statement, including the deputy minister's opinion, must be read in order to give a fair report of what I said.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Golding): Order. I think if the hon. member is going to deal with the statement made on March 15, he will be out of order. But if he deals with the statement which was made on March 24, that will be in order.

Mr. HACKETT: I will deal with whichever statement pleases you, Mr. Speaker. I wish to say to the minister now that, however much I might in the heat of political controversy wish to score on somebody, I do not wish to do that—probably I could not anyway—in this instance. I do not wish to take out of the minister's speech a phrase, a paragraph or a page that may reflect an opinion which is not his. I have read his remarks not once but many times. Having scrutinized them with the utmost care, I interpret his speech as a whole,—and I will not worry him with half a dozen quotations, which I have here in my hand and could give him,—and it left me and the house under the impression that in his considered opinion a national emergency is not a condition sine qua non to the invasion by the federal government of the provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was merely presenting to the house what, in my opinion, that case decided; that is all.

Mr. HACKETT: I agree with what my right hon. friend says, and I am not attempting to go beyond that. I am merely attempting to lay before the house the point of view of the right hon. gentleman who is the conscience keeper of the government. The Minister of Justice is the legal adviser of the government, and different members of the cabinet go to him in their perplexities for enlightenment and direction. I submit the fact that the right hon. gentleman holds the views he has expressed in the house, and believes as he does that something other than a national emergency warrants the invasion of the provincial field by the dominion, must necessarily have its bearing upon the attitude of the federal government toward the invasion of that provincial field.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a progressive advance by the federal government into the provincial field. It is reflected in many areas. Primarily and above all it is reflected in the disunion and conflict which exist at the present time between the dominion and the provinces. But it is reflected elsewhere. May we consider the War Measures Act, chapter 206 of the revised statutes. This act provides that, during a period of war, invasion or insurrection, real or anticipated, the federal government may invade the provincial field and the governor general in council may take over legislative powers otherwise denied to him. But that there should be no misunderstanding as to the limits of time within which these extraordinary powers could be exercised, after they had been first limited by section 2 of the act, section 6 goes on to say:

> The provisions of the three sections last preceding—

Those are the sections which enable the governor in council to exercise the unusual powers.

> —shall only be in force during war, invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended.

We have the additional section to make it certain that this invasion of the provincial field shall cease when hostilities cease. Parliament was summoned in September, 1945, and on December 8 the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, was given royal assent. Here I take issue with the right hon. gentleman. He says in his speech that these extraordinary powers conferred by the War Measures Act were curtailed by the act of 1945. In my view they were extended. They were extended as to time; they were extended as to the area within which they might be exercised, and they were greatly increased and broadened. That act contained a limit on the duration of these extraordinary powers. It said these extraordinary powers should not be exercised by the governor in council after December 31, 1946, if parliament sat in the months of November or December, 1946. If parliament did not sit in either of those months, however, the exercise of these powers should terminate fifteen days after parliament met in 1947. On one of the last days parliament sat in 1946 an amendment was introduced extending the period within which these extraordinary powers might be exercised until sixty days after parliament met in 1947. Parliament met on January 30 of this year, so that the period would have expired on March 29 or 30. The act contained a provision that the period might again be extended by an address. This address was adopted, and, as matters now stand, these powers are susceptible of enjoyment until May 15, which, if my memory serves me well, will be more than two years after the termination of the war with Germany.

In the meantime parliament dominated by the government had imbedded in a number of statutes extraordinary powers which are susceptible of exercise by the governor in council for periods varying from one to a number of years; in some instances no time limit was placed upon them. As examples, I refer to the crown companies act; to the legislation by which the government took a monopoly over aviation and out of which it sidled a little later on; the act by which it took over the manufacture of aeroplanes, from which at a cost of untold millions it withdrew the other day, in a way which, despite the statement of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) has not yet been satisfactorily explained to the house. There was also the seemingly innocuous measure by which supplements to the contracts of postal carriers were to be paid, which gave the governor in council the right to rewrite contracts for the carriage of rural mail, and this under national emergency legislation. Then the Canadian Wheat Board Act was amended. I shall not dwell upon it beyond referring to the extraordinary powers with which it vested the governor in council. That great commodity grain, the greatest single commodity produced by the greatest single class in the country, has been placed under the monopoly of the government, under the dictation of the governor in council, without, be it said, any appeal as of right to the courts of the land. Then we have had the act for the sale and export of agricultural products. I have not any doubt that there are a number of other instances. I recall the Patent Act, for instance, under which, in certain circumstances, the governor in council is given the right to expropriate patents. People come to this country and confide in us. They give us their secrets, under the Patent Act; and, forsooth, upon the recommendation of the governor in council we may expropriate that property for the benefit of the crown.

I mention these facts merely to show that there is a growing tendency on the part of the government to arrogate to itself the right to legislate for the people of Canada, and that the tendency to trespass upon the provincial field, the tendency to invade the realm which is sacred unto the provinces is progressing, and is rapidly gaining ground.

I listened with some interest to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), who made some references to prices of maple syrup, milk and automobiles. But that gentleman entirely overlooked the fact that some eighty years ago the provinces of what is now Canada came together and entered into a solemn pact, by the terms of which certain rights, certain prerogatives, were reserved to the provinces. And had it not been that a complete understanding and agreement was arrived at between these contracting parties, there could not have been a dominion; there could have been no Canada.

We have agreed that, in the event of a national emergency, certain extraordinary rights might be vested in the dominion, in the federal authority. It is wrong to kill; and if a man wantonly kills a fellow man he is hanged for it. But if he kills in self defence he is justified. To apply a principle somewhat akin to that, when the life of a country is threatened, when its very existence is in the scales, then there emerges the overriding principle of self-preservation which obliterates contracts and constitutional safeguards; then the great elemental doctrine of survival overshadows for the moment those lesser contingencies which are the basis of our national life. Just because it has been the ill-fortune of the generation which is so abundantly represented in this chamber, to have witnessed two such great cataclysms; to have seen the life of our country twice imperilled, and to have seen the invading hordes almost at our gates, and because to resist those perils we have found it necessary to take administrative shortcuts to muster our strength to repel the foe, is hardly a reason to perpetuate them long after those perils have passed.

I come now to the speech of the minister. He has said that the reason which justifies the dominion in its invasion of the field of the provinces is to be found in his speech. I endeavoured—and here I shall pause just to open a parenthesis to say that when hon. members opposite say the party to which I belong voted for the resolution on which this bill is founded they are stating something that is not at all in accordance with the facts. No member of this party voted for the resolution. I think the minister will agree that the questions we asked were appropriate. They were questions to which answers were due. Questions were asked to which answers were given, although they were not entirely satisfactory in every instance.

Speaking to the resolution, the minister referred to conditions which, he said, constituted a national emergency. There are three or four of those references about which I shall say a few words as I go along. One of the grounds of a national emergency to which he referred is that of housing. Then he made reference to rental controls. May I say in passing that I am a believer in private property. I believe that the owner is entitled to the use of his property, and to its administration.

The government has attempted to provide housing; and many people have reached the conclusion that it has failed in its attempt. In fact many have said in the house—and have advanced solid arguments and many facts in support of those arguments—that had the government refrained entirely from its attempt to provide housing, more houses would have been provided than the government has found it possible to provide.

The government is attempting to provide houses on an uneconomical basis, which means that at least some of those houses will be occupied by people who will not be paying for them. They will be getting something for nothing from the government and to that extent they will be subject to the government's whims and good will, because like accommodation for the same outlay will not be available elsewhere. Rent controls keep owners out of their properties and frequently keep people out of an occupancy to which they are entitled. They may have been absent at war or they may have been called away to other fields of activity, but when they come home they want to get into their houses. The government seems entirely to overlook the fact that nobody wishes these houses to be vacant. There would be just as many people in these houses if these controls were removed as there are now; the only difference would be that the people who would occupy them would be either the owners or tenants occupying them with the consent of the owners instead of the controller.

I have more confidence in mankind; I have more confidence in the generosity and good will of people than has the government opposite which paints such a dark picture of all the horrors that will occur should people be allowed to have their properties and enjoy them as they always have in the past. It is the full application of the principle of private property that has made Canada diminutive as she is in numbers, the powerful entity that she is today in the concert of nations. It is because we have respected the rights of the citizen that we are looked upon as the haven and the refuge of peoples whose lives have been trampled upon. I do not believe that many would be harshly treated were all of these restraints lifted.

The other day I heard a many say, "If I am allowed to raise my rents twenty per cent under control I must do it because, I do not know what the controller will do to me the next day. However, if controls were off I could protect a good tenant. I carried some of my tenants for five or ten years during the period of depression, for no rent in some cases and at reduced rents in all." I have more faith in the generosity of the Canadian people than have the gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches. I believe if we go back to a reign in which people can give some scope to their humane tendencies and their kindly feelings instead of being under the lash of some, I was going to say of a bureaucrat—I do not use the word in any other sense than its dictionary meaning; that is someone in government office; someone who cannot know the circumstances of each case but who has to act by a rule which has no universal application—we would be much better off.

If we could free ourselves once again from the restraints which have been placed upon us we would have found a remedy for three-quarters of the ills from which we suffer.

I go on now to deal with some other alleged reasons for maintaining controls. . The right hon. gentleman referred to inflation. That dog has chased us a long way, but I do not know that it has bitten anybody seriously as yet. Our money is not as good as it was. Why? Because it has been diluted. I am not going to bandy words with the right hon. gentleman as to what inflation means. He talks of these matters in language which I am unable to follow. But the fact is there.

We have been through a great ordeal, an ordeal which has tested our soul, our every resource and energy. We have paid for it in blood; we have paid for it in sacrifice; we have paid for it in treasure.

One-half of the actual cost of the war has been paid out of current taxes; two-sixths have been paid out of borrowings, and one-sixth has been paid through the depreciation of our dollar, call it inflation or whatever you will. We got that one-sixth from the Bank of Canada and from the chartered banks. It was, to put it baldly, obtained by the use of the printing press. Our dollar does not buy what it used to buy; our dollar cannot buy what it used to buy, because it has not the inherent worth and value that it had before it was diluted. I think that is something that everybody understands, and when we talk about increased prices we must take that fact into consideration. The minister feared that the cost of living might increase if controls were removed.

In determining the cost of living, whether we will or not, we must take into consideration the total of these subsidies, whether they be $600 million, whether they be $800 million or whether they be $1,500 million. This has not been done. These have resulted from our activities; these have resulted from our way of financing this war; they are burdens which have reduced our resources and which have resulted necessarily in higher prices and in higher costs, expressed in the Canadian dollar.

I wish to submit that there is no national emergency at the present time. Our fighting forces are home from the front; they have been brought back and they have been disbanded and dispersed. They have found gainful occupation. Our great industrial machine which for five or six years was devoted to the manufacture of the munitions of war has been dismantled and dissolved. Many parts have been sold. The people who worked so valiantly, the men and women, the boys and girls, to produce munitions which were so essential to victory have taken up other activities and are now engaged in peaceful occupations.

I have here the whole story, but I am not going to worry you, Mr. Speaker, with all the details. I know that when I have completed this enumeration some hon. gentleman opposite will say that that is evidence of a wise and beneficent government, that it is evidence of the good administration that Canada is enjoying today. I do not wish to be disagreeable, but I believe that the prosperity which is ours today is ours despite the administration and despite its many errors.

Let us take bank clearings as an example. Bank clearings were greater in 1946 than they were in 1945. In the first two months of this year, 1947, they were even greater than they were in the first two months of last year. That is true of the combined bank clearings of Toronto and Montreal. Reports for the rest of the country are not yet available for the first two months of this year. Take bank deposits; they were greater in 1946 than they were in 1945. Take company earnings. Last year they were greater than they were in 1945. Take employment; it was higher in 1946 than it was in 1945.

Mr. KNOWLES: And so is the cost of living.

Mr. HACKETT: Yes. Take unemployment insurance; and I have the figures here somewhere if I can find them, which were published in this morning's press. This shows that the jobless insurance fund shows big gains. It says:

> Canada's unemployment insurance fund increased by more than $4 million in February, and payments made to unemployed workers "were considerably lower than in the same months last year," the unemployment insurance commission announced today.

Then they give the figures as approaching some $400 million in the coffers of that enterprise.

Mr. MARTIN: All of which adds up to good government.

Mr. HACKETT: May I say to the hon. gentleman opposite that the point I am talking to is not good government; it is not dollars and cents. The point I am talking to is the tendency of the government to destroy confederation, to trample on the rights of the provinces and to dissolve that partnership which was entered into eighty years ago. That is the point to which I am talking, and that is the point which has brought to a focus the disagreement in this family of nations which make up the Canadian people. It is that spirit to which the hon. gentleman has given utterance which threatens the very solidarity of our country.

I go on: foreign trade was greater last year than it was the year before; production was greater; carloadings were more numerous last year than the year before. I am aware that hon. gentlemen will say, "Oh, yes, but we have done these things." I admit that they have happened while the hon. gentlemen were in office. But again I would point out that if wisdom, if prudence, if respect for the lessons of the past counted with the cabinet as we hope it will always count with those who occupy the treasury benches, their demeanour in the matter under discussion would have been entirely different.

The government says there is a national emergency; it presents as evidence of the fact a list of the articles which are still under control. I do not wish to be amusing; I turn to the items covering ladies wear. It is a long list, but it hardly creates a national emergency. I might turn to some agricultural implements that it is well that farmers should have. I might even condole with my dear friend the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), who votes with me even when I am wrong, and say that I regret that he cannot now sell his old automobile at a high price since it was removed from control yesterday; but, Mr. Speaker, when we speak of a national emergency we are speaking of something that threatens the very life, the existence of the country. We are not speaking of some petty, puny, paltry expedient that may be resorted to to maintain a party in power or to meet the whim of some leader powerful in that party.

Mr. Speaker, the emergency which justifies the trampling under foot of a country's constitution is not a petty thing; it is something that is overwhelming; it is something that threatens the life and the soul of a nation. This long list of sundry conveniences and requirements laid on the table to-day does not represent the type of emergency that justifies the suspension of the constitution. Nothing less than the crushing hoofs of the horses of the Apocalypse, something like flood, famine, pestilence or war, can constitute a national emergency. Nothing else can justify the action the government has outlined in this bill. No such emergency is established by the list of petty wants offered to a sorrowing house late yesterday afternoon.

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): I have waited a long time, weeks now, to have an opportunity to present a few words on the subject matter under debate today, as to whether economic controls should be allowed to lapse or whether they should be continued. Like the genial hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault), who spoke a few moments ago, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) has taken more props from under our feet during the very time that we are debating the matter of continuing these controls.

This afternoon I listened attentively to able arguments by two of my hon. friends from the Progressive Conservative party. Personally I am happy to hear their policies so keenly expounded, even though their policies are not looked on by myself or my party with the greatest favour. I should like to say to the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) who argued, as no doubt a brilliant lawyer should, the case for discontinuance of controls on the ground of provincial autonomy, whatever that may happen to mean in a lawyer's vocabulary, that it seems to me it is a term which has been used to cover almost any legislation that he may want to oppose when he has no other reason to do so.

In suggesting that controls be discontinued, the hon. member for Stanstead made reference to the fact that we have not in this country an emergency such as that of war or of flood or of pestilence. The hon. gentleman with his background differs considerably with me because of mine. While in his own circle of acquaintances when there is not a war there may not be any emergency, I must say that during my upbringing from a child my family and my friends have always lived in a state of economic emergency from day to day. I think that is as important in their lives as is a state of war in the life of a nation. When that third or that half of a nation is facing daily calamities that are as serious to them as war is to a nation, to argue provincial autonomy to evade our responsibility is, in spite of the brilliance of the argument, an utter evasion of the case.

I was impressed by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), whose address is always interesting, and I wish to refer to one or two of the remarks he made. For example, in referring to my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), who spoke yesterday and referred to cut-throat competition and monopoly exploitation, the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario attempted to show that these two terms were contradictory to one another; that it was impossible to have cut-throat competition on the one hand and monopoly exploitation from the same source. I would point out to my hon. friend that while the two things may not be simultaneous they are definitely consecutive in the scheme of economics as it exists under what is called private enterprise. Undoubtedly, when capitalism had its beginnings, there was a form of competition. In its early stages, markets were limitless and there was no need for other than healthy competition as between producers. As I say, there were markets. As the markets became restricted, however, there was for those who wished to exist in the competitive field the need either to restrict their activities or to eliminate those who competed with them; so we stepped from competition to cut-throat competition; and, as more and more throats were cut, eventually we reached the stage where those who remained had a monopoly of the field. That monopoly has existed at various times and in various forms, resulting in exploitation, so that while perhaps simultaneously cut-throat competition and monopoly exploitation are opposite terms, nevertheless one follows from the other.

The hon. member stated also that it was a favourite saying of those who cast aspersions on private enterprise, that a man who risks capital is a parasite. I would go farther than that. According to the modern practice of capitalism, I would say that the man who risks capital is not a parasite but a sucker. I am going to try to illustrate my meaning, and I will do so by means of certain references to events that have taken place more or less recently.

I will give two examples and try to authenticate them by reference to the proper documents. Let me give one from my own province, because that is not so generally known in this part of the world. I will read certain questions and answers from the proceedings of the Saskatchewan legislature of Tuesday, March 18, 1947, to indicate what I mean with reference to risk capital:

Mr. Feeley asked the government the following question, which was answered by the Hon. Mr. Phelps:

(1) Did the Saskatchewan government invest any money in a briquetting plant at Bienfait? If so, when and how much was so invested?

Answer: Yes. 1918-1924, $267,500.

(2) What was the total cost of the said plant?

Answer: Under agreement, 25 per cent of the cost was paid by the Saskatchewan government, amounting to $267,500, 50 per cent of the cost by the federal government, and 25 per cent of the cost by the Manitoba government, bringing the total cost to $1,070,000.

(3) Was any of the money invested by the Saskatchewan government repaid?

Answer: No.

(4) Was any interest paid by the Saskatchewan government on account of above investment?

Answer: No.

(5) Has the property been sold? If so, when was it sold?

Answer: Yes. April 22, 1927.

(6) To whom was it sold, and how much did the Saskatchewan government receive from proceeds of its sale?

Answer: Charles Gathorne Ashwin for the sum of $1.

I would say that under such circumstances the man who risks capital is definitely a sucker. Let me give another example. I wish to read from the statement made by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe) on Canadair Limited, delivered on Thursday, March 20, 1947. The minister said, in part, as reported at page 1542 of Hansard:

During 1946, the Electric Boat Company, a substantial American corporation, became interested in the Cartierville project. This company, with large financial resources, had examined carefully into Canadian economic conditions, and became convinced that it could wisely and profitably engage some of its liquid capital in Canada. After extensive negotiations, Electric Boat Company acquired substantially all of the stock of Canadair Limited, and has entered into an agreement with the Canadian government, effective as of September 14, 1946, covering the crown facilities, contracts, etc., at Cartierville.

I have quoted there from the statement of the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply wherein, on behalf of the government of Canada, he leased to a United States concern, the Electric Boat Company, a property which cost the federal government approximately $22 million, the lease to run a maximum of fifteen years. The rental during that period was at the rate of $200,000 a year. The Electric Boat Company, during the life of the lease, had the option of buying the entire business of this aircraft factory at a price which varied, in the first year, from one-quarter of its capital cost, to one-eighth during the fifteenth year. Along with that, the Canadian government gave contracts to the Electric Boat Company, this United States concern, for $28,000,000 worth of aircraft for Trans-Canada Air Lines and for the Department of National Defence. The sum of $2,000,000 was invested in this particular instance by the Electric Boat Company, according to the statement of the Minister of Reconstruction, and the Electric Boat Company is to provide Canadair Limited with $2,000,000 of working capital.

Here we have an instance of a private corporation, not even a Canadian corporation but one in another country, setting up as a going concern in a factory which now has 7,400 employees on the payroll, at a rate of rental for an equipped factory—one of the most modern in the world, I presume, since it has had a successful record in the production of aircraft in the war—a rate which is one-eighth of what the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) told this house repeatedly last year was considered an economic rent for a tenant of national housing.

Why do I bring these matters up in this debate on the question whether or not economic controls should be allowed to lapse? I wish to give the Liberal party every credit for what it did in the war emergency, not because it wished to do so, but because it was forced by circumstances to adopt a form of economic planning which I believe the laisser-faire Liberal will admit was contrary to his best normal inclinations. It stepped into the field of controlling the economy of Canada because it was felt necessary by such gentlemen as the present Minister of Justice, to whom I wish to pay every tribute for the job he did. May I say that I believe the country has always paid the right hon. gentleman the tribute to which he is entitled.

Under pressure of war emergency the Liberal government did something which I say was foreign to its true instincts, that of managing the economy of this country. Certainly it would be opposed to the instincts of my hon. friends to my right, and I believe it is contrary to the expressed instincts of my hon. friends to my left. There is only one party in this House of Commons which believes that the government did adopt a policy which should be used in every crisis, provincial autonomy or other arguments notwithstanding. I believe there are constitutional means of coming to an agreement, so that whenever there is a crisis, whatever its nature, those things can be done which must be done for the welfare of our people. I say the government did a good job by adopting controls, a measure which, as I say, was against its normal inclination to undertake. There was no successful alternative, as it felt and as we agree, to meet the crisis in Canada as a nation. The controls which were instituted as a result of that war emergency were, shall we say, reasonably equitable to most of Canada and to most of its people. I say reasonably so, because proper economic control cannot be combined with a major retention of the profit motive. However, as I say, with that one fly in the ointment, the government stepped into the control picture. Of course adjustments were made from time to time, based on the pressure techniques that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, labour unions, federations of agriculture, housewives, consumers' leagues and others may have been able to employ. The amount of success that their pressure was able to give to their own group depended a good deal, I would say, on the general attitude of the government to matters respecting social welfare.

There were some good results. We developed a form of labour relations, I think, under national supervision. Again, of course, the hon. member for Stanstead will say, "in opposition to the needs of provincial autonomy" but it was something which we used in a national emergency. There was a form of extension of unionization and collective bargaining which did bring a somewhat closer relationship between wages and the cry for a minimum standard of wages. I say, however, that the government was not entirely sincere in that—and I am not saying that in an unfair way at all—because the dominion government's own pay sheets were not always in accord with the various minimum standards of wages set up by the provinces. The federal government used the fact that it was a sovereign body in order to avoid its obligations and, as nearly as I can tell, is doing so at the present time.

For example, in my own city of Regina, as a result of complaints brought to my attention, I questioned the government with respect to rates of pay at the Regina ordnance depot, and the answer given with regard to conditions there at December 31, 1946, was as follows. One question was, "How many, if any, of the civilians employed at the Regina ordnance depot in October, November or December, 1946, received pay at a rate below the Saskatchewan minimum wage of $18.50 a week?" If the Liberal party is to be fair with respect to planning for proper wages for the people of Canada, it should certainly be a fair employer itself. However, the answer to this question was that in the Regina ordnance depot there were three employees of the federal government receiving less than $18.50 a week.

I asked this further question, "In what employment classification, if any, were wages being paid below the rates recommended to the civil service commission?"

There is a practice, as you know, Mr. Speaker, that wages paid by government departments or on government contracts are supposed to bear some relationship to the going wage in the area in which the work is being done. With regard to the Regina ordnance depot, certain recommendations were made to the civil service commission that certain people be given wages which corresponded to the going wage in the area; yet twenty-three employees at that ordnance depot, which employed 370 employees, received wages below what was recommended as being the going wages for the district: three clerks, grade 1-A; one typist, grade 1; three clerks, grade 2; one clerk, grade 3; thirteen packers and helpers; one storeman, technical stores; one stenographer, grade 3. So I say that the federal government, in spite of being forced into a position where control over a labour condition was assumed by it, in hiring its own help did not live up to the obligations which it imposed on the rest of the Canadian economy.

This is another good result that I should like to say came from this controls programme forced on the government. There is now, and has been for a year or so, a form of orderly marketing of some farm products, with floor prices until 1950. I do not intend to reopen the debate on floor prices; but when I think of floor prices I am reminded of what one of my friends out west said when he made reference to the fact that wheat is now somewhere around $3 a bushel on the international market and our floor price is $1.55. He said, "Sir, you certainly got a floor, not upstairs but away down in the basement." With that I can agree. But our farmers generally are favourable to the idea of orderly marketing at assured prices, and hope and beg that such controls as are necessary to give the producers the prices they require in view of what they must pay for the things they buy may be retained or reinstituted. That is what is meant by parity prices, and "parity prices" is a slogan you will hear a great deal more often from now on. You will hear it not just from the farmers of my province, who know something about the general meaning of the phrase and who have suffered because there has not been parity; you will hear it from other classes of society in this country who also want parity.

Our consumer prices were kept in hand fairly well during the war and until the last couple of months, and for that I congratulate the government. But I say they are making a mess of things right now. They do not believe in controls; they admit they are going to give us a form of orderly decontrol. Heaven help us if it is any less orderly than at present, because now it is almost a rout. Yesterday the price of sugar went up one cent, and the price of gasoline is quoted at a cent higher as of yesterday or today. It went up two and a half cents in Regina. We are also threatened with increased freight rates. If we want to retain the capitalist system after the lessons taught by the war we have just gone through, when we found that by putting our social house in order we could provide fair distribution for goods in short supply, not just to those who could afford to go to the black market or those who had the largest number of tickets in the form of dollars; if we feel it is just too bad that the poor children cannot get milk at ten cents a quart; if in order to obtain diapers for our babies we have to receive them in parcels from Great Britain, a country which is rationing its own supplies and which is being looked upon with considerable disfavour because it is attempting a new social order, and that because there is not enough profit in manufacturing baby clothes in this country to give manufacturers an incentive to supply our own people; if we just want to let things drift away planlessly, we should support hon. gentlemen to the right, or those across the way. They offer no other course but drifting.

The other day I read a description of free enterprise which, in view of what I have told the house this afternoon, seems rather apt. Free enterprise was likened by a labour leader in this country to an ocean. Those who believed in free enterprise said to all the people, "Now, we will throw you all into the ocean. Those who are worthy will reach the shore because they will have the strength to persevere; those who are inefficient will perish." I want to give a little quotation from the remarks of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), as reported at page 1772 of Hansard:

> . . . one of the greatest virtues of the whole system of free enterprise is that those who are inefficient disappear. If they cannot hold their own and render service to the people at reasonable prices—

I want to be fair, so I continue the quotation:

> —it is soon found that someone else takes their place and their business.

Mr. JACKMAN: I would just direct attention to the fact that the latter part of that quotation obviously refers to businesses; and I think the fact that inefficient businesses do disappear under the free enterprise system is a good deal like having white corpuscles in one's blood stream, because they purify the stream.

Mr. PROBE: That is right; but let me finish my own little allegory. Free enterprise drops us into the sea of economic opportunity. The trouble is that certain people have weights tied to their legs. Others, perhaps through circumstances such as I mentioned in connection with the Electric Boat Company deal or the briquetting plant at Estevan, are given waterwings to help them swim to shore, or they may even be picked up by a good sized raft or a speed boat properly equipped with good old privileged capitalism. It is that form of capitalism to which I object, and it is for these reasons that I want the government not only to retain what feeble controls they now exercise, but to reinstitute those controls which have been removed.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I am rising for just a few minutes because of a statement made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) in reply to my colleague the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell). The hon. member mentioned that there were some 140,000 employees of the government, and the minister said the number was 135,000, according to the bureau of statistics. I do not want that statement to go unchallenged, because, according to a return I have here, the number of employees of the government of Canada, including employees of boards, commissions and corporations appointed by the federal authority, was 173,961 as of December 31, 1946.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this matter is entirely extraneous to the debate.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is not extraneous. My colleague was talking about the number of bureaucrats in the country, and so on, and I want to get this straight.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman will admit that we are on the second reading of the omnibus bill, which has nothing to do with the civil service.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It has everything to do with it, because the whole question is a matter of controls, and the number of people in the employ of the government has a great deal to do with those controls. The statement made this afternoon should not be permitted to go out in that way, because I have the figures here. The monthly payment is $26,462,000, which would be at the rate of $317,544,045 a year. I do not want to take up more time, but I want that statement corrected, as I think is my right.

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Secretary of State): With respect to the statement just made by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), I think I should point out that the figure he has just mentioned represents payment not only to civil servants but to employees of crown companies and commissions, and that the figure mentioned is very much larger than the amount paid to civil servants only.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not talking about civil servants; I am talking about the people in the employ of the government of Canada. That is what the people of this country are interested in.

Mr. E. D. FULTON (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, thus far the debate seems to have been largely devoted to a discussion of free enterprise or free initiative economy as against a system of government controlled or planned economy. As was pointed out earlier by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell), hon. members of the C.C.F. have taken the position that when we speak of returning to a free economy, a system of free enterprise, we in the official opposition envisage the sort of laissez-faire economy which prevailed in the nineteenth century, and which undoubtedly had its worst development in the nineteen-thirties.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario pointed out this afternoon that we do not mean that kind of economy at all. We do, however, mean the type of economy under which freedom of initiative can be given full play, rather than one under which initiative would be hampered by excessive government controlling and government planning. The type of unrestricted monopolistic capitalism to which the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. Probe) referred is not the type of free enterprise we have in mind at all. But after what has been said, if hon. members in the C.C.F., for whatever reasons they may have, refuse to believe that we do not mean a laissez-faire capitalism, then of course we cannot force them to believe it. It is rather wasting their own time and the time of the house, however, to state with no better foundation than their own desire to believe it, that we wish to go back to that type of economy.

In my subsequent remarks I shall devote some attention to the type of system we have in mind when we use the expression "free enterprise." At the moment, however, may I refer to the statement made last night by the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply (Mr. Howe), because I believe that statement typifies completely what, for want of a better term, I would call the bureaucratic frame of mind.

The minister's statement is found at page 1957 of Hansard, as follows:

> Hon. gentlemen seem to think that, after some six years of controls administered by the government, it is now necessary for various members of the opposition groups to examine each item of control and give their opinion on whether the government is doing the right thing or not

In this sentence the minister, by implication at any rate, indicated that it is not proper or necessary, or even perhaps desirable, for us to examine these measures.

Mr. HOWE: Would the hon. member please finish the sentence? He has used only part of it.

Mr. FULTON: I intend to do so. The minister went on to say:

> It seems to me that the government which has had experience over six years in the administration of controls should be capable of deciding the appropriate time to abandon them.

That is the end of that particular quotaiton. It might seem to the minister that that should be the case; it might seem to the house that that should be so. But the point at issue is that apparently the government does not know the best time or method to remove controls. And, further, whether that is so or not, it is surely the function of the opposition to assist the government in arriving at that decision. That is one of the things for which we have an opposition, one of the reasons we have debate and free discussion in the House of Commons. Unless we are to adopt the principles that we should abandon elections, abandon responsible government, and abandon the system we follow of allowing people to make up their minds and express their views as to the manner in which they should be governed—unless, as I say, we are prepared to change our principles, then when we come to this House of Commons it is our duty to tell ministers, whether they have been here for six years or sixteen years, whether we think they are administering the affairs of the country in the best possible way. It is not in keeping with the traditions—may I put it in that way?—which have given this country democratic government in the past, for ministers to indicate that others' opinions, honestly held, are of no value, that in any event they will not be regarded, and that they should not be expressed.

I use those words because I think the following expression of the minister last night indicated what he had in mind. He went on to say:

> Therefore I would urge that this session be not prolonged by debate that can have no real effect on the situation.

Surely that indicates only one thing, that the government has come to the house with its mind made up, with a closed mind, and is in the mental attitude where it will refuse to accept any suggestion, however much thought has been given to it, or however much real value it may have.

Mr. MUTCH: That is ridiculous.

Mr. FULTON: If my hon. friend can put any other construction upon it he will have an opportunity to do so. During the course of the debate I should like to hear what his construction is.

Mr. HOWE: May I ask the hon. member a question? After six weeks of debate on this particular bill, what effect has the debate had, to date?

Mr. JACKMAN: It took off a lot of controls yesterday.

Mr. FULTON: I would mention the categories of goods which were removed from controls yesterday. There is, of course, a good deal of force to the argument which has been put forward by members on this side of the house, that it is difficult to deal with this bill because there are fifty-seven measures involved. We would like to have that changed. Then in committee we may make more suggestions with regard to these fifty-seven measures. It seems to me immaterial, in a sense, whether we have to sit here until next December before we finish the bill if, when we get through with it, even in only one respect it is a better bill than it was when it first came before the house. That will be the object of the opposition.

Mr. HOWE: That is a high price to pay.

Mr. FULTON: We have only a few minutes left for discussion this afternoon, and I should like to bring up one other matter before moving the adjournment of the debate.

We have heard a good deal about bureaucrats. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario referred to the functioning of government officials—he did not use the word "bureaucrats"—the way in which these controls involve supervision and constant snooping. We have heard statements as to the number of these officials required, if there is to be a thoroughgoing system of controls. All these things open the way for great abuses. And, as was suggested by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, not only do they have a tendency to make criminals of those citizens affected—because we all resent controls—but we have in the act a type of provision which has the effect of depriving a man of the benefit of that doubt which, under our criminal law, results in an accused person's being presumed innocent until he is proven guilty.

We also find it necessary to protect controllers against what would otherwise be the legal consequences of their acts. For instance, we find this in section 15 of the order in council setting up the wartime prices and trade board:

> No member of the board and no administrator or other person employed or appointed by the board or acting on behalf of or under authority of the board shall be or become liable to any person for or in respect of any act or omission of himself or any other person in the exercise or purported exercise of any power, discretion or authority or in the performance or purported performance of any duty conferred or imposed by or under these regulations.

And so on. So that those people have complete protection for their otherwise wrongful acts.

That brings to mind a case which has arisen this afternoon. I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), or perhaps both of them, if they would care to throw light on this particular case, one which concerns the activities of some of the officials of the wartime prices and trade board. It is a case which shows that not only do these controls tend to make criminals of citizens affected, but they tend sometimes to make criminals of those who find these unusual opportunities for abuse placed in their hands. It is reported from Montreal this afternoon that a lawyer, an official of the wartime prices and trade board, along with another man has been arrested because he had received at least $1,000 as a bribe for issuing blank accommodation rate cards for hotel rooms. It appears that this official is in charge of hotel accommodation rates for one district in Montreal and that he was caught in the act of delivering these blank rate cards to a certain hotel in the Windsor street district. The hotelkeeper apparently informed as to what was going on and the information which we have and which the press has is that at least $1,000 in marked money changed hands in one particular transaction in that connection. I understand that these men are to be arraigned, if they have not already been arraigned, and will be charged early next week.

That is an indication of the extent to which abuses can creep in and are creeping into the administration of these controls. It is possibly an inevitable consequence when you expand your administrative or controlling force as must be done with widespread measures of control such as we have had in this country. I wonder if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) would care to say something this afternoon about that situation, because I think it is of vital importance to the country. Perhaps it is not fair to introduce it just before six o'clock without giving him some opportunity to make an explanation. If it is the wish of the right hon. gentleman and it meets with the feelings of the house I suggest that I be allowed to adjourn the debate now, and the minister could make a short statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no information about the facts; this is the first information I have had.

Mr. FULTON: May I be permitted then to adjourn the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ST. LAURENT moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: When we meet again on April 14 the first order of government business will be the motion to go into supply, not for the purpose of dealing with supply, but for the purpose of opening up two departments and giving hon. members, if they have any matters that they consider of sufficient importance to take up the time of the house, an opportunity of raising such matters.

Mr. KNOWLES: Do not make that invitation too wide.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I will repeat what I said before, that I would like to trust to the feeling of responsibility of hon. members not to take up unnecessarily the time of the house when there is so much urgent legislation to be dealt with. I feel sure that hon. members will feel that sense of responsibility.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m., until Monday, April 14.
