Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I join with the other speakers who have preceded me in adding my congratulations to Mr. Speaker and Mr. Deputy Speaker for the resounding vote of confidence which they received in being elected to preside over our deliberations. I commend the government for nominating a member of the official opposition for the post of Deputy Speaker. I hope that this will constitute a precedent for future parliaments. I wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and to commend them for the manner in which they have discharged their duties. I am sure their constituents are proud of their performance.

This first session of the twenty-ninth parliament finds the House of Commons meeting in a most sensitive situation. The recent election resulted in a stalemate in which no party has been given a clear mandate to govern. Consequently, this is a parliament of minorities. This House has two options, either to bring about an immediate election or to attempt to work out government by consensus. I want to opt for the latter course because I believe that a parliament of minorities constitutes a challenge to the statesmanship of all the parties and to every member of this House.

In my opinion, there are two compelling reasons why an immediate election would probably not solve our problem. The first is that the vast majority of Canadians do not want an immediate election if it can be avoided. Early in December I sent out a questionnaire to every householder in my constituency. While the returns are still coming in, of the many thousands that have been received, less than 10 per cent gave it as their opinion that an immediate election should be held. Interestingly enough, on the question as to which of the major parties they would like to see form the minority government, 35 per cent plus a fraction favoured a Conservative minority government, 35 per cent plus a decimal fraction favoured a Liberal minority government and 28 per cent and a decimal fraction had no preference whatsoever.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They couldn't tell the difference.

Mr. Douglas: The second reason I think an immediate election would not solve our problem is that there is no assurance whatsoever that if an election were held in the next two or three months, the results would be substantially different from what they are at the present time. There might be a different political party with a slight numerical majority, but I doubt very much if any party would have a clear majority in the House of Commons.

We ought to reconcile ourselves to the fact that we are likely to have a multi-party House of Commons for many years to come. It is significant that in the past 15 years we had only two majority governments and four minority governments. Some members might yearn for a return to the two-party system, but the returns from the last election indicate we are not going to have this for some time. We had the two-party system from confederation to 1921, with the exception of some independent and farm members who were elected from time to time, but the two-party system broke down in the 1920's. It broke down because both the Liberal and Conservative parties did not represent any fundamental difference in political philosophy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Because both of them spoke for the privileged groups of Canada, most of the elections were fought on the basis of racial, regional and religious differences. That was responsible for most of the national disunity we find in this country today.

In the 1920's we began to see the break-up of the two-party system. In 1921 we saw the emergence of the Progressive party, the United Farmers of Alberta and the Independent Labour Party, all of which were represented in the House of Commons at that time. In 1935 the CCF sent its first contingent to parliament. That party, and the New Democratic Party which succeeded it, has continued to secure an increasing measure of electoral support. It may well be that the day will come when there will be a political realignment in Canada and we will develop a two-party system such as has been developed in many other democratic countries. When that time comes, it will be a two-party system based on an ideological polarization with the parties representing on the one hand those who desire to retain the present corporate controlled society and, on the other hand, those who desire to establish social democracy in Canada. In the meantime, we must face the situation as it is and reconcile ourselves to the fact that we have a multi-party system and that it does reflect the views of the people who sent us here. Minority governments may be uncomfortable and inconvenient for politicians, but they do reflect the views of the voters and they challenge us to make parliamentary democracy work in the present situation.

In a recent editorial, the editor of the Ottawa Citizen wrote, and I quote:

> Minority government is a nightmare for civil servants. It is hell for politicians. But it can really be quite good for people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Government by consensus may present some difficulties, but it also provides some significant advantages. It means that whatever government is in office must be more sensitive to public opinion and more responsive to public need. Whatever the problems of this parliament, they are in many ways better than the arrogant government we faced in the last parliament which turned a deaf ear to every plea and showed a callous disregard toward the most glaring needs of many Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Government by consensus makes possible the opportunity for better and more progressive legislation. No government is the sole repository of all wisdom. If a parliament of minorities makes it possible to amend legislation or reject legislation if the majority of the members so decide, this is all to the good. In the final analysis, members of this House are accountable to their constituents. If the majority of them are dissatisfied with legislation, it is a safe assumption that this represents the views of the people who elected them.

Some of the most advanced legislation placed on the statute books has emerged from parliaments in which no party had a clear majority. The Mackenzie King minority administration in the 1920's produced such things as old age pension legislation, reduction in tariffs, adjustments in freight rates and long overdue legislation to deal with grain deliveries in western Canada. The Conservative administration, headed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), in 1957-58 was much more progressive and forward looking than the administration which he headed from 1958 to 1962 when he had the largest majority of any government in the history of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The late Right Hon. L. B. Pearson headed a minority government in 1963 and again in 1965. Those two parliaments produced such legislation as medicare, the Canada Pension Plan, the Canada Assistance Plan, the National Labour Code, the new broadcasting act and a distinctive national flag.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I am not suggesting that minority government is an ideal situation, but I do contend that it is not a disaster. It can result in beneficial legislation which represents a consensus of the convictions held by members of this House.

The Progressive Conservative members have been highly critical of the position taken by the New Democratic Party in refusing to defeat the government in this debate on the motion in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The members of the New Democratic Party have, after very careful consideration, decided unanimously to follow the logical course of giving to whichever party had the largest number of seats in the House an opportunity to present its program to the House of Commons with the clear reservation that if the legislation which was presented failed to live up to its advance billings, they would vote against the government. I was disappointed by the frenzied attack which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) made on the leader of this party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). The Leader of the Opposition revealed a hunger for office which fails to take account of political realities. He wants us to put him and his colleagues on the treasury benches despite the fact that they failed to get a mandate from the electorate, and that, if anything, their policies with respect to such issues as unemployment, economic growth, price stability and pensions are even more vague than those of the government.

• (1450)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: If the Progressive Conservative party had secured more votes than the Liberals, and secured more seats in this House, we would have given them the same opportunity to present their program as we are now giving to the Liberal party. And if the Progressive Conservative party is called upon to form a government during this parliament we shall give them the same opportunity as we are now giving to the present government, that is, the right to present their program and show whether or not they intend to put that program into effect.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then, the Liberals will be saying nasty things about us.

Mr. Douglas: The taunts of some Conservative members are really unworthy of them. The Leader of the Opposition said the other day:

A marriage of convenience has been arranged between the two parties, a union achieved by cynicism on the one hand and by sheer fright on the other.

Mr. Nowlan: Right on.

Mr. Douglas: I want to tell the Leader of the Opposition that I am neither cynical nor frightened. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) says the Liberal government sits there by the grace of the New Democratic Party. Need I remind him that in 1963, when the Social Credit party moved a motion of no confidence based on a motion calling for debt-free money which was supported by that agile chameleon known as the Liberal party, the New Democrats voted against it and kept the right hon. gentleman in office for a few more weeks. It is true that some time later we supported a no-confidence motion when it became apparent that the government was disintegrating from within, because they had not only failed to secure any organic agreement with any other party they had failed to establish agreement within the cabinet itself. This is why it collapsed.

In the course of this debate several hon. members, in particular the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) talked of the NDP being "in bed" with the Liberals.

An hon. Member: Must be hard up indeed!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas: I want to ask hon. members in the Conservative party whether, if, by the fortunes of war, they were occupying the treasury benches—and they might well do so in the coming months—would they expect us to vote against a Speech from the Throne presented by them merely because we were frightened the Liberals would taunt us by saying we were in bed with the Tories?

Mr. Basford: No answer at all from over there.

Mr. Douglas: We have a much more serious task before us in the House of Commons than to play partisan political games. So if parliamentary democracy is to work, we must demonstrate to the country that parliament is capable of governing. In our opinion this means giving to the party with the largest number of seats and votes an opportunity to present its program and sufficient time for it to be determined whether that program will be reflected in specific legislation and effective fiscal measures. If the measures promised in the Speech from the Throne fail to materialize we reserve the right to vote the present government out of office.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert has drawn attention to the Prime Minister's statement that if this government is defeated on some fundamental issue he reserves the right to go to the country. But the NDP has made clear its belief that whatever the constitutional position may be the Prime Minister has a moral obligation, in the event of being defeated, to ask the Governor General to call upon the Leader of the Opposition to form a government. The constitutional right of the Prime Minister to ask for dissolution would apply whether his government were defeated on the issue of the Speech from the Throne or on any other matter which he considers to be a question of confidence. Ever since the controversy between Mackenzie King and Lord Byng it is doubtful that any Governor General would refuse to grant dissolution to any Prime Minister. The question is not really an argument about constitutional rights; it is one concerning moral obligations, and it should be remembered that in the final analysis the last word will lie with the Canadian voters. I am convinced that if the present government is defeated during this session, asks for dissolution and goes to the country without recommending that the Leader of the Opposition be called upon to form a government, the voters will make their views known in no uncertain terms.

May I turn, now, to the Speech from the Throne? This document represents the greatest about-face in Canadian history. It contains many laudable and desirable national objectives. But most of all it demonstrates that a kick at one end of the spine can have a most stimulating effect upon the other end.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: At long last the government recognizes that unemployment exists. Before the election, the Prime Minister couldn't see any unemployed—only frauds and cheats. He spent much of his time blaming the unemployed for being out of work and telling them there were plenty of jobs. The government has learned, somewhat belatedly, that the cost of living is increasing at a fantastic rate. Before the election the Prime Minister was saying it was good for the farmers and the Minister of Finance blamed rising food prices on the weather. This comes well from a government which, only a few short years ago, was paying farmers not to grow wheat, with the result that today we face a shortage—last year, too, they paid farmers to kill chickens, with the result that there is now a shortage of eggs. Apparently they do not realize you must have chickens in order to get eggs.

Mr. Whelan: We have enough eggs, too. Don't kid yourself.

Mr. Douglas: In his speech of penitence, the Prime Minister said that although the government had made mistakes they were not sins of omission. He is wrong. The wrath of the Canadian people was not directed against the government's mistakes. All governments make mistakes. It was directed against the fact that the government ignored the plight of many Canadians and showed a callous indifference to their sufferings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Members opposite are only practising self-deception when they talk, now, about an English backlash or find some other excuse. The real test of the Speech from the Throne will lie in the answer to this question: what realistic measures will the government take to reach some of the admirable goals it has outlined. Two policy areas are designated to receive major concern. The first has to do with economic policy and the second with social policy. I shall deal with economic policy briefly. The first of these declared intentions is to expand job opportunities. We welcome these measures but I believe it can be said that some of them are too late, and also that they are too little.

• (1500)

The minister said we will not have the final decision in respect of approving many of the projects under the Local Initiatives Program until January 19. How much time will that give those who are sponsoring these programs to provide for jobs? The program of winter works to assist provinces and municipalities was announced the middle of December. The premiers asked for that program as far back as August and the Mayors and Municipalities Association asked for it last June. Any premier or mayor of a city will tell you that if they are to have any work and wages program for sewage disposal plants or do any kind of public works they will need several months in which to prepare their plans, call for tenders and allot contracts. The program is not only late, it is too little. The Local Initiatives Program involves $165 million, but the minister says the number of applications would cost $400 million. This means that more than half of the projects will have to be thrown out. The winter works program, which is part loan and part grant is to be $350 million spread over three winters. Only about $60 million to $70 million will be available for this winter. For the province of British Columbia the allocation for the three year period is $37.3 million. Vancouver Island alone would need $37.3 million if it is going to have over three winters an adequate working wages plan that will put people to work. It is not that there is a lack of work. When you think of the millions we are spending in handouts to corporations and think, on the other hand that there are very large cities in Canada which are putting inadequately treated human sewage into rivers, lakes and coastal waters and the price we will have to pay to clean up this pollution in the future, there should be no difficulty in finding projects and no difficulty in finding the necessary money to put these projects into effect.

The second program the government discusses is that it is going to promote stable economic growth.

An hon. Member: It better not smell.

Mr. Douglas: The Prime Minister said the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) would discuss this. I listened to both those gentlemen very carefully and they told us in turn that we would have to wait until we heard the budget. In the Minister of Finance's speech I gathered that the government is still committed to the belief that grants to corporations and accelerated writeoffs are the answer. I say this policy has already failed, failed demonstrably and failed dismally. What this country needs are fiscal measures to redistribute income and to provide increased purchasing power to the low income group so as to increase aggregate demand. Unless the government moves in this direction all its talk about promoting economic growth will be a mirage.

The third area of the government's economic policy has to do with reasonable price stability. Again, I listened to the Minister of Finance very carefully. He eloquently depicted the dire consequences of rising prices, as though that were needed, since every person is feeling the pinch of rising prices. He failed completely to prescribe any solution or indicate any definite measures the government is going to take to promote price stability. The only proposal the government has put forward either in the speeches of the minister or in the Speech from the Throne was the appointment of a joint committee on food prices. This could turn out to be nothing more than a stalling device.

Members of the last parliament will recall the joint committee we had on consumer prices. It was appointed on March 15, 1966 and reported to the House on April 25, 1967. To the best of my recollection the report was never debated and never passed. I suggest that a joint committee will be a useful exercise in getting some information for members, but such a committee has neither the time, the expertise nor access to the books of food processing companies and chain stores to get the kind of information necessary. In addition, it is difficult to study food prices in isolation. The price the farmer gets for food can only be considered in the light of what he is paying for his machinery, the interest rate he has to pay on his mortgage and the price he must pay for the supplies he purchases.

We in this party have been advocating for several years that what we ought to do is establish a prices review board with authority to examine the books of various companies and to ascertain which price increases are unwarranted. Such a board ought to be armed with the legislative authority to stop price increases where it finds they are unjustified and, where necessary, to roll them back. Only a prices review board would have the time and expertise to study all the relevant data which this House must have if we should decide later to move into some type of selective price controls.

The fourth area of economic policy referred to in the Speech from the Throne is the need to ensure that all regions benefit from prosperity. The government's announcement is that a conference is going to be held with the western provinces. This is a long overdue recognition of the need for building an economic base under the western economy. Such a conference could mean a great deal or it could be merely an exercise in futility. This conference will be meaningful only if the government of Canada is prepared through the Canada Development Corporation or through any of its other agencies to generate a large accumulation of capital to enable the western provinces to transform their raw materials into processed and finished products. British Columbia, as an example, has all the potential for a steel industry, for copper refining and smelting and for a shipbuilding industry. What it needs is the necessary capital generated and leadership given. If that comes out of this conference the conference will have been worthwhile.

Let me say in conclusion these few words. The Prime Minister says the government has made some mistakes. That makes it unanimous. We in this party are not granting the government a pardon but only a reprieve. Our vote is not a vote of confidence but it is a carefully considered decision to give the government an opportunity to demonstrate that the programs set out in the Speech from the Throne are more than a collection of pious hopes. This government has a chance, if it will take it, to show that it has learned some lessons from the election of October 30 by carrying out a series of dynamic programs to provide jobs, to promote economic growth and to provide a reasonable degree of price stability. At the same time, this House has a chance to show that parliamentary democracy can work by supporting the government when it delivers the goods and by changing it when it fails to do so. That is the challenge which faces the Twenty-ninth Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. H. T. Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, one of the real pleasures for me in my short time in this House has been the opportunity to meet the Speaker and watch him execute his onerous duties. Many of us could take a lesson from him in control and deportment. We are, indeed, very fortunate to have a man of his calibre among us. I extend my congratulations also to Mr. Deputy Speaker who has already demonstrated those qualities which are so essential to the efficient control of the House. I want to add my voice to the many sincere congratulations that have been offered to the mover and seconder of the address in reply. They have demonstrated the new approaches and abilities which are being brought into our deliberations.

• (1510)

I am particularly anxious to emphasize by repetition two paragraphs from the remarks of the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker). In reference to our two founding language groups, he stated:

> My colleagues and I from the province of Quebec have not come to this House of Commons to preside over or take part in any discussion as to the right of either language group to address itself to and to communicate with its federal government in the language of his choice. It is not a matter to be discussed. It is a matter of right.
> It is not a privilege to be accorded by one government or another, it is an absolute moral and legal right on the part of French Canadians, just as it is on the part of English Canadians, to make use of their language when communicating with this government.

Coming as I do from a county that is representative of both cultures, I have been pleased that the leader and members of my party have spoken out so strongly for the kind of Canada in which my family and I want to live. I cannot claim that the following words are original. However, I attach such importance to the subject that I am going to repeat them here.

The subject of national unity is treated by many members on the other side of the floor with cynicism and apparent distaste. It not only is a subject for active discussion, but must continue to be for as long as there remain bigots or those who try to divide our country.

We have, for as long as I can remember, tried to point out to "les Quebecois" that they did not need to fear English power, the English majority. The Quebecois have been encouraged to take their rightful place in the government of this country, helping to make decisions, whether they be matters of greater or lesser concern to the east, the west or the centre. We should not and we will not speak for the rights of one group if we cannot obtain the respect, the understanding and the active support of the rights of the other group.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herbert: As an individual, I am blessed with the opportunity to enjoy the best of our two cultures. My wife and I have many different points of view. We do not pretend that those differences do not exist by closing the door on discussion.

The members facing me must be naïve indeed—and I use an intentionally gentle expression—if they suggest that the question of separatism or the subject of language power is unique to the province of Quebec. Only this past week, most of you must have received the hate literature which stated that:

> We are essentially again in the throes of a second Papineau rebellion, the object of which is the establishment of French power in Ottawa.

My regret is that this subject appears to polarize along party lines. I plead with every true Canadian to treat all differing opinions and minority groups with the true respect and understanding that will enable everyone to live as real equals.

My county of Vaudreuil is surely as representative of the peoples of this country as any can be. The more affluent, the less affluent, the city businessman, the farmer, all enjoy living in a county bordered on one side by the picturesque, if polluted, Ottawa River and on the other by the mighty St. Lawrence. Those of sufficient means can enjoy golfing, yachting, tennis, curling and equestrian pursuits, including the colourful if controversial hunt. For others, their leisure time can be filled with swimming, skating, skiing, hockey, baseball, camping and the enjoyment of our parks and woods. Our sugar camps bring visitors from afar, including the United States. We in the county of Vaudreuil are fortunate to be able to fill our leisure time in a variety of ways not available to everyone in this country.

I have had the good fortune to travel in many lands and consider myself lucky to have been able to live or work in all the provinces. From the rugged east coast to the beautiful gardens of Vancouver Island, we surely have no difficulty in extolling the wonders of a country that has such a variety of scenery and ways of life to please every taste. The breathtaking beauty of the fall colours in Nova Scotia, Niagara, the Quebec winter carnival or the Calgary stampede, Lake Louise and the magnificent Rockies, in every province and territory we can speak with pride of our favourite and distinctly Canadian attractions.

I want to quote an extract from a publication of the federal office of tourism. It reads as follows:

> The more the traveller travels, the wider his horizons become. Travel brings people together, adding to each an understanding that wasn't there before, and making tourism a powerful agent for bridging the social gaps that exist within countries. We especially need this in a country as staggeringly vast as Canada, where regionalism and isolation would be problems even without the added differences of language and culture.
> Canada was born rich. We have a natural environment that's spectacular to look at, easy to live in, and a pleasure to visit. We have wilderness for outdoorsmen, water for swimmers and snow for skiers. We have cities to stimulate, culture to appreciate, and countryside to contemplate.

This is one excellent reason for claiming that our land is strong. This is why we should raise our heads with pride, because we have a product that we believe in and that we can go out and sell.

I want to speak for a few minutes on what some may consider the more practical side. More than 20 years ago my company was building low cost detached houses in Montreal that were selling for $8,500. Today in my county of Vaudreuil, well constructed three bedroom detached houses can be bought for less than $14,000. That is an annual price increase of less than 2 per cent.

I am aware of what has happened to construction wage rates, and for many trades the increases are fully deserved. Modern techniques tend to balance field labour cost increases and each year the problems of winter construction become less. The present rate of house construction is setting an all-time record, and the projections for industrial and commercial construction indicate a healthy construction industry through the rest of this decade. That does not suggest to me a weak economy.

In the Speech from the Throne we read of "encouragement to investors to make more money available to meet housing needs". This money must be available at reasonable interest rates and much of it must come from our banks. The relatively small amount of competition that exists in the Canadian banking system tends to make banking less efficient and interest rates higher than they need be. A ceiling on interest rates should be re-imposed. This move should encourage greater lending in the house mortgage field. We should also consider whether permissible dialogue between managers of different banks does not contravene the intent of the Combines Investigation Act.

I should like now to turn to the food industry. We have seen in the past years an increased efficiency in food production and retailing that has kept the average annual price increase below the increase in the cost of living index. During this period the corner grocery store has found it increasingly difficult to compete with the big chains, and I believe that a renewed effort must be made to help this type of small, family business. Efficiency and price level must not be the sole criteria for survival. The small enterprise is a cornerstone of our nation and the need to give these businesses special tax consideration is included in the proposals of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

However, there must not be any inference here that I have any sympathetic feelings toward the suggestion of the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) that we should increase the tax burden of the big corporations. Investors in large companies expect a reasonable return on their investment. If the tax load on the food retailing industry is increased, then automatically this increase will be passed on in prices and those who will suffer most will be the poor, those with low incomes. Or does the hon. member for York South suggest that along with the increased tax bite he would impose price controls? Naturally, while he is imposing price controls he would also introduce wage controls.

I trust he listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). I quote:

> I have been told by top leaders of management and labour right across the country that if the government introduces guidelines designed to keep the annual rise in prices to between 2½ per cent a year and 3 per cent a year, and makes it very clear that mandatory controls will be introduced if these guidelines are not obeyed, both management and labour will have no alternative but to obey these guidelines.

Did the hon. member talk to the same leaders of labour to whom I have been listening? Someone appears to be dreaming, in colour!

I want to make a brief reference to agriculture. As with the small commercial business, so must the family farm be considered an essential part of the Canadian economy. Our farm policy is to give equal consideration to all farmers be they from the west or the east. Adequate price support programs, quotas that will take into account seasonal variations, even though this results in surpluses and subsidies to avoid price increases to the consumer will all encourage an industry that is seriously affected by the agricultural support programs of foreign governments. I also believe that a stepped up program of assistance for research at the university level will help rekindle the interest in agriculture which is necessary for the replenishment of the diminishing farm labour force.

I was referring earlier to the speech by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. I want to comment on the continuing references to the 3 per cent tax change. The 3 per cent tax decrease was instituted as a stimulus to the economy. Anyone doing any Christmas shopping this year would have found it difficult to believe that Canadians were buying less because of fears of a tax increase in 1973. As an example, the sales of toys were reaching new highs and three weeks before Christmas many well known quality products were already sold out. During this buying spree few people thought of our economy as being weak.

The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has been espousing many of the past tested Conservative theories that have produced down-turns in the economy of our country. He makes reference to our unemployed. We will soon be considering changes in the legislation affecting the Unemployment Insurance Commission. It will be very easy to reduce the numbers by changing the eligibility qualifications. Full employment appears to be the objective of all parties. Let us not play politics with the figures, or try to take away from anyone the right to a minimum standard of living.

However disappointing the unemployment figures have been and are, the moneys paid to these persons, those of the greatest need, have been visibly injected into the economy. We have heard discussion of the work ethic. Let there not be an over-reaction that could result in unnecessary suffering and humiliation of the real needy.

A popular subject in the last few days has been old age pensions. There is a genuine need for increased payments, but I sense that much of the promotion is more with an eye to vote getting. I wonder how many of those who have talked of the problems of our elderly citizens have actively promoted and assisted in the use of those existing programs which are designed to make our mothers and fathers a little happier. Persons on pension can be helped by increases. They can also be helped by making it easier for them to live comfortably on the moneys they receive. How many of us have encouraged the building in our counties of homes for our senior citizens? How many of us have actively promoted the New Horizons program?

Mr. Speaker, since I entered this House a few days ago I have been described as "weak-kneed", "bleeding heart", and one of a "new gaggle of Liberal backbenchers that sprung up, as it were, like mushrooms in the nethermost corner of the House". I believe that many of us are guilty of using varying degrees of epithets in time of stress, but anyone using such language in what is presumably a prepared speech not only indicates his own inadequacies but does grave discredit to this House. I do not really object to being called wet behind the ears by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), but I would point out to him that many new members bring with them a length and depth of business experience that he could not possibly have, unless he is very much older than he looks.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, more than half the citizens of the riding of Vaudreuil are French-speaking. I am therefore extremely proud of the results of the last elections: they are a good example of the relations that can exist between our two cultures.

[English]

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, as a representative of the historic riding of Hastings I approach this, my first speech in the House of Commons, with not inconsiderable trepidation. I have listened carefully to my peers and their speeches, both maiden and otherwise, and I sense a number of trends.

It is obvious that it is traditional to praise the Speaker of the House in one's opening speech. I wonder if in the past, at some time or other, members on one side of the House may well have choked on their words of praise. In this House, however, it is abundantly obvious, even in the short time that I have been here, that we are blessed with a Speaker of complete impartiality, outstanding wisdom and charming grace. I regret to presume that all the fine qualities of the Speaker may well be strained to the limit in this particular parliament. The choice of the Deputy Speaker leaves little doubt of the high regard of the House for this gentleman. Again, I am confident of a choice well made. I congratulate the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave).

It is also customary to dwell for a moment on the qualities of one's riding. For my part this is not difficult. I have had the distinct pleasure, as I am sure most of my hon. colleagues have had, of travelling the length and breadth of Canada many times. It is my considered, objective opinion that that part of southern Ontario bordering on the beautiful Bay of Quinte and reaching into the highlands of Hastings is unexcelled.

From the beautiful rolling farmlands of the south, where every conceivable fruit, vegetable and grain is harvested, to the rugged, rocky beauty of the north, the people are universally alike. They, if any, are typical Canadians exemplifying the hard working, good living principles that have made this country strong. Originally of United Empire Loyalist stock, the strong strains of English, Irish and Scotch are fully integrated with new Canadians from every country in the world. Belleville, the county seat, is a veritable gem of a small city where employment of every sort is found, including the head offices of many national and international companies. And yet one can always go home for lunch, or within ten minutes be on the golf course, sailing on the bay, skiing in the winter, or just enjoying the fresh air of the beautiful countryside.

Historically my riding has supported the Crown. In 1836, in one of the first elections in which John A. Macdonald took part, history records that the area went solidly Conservative, and in 1851 at fairs and rural hustings in the counties around, the incredible Macdonald legend began to grow. In 1838 a regiment from Hastings assisted others from counties to the east to repell invaders from northern New York. To this day, the regiment continues that proud tradition. Over the years the riding, despite frequent boundary changes, has been well represented and never better than by my predecessor, Mr. Lee Grills, the friendly milkman. I am pleased to report that Lee is recovering from his recent accident and I convey to his many friends in the House and to you, Mr. Speaker, his good wishes. This is the area, then, which I now represent, and about which frankly, I am deeply concerned. I am concerned that the bureaucracy of the government is at best, unaware that this part of Canada exists.

I am concerned on behalf of the farmers of the area, and I intend to take up this matter with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). I know that the huge grain growers of the Prairies and the fruit growers of both the Okanagan Valley in the west and the Annapolis Valley on the east, represent much larger blocks of power, but the mixed farming areas of central and southern Ontario are still the heartland of Canada. Many of these farmers rely on cheques from the federal government through the milk marketing scheme for a steady income and when these cheques are from six to eight months in coming, it constitutes a considerable and unreasonable hardship. There is absolutely no excuse for this slip-shod approach. Certainly, if the employees of the Department of Agriculture, who are responsible for checking the statements and preparing the cheques, had to wait for six to eight months for their weekly income, the situation would change quickly.

While I am rapidly learning as much as I can about agriculture and, in fact, about all of the aspects affecting the life of this great and wonderful riding I represent, my background is primarily commercial and industrial. It is for this reason that I am going to direct my remarks primarily to criticism of the government's performance in this area.

A major agency of this government, which renders a distinct disservice to the people of Canada, is the Industrial Development Bank. It represents an injustice to anyone interested in the industrial development of Canada. I contend that this body does as much to encourage the sale of our industry to the United States as any combination of other factors in the country.

While I am aware of a number of instances of this treatment, including one inflicted on a colleague on this side of the House, I refer particularly at this moment, to one of the largest non-United States-owned manufacturing industries in the city of Belleville, one of only two pre-cast concrete producers not owned by a major cement company in Ontario. As a direct result of a snail-like, suspicious, typically civil service approach by the Industrial Development Bank to this company, the company is now a fully owned subsidiary of a United States giant. The company had within it, and still has, all of the prerequisites for Industrial Development Bank support. In addition, it has a vital, young, competent management team of Canadians. I can, and will if necessary, name the company and others to prove my point that this particular form of bureaucracy has caused many companies to be sold to the United States or driven to bankruptcy.

An analysis of the eight year loss experience of the Industrial Development Bank from 1964 to 1971 with a portfolio of over $366,000,000 indicates losses of less than one-fifth of one per cent. This alone proves that the Industrial Development Bank as a lender of last resort, in a supposed high risk lending position, has failed to justify its existence. Industrial Development Bank's interest rates are nothing short of usurious unless commensurate with substantial risk. This risk has been consistently avoided at the direct expense of Canadian businessmen. The bank takes far too much security relative to its lending position, basically mortgage funds, taking as it does, life insurance, personal, family, and affiliated company guarantees and a floating secondary position after existing creditors' requirements. Lending conditions are far too stringent. Businessmen require flexibility in order to meet changing demands and should not be precluded from running the business which they know best. The government assumes wrongly, that tight controls, which are in the interest of Industrial Development Bank, will prevent fraud and offset inept management.

In practice, inflation alone has protected IDB's mortgage interest even in otherwise rapidly deteriorating situations. The overly severe limitations are known to other suppliers of credit, such as banks, finance companies and normal suppliers, who often react negatively to IDB's presence and begin to build extra protection into their lending based on past experience with IDB. Firms have been forced into bankruptcy solely by IDB's presence and the resulting inflexibility of the borrower. The IDB, to say the least, has not kept up with the changing requirements and sophistication of borrowers. It is geared to servicing the traditional small customer, such as motel, restaurant and garage. This, in itself, is not wrong, but the system assumes inept and dishonest management; inadequate, untimely and unorganized financial information and lack of control over resources and personnel.

The IDB is completely unprepared to service a customer of any size with demonstrated ability. The bureaucracy cannot adapt to such a customer and frustrates rather than encourages. The Board of Directors, heavily weighted as it is by civil servants, and lawyers, just does not have the background to properly assess loans brought before it by its senior management. They rubber stamp automatically and with good reason, since the lack of imagination by senior employees in this agency allows them to only look at those proposals that are iron-clad. They know full well that their security is such that they can invariably regain their investment through bankruptcy proceedings. This, in my opinion, is a travesty of business and bears no relationship to the original intent of the IDB. It would be a highly interesting exercise to have a small team of knowledgeable Canadian entrepreneurs search carefully through those applications that never reach the board. I am confident that in this list you would find enough talent and know-how to build a viable, healthy, Canadian industrial and commercial community.

In the case to which I refer specifically, the company met and exceeded every criteria set out by IDB. The IDB took 236 days to approve funds that were short by two thirds of being sufficient to do the job. A quick reply, even if an unequivocal refusal, would be better than the hand-wringing indecision up and down the hierarchy. In this case, even though the amount finally offered was far too little and in no way reflected the strength and potential of the company, it would likely have been accepted, had it been offered in time. In fact, the IDB continues to advertise for new customers and actively solicit new loan applications through speeches, advertisements, new offices, glossy brochures, and expensive annual reports, even when the existing system cannot produce authorization in anything resembling adequate time. Any loan applications would be unlikely if the applicants knew the true timing of negotiations through to the actual release of funds. There are times, as any good businessman knows, when a decision must be made quickly. By involving everyone in every detail of every file as the information flows up through the levels of hierarchy, by avoiding responsibility and rationalizing indecision, the IDB creates unemployment for Canadians.

Just as the departments which I have mentioned inflict their bureaucracy on the farmer and industrialist, I am even more disturbed with the major affliction of people of every walk of life, the Unemployment Insurance Commission! I am concerned here, on behalf of many Canadians, but since the regional office of Ontario, containing as it does, the much blamed computer which sends out the cheques, is located in Belleville, I am more particularly concerned.

First, I am concerned with the act itself; the anomalies contained in this insidious welfare document are legion. To record them all would be useless. I am confident that the members of the back benches on the government side of the House get quite as many calls as I do complaining of the inequities of the legislation and expressing frustration at the service received. They are aware that the system is constantly being abused, and that there are families who regularly receive over $600 a week from the commission as well as people whose income is in excess of $25,000 who are drawing hundreds of dollars in sick benefits. At the same time, there are people who, after contributing for a lifetime into the program, are temporarily out of work but, are unable to collect any money from the commission, or as in one case in my riding, less than $200. I cannot, do not and will not, blame the employees of the regional office in Belleville for these sins. Nor will I countenance any such criticism from my colleagues in the House. The blame belongs within the commission. I want to stress this as strongly as I am able. From the top down, there is little or no direction. Instead of consolidating and improving the operation, changes are being made continually.

Let me outline some of the historical problems. At the time of the conception of this act, the then chairman of the commission, Mr. Jacque DesRoches, was new to the commission. He had no commission experience from which to draw and so he leaned on Mr. Guy Cousineau. Mr. Cousineau had experience in the commission and had access to many high priced consultants for assistance. Mr. Cousineau could be called the chief architect of the document, its chief planner, the word-smith who fabricated the nonsense that eventually became legislation. Mr. Cousineau also prepared the model from which costs were projected. I suggest that those estimates were as false as the model and reflect the idiotic terms of the act.

When the act was ready for implementation, the new building was constructed in Belleville. The computers were ordered and installed. Then, the trouble began. The programs for the computers were not ready and, therefore, had never been tested. The computers themselves had not been tested alongside the existing manual methods. Amidst all this confusion the new act was introduced and put into effect; but where was the architect? Where was Mr. Cousineau? Why, Mr. Cousineau was nowhere to be seen. He had quietly slipped out of the department and was now a senior official in the treasury department. I have no idea how the plan could be expected to operate properly when the man who designed it was not even in the department.

I do not need to dwell on the catastrophic results, but I wonder how many are aware of the other costs. Mr. DesRoches initially tried to stay within the budget set. He is no longer chairman of the commission. Now, we have Mr. Cousineau back with us as chairman, and the problem that was terrible but improving-to-bad is on its way to becoming terrible again.

Belleville was chosen, in part, because the availability of capable help at the wages paid was infinitely superior to the situation in Toronto. In Toronto, as fast as key punch operators are trained they are stolen by large insurance companies and others. The life style of the people of Belleville and the surrounding counties proved attractive to some senior staff and soon, with co-operation in all areas, the Belleville office began to be more efficient. Due to the problems connected with the act itself, almost twice the staff projected was required. Temporary space had to be rented. There is now a move afoot to reduce the effectiveness of the Belleville office and, indeed, perhaps to move a good part of it out of Belleville. The regional director of the commission responsible for Belleville does not even live in the area; in fact, he visits Belleville infrequently. I would be interested in knowing, and I intend to ask the question, how he justifies trying to manage a multi-billion dollar pay centre by remote control, especially at a time when problems are still rampant. I would also be interested in knowing how the regional director justifies an expense account while staying in Belleville and, in fact, a chauffeur to drive him back and forth when he should be residing there. I assure the gentleman that it is a delightful place to live.

A very serious concern to me at present is the removal of personnel out of the UIC office at Belleville. The latest to go is the public relations officer and his staff. The reason given is that in Toronto the public relations man is closer to the major media. This may be so, but what does he tell the media when he is so far away from the action himself? We were blessed with a fine man in the position who had integrated into the community well, and I am confident that he did not really want to leave. I find it difficult to understand the rationale for moving him when the public relations officer for the Maritimes, working as he does out of Moncton, adequately handles Saint John, Halifax, Fredericton and St. John's. The public relations officer out of Winnipeg does equally well in handling Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton and Calgary. The personnel director also has been moved to Toronto and now commutes to Belleville once in a while.

How these people and their staff can properly operate one of the most important dollar distributing projects of this government by remote control is completely beyond me. How can they, for example, consult with the chief insurance officer or other senior staff still resident at the centre in Belleville? How can they have any idea of what is happening? I am aware that there is now a movement to remove yet another division from Belleville. I suggest to the members on both sides of the House that this one will effect us all equally. The division in question is the ministerial secretariat, the one that looks after all the complaints that you and I send in. Should this division be moved to Toronto, you can appreciate the type of service you will get then. At least now, when complaints come in, you can be sure of getting an answer. What the service would be with one hand separated from the other by 120 miles I leave to your imagination.

At one time we had the UIC training centre for all of Canada in Belleville at the local Loyalist College of Applied Arts and Technology. It was working in an excellent manner. This is no longer the case. As an aside, I point out that the Bell Canada engineering school for all North America is in Belleville and is used by engineers from almost every country in the world.

I am concerned also about the cost of the operation of the commission. I am aware of questions on this subject on the order paper. I look forward to these answers with anticipation. I predict that the cost of administration will be 60, 70 and 80 per cent over the projected budgets for 1969-72. The cost of HMCS Bonaventure will look like the price of a toy canoe compared to the overexpenditure in the administration of this department. I suggest also that the changes proposed in the act by the minister are far too little and far too late. I suggest finally that the changes requested in the rate structure will not, in fact, balance the cost of the program. They give a false picture to the public and more funds from the general purse will be required.

Is it any wonder that morale among the staff at the UIC offices not only in Belleville but across Canada is at an all time low. Many senior executives from managers on up, are absent due to illness or other excuses or are on long term leaves at full salary. Others have been shuffled about, leaving no cohesive managerial sequence. Surely, there is a crying need for a complete investigation of this commission. I demand of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) that he hold a complete investigation publicly before the standing committee and clear the air on this matter. I have outlined only some of the problems; others would soon become evident. I have named senior members of the commission. This government, however, must accept the final blame. The previous minister gave us a great dissertation on the act just last week. To this I say, balderdash. It deserves no further mention.

These, for the moment are my chief concerns. There are many other areas which I feel deserve similar attention and I intend to devote myself to them. I have been told by older hands that I will burn myself out fighting the system. I have no desire to fight anything. I am determined to obtain for the residents of Hastings riding an efficient, reasonable and commonsense response from the people employed to serve them in the federal government. This is not a new approach perhaps, but one not likely to be achieved under the present administration. Perhaps we may even change that also.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, it was with a great deal of pride that I took my seat for the first time in the twenty-ninth parliament as a member of the House, and I am grateful for this opportunity to speak today. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggested, I am wet behind the ears. I find that there are many strange customs that one must become accustomed to in the House. Some of them, I think, are excellent and I like them very much. For instance, I like the idea that the House as a whole addresses Mr. Speaker and speaks to him collectively. Yet, I find it rather strange that all the members should congratulate the Speaker on his election. I feel that we should congratulate the members for their widsom in selecting such a fine person as Mr. Speaker, a person who has such knowledge, such objectivity, fairness and, above all, a sense of humour. I am also very much impressed by the role of the Deputy Speaker and was impressed by the manner in which he was selected.

[Mr. Ellis.]

May I also congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I was impressed by what they said and also impressed by the fact that the mover was a French-Canadian from Ontario and the seconder an English Canadian from Quebec. If we are not one nation, we are nothing.

I am also very pleased to note that each one of us is given an opportunity during this debate to speak about our own section of Canada. I was pleased that the debate was not cut off, as proposed in an amendment. It is very important that we, especially the new members, get to know the problems of people in other parts of Canada. This is a massive country. Unless we hear all members speak, it is very difficult for us to understand the problems of the rest of the country.

I have observed that there are some massive divisions within this country. One member spoke of five different areas. These divisions give me some concern. I wish to talk about a sixth division in this country. There are two dividing lines which, in a sense, divide but which also unify. There is a patch of green that stretches from the Queen Charlottes through Prince Rupert, Prince George, Peace River, The Pas, Thunder Bay, Sudbury, Timmins, Rouyn, Noranda, Baie Comeau, Chicoutimi, Rimouski, Bathurst, N.B., Twin Falls to Cornerbrook. Some call it mid-Canada. Others call it the boreal forest of the north. It does not matter how you delineate it.

This is the stretch which is the heartland of Canada, the very center of this country, an area that can bring unity to this country. There are many variations within this part of Canada, but there are many things that are the same. We are the center of the greenbelt. The forest north, the forest product industry, the pulp and paper industry and the lumber industry are centred in this area. People working in these industries have many of the same problems. The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) talked about the closing of the CIP plant. Living in this particular area of Canada, this also affects me.

We are at the center of the mineral wealth of Canada. When we talk about energy problems, we talk about the problems of the heartland or middle part of Canada. We have most of the ground water. When people in this area are concerned about water diversion, they are concerned because they know about the ground waters in the center of Canada. This is an area of great natural beauty with a great potential for tourist growth. We are a people who are free. We are used to distance, travel and movement. There are a great variety of peoples in this area. Most of the native people in this country live in this area. I have been very close to the native people in this country through marriage and many years of experience. I know the kind of problems they face.

There are many problems in mid-Canada. This is not the growing south and not the exciting far north, but the heartland of Canada. I must list some of our problems. Perhaps the most important is absentee ownership, the fact that things are always being done to us, not by us. We are the centre for expertise. Groups of experts are always telling us how to do things.

I wish to congratulate Mr. Richard Romer on his notion about the mid-Canada corridor. However, although there was much good in it, we did not participate in the planning. A partial explanation of this situation lies in the fact that we are absentee-owned and managed. Although I cannot put my finger on the figures, a survey that was conducted indicated that 50 per cent of the large industry in this area is branch plant industry and the average manager of one of these plants is in a community for four or five years. That kind of absentee ownership and management affects us very much.

We suffer from poor communications. There is a great need for organizations such as the CBC to provide better communications. In spite of the fact that we need a network in the north, we do not have a single CBC station in that whole area, and certainly not a network. I have referred to an east-west line. There is an opportunity to do something worthwhile to unite Canada, namely a communications network across the mid-Canada corridor. I again thank Mr. Romer for this suggestion.

We are dependent on a rail system which is totally inadequate. The two major railroads in this country do not want to run railroads. I have very strong feelings about the poor transportation in the north country. From time to time, I intend to speak about the lack of desire of our railroads to run a railroad system in this country.

At this point, we are sadly under-represented. This is one problem that faces all members in this area. Of the 21 constituencies where nomination dates are early, 19 are in this area about which I am speaking. This is the area hardest hit by the new redistribution. There are three such constituencies in northern Ontario and two in northern Quebec. Four of these have an increase in area of between 40 and 50 per cent as a result of redistribution. In three of the constituencies in northern Ontario, Kenora, Nipigon and Cochrane, there are distances further apart than Ottawa from Windsor or Ottawa from Yarmouth, Nova Scotia.

• (1600)

I should like to put into the record some observations by Douglas Fisher taken from Times-News of January 3:

> Ontario is to have four ridings near or more than 150,000 square miles in size, i.e., each is to be substantially larger than Great Britain, or five times as large as Nova Scotia. Each of these four ridings is populated by at least 64,000 people in scattered nodes across its space.

I would say that most contain populations of around 75,000. Mr. Fisher goes on to speak of the role of a Member of Parliament:

> It becomes more obvious each year that MP's who hold such monsters are not even bystanders to the basic parliamentary work of legislation and scrutiny. Just serving their ridings takes all their efforts. This year's increases in area, and those due after 1981, will make the monsters impossible.
> We've got to make changes in redistribution before 1984.

I maintain we must make changes in redistribution before 1974 or else in these areas about which I am talking we shall have virtually no representation at all. I welcome the suggestion by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that a constitutional amendment should be introduced so as to give due representation to people in these and similar parts of the country.

I have spoken for a few moments about this strip of green, what we call the heartland of Canada. I will conclude by mentioning the heart of this heartland, the city of Thunder Bay and the constituency of Fort William. I do this because it is a custom, a custom I like, to speak about one own's constituency. I do so, as well, because here I am speaking about a sector of mid-Canada. We are neither easterners nor westerners. We look both ways. Our government is to the east; we look to Toronto for provincial government. Most of our business, on the other hand, comes out of Winnipeg in the west. If I had to choose, I would say we were more western than eastern. We receive our CBC programs from the east, and one hour later we receive our CTV program from the west. So we are one of the few parts of the country which can get CBC news and CTV news at different hours.

The newly formed city of Thunder Bay is a major communications and transportation centre. I understand that in the last shipping year we handled the largest tonnage of any harbour in Canada on a monthly basis while the harbour was open. We are very much concerned with commerce, with everything which moves between east and west.

My constituency of Fort William has been ably served the last 37 years by two very fine members. Some of those present may remember the Reverend Dan McIvor, a very warm-hearted person who graced this House for many years—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: —as well as my immediate predecessor, Mr. Badanai who was a member of this House for the last 13 or 14 years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: I can assure Your Honour that Mr. Badanai, still does a quarter of mile around the track and swims every day—he could take us all on. He extends his greetings to all his friends in the House.

In conclusion, coming as I do from the centre of the heartland of Canada, I should like to pledge myself to doing all I can to bring about unity in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, one of the things with which I have been duly impressed in my time here in the House is the skill and diplomacy with which you and your Deputy, the member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) have performed the difficult task of acting as Speaker. The very effectiveness of this House as the major institution of government in this country is dependent on you to a large extent, and may I say to you, Sir, that Canadians are well served by the present incumbents of the Speaker's Chair. May I congratulate you both on your election to this office. Also, may I express my admiration for all the new members who have spoken in this debate. I refer not only to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the throne speech, but to the new members of all parties who have set such a high standard of advocacy and eloquence in their maiden speeches in this House. And, of course, I state here unequivocally my support for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), a most thoughtful and considerate human being as well as a great leader. I am proud to be a member of his team.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: The riding of St. Paul's which I have the honour to represent lies in the heart of the great city of Toronto. It embraces famous Toronto landmarks known to many Canadians: Casa Loma, the village of Yorkville, Upper Canada College, St. Michael's College School, Forest Hill Collegiate and many churches and synagogues known throughout the world. Many of my constituents are leaders of government, business, the professions, the arts, labour and industry. Included among their numbers are two provincial cabinet ministers and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) sitting opposite. This is the riding which produced one of Your Honour's predecessors, Mr. Roland Michener, who served with distinction as Speaker of this House from 1957 to 1962, a great Canadian who now occupies the high office of Governor General of Canada.

St. Paul's is an urban riding in the centre of one of the fastest growing metropolitan areas in North America. Perhaps the growth has been too fast for the liking of the people of the city of Toronto living at the centre of the metropolitan area. This was certainly the message of the people at the recent municipal elections in Toronto. Their demand, and my demand, is to preserve our city and our neighbourhoods as decent places in which to live. I note that the government in the throne speech now appears to acknowledge, perhaps reluctantly, a major federal role in the preservation of cities. Yet one has to question the urban intentions and priorities of a government which is willing to commit over a half billion dollars to an unwanted and unnecessary airport at Pickering that is a political mistake, and thereby deprive the people of the Toronto-centred region of federal assistance for public transit and housing for which there is an urgent need.

Particularly in the field of housing, imaginative proposals are needed to assist in the rehabilitation of existing housing stock and neighbourhoods as an alternative to high-rise living. St. Paul's riding, particularly in the area known as the Annex, contains some of the finest old housing stock existing on this continent. Many houses form an important part of Canada's architectural history. Yet the residential rehabilitation assistance program announced by the Secretary of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) last June fell far short of the mark both in terms of flexibility of loan and grant ceilings and in terms of the type of dwelling which would be eligible for rehabilitation assistance. The need is not only for single-family accommodation, but for multiple family use, hostels and homes for senior citizens and the handicapped. Also, the program of assistance for neighbourhood recreational and social facilities must be stepped up. One would hope that the rehabilitation assistance program referred to in the throne speech will be a substantial improvement on this earlier effort.

Another unique feature of the St. Paul's riding is that almost one in five of the voting residents there are old age pensioners. Where is the government's program to improve the lot of these people, many of whom built and served this country well, yet who find their poverty pensions whittled away by rampant inflation? When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) gave the government an opportunity to bring in old age security legislation as a priority item last week, who was it who stood in opposition to this humane gesture to the senior citizens of Canada? The arrogant Liberals, hand in hand with the NDP!

I do not intend to get involved in the numbers game of suggesting what the basic pension and guaranteed income supplement should be. All of us in this House know that the increases should be substantial in both cases. The reputation of the new Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) among senior citizens will stand or fall on the size and nature of the increases. But what I would suggest is that some consideration be given to special increases in the supplement for senior citizens living in larger cities to reflect higher costs of shelter. Rents in the city are appreciably higher than the rural areas for all types of accommodation, and those city dwellers eligible for the supplement should receive consideration along these lines.

Now, let me turn to a matter of my special concern. It is interesting to note from the throne speech that the government has not forgotten about its famous competition bill. Indeed, it looks as though we may see the new and improved version of this fancy product some time later this session. I hope that in describing the bill which will be coming as "new and improved" I will not be violating the provisions against misleading advertising.

I know that the mention of this bill will bring back many memories to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) who had the honour or dishonour of originally introducing it. Fortunately for him, he seems to have fared better than his former colleague who introduced tax legislation at about the same time and for whom the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was able to find only a civil service job when it came time to bail out excess baggage prior to the last election.

Mr. Atkey: The throne speech indicates that the new competition policy will be in harmony with industrial policies in general and foreign investment policy in particular. If this means that this government's industrial policies and foreign investment policy must be determined first before the bill is reintroduced, then we are unlikely to see the new competition act before the year 2000 at the present rate at which this government engages in economic policy development.

Nevertheless, I am glad that the government now realizes apparently that competition policy alone cannot be relied on to fashion an efficient, dynamic economic structure in this country. Competition must be carefully related to and placed in the context of other industrial development policies and objectives. It was not wise for this government to have gone full steam ahead with a comprehensive competition bill without stopping to consider the economic options which that bill might have foreclosed when considering the broader questions involved in the development of a viable industrial strategy for Canada. This government had not committed itself to specific policies relating to industry structure, patterns of rationalization, export prospects, import competition and foreign ownership. Until it had done so, it was a mistake to try to lay down a specific competition policy.

Let me say a word or two about the 1971 version of the competition bill and the approach taken by its draftsmen. Now I have no doubt that the authors of this bill were able, legal scholars. They probably had read most of the literature in the field and the intricate, legislative model which they put forward was in many ways a scholar's delight. But it was also a businessman's nightmare, and one which no practical man would have ever expected could politically survive the transition from logical construct to operating program. No little wonder that the business community rose up in unison against this bill. Most Canadian businessmen would understand what they were told to do if they were instructed "to compete, but not in ways that destroy competition".

Under Bill C-256 however, the Canadian businessman would have had to live with a different commandment, going something like this: "Ply thy trade in purity; open up potentials for entry among thy suppliers, thy competitors, and thy customers; and if thy competitive decisions lead thee into murky areas of commerce, seek the blessing of the Tribunal." Such a commandment could only lead to business hesitancy and unnecessary restraints on competitive innovation. This is not to say that there were not certain aspects of the proposed competition act that were good. For example, the shift away from the criminal law approach towards a more suitable civil jurisdiction was long overdue for such matters as price discrimination and non-permitted mergers. Also, the act included for the first time service industries in its coverage of anit-competitive behaviour.

Third, the act refined and consolidated the prohibition of objectionable practices at the consumer level, providing much needed clarification in this area. And fourth, the act would have created a competitive practices tribunal capable of undertaking a sophisticated economic and managerial analysis in the evaluation of mergers, specialization agreements, export agreements, exclusive dealing and tying arrangements, etc.

These were some of the desirable features of the proposed competition act. However, they were obscured in large part by certain provisions of the bill which tended to completely over-reach its stated goals of nurturing efficiency through competition where possible and through agreement where necessary. For example, the act as originally introduced included a large number of per se offences which were to apply notwithstanding that the impugned combinations or agreements had no significant impact on competition. These provisions were unnecessarily harsh and it is to be hoped that the new version of the bill will subject most of these offences to the more gentle "material lessening of competition" test before the offence is proved.

Second, one would hope that there might be some amendment to Section 73(7) which would have presumed directors liable for offences of which the corporation had been convicted. This invidious section should be amended to provide directors with at least a minimum due process protection consistent with the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Third, some of the powers of the proposed competitive practices tribunal should be amended to provide further procedural safeguards, particularly relating to the notice provisions. Also, consideration might be given to requiring that at least one member of a three man panel of the tribunal should be a lawyer with the status of a high court judge, as is the practice followed in constituting the restrictive practices court of the United Kingdom.

One of the overriding problems of the competition bill introduced in 1971 was the serious doubt raised as to its constitutional validity. It is difficult to argue that the federal level is not the logical preserve for competition laws generally. But much of our constitutional case law indicates that federal regulation of businesses operating solely within a province may be an impingement of the provincial property and civil rights jurisdiction. Not only will this create uncertainty in the setting up of the competitive practices tribunal but it will create additional uncertainties in the business community already reeling from the magnitude of the substantive changes proposed. To remove these uncertainties one would hope that the federal government might work together with the provinces in having the question of constitutional validity of the new bill tested by way of reference to the Supreme Court of Canada at the earliest opportunity, preferably before the bill becomes law.

All these remarks are by way of general comment on what has essentially been a preliminary skirmish. The time for the hard analysis will come when we see the specifics of the new bill, if it ever comes.

Mr. Speaker, as a final matter, I would refer to the Prime Minister's suggestion a week ago in this House on Monday, January 8, that if the government is defeated on a clear vote of no confidence he will immediately go to the people. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) has already referred to this during the debate this afternoon. While the Prime Minister may have recanted somewhat from these views in a subsequent conversation with some newspaper or television interviewer, I think it is extremely important that the correct constitutional position be stated in this House.

To put my position simply, I would challenge on constitutional grounds the inference of the right hon. gentleman that another election is the only course open to him under the present circumstances in this House. His was the statement last week of a desperate man attempting to cling to power at all costs. It ignores the established constitutional practice honoured in virtually every parliamentary democracy of the Commonwealth that in minority government situations such as these, His Excellency the Governor General is perfectly entitled to caution against a request for dissolution and to suggest that the Leader of the Official Opposition be called on to form a government. Moreover, it has been the tradition for a Prime Minister whose government is defeated in the House in these situations to advise His Excellency to call on an alternative government rather than to inflict another election on the people.

Hon. members opposite may think that there is some comfort to be taken from the unfortunate precedent of the King-Byng affair in 1926. But there is not a constitutional historian worth his salt who has ever suggested that Lord Byng was not constitutionally right in refusing Mackenzie King dissolution and calling on Arthur Meighen to form a government. At the very least, the most charitable comment that has ever been passed by constitutional historians in retrospect is that Mackenzie King gave His Excellency bad advice in requesting dissolution and that Lord Byng would have been perfectly entitled to point out to King the harmful effects of another election and the fact that an alternative government could be formed, before eventually succumbing to the unreasonable request.

Even so eminent a constitutionalist as Dr. Eugene Forsey, a recent convert to the swelled ranks of the retired Liberals in the Senate and, by the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) own admission last Monday, one of his speech writers and advisers, concluded in 1943 in his now famous book "Dissolution of Parliament" that Lord Byng acted correctly. Indeed, Dr. Forsey in his book put forward this proposition, that a government which survives an election and which meets the new House following that election and survives the vote on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and then is defeated at some later period of time of the first session, is not entitled to dissolution when an alternative government is possible. I agree with Dr. Forsey, the Prime Minister's adviser. I agree with this proposition and would have thought that it was now a practice firmly established by parliamentary tradition in this country and throughout the Commonwealth. Certainly, that is the impression left by reading Senator Forsey's book. Therefore, it seems to me that the right hon. Prime Minister's suggestion that he will immediately go to the people following a defeat in the House this session is a questionable constitutional doctrine at best.

If the Prime Minister carries out his threat to ignore established constitutional practice, then he may well find that the Canadian people will, to coin a phrase, become disillusioned with his dissolution, and will wreak their revenge on him in the ensuing election. But the Canadian people do not want another election. They want constructive policies dealing with present economic conditions which have given us record high unemployment combined with drastic increases in prices. They do not want delays in the House of the sort that this government seems ready to sanction, despite its statement of good intentions of January 4. Neither do they want this House to be diverted into other issues which will take the heat off this government's lack of creative ability and imagination to put forward specific policies to deal with economic matters. The Canadian people want this House to produce, and if the present government will not present the legislation to give it a chance to do so, then surely an alternative government should be given that chance.

The last thing the Canadian people want right now is to go to the polls, particularly when it may be brought about by this government setting up diversionary issues which may ultimately prove to be like the Maginot Line, failing completely to stem the onslaught of real problems facing Canada. If they will not act, Mr. Speaker, we stand ready.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on several occasions during this throne speech debate hon. members on this side and from across the floor have suggested, in fact some have urged, that members of the government elaborate and explain in greater detail some of the statements in the Speech from the Throne, particularly those that are in their immediate area of interest or in their area of responsibility. So, in addition to wanting to congratulate you, Sir, as well as Mr. Speaker, Mr. Deputy Speaker and the mover and seconder of the motion, in addition to wanting to join and associate myself with all the very sincere tributes that have been directed to each of you, I want to participate in the debate at this point in order to speak about two statements in the Speech from the Throne that have not been discussed, I believe, to the extent that they merit or deserve.

The first is the reference in the speech to the wider area of service open to the Canadian armed forces, and the second and really vital statement to which I want to address myself is perhaps one of the most far-reaching and significant statements in the whole Speech from the Throne, namely the one regarding the proposed conference on western economic opportunities.

First of all, turning to defence, I should like to remind the House of the exact words in the Speech from the Throne. They were:

> The government intends to widen the area of service to Canada open to personnel in the Canadian armed forces. In addition to maintaining a high degree of military capability as the primary and most essential role of the forces, new emphasis will be placed on the many areas in which the varied skills and training of this large number of dedicated Canadians can contribute to the achievement of national goals.

Those are the words from the Speech from the Throne, and in speaking on this subject I wish to emphasize first of all our commitment to maintaining a high degree of military capability. The first duty of our armed forces is to protect Canada, and nothing we do in other areas should diminish that capability. But having said that, I believe that there are skills and training possessed by personnel in the armed forces that can serve other national goals. I also believe that within the armed forces there is a desire to serve, not just to serve in a military role, not just to protect this country, but to help to improve this country. Some of the subjects that I have in mind are as follows.

I might say in these first few weeks as Minister of National Defence that I have not tried to establish programs. I simply want to put forward a concept. Take the case of engineering.

We have engineering skill in the Armed Forces. I do not go so far as to say we should copy the American Corps of Engineers who have built some of the great projects in that country, but certainly our engineering skill can be used to meet other goals than our military capability. I am thinking of the development of the north, and even more particularly of the great project along the Mackenzie valley.

I am thinking of communications where we are in the process of putting in new and sophisticated equipment, all of which is going to cost us in excess of $50 million. Looking at the department for the first time I ask myself, should we be doing this just for our own use, just for our own departmental communication, or is there some way in which this expenditure of taxpayers' dollars could be used to serve other departments or other national purposes?

Then, look at the matter of physical fitness. You will note that in the throne speech debate my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde), has talked about physical fitness. Even if it is not now, this should be a national objective, and again I do not know of any group other than the Armed Forces who possess a higher degree of physical fitness. There must be something there in their coaching skills, and in their facilities, which could be given a wider application.

I think, too, of the ecology, of the national objective of clean air and clean water. Again, I know that the Armed Forces have an expertise in this area. Not only did they help in the clean-up on the Peace River, and in Chedabucto Bay following the Arrow tragedy, but daily they are on patrol spotting areas of pollution around our shores. This is another area which I think could be given greater emphasis.

Then, too, there is the whole area of search and rescue, which has recently been widely publicized. Here again there are taxpayers' dollars being spent for very worthwhile non-military purposes. Apart from search and rescue we fly over 200 mercy flights a year, some four mercy flights a week, as a contribution of the Armed Forces. I could elaborate further, Mr. Speaker, but time is limited and I want to talk on the other main subject.

Let me sum up by saying that I believe that in addition to their primary objective, which is to defend the sovereignty and independence of this country, in other words to protect Canada, the Armed Forces should also be helping to improve Canada. If I were allowed, Mr. Speaker, I might make a brief personal reference, as an example, of the kind of thing I am talking about as a secondary mission.

When I was flying with 10BR squadron in Labrador in 1944 our main military purpose was to look for submarines. The year before we were there the supply ship coming into Goose Bay, which was carrying a year's supply of beer, struck an iceberg and sank, and we ran out of beer about the middle of February. So, our crew were given the responsibility, as we were looking for submarines, to mark the icebergs in order that the next year's supply ship would be able to get through. It did get through, and that is an example of how secondary objectives can be attained by the Armed Forces.

Now, moving on to the other main and important subject, the proposed conference on western economic opportunities, I have already said that I believe this could be one of the most far-reaching proposals in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Paproski: Would the minister allow a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is the hon. member rising for the purpose of asking a question?

Mr. Paproski: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): This could only be done with the consent of the minister because it is taken off his time.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I prefer to cover my subject first, and then I would be pleased to entertain questions, particularly from the hon. member whose questions I always enjoy.

As I was saying, this conference is probably one of the most important proposals put forward in the Speech from the Throne. Before we can talk about it I think we have to start by asking what does western Canada want. In a television interview the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made the comment that for years Canadians had asked what does Quebec want, and he said that now we must start thinking what does the west want.

This conference is confined to economic opportunity. So, I think we have to go one stage further back and define what kinds of economic opportunities there are before we can say what the west wants. Although this is somewhat of an oversimplification, as it necessarily has to be, there are three main areas of economic opportunity, three phases of economic development, one of which is lacking in the west.

The first main stage of economic development is of course the primary resource stage, starting really from a hunting economy, agriculture, resource development, fishing and forestry, and covering all of the primary resources. The west has this phase of economic development in abundance.

The second stage, and the vital one, is called either secondary industry or the industrial stage. The word industrial in this context is not perfect because it implies a smokestack type of society, but I use industrial society to include scientific development and technological development, in effect really an advanced society.

The third clear area of economic opportunity embraces the service industries, all the hotels, restaurants, taxi cabs, beauty parlours, laundries, and maintenance of all kinds. The service industries grow on top of primary industry in the same way as they grow on top of an industrial society. That is why, when you look at them superficially, you cannot tell a western city from one in the industrial area of the country. But if you go behind the office windows, go into the factories and look at the job opportunities, you will find there is a tremendous difference between an area that has just a primary resource base and service industries on top, and is missing that all-important secondary industry, and an area which has secondary industry, has an industrialized, technological, scientific section as part of its existence. This is what the west wants.

The west wants to build industrial strength on top of its agricultural, resource and energy base, and here is exactly where the Speech from the Throne shone a light right on the area that is wanted. These are the words in the Speech from the Throne:

> The government recognizes that western Canadians wish to build industrial strength on top of their region's great resource and energy base.

If that is what the west wants, Mr. Speaker, then what we have to determine is what can the federal government do to help achieve that objective. In a single word, it is decentralization. The Speech from the Throne is quite specific on this point when it says:

• (1640)

> As the economy continues to grow, a greater measure of decentralization of industrial activity will be necessary to achieve this desired regional objective.

Mr. Speaker, in the time I have left I should like to speak about decentralization and the results the government has achieved in that area. This government has shown leadership and has shown understanding of the need for decentralization which is not a new concept to this government. As well, I should like to point out some areas where we have not done as well as we should and I should also like to point to some things that I believe we should do.

We have had some successes in this area. As Minister of Supply and Services, I pointed out to this House that 85 per cent of all purchases made by the federal government were made in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, leaving only 15 per cent for the other eight provinces combined. The government changed its purchasing policy in order to give increased federal buying to the Atlantic provinces and to the western provinces. It is natural for the lion's share still to go to Ontario and Quebec but this change is an example of decentralization.

Mr. Paproski: That has been changed again.

Mr. Richardson: No, Mr. Speaker, it has not been changed and it cannot be changed as long as this government is in power.

Mr. Paproski: You have no power to direct that department now.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, in response to the comment from across the floor, it is not the minister who makes the decision, but the government and this government is committed to decentralization as is indicated in the Speech from the Throne.

Let me give some further examples, Mr. Speaker. It was apparent to some of us that the Crown corporations were clustered around the capital in a very small regional area, and when we realized that we needed more minting capacity, it was decided that the coins of this nation should be minted in western Canada. That is an example of decentralization.

There is another example in the west that I know will please my hon. friend. This government decided that the head office of the Canadian Development Corporation should be located in Vancouver. This is probably the largest Crown corporation in Canada, so we have some record in this area—

An hon. Member: You sure have some record!

Mr. Richardson: Although we have done well, Mr. Speaker, and clearly understand this national requirement, I want to say that we have not done nearly well enough.

A perfect example of decentralization outside our own experience is the American space program. To my knowledge this is the biggest program that has ever been put together by any government and it is highly decentralized. The rocket is fired from Florida, the headquarters are in Houston, Texas, the parts are made in California and Seattle and the gross national product of at least 25 states is greatly strengthened by the total program. We do not seem to be able to exert the same regional influences, regardless of which government is in power. The United States has a system which allows them to decentralize and I think we should examine this.

Mr. Speaker, I am really talking about two subjects—industrialization of western Canada and about that objective being helped by decentralization. I could point to some things that may surprise my colleagues. We did a lot of talking during the election—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: —and at other times, about hopper cars. We provided 2,000 hopper cars at a cost of about $46 million. I have heard it said that these were a great gift to western Canada but, Mr. Speaker, where was the industrial benefit? Where was the economic stimulus? Where was the payroll? I am pleased to say that in the interests of decentralization some of these hopper cars were built in Trenton, Nova Scotia, but still the lion's share was built in Sorel, Quebec and in Hamilton, Ontario. Mr. Speaker, not five cents was spent in western Canada for the building of hopper cars. It has been pointed out that in the old days of wooden cars at least some of the lumber was sometimes sent from the west. These cars are useful for the movement of grain and I would not suggest that they are not a valuable addition for that purpose. But, Mr. Speaker, that is extending our primary resource economy, it is not doing anything to achieve our industrial development nor to provide the kind of jobs that young western Canadians seek when they leave university.

Mr. Speaker, the provision of creative jobs is the main single reason that I believe we must build industrial strength in the west. Although a lot of our young people coming out of the universities think of farming as one of the finest occupations in the world—and it is—or may think that mining is, we simply cannot have all our students going to university in order to become wheat farmers or hard rock miners. If they are to have the kinds of jobs that they are looking for as designers, engineers or computer operators, and are to have them in the west, then we have to industrialize.

Mr. Speaker, I have pointed out where we have done well and have tried to point out where we have not done well. Now, let me point out a few places where I think we should decentralize. According to the figures that I have, 91 per cent of our industrial research grants are given in Ontario and Quebec. Other research and development expenditures on behalf of the federal government, are 90 per cent in Ontario and Quebec. That leaves something under 10 per cent for the other eight provinces. I do not say that it is easy to move these research grants, but I think it is essential that we try to achieve an appropriate balance.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Is the minister one of the western separatists the Prime Minister talks about?

Mr. Richardson: I am one of the people who can, hopefully, prevent the west from separating, because I want to get an equal deal for us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Paproski: Just a minute, please. We had no intention of separating in the first place. We do not want to separate. We have a pretty good deal going right now. Perhaps you people, in Winnipeg, want to separate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I will move on to other subjects that I feel strongly about. I want to speak about wider national participation in the area of my own department. I refer to defence procurement. We will be involved in the purchase of a long range surveillance aircraft, and the figure publicly used now in connection with that purchase is $600 million. This is to be a major national purchase and, understandably, what we are saying to the manufacturers of these aircraft is this: "If we are going to buy your aircraft, whether they are made in Europe or the United States, we want a maximum amount of Canadian content. We want a maximum of Canadian industrial benefit." That is really all that Canada has ever said so far. But, we are now saying to those manufacturers: "We want Canadian content industrially; but not only that we also want to know where the industrial benefit is to take place in Canada." My main message is that national purchases of this kind, national projects, national endeavours, must bring nationwide industrial benefit. That is where we have failed so far. I see an opportunity, in the wording used in the Speech from the Throne, to achieve that objective.

Another area in which we should bring about such nationwide benefit is in the area of the short landing and take-off aircraft. Here is a national project. This is not being undertaken by private industry; it is being subsidized. The federal government is putting millions of dollars into that program. We are building the airframes in Toronto and the engines in Montreal. I do not object because, as I say, it is a national project, but national projects must bring nationwide benefits, otherwise we are not a nation in the sense that I should like to see it.

Mr. MacLean: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: My time is nearly finished. I have talked on these subjects frequently, Mr. Speaker, but I talk with more confidence now, after the election of October 30. These are the kinds of things I said during the election campaign and I had the good fortune to have my constituents give me a larger majority than they did in 1968.

Mr. Paproski: That is because you are a great guy, Jim. There are not many like you left in western Canada.

Mr. Richardson: What I am now saying does not reflect only my own view; it reflects the view of many others. I now have the endorsement of a large number of western Canadians who are my constituents in Winnipeg South.

Mr. Paproski: I am glad the minister mentioned constituents, instead of members in cabinet.

Mr. Richardson: The other items on this important conference agenda are transportation, regionally based financial institutions and northern development. Each one of those could form the subject of another speech. I will not begin speaking about them now. But I will conclude at this point by saying that I have been talking in a regional sense, because the statement in the Speech from the Throne concerned a regional conference. I would not be a member of this House, and I do not believe other members would be here, if we did not all wish to see a stronger and better Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Richardson: I do not apologize to anyone for describing what I believe to be necessary to build a stronger west. I believe that it is strong parts that make a strong total. In the final analysis it is only strong regions that will enable us to build an even stronger country.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles)—Public Works—Floods—Assistance to people with property on north shore of Lake Erie damaged by high water level; the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight)—Transport—Inquiry as to action to prevent closing of railway stations in western Canada; the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser)—Transport—Airport—Vancouver International—Runway expansion—

Request that environmental impact study be provided to expropriation hearings.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. J. J. Blais for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to the speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I need not say what a thrill and honour it is to be here and to address this assembly during this throne speech debate. A few days ago the senior member among us, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) warned that we freshmen members, on the occasion of our maiden speech, would be making the hardest speech of our lives. I confess, Sir, that at the time I do not think I truly appreciated the significance of his warning; but as I stand here before you in this impressive chamber, with its great tradition of oratory of the highest calibre, an example of which we witnessed in the speech of the right hon. member for Prince Albert recently, I am beginning to appreciate the significance of his words.

As a freshman member I am, of course, very mindful of the great traditions of the House of Commons. In fact, Sir, as with all the members of the party to which it is my honour to belong, I am mindful and respectful of all our Canadian traditions, and particularly now the tradition of the throne speech debate. One of the pleasant traditions is to congratulate you, Sir, on your elevation to the position of Speaker of this assembly. Those more senior than I have already commented on your record of fairness, humour and ability. I feel fortunate to be a member of this assembly with you, Sir, in the position that you occupy, particularly now, given the makeup of the House. May I also congratulate the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) on his elevation to the post of Deputy Speaker.

Another pleasant tradition, Mr. Speaker, is to compliment my fellow freshmen, the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, and this I do with pleasure. I cannot help but speculate that, but for a few dozen votes and 31 New Democrats, I might have performed that task and they mine.

It is also customary, Sir, to spend a few moments to talk about the constituency which a new member represents; of course it would give anybody great pleasure to talk about Calgary Centre. Before I talk of the people and places that make up this constituency, I should like to take a few moments to pay tribute to my predecessor; of course, I refer to Hon. Douglas S. Harkness. In a sense, Sir, I, as the new member for Calgary Centre, bear a double responsibility as compared to most new members, because anyone who sits in parliament for Calgary Centre will be judged against a standard of dedication to public service that has no equal. First in war, where he was decorated for bravery, then in parliament from 1945 to 1972, Doug Harkness has served Canada. I cannot aspire to his distinction, nor could anyone equal this tradition; but I will try and honour it. Few people have served Canada as well and I know his presence in this assembly is already missed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: The constituency that Doug Harkness represented and that I now represent, Calgary Centre, as the name implies is the heart and core of that great city nestled at the foot of the Rocky Mountains. I will not try to describe my constituency because words alone, at least not the words of an engineer, could do it justice. Those who have not been there are the lesser for it and I would recommend most highly that they take the earliest opportunity to fill this void in their lives.

There is just one point I would like to raise in connection with my constituency, and that is in regard to the proposed federal government building for Calgary. I hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) will give this matter his attention since the officials in his department are attempting to acquire a site which the people of Calgary would prefer as the site of a downtown park. The city of Calgary has been encouraging the federal government to locate its new building in the designated urban renewal area and here, Sir, we have an example of a lack of co-ordination by the federal government and its departments which is very difficult to understand and very disturbing. After spending millions of dollars on urban renewal and after encouraging virtually everybody else to expand or erect new buildings in that designated area, they now resist going there themselves. Of even more fundamental concern at least to me and to the people of Calgary, is the federal government's apparent lack of concern for the fact that the location they covet for the site of their building would destroy virtually the last possible site for a downtown park.

I hope that the Minister of Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) who, from his public statements at least, is apparently interested in the quality of life in our cities, will use his influence on the Minister of Public Works and the department officials to get them to change their minds; to reconsider their posture. We are not asking for a multi-million dollar federally funded downtown park, although in view of the established precedent, maybe we should. We are simply asking the federal government to erect this building in the urban renewal area and leave at least one small patch of greenery for the people of Calgary Centre, half of whom live in apartments.

This issue, Sir, is obviously not a major or principal issue to my constituents. They, like all Canadians, and probably more than most, are vitally concerned about Canada's future, Canada's unity, its independence, the poverty amidst plenty, unemployment at disastrously high rates, inflation and its effects on the elderly and those on fixed incomes and about all of those major problems facing Canada with which this government has been totally unable to deal.

The people of Calgary Centre are not, using that expression of the member for Rosedale (Mr. Macdonald), rednecks, reactionaries afraid of change. They welcome change, beneficial change. They welcome progress, real progress in coming to grips with the problems facing Canada. They did not see this progress coming from this government for the very obvious reason that there was none. There was activity, a great deal of it; there were great plans, many of those; there were successive throne speeches with promises that inflation and unemployment would be beaten. There were large, very large amounts of money spent. In fact, Sir, there was just about everything, except results, and in Alberta, as the election returns proved, we judge on the basis of results, not on promises, and certainly not on charisma.

This being my contribution to the throne speech debate, I should most properly consider not just the past record of this government, dismal as it was, but rather the program it intends to pursue and that program was presumably outlined in the throne speech. Certainly, within that context, there is much to talk about, not only for what the throne speech includes but, as well, for what it leaves out.

However, one statement in that throne speech in particular, Mr. Speaker, was welcomed, certainly welcomed by me and I am sure the majority of people in my constituency. I refer to the statement that began:

> The government recognizes that Western Canadians wish to build industrial strength on top of their region's great resource and energy base.

The omission of the word "agriculture" may add further fuel to the argument presented by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) earlier today. It apparently took the shock of an election wipe-out to draw this government's attention to what westerners have been saying for years. Yes, we do have a great resource and energy base, and nowhere is that more apparent than in my constituency where are located the headquarters of the vast majority of Canada's petroleum companies, and, incidentally where should be located the headquarters of the National Energy Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: That is why I welcome part of the comments of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Richardson). I am sure he will come to my defence when, at a later date, I present arguments to back that suggestion.

The progressive policies of successive Alberta governments have fostered a healthy and prosperous petroleum industry which, in turn, has helped make Alberta one of the "have" provinces. However, Mr. Speaker, history has shown that great reliance on one industry, no matter how prosperous that industry, can be very dangerous. We had an example of the sort of thing that could occur just before the throne speech where rumours of what the speech might contain caused great gyrations in the western oil section of the stock markets. This is a reflection of the lack of confidence that the business community associated with the petroleum industry has in this government. May I add that the unnecessary delay in tabling the new energy policy is not helping their confidence in any way.

The petroleum industry has been good to Alberta and Alberta has been good to the petroleum industry. That is not to suggest that things cannot be improved because they certainly can. I hope that, if and when we see the energy policy, there will be an opportunity to discuss this point further. It must be pointed out that even a great industry like the oil and gas industry is limited in its capacity to absorb the growing work force of my area of Alberta. Anyone at all familiar with the situation in Alberta realizes that without the development of a substantial secondary industrial base, without the diversification of the economy, Alberta could in the not too distant future become a have-not province like too many others in Canada. No one can argue that awaiting that eventuality before acting will serve any useful purpose, to Alberta or to any other region of Canada. I want to make it abundantly clear that we are not asking for special treatment from Ottawa. We are not asking for handouts or for money to be diverted from other regions to ours. We are asking for fair and equal opportunity with other regions. We are simply asking to have those obstacles removed which now, unnecessarily and unfairly, prevent us from fulfilling our own potential. The cause of Canadian unity, the improvement of the material and social welfare of all Canadians is not well served by policies and, more important, by attitudes that are based on the concept of a central heartland and a subservient hinterland. For that reason, I welcome the commitment made in the throne speech to at least discuss the western viewpoint at a conference on western opportunities.

As an aside, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), if he has not already done so, accept the invitation of Premier Lougheed to hold that conference in my constituency. The hospitality he and any other attending will receive will be of great aid in creating that friendly spirit which will be so necessary if the conference is to produce useful results. Welcomed as the planned conference is, I am sorry it is to be delayed until summer. By that time the honeymoon with the NDP may well be over and this opportunity to educate the future Leader of the Opposition will have been missed.

It is hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the reference in the throne speech to improvement in the transportation system is more than mere window dressing to entice some western voters back to the Liberal fold. I think the voters of western Canada are entitled to be somewhat sceptical, especially so long as Edgar Benson remains head of the Canadian Transportation Commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Also, I listened in vain to the recent speech by the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) for some evidence of new insights or appreciation of the Canadian transportation system and what might be done to improve it. Not only were there none, but a listener would be hard pressed to identify the speaker as having anything at all to do with the Ministry of Transport. As this government seems determined to hold on to power at all costs, I hope that the minister will soon turn his attention to his department.

The problems of transportation and access to markets are obviously of fundamental importance to the development of western Canadian industry. However, the west shares with all other regions of Canada the other basic weaknesses that exist in the economy which are readily apparent in the high unemployment rates and the disastrously high inflation. There are many factors which are contributing to this weakness and my colleagues have been trying to bring these to the attention of the government. I want in my remarks to talk primarily about just one of these factors, that is about Canada's science policy or, more accurately, the lack thereof.

The throne speech mentions measures to improve the transfer of technology from abroad. But what about the development of Canadian technology? In this highly competitive technological age we just cannot rely totally on foreign technology. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) mentioned in his speech that he will be investigating the licensing of foreign technology, recognizing that this mechanism is the preferred way to import technology. The minister indicates that some licensing arrangements, by the conditions they impose, handicap the licensee. He implies that the government will be trying to gain improvements. But what he apparently has failed to grasp is the question of timing. By the time a new technology has been developed to the point that it is ready for licensing abroad, the markets for this technology have already been captured.

So even without restrictive licensing, Canadian industry relying on imported technology will be restricted to the domestic market, and then probably only if it is protected by tariffs. But of even more fundamental long term concern, at least to me, is the fact that every time industry relies upon imported technology, the Canadian pool of technological competence is depleted and our chance of developing viable Canadian industry is reduced.

We must take strong measures to increase Canada's technological competence and this, of course, means establishing a fully co-ordinated science policy which means something and which works. Almost every one of the many groups which have studied and made recommendations regarding Canada's science policy has commented that a national industrial strategy must form the cornerstone of such a science policy. Yet from the remarks of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce it would appear the government is still no closer to such a strategy and apparently does not even know what would constitute such a strategy. Therefore, regrettably, we can expect a continuation of the fragmentation of Canada's secondary industry.

This fragmentation is one of the basic weaknesses of our economy. The reasons are complex, to be sure, but some of the elements are these: the extent of foreign ownership, the anti-combines legislation, unco-ordinated regional economic expansion, unco-ordinated research and development incentive programs. All of these, according to the throne speech, will be reviewed or altered by this government, but apparently in a totally unco-ordinated manner. This exercise, I am afraid, is going to cost the Canadian taxpayer great amounts of money and do very little to improve the state of Canada's secondary industry, which the Chemical Institute of Canada recently called a national emergency.

It is imperative that the government give the highest priority to developing a national industrial strategy and, in conjunction with that, a national science policy. The government should create a department of science and technology with responsibility to develop and implement this policy. This department should be responsible for all research and development incentive programs, for the patent office and all research agencies and departments of the federal government.

All government research and research incentive programs should be reviewed and related to the production of social and economic goods and services. The recently announced farm-out policy should be administered by this department and expanded to include most of the research now done in the House. I am certain that were she here the new Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mrs. Sauvé) would agree that these suggestions are both reasonable and necessary. I can only hope the minister is able to convince her cabinet colleagues that these steps are necessary and that the science ministry should be more than just a training ground for more important posts.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to conclude my remarks by stating that while the major part of my speech was based on economic matters, these matters are not my principal concern. The social problems facing Canada are frightening in scope and depressing to contemplate. But one thing is sure; their solution is almost impossible without a strong economy. Therefore, I would urge the government to act quickly on the many responsible suggestions coming from this side of the House, or else to trade places with us and let us get on with the job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is traditional, of course, to offer you compliments on being elected as Speaker of this august House. I do not think I can add anything to what already has been said, except that I know of no man who would be better qualified or more deserving of this high honour and office. I am pleased, also, to offer congratulations to the Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), with whom I have had considerable association during the last four and a half years as a Member of Parliament through the parliamentary breakfast group in which he has been a very active participant and leader. I am proud to be associated with that hon. member and to congratulate him upon the honour this House has bestowed upon him. In addition, I should like to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They did great credit to themselves and to the constituencies they represent.

In the Speech from the Throne a great deal of importance was attached to a policy area which is of immediate concern to me as parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde). There was in the throne speech a great deal said about social security matters and forthcoming changes in the fitness and amateur sports program, as well as changes in health care arrangements. This is the area about which I would like to speak more specifically.

The Speech from the Throne contained a brief reference to the fact that federal-provincial meetings at the ministerial level are projected on a range of urgent matters and that these include health care programs. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, the hon. member for Outremont, subsequently informed the House that there has been under consideration, a proposal for change in the federal-provincial financing arrangements which will be discussed at a joint session of federal and provincial health and finance ministers which will be held January 19.

If these deliberations reach a satisfactory conclusion, we are confident that the provinces will have a much better framework within which to develop health care programs which are not only efficient and effective but also in accord with their respective priorities. These goals can and should be achieved within the broad framework of existing national health standards of the present hospital insurance and medical care programs, relating to comprehensiveness of insured services, universality, accessibility and portability.

In view of the obvious priority which has been given to this matter by the federal and provincial ministers most directly involved, I am certain hon. members would wish to be given a review of developments to date in order that they may understand the importance of these deliberations and be able to take an interest in the eventual outcome. Recently elected members of the House might not yet have had time to completely familiarize themselves with the issues involved, and for them in particular I hope my remarks will be helpful.

The hospital insurance and diagnostic services program implemented in 1958, and the medical care program which commenced in 1968 together account for the bulk of our health care expenditures. These two programs are currently costing the two senior levels of government about $3.5 billion annually. These costs are shared about equally between both levels of government, but the cost-sharing formulae provide a higher percentage of federal financial support to provinces with lower per capita costs, and somewhat less than 50 per cent in the case of provinces which have per capita costs which are higher than the national average.

It is worth while recalling that during the 1950s many hospitals were in serious financial trouble and that many sick persons were not able to obtain necessary treatment because of financial barriers of one sort or another. The hospital insurance and diagnostic services program was implemented in 1958, which subsequently made it possible for all Canadians to receive necessary hospital care of an acceptable standard, on a prepaid basis. Generally speaking, the system has been functioning fairly well, it has met the objectives set for it at that time and the vast majority of Canadians receive care that is adequate for their needs without incurring excessive financial burdens. However, such factors as the increased complexity of hospital care, with advancing technology, the increased availability of hospital beds and improved remuneration for hospital staff have all contributed to a relatively high escalation year by year in the cost of hospital care.

Since the program recognizes, for cost-sharing purposes, only specified hospital services, it does not encourage the development of adequate alternative forms of care at lower cost for those patients who could be treated just as satisfactorily but in a less expensive way than by occupying expensive, acute care hospital beds. With proper arrangements, there need be no compromise in the quality of care actually provided for such patients. Surveys have indicated that as many as 30 per cent of the patients occupying beds in general hospitals could be adequately cared for on some other basis if the services they require were available without financial penalty to the patients themselves. We have tended to be rather lavish with providing health care through hospitalization, particularly through the use of high-cost beds. For example, we have per capita more active treatment hospital beds than there are in the United States.

Our second major health insurance program, the medical care program which was introduced in 1968, was based largely on the findings and recommendations of the Royal Commission on Health Services, the Hall report which was submitted in 1964. This commission, which was appointed in 1961, undertook a most comprehensive and detailed assessment of Canadian health services. In its major report submitted in 1964 it reported that it had found that while nearly 60 per cent of Canadians had some insurance protection against the costs of medical care, approximately 30 per cent of it was totally inadequate. Medicare was established to solve this problem.

The open-ended nature of the federal-provincial financing of these programs is now a major point of concern. No limits are placed on the health services which an insured person may receive provided the criteria of medical necessity are met. This is a fair and just provision. However, neither program provides sufficient flexibility for the provinces to develop alternative and less costly forms of health care consistent with the needs and priorities as perceived by the provincial governments. The nature of the current sharing formulae is such that the provinces only obtain sharing for certain specified services, and thus there is an inadequate incentive to cut costs and provide less expensive services.

Controlling the escalation of the costs of our two major national health insurance programs has become one of the chief priorities of all levels of government. During the last three complete fiscal years the combined average annual rate of increase in the cost of the two programs has been about 13 per cent. This rate of increase significantly exceeds the growth rate of our gross national product. The rate of escalation must be reduced, for obvious reasons. We must take steps to ensure that we are receiving the best possible value for our health care dollars.

The federal and provincial ministers of health have been for some time deeply involved in studying ways and means of resolving these problems. For example, in November, 1968, we appointed a federal-provincial committee on costs of health services to recommend what steps should be taken to contain costs without having an adverse effect on the quality of care. The report of the committee and its seven subsidiary task forces was presented to the conference of health ministers in November, 1969. Most of the areas where improvements could be effected naturally lie within the provincial sphere of responsibility in so far as implementation is concerned.

The committee drew attention to the need for co-ordinated government planning for health facilities and services. Many of its other recommendations cannot be fully implemented without such co-ordinated action. However, provincial efforts to improve the delivery of health care, both in regard to effectiveness and efficiency, cannot be maximized unless sufficient flexibility and incentives are provided through the federal-provincial financing arrangements. The federal government believes that changes can be made to achieve this desired result.

We subsequently proposed that future federal financial contributions to the provinces in respect of health insurance might take the form of a per capita payment to replace the contributions presently payable under the hospital insurance and medical care acts. Flexibility, which many provincial ministers desired, could be achieved through each province being free to use the federal contribution in accordance with its own priorities, provided existing national standards for coverage were maintained. Federal payments, therefore, could be applied to the total range of provincial health services, existing and innovative, and in the way deemed most effective, without the province incurring financial penalties as a result of cost-saving measures.

The federal minister emphasized that any new financial arrangements should not result in a lessening of federal-provincial co-operation in health matters, particularly with respect to improvements in the way in which health care services are arranged. The minister therefore gave his provincial colleagues an unqualified commitment that the federal government would continue and if necessary expand its role in promoting federal-provincial co-operation in the exchange of information, in the provision of consultative services and in the support of studies, surveys and research. The Department of National Health and Welfare has already increased its ability to respond to this commitment, particularly in its response to meeting the expressed desires and requests received from a number of provinces, in particular the smaller ones.

The minister felt that a fresh approach along the lines indicated would be the most effective way of containing costs without impairing the quality of care. The reactions of the provincial ministers of health at this meeting in December, 1970, to the general outline of the proposal was most encouraging. Following the meeting, the federal minister instructed that a detailed examination of the existing federal legislation be proceeded with at the official level and that an attempt be made to work out, in consultation with provincial officials, a suitable alternative cost-sharing arrangement for consideration by the ministers of health.

The outline of a possible approach was the subject of extensive bilateral discussions with the provinces at the official level during the months of April and May, 1971. While most provinces at this time expressed a positive attitude towards the principles and objectives of the approach, there was a common concern about the adequacy of some of the financial features, such as the escalation factor suggested and the base year upon which future costs would be calculated.

Significant modifications were subsequently made in the initial approach, including the provision of special thrust funds to help provinces finance the reorganization of their health care delivery systems according to their particular needs. These modifications were thoroughly discussed with the provinces at the official level. Further substantial modifications were subsequently made in the suggested formula to meet continuing and additional provincial concerns which were considered justifiable.

The concern with health care costs was also an item on the agenda of the conference of first ministers which was held in Ottawa from November 16 to November 18, 1971, and it was on the agenda of a meeting of finance ministers which was held at the end of January, 1972. Both the then minister of national health and welfare and the President of the Treasury Board, the hon. member for Westmount (Mr. Drury), reviewed for the first ministers the progress made to that date in the legislative review and the search for an acceptable alternative to the current cost-sharing arrangements.

The President of the Treasury Board urged that most serious consideration be given to the proposed arrangements. He pointed out that the proportion of our gross national product being spent on health care was large enough to make Canada one of the healthiest nations in the world, if the money was spent wisely. He also urged that the cost-sharing arrangements be amended to maximize the probability of this being achieved through rationalizing health care in Canada.

The federal minister placed before a conference of health ministers which was held in Ottawa on December 16 and 17, 1971, a detailed federal proposal which is still before the provinces. I would like to review briefly its basic payment features. First of all, the federal payment would be made on a per capita basis per insured resident of each province, with the payment being revised annually in accordance with changes in population and general changes in the economy. This payment could be applied to the whole range of health services and would not be limited, as at present, to specific health services. The nationally accepted standard of comprehensiveness, accessibility, universality on uniform terms and conditions, and portability of hospital and medical insurance services would have to be maintained.

The per capita payment would be escalated by the rate of growth of the gross national product excluding, of course, the population component of that index. However, in order to protect the per capita payment against year to year fluctuations, the escalation factor would be based upon the moving average of five consecutive yearly indices. Per capita payments would be standardized among the provinces over a period of five years through appropriate yearly adjustments.

A thrust fund would be available on a different basis, and I will later describe this provision in more detail. The initial agreement with respect to the per capita payments would be for a period of five years, and for the thrust fund this would be available over a period of six years. All the features of the federal proposal as a package are designed to lead to the development of a total health care system. This must not be lost sight of when considering elements of the over-all federal proposal.

The levels of the basic per capita contributions would be determined in relation to the costs of existing insured services of the current hospital and medical care insurance programs. Provision has been included to accommodate a nationally insured optometric benefit. As already indicated, the basic per capita payments would be available for use by the provinces for the whole range of health services.

A special thrust fund, to which I alluded earlier, has been proposed at a level of $640 million and would be payable to the provinces over a six-year period to assist in the reorganization and improvement of the provincial health care delivery systems. These funds would be for mutually agreeable projects designed to promote improvements in the efficiency of these systems. I should emphasize that the thrust funds would not be required to be matched by the provinces. The thrust fund would be made available for the capital and operating costs of acceptable provincial programs designed to bring about the reorganization and development of the health care delivery system into an integrated mechanism. The thrust fund would also help to cushion the time lag between the implementation of reforms and the appearance of resulting economies.

The thrust funds would also be made available to help finance a service or a program which will clearly substitute for or avoid the expansion of existing and unnecessarily expensive methods of providing necessary care. They would not be made available to simply shore up the existing system by being merely used as a supplement to the federal per capita payments in meeting the operating costs of the present system. It is not intended for the provision of new services or for the building of new facilities, nor is it intended to meet the costs of additional insured benefits for services not now covered, except where these would substitute for costly services which are presently insured, nor to support research, innovative studies, surveys or the like. It must be recognized, however, that many of the acceptable programs will in fact be breaking new ground.

Examples of areas where potential improvements exist and for which thrust fund support may be approved include home care, programs that effectively take patients out of hospital, costs for community health centres and other facilities providing ambulatory care, and the development and increased use of allied health personnel to avoid the unnecessary use of high-cost professional services. It would be up to each province to determine the reforms which are the most promising according to its own particular situation, and which will likely find acceptance for thrust fund support. In a nutshell, the thrust fund is aimed at producing reform and rationalization in the way in which health care services are made available.

Criticisms and reservations have been expressed by the provinces throughout these many discussions and the federal government has tried to respond by making appropriate modifications in the proposal. A major recommendation of the provinces is that the federal government commit itself to some degree of risk sharing in the event that unexpectedly high provincial costs are encountered.

The federal government is very serious about its intention to moderate the escalation of health care costs and to make it easier for the provinces to effect significant improvements in the way health care services are provided. It is sincerely hoped that all provinces share the federal views in this matter, and that agreement can be reached on new financing arrangements which will provide to the provinces the desired flexibility in the use of federal contributions and create the framework for the introduction of less costly but equally effective health care services.

Personally, I look forward to participating in the federal-provincial conference of finance and health ministers which will take place this coming Friday and I share with the minister the hope that the agreements which will be reached at that and subsequent conferences will prove to be of significant and lasting benefit to all Canadians.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying what a great honour it is for me to be a member of this House and to sit with such a distinguished group of men and women from across Canada. I feel it speaks highly for our democratic system of government when a refugee from Czechoslovakia can have the opportunity to be elected to represent other Canadians in the governing of this great country.

My constituency of High Park-Humber Valley rests on the shores of Lake Ontario and is a part of west Toronto. It is a riding which is truly representative of the strength and vitality of our country. It is made up of Canadians who represent a wide variety of cultural heritages, sharing not only the beautiful and scenic open-spaced park from which the riding receives its name but also the winding Humber Valley through which the now too polluted Humber River flows.

On the west side of the river there is a part of the new burgeoning borough of Etobicoke, and on the east the old village of Swansea and a large section of York township which used to be known as west Toronto. It is a riding of diversity and complexities, an exciting and interesting place in which to live and for me to represent. That is why I regret that the federal electoral boundaries commission has seen fit to make major changes in the riding's boundaries.

The greatest strength of this constituency, and indeed of all Canada, lies in its people of various cultural heritages and backgounds. The quality of the lives of all Canadians has been enriched by the number of cultures that have joined to form our society, and it is important that we maintain this rich cultural heritage while adapting to changing conditions in Canada. I believe in Canadian unity and will play any part I can to ensure that this unity is maintained in every sense of the word.

I was appalled, as were most Canadians, at the recent comments of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) which attempted to create an issue by accusing our party of dividing the country. To make Canadian unity a partisan issue is very dangerous indeed and can only create problems, not solve them. I am sure that every member of this House is here for the primary purpose of keeping Canada unified and it seems to me that the Prime Minister, with his recent remarks, might be better suited to govern a single province rather than the whole of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: At this time I would like to take the opportunity to add my congratulations to the Speaker on his re-election to the House. As a new member, I can only say how highly he is regarded by the many hon. members I have talked with. I look forward to his guidance which, along with all new members, I will certainly be needing in the weeks and months ahead. I would also like to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), who I know will do justice to his position as Deputy Speaker.

I would like to congratulate the Prime Minister, as well, on the second big romance of his life. Even though I am new to the House, I have been told that romance and politics do not mix. I am sure that his first romance will have a long and prosperous life, unlike the second which is doomed to failure.

As we all know, Mr. Speaker, some of the greatest problems facing us today are the continuing rise of inflation, unemployment and the general instability of our economy. I can think of no better example than my own business experiences during the Trudeau years to demonstrate the many flaws in the government's over-all economic policies. Unfortunately, my experience is not an isolated example but is a far too common happening in Canadian business today. I started a small manufacturing company some years ago. In the first three years we realized a substantial growth to over $1 million in sales, providing over 50 new jobs for Canadians. By the middle of 1971 business had become very active and we reached even higher sales which required us to expand our facilities. For this we needed further financing. Up to this point it sounds like a perfectly healthy business situation.

The crunch came when we approached chartered banks, and finally the Industrial Development Bank which theoretically was created to promote the economic welfare of Canada with particular consideration to the financing problems of small enterprises, in other words, to help small businesses across Canada and thus stimulate a healthier economy. It took us close to a year to obtain a relatively small loan from the IDB, which cost us in legal fees nearly 10 per cent of the loan. Our collateral to the IDB was almost four times the value of the loan. As a matter of fact, it took so much for collateral that if I had told them my grandmother had gold fillings in her teeth they probably would have wanted those as well. On top of all that, the interest rate was 11½ per cent. I do not call that helpful to anyone.

Eventually, like many other Canadian manufacturing companies lacking growth capital in order to create jobs, curb inflation, and generally in a small way help the over-all Canadian economy, the American sharks were biting at our heels. To make the story short, we were finally offered to be bought out by an American firm that had already been offered the required capital for the takeover by the same Canadian bank that had turned us down, to stay Canadian. In other words, it is the same old story of being bought out with our own money. Fortunately, they made me an offer that I could refuse.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: We have taken note of the fact that small business failures in Canada in 1972 were at record levels and the trend is continuing in 1973. The over-all level of business failures for some months was the worst since the depression, We have taken into consideration the fact that small business ownership suffers from lack of adequate capital, higher interest rates and excessively high taxation. We have taken note of the fact that the government of Canada appears to believe, as we do, that tax incentives granted to the larger corporations produce beneficial results.

As a means of promoting small business, our party has proposed, among other things, allowing Canadian citizens to deduct from their income tax half of any amount up to $5,000 invested in small Canadian companies. The Prime Minister's response to this proposal has been an interesting one. He has said that it would be inflationary. But of course, Mr. Speaker, you must remember that this is a statement from the same Prime Minister who told the nation last fall that he did not think the rise in food prices was a very serious matter because it was good for the farmers.

Also last fall, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) stated, with respect to our proposal to encourage personal initiative and community enterprise, "it would provide an opportunity for some individuals to reap a rich bonanza . . . without meeting any demonstrated need of small businesses for funds." This is an insult to the individual and an affront to the business community. We have stated that there is a desperate need for incentives to the small business community in Canada to help it grow, while the Minister of Finance has said that small businessmen have not demonstrated the need. Well then, Mr. Speaker, who has demonstrated the need? Perhaps the government is demonstrating the need—the same government that estimated that the budget last year, for special services and outside consultants, was $531 million. These tax-supported consultants were superimposed on the public service of Canada. They have been described as arriving in Ottawa by the planeload every Tuesday and leaving by the planeload every Thursday. The government has advisers advising advisers and consultants consulting consultants. The government of Canada today has the most serious case of "the files" in its history. No one knows what they do; it is secret and confidential. We only know the cost.

With four years of investigating, analysing, consulting and advising, why was there not a policy for unemployment insurance that was not a recipe for bankruptcy, a policy for economic independence that would satisfy someone other than the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), and why was there no policy for small businesses at all? In my opinion there is no logic in a policy that would allow the unemployment insurance deficit to soar to such unbelievable heights while ignoring the key areas in the economy that would greatly assist in the creation of jobs.

It is fine to hear all of these problems mentioned in the Speech from the Throne after ignoring them for four years, but the government's sincerity to act on the multitude of topics it outlined is questionable, particularly in view of the fact that the government and its new friends in the House even refused to take care of the most pressing problem of the old age pensioners, a problem which is long overdue for solution.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, even key Liberals no longer believe the present government can solve Canada's economic problems. For example, Charles Templeton, former leader of the Ontario provincial Liberal party, a strong voice for the Liberals in the media for many years and an organizer and strategist for the Liberals, admitted on his radio program on CKEY last week in Toronto that the archaic principles followed by the Liberal government cannot solve the problems of unemployment and inflation, and that the Progressive Conservatives should form the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, turning to an area that is of importance for the general physical and mental well-being of all Canadians, in this regard I was happy to submit a private member's notice on January 4 of this year which reads as follows:

That this House, affirming that Canada should adopt physical fitness and athletic excellence as a major national goal—as well as for the health and general well-being of Canadians as for the contribution which a successful sports program can make to Canadian unity and to the Canadian identity recommends that a national council for sports be established which would support and co-ordinate the activities of regional training centres to be built in various areas of Canada by the federal government in consultation with the provinces, sports governing bodies and community groups.

I was interested to see that the throne speech stated:

In response to the increasing importance of fitness for the well-being and health of Canadians and the need for greater opportunities for people to participate in sports activities, the federal government has proposed over the next three years to more than double the current level of expenditures under the fitness and amateur sports program.

I was puzzled, however, Mr. Speaker, that no mention was made in the throne speech of the world international event, the Olympic games, an event that not only tightens national unity within a country but, indeed, attempts to bind together all countries around the world. We all know that today's magnitude of the games could become a costly proposition and thus, most probably, a problem with far reaching consequences. I suggest that the government, even though it has been in constant touch with the various Olympic organizing committees, has been most obvious in trying to evade this issue, and therefore I should like to make some suggestions regarding this matter through this House.

Realizing the possibilities of incurring high costs, we must look for some options or alternatives. The Olympic Games in recent years have become much too large and complicated, both in regard to facilities and the number of participants, to be held in any one city. They are no longer the games consisting of a small scattering of individual athletes, as was the case a decade or so ago when I was lucky enough to represent Canada at the Olympics.

I believe that Montreal is the city best able to cope with the multitude of problems that would be faced by staging the games in Canada. However, because of the costs and added possible benefits to our country, we should consider partially decentralizing the games somewhat along the lines of the Munich Olympics, which in fact took place in as many as seven different cities, one as far away as 550 miles from Munich.

For example, Mr. Speaker, do we have to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars on gymnastic facilities? No; Laval University, in Quebec City, has one of the best sports complexes in North America. Do we have to spend millions of dollars on an Olympic pool for swimming and diving? No; Winnipeg has the country's best, and the Etobicoke Jaycees near Toronto are in the process of planning one, with no government aid.

Ottawa-Hull has one of the world's finest shooting ranges. St. Catharines has the only Henley rowing course in Canada—the world's finest—on which the federal government has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars. Kingston is made to order for sailing, and Toronto, with its large ethnic population alone, is ideal for soccer; and on and on—to save money and to promote good will, to reap benefits by permitting larger proportions of the Canadian population to benefit both monetarily and socially by seeing and feeling their part in the Olympic games, and to boost tourism, both on a short-term and long-term basis, whether it be through travel, accommodation or gaining international reputation and Canadian self-esteem.

The facilities alone must eventually be built across different areas of Canada as this country has already committed itself to holding no less than seven major sporting events of national significance before the end of 1976. These are the Canada games in 1973, the Canada Olympics in 1974, the PanAmerican games trials in 1975, the Canada winter games in 1975, the Canada Olympic games trials in 1976, the Canada Olympics in 1976 and the Olympic games in 1976.

Mr. Speaker, if Montreal were to agree to somewhat decentralize the games, I believe that the Olympics would provide more than tourism, facilities and international esteem. Starting now, the Olympics could be, and should be, the rallying point, the stimulus to make the people of Canada physically fit. When you consider that Canada's 30-year old males have the same physical fitness rating as some 60-year old males in Sweden, it is shocking. I am glad to see the government is getting off its seat, though very, very slowly, to help our spectator populace to do the same. Looking around the House, I would suggest that this is one instance where some members should take notice.

I know that in the minds of many people it is important to win medals in the Olympic games, and I suppose it is. However, I do not believe that a vast program of financial aid over the next four years to train our best prospects for 1976 is the whole answer. Athletic excellence at the Olympics should not be our only goal—physical fitness and health for everyone should be our main objective. We will only be successful at the Olympics or in any sporting event when athletic excellence by a few is part and parcel of general fitness for everyone. I know of no better incentive for such a program than the Olympic games themselves.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to change to yet another topic of immediate importance, that of capital punishment. Although I will vote on this matter as the majority of people in my riding would have me vote, my own strong, personal views can best be summed up in this radio editorial given by Mr. Robert Holiday last week on CHFI in Toronto, following a recent incident in that city:

Another policeman is dead, another woman widowed, another son fatherless, another bill to abolish capital punishment, another provision that killers of policeman be hanged.

The single death of a policeman is not likely to make any difference to the majority of the Members of Parliament who will be voting on the capital punishment legislation.

There are in this country too many people that believe hanging for murder is cruel and inhuman punishment for a man or woman convicted of such a crime. These people, it appears, have no regard for the victim or victim's family. That argument, however, I will leave for another time.

What makes this new five-year ban before parliament so meaningless and what makes me bristle, is the attitude of the federal cabinet during the five-year ban which has just expired.

There was a provision for capital punishment to be levied against convicted killers of policemen and prison guards, but was a man so convicted during this five years ever hanged? He was not.

The new legislation prepared for this new twenty-ninth parliament has a similar provision.

But of what use has this provision if the federal cabinet during the next five years refuses to recognize the will of parliament and again, as it has in the past, vetoes that legislation and commutes the death sentence imposed on the policeman or prison guard killer? Men and women hyped by speed and armed with weapons walk our streets with violence in their minds and murder in their hearts. You and I walk these same streets unarmed, protected only by the men recruited to keep law and order and when these men give their lives while protecting our lives and our property, who pays? Does the law of the land demand payment? Yes, it does.

Who then should have the right to abrogate that law? The federal cabinet, in an aberration for which there is no sensible reason and which cannot be justified, does and has exercised that right repeatedly. It is time to re-examine this masochistic trait. We teach people that the age of maturity is 18. If a person after he or she reaches that age chooses to become an operative outside of the mainstream of society and is convicted of killing a man who maintains the law of the land, you cannot justify commutation after you attempt to justify life for this miserable human.

You are doing an injustice to those who live within the law and to those who maintain it. A killer has no right to inflict his presence on this society after he has been sentenced to death for the murder of a policeman. For if he lives, he is living proof that society has no desire to protect itself or protect those hired to protect lives and property. To let him live makes a mockery of the law, makes a mockery of those who enacted the legislation and those who elected the enactors of the legislation.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Jelinek.]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great privilege to rise in this House at this time to make my maiden speech and to speak for the first time on behalf of the voters of the constituency of Toronto-Lakeshore whom I have the honour to represent. The sense of occasion is for me enhanced by my recollection that my grandfather sat in this House some years ago for the constituency of Welland. He was elected in the years 1925, 1926 and 1930 and to this day George Pettit remains the only Conservative to have won the constituency of Welland since the year 1896. I only hope that some of his obvious ability to engage and retain the confidence of his electors will have passed on to my generation.

As a teacher of political science, I have had occasion in recent years to refer to the importance of the office of Speaker and the skill of the present incumbent. In extending my congratulations to the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker, I can only say that since coming here my views of their importance and skill have been reinforced.

Since the election, many commentators have sought to explain what took place and to analyse the collective motivation of the voters on that occasion. Tonight I simply want to add my observations and say that, in my judgment, for many voters, both in my constituency and across the country, the election was a collective search for fairness. I believe that people in great numbers felt that somehow the social and economic system pressed upon them unfairly. Many people were defeatist and apathetic about the possibility of effecting substantial change. Successive government failures, both by Liberal governments and by their Conservative predecessors, rendered voters cynical and indifferent to the possibility of change. I suggest, aside from any partisanship, that such an attitude is not good. We, as parliamentarians, must produce and show the voters in this country that the political process is capable of solid achievement.

In a number of areas this sense of unfairness and a collective groping for a fairer system manifested itself. Wage and salaried employees, and these constitute the great majority of our labour force, knew almost instinctively that the tax system in Canada was pressing upon them most heavily while at the same time other groups enjoyed tax allowances and concessions of no visible social utility, and that the revenues produced by the tax system were in large part being funnelled to individuals or enterprises better off than the average citizen.

Canadians across the country in this election campaign knew instinctively that they were paying more than their fair share of Canada's taxes and that they were, and indeed still are, getting less than their fair share in return. There is nothing much very new about this, but in an age of slogans about equity and justice it sticks in the craw. Moreover, it erodes people's sense of willingness to contribute of themselves and of their resources to the collective well-being of the country. When that willingness to contribute to a country's well-being is worn away, a nation's strength is sapped. For that reason, as well as for the reason of equity, I believe, as my leader pointed out on so many occasions during the campaign, that this parliament must attach a high priority to the restructuring of our taxation system, to the end that individuals and enterprises together pay their fair share; no more and no less.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: I suggest that this sense of unfairness was also felt in the field of unemployment. All of us today recognize that unemployment is very largely caused by factors beyond the concern of the ordinary worker. It may be caused by ill-advised anti-inflation policies such as those produced by the Liberal government in the years following 1968. It may be caused by the introduction of new plant and equipment technology which has the effect of causing layoffs. I may say that in the constituency of Lakeshore this winter there will be numbers of persons laid off for this reason. It may result from the hasty and ill-considered rationalization and consolidation of plants and industry, a consolidation and rationalization which was suggested, if not in this House at least following the general election, by the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). This, too, can create hardship and result in a loss of jobs. It may result from a reduction in product demand, as was the case last week in my constituency where a firm employing upward of 500 people announced that its doors would close on May 1.

When people such as these are rendered unemployed by circumstances beyond their control, they are all too frequently called lazy. Their incentive to work is called into question. Indeed, they are sometimes called bums. They are harried by an unemployment insurance machinery which, while it may have been conceived in good will and while it may be overworked and harassed by some critics, none the less all too frequently operates with indiscriminate and impersonal inefficiency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: It is ironic to compare the meagre benefits allowed by that system with the pension entitlement which a suddenly unemployed Member of Parliament with a major attachment may claim.

Another area of unfairness that surfaced in the campaign was that of housing. This area has been mentioned by other hon. members. In cities like Toronto, new, expensive homes, be they single-family or apartments, boost the housing starts statistics but they offer little consolation to ordinary working families who do not have the means to qualify for them. Not for them a new home in Toronto with a starting purchase price upwards of $37,000 or $38,000, or an apartment with a monthly rent of $250 to $275. Their alternatives are few. Alas, in my constituency the alternative is too often to move outside the riding to ex-urban communities to the west and northwest of Toronto. Thus, among other things, they deprive the constituency of a new generation of leadership to which it ought to be entitled and without which it cannot continue the sense of community which has sustained it so far.

Too often, older homes which could provide accommodation for many thousands of people are allowed to be bought up for apartment developments. I can say that in our constituency we are making a determined effort to control this phenomenon. But it leads me to urge upon the government the necessity to provide NHA loans to those who wish to purchase existing or older housing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: In the absence of such a provision, I cannot see any hope for reversing the present trend in urban housing. I also urge upon the government the necessity of introducing measures to reduce the interest rate on mortgages for homes. In this connection I should like to quote from a letter I received yesterday from a constituent of mine:

> We bought a small family home in January, 1969, with $2,000 down payment. The first mortgage is at 8¼ per cent and expires October, 1973. The second is at 9 per cent and expires January, 1974. We pay our mortgage payments exactly on time. To afford the high payment we live an unbelievably simple life. We have no car, we stay always at home.
> We find out we paid almost nothing into the house during four years. High interest took almost all the money. We have paid up to the present time, for both mortgages, $11,300; $8,000 is for interest and $3,300 for the house. Increased interest will make this picture even worse.
> We want very much to keep our home. But now we are in danger. When mortgages expire and interest increases, what will be? We can never pay off the house. The interest is inhuman. We are not young any more, and we need to pay off the house during 10 to 15 years. But how? With high interest it is not possible. Please help us to get a government loan with low interest. Our dream is to put together the first and second mortgages with low interest. It is only possible with government help. Please try to understand us and please help us. We are worried; we do not want to lose our home and many years hard work. Our income is $6,000.

Mr. Speaker, I shall have to reply to that letter by saying that unless the present government takes steps to provide lower interest rates on mortgages, such hopes may be forlorn.

Another area of concern is that of pensions. Older people wait while almost all others, not least elected politicians and not only at this level, are able to increase their income and their pension. This waiting and this concern, this apprehension and frustration is, I am afraid, often cynically explained either at election time or, I regret to say, by manoeuvres like that proposed in this chamber the other day.

Another area of unfairness toward which voters in this election groped for a solution is that of prices. Steadily rising prices press upon the average working family, and yet when one asks why prices are going up, one is treated to sophisticated rationalizations from the corporate world, from public relations types and others who can all too often bamboozle and confuse the public. Labour costs are frequently blamed, but the public has up to now been denied the facts. That is why I welcome, albeit with reservation, the proposal presented by the government in the throne speech to establish a committee to investigate food prices and the food industry. I shall be surprised if they do not come to the conclusion—I hope it is a swift one—that they are forced to recommend a prices review mechanism at the very least of the kind which has been proposed on many occasions by our leader and other members of this party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: I may say in passing, Mr. Speaker, that I for one tend to be sceptical of the recent trend toward consumerism which is so evident in today's advertising and so much part of the public relations façade of contemporary industry. I am sceptical that it is as much as anything else an effort to lull the public into a sense of security that something substantial is being done to preserve their equity in the market place, without taking any real steps to solve the problem.

Also in passing, Mr. Speaker, I have some hesitation about the concept of wage-price freezes because, neophyte as I may be in the science of economics, it does not seem to me that wages and prices are comparable elements in the economics equation. Wages are the return to labour and profit is the return to capital and investment, and price is the mechanism by which these two returns are achieved. Therefore, I would suggest that if we are going to talk about wage freezes and wage controls we must talk also of profit freezes and profit controls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: These are the analogous, the comparable elements in the economics equation, and the price mechanism is simply the framework within which they are achieved.

When I talk of prices, Mr. Speaker, I think of the symbolic significance of the recent application by Bell Canada before the Canadian Transport Commission for rate increases. It seems to me, in a time of expressed concern about rising prices, that it is somehow curious that this government should take such a laissez-faire attitude toward the application by Bell.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: The burden of Bell's application appears to be that it requires equity capital and that it faces a lack of investor confidence. If it raises its rates, as it is seeking to do across the board, it will presumably ensure higher earnings and provide a greater attraction to investors. The effect of this, however, will be that consumers will pay more; they will subsidize Bell's profits and reward Bell's investors. Of course, the double irony is that having achieved, if they do so, the rate increase for 1973, Bell will within a matter of months turn around and submit another application for a rate increase for 1974—the so-called application "B". The effect of Bell's "A" plus "B" theorem—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grier: —will be a 100 per cent increase in most general service charges, 100 per cent in pay telephone calls, and residential phone tariffs will increase by around 50 cents a month, just to take some examples from the various applications submitted by that corporation. Yet Bell's last increase was awarded in the spring of 1972 and we appear to be on the verge of an annual affair between Bell Canada and the Canadian Transport Commission. Bell complains about cost squeezes and lack of investor confidence, but I draw to the attention of this House that the figures show that Bell's profits in 1971 were upward of $140 million, up from $108 million in 1967. In the last ten years, total profits were over $1 billion, and between 1962 and last year they had increased by 125 per cent.

Bell Canada ranks number one among Canadian corporations in terms of assets and in terms of net income; third in rank by sales. It has often exceeded the earnings ceiling laid down by the commission and has done so without penalty. Its earnings per share rose 26 per cent in the five-year period from 1966, and two of its subsidiaries received close to $9 million in the fiscal year 1971-72 by way of federal government grants.

Bell has a lot to say about equity. Mr. Speaker, what about equity for the consumer? Equity is another word for fairness. I suggest that the commission and this government must be more concerned about equity for the Canadian taxpayer and the Canadian consumer than they are about equity for Bell Canada. If the public is going to subsidize Bell's operations in this way, I suggest the public is entitled to equity in return.

I therefore call on the government, as I have in questions in days gone by, first to join with the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in opposing Bell's application for a rate increase. The Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier) indicated in a reply to a question last week that he could conceive of certain times and circumstances in which it would be appropriate for the government to make a statement about this application. I suggest the time is now and that the circumstances are appropriate.

I also call upon the government to insist that the CTC hold hearings in centres other than the city of Ottawa. Many individuals and groups, including municipalities, have indicated that problems of distance, time and expense prevent their coming to Ottawa and following up any written briefs they may have by appearing in person before the commission. In a matter of this magnitude, affecting one of the largest corporations in Canada and Canadian consumers, it does not seem to me inappropriate to suggest that the committee should take itself out of Ottawa to other centres of the country and make it more convenient for people to appear before it, thus demonstrating to the people that it is indeed concerned that their voice shall be heard to the fullest extent.

Moreover, I suggest that if Bell's problem is a valid one, and if in fact Bell must have more capital in order to carry on its operation, then in consideration for the public supplying this capital the public should be entitled, through the public sector and this government, to some equity ownership in Bell.

This search for fairness is not over. It is going on now in the country and I think it is going on now in this House. I sense that a politically divided House, as this is, reflects a politically divided country—and both require a generous measure of co-operation. Yet I am bound to say, with some regret, that hon. members to my right are acting as if this were a majority parliament and as if criticism and gamesmanship could be carried on without fear of the consequences and without particular concern for the anxieties of many Canadians who expressed those anxieties during the election campaign. This gamesmanship and this political manoeuvring, to me, belies their expressed concern for people's problems. For all their criticism of the government, much of it justified, about speeches from the government side being less than specific, I am bound to say that the speeches from the Progressive Conservative benches have been even less specific.

If it is specifics the House is looking for, I suggest all members, including those of my own party, are obliged to present them. I am quite sure that Canadians want parliament to get on with the job, and if no single party has a mandate—and indeed no single party has—then surely parliament itself has a mandate. We, as members of the House of Commons, are under a stong obligation, if not to put partisan advantage aside, because that would be unrealistic, at least to contain it within limits so that we may in the coming weeks and months pass some solid legislation.

I think a party indecently anxious to get into power does neither itself nor the Canadian people a service, if I may presume to say so. I detect a faint resemblance between the behaviour of members on the Conservative benches in this House and members who sat on the Liberal benches in 1958 and repeatedly asked the government of the day to move aside and let them do the job. No party won this election, and certainly the Conservative party did not win it. I think all of us are obliged to bear that in mind. Mr. Speaker, it may be naïve and presumptuous of me, as a new member, to hope that recriminations and exceedingly political gamesmanship can take a back seat for the next weeks and months—but I do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, it is always with pride that I address this House on behalf of the constituents of Labelle to whom I want to pay homage and express my gratitude for the confidence they showed me October 30 last in reelecting me as their member and representative in the House of Commons.

[English]

Before I go any further, I should like to extend my congratulations to the preceding speaker, the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Grier) who was making his maiden speech. I should like him to know that in spite of the fact I may not agree with the whole substance of his speech, I thought he acquitted himself beautifully in his maiden speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Dupras: First, your Honour, I should like to join with the previous speakers who paid tribute to the Speaker upon his unanimous re-election. Several members before me recalled his great qualities and his sense of humour and at the risk of embarrassing him, I should like to express my admiration and the high esteem in which I hold him, that are inspired by his ability and his fair-mindedness.

Those congratulations that are offered every day to him are a tribute to the voters of his constituency of Stormont-Dundas, for the wise choice they made in re-electing him for the fifth time.

Their pride is only natural considering, Mr. Speaker, that they are represented here by one of the most prestigious figures in the history of the House.

I wish to pay tribute also to the gentleman who was elected Chairman of the Committees of the Whole, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), a choice which already meets with the approval of all four parties. It is also fitting to emphasize the altruism his party displayed in depriving itself of the services of such an excellent member.

Mr. Speaker, may I also be allowed to extend my best wishes to the Deputy Chairman and Assistant Deputy Chairman of the Committees of the Whole (Messrs. Laniel and Boulanger). Of course their task is fraught with responsibilities and they will have to rely on the co-operation of all hon. members.

Like the previous speakers, I should like to pay tribute to the movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Messrs. Blais and Blaker) who showed much self-assurance and eloquence in the discharge of their duty.

I should like to congratulate also all the new members, be they of this party or of any other, on their election and I wish them a fruitful and constructive career in this House.

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to congratulate the lady members of the House. I cannot help saying how much their presence improves the look of this august assembly, and if those ladies should follow the example of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) I am convinced that they will serve with distinction.

As for the members of the opposition parties, I consider that it is only fair to let them assert their right to represent their electors in the House with as much energy, aggressiveness and loyalty as we do as government members.

• (2030)

[English]

However, some of the new members on the opposite side lost no time in showing by their contributions and their behaviour that they believe the quality of their contributions and the value of their interventions is measured here in terms of decibels.

Mr. Rose: That is not very nice.

Mr. Dupras: Unfortunately, some of these members even had comments to make regarding our front row. Perhaps I, too, could make some comments on the front row facing me, a row which may be called a row of broken dreams. As you know, Mr. Speaker, no less than five members in this row were turned down, were denied at one time or another the leadership of their party at five different conventions; so it seems that the electors failed to recognize their hidden talents. Some of these ex would-be leaders have shown already in their interventions how wise their party members were to deny them the leadership of the party.

In the short two years that I have been a member of this House, I have learned very quickly to become greatly involved in the activities here and I have developed a deep attachment for this institution. I soon discovered how quickly we develop a sense of solidarity toward one another, regardless of party line, and it is with this in mind that I make my contribution this evening. I would like to believe that my views and ambitions are shared by the majority of hon. members. I know, also, that I might risk offending some of my electors if the comments that I make are anything like the ones that I heard the other day.

This brings me to the question of how people reacted when they read the speech that the newly elected hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) delivered to the House the other day. It was not very inspiring. I imagine that he is much more interested in what the newspapers had to write about him than what his electors may think of him. This emphasizes the wisdom of the delegates at the Quebec Liberal convention when they denied him the leadership of the party.

A great deal was made of the film produced by the Liberal party and used during the last campaign. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe mentioned that the stars in the film were three doves and one or two sparrows. Some people have no talent for posing. Some people even observed that we did not have a peacock in the film.

In his remarks on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) asked among other things, whether the province of Quebec and the Atlantic provinces found the Trudeau government satisfactory after four and a half years in office. I cannot help but being astonished by such a question when the number of Liberal members from these provinces has increased at the last election. This shows without any doubt the support enjoyed by the government of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and its politic and constitutes of course a clear and obvious statement of appreciation. Therefore, the question of the Leader of the Official Opposition is not even justified.

Among other things, the Leader of the Official Opposition gave a gloomy picture of our economy by reminding us of the latest available figures which show that more than 600,000 Canadians are jobless or supposedly unemployed. This is far from the record number registered in the province of Quebec in 1960 under the last Progressive Conservative government when unemployment reached 10.1 per cent. What he failed to say or did not want to say is that our economic performance is expected to make of 1972 a record year in terms of gross national product, bank savings, wheat sales, export, the effects of which we can see every day.

He should also have told us that our gross national product has, for the first time, exceeded $100 billion this year and this represents an 11 per cent increase over 1971.

He also failed to state that consumers have been spending much more and that in spite of this they have saved more. The purchase of durable goods has been stimulated mainly by the building of new homes which will reach this year an all-time high with slightly over 240,000 units.

[Mr. Dupras.]

Furthermore, our economic indicators are showing an all-time percentage increase, and I quote some examples as published in the excellent monthly publication of the Provincial Bank of Canada.

In retail sales, we are showing an increase of 14.1 per cent over the first eight months of last year; in exports, an increase of 10.7 per cent over ten months; in imports, 20.3 per cent, again over ten months; in housing starts, an increase of 7.5 per cent.

Mr. Speaker, we are quite far from the dramatic situation described by the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Suffice to mention, for example, the record sales disclosed by the large chain stores during the last holiday period, figures which reveal unheard of results concerning the sales increase registered by these stores during this period. This prosperity, Mr. Speaker, is found in all areas.

You could read in a weekend magazine that each Canadian had spent more than any other citizen of any other industrialized country in 1970 for international travel--$68. In second place came the Swedes who spent $62 while the Americans, for the information of hon. members, spent only $20.

For a population of slightly over 20 million people, Mr. Speaker, we are certainly, percentage-wise among the most numerous people in the major tourist centres around the world, be it in the Alps, in the South Seas, in the Southern United States or Central Europe.

One has only to remember that when the Russian hockey team came to Canada, very few Russian citizens accompanied their team, while no less than 3500 Canadians—from an alleged slow growth country—accompanied Team Canada to root for them. This, Mr. Speaker, is another proof of the tremendous buoyancy of the Canadian economy which provides every Canadian with a standard of living higher than the standard of most industrialized countries in the world.

While really satisfactory, such a performance, Mr. Speaker, does not keep us from looking toward the future and from attempting, through new mechanisms, to improve on a continous basis the living conditions of all Canadians, western Canadians and eastern Canadians alike.

Upon reading the Speech from the Throne I cannot but be pleased about the great many measures to be found in it, which will be brought before the House next week in order to bring amendments to measures already foreseen, to clarify others already initiated that can now be carried out.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) informed us in his speech of last Thursday of some new projects to reopen the file in the federal-provincial field of social affairs. Such measures are the results of much thought on the part of the minister and the care he brought to the consideration of these projects permits us to believe that they will come up to the expectation of the various provinces with a view to assuring the welfare of the people concerned in these programs.

Some steps are already being taken, for instance additional credits have been authorized for LIP projects as well as for training on the job programs. Those two programs have received unanimous acceptance and approval across the land and they contribute immeasurably to creating jobs.

What about the measures proposed to stimulate tourism in Canada? They are an additional proof of the prosperity of our economy. When we consider that in 1970 every Canadian citizen spent $68 on international tourism, we realize that we must do everything possible to prevent those amounts of money from being spent abroad. We must at all costs stimulate the tourist industry at home and enable our Canadian industries to benefit from the many advantages tourism offers.

Mr. Speaker, as I am fortunate enough to represent a riding whose main industry is tourism, needless to say those programs stir considerable interest back home.

A large number of my constituents already have plans to improve their facilities; several already have projects for expansion and are very anxious to know all about the measures we intend to take to help that industry which is so important in my constituency.

In another field, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) told us what he intends to do to help small businesses by means of new provisions to improve management services, consultation services and to ease the access to financial help. This will certainly be most welcome all over the country and it will be an opportunity for us of the central government to help those industries employing no less than 32 per cent of the Canadian manpower.

Another important measure is intended to strengthen the very foundation of the country's economy and it will show that the government is in favour of a fair relation between the price of feed grain used by cattle breeders in different areas of the country. The government, Mr. Speaker, intends to take measures before the next farming season to ensure fair marketing prices for the producers of eastern Canada.

Again last week, and as he has been doing since 1962, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard) asked that such steps be taken. When we read a speech he delivered in 1962, we now realize that he was asking with much energy that the government take all possible measures to ensure a fair distribution of feed grain all over the country. He mentioned the progress made by several producers of the Lac Saint-Jean area on a co-operative basis in the field of slaughtering and butchering and he added that their turnover was continuously growing. At that time, he was already saying that the major problem which the producers had to face was that of distribution and costs of feed grain. Maybe I am too readily happy to see that the problem that the producers of eastern Canada have had to face for so long will be solved, we hope, during the coming weeks.

However, a solution can be found provided hon. members belonging to the four parties in this House co-operate and concur.

You will probably be hearing about this matter within the next days as we, who represent the province of Quebec, will not yield an inch and will not accept a negative reply to our repeated requests since 1962.

Many other initiatives of as great importance to living conditions in Canada were mentioned in the Speech from the Throne and will no doubt be debated within the coming months.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak of matters more closely related to my electors and my riding. I want to inform my colleagues that last Friday, January 12, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Marchand) and I were present on the occasion of the transfer of titles to the La Macaza Base from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The educational centre of La Macaza is part of a program announced jointly on June 8, 1972 by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier).

The program dealt with funds made available to native people for creation and operation of the educational and cultural centre. This centre, we were told, was conceived in order to allow Indians to study in an appropriate environment consistent with their own culture and special needs. This program is mainly aimed at enabling the native people served through that centre to take decisions about the management of programs, educational methods and any other activity connected with the operation of those centres.

This program, as was indicated, is an answer to the request of Indian groups to the federal government in order to ensure the survival of their culture. We have quite rightfully answered those requests.

In a joint statement, the ministers said that the centres were a unique opportunity for the native people to understand and appreciate better their present and historical part in the Canadian community. They added that the cultural consciousness and autonomy of the native people would be stimulated and developed by the creation of training facilities which are very important to them and to the whole of Canada.

The establishment of this centre is for us, of the riding of Labelle, a most fortunate solution, as it was stated several times. The closing of the Bomarc base at La Macaza represented for this area the loss of the second major employer. It will be recalled that the operation of this military base required a civilian staff of at least 80 people. I am thinking also of the goodwill that the presence of 200 or 300 families of military personel could mean for the region. The area was therefore exposed to considerable hardship after the closing of this military base and its very economy was jeopardized.

I am very happy about the transformation of the military base and I would like to express all my satisfaction for having contributed to a certain extent to accelerate the negotiations so that the population of that area would not have to suffer too much from the closing of the base.

I would also like at this time to draw the attention of my colleagues on the more than warm welcome the people of my area extended to the Indians. Not only did the residents of Annonciation and La Macaza have a warm welcome for them but they already consider them and accept them as a part of theirs.

So, Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed at this time to pay special tribute to the people of my riding and on behalf of all Canadians I thank them very sincerely for their conduct, for the way they welcomed the Indians and for their contribution to national unity.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate you on the confidence you most certainly deserve from all your colleagues, our party included, for the heavy burden of presiding over our proceedings. The situations sometimes critical we have to live through in this House can only be solved by your tact, your competence and most of all your fairness. I want to assure you on behalf of my party of our co-operation at all times so that our proceedings can benefit the whole population we have the honour to represent.

Mr. Speaker, I would like at the outset of my remarks to congratulate the hon. members for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette) and Drummond (Mr. Boisvert), three new colleagues we welcome to this House. All our colleagues have seen their eloquence and their sincerity when participating in the work of this House and their will to contribute to improve the lot of all citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I should like also to congratulate the movers of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne (Messrs. Blais and Blaker), and to assure them of my admiration as it is not always easy to put forward more or less acceptable proposals.

Mr. Speaker, I was the most surprised man in the world on coming back to the House for a second term by the tone of the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

That Speech from the Throne is perhaps the least rational of all the ones I have known, but perhaps the most practical of all. What all that will come to, whether it will be translated into action or not, all that remains to be seen.

Mr. Speaker, all hopes are permitted. As a Social Credit member, I am happy to see not only that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) is considering a guaranteed annual income for a group of citizens but that our ideas winning acceptance. Therefore it is not as stupid as the former Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said it was during the election campaign. I realize now that things are changing, which gives us heart to keep on with our work.

But when I heard the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Government attacking one another to know who was the most in favour of national unity or the most against it, I was disappointed to say the least.

When we listen to the speeches of the members from the Maritime provinces, what do we hear? If they are from the Progressive Conservative party, we may be sure they will criticize but if they are on the government side, they say all is for the best in the best of all possible worlds.

But to be honest, let's forget about the rhetoric and realize that they are saying: "If things are not going well in New Brunswick, it is on account of poverty, lack of employment, misery in the midst of abundance and a surplus of potatoes".

I see this moves the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) to laughter because when he went there to collect votes they were raising potatoes. Nevertheless people in the Maritimes say that if things are going badly it is because they have a surplus of products, for which they find no buyers and that therefore the federal government is to blame and even perhaps the people in Quebec, perhaps even also Westerners who are getting too much.

When you hear Opposition members who come from the west, since one can no longer speak of Liberal members from the west, you get another version. They speak the same language as the others, English. Things are going badly for them because they have a wheat surplus and the government is to blame for that surplus, because it failed to make enough sales and its distribution machinery is inadequate.

This afternoon I heard a highly eloquent Progressive Conservative Party colleague repeating the same old tune he has been singing since he has been here, Mr. Speaker, saying that everything the Liberals sold was bad and that the only good wheat is the one the Progressive Conservatives have sold. Yet, if things are going badly in the Prairies it is because there is a surplus of wheat.

On the other hand, when I come to Quebec I see that for Quebec farmers also things are going badly, not in English but in French. They are going badly because of a surplus of milk, of butter, of cheese and there is a shortage of feed grain from the west because it is too expensive.

Then there is the problem of potatoes and the problem of eggs in Ontario.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the economy of Canada, protected by the Grits and Tories over the past 100 years, has contributed to the division of our country to the extent that today you would swear we have Upper Canada on one side of the House and Lower Canada on the other, as a result of the October 30 election.

Mr. Speaker, I am really disappointed at seeing that the basic problem does not lie with language but rather with the economic situation and that most hon. members are accusing one another on the plea of language difficulties and because of French power while forgetting the economic problems which our people have to face.

I believe that this statement may cause a number of hon. members to laugh, but I shall remind them that in the constituency of Lotbinière we are faced with a problem which is the same in almost every riding. Personal initiative as well as work is not encouraged in Canada, and I call on my colleagues' good conscience to make the following reasoning. For the older person who is entitled to the old age security pension at the age of 65, we wish to bring the eligibility age down to 60. The act states that the older person is entitled to the same basic amount at the age of 65 and that if his income is not sufficient the government grants him a guaranteed supplement which will reach the incredible maximum of $150 a month. If this older person wants to help school boys cross the road, works for the school board and gets a certain income, what does happen? This older person must declare such income and therefore his guaranteed income supplement is reduced. Each dollar earned by this person means $1 less in supplement. Such is the principle of present rules and governments. They stifle a man's initiative and seem to tell him: "My friend, sit down in your house, smoke your pipe, don't make a move and you will get $150." But if he tries to help himself, this plan developed by mad people—and I weigh each of my words—will take some money away from him. No wonder these people are fed up. This is only because these people, although they are aged, are still willing to go on working to earn a living even in small part-time jobs because they are still ready to help themselves.

Mr. Speaker, our philosophy in this House is negative. With our bills, individual initiative is discouraged. What about young people? Let me deal with the opposite end of the age structure. What about our students? If a student has worked all summer to help himself and his parents and applies for a federal or provincial scholarship, he is told on a nice little grey slip of paper, because this is rather sad news, "In view of the income you earned during the summer, we regret to inform you that you are not eligible for a scholarship. However, you are eligible for a loan on such and such terms." All this because he worked all summer and received an income. The other student who is in the same grade and lives on the same street but was unable to find a job or did not want to work—both cases are possible—will ask for scholarship and he stands a pretty fair chance of obtaining a full scholarship because he did not have any income during the summer.

Mr. Speaker, this case is similar to that of aged persons—the student who wants to help himself is not entitled to a scholarship. The student who takes life easy or does not get an opportunity is discouraged; he becomes worn out and dependent on others as the aged person.

What about the person who is between the young and the aged, that is the unemployed? Some say that there are 500,000, others 600,000. Some Liberals maintain that under the Conservative government they were more numerous, while the Conservatives say that under the Liberals there were more. Then, while they are having a good time counting them, I should say: Why don't you name them? If we must enjoy ourselves, let us have a ball. But they forget to try and find solutions, and then to analyse this matter.

What happens in the case of the unemployed? First, they make complicated laws, just as stupid as the minister who introduced them. Second, they close local offices and centralize to the extreme throughout the province. In fact, all cheques must go through some electronic machine. They create local, then regional services in Sherbrooke, Trois-Rivières and Quebec City. And what happens to the citizen in Victoriaville who is stuck with unemployment?

Mr. De Bané: Yes.

Mr. Fortin: The member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) says "Yes" because the same situation can be found in his constituency.

I was saying that the unemployed from Victoriaville must dial a long distance call to Sherbrooke at his own expense. He must go to Sherbrooke to appear before an arbitration commission often at his own expense. He must complete forms which he often does the wrong way because of a lack of communication. As a result anyone who became unemployed on November 1—in the mad system we were imposed— is still waiting for his first cheque on January 1. Chances are he did not receive his cards regularly either.

Mr. Speaker, the jobless in such a situation goes to his member of Parliament or any official in his union to make the best of it and the problem is immediately settled. I wonder how it is that a member of Parliament is able to settle a problem immediately whereas the poor taxpayer cannot succeed but must wait for his cheque. Is it that only Parliament members are able to handle a civil servant that should be at the service of all citizens without any distinction?

It often happens that the jobless worker entitled to unemployment allowances receives a letter from the local unemployment insurance centre worded as follows: Dear Sir: In view of current administration problems and the substantial amendments made to the Unemployment Insurance Act and in view of the fact that an increasing number of people are becoming eligible for unemployment allowances it is our regret to inform you that we are not in a position to pay your allowances immediately.

Sometimes, he is the father of five, six or seven children. His situation may appear funny tonight, but suppose you take his place? He is told in the last paragraph: In the meantime, call at your local social welfare office where, under an agreement between Ottawa and Quebec, you will probably get temporary help, even though a refund may be required eventually.

So the unemployed potters along. In the meantime, he has exhausted his savings for he was a labourer. There are thousands of people in a similar position in this country. Therefore, he goes to the local office and falls on his knees before the officials, stoops, begs for a meager allowance, signs a refund pledge and gets $300 which he has soon spent, and then the unemployment insurance benefit arrives. What happens then, thanks to the great generosity of all those officials who have a good time counting the unemployed instead of trying to settle their problems? When the unemployed man receives his cheque, he looks at it carefully, has it photocopied in order to keep some remembrance of the government's generosity, signs it, and then brings it to the social welfare office to repay his loan.

Mr. Speaker, that is how a man's initiative is stifled, how he becomes dependent on the state and a radical. I shall say bluntly that the number of people who become dependent on the various levels of government is ever increasing and that the number of those who have to pay the costs for administration of the various levels of government and to support such a large number of unemployed is becoming smaller and smaller, with the result that the governments are facing a problem of overtaxation. Their income is not sufficient and they ask for wage increases. Then we are running around like mad yelling that this disaster is caused by inflation, unemployment, Liberals, Progressive Conservatives, English-speaking Canadians, French-speaking Canadians or the unemployed.

Finally, the number of Liberal members decreased from 147 to 109 and the Progressive Conservatives also failed to obtain a majority. And the question is asked, who will lead the country?

Mr. Speaker, I will say, using perhaps a picturesque language—I may be teasing you in passing—that all this shows that the basic problem in our country is not a problem of language, of a lack of will to work, of a lack of desire to co-operate in building our country, but an economic and monetary problem. As long as we will find it amusing to divide ourselves on superficial questions and the problem of distribution of wealth is not tackled, as long as English Westerners will keep their wheat the French-speaking people will claim that it is the fault of the English-speaking who will say "Goddam French power", and we will not get anywhere.

Mr. Speaker, I would like my colleagues to reflect on that question and try "together", as a certain slogan that became fatal said, to think about it and come up with positive conclusions. Let us help and set examples for one another in parliament by stopping attacking one another, dirtying one another under the cover of national unity and let us really tackle the problems.

Mr. Speaker, for four years, from 1968 to 1972, this government enjoyed a majority and did so arrogantly. At a given point, the guillotine was brought down on us under Standing Orders 75A, 75B and 75C to avoid answering our questions. I also remember the famous roster system for ministers during the question period and a number of similar situations where members of the opposition were ignored. Now, after the election it is strange to see ministers recognize and salute us. The Progressive Conservatives recognize and salute us. I cannot understand why. And the government has become more conciliatory with the provinces. We realize more and more, as a colleague from the Liberal party said, that there was a time when the government used to propose and dispose, but now the government proposes and the House disposes. Here we are on our two feet again under a totally democratic regime. It feels good for a young member finally to breathe some democratic air in the House.

Mr. Speaker, we hope that our work and our proceedings—and we hope that legislation will be brought in as soon as possible—will enable us to prove to the people that members are serious, that they work and produce. The Canadian population is expecting great things from us: it expects us to come to grips with real problems.

In view of the election result, I contend that it is not the Progressive Conservatives, the New Democratic Party or the Créditistes who have defeated the government but rather the bureaucrats who in their ivory tower believe that they can do anything and who do not give a hoot about what people want.

Let us think for one moment: should those who do not understand the act on unemployment insurance—let us assume it is good—should they apply it? The members and the civil servants must understand the act. The same could be said of old age security pensions, family allowances and all government programs. We are told about creating jobs, LIPs, wonderful programs, so they say. I have in mind two projects that were accepted a month ago. The civil servants called the interested parties and told them they could go ahead, that they would receive some money. They launched their projects and have been working for nothing since. At the same time, the Department of National Revenue wrote to them asking them to pay income tax on the salaries paid.

People come to see us. They ask what to do. Simple: the civil servants of one department are as stupid as those of another. That is what it proves, Mr. Speaker.

I may be a little blunt but time has come to quit fooling around and reach an understanding.

The government will have to show some maturity, act responsibly and call its civil servants to order. Whatever the advantages may be of the bills passed in this House, if the government does not train the civil servant who applies them, the Canadian people will continue to be served as badly as it now is; and there will surely be no change.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, that important point should also be considered. I do not wish to monopolize the time of the House any longer, for I am eager to start studying the bills the government seems to have the intention of putting before us. But before closing, I should like to call the attention of my colleagues on a particular point.

There is a proposal to extend the limits of our electoral districts, to redraft the electoral map—if one wishes, one can put in claims—in order to nearly double the area of ridings.

Mr. Speaker, the Lotbinière riding for instance includes three provincial counties: Arthabaska, Nicolet and Lotbinière. According to the new map, Quebec's representation would be reduced from 74 to 72 members and almost all of Mégantic county would be added to the Lotbinière riding. If we consider for a moment the number of provincial members in my riding, we find there are three at the present time, and according to the new map there will be four, each having two secretaries and an office.

We of the Federal Parliament serve the same population as these three members and we have neither an office nor a secretary in the constituency, and no telephone link with Parliament. This is absolutely ridiculous. Mr. Speaker, one could think we still live in Noah's era. Nobody seems to be interested in that problem.

By re-electing 15 Social Crediters, the Canadian population is teaching a lesson to my opponents. The former Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and many others have paid a visit to me and to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) who thanked them for their visit by saying that they were a great help to him, leaving him free to go and help other Creditiste candidates.

In spite of the predictions, more Social Credit members were elected. The members of this House should realize that the Social Credit vote has increased and that it will continue to increase. Why? Because the Social Credit members, since 1962, have given a lesson to the other members. We may not have diplomas as the other members, but we are hard-working. In our constituencies, in our offices, we look after our people every week-end. We ask for their views, we send them circulars; they give us their views and then we rise in the House to express them. Since 1962, the Social Credit members have joined ranks to form a team with the purpose of bringing the elected closer to the electors, of bringing the administrator closer to the administered and of seeing to it that democracy in our constituencies is really a living thing.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, we are so responsive that, as far as I am concerned, I intend to categorically oppose the adoption of this new electoral map by all parliamentary means at my disposal, as long as the government fails to understand the importance of giving members of all political parties the proper means to serve the population they represent. The people expect services from us and the government should give us the necessary tools to enable us to render these services. "Give us the tools and we will do the job" as our English power friends would say.

Mr. Speaker, this is an important point and, with regard to our parliamentary behaviour—at least mine—I would like to make clear to all my colleagues that, whatever the situation in the House, I am not here to topple the government, nor to protect it. I was elected in my constituency and my expenses were $2,500, made up of quarters given to my electoral fund by workers. I was democratically elected and I intend to act freely. I thank my leader for allowing me to speak freely according to my conscience.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that we have a minority government, because it shows that democracy is sound and that there is always room for a free member in the House, whether the government has a majority or not. This is the main thing.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to have enough time to complete my comments even if many ideas come to my mind.

The government says that it wishes to create employment and to control pollution. I would like to remind the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) that he should try to be more active than his predecessor and realize that the St. Lawrence, one of the great inland seas in the world, is completely polluted. It is a real disaster.

The government should revise its position and study the possibility of improving the shores of the St. Lawrence between Montreal and Quebec at least so that this natural resource of our country may be developped and freed from pollution.

Several fishermen all along the river have lost their jobs. The waterfront land in the municipalities of my constituency is being eroded. The highway has become a public danger because of landslides. However the government says: This is not a priority; there is nothing we can do. Yet, it has before built some supporting walls and some ports. So even if it were only to help these municipalities I do not see why the government would not revise its policy in this regard. It would then kill two birds with one stone: while fighting pollution and improving the river banks and the beauty of certain historic sites, it would contribute to the creation of jobs and would enable municipalities to carry out public works which have become an urgent necessity.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank you for your kindness and assure you of my co-operation in the future.

[English]

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, let me join other hon. members in congratulating you on your re-election as Speaker of this House. Your concern for and consideration of freshmen members was known to me long before I had the honour to take my seat as a member of the House of Commons.

It is a singular honour for me to represent the historic riding of Provencher. Provencher was created at the time Manitoba became a province in 1870. The first member to be elected for Provencher was Louis Riel. It goes without saying that our first representative made a lasting contribution to western Canada and, more specifically, to Manitoba. Still, it is my hope that my fate as the representative for Provencher will not in any way parallel that of Louis Riel.

Provencher is a riding which is not typical of western Canada. The Canadian shield skirts the riding in the east and the north. We are the possessors of timber resources and mineral resources in these areas. We have been blessed with farmlands right across the constituency and we are a major supplier of agricultural products. Tourism, also, is making itself felt as an economic factor, and especially in the eastern section of our riding tourism is becoming a big thing. Nevertheless, regardless of other factors—and we welcome diversification—agriculture remains the backbone of the rural constituency of Provencher and agriculture is my major concern.

While our geography might not be as typical of Prairie ridings as might be expected, Provencher is typical of western Canada in one respect, and that is in its multicultural mosaic. We count French-Canadians, Ukrainians, Indians, Anglo-Saxons and Mennonites as major groups comprising the total population of our area. Added to these groups, Mr. Speaker, are many other nationalities which have given us the contribution of their culture. The hallmark of these people has been co-operation with each other. While we hear so much today of various interest groups, I submit that in western Canada we have learned to live together. A person should not be judged by his national background or the background of his forefathers but, rather, by the contribution he is willing to make to our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: We all have different backgrounds, but first we are Canadians. This is the country that gave our forefathers a new home. Hence, since taking my seat in this House, Mr. Speaker, I have been disturbed by the statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand). At a time when reason and understanding should prevail, they have taken it upon themselves, in an attempt to explain the losses they encountered at the polls on October 30, to suggest that these losses were due to an anti-French attitude held by many Canadians, specifically those of western Canada. As a western Canadian, I simply do not accept that criticism. Historically, it is not a correct statement that we have been anti-east or anti-French.

Since the time of the British conquest, the duality of Canada, with its French and English peoples, has dominated the political considerations of the day. At the time of confederation, agreements were reached that Canada would have two official languages. Federalism was adopted which allowed for the preservation of the cultures of the two peoples. Especially was this preservation sought by the citizens of Quebec and, I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, by the citizens of Manitoba in 1869 and 1870. Added to this duality were the many nationalities who came to Canada, especially in the 1890s and the turn of the century, and again after the two world wars. Canada became a haven for them, a haven of religious and political freedom, a land of opportunity, a land where they could be equal and a land where they were not judged by their background or the accent with which they spoke the language of their new country. They were judged as human beings and people of worth. While we have had our differences in the past, these differences were not nearly as great as the bonds of friendship and the desire to live together as neighbours.

Since October 30, various political experts, self-styled, or otherwise have been saying that a great division exists between the English and the French in Canada. In Provencher we have a larger number of French-Canadians. They want the rights that are theirs by law, they want the rights that are theirs by tradition; but they are not using these ambitions as divine means to achieve an illusory goal.

There are those who argue that areas outside of Quebec voted against what is referred to by some as French power. The same people say that French-Canadians voted solidly for the party in government because it was the only party which cared for Quebec. It is argued that our party, following historic tradition, received a negative vote from the people of Quebec. While some of these observations may be partially correct, Mr. Speaker, the effect of such divisive statements, comments made in this House and attitudes that have been expressed by some, will be to create further division. It is a division which says simply that confederation is no longer workable: it says that we cannot live together any longer. I categorically reject these prophets of doom, and this House cannot be a party to such matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Epp: I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister should not take it upon himself to create division. I see his statements as being an attempt at possible short-term political gain. Rather, he should immediately make his legislation known to this parliament and to the people of Canada. What does he plan to do about inflation? What does he plan to do about unemployment? Especially, what is he willing to do for people who are on fixed incomes, old age pensioners and people who are seeing their savings depleted each year because of the inflationary trend?

The Speech from the Throne also indicated that this government, the Prime Minister in particular, have suddenly become painfully aware of the western presence. I would like to read into the record part of an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune of Monday last:

The Prime Minister's program seems based on the assumption that the west was motivated by envy. We were upset at all the goodies that were going from Ottawa to central and eastern Canada, and we wanted our place at the jam pot. If he's not exactly giving us that, then at least he's spreading a little jam our way.

But there are other reasons why they might have turned against the Liberals. It may simply be that a lot of voters disliked the mystery men they elected in 1968—not only the Prime Minister but the many new backbenchers who came into office with him. It may have been their faces, their style or the cut of their clothes that turned the voters off. If that's the case, the people who think that way may well be angered that the men they voted against are clinging to power. The more the government uses its power to try to placate them, the angrier they may become.

Assuming the voter is a more rational beast, he may well have been upset not because his part of Canada was getting too little from Ottawa, but because the other parts were getting too much. Mr. Trudeau, after all, was the politician who promised Canada that there would be "no more of this free stuff". Those who believed him then are bound to be disgruntled now. Whether he can buy them off by passing out some of the "free stuff" to them as well remains to be seen.

I place special emphasis on the final paragraph:

In a moment of candour, Mr. Trudeau admitted not long ago that he has been unable to understand western Canadians. The election proved him right. The question now, despite the throne speech, is whether the prime minister now understands why he has been unable to understand the west.

Rural depopulation is an issue of great concern to us in western Canada. The economy of western Canada has always leaned very heavily on agriculture and on businesses which service this industry. The western farmer has consolidated; he has changed his methods and become more efficient. Thus, he has survived, not because of government programs but possibly, despite them. He has survived because of his own efficiency and his own enterprise.

Provencher is a good example of the new western agricultural community. We produce a major part of the poultry, beef and milk needed by the province. This is due to willingness on the part of our farmers to take risks and to expand, and it is a tribute to their enterprise that success has come their way.

• (2130)

One program that does not help preserve the family farm is the capital gains tax which was instituted by the government. While we in this House and people right across rural Canada decry depopulation of the rural areas, we virtually make it impossible for sons to buy the farms of their fathers. Many of these young men and women, especially in western Canada, want to continue farming; it is a way of life they want to preserve. Yet despite certain government programs they are having great difficulty doing so, due to high interest rates and difficulty in obtaining low-interest loans. And now we have this destructive capital gains tax which is forcing young farmers to give up their ambition to farm, and find jobs in our urban centres. If we are seriously concerned about rural depopulation, we should tackle the problem at its source.

The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was designed to establish new industries in economically depressed areas. This was going to be the great panacea for western Canada. We were going to be ushered into the industrial age, we were going to create satellite industries in farm areas and have more jobs in rural Manitoba. The aim of this program was, of course, the creation of jobs.

While some success is being experienced in Provencher due to DREE programs, it has always been my contention that if grants are to be made available, small businesses in rural areas should be eligible for them. These people have invested their work in the community; these people have staked their lives on their communities. It is private initiative and personal enterprise that provides employment; the government cannot provide the employment that private enterprise provides. I submit, therefore, that rural depopulation can only be arrested in part by encouraging local business to expand. This type of expansion creates long-term employment rather than the band-aid approach that we are again receiving from members opposite.

I understand that DREE is committed to a policy whereby only two centres in Provencher are designated as growth centres. These areas will be eligible for grants. Yet there are many small communities in my riding which are growth centres because of the drive and the initiative of the people. I submit that it is hardly fair for me to go back to these areas and say to the people that I am sorry, but they are not eligible for grants because technocrats in Ottawa have made the decision that they will not grow.

The technocrats in government are saying that most rural areas are not going to survive or, if they do, they will survive without any government help. This policy is wrong and discredits the work and aspirations of the people working in rural areas. Instead, the government should give direct tax incentives to people investing in small rural businesses, in order to encourage growth. It is the responsibility of government to create an atmosphere of confidence in which individuals are willing to invest in these businesses. A decision made by DREE seems to have been that Provencher is similar to other prairie regions. For example, there is rail abandonment in some areas and some communities are finding it difficult to survive. I suggest there are communities in Provencher that are surviving and they should be eligible for DREE grants. They should be considered as growth centres and should be given the credit which is due.

Therefore, I do not accept the criticism, especially from hon. members to my far left, that only business interests will benefit from investment in small businesses. Today an insidious attitude prevails in the minds of many, that as soon as incentives are given to business, the ordinary citizen is being taken advantage of. These people say that surely more money could be spent on various make-work programs.

I submit that the free enterprise system is the only long-term employment creator—employment created on the basis of production and the ability to sell on markets subject to supply and demand. This is beneficial to all Canadians and all people in the work force. I would reiterate what we have been saying throughout the election campaign, that less money should be taken out of the private sector through various forms of taxation and put into the public purse but, rather, the reverse should take place. Let us leave more money in the hands of the private investor: he will invest it in Canada because of his personal drive.

In conclusion, it is with deep humility that I, as a member of the House, have the honour to be one of the first Mennonites to be elected to this House. Next year, in 1974, we will be celebrating the centennial of the first settlement created by Mennonites in Canada in the town of Steinbach, Manitoba. We are but one of the many ethnic groups beginning to plan similar celebrations.

I should like to thank the minister responsible for multiculturalism for his comprehensive report to the House last night. Canada gave us the opportunity to practice our faith in the manner we believe to be right, and we are thankful for the contribution we have been able to make in return. Since 1967 we have been re-creating a fitting memorial to commemorate our past; a replica of a Mennonite village, circa 1870s, is being built. One of Steinbach's first industries was a wind-driven grist mill. This mill attracted people from all over southeastern Manitoba. Today a replica of the first windmill stands on the same museum grounds.

On behalf of all the people of Provencher, I extend to members of this House and the constituents they represent a hearty welcome to come and visit us in 1974 when we particularly want to return thanks to God and our new country, Canada, for the freedoms and opportunities which were given to us.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues, I should like to congratulate you. I share the feeling often expressed over the last few days, that you have earned our respect and affection for the manner in which you have carried out your duties as the first commoner. This is not only true of your performance when presiding in this chamber; it is also true of the discharge of the many other obligations which fall upon you as Speaker. I should like to extend my comments to include Your Honour's wife, who has proven herself an extremely gracious and charming person in the performance of your many duties.

We have developed the same high regard for Mr. Deputy Speaker and we are certain that he, too, will bring honour to that post. I should also like to compliment my two colleagues who moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker) and the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais). I envy these two hon. gentlemen the facility they possess in each of our official languages. They were fortunate to be raised in an environment where from childhood they were exposed to both languages. It is far more difficult for active and busy individuals such as Members of Parliament and civil servants to acquire ability in a second language later in life.

I share completely the thoughts expressed by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), the leader of the Creditiste party, in believing that the only way we will truly make significant headway in the area of two languages is to make available to all young Canadians, second language education starting the moment they begin school. I strongly support the programs of the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) to provide assistance to provincial departments of education in developing this capacity for second language training in our school system throughout Canada.

Rather than commenting generally on the contents of the Speech from the Throne, I would prefer to limit my remarks to the proposals which dealt with the broad area of foreign economic involvement and, on the other side of the coin, measures dealing with the encouragement of Canadian business. There is no doubt about the concern of Canadians with the present level of foreign penetration of our economy and its implication for Canada's long-run prospects for national independence and economic growth. A report of our colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), dealing with foreign direct investment in Canada, and the Ontario report of the interdepartmental task force on foreign investment, dealt at some length with the extent of this penetration.

Let me summarize. Throughout Canada, foreigners control 63 per cent of our manufacturing, 62 per cent of our mining, 99 per cent of our petroleum refining, 83 per cent of our oil and gas industry, 97 per cent of the automobile industry, 90 per cent of the rubber industry, 78 per cent of the chemical industry, 77 per cent of the electrical apparatus industry, 90 per cent of the computer industry and 92 per cent of the aircraft and aircraft parts industry. The penetration continues with approximately an additional 500 corporations being taken over in three years, 1969, 1970 and 1971. No other significant industrialized nation of the world has permitted such a high degree of foreign control in its economy.

The large industrial nations, such as West Germany, Japan, Great Britain and France have controls that make Canada's absence of such controls, by comparison, look absurd. So do middle nations such as Australia. Australia has recently undertaken even more strict controls than they have had in the past. Even developing nations such as Peru, Chile, Liberia and Guyana have strong regulations relating to foreign ownership. Of course, so do countries such as Switzerland, Norway, Sweden and Mexico.

We are unique in the world in permitting such a situation to develop. The rationale for permitting such a high degree of non-Canadian ownership has been that the new foreign capital has given strong stimulation to our economic growth and contributed to our high standard of living. One has difficulty squaring this belief with the fact that Canada's growth performance has been only average among OECD countries, according to the OECD's own analysis, in spite of the fact that Canada's net indebtedness increased by $23 billion between 1945 and 1969.

Another perplexing aspect of this situation is that the so-called new foreign capital is now virtually non-existent. We Canadians, to all intents and purposes, now completely finance the sale of our own economy. The Ontario report which I mentioned earlier points out that in Canada only 10 per cent of the funds absorbed by U.S.-owned affiliates in the period 1963 to 1968 came as new inflow from the U.S., whereas approximately 86 per cent was generated in Canada.

This trend of Canadians financing the takeover themselves increased in the period 1965 to 1969. During this period Canadian banks and our bond markets tripled the financing of foreign subsidiaries in Canada. It is obvious that our own Canadian-controlled financial institutions have been using the savings of Canadians to underwrite the foreign takeover of our economy.

The Gray report underlines the fact that we have as much development capital as we need, if we would use it properly. This fact was underscored in a 1972 study by Shaw and Archibald of the University of Western Ontario business school which concluded that Canada had shifted over the past decade from being a net importer of capital to a balanced position, and more recently to the position of a net exporter of capital.

To re-emphasize, all studies and analyses indicate that Canada does generate enough savings to meet its own current capital requirements, if they were properly channelled. What is at fault is not the size of the pool of savings but, rather, the fact that our financial pipes are clogged. The funds are simply not getting into the hands, in adequate quantity, or our Canadian businesses and Canadian entrepreneurs.

Both the Gray report and the Ontario report deal with some of the other problems of foreign-controlled corporations. There is concern about the high concentration of basic decision-making in the economic sphere outside Canada. These decisions are made in the best interest, not of Canada but of the parent corporation's or parent country's interest. Obviously, these decisions may have a very direct influence on the number of jobs available in Canada and on the level of activity in our economy.

There is also concern about the concentration of the bulk of research and development activities in the parent companies. This results in substantial loss of jobs to Canada, particularly to the young science graduates of our universities. In addition, we often lose the benefits of the practical application of this research in manufacturing activity. Purchasing policies often tend to favour imports from affiliates rather than from competitive local sources of supply.

It is interesting to note that foreign-controlled firms in Canada import a larger percentage of their purchases of goods and services than do Canadian-controlled firms. Unfortunately, this trend seems to be increasing. This may have a cost advantage to the parent, but it certainly has an adverse impact on economic activities and employment in Canada. This also leads to the problem of concern about the manipulation of intracompany prices between parents and their subsidiaries, and of reducing profits of subsidiaries with the objective of moving the profit accumulation to the parent companies. This leaves considerable doubt as to whether the various levels of government in Canada are receiving their equitable share of taxes.

Mr. Speaker, so far in my comments I have tried to indicate the scope of the problem and why I believe we should be concerned. I suggest that in Canada in 1973 we have adequate amounts of our own capital without the need to import foreign equity capital. For these reasons, I was happy to note several proposals in the Speech from the Throne dealing with this very important subject.

The speech indicated that the government intends to enact measures to give aid to small businesses through new initiatives, to strengthen management and consulting services and to improve access to financial facilities. It also proposed measures for the extension and improvement of the Industrial Development Bank. I look forward to seeing these measures.

As I mentioned earlier, there is strong evidence to support the belief that our capital generation is sufficient to permit us to attain our goals for economic growth. What is needed is the streamlining of our financial institutions so that we can properly channel our savings. If our financial institutions do not meet this challenge, I trust that the government will take whatever measures are necessary to make certain that they do. This is a vital cornerstone of our future economic growth. We are all too familiar with instances of Canadian businesses being sold out and the foreign buyer going to a Canadian bank for the funds to effect the purchase, bolstered by the credit rating of the foreign parent. This is the same bank which had previously denied these funds to potential Canadian purchasers.

The Speech from the Throne also proposed a review of research and development incentive programs to improve their effectiveness in permitting innovations in the private sector of the economy and the examination of patents, licensing and other policies related to technology.

One of the problems of a truncated economy like ours, as I mentioned earlier, is lack of a properly developed research capacity, with the resultant loss of jobs and growth. The Japanese have been significantly successful in exploiting licensing arrangements involving the use of foreign technology and know-how. These arrangements, I believe, would be more beneficial to Canada. As the Gray report suggested, they would permit greater Canadian influence over the industrial activity involved, while at the same time giving Canada the benefit of superior, foreign technological inputs. The licensee generally has much greater latitude in management, production, procurement, sales and pricing than subsidiaries.

The speech went on to promise measures to ensure further control by Canadians over their economy by the screening of foreign takeovers of Canadian-owned business, measures respecting the transfer of technology from abroad and access to it by Canadian entrepreneurs, measures to increase Canadian participation in the ownership and control of resource projects and, in consultation with the provinces, measures dealing with new direct foreign investment and the sale of land to foreigners. I am not certain whether this includes major new investments by existing foreign-controlled companies in Canada. I hope it does.

The speech also promises measures that will restructure the Canada Corporations Act, including a requirement that a majority of directors of federally-incorporated companies be Canadian. I have some doubt whether this is really significant, but it will do no harm and I believe that symbolically it is important. I am delighted to read of these proposed measures in the Speech from the Throne, and I look forward with great anticipation to seeing them become reality. I hope, and I am optimistic in this respect; that they will live up to our expectations.

There are many other ramifications in this broad area. The question of tax policy vis-à-vis Canadian firms, the subject of various forms of incentives to Canadian-controlled firms and our financial institutions are ones I look forward to discussing during the budget debate. I would like to conclude by reading a quotation from the report of the interdepartmental task force on foreign investment, as follows:

—the question must be asked whether we do not delude ourselves by believing that we can retain one of the highest standards of living in the world by relying on imported technology, imported entrepreneurship, imported economic initiatives, imported trade marks, and imported patents and licences. Will we be able to compete in manufactured products without bringing genuinely Canadian products and processes into the world market, under Canadian patents and trade marks? These questions should cause us to give thoughtful consideration to the distinction between economic growth and economic development, and to increase Canada's direct responsibility for its own economic progress.

Mr. Morgan: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. Is it agreed that we call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC WORKS—FLOODS—ASSISTANCE TO PEOPLE WITH PROPERTY ON NORTH SHORE OF LAKE ERIE DAMAGED BY HIGH WATER LEVEL

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, as recorded in Hansard of January 11, I had an opportunity to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) regarding damage done to property on the north shore of Lake Erie, caused by the high water levels in the Great Lakes. As recorded at page 174 of Hansard, I asked:

Mr. Speaker, in view of the high level of water in the Great Lakes, particularly Lake Erie, which has resulted in considerable damage to farm land, cottages and marinas, would the Minister of Public Works have his engineers advise the people in the area of Long Point on the north shore of Lake Erie how they may get temporary relief in the form of either advice or financial assistance?

I recognize that there was not time to develop the question that I had in mind during the question period, so tonight I am pleased to have the opportunity to expand on what I was trying to get across to the minister. I also appreciate the fact that he is here in the chamber to listen to my representations and that, hopefully, he will take note of them.

The problem is one dating back to historic times. Property owners on the shores of all the Great Lakes have always had to live with the fact of erosion, which in particular affects the sandy clay on the shores of Lake Erie. This erosion is caused to a greater or lesser degree by the rise and fall of the water levels of the Great Lakes. Normally, these people repair the damage that is done, but on occasion the erosion of farmlands on the north shore of Lake Erie has been drawn to the attention of the federal minister of public works and the provincial government. To date, no assistance has been forthcoming for the farmers.

The cause of the present situation is aggravated out of all proportion by the abnormally high levels of water in all the Great Lakes. In Lake Erie, the water level is 42 inches above normal and is 27 inches above average for this time of year. With severe wind storms, the raging fury of the waves has destroyed farmlands on a scale never before witnessed. The waves have destroyed cottages, marinas and have even damaged public docks and piers.

Let me deal more specifically with the magnitude and extent of the damage along the north shore of Lake Erie. This area extends through the length of my riding and through the ridings of Elgin, Kent-Essex and Lambton-Kent. Incidentally, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Holmes) has a number of questions on the order paper, directed to the Minister of Public Works, seeking assistance similar to that about which I am speaking. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McKinley) has also witnessed and experienced the same type of damage along the shores of Lake Huron. Even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) the hon. member for Essex-Windsor, knows about this situation.

In my riding, in the township of Houghton the damage has been as severe as that elsewhere. The island of Long Point, a sand spit which stretches out 25 miles, almost halfway across Lake Erie, has suffered severe damage. Places such as Port Ryerse, Port Dover, Nanticoke and Peacock Point have also suffered extensive damage. In the township of Houghton, a farm owned by Mr. John Balthes on the clay and sand bluffs, according to actual survey has lost 50 acres of high-producing farmland in 20 years. This land was worth $2,000 an acre, making a total loss of $100,000. It was good tobacco and orchard land.

The cottagers on Long Point have borne the brunt of the damage. The cottages there number 900, with an average value of $12,000, making a total value of $10,800,000. Marinas and highway construction in the area have also suffered damage. That means a considerable assessment on the local municipality. Some 50 of these cottages are in imminent danger. I have received letters from cottage owners outlining the plight in which they find themselves. The pier at Port Dover, which is the responsibility of the Department of Public Works, has also been damaged. I should point out Mr. Speaker, that the minister's engineers are on the spot, looking after the damage and repairing what they can at Port Dover harbour.

Dealing with solutions to this problem, I suggest that in the short term there should be some form of compensation to those people who have suffered maximum loss, perhaps on a cost-sharing basis with the province. This would cover a proportion of the disaster area at Long Point. I also suggest the erection of a breakwater at some of the more vulnerable spots. The province of Ontario is already dropping stone into Lake Erie to protect Highway 59. The government should also consider subsidizing the cottage owners to assist them in moving their cottages farther from the shores of the lake.

[Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand).]

In the long run, Mr. Speaker, I think the level of the waters in the Great Lakes should come under the purview of the International Joint Commission. To that end I suggest that the minister should discuss this matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), and our members on the International Joint Commission should be directed to co-operate with the American corps of army engineers who have made a serious and detailed study of the cyclical water levels in the Great Lakes. At present there are sluice-gates on Lake Superior which let the water run out of that lake. There is some control available at that point. There is an outlet from Lake Michigan through the Chicago drainage canal, entering the Mississippi River, which might be used to regulate in a minor way the level of water of our lakes.

• (2200)

Above all, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister might help to bring this matter into proper perspective if he could state the facts of the case from an authoritative point of view. Many of these people are being subjected to wild rumours of what can and what cannot be done. The minister would be rendering a service not only to the people concerned but to the Canadian people as a whole if he could state exactly what the situation is and what can or what cannot be done.

With all the sincerity I have at my command, I ask the minister to seriously consider this very, very serious damage at Long Point and see if some help cannot be brought to these people.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) perhaps it should be stated, first, that there is at present no act of parliament which specifically provides assistance for the type of problem he has raised, namely, the rising of the water level of Lake Erie.

Problems of this nature and the measures to be taken for their rectification are the responsibility of the concerned departments of the provincial government. However, in certain cases the federal government can act on a specific request from a province. A decision to so act would have to be a cabinet decision. If, after any request, a decision to act were made, it would be by way of a joint interdepartmental committee. Aid in such case would be of two kinds; the first would be physical aid which is generally provided by the Emergency Measures Organization, and the second, financial assistance, is generally administered by the Department of Finance.

If funds were provided, that would be done on the basis of a formula which is derived from the physical capacity of the given province to cope with the problem. This formula is based both on population and total cost. Where the cost exceeds $1 per person, the federal government may assume the cost of such things as certain public works which can be identified, for example schools, and also certain losses for private property which were not insurable.

My advice to the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand is that he contact the provincial authorities and have them, as they see fit, approach us for whatever assistance they seek. Of course, our own engineers of the Department of Public Works are always pleased to give whatever technical advice they can to individual property owners.

TRANSPORT—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO PREVENT CLOSING OF RAILWAY STATIONS IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on January 8 I raised a question with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and was appalled to find that he did not have an answer, and even seemed to lack any knowledge of the subject. In the interests of the House, I wish to raise the question again tonight. Mine was a supplementary question and appears at page 41 of Hansard as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the House whether his department is looking into the possibility of postponing the 1975 date for rail line abandonment, in conjunction with the problem raised by the hon. member for Mackenzie?

Mr. Speaker, may I inform the Minister of Transport that in western Canada there are thousands of miles of rail lines for which in the 1960s both the publicly-owned and the privately-owned Canadian railways applied for abandonment. In 1965 a moratorium was placed on those applications to abandon rail lines and branch lines. That moratorium runs out on January 1, 1975, and the applications are still with the Canadian Transport Commission. That is a fundamental question faced by western producers in terms of transport. We do not need more statements.

The Speech from the Throne outlines the idea of a conference on western Canadian problems. We need a clear statement as to whether the government contemplates an alternative for those farmers who, if the lines are abandoned, will have to haul their commodities farther if they are to meet the demand of international markets for their goods.

May I point a few things out to the minister and to the new parliamentary secretary, whom I congratulate on his appointment. I am sure he will attempt to do a good job. May I point out some facts relating to my constituency, Assiniboia. The two railways have applied to abandon 650 miles of track. The abandonment can become effective after 1975 when the moratorium is lifted and the Canadian Transport Commission allows it.

During the past ten years, on average more than 22.5 million bushels of grain each year have been carried over these tracks. That amount of grain would have to be trucked. If that were to happen, about 11.7 million bushels of elevator capacity would be closed down. As elevators close, other farm services will disappear such as fertilizer and lumber supplies, and so on. Other farm services would be curtailed. You would see fewer stores, service stations, recreational facilities, and so on. Fewer amenities will be provided in small communities.

More than 5,100 farmers in Assiniboia alone would be forced to haul their grain over longer distances in larger trucks. Coupled with that would be extra wear and tear on the grid road and municipal road systems resulting from the use of larger trucks and higher taxes would result. On top of that, municipalities would lose between 50 and 60 per cent of their total tax revenue. Those losses would need to be made up by local residents.

This is the major question which the west faces. Not one branch line ought to be abandoned until the national government outlines a national transport policy which will ensure that the kind of service provided by the railways, whether by the profit-oriented one or otherwise, is adequate for producers to get their commodities to market. That must be the essential ingredient in any new transportation policy and it ought not to be forgotten. You cannot abandon rail lines wholesale, as was suggested by the MacPherson royal commission that was appointed by a former Conservative government.

Whichever of the two old line parties sits to the right of Mr. Speaker, it ought to know that the kind of action I have mentioned is necessary on the Prairies. Do not give us another conference. By the way, such a conference could be of great benefit in outlining some of our problems. If we are to assuage the fears of small communities, 650 miles of branch line in Assiniboia, for example, must be protected. Until there is a clear decision as to services for producers, those producers must be protected so that they will not need to bear the extra cost of grain trucking over great distances.

On the one hand, federal local initiatives grants are pouring money into the small communities; they are trying to establish recreational facilities. Provincial governments apply those grants to the building of swimming pools, curling rinks, and so on. On the other hand, the national government countenances the policy of rail line abandonment, a policy which is killing small towns. This question needs to be considered. Surely we need not wait until the turn of the century or until the 1980s to get an answer. This question needs to be answered by the government in the next year and a half. I look forward to hearing the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) on this matter.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the minister has already indicated his interest in meeting with the provinces on the matter of freight rates and other problems, including rail line abandonment.

TRANSPORT—AIRPORT—VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—RUNWAY EXPANSION—REQUEST THAT ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STUDY BE PROVIDED TO EXPROPRIATION HEARINGS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday morning I asked the following question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand):

• (2210)

> Has the minister prepared any environmental impact study relating to the effects of the proposed new runway at Vancouver International Airport and, if so, will it be filed with the hearing officer and the objectors in time for consideration at the expropriation hearings which commence next Wednesday, January 17, 1973, in Vancouver?

The minister's reply was curious, because he seemed to think that these things were always done. He said, as recorded at page 276 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, we are making an inquiry about expropriations, which has nothing to do with the environment.

I find that an incredible statement for the Minister of Transport to make. When you move a major runway on a major international airport half as close again to a heavily populated residential area, I cannot see how anyone can say that is not a move which affects the environment of the people living there.

Strangely enough, shortly after my question the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Reynolds) asked a supplementary question of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis). The Minister of the Environment said, as reported at page 276 of Hansard for January 15:

> Our basic policy is that we should prepare environmental impact studies and that they should be made available to the general public.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta then asked the minister whether such studies had also been done with regard to the Pickering and St. Scholastique airports.

The reason this matter becomes important is that the expropriation hearing commences tomorrow. Under the new expropriation proceedings which were gazetted on October 7, there are 120 days to complete the process. Under the procedure, after the expropriation proceedings close the government then decides, as it properly should, whether the expropriation will be confirmed or abandoned. My point is very simple and straightforward. I would appreciate it very much, and I know that the objectors who will appear at this hearing would appreciate it also, if the minister would make available, as he is required to do under the statute, to the objectors and the hearing officer any and all environmental studies that apparently have been made. They should be made available in time for the objectors to study them for the hearing.

My second point is that if such studies have not been made—and that may be possible because the Minister of the Environment indicated today that although he was sure the studies had been made, he did not know where they were, or could not locate them—the minister or his parliamentary secretary should assure this House that the hearing will be adjourned until studies can be made and presented to the objectors before the hearing closes.

Lastly, if there was a study but it is not yet available, I ask that the hearing be adjourned until such time as the study is made available in sufficient time for the objectors to consider it and make their objections accordingly. I am not saying that there is necessarily an environmental danger as a result of moving this runway. I do not know. Until we see the effects of the study we will have no way of knowing. It is common sense that this study should be made available before the magic date of February 4, and you can count the days when the government has to confirm or abandon the expropriation proceedings.

I ask the minister or his parliamentary secretary to take immediate action on this question, to take steps to deliver the studies tomorrow, or adjourn the hearing if the studies have not been done, and have them done. This must be done before the time runs out.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): There is no special study, as such, being carried out, but because of our noise standards we are aware of the implications of noise pollution. This is taken into account in the over-all study of airport development, and in this case in the construction of the new runway. Liaison has also been carried out with provincial and municipal authorities on other environmental matters related to the new runway. We do not plan to make any report to the expropriation hearing, but if questions are raised on these matters, answers will be given.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.19 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The House met at 2 p.m.

THE PRIME MINISTER

EXPRESSIONS OF SYMPATHY ON DEATH OF HIS MOTHER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is not in his place today. I simply rise, not for the purpose of attempting any eulogy of the Prime Minister's mother, which would be very presumptuous of me, but simply to express on behalf of my colleagues and myself, though realizing that there is nothing of great help one can say in these circumstances, the deepest sympathy with the Prime Minister in the death of his mother.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I just as briefly express on behalf of my colleagues and myself our deepest sympathy to the Prime Minister on the death of his mother. I had occasion once to watch the Prime Minister on television and to learn with what affection and respect he regarded his mother. Even though most of us did not have the opportunity of meeting her when she was alive, we feel deeply for the Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and myself join the Leader of the Official Opposition and the leader of the New Democratic Party in extending to the right hon. Prime Minister our most sincere sympathy on the occasion of the death of his mother. We all know that the loss of a mother is a heavy one. And it is so for a Prime Minister. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we express our sincere sympathy to the right hon. Prime Minister and to all members of the Trudeau family.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as Acting Prime Minister may I thank the leaders of the other parties for their expressions of sympathy on the bereavement of the Prime Minister and associate members on this side of the House with those sentiments. I will undertake to see that these expressions of sympathy from all quarters of the House are conveyed to the Prime Minister.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

TABLING OF LETTER SENT BY PRIME MINISTER TO PREMIERS PROPOSING DATES FOR FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table in English and in French copies of the letter sent by the Prime Minister to the premiers proposing dates for a federal-provincial conference of first ministers.

FINANCE

TABLING OF REPORTS BY SUPERINTENDENT OF INSURANCE ON SMALL LOANS COMPANIES AND MONEY LENDERS AND ON CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT SOCIETIES

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I should like to table one copy of the report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on small loans companies and money lenders for the year ended December 31, 1971; and one copy of the report of the Superintendent of Insurance for Canada on co-operative credit societies.

MEETING OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—TABLING OF PROPOSED AGENDA

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to table with the consent of the House the proposed agenda, as it stands at the moment subject to ratification by the provincial ministers, of the conference beginning tomorrow between myself and the provincial ministers of finance, particularly pursuant to the request of the Leader of the Opposition.

POST OFFICE

NEGOTIATIONS TO SETTLE DISPUTE WITH EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in order to bring before the House a question of urgent public importance. I refer to the fact that negotiations to resolve the dispute between the postal workers and the Treasury Board have broken down. The postal workers have accepted the majority report of the conciliation board, but the Treasury Board now appears to be making use of a report which differs from that which was subject to its previous approval. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the House now adjourn for the purpose of discussing this matter of urgent public importance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize, I am sure, that the motion is out of order. He is asking for the adjournment of the House under the terms of Standing Order 43. This ought to be done under the terms of Standing Order 26. Therefore the motion cannot be put.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my motion and move, instead, that the subject matter of my motion, namely, the breakdown in postal negotiations, be referred to the Standing Committee on Manpower and Labour?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is, of course, amending his motion with the consent of the House. There should be no difficulty about that, because he does not need to give notice of a motion under Standing Order 43. This having been said, I have to inquire whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There was unanimous consent to the hon. member rephrasing or amending his motion, but not to the motion being considered at this time. Therefore the motion cannot be put.

NEGOTIATIONS TO SETTLE DISPUTE WITH EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion which is in order under Standing Order 43. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That in view of the postal unions' acceptance of the Conciliation Board Report and the announcement by the government of its acceptance thereof, this House calls on the government to desist from seeking to make unilateral changes in that report since such actions by the government may well lead to nationwide work stoppages, and urges that the government stand by its word and reach a settlement forthwith.

• (1410)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion therefore cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971 (No. 1)

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION TO BE DEEMED ADVANCE

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1).

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

TERRITORIAL SEA AND FISHING ZONES ACT

EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONES

On the order: Introduction of Bills.

January 15, 1973—Mr. Howard—Bill intituled: "An Act to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act".

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard: Stand, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will allow the proposed notice to stand, but perhaps I should take this opportunity to indicate to the hon. member that I have had the privilege of reading his proposed bill and was particularly interested, I might say fascinated, by the explanatory notes appended to the bill. I believe that the hon. member, on at least one previous occasion, was reminded by the Chair that explanatory notes ought to be guided by long-established principles.

In this connection may I refer the hon. member to citation 357 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, which indicates that explanatory notes ought to be brief. Brevity is a quality which is subjective in many ways and the hon. member's standards may be different from those of the Chair. But I have the impression that this explanatory note is not quite in keeping with the traditions and practices of the House.

I would suggest to all hon. members that explanatory notes should not be a second reading speech. I have the impression that the hon. member is arguing his case rather than giving an explanatory note. Perhaps the hon. member, who has asked that the matter be stood, might take a few minutes of his time to take a look at the explanatory notes and possibly make them a little less argumentative.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, may I thank you very much for your advice. I might say that this bill is in precisely the same form, and the explanatory notes precise to the word, as the bill accepted by Your Honour last session.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—ALLEGED SUBSTANTIVE CHANGES BY GOVERNMENT IN CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. May I ask the minister if he is now prepared to tell the House whether or not the government accepts the conciliation board report on the postal dispute, and whether or not the government accepts it in its unedited form.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General announced last week that the government was prepared to accept the majority report of the conciliation board provided that it was also accepted by the Council of Postal Unions.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that the report was accepted by a vote of the postal unions, and in view of what appear to be substantive changes in the report which was presented to the negotiating team from the unions, I would ask the minister whether he is prepared, as a sign of government good faith, to call the chairman of the conciliation board before the negotiating team to give evidence whether or not substantive changes were in fact made in the report by the government?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think I would prefer to let the Postmaster General respond to that question because he is the one in charge of the negotiations.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I redirect my question to the Postmaster General since he now seems to have assumed the role of chief negotiator for the government, which is a new break.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite evident that the government's announced position is to accept the conciliator's report. We have made no alteration to the terms of this acceptance. I, however, want to tell the House that upon the request of the Council of Postal Unions the President of the Public Service Staff Relations Board has called upon the conciliation board to clarify the matter of classification.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary question. Since the Postmaster General now admits there were changes made in the report—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: He did say that, Mr. Speaker, and the record will indicate that he did.

Mr. Hees: You heard him.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the Postmaster General and/or the President of the Treasury Board whether in the interests of getting the talks back to the table they are now prepared to call the chairman of the conciliation board so this matter can be settled once and for all and negotiations can be resumed?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I can repeat what the hon. member may not have understood, that it is clear that we made no changes. As far as our interpretation of the report is concerned, we feel that the report is very clear on that matter of job classification. The matter is explained quite clearly in the report and we are ready to accept all its articles. We have said so to the union and we hope to be in a position in the very near future to sign a contract with its representatives as they were recently authorized to do by vote.

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON JOB CLASSIFICATION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the conciliation board report recommends that the question of job classification should be a subject permitted to be dealt with under the grievance procedure, may I ask the Postmaster General whether in fact the government and its representatives are insisting that this question of classification shall not be covered by the grievance procedure before they sign an agreement?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in the old contract the matter of job classification could not even be considered as a grievance. We have agreed that it could be one of the grievances that can be discussed within the department itself. However, that a job classification grievance could be submitted to arbitration is something that, to our mind, was not suggested at all by the recommendations of the conciliation board. We feel that this exceeds by far the mandate and recommendations of the conciliator's report.

We are willing to approve immediately the contents of the conciliator's report but we feel that particular part goes far beyond its recommendations.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Public Service Staff Relations Act excluded the question of classification from collective bargaining, in view of the fact the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board specifically instructed the conciliation board to look at this question because it is so crucial to the whole matter of reaching an agreement, and in view of the fact there is obviously a difference of opinion as indicated in the statement just made by the minister and the interpretation of the union as to what the conciliation board recommended, would the Postmaster General give consideration to calling the chairman of the board to meet with both parties in order that this question can be resolved and we can avoid a work stoppage which already began in the city of Toronto yesterday?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: I answered this question earlier, Mr. Speaker, when I said that the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board had issued a directive requesting explanations from the chairman of the conciliation board on this point.

Anyhow, this issue should not result in work stoppages as it does now. I think it is possible to clarify this point without interrupting work and lowering the quality of services to Canadians.

• (1420)

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: If the union is not satisfied with the unilateral decision of the government as to what the chairman of the conciliation board meant, obviously the union has very little leeway. I ask the question again of the Postmaster General: In the interest of having continued good relations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Orlikow: —would he agree to let the chairman of the conciliation board—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is, I suggest, the same question as was asked by the hon. member and also by the hon. member for St. John's East.

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF RESPONSIBILITY FOR NEGOTIATIONS TO DEPARTMENT FROM TREASURY BOARD

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since it is obvious that there has been a breakdown in the negotiations between Treasury Board, the postal unions and the Postmaster General, in line with the recommendations of the conciliation board is the government prepared to transfer the responsibility for negotiating a contract to the Post Office from the Treasury Board so that the vitally important postal service may continue uninterrupted?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I, of course, deny the allegations by the hon. member. I believe that the negotiations have been in excellent hands and we are making great progress toward settlement. I hope the hon. gentleman will support us in our efforts.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my next supplementary question to the Postmaster General. In light of the hon. gentleman's remarks in December concerning the breakdown in communications between the government and the postal workers and the consequent loss in morale, would he now accept some responsibility for negotiations as a minister who cares?

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON SUGGESTED PUBLIC INTEREST DISPUTES COMMISSION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister as well. As there is a reasonable likelihood of further difficulty and of a possible work stoppage, may I ask whether the government is now prepared to state if it has accepted or will accept the recommendation of the Woods task force report for the setting up of a public interest disputes commission. If so, could he indicate to the House the present status of the government's attitude in this regard?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has an advantage over me in being more familiar than I am with this particular report. I will take his question as notice.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I crave your indulgence. May I direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board, who is attempting to advise the Acting Prime Minister. Is the government in a position of a positive nature with respect to that particular recommendation of the Woods task force?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, this is an interesting suggestion emanating from the Woods task force report. The House will be contemplating later this year amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. Perhaps that will be the time to look at it.

An hon. Member: The minister does not know about it either.

LABOUR RELATIONS

WARDAIR STEWARDESSES' STRIKE—INVESTIGATION OF NUMBER OF HOURS THAT PILOTS ARE FLYING

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. If his department is to undertake an inquiry into the situation pertaining to Wardair charter flights, as he indicated yesterday, would he agree that the inquiry should be extended to find out if the pilots of that firm are being forced to fly between 24 and 26 hours without a break?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice.

Mr. Neale: Would the minister order an immediate investigation into the Wardair charter flight that left Vancouver International Airport on the evening of January 15 destined for Sheffield and Gatwick, which in fact ended up in Keflavik, Iceland, and about which there are some serious questions?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, my answer is the same as that to the previous question.

WARDAIR STEWARDESSES' STRIKE—MAINTENANCE OF SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Wardair strike. Will the minister undertake to investigate and indeed assure the House that the safety regulations will be looked into because the safety of passengers may be jeopardized, and will he report to the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the responsibilities of the department. As you know, the department is not responsible for labour disputes or their settlement, but it is responsible for air security and the House may rest assured that we are doing every effort to maintain passenger and aircraft security.

FINANCE

MEETING OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—SUGGESTION THAT BANK OF CANADA MAKE INTEREST-FREE LOANS TO PROVINCES

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Tomorrow will he finally be able to announce to the provinces the possibility of financing their administration through interest free loans from the Bank of Canada?

[English]

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member for Shefford. He will be recognized in a moment. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham rises on a point of order.

Mr. Lawrence: It has been my belief that when a document was tabled in the House this would enable—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Lawrence: My question is on a point of order. My point of order is that presumably the purpose of tabling a document in the House is so that members can get a look at it. The Minister of Finance has indicated that he has not only tabled with the Clerk one copy of the agenda for tomorrow's conference but also 15 extra copies. There are those of us on this side of the House who would like to ask some questions about it. We have sent four different couriers to the table to get a copy only to find that it is not available.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Shefford.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Finance seemed unable to answer the question about interest free loans from the Bank of Canada, can he tell us what solution he intends proposing in the next few days to help the provinces finance their administration and meet their financial obligations in a better way than they can do now?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, one of the items on the agenda will be the sharing of tax sources. At any rate, we will discuss these matters in a serious way as of tomorrow.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Could the Minister of Finance tell us if, during this conference on the state of provincial and federal finances, the financial problems of the provinces and of the federal government will be discussed?

INQUIRY AS TO FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR POLICE FORCES

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): I should like to put a supplementary question.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether financial assistance has been requested by the Quebec Justice Minister for the police forces in Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I know nothing about that except what I read in the Montreal Gazette.

[English]

MEETING OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—PRESENTATION OF GOVERNMENT'S GOALS REGARDING UNEMPLOYMENT AND PRICE INCREASES

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Inasmuch as the first item on the agenda of the conference with the premiers tomorrow is not known to us, can the Minister of Finance tell us whether or not the government is prepared to present at that time what its goals are with regard to unemployment and price increases in the coming year?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): I might say to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham that the document was tabled and as soon as he ascertains the proper procedure I am sure he will get the document.

• (1430)

Mr. Lawrence: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, because it is not covered in the little green book—

Some hon. Members: Yes, it is.

Mr. Foster: Check with Bill Davis.

Mr. Lawrence: —how do we get a copy of something that is tabled if we do not ask for it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is yelling that I have a copy. I want to assure you that I am just as devoid of copies as the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Mr. Baldwin: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: —most ministers of a responsible government would not file or table papers only the day before a conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I explained to the Leader of the Opposition two days ago what my restrictions were at that time, and to some extent I can understand the Chair's position in trying to find out who is the financial critic for the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Don Valley on a supplementary.

Mr. Gillies: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have an answer to my question.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman and I have discussed the philosophy of targets before.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, and you have not answered.

Mr. Gillies: For clarification, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we did discuss it before, but what I want to find out is whether it is the position of the government that we can make sound economic policies in this country without specific goals and targets?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister may be anxious to reply, but I suggest that is the kind of question that cannot be asked and ought not to be replied to at this time.

CO-ORDINATION OF CAPITAL BORROWING WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, if we may get down to specifics, in light of the minister's repeated and I think justified concern about provincial borrowing abroad, would the minister report today on the progress, if any, on the proposal made previously about some practical inducement to the provinces to borrow more fully in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I dealt with the hon. member's question when his leader put it to me two days ago, suggesting that we had achieved an information centre for the capital requirements of the provinces—

Mr. Stanfield: That is more than we have achieved in this House.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): —and what they might need. I have not yet succeeded in persuading the provinces to co-ordinate their borrowing requirements both on Canadian capital markets and abroad, but that is a subject that will be discussed again on Thursday or Friday.

Mr. Lawrence: Is the government going to set up some machinery to assure the provinces that they will have access to sufficient funds in Canadian money markets at interest rates equal to what they have to pay abroad?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would think that the Canadian market in the last six months, particularly since I put the proposition to the provinces, has been sufficiently flexible and fertile for provincial borrowing requirements. As a matter of fact, their rate of borrowing abroad has dropped considerably since the first six months of last year.

TRADE

IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF DUTY ON MICHELIN TIRES IMPORTED FROM CANADA—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PROTEST AND REPLY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the important possible consequences of the recent American decision to impose a special duty on Michelin tires, and in view of the important need to have that decision reversed, would the minister table for hon. members the protest letter that was sent by the government of Canada to the United States and also at the same time table the reply, if one has yet been received?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to clarify a reply I gave the hon. member yesterday. A formal note went to the United States government last summer. There have been representations—

Mr. Broadbent: Last summer!

Mr. Gillespie: There have been representations since, and there will be a formal note going forward very shortly. I will give consideration to whether that note should be made public.

Mr. Broadbent: In view of the fact the minister has waited almost two weeks to act in this matter, would he assure the House that not only will he consider tabling it but also, in view of the fact that I understand a protest has been sent to GATT, or at least that such a protest is being considered by the government, would he make a commitment to the House that that protest, in its exact wording, will be tabled?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I will take that representation under consideration as well.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

KILLING OF POLICEMEN—PLANS FOR REVISION OF BAIL REFORM LAW

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General and is prompted by the death of Constable James Lothian in Toronto recently and other attempted murders and deaths. In view of the rapidly declining morale in police organizations and law enforcement agencies in the country, does the minister have any plans for a revision of the bail reform legislation which these organizations feel is causing these unfortunate incidents?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the bail reform law is within my jurisdiction. I believe it is within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I redirect the question to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I regret I have to ask the hon. member to repeat the question.

Mr. Nielsen: The question is prompted by the death of Constable James Lothian in Toronto recently and other murders and attempted murders. In view of the disturbing decline in the morale of police organizations and law enforcement agencies throughout the country, does the government have any plans for revision of its bail reform legislation which these agencies attribute as the cause of these unfortunate incidents?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the House during my speech on the Speech from the Throne the other day, I believe we are beginning to gain that experience with the bail law as it now stands that is necessary to make it operate effectively. I drew specific attention then to the necessity for police officers, and particularly Crown prosecutors, to exercise their responsibilities in presenting to the courts in the appropriate cases the need to retain a person in custody rather than grant bail, as a definite part of the bail reform law itself. However, I do not anticipate any change that would return to the day when the poor were kept incarcerated and the rich were allowed to remain at large.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: In view of the minister's reply, and I hasten to assure him that those on this side of the House are just as eager to see reform in bail legislation as anyone else—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: In view of that answer, can the Solicitor General tell us whether the government has any plans to consult with the provinces with respect to provincial law enforcement staffs, and specifically with regard to his own responsibility for the RCMP? Does the government have any plans to increase the staffs of these organizations in order to cope with the doors that have been opened by the bail reform legislation?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I believe the staffs of the organizations referred to by the hon. member are under provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Nielsen: The RCMP?

Mr. Allmand: With respect to the RCMP we are doing everything possible to make it more effective, but the majority of the criminal law provisions are administered by the provincial departments of justice.

KILLING OF POLICEMEN—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO RESTRICT FURTHER SALE AND DISTRIBUTION OF FIREARMS

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It is also prompted by the incident in Toronto. In view of the increasing homicides occurring as a result of the use of rifles in this country, is the minister considering legislation to restrict further the sale and distribution of firearms?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that question is one which is under constant consideration and review. The House had an opportunity to address itself to it not long ago, and the government will be addressing itself further to that question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North on one last supplementary on this subject and then try to move on to the next subject.

KILLING OF POLICEMEN—POLICY RESPECTING COMMUTATION OF DEATH SENTENCES OF THOSE CONVICTED

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I direct this question to the Solicitor General. In light of the fact that about ten people have been convicted of murdering police officers and their death sentences have been commuted by the government, is it the policy of the government of Canada to continue to commute sentences where people are charged and found guilty of murder and capital punishment applies?

• (1440)

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, since 1967 when the law was changed with respect to capital punishment there have been four commutations in cases involving policemen and prison guards and each case was decided on its merits. At the present time there are two cases but they have not yet exhausted the appeal procedures.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister says that discretion is used in each case. I think we had better get to the facts. Has there been any case in which someone was found guilty of the murder of a police officer and the government has not commuted the sentence to life imprisonment?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, of the four cases since 1968 there has not been a case where there has been a hanging.

HOUSING

MEASURES TO ASSIST PURCHASERS OF BADLY CONSTRUCTED HOMES FINANCED BY CMHC

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Could he tell us whether he has been advised that houses built 18 months ago and financed by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at a cost of $14,000 already need repairs amounting to $5,000, since he told us Thursday last that the Corporation meant to control the quality of its dwellings? Could the minister state what he intends to do to assist the buyer who becomes aware during winter that the Corporation had delivered him a shack?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would identify the particular houses or subdivision I would ask for a report and see what can be done for these people.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I have a question—

[Translation]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that such a question could easily be put on the order paper. If the hon. member wishes to put a supplementary question, he may do so now.

Mr. Godin: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INCOME TAX

ADVERTISEMENTS CONCERNING FORM

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister responsible for the half million dollar advertising spectular which contains this notice which I show to him entitled, "Close up—it is easier than it looks".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows better than or possibly as well as any other member that he cannot use exhibits in the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baldwin: I appreciate the point but Your Honour will understand how difficult it is to make hon. members opposite understand things without showing them. I should like to ask the minister whether he is responsible for that spectular advertising campaign offering alleged free advice to the poor harried taxpayer, and is he aware of the contents including the statement with regard to the nine-page challenge known as the income tax form which says, "it is easier than it looks". Will the minister review the contents of that document?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): With pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: Can the minister indicate if that advertising campaign which is based on the fact that you have a wonderful form was dreamed up by the same bright man who said, "the land is strong"?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Wellington.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Wellington.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member resume his seat. The hon. member for Wellington has been recognized on a supplementary.

ALLEGED DIFFICULTY IN PREPARING DUPLICATE RETURNS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister aware that the new income tax forms are made of such heavy paper that only one copy can be typed at a time and it therefore costs more to type them separately than to make duplicate copies?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister examine this advertising very critically in order to see if it violates his principles of false and misleading advertising?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

REPORTED APPLICATION BY FOREIGN COUNTRY TO TEST SUPERSONIC JETS OVER CANADA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of information I have received that a foreign country has applied for permission to test supersonic transport jets over Canada, can the minister inform the House whether permission has been granted and, if so, to what country?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if this is so the request was probably directed to the Canadian Transport Commission. I will inquire whether they have received such an application and, if so, what was decided.

MEETING OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—REQUEST THAT CAPITAL GAINS TAX BE ABOLISHED ON BEQUEATHED FAMILY FARMS

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

In the course of the federal-provincial conference which begins tomorrow, does he intend to discuss the repeal of capital gains tax which unfairly affects the farmers of this country when there is a bequest of family farms?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if this question is raised, I am prepared to answer it.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

If this question is not on the agenda, will the minister take the initiative of raising it himself?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This is one of a number of issues which are now of considerable concern to me, Mr. Speaker.

MEETING OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—DISCUSSION OF APPROACHES AND OBJECTIVES IN PENDING TRADE TALKS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. At this conference is the minister going to outline the government's objectives and approaches with regard to the pending trade talks with the United States, and is he going to invite the provinces to make suggestions in this area and agree to hold a meeting with them on this critical matter?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is not specifically on the agenda although the first item is wide enough for it to be discussed. There are only two days and, as the hon. member can see if he reviews the agenda, we are dealing with the economic situation and outlook, the fiscal situation and outlook, seasonal employment, revenue sharing and taxation, health services financing, the ninth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada with the 15 indicators suggested by the council, and other business. If there is time for it to be discussed it will be, but whether there will be time I do not know.

SUGGESTED RETURN TO BASIC HERD CONCEPT FOR FARMERS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister assure the House that he will give consideration to a return to the basic herd concept for farmers when he brings down his budget?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of National Revenue and I have responsibility for a committee that Mr. Mahoney announced to the House in the last parliament. This committee was concerned and I am still concerned that the application of the Income Tax Act to the farming community of Canada is well understood not only by the farming community but by the people who write and interpret tax laws. That is one of the subjects under review.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): It is a little late.

STEPS TO PREVENT LAY-OFF OF CANADIAN NATIONAL TELECOMMUNICATIONS EMPLOYEES—POSSIBLE VIOLATION OF PROVINCIAL LAWS REGARDING NOTICE

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that there is an extremely high unemployment rate in the country and in view of the fact that a department of the government is supplying loans and incentives to increase employment, would the minister indicate to the House whether he proposes to take steps to obviate and eliminate the proposed lay-off of 200 employees of Canadian National Telecommunications?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): I will have to inquire about that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: You will be known as the minister of inquiry.

Mr. Harney: While the minister is getting the notice ready for this very large notice board of his, could he inquire whether the proposed lay-off of these 200 employees by Canadian National Telecommunications would in any way violate the provincial laws in Quebec and particularly in Ontario regarding the notice to be given to large groups of employees being laid off?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that perhaps he is making a representation to the minister. In any even, he is asking the minister to give a legal opinion. Perhaps the hon. member might limit himself to the original question.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT—POSSIBLE DANGER TO CANADIAN INDEPENDENCE AND AUTONOMY

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I gave him notice a few days ago. Has the minister given consideration to the increasing danger to Canadian independence and autonomy resulting from the Canada-U.S. auto pact, specifically as a result of the centralization of decision-making in the automobile industry in the United States, which decisions are now based mainly on continental rather than national considerations?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for notice. I do not think that the automobile industry has changed significantly in terms of the decision-making centres since the auto pact.

AGRICULTURE

POSSIBILITY OF U.S. CATTLE GIVEN DIETHYLSTILBESTROL ENTERING CANADA DESPITE CANADIAN SUSPENSION OF USE OF DRUG

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture with regard to the use of diethylstilbestrol or DES as it is commonly known in the cattle feeding industry. Is the minister aware that after May 1 it will be possible for United States fed cattle that have been quite properly finished with DES implants to enter Canada for slaughter in spite of the Canadian suspension of the use of DES implants? If so, what is his department prepared to do about this situation?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that research is being carried on in the United States and we have some of our officials in the United States observing this research to learn their findings. I am not aware that the report is finalized. Until that report is finalized and brought to my attention, I am not in a position to make a decision.

Mr. Hargrave: Is the minister aware of the unfair advantage United States cattle feeders will have over Canadian feeders because of our loss of the use of DES and a resulting feeding efficiency loss of some 10 to 15 per cent as a result of this imbalance in Canada-United States DES regulations on this product? If so, what will he do about it?

Mr. Whelan: As I said, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the study that is being carried on. I am hoping this report will come forward early in February. At least, this is what I have been told. I am also aware of the disadvantage our producers will be under if American producers are allowed to use the product DES, as it is commonly referred to, in the United States. I am willing to go as far as discussing the matter with my counterpart in the United States. I have also discussed it with the Minister of National Health and Welfare for Canada to find out where we will go from there if the use of DES is still allowed in the United States.

[Later:]

INVESTIGATION OF ANTIBIOTICS ADDED TO CATTLE FEED

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. It is supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Medicine Hat. Is the minister prepared to take any action with regard to antibiotics routinely added to cattle feed as there is a good deal of evidence to indicate these may be more harmful to humans in some ways than diethylstilbestrol?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have been told by my department and the Department of National Health and Welfare that this is under constant study. Before any decisions are made, we want to make sure that we will be able to make the right decisions.

FISHERIES

CONSTRUCTION ON WEST COAST OF VESSELS FOR SERVICE IN THAT AREA

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. During his speech on January 11 the minister promised the addition of three large ships and 12 medium-sized patrol craft to the fisheries and marine services. Can he now assure the House that at least the vessels for use on the west coast will be built on the west coast?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. We always try to get these ships at the lowest possible cost. Nevertheless, it has been the habit of the government to buy in the area where the vessels are used.

SOCIAL SECURITY

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES BEFORE AMENDING OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Does he intend to follow up the wishes expressed by the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs concerning the necessity to hold a federal-provincial conference before amending the Old Age Pensions Act?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in this connection I received a letter from the Quebec Minister of Social Affairs. As a matter of fact, I am going to meet him as well as my provincial counterparts within the next few days on the occasion of a federal-provincial conference of health ministers. Following these consultations, we will take advisement on what steps to take next.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON GRANT DISTRIBUTION AMONG INCOME CLASSES—CONSULTATION ON WEEKLY PAY RATE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Secretary of State. Will the minister make a statement on motions outlining what measures the government has taken to ensure a more equitable distribution of the benefits of opportunities for youth grants among the youth of various income classes? In particular, what criteria are employed to guarantee that an adequate allocation of funds goes to youths of low-income families?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I will do that by way of a statement on motions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Faulkner: —but I would like to elaborate on this. The two points raised by the hon. member are important. It was one of the strengths of the opportunities for youth program in the past that it did get to low income and remote areas. I would like to find some method of providing some information to the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York-Simcoe.

Mr. Symes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might allow the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie a supplementary. The Chair will then recognize the hon. member for York-Simcoe and then call orders of the day.

Mr. Symes: Will the Secretary of State inform the House whether he had any consultation with the provincial ministers responsible for post-secondary education about the financial requirements of students before he determined the weekly pay rate under the opportunities for youth program recently announced?

Mr. Faulkner: No, Mr. Speaker.

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—POSSIBILITY OF USE OF LAND TO BE EXPROPRIATED FOR LAND BANK RATHER THAN AIRPORT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport or the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. In view of widespread interest in the proposed Pickering airport, will the Minister of Transport inform the House whether the government now intends to use the lands which are under notice of expropriation in the Pickering area for a land bank rather than for the proposed second Toronto airport?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe I mentioned in the House that we have received the report of the commission which conducted an inquiry on the expropriations. We are now studying it and the cabinet will be taking a decision by February 2 and at that time the hon. member will no doubt be exactly informed of the government's decision concerning the Pickering airport.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the minister understood my question. I am not speaking about the Swackhammer report. I am referring to the possible change of decision which I understand has been recommended or suggested to him. Has a decision been made to use the land for a land bank rather than for a second Toronto airport?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As this is the last day of the throne speech debate, possibly the government House leader might indicate the business for the rest of this week, next week and as far as he is able to look into the future.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose to call the resolution establishing the joint committee on food prices. Following that I would like to call the unemployment insurance bills, particularly Bill No. 1. Depending on the progress we make on these measures, we will then consider the capital punishment bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the order of business, I wonder if I may put a question to the government House leader. In view of the confusion that is developing between the automatic increase in pensions that will take place in April and the government's promise to make a substantial increase in the rate of pensions, will the government bring on that pension bill at an early date so that people will know as soon as possible—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: You voted against that.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. "At an early date" may be variously interpreted, but will be as soon as possible. It will not be delayed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Good.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

As I was unable to ask a question during the question period, I would like to ask the Chair if, in view of the importance for the Montreal Olympic Committee of the budget it must submit on February 3, the federal government still intends to refuse financial assistance for these games?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member could put this question only with the unanimous consent of the House and it is with reluctance that I allow members to ask questions after raising on a question of privilege or on a point of order once the question period has ended.

The hon. member might ask his question tomorrow since it is not urgent. At any rate I shall give the hon. member priority at that time.

[English] SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Tuesday, January 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. J. Blais for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Trevor Morgan (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I have learned that it is traditional to congratulate you, Sir, on your election to the high office which you now hold; but what I have to say to Your Honour is not out of tradition nor out of custom but out of sincere sentiment, well founded. Your reputation, Sir, has gone before you; you are not like a prophet who is without honour in his own land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Morgan: There is one thing on which I must compliment this government, new as they may be, and that is the appointment of the Deputy Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I believe in the principle that justice must not only be done but must be shown to be done, and I do congratulate Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, as a novice in this chamber I listened extremely carefully to the Speech from the Throne as presented to this House. I listened to and evaluated what other members said here, older and wiser ones than I, what they thought about the Speech from the Throne and just what it meant to the people of Canada. The sublimation of all this listening and all this evaluation can, for me, be reduced to a very few lines:

There was a young man from Australia,
On his backside was painted a dahlia,
The artistry was there,
The resemblance was there,
But the smell was a horrible failure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Morgan: Mr. Speaker, I have the proud privilege of representing the riding of St. Catharines. The city of St. Catharines lies in the midst of the industrial fruitland. That is not a contradiction in terms, for in and about the riding of St. Catharines is the tender fruit industry which is a $50 million-a-year industry. This has a great deal of commercial vitality to the city of St. Catharines. St. Catharines has been potentially a very active industrial centre. I say "has been" and "potentially," for if the government ever attempted to sacrifice the safeguards of the auto pact, the dynamics of this industry would be destroyed. If this should ever happen, there should be such a hue and cry from the people in my riding that even the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) would quickly quit the quiescent quilt where he now silently sleeps in the shade.

I have indicated to you, Mr. Speaker, that the city of St. Catharines is the business and commercial hub of the Niagara region, a region comprising some 350,000 people. St. Catharines is also the seat of government for the new regional municipality of Niagara which has been in existence for just over three years. I had the privilege of serving on that council from its inception until my election to this House.

The financial plight of this municipality, as well as all other municipalities across the country, must not and cannot be ignored by the government. More money must be funnelled into municipal coffers in order that the heavy burden on the home owner, through real estate taxation, can be alleviated. A distinction must surely be made between taxation representing services for people and taxation representing services for property. There is no logical reason why services such as welfare, education, hospitals, homes for the aged, day care centres, the work of children's aid societies, and so on, should be charged against land and buildings and become a burden on the home owner through real estate taxation.

The recent tri-level conference of federal, provincial and municipal leaders was perhaps a recognition of this problem and a first step, if a somewhat tentative one, toward a solution. The government has it in its power right now to assist the home owner in the dilemma in which he finds himself. I have already placed a notice of motion on the order paper calling for an amendment to the Income Tax Act to allow a home owner to deduct the real estate tax paid by him up to a maximum of $500 and to deduct from his taxable income, as well, the mortgage interest paid by him up to a maximum of $2,000. I shall, of course, have more to say on this topic at a later date.

This particular problem has been aggravated for the citizens of St. Catharines by the lack of growth in the industrial sector. In a recent survey of some 1,200 industries throughout 21 major industrial cities across Canada, in terms of growth the city of St. Catharines was twenty-first on the list. Dead last! The national average in terms of growth was just under 7 per cent. The percentage for St. Catharines was just over three.

I suggest there are two major reasons for this situation. First, there has been an unrealistic and unsympathetic approach on the part of DREE and by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in making the grants and supplying the incentives necessary in the region of Niagara. Second—and I agree this is a provincial matter—there has been an unwarranted rise in hydro rates to power users. This has caused several industries to leave St. Catharines and the region of Niagara.

If it really cares, this government could do three things to alleviate the situation. First, DREE and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce could be more realistic, quicker to realize why we are losing these industries. They should provide the grants and incentives needed to make these industries stay in the area and become more prosperous. Secondly, I suggest that the Department of Transport, through the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, commence immediately the construction of a new Welland ship canal, the land for which was expropriated and paid for four or five years ago. The land is sitting there idle and being allowed to waste. Formerly it was good farmland.

The construction of this canal would have a double effect on the city of St. Catharines and the Niagara region. Firstly, this kind of project would tend to have a high labour content and would compensate somewhat for the miserable conduct of the government in relieving unemployment. Secondly, although St. Catharines lies within a radius of about 500 miles of markets of well over 100 million people, due to the lack of adequate road and rail facilities these markets have been effectively closed. With a new canal, with fewer but larger and deeper locks, as well as adequate harbour facilities, we would go a very long way toward solving this problem.

There is a third way in which I think this matter of growth can be cured, not only for St. Catharines but for Canada as a whole: it is for the government to take a realistic approach in combating the DISC program of the U.S. by encouraging the growth of secondary manufacturing industry within Canada. I suggest a Canada-square program consisting of sensible quotas undertaken against resource exploitation—the words speak for themselves. With this three-pronged approach I am sure we would go a long way toward solving inadequate growth not only in the Niagara region and St. Catharines but throughout the country.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), in using, if you will pardon the expression, Mr. Speaker, rather pregnant prose, described the mangled meeting which took place between the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I shall make no further comment than to say that when I heard about this particular incident my mind waxed somewhat lyrical as follows:

Two politicians alone in a room,
Both dreamed of power they wished to assume;
But they argued all night,
As to who had the right,
With what, and with which, and to whom.

The same right hon. member for Prince Albert, and the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Atkey) also touched on the mumbo-jumbo recently espoused by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) regarding his constitutional authority to dissolve this House. That I will describe in one word—"poppycock". It is without a scintilla of truth, and I give him no credit for it.

When as a rookie Member of Parliament I first took my place in this House, I thought my job was fairly simple and straightforward, namely, to do the best job I could in getting good legislation through, not only for the people of St. Catharines but for every person in our beloved country. My hopes were soon dashed when I heard the Prime Minister on January 8. He reminded me of the man who was an agnostic until he realized that he was God. Then I, along with other members of the opposition, was subjected to vindictiveness, calumny, smear and character assassination. I happen to be very proud to be a Canadian and I think, with all humility, that I am a good one. Let me remind the Prime Minister of Iago:

He who steals my purse, steals trash. It is something, it is nothing. It was mine, it is his. Hide the tears. But he who filches from me my good name robs me of that which does not enrichen him but makes me poor indeed.

Then came the speech of the hon. member for York South, following which I went back to my office not knowing whether to laugh or cry. Sitting there silently, the words of a very old poem came to me and I should like to commend it to the Prime Minister and the hon. member for York South:

God giveth man a time like this to command.
Great minds, true faith, strong hearts and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office cannot kill,
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy,
Men who have opinions and a will,
Men who have honour,
Men who will not lie,
Men who can stand before a demagogue and damn his treacherous flatteries without winking,
Tall men who stand proud above the fog of public duty and in private thinking;
For a while the rabble with their thumbworn creeds,
Their large professions and their petty deeds,
Mingle in the common strife.
Lo freedom weeps,
Strong rules the land,
And waiting justice sleeps.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to offer my congratulations on your appointment to your high office. I also congratulate Mr. Deputy Speaker. As I sit here and watch you perform your duties in the House, in the short time I have been here I have come to realize that yours was a most judicious choice and that this House is privileged to have a man of your wisdom preside over its deliberations. I also wish to extend my congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the Speech from the Throne; on their first appearance both certainly did a very honourable job.

I should also like to thank the people of Cardigan for the honour they have done me in electing me their representative in Ottawa. It is a great privilege, as well as a great responsibility, to represent a riding such as Cardigan. It is a challenge that I look forward to with great excitement. I think I have a fair knowledge of the problems of Cardigan riding, having lived there for so many years and having had the privilege of representing part of the riding in the provincial legislature of Prince Edward Island. May I simply say, Sir, that I intend to work my hardest and best on behalf of those wonderful people.

• (1520)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I feel even more privileged because the people of Cardigan decided to elect me at a particularly exciting time in our political history. The party representation is such that the government could indeed be defeated in the House at any moment. However, I do not think hon. members—I am addressing myself here especially to my Liberal colleagues—should develop ulcers over this situation. I had the occasion of living through a situation similar to this in Prince Edward Island from 1966 to 1970. The Liberal government of Premier Alex Campbell governed Prince Edward Island with a majority of one vote, that of the Speaker. I think it is fair to say that this was a particularly successful period of our provincial history.

I am particularly pleased, Mr. Speaker, that my maiden speech in this House should coincide with the centennial of the province I have the honour of representing. As hon. members will know, Prince Edward Island celebrates this year its one hundredth anniversary as a member of the great Canadian confederation. We know that the road to confederation started in Prince Edward Island in 1864. However, Prince Edward Island took a few more years before joining confederation. We islanders like to think twice before we embark on any serious adventure, but in 1873 we felt that Canada was ready for us. It has now been 100 wonderful years and, needless to say, we have never regretted our decision nor do we regret it now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): As hon. members will know, the celebrations of our centennial have already started. We were privileged to have His Excellency the Governor General and Mrs. Michener officially open the centennial celebrations at the beginning of January. As was pointed out in the Speech from the Throne, we will be honoured by a visit by Her Majesty the Queen, later this year. Needless to say, Sir, all islanders look forward with great excitement to that historic occasion. If I may at this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend, on behalf of all islanders, a most cordial invitation to all members of this House to visit us during our centennial year. Even hon. members opposite are invited!

Mr. Marshall: Transportation free?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): For a short while islanders are prepared to forget even their politics and, God knows, this is not always too easy. It is our birthday and we invite you to come and celebrate it with us. It will be a year to remember for those who are lucky enough to be islanders and all those who wish they were.

Having regard to the island, Sir, there are a few points I should like to touch on briefly. Hon. members will recall that a comprehensive development plan came into effect in March, 1969. Implementation of the plan covers the 15 years from 1969 to 1984 and it involves further development of all major areas of activity on the island—from agriculture to tourist facilities, from fisheries to manufacturing industries and many other fields of activity. May I simply recall here that federal participation in the plan is in the order or $225 million.

In the agricultural sector a new family farm program has been initiated. Under this program, grants of up to $6,000 are available to farm operators who can demonstrate through the presentation of a five-year plan that a grant would improve their net income. The response to the program has been encouraging and it is evident that farmers are taking advantage of the results of research and agricultural counselling and are recommending modern agricultural practice in both the planning and implementation of their proposals.

The Land Development Corporation, a provincial Crown corporation, is also supported with DREE funds and provides many programs to assist farmers in the expansion and improvement of their operations. DREE has provided financial assistance in the design and construction of new or improved waste disposal systems for several food processing plants in Prince Edward Island. In addition, departmental grants of over $700,000 and loans of $1 million have been authorized for the construction of sewage disposal facilities in Souris, Montague, Summerside and Charlottetown. A road building program, in effect since 1969, is producing a system of all-weather roads to assist the social and economic development of the province, at a cost of over $7 million in federal funds.

As a result of an amendment to the plan in 1971 making provision for federal assistance in the construction of educational facilities, schools at Ellerslie and St. Louis have been completed, and work is under way on additional facilities at Cornwall, Sherwood and the Murray River-Sturgeon school. DREE is also helping with assistance to home improvement projects and home ownership in Prince Edward Island. Grants of up to $1,000 are available for home improvements, and forgiveable loans of up to $4,000 may be obtained to assist low-income families in the purchase of homes. To date, approximately 3,500 families have benefited under this program.

As an attraction for the many tourists visiting the island, the two governments have created a major tourist attraction at Brudenell, where a resort and golf course were built at a cost of approximately $2 million. A major urban development is now under way on the Summerside waterfront. I might say, when referring to this item, that it brings back the memory of something going on today in Prince Edward Island. The minister of the provincial government responsible for this program, a very smart young man of 47 years of age, is being buried today. I say this with due respect to him and the contribution he has made to Prince Edward Island. This major urban development is now under way on the Summerside waterfront—at least that dear fellow saw it commence—where a modern complex of commercial buildings, a convention hotel and marina are being constructed, with federal assistance, on reclaimed acreage in the harbour area.

Before leaving the topic of DREE programs, sir, I would add that I was extremely pleased to note in the Speech from the Throne that not only is the government pledged to carry on its fight to reduce regional economic disparities but the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will be decentralized to a greater degree. I think such a move will be most beneficial to those regions directly affected by the DREE programs, one of those regions being, of course, Prince Edward Island.

I should like to say a word about another industry which is vital to the economy of Prince Edward Island, that is, our fisheries. The year 1970 marked a turning point in Prince Edward Island's fisheries development with the catch that year exceeding 100 million pounds, double the normal harvest, and worth a record $11 million to the fishermen. The catch and landed value dipped slightly from that mark in 1971, but preliminary figures indicate that the 1972 catch will again be worth more than $10 million. Lobsters are, of course, the island's most valuable fishery resource, with a landed value estimated at $6.3 million in 1972.

During the current fiscal year, approximately $100,000 has been allocated by the federal government toward shared-cost, federal-provincial projects aimed at extending and modernizing the fishing industry in Prince Edward Island. Approximately the same amount was allocated in 1971. These projects include the technical upgrading of fishermen to improve their efficiency, various types of exploratory fishing, and demonstration programs of new fishing methods and gear such as oyster rakes, otter boards, power blocks for use on small vessels, hydraulic-bar clam dredges and refrigeration aboard inshore boats.

Considerable attention has been devoted to developing the island's oyster industry, and during the past summer a new oyster leasing policy was introduced covering the entire maritime provinces. It is anticipated that the changes will substantially increase oyster production and will improve management by encouraging large lease holdings and the formation of small companies or co-operative fishing associations.

The opening of a new school of fisheries at Summerside, Prince Edward Island, last fall reflects the importance which the provincial government places on the development of the island's fishing industry and the need to keep its fishermen abreast of modern techniques and technology.

I was pleased the other day to hear my colleague, the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis), talk about new legislation that will provide financial assistance to small inshore fishermen who require ice-making, ice storage and fish-chilling facilities. As the minister pointed out in his speech, this legislation will be particularly helpful to the disadvantaged parts of the country. I was happy to hear the minister say that as a result of this new legislation the earnings of all our inshore fishermen should be increased by about 30 per cent. That indeed is very good news to the inshore fishermen.

My remarks about some of the issues pertaining to Prince Edward Island would not be complete without a word on transportation. We islanders are blessed with many advantages that mainlanders may not know about, but transportation in general and transportation costs are still problems that we have to face on a daily basis. Some progress is being made in that regard, but much remains to be done.

With regard to freight rates, I am particularly pleased that this government has announced its intention to meet with provincial governments to examine the impact of freight rates on economic development and consumer prices. While I do not believe that lower freight rates are the complete answer to the transportation problem of the Atlantic provinces, I do believe positive action must be taken to ensure economic transportation access to markets in central Canada for Atlantic provinces producers. I am encouraged by the co-operative attitude of the railways with whom the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) has discussed this matter. Also, a closer interfacing with DREE is now envisaged and will help.

I am aware of the large amount of subsidy money, about $20 million per year, already contributed directly to transportation movements by road and rail under the Maritime Freight Rates Act and the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act. I am pleased to note the activities of the federal-provincial committee on Atlantic region transportation, working in co-operation with the Atlantic provinces transportation commission, to find more effective ways of spending this subsidy money, currently disbursed on a blanket basis for almost all commodity movements within and from the Atlantic provinces. I hope this work will help to provide some indication of how the over-all moneys might be channelled into more effectively solving this particular problem, that is, maintaining access to the eastern markets and offsetting transportation costs which are most disadvantageous to our region.

Another particular concern of my province is that of the future of the rail car fleet for moving potatoes. Within the next few years this fleet will be due for replacement. The impact of such replacement on rates for moving potatoes could be quite dramatic. This is a matter which might well be an item for discussion in the upcoming federal-provincial meeting on consumer prices. I am aware that the solution need not lie exclusively in the rail mode.

In so far as the ferry services to Prince Edward Island from the mainland are concerned, particularly with respect to the centennial year, I am pleased to note that plans have been implemented that should provide a service that will have even more increased capacity than P.E.I. enjoyed this past summer. In fact, in the planning a traffic increase of 17 per cent was used, to allow a sufficient margin for such an important event as the P.E.I. centennial celebration. To meet the projected demand, MV Lucy Maud Montgomery will be taken from the Newfoundland service and added to last year's fleet on the Borden-Cape Tormentine route.

Mr. Marshall: Watch it.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I thank the hon. member for his vote. Additionally, capacity was increased on the Wood Islands-Caribou service by 50 per cent by adding the new ferry, MV Prince Edward, in November, 1972. With these additions, I believe the previous high standard of service that was established in 1972 will be not only maintained but enhanced.

I would now like to say a few words about my own department. Having been elected Member of Parliament for Cardigan, I came to Ottawa, like any other freshman MP, ready to tackle the job. Needless to say, I was pleased, surprised and honoured when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked me to become Minister of Veterans Affairs. As hon. members may know, I have had a very close relationship with the department for a good number of years, and I believe I had a fair knowledge of the department even before I came here. I realize that there is still a good deal to be learned.

After nearly 30 years of observation and experience of the veterans affairs department and agencies from the output point of view, I have been most interested to be able to study it from the input end. This I have been doing pretty intensively for the past two months. I am not going to take time on this occasion to talk at length about the Department of Veterans Affairs programs and achievements, however desirable that might be, but I do want to say a few words on two or three points that I think are of interest both to hon. members and to veterans in Canada.

The first point concerns pensions; more specifically, the basic rate of pensions. My ministerial legacy included a report on this subject by a joint study group composed of representatives of veterans' associations, the Department of Veterans Affairs and the Canadian Pension Commission. It was set up last July under the chairmanship of Allan O. Solomon, commission chairman, and its findings were announced early last November jointly by my predecessor Hon. Arthur Laing, now Senator Laing, and Robert Smellie, president of the Royal Canadian Legion.

In essence, the report recommends that the basic pension rate, which is the amount of compensation paid to an unmarried, 100 per cent disability pensioner, should be related directly to the earning power of five categories of unskilled employees in the federal public service. At pay rates in effect at the time the report was presented, that would make for a basic rate of $4,529 per year and that was the figure recommended in the report. As I pointed out in this House the other day, when the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs has been reconstituted I will introduce a resolution referring the report to the standing committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): My second point also concerns pensions—the adjudication of pension claims and why decisions are sometimes months in coming. I want to begin my comments on this point by saying that the chairman of the Pension Review Board and the chairman of the Canadian Pension Commission, the two adjudicating agencies, believe that their primary responsibility is to award pensions; they do not consider themselves to be guardians of the privy purse. I support them wholeheartedly in that philosophy. At the same time they, and I, realize that pension entitlement cannot be awarded irresponsibly, that enough credible evidence must be presented to justify a favourable decision being rendered on a claim.

The other pensions agency, the Bureau of Pensions Advocates, and the veterans' associations go to great lengths to obtain and present that evidence. But not generally known—certainly, I did not know it until recently—is the magnitude of the problem that has been faced by the Canadian Pension Commission which is responsible for the first two levels of the adjudication of claims.

The 1971 amendments to the Pension Act were described by the then minister of veterans affairs, the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Dubé), as the most extensive and comprehensive in half a century, giving Canada what I am sure is a world model for legislation dealing with compensation for disability and death related to military service. But perhaps of greater improtance from the veterans' point of view was the removal of restrictions and the expansion of the basis for pensions claims, a more generous definition of the benefit of the doubt clause, an improved adjudication procedure and a more liberal attitude toward pension claims generally.

It was a new ball game for pension applicants and also for the commissioners and the commissions' employees. The implications of the amended act had to be carefully considered, new procedures had to be worked out, new staff had to be found and trained, old employees had to be retrained, priorities had to be established and potential claimants had to be informed of the extended benefits, including the three year retroactivity provision.

As expected, a deluge of pension applications descended upon the commission. It may be easing a bit now, but it has continued at a higher level for much longer than was anticipated; for example, applications in November and December of 1972 were somewhat higher than in the same months of 1971. Predictably, many of these claims were the renewal of applications that had been turned down under the old act, or were from widows who were entitled to apply under the amended legislation. Very many of these applications were for pension entitlement for medical conditions identified years after service which may be attributable to incidents that took place 30 to 50 years ago.

Regardless of whether the end result is a favourable decision or an adverse one, the medical appreciation of a claim and the ultimate adjudication of it is very time consuming, and the decision must be a written one. The law requires that it be in complete detail if it is unfavourable. Then, in addition to the time required for these procedures, many man-hours may be devoted to seeking or verifying evidence required to justify a favourable decision; and sometimes this hinges on evidence provided by commanding officers, comrades, archives, and so on, resulting in further delays while records and memories are searched and letters and reports are written.

There is more I could say about the reasons for the substantial backlog of claims and about the time required to render decisions, but I prefer to talk about the way the commission is handling this problem. All claims for pension had a fresh start under the terms of the new legislation, that is, as of March 30, 1971, when the act was amended. The act also provides that pensions may be paid from the date of application or retroactively for three years, whichever is the later. There is provision, also, for further extensions to compensate for administrative delays, if that section needs to be invoked.

The first priorities of the commission were the automatic awards to Hong Kong veterans and to the exceptionally incapacitated. These groups were dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the amended act during the 1971-72 fiscal year. Generally speaking, widows' claims now have priority, especially is they have been recently widowed, veterans of World War I and their dependants have priority over those of World War II, for obvious reasons, and priority is also given to claims where there is a social or medical urgency attached to them. Apart from these special considerations, applications are handled as far as possible in the order of receipt.

Thus, I can assure hon. members that whenever a justifiably urgent case is brought to the attention of the commission it is given priority attention. In other words, so far as we are aware prompt consideration is being given to all claims where there is real need. Last fall seven more commissioners were appointed and they will soon be able to carry their full share of the load. Support staff has also increased substantially and more will be taken on as fast as they can be trained for these highly specialized jobs.

The cumulative result of these measures is that the output of the commission is rising substantially. This trend, and the fact that the trend of new applications is downward, leads to the conclusion that, hopefully before summer comes, decisions rendered will outnumber applications received. But even when the current backlog has been completely eliminated, much time will still be required to deal with the continuing flow of applications based on service of long ago. As I have already said, this type of application constitutes a large part of those now awaiting decision.

Before leaving veterans affairs subjects I want to say a few words about our treatment services. In 1964 it was announced that the government was prepared to transfer DVA hospitals to suitable public authorities, subject to certain conditions. Stated briefly, those conditions would guarantee adequate accommodation and satisfactory standards of treatment for veterans, and the continued employment of the hospital staffs at rates of pay and other benefits equivalent to those they enjoyed as federal public servants. Since then, several DVA treatment institutions have been turned over to such authorities, notably Sunnybrook Hospital in Toronto, Ste. Foy Hospital near Quebec City and, last November, Lancaster Hospital near Saint John, New Brunswick. Negotiations for the transfer of other DVA hospitals are in various stages of discussion.

I want to assure hon. members that the policy of this government on that point remains the same. Indeed, it can be no other way if we are to fulfil our obligation of providing satisfactory medical treatment for the veterans for whom we have treatment responsibilities. Very few veterans are now under 50 years of age, and it is increasingly difficult to recruit highly qualified medical and technical staffs for hospitals which are chiefly providing chronic treatment to older people.

I do not want to imply that the standards of medical treatment in our remaining hospitals are not high. We still have many well qualified, dedicated, medical, nursing and technical services employees, but it is becoming more and more difficult to replace those who retire, for younger professionals in the medical sciences prefer to work in hospitals offering wider experience and more constructive challenges.

Our responsibility is to provide quality treatment for veterans, and we intend to do so. It is apparent that in the years to come it will be more effective and economical to buy that treatment than to provide it, and our policy is to continue to work toward that objective.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question? Can he tell us what the backlog of applications is at present? I am referring to the cases before the Canadian Pension Commission.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I did not have my earpiece on, but I believe the hon. member asked about the backlog of applications at present. The figure may not be exact, but I believe that at present it amounts to 9,400.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the new minister on his appointment. In view of the fact that it will be impossible to get evidence on cases which go back 10 or 15 years, would the minister consider and discuss with the pension commission the relaxation of the benefit of the doubt clause, because it seems to be part of the problem? If we are going to give them the benefit of the doubt, let us give them the real benefit of the doubt. Will the minister take that matter into account?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Yes, I will take it seriously into account. If I might be allowed to elaborate for a moment, Mr. Speaker, some of us know of cases of veterans with whom we served. We are aware of something that happened to them, something that is not recorded in their papers. This is why I would be in favour of this suggestion, and I will bring it to the attention of the commission.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): I should like to join other hon. members of the House who have taken part in this debate in extending to His Honour, the Speaker, my sincere congratulations on his re-election to that very important post. I have every confidence, as have my colleagues, that His Honour will discharge the awesome responsibility which has been entrusted to him with dignity and fairness to all members of the House. I would also like to extend to you, Sir, my sincere congratulations on your election to the very important office of Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you, too, will discharge your responsibilities with the same dignity and fairness to all members of the House regardless of political affiliation.

Needless to say, I am honoured to have been re-elected by the voters of St. John's West to represent them once more in this House. To other hon. members who were re-elected, I offer my sincere congratulations. To those who occupy seats in this House for the first time I wish the very best and I hope their tenure of office will be rewarding and fruitful to themselves and to the people they represent.

The Speech from the Throne opening this session of our twenty-ninth parliament contained very few surprises for the average Canadian. However, it does stand out as representing the fastest reversal, the fastest about-turn in government policy since the Prime Minister's recognition of the Queen. But I am afraid, Sir, that it contains about as much sincerity. It seems that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his ministers have come to realize that people, their needs, desires and expectations must be considered top priority by any legislative body, and the House of Commons is no exception. People are very important, and they were very much in evidence on October 30 last. The lesson learned by the government that day must be a bitter one indeed.

One must credit the government for finally recognizing that something must be done to assist Canadians who are less fortunate than the majority. I am talking about the elderly people, the underpaid, the unemployed, those on welfare and those who are living in conditions that are less than satisfactory. However, it is questionable whether the government has in any real sense come to grips with the problems these people experience. It is questionable because although the Speech from the Throne sounds promising, it provides no real, fundamental changes in the programs being advocated as solutions by the government. The Speech from the Throne demonstrates clearly that the government has noticed there are problems in need of solution. However, it does not provide any assurance that the government is prepared to undertake any meaningful action to accomplish its stated objectives.

Representing, as I do, a Newfoundland constituency in the economy of which the fishing industry plays a very important part, I was most disappointed, but I might say not really surprised, to learn that the Speech from the Throne did not contain any reference to the fishing industry. The fishermen of my riding have become reconciled to the fact that the government is totally insensitive to their problems. The attitude of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé)—I am glad to see him in the House this afternoon—toward the need for improved and additional wharves, landing and harbour facilities in my riding would make Scrooge look like a big-time spender. In almost every community there you can see evidence of neglect on the part of the government. Public wharves are allowed to deteriorate, in many cases to a point where it is not safe for people to walk on them, and those that are being maintained are so overcrowded as to make their use by fishermen almost impossible.

Breakwaters are required in many parts of my riding. I presume the same situation prevails in most communities in eastern Canada. Breakwaters are required to provide shelter for boats and other property. Fishermen are forced to haul up their boats from the water on makeshift slipways. They run the risk of losing their boats during storms because of inadequate shelter and proper haul-out facilities. For this I give full marks to the Minister of Public Works because it is quite obvious that he and the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) are still battling over the old question of which comes first, the hen or the egg or, in this case, which comes first, fishermen or fishing facilities.

The Minister of Public Works refuses to take any action to correct these problems, on the basis that his colleague, the Minister of Fisheries, will tell him there is no need for breakwaters in St. Mary's Bay, or a wharf or community stage, because there are no fishermen in St. Mary's Bay. What the minister does not realize is that in order for there to be fishermen in that part of my riding there must be fishing facilities. That is why it is amusing to see the struggle that is taking place within the minds of both ministers as to what we should do first, whether we should provide fishing facilities or try to provide fishermen.

I say to the Minister of Public Works that if the government accepted its responsibility, if it performed the function that it was intended and supposed to perform, there would be fishermen in that area. I ask him to be more sympathetic to the needs of the fishermen in my riding. In Newfoundland and eastern Canada generally, wharves, breakwaters and other facilities are an essential matter. The federal government has responsibility to provide and maintain certain marine facilities in our harbours. These facilities are essential to our fishermen if they are to be given a fighting chance to eke out a living for themselves and their families.

God knows, the life of a fisherman is not easy even under the best circumstances, but it is much more difficult when he has to operate under these conditions, when he has to contend with a government, with the Minister of Fisheries and the Minister of Public Works who are totally indifferent and insensitive to his needs.

Not only does the government have responsibility for the provision and maintenance of harbour facilities for our fishermen; it also has a responsibility to protect our fish stocks against the plundering of foreign fishing ships, and to protect our inshore fishermen against the encroachment of larger ships—I might say both foreign ships and local ships—which run rampant over their fishing grounds, leaving in their wake destruction and chaos.

Mr. Speaker, on numerous occasions I have reported to the Minister of Fisheries instances of foreign and local ships coming into the harbours and bays in my riding without regard to the fishermen and their gear. They use the fishing grounds and destroy gear, then thumb their noses at the fishermen and sail into the sunset, leaving no compensation to the people affected. Foreigh ships continue to plunder our fishing stocks, ignoring our rights and challenging our authority. This goes on without a word of protest from the Minister of the Environment or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp).

The fishermen of eastern Canada realized a long time ago, Mr. Speaker, that they were not going to get much sympathy from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is not hard to detect in his attitude his absolute dislike of fish and his indifference to the treatment of fishermen. I suppose we have to make some allowances for the fact that he is a big-time city slicker from Upper Canada. However, it is another matter when speaking of the Minister of Fisheries who now prefers to call himself Minister of the Environment. It cannot be overlooked that the Minister of Fisheries shows complete indifference to the problems of fishermen and the fishing industry. We are unable to forgive him for that. We expect our Minister of Fisheries to at least go through the motions of showing interest in what is happening and to support our fishermen in their fight for survival. We expect him to take a stand in their efforts to get protection against these twentieth century pirates who infest the waters of our coasts and our bays.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Carter: We expect the minister to show concern for the lack of proper harbour facilities, and we expect him to impress upon his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, the need for funds to help the fishermen of this country. Unfortunately, the minister is so wrapped up in matters pertaining to the environment and protecting people against pollution that he appears to have forgotten the fishermen. It is not my intention to play down the need for efficient laws with respect to pollution—indeed, I think perhaps more rigid laws are needed to protect the environment—but a great many east coast fishermen have problems just as pressing, for which no solutions are forthcoming.

It is very difficult for a fisherman of St. Mary's Bay in my riding, or in the Ferryland district or the Placentia area to appreciate this government's expenditure of $2 million on a navy when he is left to his own resources in order to protect himself and his gear against foreign fishing ships.

There presently prevails across Canada a severe shortage of family housing at reasonable prices. Despite past efforts on the part of this government to alleviate the situation, there appears to be no improvement when one reviews the statistical information on the cost of housing, building materials and land. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I cannot become enthusiastic over the Speech from the Throne proposals in the area of housing and urban development.

Most of these proposals are not new. We must remember that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) had the same proposals ready for introduction at the beginning of last year. Despite the timing of the Minister of Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford), breaking open the cookie jar did not prove too profitable for the rest of Canada when he introduced new measures last June, although they no doubt helped the minister's election results.

Having studied the previous proposals and realizing their shortcomings and the insufficient impact they would have on the social conditions of this country, I cannot believe the minister has suddenly taken a turn for the better and that matters will improve in his department in so far as helping those in need of housing is concerned. On the other hand, if by some stroke of luck things have changed, the minister might be interested to know something about housing problems in Newfoundland.

An article which appeared in this morning's issue of the Globe and Mail gave statistics with reference to the housing problem in my province. It stated that Newfoundland appears to have the worst record of housing of any province. Regretfully, I have to agree with that statement, Mr. Speaker. We have very serious overcrowding in my riding and in Newfoundland generally. There are not sufficient subsidized housing units to accommodate the people who are desperately anxious for a decent place in which to live and raise a family. In my city, with a population of less than 100,000, there are more than 500 families desperately in need of public housing. Their names have been listed with the St. John's housing authority for quite some time, but there is very little hope of their getting better housing in the foreseeable future.

The average cost of a new house built under the National Housing Act in St. John's, Newfoundland, exceeds the average cost of the same house built under the National Housing Act in other parts of Canada. That in itself is not so frightening, Mr. Speaker, until we realize that in my province and in my city the per capita income is far less than that enjoyed by other Canadians, in my province and in my city the rate of unemployment is higher than that experienced in other Canadian cities and provinces, and in my province and in my city the cost of living exceeds that in other provinces and cities.

When all these things are added together, I am sure it will be seen that there is a very serious problem for the average salaried, blue collar worker living in the city of St. John's and in Newfoundland in general. Mr. Speaker, we must ask ourselves how we can expect a person who is forced to live and raise a family in a home that is unfit for human habitation to appreciate the problems of national unity or the multimillion dollar spending spree of this government on bilingualism and biculturalism. It is about time members of this government, both English-speaking and French-speaking, faced a few very important facts of life. I should like to remind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the Prime Minister, who devoted their entire speeches in this debate to the problems of French Canada, that Quebec is not the only province whose people have problems and who in many instances are treated like second-class Canadians. I admit that in some areas these problems are peculiar to that province, but basically there is not much difference between the problems of Quebec and those of the other disadvantaged regions of Canada. These problems are as basic as bread and butter or meat and potatoes; they are as basic as the difference between have and have-not. Misery and suffering brought on by poverty knows no linguistic or cultural boundaries.

I would like the minister and the Prime Minister to appreciate that the extent to which the fishermen in Quebec must struggle for existence is no different from that of the fishermen in St. Mary's Bay in my constituency. The pleas of a child who is fighting to overcome the stigma of social welfare, struggling to make his own way, to find his place in the sun and beat the system that has forced him and his family on welfare, are no different whether they are spoken in English or in French.

I believe that the problems in Quebec and in other parts of Canada are not linguistic or cultural, as certain people would have us believe; rather, they are problems of people not unlike people in my constituency and in other parts of Canada who demand social and economic equality. Their problems are no different, no less acceptable and no less palatable than the problems of people living in Newfoundland or in other so-called have-not provinces.

I wish to make some comments with regard to the need for more and better legislation for consumer protection. We must recognize the fact that the rapid growth of consumer credit in Canada has created an urgent necessity for more rigid and restrictive standards of consumer protection. Lack of substantial controls and regulations in this area has allowed the public to be subjected to gross misrepresentation through false and deceitful advertising. Numerous worldwide cartels have imposed unfair prices and impositions on the consumer, with little opposition from the government.

Since the advent of television we have been mercilessly bombarded by the ingenious advertising gimmicks of Madison Avenue-type ad writers who have succeeded in giving their usurious clients an almost divine right to the minds, bodies and souls and, in many cases, the future earnings of unsuspecting consumers. It is for these reasons that a definite program of government control should be instituted in order to provide protection for the consumer.

In my opinion, the following steps should be taken by the government if it is willing to embark on a crusade to end exploitation of the consumer. A reorganization of the Consumer Council of Canada should be undertaken to assume the position of the major advisory link between the government and the consumer. The council should be reorganized along the following lines. More money should be granted to aid its purpose; more research staff should be added to pursue the ways and means that could be implemented to combat consumer exploitation; membership in the council should be extended to include provincial representatives in order to provide a more realistic link between the government and the people; the reformed council should be independent of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. This would ensure an unbiased look at the situation as it now exists.

Despite the fact that the council would be independent of the department, it would still have to proceed with full awareness of the government's intentions for consumer protection. The council must have a clearcut definition of its purposes and its function. I feel this is very essential. The council's reports should be made public. Its independence from the department would ensure that this would be made possible. If the council is to be at all effective, it should ensure that the public is made fully aware of its rights and what laws and regulations assure these rights. I feel these are worth while suggestions and should be given very careful consideration by the government.

If such a course of action as the one outlined above is enforced, the public will no longer have the problem of assessing the value of products purchased. The standards set by the council will not only improve the quality of the products on the market but the consumer will be made aware of the value of what he is buying.

A perfect example of the need for consumer protection is the plight of those plagued by finance companies. The "bill-payer loan", which promises to consolidate all monthly bills into one, fails to get the basic truth across. Its deceit lies in the fact that, while consolidating bills might be a good idea, the interest payments are not. In effect, when a consumer is talked into this type of arrangement he is paying for paying his bills. While many will say that in the case of finance companies it is the fault of the consumer for not reading the fine print, it is not until he becomes involved in this type of arrangement that he realizes the effect bill collectors and collection agencies can have on the mental and physical condition of those in such situations.

In many instances people who have committed themselves to become overextended, credit-wise, and have fallen into the clutches of loan sharks have been driven almost to the brink of insanity and physical exhaustion by the merciless hounding of the usurers or their representatives. Unfortunately, the vast majority of those who fall victim to these goings-on are those who through no fault of their own can least afford the costs involved and in too many cases are unable to look after themselves. All too often they are people who have not been permitted by the system to rise above the bottom half of the social and economic ladder in our society. They are the real victims of inflation, greedy landlords and selfish employers. They are the unemployed, the underpaid, the widowed and the exploited, the so-called have-nots. These are the people who because of their circumstances cannot afford legal counsel to protect them against the garnishee-brandishing, judgment-seeking people and money lenders who would have no more compunction about attaching a person's wages, home, furniture, the food on his table and the clothes on an orphan than they would in driking a double martini at their favourite country clubs. These are the people who continue to fall victims to the vultures in our society.

Since 1968, the government has passed ten bills dealing with consumer and corporate affairs. Four of them were amendments to existing legislation. The fact remains that the legislation was not properly co-ordinated; it was piecemeal. In addition there was a considerable time lag between the passage of a bill dealing with consumer protection and its actual operation. An example is the Hazardous Products Act which only became effective in January, 1972, almost two years after the bill had been passed by this House. The Packaging and Labelling Act was passed in June of 1971, yet I understand it has not yet been proclaimed; consequently, its regulations have no force in law. The government has been slow to ensure that acceptable standards of quality, safety and fairness characterize the production and sale of consumer products in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired. He may, however, continue with unanimous consent. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Carter: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have only a few more sentences—

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I say that I hope my hon. friend will take just a minute or two, perhaps, in which to conclude. We have a long list of speakers who wish to take part in this debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has been given extra time and he may continue.

Mr. Carter: I apologize to the House. I realize I may have gone beyond the time allotted to me, but I felt that the matters raised were of sufficient importance to my riding, to my province, and maybe to the country, if I may be so bold as to say so, as to justify a little extra time being taken.

I shall close by saying that the government should take immediate action in many areas to correct serious inequities which exist in Canada, including serious inequities which affect the fishermen in my constituency and the facilities afforded them. I hope the government will, indeed, take action to correct these inequities.

Mr. Harry Olaussen (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, as a new member I have been impressed by the rituals and by the debates in the House of Commons. There is no doubt that the debates in the House play an important role in expressing the feelings of all parts of Canada through their elected representatives. As a new member from British Columbia it has been my privilege to meet members from various parts of Canada, most of whom, I am sure, are deeply concerned about the problems of their constituencies and the direction in which the country is headed. It is also my privilege, as a new member, to deal with the problems of my own riding and to take the necessary action.

A riding as large and as diversified as that of Coast Chilcotin has, no doubt, a diversity of problems some of which are brought to the member's attention to be dealt with as effectively as possible. I will touch on some of the problems in my riding, but first of all I would like to express my concern on one particular issue of interest.

Mr. Speaker, a good, reliable transportation system is the lifeline of a modern, civilized, industrial nation such as Canada. We have seen how transportation played a remarkable role in the opening-up and development of western Canada. We have seen how this country developed and grew as a result of the growth of a modern transportation system which enabled this huge country of ours to remain united in spite of the vast distances that separate the east from the west and the north from the south. We owe our existence as a sovereign nation to those who have struggled, sometimes under harsh conditions, to build, maintain and operate a transportation system which, despite some of its current shortcomings in many areas, can justify our sharing a sense of pride with all Canadians in the fulfilment of our national dream.

However, this pride gives way to a sense of guilt and shame when we consider that this country, one of the world's largest exporting nations and one of the most industrialized, has practically no merchant marine to speak of other than those ships engaged in coastal and inland waters. As an ex-merchant seaman, I am vitally interested in seeing this country develop a merchant marine, not only for economic reasons but also to give us a sense of pride in and respect for the maritime traditions which have been part of this country's development since the early settlers first arrived in Canada.

The subject of a Canadian merchant marine has been raised many times in past sessions of the House, and will undoubtedly be raised again in this and future sessions until such time as the matter can be resolved in accordance with the wishes of those who have repeatedly brought up the issue on their own behalf and on behalf of those who are interested in seeing the establishment and development of an active merchant marine. As a first step toward this goal, it is my feeling and the feeling of other concerned parties that the Darling report on the coastal trade of Canada and related marine activity must be implemented without delay.

Considering that services traditionally provided by Canadian ships and Canadian workers have been transferred to foreign flag vessels which are built, manned and supplied by other countries and are exempted from Canadian taxes, safety codes and labour standards, it is my fervent hope that members of this House will join me in endorsing the main recommendations set down in the report.

The first is that the Canadian coastal trade should be reserved to Canadian flag vessels only. Adoption of this recommendation would result in the employment of an estimated additional 40,000 seamen and shipbuilding workers, and would assure Canadian control over domestic shipping and Canadian sovereignty in our coastal and Arctic waters. Second, the development of resources in the Arctic and the offshore areas should contain conditions on the extent of use of Canadian shipping to be required. This policy would result in substantial participation of Canadian shipping and would be a logical part of any campaign to restore a Canadian flag, deep sea merchant marine. Third, the policy of issuing permits should be directed as far as possible toward replacing foreign vessels by Canadian vessels. Permits to non-Canadian flag vessels should be given only when Canadian vessels are either unavailable, insufficient or inadequate for the purpose. This policy would encourage the development of sufficient Canadian flag tonnage to handle all coastal trade requirements. Fourth, the reservation of coastal trade to Canadian flag vessels should extend to other marine activities, dredging, salvage, seismographic, supply and support vessels in offshore drilling.

It is recommended that marine activities in connection with the economic exploitation of the continental shelf be placed in the category of coastal trade and other marine activity which would be reserved to Canadian ships. It is unthinkable that the exploitation of Canadian resources should take place without the full coverage of Canadian law. It is also desirable that any exploitation of these resources provide the maximum return to Canada.

Fifth, government assistance to new industries in the marine sector should have attached to it conditions on the extent of use of Canadian shipping to be required. There is no doubt that shipping policy needs to be fully integrated into regional development policy, as recommended in this report, since shipping itself is one of the most likely possibilities for regional economic development, especially in areas such as the east coast.

It is my belief that there must be continual demands for a review of Canadian shipping policy, not only with regard to the coastal trade as recommended in the Darling report but with regard to the possibilities of a deep sea merchant marine. These studies, both of the coastal trade and of the deep sea fleet, are a necessary prelude to any development of an effective policy for the shipbuilding industry. Besides the many economic advantages to be gained from the development of an active Canadian deep sea merchant marine, this country would see to the training and development of a new generation of merchant seamen dedicated to Canada's maritime traditions, traditions that have played a very essential role in the growth and development of this country.

There is no doubt in my mind that a merchant marine as envisaged by me and others in the House will soon become a reality, reality that will result in an expanded shipbuilding industry on the west coast as well as on the east coast, one that will result in increased employment within the industry itself and in the other areas directly or indirectly associated with the shipping industry. Not only will the government derive more revenue from such a program but it will also be able, with this revenue, to offset subsidies that may be required.

Speaking for my province of British Columbia, I welcome a policy that will result in greater Canadian control of its shoreline in matters of pollution; I welcome a policy that will result in greater activity in the shipping industry, and I welcome a policy that will stimulate the economy and encourage the growth of secondary industry in the province.

It is indeed heartening to note that the government, in its throne speech, believes that a greater measure of decentralization of industrial activity is necessary and that it recognizes that western Canadians wish to build industrial strength on top of their region's great resource and energy base. It is also heartening to note that the government is suggesting improvement of the total transportation system, so basic to overcoming the problems of distance. This will be a matter of interest to my riding of Coast Chilcotin where federal-provincial co-operation is necessary in order to resolve some of the problems there, specifically with reference to a possible connecting line between the British Columbia railway and the Canadian National Railways in the Squamish-Lillooet area.

On the subject of the throne speech, it is also heartening to note that the government is interested in efficient communications between all parts of the country, that it will in the near future submit proposals for a national communications policy and for resolving problems arising from the growing interaction between broadcasting and other forms of telecommunication, giving due weight to the interests and concerns of the provinces. This will also be of some significance to my riding of Coast Chilcotin in which people living in isolated areas have little or no communication with the outside world and are virtually deprived of such facilities as are necessary in a civilized world. There is no room for little Siberias in a modern and enlightened country such as ours.

I welcome any significant changes that will improve the quality of life and benefit the people of Coast Chilcotin. I welcome the government's decision to recognize the needs of the western provinces and to take specific action as required in order to carry out its decisions. I have no doubt that the people in my riding will greatly benefit from the government's future course of action, one that can only help unite this country. It is the kind of action that has been long overdue, and if the proposals contained in the throne speech are carried out as promised there is no doubt that this country will greatly benefit from improved relations between the east and the west.

I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the west stands on the threshold of a new era, an era in which economic and industrial growth will be accompanied by concern for the environment and a demand that effective anti-pollution standards must be enforced if industrial growth is to be encouraged. In my riding of Coast Chilcotin, great importance is attached to the environment as the riding is blessed with the kind of natural beauty probably unsurpassed by any other riding in Canada. It is our intention to keep as much of it as possible in its natural state, unspoiled by the blight of industrial growth so common to other areas of the world.

I am pleased to note that the government of British Columbia is anxious to bring about industrial development in the province and is also anxious to see to it that beautiful British Columbia will continue to be beautiful through effective pollution controls and concern for the environment. I am sure that many of my constituents in Coast Chilcotin share my feelings regarding industrial growth and the need at the same time to protect the environment. There is talk of zero growth in terms of population and industry; there is talk of wildlife protection, there is talk of unemployment, there is talk of pollution, there is talk of industrial growth, there is talk of improved transportation and communications, there is talk of incentives and government grants. These and other topics interest the people of my constituency because they are topics which are of great concern to western Canadians in their search for the good life. We must be willing to share their concern as Canadians, because by sharing their concern we can learn something about the good life and how to achieve it without destroying our environment.

This country has the opportunity and the resources to bring, not merely a higher standard of living to those who have so long been neglected but to improve the quality of life for all Canadians. I feel that in our search for a Canadian identity, in our search for the good life in terms of cultural and social advancements, and in our search for ways to preserve the environment, we are taking a course of action that identifies us as civilized and responsible people. It is a course of action that I approve and support. It is a course of action that is necessary if we are to enjoy the benefits of a civilized and environment-conscious country. However, we must remember that in our search for quality, human survival in terms of job requirements is essential. Not only is it important to reduce the high rate of unemployment that is part of our economic system; it is equally important to recognize the right of workers to organize and to have a voice in all areas of decision-making that affect their welfare.

It is unfortunate that in a country which believes in the sanctity of the free enterprise system there are more than five million unorganized workers who must accept a system in which human values are easily neglected in the mechanization of production. The master-servant relationship continues to be the only acceptable kind of relationship in the minds of economic and political dinosaurs who use any opportunity they can to discredit unions as scapegoats for our economic troubles.

The people of Canada have been led to believe that it is they who have to serve the corporate system and the corporate interests. It is not the people who have to serve the system, but the system that must serve the interests of the people, and it seems that members, who are elected by the people, are sometimes prone to ignore this fact. We have an obligation to the people who elected us. Let us fulfil that obligation in the interests of the people.

Justice for the people means justice not only for majority groups but also for minority groups. The Indian people of Canada find themselves in perhaps the weakest position of all minorities. They constitute one of the most deprived groups of Canadian society. Their plight can be studied in the province of British Columbia in which 50,000 "status" Indians live, most in out-of-the-way parts of a vast and forbidding region.

• (1640)

One constituency in which almost a quarter of the British Columbia Indians make their homes happens to be my constituency of Coast Chilcotin. Large settlements are found on the coast at Sechelt, Powell River, Bella Bella and Bella Coola. Other large settlements are found at Squamish, Mount Currie, Lillooet and the Chilcotin country.

Early in this century the Chilcotins, like so many other Indians, were on the trail to extinction. That trend has been reversed since then, due to better health care and medical responsibilities. In the meantime, instances of violence and manslaughter continue to exist, and it is not surprising when one sees the misery, the alcoholism, the extremely high rate of unemployment and the lack of pride in an almost non-existent culture. This is the tragedy in which the Indians find themselves. This is the tragedy in which a once proud and resourceful race now finds itself.

However, progress is slow and the basic problems continue to exist. The government of British Columbia has taken the right initiative in areas such as financial assistance, education, legal rights and participation by native Indians in matters affecting Indians. It is time to realize that direct participation of Indians in all decisions affecting their development is essential, and that education must play an important role in their future development. There are very good reasons for the present high Indian drop-out rate and it is time something was done about this.

It has been my privilege over the past year to meet many progressive-minded Indians in my constituency who show deep concern for the future of their people. These are the people who have the capability of providing the kind of effective leadership that is essential to the future development of the Indian people. This is the kind of leadership that is required if Indian people are to participate directly in all decisions affecting their development. The paternalistic attitude of the government must be replaced by such participation on the part of the Indian people as a step in the right direction. It is my belief that we must focus our attention on the plight of minority groups in Canada, for there is no way in which a just society can be established unless we bring in effective measures to eliminate social and economic injustices which continue to exist in our society.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding my speech I wish to thank you for giving me the opportunity to address the House of Commons for the first time. May I also take this opportunity to congratulate you on your appointment as Speaker of the House and wish you every success in the discharge of your duties to the satisfaction of every member of this House.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, each participant in this debate has opened his remarks by congratulating you and the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lamoureux) for your election to the important offices which you hold. This however is more than mere routine. It shows a sincere conviction that the destiny of the House is in good hands and attests to the wisdom of its members. I so take this opportunity to join other hon. members who have expressed these feelings.

The Speech from the Throne includes proposals relating to almost every aspect of our nation's life and is in fact a varied and detailed program that has been welcomed by most hon. members. This response has indeed ensured the government of the confidence it needed to proceed forward and face the many and very real problems which confront any nation today.

However, what upsets me is awareness that some situations which should not create problems seem to do so, which tends to undermine the unity of Canada.

After 100 years of Confederation, the concept of bilingualism has found practical expression in the legislation of the country, and this due to the exceptional leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I must however deplore the lack of understanding in some parts of Canada of the philosophy of bilingualism according to which a citizen should be able to communicate with his government in either of the two official languages. In fact, I find the persistence of this gap surprising. It might be less so to me if I were born in this country.

As all can notice from my pseudo Irish accent, I belong to the group of men and women who were born outside the boundaries of Canada and who deliberately chose this country to be their new fatherland. To put my thought in more simple terms, I am a Canadian not by accident, but by choice.

When, over 17 years ago, I was handed an immigration form to sign, it was bilingual. It should therefore not be surprising that millions of immigrants like myself instinctively sensed that they were entering a bilingual country. It was thus normal that we should consider that the controversy over bilingualism had been solved once and for all and that bilingualism was one of the values to be taken for granted in Canadian life. And this, not only in the text of the act, but also in our daily contacts with Canadians.

How can there be any hope of mutual understanding if we can only communicate through an interpreter? So long as all Canadians will not feel truly at home, whether in Quebec or in any other region of the country, we shall really not have achieved much in this country.

We must resolve this internal problem before we can consider dealing with the external problems that are in store for us. This is as essential as a close family relationship, when one has to be well prepared to face the outside world. If we are not united, how can we hope to sign agreements with the powerful European common market now that the United Kingdom is part of it? How can we negotiate with other powerful trading countries or groups if we fail to put an end to our domestic problems?

• (1650)

We can find in our country the full measure of its force and energy only if we understand each other. And we will not achieve that understanding about which we are so anxious as long as we need interpreters to communicate among ourselves. As long as such aids are necessary, in this House or elsewhere, we shall remain strangers to each other.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to point out that our exports to French-speaking countries have increased four-fold since 1968. That fact shows that when referring to bilingualism, we are at the same time referring to our daily bread and butter.

I shall also deal with another aspect of Canadian life which seems to violently contrast with the state of mind of our time which bears the stamp of space exploration, scientific and technological discoveries, rapid growth, speedy development of communications all over the globe, the behaviour of provincial governments within the Canadian framework. For instance, we are being informed of the intentions of a province that pursues some restricted goals and individual interests, while taking no account of the rest of Canada, as if it were a state by itself, that considers that the federal government is spending too much in another province, that, finally, wishes to share all its natural resources while the other provinces oppose such a policy. No wonder that some people are asking themselves whether the provincial premiers really have at heart the interest of Canada as a whole and where our country would end if Ottawa allowed all those provincial bigwigs to have their way.

As federal members, Mr. Speaker, we consider that there are no frontiers. As representatives of the federal government we direct our efforts where they are needed. We lend money in places where there is unemployment or again we attend to the needs in the housing field. We are not doing it for New Brunswick, Quebec or Nova Scotia but for Canada as a whole. This is why we feel repulsion at anything that smacks of ethnic favouritism.

Provinces have a role to play in the attainment of Canadian unity. They must have a larger vision of the events instead of trying only to get money from the federal government; they must think and act with a view to attaining national objectives. If they are so convinced, they will work through the Canadian offices abroad instead of their own offices throughout the world.

That behaviour on the part of some of the provinces which set up their own offices abroad proves a lack of confidence in Canada. We see it again, Mr. Speaker, when the provincial treasurers refuse to cooperate with the federal government, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) makes reasonable suggestions to co-ordinate the loans required to meet the needs of the provinces.

That is why, as we start a new year, we wonder where we are heading. For my part, Mr. Speaker, the answer is quite clear: We must endeavour to achieve that unity which will make us stronger and allow us to face the problems that will assail us from outside. We must stop our internal strifes; we must not tolerate provincial barons who pursue aims contrary to the national interest. On that highway that leads to Canadian unity, the provinces can and must play a positive role.

In addition, the daily practice of bilingualism, and not only its acceptances by all Canadians, can and must play a unifying role. We must accelerate and not decelerate, Mr. Speaker. We must not wait for the next generation to do it for us. It may then be too late. A bilingual Canada implies a multi-cultural Canada. Fashioned of all those strengths, Canada will grow richer.

[English]

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I first join other hon. members of the House in offering you my sincere congratulations. In the short period I have been in the House, your tactfulness and fairness in presiding over sometimes stormy debates and question periods have impressed me greatly. I also want to congratulate the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) on his election as Deputy Speaker.

As a new member, I wish to say that it is a great honour for me to be in the House representing the people of the Moose Jaw constituency. I will do my utmost to represent them in a good and statesmanlike manner and not betray the trust they have placed in me.

I represent a constituency where there are people of all racial extractions. There are people who came to Canada from various parts of Europe before the turn of the century to take up homesteads. There are descendants of these homesteaders, as well as newer immigrants—people of Ukrainian, Romanian, Russian, Finnish, English and Scottish extraction, as well as many others, all living together in harmony and proud to be Canadians. They are people who, while celebrating their national holidays and retaining much of their culture, place Canada first and foremost. I am proud, Mr. Speaker, to represent these people.

If any hon. members have travelled on the Trans-Canada highway through Saskatchewan, they will find, if they start at a point just east of the city of Moose Jaw and travel west to the town of Herbert, that this approximates the southern boundary of my constituency. The constituency stretches north from both Moose Jaw and Herbert to a line drawn east and west approximately 20 miles south of the city of Saskatoon. It is a large constituency, covering approximately 9,000 square miles, with a population of roughly 62,000. It contains some of the finest farmland in the west and, while a good deal of wheat and coarse grains are produced in the area, there is a large livestock industry. Potash and sodium sulphate are also mined in the area.

Within the boundaries of my constituency lies the Gardiner dam, an earthfilled dam some 210 feet in height, extending across the South Saskatchewan River valley some three miles. This dam is among the largest of its kind in the world. It dams the waters of the South Saskatchewan River and has created a man-made lake of mountain water some 140 miles in length, 185 feet in depth at the dam, with a shoreline of 475 miles. The lake is known as Diefenbaker Lake in honour of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who as leader of the Conservative government in 1958 had the foresight to enter into an agreement with the province of Saskatchewan to start construction of the project.

The dam is a source of power for the province, and the waters from the lake are fed into the Qu'Appelle River system, guaranteeing a domestic water supply for the cities of Moose Jaw and Regina. The project has created possibilities for extensive recreational development, not only on the lake itself but also by assuring a water supply in the Qu'Appelle River system. It has also provided a source of water to create Blackstrap Lake as a recreational area for the people of Saskatoon. It has made water available for irrigation in the Outlook area of the constituency.

Irrigation projects are costly in terms of capital investment, and many farmers who have become involved in an irrigation program are suffering from lack of capital. I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that he and the officials of his department, when meeting with representatives of the province, give consideration to the development of a program to assist those farmers who are already involved in irrigation projects, as well as those who have land suitable for development.

The city of Moose Jaw, with a population of 32,000, is the only city in the constituency and is located in the extreme southeast corner. Moose Jaw is the home of the Kinsmen international band festival, the largest band festival in North America if not in the world. It is a three-day festival, held on the May 24 weekend, with competing bands and contestants coming from various parts of Canada and the U.S.A. It grew from a humble beginning in 1950, when there were two adjudicators judging 12 bands, to some ten adjudicators from Canada, the U.S.A. and Scotland judging some 70 bands, 700 soloists and 56 ensembles in 1972.

On behalf of the city of Moose Jaw I wish to invite all hon. members of the House and their families to visit Moose Jaw on the May 24 weekend this year to see one of the most spectacular band concerts and festivals in the world.

The Canadian forces base at Moose Jaw, a training station for Canadian and NATO pilots, is located three miles south of the city, and in 1972 hosted one of the largest air shows ever held in Canada. Some 125,000 people from the three prairie provinces and the northern United States attended. The commanding officer and his men did a commendable job, and it is hoped that with the blessing of the Department of National Defence this show will become an annual event.

The economy of the Moose Jaw constituency is primarily agricultural; there is very little industry. The proximity of the city of Moose Jaw to the capital city of Regina, some 40 miles away, has to a certain extent inhibited the industrial growth of Moose Jaw. There is a tendency for government at both the provincial and federal level to encourage industry to locate or expand in more densely populated centres. The result is that the smaller centres tend to stagnate and later deteriorate, losing the youth who have to leave their homes to find employment.

I hope that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson), when considering programs and holding discussions with the provincial authorities, will give priority to the encouragement of industrial growth in smaller centres such as Moose Jaw and including some of the larger towns in the rural area.

I am aware of the fact that we on the Prairies cannot expect too much development in the field of primary industry, but there certainly is plenty of opportunity to develop secondary industries to process our agricultural products. This will require, however, the full co-operation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and a complete restructuring of our freight rates. I would therefore suggest to the House and to the minister that the development of secondary industry in Saskatchewan should be given top priority.

Saskatchewan has been losing population at the rate of 10,000 a year, primarily from the rural areas. Why is this happening? It is happening, not only because of the lack of industrial development to create jobs for the youth but also because of the fact that no attempt has been made in the past to retain the family farm. The loaning policies of the Farm Credit Corporation have been such that unless a young person had capital of his own, or unless a parent or close relative was in a position to assist him, he could not take up farming as a career. The result has been that farmers' sons born and raised on the farm and skilled in farming have no choice, on finishing their education, but to find their way into the labour market or professional field. Once established, they never return to farming.

The small farm development program will not solve the problem. It will require a widening of the regulations under the Farm Credit Corporation Act. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Agriculture indicate yesterday that he proposes changes in the act and regulations, and that he is open to suggestions. I imagine that he will be getting quite a few suggestions from many of the farmers and their representatives from the province of Saskatchewan.

I have been disturbed, however, by the recent announcements of the Minister of Agriculture. His news releases indicate that he advocates marketing boards. If he means marketing boards whose function is to develop markets for products, this is fine; but if he is talking about the supply management type of boards I would suggest to him that the farmers, particularly those in the west, do not want more controls, they do not want more programs like Operation Lift which by threat restricted the production of wheat and which cost the farmers approximately $600 million.

With all the starving people in the world today, we should be expanding the production of agricultural products by developing markets in the underdeveloped countries. The function of the federal government, I would suggest, is to develop these markets in co-operation with the other major grain producing countries in order that we can produce to the maximum and ensure stability of prices for the farmer.

I would now like to spend a few moments discussing the changes in the Income Tax Act as they relate to the farmer. For many years, farmers as well as fishermen were given the opportunity to use either the straight line part 17 or the diminishing balance part 11 method of calculating depreciation. The majority of farmers I have dealt with have been making use of the straight line method. The few who have been using the diminishing balance method have done so at the suggestion of officers of the Department of National Revenue, much to their sorrow for they were locked into that method and could not change. This meant that on the sale of a piece of farm equipment they found that, unlike those on the straight line basis, they had to recapture the depreciation, if the article was sold for more than the undepreciated capital cost, and pay tax on the difference.

Under the new act, on new equipment purchased after January 1, 1973, a farmer has no option; he is compelled to calculate depreciation on the diminishing balance basis and to pay tax on any recaptured depreciation. With the rising cost of farm machinery over the past number of years, it is not uncommon for a farmer to trade in a piece of farm machinery, and obtain a trade-in price that is more than the undepreciated capital cost. This gave him a certain advantage when he was dealing in farm equipment, in that the difference in value between what he received for his trade-in and the undepreciated capital cost was not taxable in his hands. The effect of compelling a farmer to convert to the diminishing balance method of depreciation will, in the end, mean that the cost of a new machine is increased by the amount of income tax paid on the recaptured depreciation.

I think most hon. members are aware of the spiralling cost of farm machinery. For the government to add even more to its cost by the changes in the Income Tax Act is something that has not been well received by the western farmers. I would urge the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) to consider seriously an amendment to the act to allow a farmer to continue to use the straight line or part 17 method of calculating depreciation.

Further, Mr. Speaker, the institution of the capital gains tax as it affects the family farm, coupled with the provincial succession duties that we have in Saskatchewan and with the recaptured depreciation provision, will have a disastrous effect at the time of the death of a farmer. Very few farm estates are liquid, and the combination of these three taxes will mean that farmland will have to be sold in order to pay them, thus destroying the farm as a viable economic unit.

I can appreciate that this subject may be discussed when the federal and provincial ministers meet later this summer, but I feel that conferences of this nature generally discuss policies and not the results of the application of the policies. Politicians and civil servants administering acts do not appreciate the implications of taxing statutes.

Perhaps the answer is consultation with solicitors, accountants and trust companies actively involved in estate practice, as they are in a position to give concrete examples of the hardships involved and of what the practical application of a change in tax laws can mean to a particular segment of our society.

There are a number of other matters of vital concern to my constituents, Mr. Speaker, but time will not permit me to discuss them this afternoon. They include such items as rail line abandonment, the rationalization of grain handling and transportation facilities, the marketing of feed grains, the effect of the elimination of the basic herd, the Canada Pension Plan as it applies to farmers, low-cost housing, and pensions. I hope to be able to deal with these matters in the future.

Finally, I might say that while we in the west have sometimes felt ignored by eastern Canada and that we were being treated like poor relatives, we are proud of Canada. We believe in one Canada, a Canada that has regional differences but not a Canada of five countries, as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) suggested last Friday. We, as members, cannot afford the luxury of being supersensitive. We must be able to accept criticism or comment without taking it as a personal affront to ourselves, our constituency or region. The freedom to criticize or comment is basic to our democratic way of life. Criticism, Mr. Speaker, is not bigotry.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to join those who have preceded me in congratulating you and your deputies on your well-merited election to office.

Since there is such a short time left in the Speech from the Throne debate, I have been asked to keep my remarks very brief so that another hon. member can follow me. I shall try to do that, but I do want to say a few words about a very important subject which I do not believe has yet been broached in this debate, and that is the high water condition on the Great Lakes. I know that many other honourable members of the House—I mention the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen) in particular—are very concerned about this problem and I want to bring it to the attention of the House.

In the past year we have seen some record and many near-record water levels established on the Great Lakes. It is being freely predicted that in 1973 all records during the previous 70 years of record keeping will be surpassed. For the sale of perspective I think we should keep in mind that as recently as 1964 the water levels on the Great Lakes were at a critical low point, but, while this may be some consolation, it is no solution to the problem.

The Great Lakes system is comprised of some 95,000 square miles and is probably the largest body of fresh water in the world. It is bordered by eight of the American states and by the province of Ontario, has some 10,000 miles of shoreline and there are some 40 million people living on its shores.

The lake in the system with which I am most particularly concerned is Lake St. Clair, not one of the larger ones but nevertheless a very important lake, lying roughly halfway between Lake Huron and Lake Erie. As I have mentioned, the predictions for the present year are not encouraging ones. One engineering expert forecasts that all previous records may be surpassed, including records of damage done in the past, and most recently the damage done in 1952. I believe that in mid-November we had only a foretaste of what may be in store for us with the flooding that occurred in Lake St. Clair and Lake Erie.

There is considerable disagreement about what causes the present high levels. The position taken by the International Joint Commission, which has some responsibility for supervision in this area, is that there are no practical measures within its jurisdiction that can be taken to afford relief. In its view any improvement can only be achieved by long-term changes such as are already being studied by the commission's international Great Lakes' levels board. In discussions with officials of the International Joint Commission I found that the tendency is to attribute the present high level of water to natural causes. While this may be the explanation, there are many people who feel otherwise. We have recently had brought to our attention a letter directed by 34 members of the United States House of Representatives to the President of the United States calling for action which would involve Canada as well as that country.

I have been in touch with Representative James O'Hara, one of the leading members of the group, and it seems to me that it is very important that we Canadians consider the proposals made by this group of American legislators, especially the suspicion which is implied in their views that the problem is, at least in part, man-made.

The three steps which these American legislators suggest to remedy the problem are as follows: first, significantly decreasing the amount of water flowing into the Great Lakes system from the Hudson Bay watershed. The water from two Canadian inland lakes has for years been diverted into Lake Superior for navigation and power purposes. They say they have been informed that the agreement under which this was done was a verbal one between United States and Canadian officials, and take the position that an arrangement as informal as this one should be readily susceptible to modification and certainly should not be allowed to continue to the detriment of the Great Lakes and the bordering communities.

Second, the Lake Superior board of control, an arm of the International Joint Commission, should agree to impound water in Lake Superior up to the limits currently permitted in the rules of regulation. By reducing the flow of water from Lake Superior into the rest of the Great Lakes system, the levels of these other lakes would be lowered and the threat of further flooding and flood-related damage would be eased. Third, the court case limiting the amount of water which the Chicago sanitary district can divert from Lake Michigan should be reopened, so that increased water can be drawn off through the Chicago ship canal, further lowering the level of the lakes in question.

The American Congressmen suggest that they were informed by an officer of the American Corps of Engineers in testimony before the Conference of Great Lakes Congressmen that these three steps, taken in concert, would result in lowering the levels of Lakes Michigan and Huron by eight inches in a year's time, with comparable but smaller reductions in the levels of Lakes St. Clair and Erie.

I am not competent to judge whether these proposals would in fact have the effect which the Congressmen wish them to have. There is a great deal of confusion on this subject and I think it is very important that the causes of and solutions to the present levels of the Great Lakes should be thoroughly and publicly investigated in Canada as well as in the United States. I believe that a committee of the provincial government is looking into this matter and I think that some federal body should be conducting a similar investigation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacGuigan: In addition to the question of the levels of the lakes themselves, Mr. Speaker, the damage which resulted from the mid-November floods showed us a number of the other aspects of the problem. For example, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand), the latter through his responsibility for the RCMP, are involved with respect to alleged speeding by commercial vessels in the Great Lakes system. At a time of high water this speeding is especially detrimental to the shoreline because of the great waves which are sent crashing against either the structures which are there to protect it or in some cases the unprotected shoreline.

The Department of National Defence may be involved because of the insufficient number of sandbags for the protection of areas which are in the process of being flooded and the insufficient number of pumps for removing water once it has gained the land. The Department of Manpower and Immigration may be involved with respect to winter capital works projects. I have informed the three municipalities in my district, the city of Windsor, the town of Tecumseh and the village of St. Clair Beach, that they would be eligible for federal winter works projects, but I do not believe that any of them have submitted applications, although I think that the town of Tecumseh has asked the provincial government for some winter works assistance in this respect.

I suggest that the Department of Urban Affairs is also involved, Mr. Speaker. In the United States, in 1968 the federal government, through the department of housing and urban affairs, set up an emergency flood insurance program. It is difficult, if not impossible, for home owners to obtain commercial insurance which will protect them against the risk of flooding along the Great Lakes. Insurance companies do not look upon this as a very good risk for them. There is a serious need for a government program of insurance against flood damage in Canada just as there is in the United States.

The Department of Public Works is also involved because of the question of erosion. The Minister of Public Works has taken the position in regard to the waters of Lake St. Clair that because the distance to the navigation channel from the shoreline varies from 6,000 feet at Peach Island, which is the beginning of Lake St. Clair, to over 20,000 feet at Pike Creek east of St. Clair Beach, any erosion damage which occurs on shore is not sufficiently clearly related to commercial navigation to give rise to any federal responsibility. That part of my constituency along the St. Clair shore which was most severely affected by the storm would, therefore, not appear to have the right to claim any assistance from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Dubé) under the existing erosion policy.

Mr. Speaker, this may be reasonable as the response of a single department which is concerned with the administration of one existing policy which has to do with erosion caused by commercial shipping, but it is not acceptable as the total response of the federal government to the problem which has arisen in the past few months. There is also the possibility that the Emergency Measures Organization may have a continuing role to play.

I do not want to overlook the other levels of government either. All municipal governments are involved. In Essex County, a conservation authority has been voted down several times but I believe one is likely to be set up at the end of this month. Such a body and the municipalities may have some direct responsibility in dealing with all flooding problems.

In addition, there is the responsibility of the provincial government. I have been in touch with Mr. Bernier, the minister of lands and forests for Ontario, and he expects to be able to announce his government's policy with respect to the problems of lake flooding by the end of this month. In general, Mr. Speaker, after having contacted with half a dozen federal departments, the provincial minister of lands and forests and all the municipalities involved, I have to say that there has been an inadequate response by government in general to this most serious problem.

I would fear that the lake problem is likely to worsen. What we need is some co-ordination of the activities of all governments and departments involved. Action is necessary at the international level, at the national level, at the provincial level—and perhaps some action involving the provinces and states together—and at the municipal level, as well as involvement of bodies like the Ontario Water Resources Commission. We must put the interests of all these governments and bodies of governments into manageable form so that we can have a coherent and total policy to deal with all the problems which result from high lake waters.

At the moment, Mr. Speaker, I see no signs that this is being done and that is why I want to bring it to the floor of the House this afternoon. Whether there is an immediate solution for the problems of high lake levels directly—that is, whether or not we can in some way lower the levels of the lakes—we must still deal with the consequences of the flooding which may occur. We must have policies for holding back water, especially in some of the low lying areas, and we must establish an insurance policy for home owners along the lakes. It is not a viable position for us to suggest to the lakeshores owners that they should move their dwellings or move off their land.

The governments of this country bear a very considerable responsibility to assist the individual who happens to be located along the lakeshore in his battle with these natural forces. I should point out that it is not those who live right on the shore who may be involved. The people who live further inland found in the mid-November storm that they were likely to be as affected. Once the waters cross—the barriers on the shoreline, they may keep on coming. In some cases there is no appreciable flooding at the shoreline, but hundreds of feet inland. Since all the land in Essex county is low-lying, this presents a problem for all property owners, not just those who live along the shore but those who live inland as well.

Perhaps I have said enough to indicate the seriousness of this problem. I must allow time for the following speaker. However, I want to reiterate that we need co-ordinated action in this area. We need a coherent explanation to the public, as far as this is possible, by the federal government of the causes of the flooding and whether the solutions are as simple as many people believe them to be. Concerted action must be taken to deal with these problems. If we can have that within the next few months, we may be in a position to deal with the higher lake levels which may come in the spring. If we do not, we will surely bear a great responsibility to the people of Canada. I am not only speaking of the federal government but of the collective governments of Canada. They will bear a responsibility to the people in these areas for not having acted when there was time.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member knows he can ask a question only with the hon. member's consent.

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise and follow the many fine replies to the Speech from the Throne. This will probably be one of the shortest speeches, because of the time; but one of the best speeches I ever heard was also one of the shortest. It was an after-dinner speech. It consisted of only four words, "I'll pick up the check".

As a new member serving his apprenticeship in this House, I congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, and your deputies on your appointments to the prestigious and important positions in which you now serve.

I am indeed the fortunate one in representing the riding of Hamilton Mountain. I say this in all sincerity, because I collected only 40 per cent of the popular vote. Let me assure you now, though, Mr. Speaker, as well as the 60 per cent who wanted a representative other than me, that I shall be constant to my duties and I promise to do the best I can for my country, Canada, in general and my riding in particular.

From Mountain lookout the visitor enjoys a scenic panorama with miles of residential and commercial developments in the foreground; in the middle distance, the heavy industry of Canada's third most important manufacturing city and Canada's two largest steel mills, the whole framed by the dramatic Burlington skyway in the background. Front and centre in Canada's golden horseshoe area, Hamilton is the industrial heart of the nation, at the strategic west end of Lake Ontario.

Only one third of Hamilton's labour force lives in the actual city. As is the trend in most large metropolises, many workers now live in the suburbs and commute to the city. Today 30 per cent of the population lives atop the escarpment, hence the term "split-level city" and hence the name Hamilton Mountain riding, which I proudly represent. I say this with great humility, Mr. Speaker, as a member of a large family that emigrated from my native land of Scotland 22 years ago.

Last week two hon. members stated with great pride the fact that they now represent ridings formerly represented by fathers of confederation. Well, let me tell you, Sir, I was born and raised in the shadow of Sir John A. Macdonald's birthplace and bring to the House an accent similar to that great statesman—with full apologies to the interpreter. Just console yourself with the fact that I cannot speak French, because then you would really be in trouble, although I admit it is a rare gift indeed to be able to express oneself as eloquently as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) did last Friday.

In that speech he reminded me of the village bully who also had the only football in our poor area. If we did not play by his rules, he picked up the ball and went home. It may be of interest to some hon. members to know that I never learned how to play football. I do, however, recognize something sinister cooking when the minister states, "If the atmosphere does not get healthier, I don't think we will be here very long". This is either a game of blackmail or a frantic plea to get on the post office calendar mentioned by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin) as "Saint Jean Marchand".

Much has been said about the implementation of the Official Languages Act. Let me say briefly and with all the sincerity I can muster, if the real reason for the bill was to keep Quebec in confederation, then in my opinion it is the wrong policy being pursued for the right reason. Confederation has to be preserved by other means. The only way I know to preserve it is by having all hon. members playing the game by the rules set down by this House. Surely ethnic background, religion, language or political affiliations can take a back seat to this crucial but worthwhile task.

Now, back briefly to Hamilton Mountain. The problems besetting the riding, I would say, are similar to those of other urban ridings; problems such as unemployment, concerns of the general management of the economy and the high cost of serviced land. Although we have a high percentage of home owners compared to the city proper, we have little or no heavy industry. We do, however, have a regional airport which the transport department wants to expand and which many constituents would like moved out of the area.

The many letters I receive also express concern about our penal system, and in light of the fact that the Mary Nelles kidnapping made the news yesterday, accompanied by the kidnapping of the wife of the mayor of North York, I think it appropriate to mention the rehabilitation and parole system. Here is a case where four of the criminals served approximately 18 months of a five-year sentence. The reason for their parole: they were rehabilitated.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that these bandits were rehabilitated the day they were caught. But what about the deterrent? The ringleader, who is awaiting parole after serving three years of a 15-year sentence, has been having a ball running a ski resort in Bracebridge. I can only assume that the reason he is still in custody is that he does not want to leave. And who would? What other position would reward him with six weeks' holidays a year?

I try to allay the fears of the people by telling them things will get better with the new Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand). They couldn't get much worse. However, I do not want to be too critical of the former Solicitor General, the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), as I understand he is a lover of Scottish people. Rumours persist that after last year's prison break from Kingston penitentiary, he was going around whistling that famous Scottish tune, "Will ye no come back again".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beattie: What faith, what confidence in the perfectability of criminals! My constituents also write to me about capital punishment, an emotional issue on which I hope to speak during the debate. I also get letters, Mr. Speaker, about the punishment of capital. By that I mean the capital of those whose fixed incomes are rapidly being eroded by rampant inflation. I contend that more consideration should be given to people who have gone without many of life's luxuries in order to live the evening of their days in modest comfort.

• (1740)

I would say there is a great community spirit on "The Mountain" and many people work hard on various projects. The one foremost in my mind is the work done by volunteers in the fight against that killer disease, cancer. How much time will pass before we gain dominion over this disease? How many more lives will be lost? How many more will be blighted?

There are statistics, of course. It has been said that we North Americans are enamoured of those neat, bloodless figures. I shall not cite them here, impressive though they are, as humanity is not a game of numbers. Medical research, on the other hand, is very much a game of numbers. Increments, accidents and chance are still very applicable words to describe the processes of scientific research. But we have also learned that by careful organization, by systematic approaches, by co-ordinated efforts, by employing more highly qualified people and using more sophisticated equipment we can greatly affect the outcome of research. All of which is just another way of saying that the outcome of research is today as much dependent upon money as it is upon mentality. Money may not be the root of all progress in science, but it does possess the miraculous power to compress time. And we have at last begun to realize that time is what we are fighting against. Time is the enemy.

Now, what kinds of research are we going to buy? The priorities obsess our best minds. What comes first—population control or expansion of food supply; prevention of killer diseases or solutions to serious urban crises? Establishing a meaningful system of priorities in medical research is well-nigh impossible. Millions of dollars poured into one promising direction could yield nothing, while relatively modest sums expended in some other area might well bring about a significant advance. And there is always the possibility that one scientist may come up with something that turns all the priorities topsy-turvy, requiring an immediate shift of both money and manpower into some other hitherto unexplored avenue. Yet despite these obstacles, a massive assault on cancer deserves our support; for if it is successful, the same all-out approach might then become our means of dealing with other great scourges of mankind, medical, social and environmental.

Within the medical field itself, the priorities are by no means clearly established. What shall be done with the limited funds available? There are those who continue to insist on emphasizing research into the leading killer diseases. There are others, equally insistent, who feel we have a greater need right now for improving the delivery of health care services. It cannot be denied that health care is still very much a cottage industry. We urgently need to improve our means of making quality health care available to great masses of people.

Must this be done at the expense of research? And if so, how long could we hope to stay ahead of the game without finding still simpler and less costly ways of preventing and curing serious physical afflictions? The dilemma is even: we cannot afford to abandon basic research, nor can we ignore the need for improved health care delivery. Somehow we must accomplish both of these objectives. But how? Perhaps the answer is implicit in another question, the one that asks, "If we can land men on the moon, why can't we find a cure for cancer?"

With increasing frequency these days, this question leads to a demand that the United States make the conquest of cancer a national goal, just as its moonlanding effort was. How simple a solution that appears to be. And yet in many ways it poses problems considerably more complex than those of getting a man to the moon and back again. For one thing, an all-out attack on cancer lacks the element of competitiveness so inherent in the space race. I somehow have the feeling that very few people in Canada or the United States would be very upset if we learned tomorrow that the Russians had discovered a cure for cancer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38 (5), to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the main motion.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Baldwin: On division.

Motion (Mr. Blais) agreed to.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That the said Address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That this House do, at its next sitting, consider the business of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Baldwin: Including Governor General's warrants.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the pleasure of the House that we call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5.50 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 18, 1973

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD—FAILURE OF INFORMATION CANADA TO SUPPLY MEMBERS WITH CANADA GAZETTE CONTAINING PROPOSED CHANGES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA RIDING BOUNDARIES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege about which I have given Your Honour notice. My question of privilege relates to the advertisement by the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of British Columbia in the January 3 special edition of the Canada Gazette, wherein was published the proposed boundaries for the electoral districts in the province of British Columbia as a result of the 1971 census.

The deadline for making known to the commission the desire of anyone to appear before it to make representations is January 26. The Canada Gazette for January 3, within which these proposals were contained and which I understand Information Canada distributes has not been sent to any Member of Parliament as far as I have been able to determine, nor has it been sent, at least as of yesterday, to the Parliamentary Library. Indeed, it has not been sent to anyone.

My question of privilege is that the failure to distribute the information contained in the January 3 edition of the Canada Gazette interferes with the duties and responsibilities of the members of this House in their attempts to represent their constituents should they wish to make submissions or presentations to the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of British Columbia. Accordingly, if Your Honour finds that there is a prima facie case of privilege involved, and so that the matter will not founder because of lack of a motion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House expresses the view that Information Canada should forthwith make available to members the proposals of the Electoral Boundaries Commission for the province of British Columbia, as advertised in the Canada Gazette for January 3, 1973.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Skeena has given the Chair the written notice required by the Standing Orders. I have given some thought to the matter he is now proposing for the consideration of the House. I would think that the hon. member may have a grievance. Certainly he has justification, I am sure, for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. He knows—and this was confirmed, I believe, in conversations we had before the opening of proceedings this afternoon—that the commission reports to the House through the Speaker, not through Information Canada or any other government agency. It may very well be that the Chair could be of assistance to the hon. member and others interested in getting an early copy of this report and in ensuring that the report is circulated immediately to all interested members from British Columbia. I will undertake at this time to see that action is taken immediately.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the second report of the committee appointed to prepare and report lists of members to compose the standing committees of the House. I shall seek the concurrence of the House in this report on motions later today.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the lists which are the substance of the motion to be proposed to the House later this afternoon by the President of the Privy Council are rather lengthy. Normally they should be read by the Clerk at the table. Perhaps this could be dispensed with. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: The report referred to above is as follows:]

WARDAIR CHARTER FLIGHT SAFETY STANDARDS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on motions?

Mr. Paddy Neale (Vancouver East): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In view of the need to satisfy the public that working conditions for flight crews on Wardair charter flights are not so severe as to endanger the lives of passengers, and in view of the need to satisfy the public that the capacity to carry out emergency procedures properly is being maintained, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to move the following motion:

That this House calls upon the Minister of Labour to establish an inquiry under the Labour Code into the working conditions of Wardair flight crews in order to ascertain whether safety standards are being maintained.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion therefore cannot be put.

Mr. Baldwin: You never say yes.

TERRITORIAL SEA AND FISHING ZONES ACT

EXTENSION OF FISHING ZONES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-126, to amend the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, in explaining the bill I should like to thank Your Honour for the advice you gave me yesterday and try to comply with it. The purpose of the bill is to establish as fishing zones an area off the coasts of Canada to the point where the depth of the ocean is 1,000 fathoms, in other words, to extend the zones to the edge of what I believe is referred to as the continental slope. I think it would be most appropriate that this be accomplished this year when we are to raise such matters at the conference on the law of the sea.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ENERGY

SECURITY OF OIL SUPPLIES FOR EASTERN CANADA—POSITION OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON POSSIBLE AGREEMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in respect of a possible agreement between Canada and the United States on the security of oil supplies for the eastern part of Canada. At the initiative of which government are these discussions taking place and an agreement being sought, the government of Canada or the government of the United States?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, it was at the initiative of both governments arising out of the 1970 ministerial meeting between Canada and the United States. The hon. gentleman will recall that a press release issued at that time indicated that these particular discussions would be carried on for the purpose of arriving at a satisfactory agreement. I would confirm that at the moment there has been no agreement. There have been discussions for a lengthy period of time but at the present time I cannot predict when an agreement will be arrived at.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether the government of Canada in connection with this discussion is proposing that markets in eastern Canada be supplied by oil from western Canada, by oil from the United States or by both in the event our offshore supplies are cut off?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, it is rather more likely they will be supplied with oil from neither place. It depends very much on the nature of the international interruption. The most probable thing, for example, is that if there is a Middle East interruption there will be increased exports to Canada from Venezuela and Africa. It will depend on the international contingency. I would have to confirm this, but I think United States production at this time would not be in a position to satisfy the eastern Canadian market. We have no proposal at this time to expand the eastern shipment of Canadian crude from western Canada beyond the present position west of the Ottawa Valley line.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact it is apparent the government of Canada is expecting oil supplies from the United States to meet at least part of the requirements, I should like to ask the minister what quid pro quo the government of Canada is offering the United States for this assurance of meeting at least part of the requirements of eastern Canada in the event of such a cut-off, and will the minister give the House the assurance that he will report to the House the terms of any such agreement with the United States before entering into it?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, we are not offering any quid pro quo. The United States position very naturally is to seek from Canada some assurance that Canadian supplies to the western United States would not be cut off in these particular circumstances. The negotiations will continue and I am certainly prepared to report to the House on their progress or otherwise from time to time.

SECURITY OIL SUPPLIES FOR EASTERN CANADA—NATURE OF PROPOSED SHARING BY UNITED STATES AND CANADA—EXTENSION OF PIPELINE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the deputy minister, Mr. Jack Austin, has spoken of these discussions as being related to sharing of oil supplies by Canada and the United States and in view of the fact our shipments of oil from western Canada are now at the maximum and fill the pipeline, is the Canadian government seeking to obtain United States supplies for the eastern market in the event that Middle East oil is cut off and, if so, what sharing would there be, what would Canada's share be? Does Canada propose to increase its supplies through the Rocky Mountain area or what would be the exchange for any additional supplies of oil from the United Staes for the eastern market in Canada?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I might advise the House that the report in the Canadian Press attributed to the deputy minister is, I understand, a false report which since has been corrected by another Canadian Press story. With regard to the discussions in respect of the contingent interruption of overseas oil the United States of course, is seeking some assurance that in that eventuality the exports from western Canada to the central United States and the western United States markets would not be interrupted. This is the position they are seeking. We are seeking to protect our supply on the east coast. These are the two basic interests involved in what is still a negotiation.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there is a strong feeling among the independent petroleum producers that the best way to secure Canadian supplies in eastern Canada is to extend the present pipeline at least as far as Montreal, and in view of the fact that the figures they have produced indicate this would be economically feasible, I should like to ask the minister whether the government is making any study of the possibility of extending the pipeline, whether or not that study is completed and whether or not on the basis of that study the government proposes to proceed or encourage proceeding with the extension of the pipeline?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, examination of an extension to Montreal is not active, the principal reason being that there is some hope everywhere in the House and particularly in eastern Canada that the current explorations on the Canadian east coast will yield a significant field. Very naturally we are reluctant to commit ourselves to a heavy expenditure on a pipeline continuing on to Montreal when, with eastern offshore discoveries, it might become obsolete.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for a further supplementary, but I should like to ask the minister whether he proposes to take any action at all to overcome what appears to be the present situation, namely, that in the event offshore supplies to eastern Canada are cut off, eastern Canada would in fact be without anything like an adequate supply of oil?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, that is the purpose of the discussion.

POST OFFICE

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—CLARIFICATION BY CONCILIATION BOARD CHAIRMAN OF RECOMMENDATION ON JOB CLASSIFICATION—GOVERNMENT PROPOSAL FOR SETTLEMENT OF GRIEVANCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct some questions to the Postmaster General with regard to the situation in the Post Office. I understood him to say yesterday that the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board had requested the chairman of the conciliation board to clarify the conciliation board's recommendation in respect of grieving on classifications. May I ask the minister whether the chairman of the conciliation board is making such a clarification or has made it yet, or how long he expects it will be before he can present his clarification?

• (1420)

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the request has already been made. In fact, Mr. Shime is presently considering this case and he should have an answer in the near future.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the employees of the Post Office are becoming pretty restive as a result of the delays—and may I say I cannot entirely blame them for that—is the minister making an appeal to Mr. Owen Shime—I believe that is the name of the chairman of the board—to give his clarification as soon as is humanly possible? It ought not to take him more than an hour or so to write what he meant by the words he used in the previous report. Is the minister making representation that this be done quickly?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I realize indeed that the employees may begin to grow impatient, and I agree that there should be some possibility to return to the bargaining table and secure from the union representatives their acceptance of the majority report. Let them give us proof that they are prepared to sign the contract. As for us, we are prepared to sign right now which, by the way, would lead to a considerable improvement of the climate.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for York South might ask a further supplementary question, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I understood the minister to say yesterday that the government was agreeable to making objection to a classification matter a subject under the grievance procedure but that it is not agreeable to this going beyond internal discussion, that the government objects to it going to arbitration or adjudication, as it is called in the Public Service Staff Relations Act. May I ask the minister what procedures the employer has suggested to settle such a grievance if the parties remain apart? If the matter is not going to adjudication under the law for final and binding settlement, what alternative suggestion is the government making for a final and binding settlement of such a grievance?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, as recommended in the conciliator's report, the government is prepared to accept amendment of clause 9.03 of the contract, allowing any grievance concerning classification to be discussed within the department. We said we were prepared to accept the recommendation made in the conciliation board's report.

As for clause 9.04, dealing with grievances which can be submitted to arbitration, it has already been signed by both parties and there is no change, so that the exception relative to classification still stands.

I want to tell the hon. member that the matter can be discussed within the manpower committee, according to the suggestion made in the report, which we are prepared to accept.

[English]

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—INQUIRY AS TO SUBSTANTIVE CHANGES BY GOVERNMENT IN DRAFT AGREEMENT FROM CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Postmaster General whether the draft agreement proposed by the government contains any additions to or any substantive omissions from the majority report of the conciliation board?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): I would tell the hon. member what I already stated here yesterday, namely that we have in no way altered the substance of the majority report. We are prepared to accept the report in its entirety, as recommended.

Furthermore, I would remind the hon. member that he would do far better if he encouraged the representatives of the employees to sign a contract, instead of making certain allegations.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: The minister used the word "substantial" today. May I ask him what changes have been made, or what departures did he make from the majority report of the conciliation board in the government's proposal which was placed before the unions' negotiating team?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: At the request of the employee representatives, we have submitted in a contractual form the recommendations of the majority report. We have submitted these recommendations in contractual language which means that if the union does not agree on certain words, the matter can certainly be discussed at the bargaining table without the service having to be interrupted, as workers do in certain cases.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the minister whether he is prepared to lay the government's memorandum of settlement, which is the basis of the government's position, on the table of the House so that members will have an opportunity to compare it with the majority report of the conciliation board, which the government claims it has accepted?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, as I said a few moments ago, Mr. Shime has been asked to clarify the matter. Until it is done, I see no advantage for both parties to make our contractual representations public. I am willing, if the hon. member so wishes, to table the majority conciliation report and I can assure him that the recommendations contained in that report are fully endorsed by the government.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a question of privilege. Before I recognize the hon. member I might refer to the fact that there are a number of other hon. members who want to ask further supplementary questions. They will be given an opportunity to do so, but after hearing the question of privilege I will recognize first the hon. member for Témiscamingue. For the moment the hon. member for St. John's East rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is based on the replies given by the minister today, and the replies given by the minister and by the President of the Treasury Board yesterday which can be found at page 391 of Hansard. At that time the President of the Treasury Board said the government was prepared to accept the majority report of the conciliation board provided it was also accepted by the unions. Well, Mr. Speaker, the unions have accepted the majority report. The issue is that the government has not accepted it.

The Postmaster General the same day indicated it was clear that the government had made no changes in the report. Today, Mr. Speaker, I asked the minister, in order to clarify the matter because it would appear the minister is misleading the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: —which in itself would be a very serious matter, to table the government's memorandum of settlement so that hon. members would have an opportunity to compare that document with the majority report of the conciliation board and the House could satisfy itself if in fact changes were made. The minister has refused to do so. Therefore I move, in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 17—this is the first and only opportunity I have had to raise the matter—that the substantive matter contained in my question of privilege, whereby the House would have an opportunity to compare the government's position with the conciliation board report—be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member rises on a question of privilege and proposes that a motion be debated by the House at this time relating to a dispute between himself, possibly other members, and the minister as to the facts. There are many authorities as the hon. member and hon. members generally well know, to the effect that a dispute as to facts or statements made in the House cannot form the basis of a question of privilege. I would think that the motion proposed by the hon. member is a substantive motion and cannot be debated at this time under the heading of privilege. I would hope that the question as to what was or was not said, or what the facts were, could be pursued by the hon. member for St. John's East or by other hon. members in some way other than a debate under the heading of privilege.

• (1430)

Mr. McGrath: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask for the unanimous consent of the House so that I can table the two documents and the House can then make its own judgment?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There are two difficulties here. One of them, of course, is that by the rules of the House and the practice of the House there is no provision for private members to table documents as is suggested by the hon. member. Even if this were done by asking for unanimous consent, the hon. member has heard, as I have, that there was not unanimous consent, so that second aspect in hypothetical.

An hon. Member: Who said no?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member can ascertain that. As far as I am concerned I go by my ears and I heard that there was not unanimous consent. Therefore, obviously the motion cannot be put.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, is the government House leader prepared, with the consent of the House, to table under the provisions of Standing Order 41 the government's memorandum of settlement so that the House may make a judgment on this matter?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, an answer to that question has already been given by the Postmaster General.

An hon. Member: What are you hiding?

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO REASON FOR DELAY IN APPROVING PROJECTS

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

With regard to the LIP projects submitted to the officials of his department since December 5 last, is it normal that it should take so long to reach a decision? Can the minister tell us why it is taking so long to give an answer?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hate to disagree with the hon. member but I think that by any past standards—and there is only one previous year of experience—we are dealing with these projects and approvals faster than previously. We have had some 14,000 projects from which to select those we can honour or approve, and a budget of $165 million versus appeals for something like $473 million. As of this date we have approved $128 million in projects, and we are pressing to get final approval through for the rest of the projects so they can come under the remainder of the allocation.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell us how many projects have been accepted out of the 17,000 submitted to date?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the best information I have right now is 4,195.

[Translation]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF PROJECTS APPROVED IN EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary?

Can the minister explain why, compared with last year, less than half the projects in the Eastern Townships of the province of Quebec alone have been approved so far?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, nationally I think the ratio of 4,195 approved to 14,000 received indicates that if the hon. member has had half his projects approved he is in pretty good shape.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister again why in the region I represent only half the number of the projects have been approved in comparison with last year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi—order, please.

[Translation]

I shall recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue in a moment. I think we should allow the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi to state his question and allow the minister to reply in peace, silence and order. The hon. member for Témiscamingue on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi has just said that half the projects were accepted.

Mr. Grafftey: No, this is not what I said.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Half those of last year.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We could proceed faster if we allowed the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi to ask his question.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I wish to repeat my question.

The citizens of my constituency want to know whether the local initiative program is a political project or an actual project to reduce unemployment during the winter months. This is a serious question at the present time.

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, it would be my desire to approve every project that merits it, but that is impossible in view of the number of applications we have received for which money is available. I am very sympathetic with the hon. member and if he will send me the details of the situation I shall do my best to reply. However, I rather doubt that we can hold out any hope that any member is going to get all his projects approved.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN FUNDS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that of the 10,000 projects, many of which will have to be rejected, many are identical with those that have been accepted and will be rejected because of the shortage of funds, can the minister tell the House whether he has approached his cabinet colleagues for an increase in funding for this program, whether a decision will be made shortly, and when we can expect an announcement?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not formally approached my cabinet colleagues on this matter but I think any further announcement of that order would probably be forthcoming when the Minister of Finance announces his budget.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the fact we are almost at the end of January in terms of decision-making under this program, can the minister give any indication when we can expect that kind of decision by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think I would leave the announcement of the date of the budget to the Minister of Finance.

[Mr. Speaker.]

While I am on my feet I should like to make an appeal to all hon. members about a program I think is important but which is not receiving the attention we would like. I refer to the on-the-job training program. Subscriptions to this are not moving as quickly as I would like to see; yet it is recognized as one of the best that we have—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—APPROVAL OF PROJECTS AND ALLOTMENT OF FUNDS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since a very small number of projects had been accepted more than a month ago and that, in respect of some of them the government has not yet paid a cent, can the minister tell us if it is a directive from his department?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would really need the details of the specific cases to which the hon. member is referring. If he would be kind enough to send them to me I shall do my best to render the necessary service.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—DEADLINE FOR PROCESSING OF APPLICATIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that in the House last week or the week before the minister said that the deadline for processing applications was January 19, tomorrow, and that there are many applications still in his office, is there a new deadline or is tomorrow still the date?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am holding my breath and hoping that by tomorrow we will have the applications processed. It may be that I shall have to seek the indulgence of the House to extend it by a day or two but I do not know yet.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. As the minister has indicated that the deadline is tomorrow, may I ask him if he will discontinue the practice of consulting with his colleagues with respect to approval as this smells of political patronage?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe in a moment for a supplementary. I had given an undertaking that we would return to the original question as I believe both the hon. member for Brandon-Souris and the hon. member for Winnipeg North have supplementaries. We will first hear from the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe and then the hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED NEW LOCAL EMPLOYMENT ASSITANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated to me last week that he had another program called LEAP that would supplement the local initiatives program. In view of the fact he has agreed that he would like to see approval of many of the projects that were not approved, would he make a more definitive announcement about this new program or make a statement on motions as soon as possible?

• (1440)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to take the leap from LIP to LEAP yet. Although we are examining it, the hon. member for Trinity the other day suggested we should not be in too much of a hurry. However, I think it is a good program from what I have seen of it so far and we will be examining it shortly.

POST OFFICE

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR NEGOTIATIONS—STEPS TO MAINTAIN MAIL DELIVERY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. It would appear that he has now taken over responsibility for negotiations with the employees from the President of the Treasury Board. Can the hon. gentleman confirm this and at the same time indicate what steps he has taken to ensure that, notwithstanding rain, sleet, strikes, etc., the mails will go through?

Mr. Paproski: If necessary, by pony express.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I assume all my responsibilities. In dealing actively with this matter, I hope I can assure the Canadian people of a better and greatly improved postal service while taking the interest of all postal employees who are anxious to see their union leaders sign this contract with us very soon.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Am I to take it from the Postmaster General's remarks that one of the measures he is taking is to ensure an early settlement of this long, drawn-out negotiation process?

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—ACCEPTANCE BY GOVERNMENT OF CLARIFICATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS BY CONCILIATION BOARD CHAIRMAN

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As both the government and the unions have indicated that they accept the recommendations of the conciliation board and are willing to sign an agreement on that basis, as there seems to be some difference of opinion as to what precisely the conciliation board meant in some of its recommendations, and as the chairman has now been asked to reinterpret some clauses, can the minister assure the House that if the chairman in his explanation indicates that he believes that other sections, such as section 904 of the agreement, should be rewritten along the lines he recommended in section 903, the government would agree to such a proposal?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member takes it for granted that the union have already clearly indicated their willingness to accept the majority report. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) stated earlier that he also believed that the union have indicated their willingness to sign a contract. Unfortunately, this has not been clearly indicated to us as yet.

If the employees' representatives are truly prepared to accept the majority report, if they are willing to sign a contract as recommended by the majority report, I think we shall have made a very great step forward, that the language issue will be settled quickly and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret I must interrupt the hon. minister but I think I should now recognize the hon. member for Joliette.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE—DISCUSSION WITH ORGANIZING COMMITTEE

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

In view of the fact that the Olympics organization committee will present their budget on February 3 and in view of the fact that $400 million are absolutely essential to avoid increasing Montrealers' financial burden, could the minister inform us whether the government has reviewed its position and is now prepared to grant financial assistance to ensure the success of those games?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government's position has not changed. We have had some requests of a non-financial nature from the organizing committee which I have indicated are being considered by the government.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Could the hon. minister tell us whether federal government officials intend to meet the Olympic games representatives before February 3 and perhaps negotiate financial assistance with them?

[English]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the latter part of the question, the government's position has not changed. There have already been and I would anticipate there would be further communications with the organizing committee.

[Translation]

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—REQUEST BY CITY FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question.

Did the authorities of the city of Montreal and the people responsible for the Olympic games request grants one way or another from the federal government?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, they have asked for leave to issue some coins and stamps and things of that sort which I described as non-financial requests.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—INQUIRY AS TO REQUEST BY CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS TO PROVIDE COVERAGE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Does the Secretary of State have a request from the CBC for additional financing of between $40 million and $50 million so the CBC can handle coverage of the Olympic games?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: Would the minister take it upon himself to discuss this matter with the president of the CBC so that a consortium of the CBC and the CTV, using the best of both networks and thus keeping the cost down, can provide the sort of service for which there was a precedent at Munich in the last Olympic games?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, I have already had some discussions with the president of the CBC on this and other matters.

GRAIN

WHEAT—FORM OF POSSIBLE CHANGE IN PAYMENT UNDER TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the minister considering changes at present in the pay-out under the two-price wheat system to western farmers. If so, what form would the changes take?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have received some representations from farm organizations in connection with this matter and we are giving consideration to those representations.

Mr. Murta: As the minister is giving consideration to those requests, can he inform us when the decision will be made? Also, if it is to be made, will it be made in such a way that the distribution will be more acceptable to wheat producers and not strictly as a political gimmick to entice western farmers to vote a certain way?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that a question asked in those terms is not in order.

PROVISION OF INCENTIVE TO FEED GRAIN AND OILSEED GROWERS TO MAINTAIN MARKETS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he will also give consideration to providing some incentive to growers of feed grains and oilseed so that the markets for those commodities that have already been established will not be lost in the coming year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the various farm organizations have also made comments on this subject. We are earnestly examining the question to make sure that farmers in the prairie region continue to produce rapeseed and feed grains in adequate volumes so that we can sustain the very important export markets that we have developed. We are not at all sure at this stage what form the action to try to assure this will take. Certainly, action in bringing information to the attention of farmers will form an important part of what is done. We do anticipate, prior to March 1, making information available to the farmers of western Canada on initial prices and on expected sales prospects.

Mr. Korchinski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At least 25 hon. members are seeking to ask supplementaries on this subject. That could keep us busy all day. There are five minutes left before the end of the question period. I am prepared to recognize supplementaries on this matter and then call orders of the day. The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, has the minister made a firm resolve to discuss this matter with the Minister of Agriculture who apparently is advocating the growing of more wheat? Is the minister responsible for the Wheat Board advocating the growing of coarse grains? Has this question been resolved, or will this kind of decision be forthcoming before spring?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Agriculture and I agree that there are tremendous opportunities for exports of wheat at the present time. We are also determined to try to make sure that adequate volumes of feed grain and rapeseed are produced. I share with the Minister of Agriculture the view that the fullest use should be made of fertilizers and sprays and the best possible techniques should be employed so that, now that we have the grain system operating well, the farmers will be in a position to produce grain at the lowest possible cost.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN SUBSIDIZED PRICE OF WHEAT FOR DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question relating to the two-price system. In view of the fact the international wheat price is at least 50 cents above the domestic price paid by the millers of $1.95½ a bushel, can the minister inform the House whether the subsidized price of $3 a bushel will be increased by at least 50 cents in comparison with what was paid last year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The $3 price ensures, of course, that the farmer in the prairie region obtains that price for the wheat consumed in Canada, and that price is still well above the international price.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Assiniboia for a last supplementary and then go to the hon. member for Richmond.

Mr. Knight: In view of the fact the pay-out is made on the basis of all six grains and that wheat producers could lose up to $30 million on the basis of what the millers are paying and the international price, can the minister inform the House whether the system will be revised so that payment can be made on the basis of bushels?

Mr. Lang: The matter of the difference in pay-out procedures was, of course, the subject of the original question which I answered. I should like to correct the hon. member though: payment was not made on the basis of six grains but rather on an acreage basis to the farmers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously this difficulty will not be resolved this afternoon or during the question period.

POST OFFICE

INQUIRY RESPECTING CALENDAR PUBLISHED BY DEPARTMENT

Therefore I recognize the hon. member for Richmond.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General.

Since on January 10 the minister told the House that he would willingly take appropriate action concerning my request if he were given the proof that French Canadians send greeting cards for the St. John the Baptist day, could the hon. minister tell us whether he considers the possibility of having a new Post Office calendar published for 1973 in order to redress that injustice?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I specified to the hon. member that there was no injustice in that, that it was not a real calendar and that next year we could check again—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should like to suggest that this question, as I said a few days ago, could be placed on the order paper. I really do not see any urgency in that. Perhaps the hon. member could ask a supplementary question—

[English]

And after that I will recognize the hon. member for South Shore.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO RESCINDING OF BAN ON WHALING

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a whale of a question for the Minister of the Environment. In light of the scientific data on sustainable yield concerning whales and the minister's press release of July 4, 1972, advocating adherence to the optimum sustainable yield principle, is it the minister's intention to rescind his announced ban on Canadian whaling of December 22 in the hope that the whaling industry located at Blandford in Nova Scotia may continue its operations under a government controlled quota?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): No, Mr. Speaker. As the hon. member is aware, the catch last year was three times the sustainable yield.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROVISION OF IN PERSON SERVICE AT OFFICES—REQUEST FOR EXPEDITING OF PAYMENT OF CLAIMS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the continuing long delays being experienced by claimants for unemployment insurance benefits, can the minister advise whether consideration is being given to in person service at unemployment insurance offices to expedite claims?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): That program was inaugurated about a month ago. If it has not yet reached the hon. member's constituency, perhaps he would be good enough to give me the details and I will see what can be done.

Mr. Muir: I thank the minister for his reply. In light of the hardship suffered by claimants and their families as a result of delays in receiving their cheques, such delays ranging from two weeks to 12 to 14 weeks, would the minister consider making it mandatory for these claims to be put into manual pay as soon as a delay of two weeks exists?

Mr. Andras: I really would appreciate from all hon. members exact details of these incidents so that I can have my office look into them. We had a session today with the chairman of the commission and I am satisfied he is exerting every effort to speed up these payments. But I should like to be given specific instances which might help me to assist him.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—INQUIRY AS TO OPPOSITION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo have a supplementary?

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): It is not a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, but I do have an important question to ask.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the House will permit the hon. member to ask his question before we call orders of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is for the Minister of Communications. In light of the increased profit arising from last year's operations by Bell Canada, has the minister decided to make representations to the Canadian Transport Commission concerning their application for increases in rates?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): I am happy, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member asked me this question which had already been asked. We have completed our consideration of this issue. Our consideration led us to a negative conclusion; under the National Transportation Act the governor general in council has the power to change or cancel any decision made by the commission, either unilaterally or following a petition. Although this power has been rarely exercised the fact still remains that its use could place the government, considering it has already intervened at the tariff hearings, in the incompatible role of both judge and plaintiff.

However, the necessity of making representations from time to time being very important—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister. I think he will agree with me that a statement such as the one he wishes to make at this time in the House should normally be made on motions. It seems to me that his answer to the hon. member although interesting and important goes somewhat beyond the normal time allotted to answer a question.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOOD PRICES

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF SENATE AND HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, which might be dealt with by the House now. In view of the interest shown by hon. members in taking part in this debate, the suggestion has been made that following the initial statements subsequent speakers ought to limit their remarks to 20 minutes. I am not pressing this point, but I am raising it so that it might be settled now, rather than later, and in order that we may seek out some understanding.

Mr. Baldwin: We would agree with that. The urgency of the situation, the high cost of food, makes it imperative that as many members as possible participate in the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I believe this was our proposal. We are glad it is being accepted.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I still maintain my support for this motion, as I did at the meeting of the House leaders.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to inquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends;

That 20 Members of the House of Commons to be designated by House at a later date be the members of the Special Joint Committee and that Standing Order 65(5) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; to engage the services of counsel, accountants and such other clerical and technical personnel as may be deemed necessary; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, because of the interest which is being taken in this notice of motion, I do not think it is necessary for me to speak at any undue length in support of it. I want to begin by pointing out that in the Speech from the Throne the government confirmed the high priority it assigns to the economic policy of the area—to reduce unemployment, contain inflation and strengthen our economy generally.

The government's position with respect to rising food prices is reflected by the statement in the Speech from the Throne that, and I quote,

> . . . the government is determined to contain inflation in Canada, to protect the purchasing power of the Canadian dollar in the hands of the Canadian people and to protect Canada's position in world trade.

I think it is important to bear in mind the fact that this matter is a world wide problem to which no country has yet found a complete and final solution. This is indicated by the behaviour of consumer price indexes for the major western countries. Between September 1971 and September 1972, the over-all consumer price index for Canada increased by 5.3 per cent. Performance in the United States and Japan, where consumer prices increased over the period by little more than 3 per cent, was better than in Canada. But in France, Germany and Italy, consumer prices rose by over 6 per cent, and in the United Kingdom and the Netherlands they rose by 7 per cent or more in the year ending last September—the latest dates for which comparable figures were available.

The recent tendency for food prices to rise more than prices of non-food items is also world wide. As of last September, the Canadian food price index was up over the year by 8.3 per cent, a figure matched in the other countries I have mentioned only in France. The increases for other countries amounted to 8.1 per cent for the United Kingdom, 7.5 per cent for West Germany, 7.2 per cent for Italy, 5.6 per cent for the Netherlands, and 4.8 per cent for the United States.

The government is watching closely the trends in food prices here and abroad, as well as steps being taken by other countries to meet these problems. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) mentioned in the House the other day, the advisability of instituting controls is constantly under review and work has been going on with respect to contingency planning in this area.

In considering the food price problem we should remember that the United States authorities, for example, have at no time during their experiments with price and income controls considered it practicable to impose controls on raw agricultural products. They have had controls only on processors' and producers' margins. There are indications also that a price war among food retailers in the United States has been another factor. In any case, the United States performance in the food sector does not match what it has achieved in other areas.

The upsurge in food prices in Canada is of fairly recent origin. On a long term basis, food prices at retail in Canada have risen at rates comparable to consumer prices in general, as measured by the consumer price index. Over the last year, on the other hand, food prices have risen more than twice as much as the average of prices for non-food items in the consumer price index. In statistical terms the increase in food prices from December 1971 to December 1972 was 8.6 per cent. Over the same period, the rise for all items other than food in the consumer price index was 3.8 per cent.

The government is concerned about trends in increases in food prices. After all, these affect every Canadian consumer. While I am informed that the proportions of incomes that Canadians spent on food have been declining, they do remain high relative to proportions spent in other main areas. Moreover, the lower income groups have no choice but to lay out a proportion of their income on food that is larger than the proportion that the rest of the population devotes to these commodities.

The House will recall that a joint committee of this House and the Senate conducted a very useful inquiry some years ago and food prices occupied a major part of its work. This committee, however, concluded its deliberations some six years ago. I submit, therefore, it is timely for the creation of another parliamentary inquiry of the kind proposed in the Speech from the Throne. I am, therefore, pleased to urge the adoption of the motion now before the House to appoint a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to inquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada, and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends. I look to such a committee being able to make a thorough inquiry and finding itself in a position, in a relatively short period of time, to make recommendations which can help lead to useful policy initiatives.

In assessing the causes of the current rapid rate of food price increase, the committee will no doubt wish to consider the world wide as well as purely domestic aspects of the problem. From the global standpoint, I am informed, for example, that poor crop yields have been a major factor. The most important crop failures have been in the eastern hemisphere and have affected yields of grains and other staples. Canadian consumers have been protected in part from the effects of the major increases in world grain prices because this has not been allowed to affect the price of wheat sold for human consumption in Canada. However, the world grain shortages are contributing to increases in the prices of meats and dairy products.

Grains are by no means the only farm products in short supply because of partial crop failures abroad. The large increase in sugar prices is partly the result of deficiences in the sugar beet crop in the Soviet Union and of the cane crop in Cuba, normally the principal source of Russian sugar imports. Demand from China has also been a factor.

Closer to home, bad weather in some vegetable producing areas in Canada and the United States has led to shortages that are clearly evident to the housewife. Poor crop conditions have been experienced in some parts of the western as well as the eastern hemisphere. For example, the frost experienced in Brazil in July of last year was followed immediately by a rise of almost 20 per cent in world prices of raw coffee. The information of an international cartel by coffee producing countries earlier last year has also contributed to the rise in coffee prices.

Again, closer to home, there have been weather problems in wide areas in Canada and also in the United States. The effects of these difficulties become clearly evident to the housewife when she comes to buy vegetables and fruits, as well as to the farmers whose crops have been affected.

I have described some of the more dramatic developments on the farm front of the very recent past. These have contributed to the rise of 8.7 per cent in the wholesale price index for Canadian farm products that occurred between November 1971 and November 1972. But it must be remembered that, while farm incomes have increased substantially in the last year, they have not kept up with increases in incomes in other sectors of the community over the last decade or more.

Farm prices are only one factor in food prices, and the proposed committee will, I am sure, devote much and perhaps more of its attention to processors' and retailers' margins. In considering processed foods, we have to keep in mind not only the increases in the prices that manufacturers pay for raw agricultural products, but also changes in prices of the other materials they use. Labour costs are also a factor. I am sure that the committee will also want to look into the question of profit margins.

Those of us who look at food prices primarily as consumers should recall that many of us nowadays want to buy potatoes, for example, peeled, sliced and fried ready for serving. Obviously, the more convenience foods that are bought, the higher the cost of the consumers' grocery order. This brings up the important question of the expense to which expenditures on packaging, advertising and promotion are sufficiently to the benefit of consumers and to what extent further action, if any, should be taken to see that their interests are more fully taken into account in operations in the food industries.

These have been some of the relevant factors which will likely be of interest to the committee and which they may therefore want to look into. In summary, the factors include such matters as to what extent poor yields both at home and abroad have affected the price of agricultural products; the cost elements affecting margins of producers, processors, distributors and retailers of food, and their profit margins. I have also mentioned the implications of the growing use of convenience foods, and the question of the effects of expenditures on packaging and promotion. I am sure, therefore, that the committee will be interested in looking generally into the cost elements and profit margins affecting prices to producers, processors, distributors and retailers, all those making up the food system chain.

If this motion has the support of the House, the committee thus created will have wide authority to examine witnesses, to obtain the assistance of expert staff and finally to inquire into and make recommendations with regard to trends in food prices and the factors which account for them.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I will look forward to having an opportunity of appearing before the committee to provide it with further information on the matters referred to it once it begins its work. I will also look forward to hearing with interest the points to be made by hon. members during the course of this debate, and I will attempt to respond to them when I speak at its closing. I am sure the recommendations of the proposed committee can be most useful in dealing with the serious issue of current trends in food prices, a matter of concern to the government and to the Canadian people generally. I, therefore, urge the speedy adoption of this motion.

Mr. Stanfield: Would the minister permit a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Gray: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he would make available to the committee, when and if this motion is passed and it is established, all the memoranda, documents, reports and studies which may have been prepared by or on behalf of the Prices and Incomes Commission on food price increases, or indeed any related matter on which the committee may request information?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, a number of studies by the commission have already been released. I will be pleased to examine the extent to which further information based on the work of the commission can be provided or presented to the committee when it is established, as I hope it will be.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, in view of the time it will take the committee to hear the evidence and make either an interim or a full report, I should like to ask the minister whether he intends to take any immediate steps, either legislative or otherwise, to curb the high cost of foods?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, if such steps are to be taken they will be announced once a decision is made. Any other course of action would not be to the advantage of the Canadian consumer. I do hope the House will pass the motion before it as soon as possible, so the committee can make a prompt report and its recommendations can be taken under active consideration by the government.

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. minister, I will certainly not take up my full allotment of 40 minutes. I hope to be brief and I hope to be a lot sharper than he was.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: In the answer to the question by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) I hope you noted the very small word with the very big meaning at the beginning of the answer. He said that "if" any action was to be taken by the government it would be announced in the House in due course. In light of what the minister has said, and in light of this being the only action the government has proposed, indisputably the government is mentally totally barren of any solution to the inflationary crisis in which we find ourselves today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: There have been no worthwhile and no specific measures laid before this House, Sir. There have been no policy initiatives announced in the throne speech. There have been absolutely no changes or thrusts in new trends at all in respect of ministerial announcements or in speeches inside or outside this House by members of the Cabinet. The only idea put forward, and this is a time-worn crutch known to all governments, federal or provincial, is the appointment of a committee. This is a time-worn crutch which is used when the only answer you can come up with is the establishment of a joint parliamentary committee. For this group on this side of the House, I say to you that we do not believe this is either the answer or even an answer to the inflationary crisis we are in right now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: We had an election campaign, Sir, during which the policies of the parties were advocated. Certainly, this idea of a joint parliamentary committee was not what my leader advocated in that election campaign. It is not what we would have done had we been elected to power on October 30. For myself and my colleagues, I say that we are highly skeptical that anything worthwhile or any action fast enough to make any difference this winter will come out of this parliamentary committee. In spite of the lack of ideas and the lack of initiatives coming from the Cabinet or the ministerial benches, I can say to you that as a party we are willing to support it grudgingly, quizzically and doubtfully. We are willing to go along with this charade of setting up the committee in the hope that perhaps somehow, sometime and somewhere this Liberal delaying manoeuvre will produce something constructive, something worth while and something immediate to help the inflation trend in which we are now, certainly in respect of the cost of living.

There are conditions which we feel we must attach to our support and our co-operation in passing the motion to appoint a committee. Obviously, if the government had the time, and it does not, we should have liked to see the committee terms of reference wider. We think that focusing attention on food prices alone is only a meagre nibbling at the total problem of the cost of living. If the government had the backbone and had the time it could have taken a giant bite not only at food prices, but at housing and shelter costs, at clothing prices, at transportation, at health and personal care costs and even at recreational costs, all of which showed an increase in the indices published a week ago and which, as stated in the government's own press release "exceeded all other November to December increases of recent years".

The cost of living at the end of 1972, just last month, was 5.1 per cent above a year ago. The cost of food alone was up 8.6 per cent from a year ago. Housing costs were 5 per cent above a year ago and, indeed, in the long haul housing, shelter and accommodation have shown an even greater increase than food alone. Now, we are faced with the government's panacea to this crisis, and that is the establishment of a joint parliamentary committee. Perhaps this is indicative of the government's concern. Perhaps the government feels that those on fixed incomes, those on pensions and the hundreds of thousands of neglected citizens in Canada, referred to now sometimes contemptuously by Cabinet ministers as "the working poor", are not feeling any economic squeeze at the moment and perhaps the parliamentary inquiry will somehow satisfy their plight. I doubt it.

As a matter of fact, I think the government is 100 per cent wrong on this and I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was wrong the other day when he indicated to the House that economic matters were taking a subservient place in the government's attention. I know the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was wrong yesterday in Halifax when he said that consumers were getting a bargain in food prices and that they did not complain about the high prices of other goods in the economy today. I do not know where he has been. I have heard complaints concerning all items on the cost of living index, believe me, and not just food. I should certainly like to hear the Minister of Agriculture repeat his comment that food is a bargain before some of my constituents, some of whom are food producers.

If the opinions of the Minister of Agriculture are shared by his colleagues in the two front rows, I wonder why we are even considering the setting up of a committee on food prices. Why go through the exercise? The answer is simple: he is wrong and his colleagues are wrong. Food prices, like all prices, are simply running out of control today. Our whole economy is out of kilter. The government's answer to this crisis is to set up another committee. Just let me add this warning on food prices. If you want to consider it as a threat that is all right. However, I consider it to be a warning. Already this month the retail price of milk has gone up. Already this month the retail price of beef has continued to climb. Already this month, vegetable prices have increased. If the government is not panicky it should be. Next month's statistical release from the government will show these increases and others. Oil and fuel prices have already increased.

I think the publicity surrounding the formation of this committee is at best a weak-kneed effort, a heartless smokescreen to the people of this country. It is an attempt to suggest that the government is doing something about this crisis. At its very worst, it is an attempt by the government to shift its responsibility to some sort of all-party group, with the result that some of those detrimentally affected by what has happened and is now happening in respect of food costs will expect immediate, constructive action to take place. Obviously, this committee or any parliamentary committee will not be able to take action. Only the government can take action. But there will be people in this country who will believe from now on that these current and continuing price rises will be the fault of the committee, not the government.

I give the House fair warning that some of us intend to do our utmost, until some concrete, specific constructive measures are taken by this government, to lay the blame exactly where it belongs—on hon. members opposite, and particularly the ministry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: In spite of our doubts and our scepticism I am willing to admit, but only after a great deal of soul and heart searching, that we are willing to go along with the committee proposal. We will bring a constructive and co-operative attitude to the deliberations of the committee in the hope, vain though it may prove to be, that some glimmer of policy change might become so apparent to the public that even this government may move in a direct, quick and efficient way. But we do have conditions. First, we believe the committee should be exclusively a House of Commons committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: I shall be moving an amendment to strike out all reference to membership on the committee from the other place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: Our purpose, unlike that of my NDP friends, is not to slander the involvement of individual members of the Senate—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —but rather to give that body the opportunity to perform a responsibility in this current crisis for which it is better suited at the moment. A House of Commons committee under current conditions must stay in Ottawa. A House of Commons committee should work toward immediate and perhaps even short-term solutions. A House of Commons committee should reflect exclusively the party membership ratio of the present House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: This still leaves the Senate free—and indeed I urge it to do so—to set up its own inquiry, drawing on the wisdom, experience and connections which so many of the members of that body appear to have—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Some connection!

Mr. Lawrence: —in order to look into the more long-term, permanent answers to this chronic and constant problem of inflation. That committee could travel around the country. We could not. The Senate committee could undertake a more in-depth study and take a more leisurely pace which is perhaps more suited to its method of work than that of this parliament and that which the country would expect from us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: We also feel that the past history of joint parliamentary committees is not something of which to be particularly proud. The past history I have been able to ascertain shows that most joint parliamentary committees have been neither as productive nor as fast in respect of their recommendations as both the nature of the problem and the time element require in this case.

None of the five joint parliamentary committees appointed by the Twenty-seventh Parliament completed their meetings within half a year; in fact, most took longer. The average time consumed in meetings of these committees was eleven months. The major joint parliamentary committee of the Twenty-eighth Parliament held meetings over a period of two years before it completed its deliberations. The Joint Committee on Consumer Credit and Food Prices, which sat during 1966 and 1967, took three months before submitting even an interim report. I say that these time periods are too long. The 1967 Royal Commission on the Rise of Food Prices took a year to publish its findings. Indeed, the subject has been so well researched, investigated, commissioned, inquired into and so committeed to death that apart from the argument about whether or not we should even have the committee, it is apparent that a time limit should be imposed on our committee forcing it to report within three months.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lawrence: In addition, we feel very definitely that our committee should not cover old ground which previous committees have ploughed. Its historical research inquiry should date back only to the point at which the previous joint committee left off in 1966. My colleagues on this side of the House will be presenting in due course amendments to cover these points as the debate progresses. We feel that the current party representation on the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee properly reflects the partisan make-up of this House and should be a precedent for this committee. Therefore, an amendment will be moved later to the effect that the total number of members on the committee be 19, not 20. As a result, we would have eight members from the government benches, eight from the official opposition, two members from the party to my left, and one member from the Creditiste party. This is in accordance with the present make-up of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee and, we think, more properly represents the party membership in the House.

• (1530)

Finally, an amendment restricting the choice of staff and counsel will be made by one of my colleagues in the belief that everything possible should be done to get this committee working as quickly as feasible. If this is the government's only answer to inflation—and it seems to be—we think much more could and should be done, but we do want to be co-operative and we do want to get cracking on it. Certain restrictions on the choice of staff will, therefore, be suggested later in an amendment from our side.

The sooner the debate is over, the sooner the committee will get to work. While we do have these amendments, we are quite willing to limit ourselves, providing the other parties do so, to one speaker per amendment in respect of this debate and this motion. Of course, if any of the other parties put up more than one speaker per amendment, we have many speakers, believe me, who are burning with desire to get into the discussion and we will have these members speak in the debate.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That the motion be amended by striking out

(a) the words "Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons" in the first paragraph and substituting therefor the words "Special Committee of this House",

(b) the word "Joint" on the second paragraph, and

(c) the fourth paragraph.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion. It is difficult at the moment to compare the hon. member's motion with the main motion before us. I am not sure whether any hon. members would like to advise the Chair regarding the procedural aspect of the motion. If not, it will be put to the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I think this is one of the more important matters to come before the House and I am glad that it is being considered at an early stage. I am not saying that the committee will do what we want it to do or will go as far as we want it to go, but I do feel that a discussion of food prices and a move for action at this time is essential. After all, this is one of the measures which, more than most others, affects every one of us in our capacity as consumers. It affects us in varying degrees, it is true, but it affects us all.

I was glad that the minister laid down the terms of reference of the committee in the government resolution briefly and clearly, but when it comes to the official opposition there are a few things I want to say. The previous speaker urged the government to take a giant bite by including everything related to the cost of living in this motion. When he kept adding in all the expenses that go into the cost of living he reminded me of those old preachers who wanted paradise in one bite or else no paradise—you were condemned to go down below. I think we must take things step by step, and I feel sure that by decrying the suggestion that we start first with the most urgent matter, namely the price of food, the official opposition are actually making an excuse for not getting started on anything at all. For this reason, I am glad that we started with food prices.

The hon. member spoke of the lack of concrete measures in the government's program and said that the purpose of this committee must be to lay the blame on the government. But the people of this country cannot heap blame on the government, and to my way of thinking the official opposition so far has failed to give any notion in a concrete way of what they would have done or what they want to see come out of this committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, whatever were their motives, we welcome their conversion in regard to the Senate as contained in their amendment. This was the only concrete proposal in the previous speech. A number of us have been busy lately speaking over the radio and television making no secret of the fact that we intended to move that members of the Senate be not included in this committee. So, I am very glad that at least one idea of a fruitful character has been picked out and used in the debate this afternoon by a member of the official opposition.

I should like to point out something else to members of the official opposition, and I wish the previous speaker would stay long enough to listen to the consequences of what he suggested. If the official opposition follows through with their suggestion, the net result will be to remove a comfortable majority of the Liberal members on the committee. If we eliminate members of the other place, we will be eliminating a very comfortable wedge of Liberal majority support for the government on this prices committee. This is surely a curious move for the official opposition to make.

Mr. Lawrence: That never occurred to me.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I suppose that is true, because the whole matter of the control of food prices is quite foreign to the official opposition. They have not taken any concrete action in the past. Certainly, they have voiced objections, but they have not said what results they expect the committee to achieve.

Before I go further in my remarks I do not wish to neglect to say that if this committee is to amount to anything in the view of members of our party there must result from it the establishment of a prices review board or a similar monitoring agency which will continue to look after the price of food after the committee has made its recommendations. When those recommendations are before the government, we want the immediate implementation of the one requesting the establishment of a prices review board which will have the responsibility of looking at the proposed price increases and demanding that those who made the proposals justify the need for an increase or else that increase will not be granted. Such an agency must also have the power to roll back those price increases which are unjustified. Let members of the official opposition not tell me that they have been urging this, because they have not. It is we in this group who have been urging this, and this is a definite recommendation that we shall seek from this prices committee.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Perhaps the hon. member could ask his question at the end of my remarks I can promise him that there will be an end.

I also say that the type of speech that I would like to hear from the official opposition is one which would include some of the things which they hope this committee could accomplish, or information on such accomplishments in other places, because what we get out of this committee will depend on what goes into it. If it is just a matter of one party in this House getting publicity for itself, then I do not think the committee will be worth while. But I believe that out of the committee can come the beginning of a pattern for controlling prices in Canada in such a way that possibly on a selective basis rising food prices can be kept in check, and people will be sure of getting the ingredients of a healthy diet to insure nutrition and energy at prices they can afford.

It is not important that this debate be rushed here with just one speaker from each party. The important thing is that a reasonable amount of time be taken by the committee of inquiry to get at the facts, to ascertain what each sector of the food industry contributes to rising prices. The committee must take time to come up with concrete recommendations to place some control on the movement of food prices. That is what we should be doing, Mr. Speaker.

The direction of the trend in food prices is upward. During the past two years the food component of the consumer price index has risen by over 17 per cent. The organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, at the end of 1972 in its assessment of trends for 1973, warned that in Canada the outlook for prices is a matter of concern. It warned that prices which have already gone up could be the forerunner of price inflation all along the line. I believe we should heed the words of the OECD in the work that we are setting out to do.

Although we were all pleased the other day to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) announce that we could expect "a substantial increase" in pensions, I would ask him what is the use of increasing old age pensions, or any other pensions, if we do not take steps to insure that the pension increases are not immediately gobbled up by other increases, of which the price of food is the greatest menace? We have to protect the living standards of our people, otherwise the business of raising pensions is merely a farce, an exercise like pouring water through a sieve, and an exercise in futility. What most people across the country want is a measure of stability in their living costs, and this at a level they can afford.

The minister pointed out that it is six years since the end of the previous prices inquiry. Actually, it is nearly seven years since that committee started its investigation of food prices. What happened as a result of the investigation at that time?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Basford got into the cabinet.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Yes, there were various little side effects, but the main thing was the establishment of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, even though I still regret that the corporate part was added to the consumer section. Also, Mr. Speaker, some safety measures were enacted, and I do not decry them. These were necessary in respect of clothing, drugs, and hazardous substances of various kinds. We also did something along the line of packaging, labelling, and the handling of consumer complaints. But we took no action on food prices, in spite of the final recommendation made by that committee of which I had the honour to be a member. It was that the Joint Committee on Consumer Credit Prices continue its investigations of concentration in the food industry. No action has been taken on that recommendation ever since the day in April, 1967, when we tabled our report. In my view this is unfinished business. This is where we come in now. This is where we must start the new inquiry afresh.

Over the years some of us tried to get that recommendation implemented. Last June, as more senior members of the House will recall, in the very limited time at our disposal the NDP tried to get the government to establish a special committee of the House to look into the matter of food prices. Because of the shortage of time, the investigation could not have been a thorough one. Even so, it could have had some particular effects. However, the government would have nothing to do with it. The government put forward all kinds of excuses. It said that rising food prices were a worldwide phenomenon and we could do nothing about them. The then minister of consumer and corporate affairs said that increasing food prices had only been the trend for a month or two, and that we should not do anything drastic because things might settle down. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) contended that higher prices were due to poorer crops. Undoubtedly, these things are all factors, but they are not the whole answer to the question of why food prices have been rising so drastically.

Now, we have the consumers again demanding that something be done about food prices, and we have the government saying, as it has done in respect of other matters lately that it is in a receptive mood and is listening. I hope it is, because the proposed committee will test the receptiveness, ingenuity and ability of members on all sides of the House. There are cynics in the House who think that the committee will do nothing but a whitewash job. There are others who say, "You cannot control food prices; it is nonsense to think you can." There are others who think the farmers will be picked out and pilloried in the same way as the Prices and Incomes Commission picked out the wage earners and tried to pillory them. In passing I would point out that later its chairman declared that wage settlements had had very little effect on the over-all picture.

There are other members of the House who are afraid the taxpayers will be hurt. Over all this there is the honeyed propaganda of various firms in the food industry, saying the consumers are living in the best of all possible worlds, crying that those in the food industry are on the point of going out of business, claiming their profits are very low, and pleading that we should leave them alone. The other day a media representative asked me, "What makes you think you can hope for something better this time as a result of the proposed food inquiry than we had in 1967?" There are one or two answers to that, Mr. Speaker. The first is that we are now six years closer to monopoly control and dictatorship by the conglomerates that run the food industry in Canada. A second is that a number of countries have started experimenting with their own patterns, to try to control food and other prices. It is no longer possible to say that this cannot be done, that nobody else is doing it.

I refer to the efforts of three countries well known to us—Sweden, the United States and Great Britain. Sweden began its control measures in 1970, the United States began its in 1971, and Great Britain just last November. There are variations in the ways they have been trying to undertake this. They have all had their faults and their failures. There has been a great deal of criticism of these plans from outside and inside. Not one of those countries is completely happy with what is happening as a result of the measures it has taken, but I would like to point out to hon. members of this House that not one of those countries is letting go. Having started on this road they know they must continue. Although they have had to change, modify and switch their tactics and control machinery, not one of those countries now hopes to go along without a precise piece of monitoring machinery such as a prices and incomes authority which we are proposing for this country, and which we in this group have proposed for the past three, four or five years when most ears were deaf to us. Those ears are now beginning to open and turn a little bit in our direction, as the logic of circumstances is making it necessary and desirable for them to listen.

We in Canada have to make our own start as well; we cannot be a carbon copy of any of these countries. We have not found the answers yet, but we have to make our own patterns and feel our way. We have our own problems, such as constitutional difficulties and our export trade difficulties as well as our relations with the provinces. In brief, to put it in a way with which we are so familiar, "Le Canada n'est pas un pays comme les autres."

We are not a country like those others and cannot pretend that we are. All I am saying this afternoon is that although we do not know the answers, we know that we must grapple with this problem of prices. We must begin with food prices and we must begin now. The longer we put it off the tougher it will be and the more human suffering there will be. This is a problem which affects us all, though it does not affect us all equally. That is the danger, the mischief of the talk of averages because people are not averages, they are flesh and blood. It is obvious that the woman with a brood of children and a tiny income is not in the same position as members of this House or people with a $40,000 or $60,000 income for whom the rising cost of food is at best a slight irritation. For people on pensions and fixed incomes, any rise can be catastrophic because it is an invitation to the gougers to move in on any increase in the pension or allowance.

I should like to return again to the experience of Sweden, which was the first country to set up this system and it is the most advanced. The other two countries that I mentioned are gaining experience with controls, but Sweden began in 1970 with specific, selective controls on specific products. About 50 per cent of food consumption in Sweden was affected—certain kinds of fish, vegetables, dairy products, flour and a few other things. This was later extended to a much wider range of foods. The result was that prices were held almost steady for the first year, 1970-71. In the fall of that year it was discovered that farm income needed to be strengthened. This sort of thing is done in Sweden; when a sector of the community needs strengthening, they do it. Food controls were relaxed to the extent that farmers were allowed to build up to the standard of the other sectors of the community. The result was an increase in the cost of living of 0.5 per cent. In the meantime, this was supplemented in various other ways where the need was demonstrated.

It was then discovered that a round of collective bargaining with trade unions had still to take place. Collective bargaining in Sweden operates within the framework of the increase in the gross national product in the previous year. The trade union membership decided that wage increases for 1971 were to go to the low wage earners. This resulted in an increase of 2.5 per cent in the cost of living. Between the increase to farmers and the increase to wage earners, there was approximately a 3 per cent increase in the cost of living.

In Sweden the system has been set up to monitor the cost of living, and wages and food prices are dealt with as I have indicated. We had news at the beginning of this year that compulsory controls were being abandoned in the United States, except in the areas of food prices, health prices and construction costs. In that country, the Cost of Living Council monitors price increases to see that they are held in line.

There is no easy answer, Mr. Speaker. I do not recommend that we should follow the United States model of compulsory wage controls while leaving other sectors free. I know that we will not do that in this country. Through the Prices and Incomes Commission, we have already learned that it cannot be done much as some people would like to do it. But we must make our own pattern, suitable to our country. As a result of what the United States did, their monthly food index during 1972 varied between 3.2 per cent and 5.4 per cent above that of 1971; in Canada during the first nine months of 1972 the monthly food index was 7.2 per cent higher than in the same period in 1971. In other words, unsatisfactory as the American model was, at least it had some effect in keeping the cost of living below our rate.

Mr. Speaker, I should now like to turn to the motion before us concerning the composition of the committee. We cheerfully support the amendment to eliminate members from the Senate.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): We have given notice that this is what we want. Later, we will give our reasons and I trust they will be better than those given by the speaker ahead of me. The terms of reference should be much more specific than those we have in the government's motion. I have a motion on the order paper which reads, in part:

> That the committee be empowered to call witnesses from the various sectors involved, including the consumer;
> That it be given authority to examine financial records and to investigate the profit on equity investment at each stage of the food industry;

Equity investment is all-important. The sales dollar is what the food industry wants as a measure of profit, but there is no mention of the real problem.

> That it be empowered to examine the corporate structure underlying the food industry, and inquire into agrobusiness, transportation, processing and packaging, distribution, advertising and promotion, retailing and any other aspects relevant to food prices;

That is the wording of the terms of reference, in part as we would like to see it. We want to see this investigation become a probe with a purpose, Mr. Speaker. We want to see a monitoring authority come out of it.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): You do not have a monopoly.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

> That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:
> "and that the motion be further amended by adding the following paragraph at the end thereof:

'And further that the committee make an interim report, including recommendations for action, within two months of its first meeting, and a final report upon the completion of its investigation."

• (1600)

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. lady would be willing to answer the question now that I referred to earlier. If she is successful in obtaining the prices review board that she referred to in her remarks, would she be willing to accept at the same time the establishment of a wage review board in order to achieve the purpose that she mentioned, that of controlling prices?

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, we have said from the very beginning that we believe there must be a relationship between prices and income. We have said that incomes are not exclusively made up of wages. Incomes include wages, salaries, rents, interest, profits, dividends and all other forms of income. If we include those things as well, then we will be prepared to accept an incomes board along with the prices review board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has some difficulty with the subamendment proposed by the hon. lady. Offhand, I am inclined to think that it is clearly not in order, because it is not directed towards the amendment offered by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) but is, rather, directed towards the main motion. I am prepared to entertain argument before making any final ruling with regard to the validity of this subamendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues are suggesting that you have thrown a real challenge to me, and I shall be the first to admit it. There is of course a rule, and no doubt this is what Your Honour had in mind, to the effect that a subamendment must be relevant to the amendment. Now, let me make my pitch.

The pith and substance of the amendment is that it changes the main motion. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) admitted that there are three or four respects in which he and his colleagues wish to change the main motion; so do we. If there had been no amendment before the House when my colleague from Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) rose to speak, she would have been in a position, we feel, to move an amendment that would change the motion in two or three respects. Since the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham changes it in one respect only, we submit it is not completely illogical to try to change it in two respects at the same time. I hope my reputation in the field of procedure will not hang completely on this effort of mine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But it seemed to us that we ought to bring both these propositions before the House in one amendment, if that were possible. If Mr. Deputy Speaker, since his reputation is also before the House, should decide that what we are doing is out of order, we will not be offended. It simply means that at a later stage in the proceedings, if we can get the floor ahead of the Conservatives, we shall move an amendment calling for an interim report. We shall have one or two other amendments as well.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, there are reasons for supporting the validity of this motion in addition to the fact that it is being supported by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). That, of course, is a very sound reason most of the time. Although in our new roles I am not accustomed to supporting my friends to my left, we may at least begin doing so, since we may be called on to do that more often from time to time. Since the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has indicated that we would be moving other amendments if given the opportunity, we would not object to including both in one motion. I realize this is not sufficient reason for the Chair to accept them. I must say the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has presented such an exhaustive argument that he has left little room for anything to be added. I would point out, if I may borrow from his language, that the pith and substance of his motion is to inquire into and make recommendations upon trends in food prices, but which group does it is not relevant but collateral; how it is done is not relevant but collateral.

I suggest that it is competent for us to propose variations with respect to the collateral aspects of the motion, so long as they do not interfere with the pith and substance of it. If we were to make recommendations in addition to trends in food prices, in shelter, in wages and in excessive costs of government, then, of course, Your Honour might very well say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was arguing on slim grounds. But we are leaving untouched the kernel, the root—

Mr. MacEachen: What about the pith?

Mr. Baldwin: My hon. friend for Winnipeg North Centre has developed the pith.

Mr. MacEachen: The hon. member is now considering the kernel and root.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that what we are doing is limiting the means by which we can bring about this inquiry and that, of course, is a collateral issue. It is, therefore, competent for the Chair to rule that the amendment of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) can be taken at the same time as that moved by my hon. friend for Northumberland-Durham. We might combine two votes in one and thus do our best in facilitating and accelerating the passage of this measure.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I followed the reasoning put forward by the hon. members who preceded me. It may be easier for Your Honour to deal with this subject in view of the position taken by the opposition parties in agreeing unanimously to have the subamendment put. Your Honour is not required to reason tortuously in order to justify a conclusion favourable to these arguments. I have no objection to the subamendment being put, with the consent of the House or otherwise, if Your Honour wishes to rule in that direction.

However, I would not accept the view of the hon. member for Peace River that the proposition can be put to the House in one package. These must be put to the House as separate propositions, in my opinion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is comforting for the Chair, embarking on the maiden voyage in ruling on a matter like this, to have had the assistance of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). One might be over-awed, at some other time, by the advice coming from such quarters. However, it seems to me that nobody presented a good argument for the subamendment to be merged with the motion and voted on in the House, and nobody seemed to feel that great damage would be done if the Chair were to rule that the subamendment could not be accepted now, as hon. members will have an opportunity to move the same amendment at a future time. That is not to say that the Chair would necessarily accept such subamendment then, either. In any event, having given these short reasons and being thankful for the participation of experts on the rules of procedure, I must regretfully declare that the subamendment as proffered is, at this time at least, out or order.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the motion now before us has been discussed for a good many years. As a matter of fact, intermediary or even government bodies have often studied the problem which we are considering today. There are two alternatives: either the government, in view of all the information which has been provided about this issue, does not now dare introduce the appropriate legislation, or all commissions and special committees which have already inquired into the problem have made recommendations which do not correspond with the government's intentions.

Now that everything is clear, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we should set up a joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons to review the problem of increasing prices. Surely we will approve new measures, but on the understanding that instead of doing nothing the government introduces in the very near future some measures based on studies which have already been made or which will be. In fact, I suggest that studies which have been made to date have provided enough information to justify the passage of legislation in the very near future.

To substantiate my allegations, I have here the 4th report of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Consumer Credit (Prices) tabled during the first two weeks of September, 1966, a committee which made very specific recommendations, but which remained in limbo. Will this new joint committee lead to the same results? If so it is a loss of time for Parliament to proceed with the setting up of this committee, and all the more so since regularly every year and every month in newspapers and journals we read articles in that connection.

If we only keep turning in a circle, Mr. Speaker, no doubt it is because we forgot all about the fundamental principles which should govern consumption. And one of these is simply that consumer goods should be paid at the real price of production, and if we do not try to find solutions with this fundamental principle in mind we shall never solve the problem. It is useless to talk about price control if we do not base our future legislation in this regard on essential principles.

What is causing prices to rise, Mr. Speaker? What is the reason for these increases which are often if not always exorbitant? What are the factors responsible for such a rise in prices?

People are willing to make studies; some have been made. All sorts of reasons are given but, unfortunately, the real ones are evaded. Mr. Speaker, do prices increase because food products are scarce?

By virtue of the law of supply and demand, if they were it might be justifiable to consider some increase but can one logically believe in a scarcity of goods in a country like ours where all resources, and in particular, food products exist in abundance? Indeed, we have so much that our problem often is that of knowing how to dispose of them. It cannot therefore be a problem of scarcity. We have here all we need for a balanced diet. Except for bananas, oranges and lemons, I believe we have all we need in Canada to feed our people well. The increase in prices is therefore not the result of a scarcity of food products.

In the last few years, legislation has been passed, rules have been adopted, like those that apply to the Canadian Dairy Commission, forcing milk producers to reduce their production. When small farmers and small milk producers were forced to give up their businesses, was there a shortage of goods? No, Mr. Speaker.

Therefore, there is no shortage of goods in Canada. Food products exist in abundance; we even try to export them, and that is one of the main problems of the government and especially that of the department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which tries to find markets for our produce.

In addition, can it be said that price increases are due to a scarcity of goods, when we know that over 500,000 workers, ready to promote greater production in the country, are unemployed?

Mr. Speaker, those people, should a scarcity of goods, develop, would be quite willing to take an active part in production. The problem does not lie there. What are the real reasons, unfortunately overlooked, which result in price increases? There are in the first place direct and indirect taxes which push prices up because all are ultimately included in the price of goods and are finally paid by consumers. This is one of the reasons. Consequently, if we want to find a solution to the problem, we must consider tax reductions.

As governments at the federal, provincial or municipal level are digging as much as they can in the taxpayers's pockets to levy funds, one can be sure that those tax increases involve price increases especially in the case of food. That is the first important factor to be considered. If we do not intend to reduce taxes, it will be very hard for us to solve this problem.

The second factor to be considered is rising wages. Even though they may be justified at times, they are automatically reflected in prices as wages are part of the cost of products and costs are reflected in prices.

Again we agree that salaries should be adequate. But we know very well the mad run on wage increases in many fields which lead to price increases. In such conditions, whenever the consumer buys products, he must pay a price that bears no relation to the production price and there are many reasons for that.

Mr. Speaker, there is another important reason for such increases. It might be said that the Créditistes have been harping on the same subject for many years, but that is where the trouble is. Why is it that in spite of all inquiries and the creation of a royal commission on prices and incomes a few years ago there has been no solution yet? This is because people prefer to ignore the true solutions. One really effective way to solve this problem would be to eliminate this debt money from our financial system. This debt money naturally bears interest and directly promotes price increases. Let me give an example: If a food dealer or producer is forced to borrow $10,000 from the bank and must pay back 10 per cent more at the end of one year, where will he take the $1,000 needed to pay the interest? He will certainly get it from the consumer's pockets by raising his prices. Considering that this happens in all fields of production, one realizes that by not applying the essential monetary reforms proposed by Social Credit, we shall go round in a circle forever and will never find a solution.

We are not content with criticizing. In looking for real solutions, we note the ill effects of the system in which we now dabble but we have alternative solutions and we should like them to be examined seriously.

To lower production costs, it must be realized that any production must be financed through new money. If we follow the principle that new money must be created for any new production, we shall avoid disorderly increases in prices resulting from fantastic interest rates. We should also recognize that public capital must be financed through interest-free loans, which would make it possible to reduce taxes.

• (1620)

Surely if we do not have to pay two, three or four times the real cost of labor, we will have more credit to give the consumers. If there is more money for the consumers, Mr. Speaker, we will reach an intelligent control of prices.

Finally, it happens that in spite of all our goodwill, in spite of the excellence of the producers with regards to the production of a particular product, it is very difficult to establish a suitable price for the consumers.

I say it again: there are solutions to this problem. The solution in the case involved would be as follows: prices should be reduced by giving discounts to the consumer.

Mr. Speaker, nobody can deny that compensated discount is economically justifiable. Not only is it justifiable but it is also necessary if we want to avoid bankruptcies caused by the existing unbalance between prices and purchasing power. The lack of a compensated discount is what forcibly causes disorganized discounts which precede or come with commercial failures.

Mr. Speaker, if we stopped to seriously study this problem, I am sure that the solutions we are promoting would be considered justly and we could thus help the consumer, that is the whole population.

And as we must consume food products, this means we are studying a problem which involves 23 million Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, compensated discount would make this dilemma disappear. And if we considered it without partisanship, if we really tried to give it serious consideration, we could find that it is possible in Canada to grant everyone economic security—the purchasing power needed by each consumer to purchase all the essential products he needs.

Since we are sitting over unparalleled riches in this country, it is unthinkable that some families should lack money to obtain the food they need. This is a disgraceful situation.

Therefore, considering that other studies have already been made on the subject, I think that any additional inquiries should be short since the problem is urgent. In fact, it foils down to the purchasing power available to individuals. Such purchasing power can be increased—and we know that it could be increased—but we should avoid, as I said a moment ago, hiding behind a screen in order to shun the solutions I have just put forward.

[English]

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have had the privilege of listening most attentively to the other members who have spoken in this debate. I should like to pay my compliments to the minister, who I thought put the cards on the table indicating where we stand in connection with setting up a committee to study this very important problem—and problem it is in Canada.

I also listened to the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). As far as that hon. member is concerned, no one can deny the great sincerity with which she speaks. This sincerity did not manifest itself just today; this problem has been close to her heart for many years, and I think all hon. members of the House owe her a pat on the back for the very effective way in which she presented this very serious problem to the House of Commons, and thus to the people of Canada. To the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), I also pay my compliments; he had some very good points that should be brought forth to the people of Canada.

It was my privilege to sit in the Ontario legislature with the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham for many years and I must say he has lost none of the fire he used to have in those days. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this hon. member is a very important man. He gave us some points this afternoon that certainly need to be read carefully in order to see what meat they contain. One of the things he suggested was that the committee would not be effective but, speaking on behalf of the Conservative party, he reluctantly agreed that such a committee should be set up. Let me suggest that the hon. member has changed his mind in the last several months. Let me tell him something he well knows. No legislative body in the whole of Canada has as many committees as the Ontario legislature of which the hon. gentleman was a member. I hope that this committee will be more effective than some of the ones in that legislature.

• (1630)

The hon. member might be interested in knowing that one of those committees left the day after Christmas to visit Florida, where it remained until the day before New Year's, December 31, investigating the drainage problems of that State of Florida. Of course, the hon. member was not a member of that august body at Christmas of 1972, but he was a member for many years before. That is the absolute fact, and these committee members were paid at the rate of $50 a day, plus expenses in the best hotel in the whole state. I suggest to the hon. member that he must certainly have changed his mind in the last few months.

An hon. Member: He wishes he were back there.

Mr. Whicher: There are other ways in which the hon. gentleman has changed his mind. His whole speech contained criticism. I do not mind criticism as I feel opposition members have a duty to criticize. I had the privilege of being in the opposition for many years and a member of the so-called rump. I will likely be in that area again after the next election. In any event, I do not mind criticism from opposition members. The difficulty is that they say everything is wrong here in Canada, including the price of food, lower profits and so on. I must say I have never seen such a change as has taken place since October 1972.

In October 1972, the big blue machine from the province of Ontario with its chief lieutenant, the hon. gentleman now sitting in the front benches of the opposition, spent $5 million to $6 million on an advertisement which simply said that Ontario is a wonderful place to live. If I am wrong I am sure the hon. member will correct me, particularly if the amount was greater. Millions of dollars were spent in selling this theme throughout the province of Ontario and that party was successful. I cannot understand how, since my hon. friend left the legislature of the great province of Ontario, things have deteriorated so badly. Let me put this rhetorical question. What did the hon. member do when he was the chief lieutenant of the Premier of Ontario to assist in solving the food prices situation in this province which has one-third of the population of the whole of Canada?

I was very disappointed in one regard. The hon. member posed all the questions and said this was a horrible place in which to live, yet he did not provide any answers. I have yet to meet a single citizen in the whole of Canada who does not proudly say that Canada is the finest place in the whole world in which to live. The hon. member told us what was wrong, but he did not give us any solutions. We on this side of the House, and I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) will agree, hope that when this committee is set up to investigate the price of food it will provide an educational forum for all the people of Canada. If in so doing it can help bring down the price of food, which is the most important commodity since every citizen of the world uses it, so much the better.

There are four main areas of inquiry for this committee. I think it has to investigate the price paid to farmers. It must investigate service costs, such as the price of labour in supermarkets and in related fields. It must investigate the profits of supermarkets, if there are any. Lastly, the members of that committee must immediately realize that the consumer is of importance and that he must have some say about the price of food.

Let us look at my first point, the price paid to farmers. I quite frankly doubt that there is a world shortage of food or that there is a shortage here in Canada. If there is a shortage here, then I say this is the fault of this House of Commons, the legislative bodies all across Canada and in fact the people of Canada, because the farmers of this great nation have not had a square deal since 1945. There is no question about this at all, and if you want to be convinced all you have to do is consider the number of farmers who have gone out of business.

Costs to farmers have increased substantially. This is the only area in our economy where cost bears no relationship to the amount paid to the producer. The farmer gets as much or as little as he can, depending on what the market will pay. There are no unions in the agricultural field and as a result the farmer has been caught in this squeeze. The agriculture industry is very important to Canada. Let me read from a brochure under the heading "Farming and Food Costs—Some Facts and Figures". This gives figures to the end of 1972 and after the questions "What is the Importance of Agriculture to Canada? What does it Contribute to our Economy?" states:

—it is the most important primary industry in Canada

—has assets valued at more than $24 billion and is growing every year

—about one-third of our labor force is directly and indirectly tied to our food and agricultural industry

—agriculture directly employs about 523,000 people

—220,000 people are involved in food processing and the manufacturing of tobacco, leather products, and farm implements

—about one-sixth of the gross value of our manufacturing industry output is processed products of farm origin

—one-third of the freight moved through the St. Lawrence Seaway is agricultural —one-fifth of all freight moved by our railways comes from farms

—farmers spend $3.7 billion each year on goods and services

—in 1971, Canadian farmers spent $178 million in property taxes

—in 1971, agricultural exports pumped $2 billion into the Canadian economy; these exports accounted for about 11% of Canada's trade surplus in 1971

—output per agricultural worker has increased 100% in the last 20 years while the area farmed in Canada has remained essentially constant; output per worker in other commercial industries increased 60%

I mention these facts to hon. members of this Chamber, although I am sure they are familiar with them, in an attempt to get this knowledge to our city friends who constantly feel that farmers are the people making the money in this great land of ours. Let me say to you that none of us, and I include myself because I have been in legislatures since 1955 and here since 1968, should hold his head up high in respect of what we have done for the agriculture industry of Canada. That industry deserves more, and one of the first things the committee must do is prove to the people of Canada that those engaged in primary agriculture in Canada are certainly not over-paid.

• (1640)

The second matter to which I should like to refer is the price of services. All of us know that labour and transportation costs have increased substantially in the past number of years. They have increased at an even more rapid rate in the last year or two. I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the Gazette of January 18, in Saskatoon. Mr. Runciman, president of the United Grain Growers suggested the following:

> The answer to increased food prices lies not in excess profits to farmers, processors or distributors but in inflationary trends in service and labour costs.

The article continues:

> He said Statistics Canada figures show prices received by the farmer rose an average of only 15 per cent between 1961 and 1971 while food prices increased 36 per cent, the same rate as the cost of machinery and other materials used in farm production.
> In the same period, Mr. Runicman said in an address to a farm and home week gathering at the University of Saskatoon, service costs—which range from transportation down to the wages of a supermarket counter clerk—jumped 50 per cent.

That is a substantially greater increase than that received by our farmers. Third, I should like to speak for a moment about a famous bugbear of many people in Canada, something which must be investigated by this committee, namely, the profits or lack of profits received by our supermarkets in Canada. My hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway suggested that these supermarkets were conglomerates and that they had a monopoly in respect of the selling of food in Canada. I respectfully say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the hon. lady, that I do not believe there is a monopoly in respect of the selling of food in Canada. I believe this is one of our most competitive businesses. I am glad in this instance that our friends do not suggest that the high prices are caused because these supermarkets are foreign controlled. To my knowledge there is only one large food chain in Canada controlled in the United States. Therefore, we must accept the responsibility ourselves.

An hon. Member: There are two.

Mr. Whicher: There may be two. I shall not deny that. In any event, there is one very large one. So, I would have to disagree with my hon. friend who suggests that supermarkets gain exorbitant profits. I think she should be fair about these things. The other day a question was addressed by the leader of the New Democratic Party to, I believe, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray). In his question he suggested that the profits of supermarkets were too large. He said they make a profit of one and one-half cents on a dollar's worth of sales, but 11 per cent on the capital investment. I do not think that has anything to do with it. A lawyer could very well have an office worth $25,000 and earn $50,000 a year. Would this mean there is a 200 per cent profit on the money invested? Supermarkets have a tendency not to own the property in which they operate. They may finance the building, but they sell the property and lease it back because the money they have is required for their inventory.

My hon. friend from York South suggested that 11 per cent is too high a figure. The words used by my friends in the New Democratic Party are "gouging the public". I really am not too much concerned about supermarkets. I do not place them on a pedestal. However, I say that the competition in the food business among the supermarkets and the efficient way in which they operate is something which could be copied by many other industries in Canada. For this reason, I respectfully suggest that "gouging the public by supermarkets" is an unfortunate phrase which should not be used more than is absolutely necessary.

The final point in respect of this committee is one which should be looked into and one which is of great interest to the consumers in Canada. All of us are consumers. The farmer, the factory worker and every person in Canada or in the world are all consumers of some type of food product. Of course, our study must be approached with full knowledge of this. If we can do anything to bring down the price of food, then of course it must be done.

On the other hand, I want to point out that things really are not as bad in Canada so far as food prices are concerned as has been suggested. If such a committee as is being proposed can accomplish anything in respect of briging down the prices of food, certainly it will have my support and I am sure the support of every member of this House. However, the fact is that Canadians spend now a smaller proportion of their pay cheque on food than ever before. I do not have the latest figures but I have them for the period up to the year 1971. These were the latest figures I could obtain. Between 1961 and 1971, the general price increase was 33.4 per cent. But in the same period, the retail food price index increased by only 27.4 per cent. Here is what an hour's work in a factory bought in 1971 and ten years earlier. In 1971 it bought 2.4 pounds of sirloin steak and in 1961 only 1.9 pounds. In 1971 it bought 3.7 pounds of pork chops and in 1961 2.5 pounds. In 1971 an hour's work would buy 15.8 pounds of bread while in 1961 it would buy only 11.5 pounds of bread.

So, while food prices have increased, and certainly we hope they may be lowered, in general the situation is not as bad as my hon. friends across the way suggest. Actually, in respect of world markets we really are holding up our heads because there is only one country in the world in which the proportion of a person's earnings spent on food is less than in Canada. That country, of course, is the United States. I suggest one reason for this is the fact that it is much easier to grow oranges in California and Florida than anywhere in Canada, as well as other citrus fruits. The weather plays an important part in this regard. In addition, the population in the United States is 210 million as against 22 million in Canada. Because of the population in the United States, products can be produced in very large quantity which has a tendency to reduce the price. For the benefit of the hon. member I might say the average person in the United States spends 18.3 per cent of his earnings on food while in Canada this figure is 19.3 per cent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but under the terms of the special order passed earlier this afternoon the 20 minute period allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) suggested to this House that our party at least would agree to have one speaker only in respect of each amendment because we feel this is an emergency measure. There has been some indication that the New Democratic Party reject this suggestion. If not, I will be happy to resume my seat and allow the question to be put.

• (1650)

In addressing the House for the first time, I realize my limitations, particularly my inability to express to you the congratulations you deserve on being selected as Speaker. May I simply be content to say that the position you occupy is deserved, the dignity you and your associates bring to the position is a credit to you and to all members of the House, and may I say finally that your patience and your guidance, particularly to those of us who are new members, makes us your debtors.

I am not happy to find myself speaking to the unhappy situation explicit in this motion. I would have much preferred the opportunity of sharing with this House my pride in such things in my constituency as the Stratford Shakespearean festival, but how can I do so with any integrity while my senior citizen constituents are faced with the impossible task of feeding themselves satisfactorily until their January cheques arrive sometime next week, hopefully? Could I be comfortable in telling you of the hopes, aspirations and accomplishments of Perth-Wilmot's townsmen and villagers, while at this very moment the housewives in these communities face the hopeless task of preparing their shopping lists? How can I tell this House of the contributions that have been made by the Perth-Wilmot rural areas, while the mothers of Perth-Wilmot are desperately attempting to plan a balanced diet with one hand and holding in the other their food dollar which is shrinking before their eyes?

I join with the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) in suggesting that we be brief because of this emergency, and I intend to heed his advice. Over the last few days I have listened to those in the Liberal party explain to the House and the country the results of last October 30. I make no comment on these explanations other than to express my surprise that not one of these hon. gentleman has had either the honesty or political wisdom to point out to us the one single factor that has permitted them to retain power. That one factor is luck, pure and simple good fortune. I submit to the House that had legislation dictated that our election be held on a Friday or Saturday, after the families of this nation had somehow once again survived the weekly crisis of purchasing their food supplies, the Liberal Party would be fortunate indeed to require the space occupied in this House by the New Democratic Party to my left. Indeed, if the election had fallen on the first or second day of any month after the families of this nation had met their monthly crisis of paying for shelter, the Liberals would find adequate room on the benches now occupied by the Social Credit Party.

One fairly trembles to think of the election results if polling date had been on a Friday or Saturday which coincided with the first or second day of the month, and we could only assume that the chairs of the independent members would provide more than adequate space for my friends opposite. I hope therefore that I might be permitted to congratulate my friends opposite on their good fortune. One cannot help but admire successful gamblers, but I have observed that once an intelligent gambler has succeeded in drawing to an inside straight, he does not pursue that course too often. I am astonished to see that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) now intends to seek a royal flush by saying to Canadian housewives: "fear not, your troubles are over for we will have a committee examine the trends of food prices". Is one to believe that the minister does not know the trends of food prices? I claim to be no expert and therefore I do not pretend to advise him, but may I invite him to repair to the nearest grocery store or supermarket where the real experts, the housewives of Canada, will tell him the trends in terms that will leave no doubt in his mind.

To be charitable, the word "trend" in this motion may be simply poor draftsmanship and the key word may be "factors". In this case, I may be of assistance to the minister by introducing him to the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan), now the Minister of Agriculture, who will assure him of one thing, that it is not the Canadian farmer who is profiting from this uncontrolled inflation. Indeed each week the farmer's wife waits with alarm in the grocery line for the inevitable moment when the cashier pushes that fatal total button. She is the most expert of the vast array of talent available to the government because she knows best of all that the prices her husband receives for his farm products do not account for the erosion of the food dollar.

We have heard in recent days that the government, in repentance, intends now to listen to the Canadian citizen. What a day of enlightenment. I, for one, hasten to congratulate those opposite me on this transformation. As evidence of my good faith, and realizing the minister and his colleagues are hard pressed to be everywhere at once, I rush to their aid by way of being a courier of information from my constituents in Perth-Wilmot.

The people of Stratford, and of the towns, villages and rural areas of my riding have several messages for this government. Incidentally, they are disappointed that the message they sent to this government on October 30 was either misplaced, misunderstood or ignored, but they are quite willing to have me report it today, and it is as follows. You have permitted inflation to be uncontrolled and your only answer was to spend $2 billion on unemployment insurance costs. You have permitted the quality of life for those on fixed income to deteriorate to the point where prices have stripped them of dignity, let alone any ordinary comforts. You have now responded to your political crisis by suggesting yet another special committee, paid for by us, to inquire and make recommendations. This is not a response; you are still turning a deaf ear to our plight.

Food Prices Committee

A special joint committee suggested in this motion may have some semblance of merit in relation to long-term planning. A joint committee is no answer to a short term crisis. The housewives of Perth-Wilmot who are waiting with apprehension this very moment in our grocery stores are not able to form their joint committee. Those on fixed incomes, particularly our senior citizens, who must salvage what is left of December's cheques to humbly feed themselves for at least another week are not able to form a joint committee. The mothers of large families who dedicate a large part of their lives to attempting to supply their children with a reasonable diet cannot form a joint committee.

The minister moves that this House rescue him from the indefensible position of his government which has done nothing about a crisis situation for over four years. If there is a glimmer of hope for any short-term relief for the housewife, the pensioner, the mother in this nation, then I believe the minister will find the support he seeks. But I respectfully request him to look for hope and not to hide behind this motion in unrealistic expectation that it will bail this government out of the deep hole into which they have dug themselves.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Manpower—Local Initiative Programs—Request for statement on progress in approving projects; the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney)—Canadian National Railways—Terms of Loan from Pension Fund to Fidinam (Ontario) Limited—Inquiry as to leasing by railway of part of Upper Canada Place; the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Air Transport—Northern Canada—Inquiry as to program for installation of improved navigational aids.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, private bills, public bills. As there are no notices of motions (papers) or private bills, the House will proceed directly to private members' public bills.

Hon. members will recall that when 120 private members public bills were introduced last Monday in accordance with long standing practice, since it was not possible for the Chair to review the provisions of each and every one to determine their procedural acceptability, it was agreed that they should be deemed to be introduced, given first reading, and ordered to be printed subject to subsequent examination.

I have now had an opportunity to examine most of these bills and should like to enumerate a number of them which, in my view at least, appear to be money bills. Initially, there is the second item on the list of public bills, Bill C-6, an act to amend the National Housing Act, in the name of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and number 24, introduced by the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald). There is No. 26, Bill No. C-30, introduced by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart); No. 29, an act to provide for the constitution of a Federal Transport Commission of Inquiry; and a bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), an act respecting rate fares for disabled persons on federal modes of transport, which is No. 41 on the list.

I am afraid that not too many of those further down the list will be reached, but there is also No. 88, an act to establish a Newfoundland Crossing Authority, standing in the name of the hon. member for Humbert-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). These items will, of course, be allowed to remain on the list. I am not making a final ruling on them now, but if hon. members will look closely at the bills I have enumerated they will see that in many instances, if not in all instances, they appear to be money bills or encroach upon the financial initiative of the Crown.

What I propose to do is leave them on the order paper at the present time, and when they are called, starting with the one when we next have private members' public bills, in the name of hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), I will hear argument as to whether that bill is a money bill, and because of that whether it should be accepted for debate in the House. I am not making a ruling now, but I would be delighted to hear the arguments of hon. members who perhaps might be able to convince the Chair that the original judgment made at this time is not correct. We will now proceed with the first item under private bills.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, I will not take up too much of your time, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to express my appreciation of your permission to develop argument in respect of the bill which stands in my name. In order to assist you, I wish to advise that I shall be proceeding on the principle that I am not talking on a money bill, but seeking forgiveness from the Crown. I think this should make an interesting argument.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

PENSION BENEFITS STANDARDS ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE INFORMATION ON PENSION FUNDS TO EMPLOYEES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West) moved that Bill C-5 to amend the Pension Benefits Standards Act (information to employees) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to speak in this session of parliament. It is not the first time I have had the opportunity to participate in private members' hour. I feel I owe a great deal to private members' hour since I participated fully in this particular hour with my colleagues from Skeena and Timiskaming during my first two sessions in parliament.

My bill, No. C-5, concerns private pension plans. It probably will come as no surprise to hon. members that my party has been concerned, and deeply concerned over the years, with pensions. Our record from the time the King government was forced to introduce the old age pension, down through the years until today as illustrated by the speeches of members like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and others, indicates a continuing interest in this vital matter of security.

Our party has often been derided by our critics for what is considered to be the CCF-NDP pension paranoia. Criticism of us has been made on the grounds that our excessive pre-occupation with security somehow indicates or admits to our own basic insecurity as people, and that we lack initiative and incentive to compete in the great commercial and industrial world out there. Mr. Speaker, if my party in the past has been too concerned with pensions, other parties are now beginning to learn that the average voter is security conscious as well. It is not too unfair to say that both the Liberal and Conservative governments, past and the present, have never been too interested in pensions, either private or public, but if a choice had to be made by those old parties I believe it would be for the private kind, because then their friends in the financial institutions would at least have a fighting chance to get a piece of the action. Nevertheless, things are now changing.

Canadians are insecure. Because of the nature of the economy there is a change in outlook among people generally, and I suppose a change in values. Only last week this House witnessed a ludicrous if not hypocritical attempt by the Tories to exploit this insecurity. What the Tories were hoping to do was defeat the government and get power themselves on, of all issues, pensions.

Mr. Alexander: Get on with your own bill.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear from the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). I recall that he was in the House one night when we were debating an increase in the minimum wage. There was an amendment before the House dealing with such an increase. It was put forward in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think that when we are dealing with private members' hour it would be most important that all of us, particularly the hon. member who is speaking now, should refer to his bill, No. C-5, which all of us thought had some merit. I would think that when he starts to digress, as he is now doing, he is moving away from the intent and purpose of private members' hour. He is now talking about the minimum wage. I do not see that mentioned in his bill. I would hope he would restrict his remarks to Bill No. C-5.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I regret this deflection. I was deflected from my topic by the hon. member for Hamilton West, and I think he is attempting to consume some of my debating time. To carry on I was about to say that he opposed raising the minimum wage at that time—

Mr. Alexander: For a good reason.

Mr. Rose: —and at that point I accused him of supporting an Alexander's Ragtime Plan. Nevertheless today, and this is specifically for the hon. member, I do not intend to talk about either the CPP, the OAS or the supplement, but about private pension plans to which employees and corporations jointly contribute. It is not that I am not interested in the others. On the contrary, I am vitally interested in them, and I believe it should be a priority of all parties not only to increase the benefits of public plans but to gradually lower the retirement age, perhaps to 55 years. In this way we could get out of this ludicrous position where we have 200,000 young people unemployed, subsisting on hand-outs such as the OFY and LIP, in effect pensioning off these kids at 21 years, and keeping the old man on the treadmill until he is 65. We have to do something about that, and we recognize this, but that is not what I want to concentrate on today.

I realize that I have learned a great deal from the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), and from other hon. members, on how to be out of order and in order at the same time, Mr. Speaker, but now to deal specifically with Bill C-5.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: To repudiate all the Liberal comments, may I say that all companies with federal incorporation, and that includes railways, airlines, and liquor interests such as Seagrams, come under a federal statute known as the Pension Benefits Standards Act. There is equivalent legislation regulating provincial companies, particularly in the provinces of British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec. My bill seeks to amend the federal statute in one specific instance. In this regard and only in this regard, my bill seeks an additional clause calling for an open book policy to reveal to employees all pertinent aspects of the contributory plan including investment policies of the plan, the return of employer contributions to the fund, vesting privileges, benefits and so on.

• (1710)

The present act fails to call for complete disclosure and because of this limitation many employees in the thousands of private plans across the country are frustrated and resentful. They believe that the enforced blindness of pension plan details have cheated them out of their democratic rights as contributors; even worse it has cheated them out of financial and economic returns which should have accrued to them as workers rather than to the benefit of the companies by whom they are employed.

The classic example of this of course is with the railway workers and their resentment about the parsimonious pensions has led them almost to the point of revolution, not only against the company but against their own unions. I should like to paraphrase an article which appeared in the Financial Times on October 2, saying that the demand of the non-op railway unions for more say in the administration of their pension plans is the first stage of a move to get more control over the investment policies of $1.5 billion worth of funds. This gives us some idea of the tremendous pool of capital in these pension plans; capital which rightfully belongs to employees and which is being managed in a great number of cases, and in some cases entirely, by companies. Other examples which have come to my attention are cases like the Seagram workers in British Columbia, who have again and again been refused any details of the interest paid on their contributions or where their money is invested. Under the present federal statute the employer has no legal obligation to make that information available to employees. My bill would overcome this response from management.

In my opinion, companies historically have yielded to the demand for pension plans only when convinced that the control of the fund would be to corporate benefit, and not because companies wish to contribute to the workers interests or security. For far too long control of the administration of the plans has been considered the sole prerogative of management. I do not agree with this nor does John G. Doherty, writing in the Financial Times on November 13, 1972 under the headline "Crunch coming in pensions", when he said:

> Some planners (pensions) feel that if pensions are really a form of deferred income, then the employee should have rights to his company's contributions, regardless of how long his tenure is.

He then refers briefly to the "locked in" situation in regulations in many company plans in which the vesting remains with the company. Thus, an employee who decides to leave the company leaves his benefits to the benefit of the company. He says further that:

> This causes problems because the employer's share of the annual funding is usually much smaller than a young employee's share.

Statistics Canada, in a special study of this subject, indicates that nearly 40 per cent of our labour force is covered by private plans, so the pool of capital under the direct control of management is far from insignificant. The immensity of the pool reveals, I think, why management is so determined to have complete control over this $11 billion fund and why the corporate interests of this country will probably not be too enamoured of my proposed amendment.

I should point out that under the United States law revelation of the trust agreement is demanded. We have not directed our legal energies toward such an open book policy but my bill attempts to overcome this. The United Transportation Union News states frankly that this union is out for more power over their workers' pension rights, and is demanding equal representation on the board. If we agree that pensions are really deferred income, a fringe of the wage package, then both contributions, the employer's and the employee's belong not to the company but to the workers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rose: Why should the employee's priorities in spending his own money not be borne in mind? Why should the employee not decide on the investment practices of his fund so that if he thought it desirable, for example, that increased benefits be paid and the plan could afford it, it could be done. If he thought the fund should be used for public housing or worker's housing, this also could be accomplished. This is not the case today and it is for this reason I ask that the workers be given the right to control their own money, a right effectively denied by the limitations of the statute I am seeking to amend.

Why should any company be allowed to fudge on its contributions by limiting those contributions to some conservative actuarial projection? If the worker's income is projected to be lower, then it follows the company's portion is lower and less money is required for the fund. But the pensions also become lower. Why should a company have the right to have its workers subsidize its own pool of private capital, thus allowing it to expand by this regular supply of cheap capital?

I know that quotations are not particularly interesting and I would avoid them if I could. However, I think it is important that we consider the suggestion outlined by D. H. Fullerton writing in the Vancouver Province on March 19, 1969. He called the column "A bill of rights for pension fund contributors" and made several extremely important points. He said:

> When an employee contributes to a fund, however, he has every right to demand full participation in its management, and full protection of his interests.

How on earth can any employee do this if he does not even have a copy of the agreement or is denied it? Mr. Fullerton goes on to suggest, in his bill of rights:

> All employer and employee contributions to the fund and income and capital gains earned by it, must be regarded as accruing to the sole benefit of the pensioners. As things stand now, in most funds the employer is the residual beneficiary.

This practice is blatantly unfair and discriminatory and I think should end. It is because I have great faith in the fairness of members I have great faith that hon. members will support my bill when it comes to a vote.

Mr. Fullerton states further:

> Employers as well as employees must have representation in the management of a fund.

He later goes on to criticize the actuarial assumptions on which deductions and benefits are based and he concludes by saying:

> Such a bill of rights should eliminate many of the abuses which arise from employer domination of pension fund policy and management.

I think I have made whatever case I can of this relatively technical matter, one which is perhaps not apparent to many young workers. Like most young people, young workers think they are going to live forever. Of course, they will find as they grow older that they will become intensely interested in pensions—like certain parliamentarians are interested in pensions—especially their own.

I realize that my amendment will not remove all possibilities of abuse in private pension schemes, and I use the word "schemes" advisedly. However, I believe my bill will go a long way towards bringing to light some of the previously furtive managerial practices in pension plans which have definitely not, I repeat, not been in the interest of workers in general. I think my amendment will allow workers, through the collective bargaining process, to become masters of their own pension house. I hope I can depend on hon. members of this House to support the bill standing in my name, Bill C-5.

• (1720)

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to on this bill, one is tempted to make many observations pertaining to CNR and CPR railroad pensions.

Mr. Benjamin: Go ahead.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): However, I want to say a few words about certain questions to which Bill C-5 makes reference and explain how I feel. I wish to make it known that I have attended three meetings of railroad pensioners' meetings which were held in Winnipeg this year. I want to go on record as saying that I agree wholeheartedly with the railroad pensioners' requests. They say that, the CNR being a Crown corporation, their pension should be on a basis of parity with those available to employees of Air Canada, which is also a Crown corporation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, these people are not asking for air passes; they are asking only for equally good pensions. They are also requesting that the voluntary retirement age be set at 60. I would agree with Mr. Picket, of Edmonton, the chairman of the association, that this would create additional jobs in this country. I, personally, have made representations to the national caucus of the Liberal party. I know, also, that the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) and the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) have made representations, along with mine, to the minister. I wish it to be known that our representations have certainly been taken into consideration and that the minister is aware of what the railroad pensioners would like to see. I hope that in the near future active consideration will be given to that end.

Mr. Alexander: You sound like a minister, Joe. I am flattering you.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, any amendments to the Pension Benefits Standards Act require the most careful consideration by reason of the relationship between this legislation and similar legislation in a number of the provinces, particularly in Ontario and Quebec. The first legislation in this field was passed by Ontario following an extensive study by a special committee of the legislature. Similar legislation was adopted in Quebec and the federal legislation was designed to follow as closely as possible the legislation adopted by the provinces. Uniformity of legislation in this field is most important in order that employers and their employees who are subject to the federal legislation, will not be at an advantage or disadvantage as compared with employers and employees who are subject to the provincial legislation. As a consequence, any amendments in the federal legislation or the provincial legislation are usually discussed in considerable detail among the various jurisdictions, to ensure so far as possible that the legislation will remain uniform.

It is of interest in this connection to note that Ontario has recently published a Green Paper outlining possible amendments to the Ontario legislation having to do with a change in the vesting requirements. The present act requires that all benefits accruing in respect of service after the introduction of the legislation be fully invested in employees after they reach the age of 45 and have achieved ten years of service. Consideration is also being given to a change in this requirement, to make vesting effective at the age of 40 after five years of service. The paper published by Ontario was for the purpose of raising this possibility for discussion, and many representations have been made. The information thus gathered will be of much interest to other jurisdictions having similar legislation or considerations to meet.

The question of information to be provided to employees is dealt with in all of this legislation on a uniform basis. The present requirement is spelled out in section 11, particularly in paragraph (c) of that section.

Mr. Rose: I beg to differ.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): In accordance with this paragraph, a pension plan is required, if it is to be eligible for registration, to provide for an explanation to be given to each member of the plan of the terms and conditions of the plan and any amendments thereto that are applicable to him. This is quite clear, Mr. Speaker. He is also required to have an explanation of his rights and duties with respect to the benefits available to him under the plan. The section also includes the authority to adopt regulations with respect to the provision of other information for the employee.

Mr. Rose: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for St. Boniface to suggest to the House where in section 11, paragraph (c), there is reference to financial matters affecting the plan?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I do not think that is a point of order. It is a question for debate.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I wish the hon. member would stay in the House and listen to what I am saying. He would understand me better. I will repeat those remarks having to do with information to be provided to employees. As I said near the beginning of my remarks, the question of information to be provided to employees is dealt with in all the legislation on a uniform basis and the present requirement is spelled out in section 11, particularly in paragraph (c) of that section. I will repeat also what I said after that. In accordance with this paragraph, a pension plan is required, if it is to be eligible for registration, to provide for an explanation to be given to each member of the plan of the terms and conditions of the plan and any amendments thereto that are applicable to him. He is also required to have an explanation of his rights and duties with respect to benefits available to him under the plan. The section also includes authority to adopt regulations with regard to the provision of other information for the employee.

It is certainly reasonable and desirable that each employee should have full information concerning the terms of the pension plan, since this appears of major importance to him in planning his financial affairs. There may be some argument, too, that he should receive information year-by-year concerning his accrued benefits. Great care would have to be taken, however, in legislating in this respect. Some employers now provide this information to their employees on a regular basis. Where the records of the pension plan are on computers, it may be fairly simple to compute the accrued benefit for each employee and provide an annual statement to him. However, in some cases the calculation of such information would be extremely difficult and costly. One could probably feel that such information would be valuable to each employee, but it would be better to leave this matter to the particular employer and employee to work out between them having regard to its complexity and the administrative costs involved. It is to be kept in mind that any such calculation would have to be accurate, otherwise employees might be led to rely on incorrect information in their pension planning. This would give rise to much controversy and difficulty later on.

The amendment proposed by this bill seems to concentrate on the financial position of the fund rather than on the terms of the plan and the position of each individual as regards his own benefits. The Pension Benefits Standards Act as it now stands contains considerable material concerning the financial position of the plan. In fact, the main purpose of the act is to require that pension plans be put on a sound financial basis. Periodic actuarial reports are required to be made and these have to be submitted to the Department of Insurance which administers the act. Annual returns are also required to be made in respect of each plan in order that its financial position may be known. The act and the regulations control the investments of funds of the pension plan. The act contains requirements concerning the liquidation of any deficits which may be revealed as a consequence of the actuarial valuations.

It would appear, therefore, that the legislation goes as far as is reasonably possible to ensure that the promises made in the pension plan are adequately funded. Where there is a deficit, that is, where the assets in the pension fund are not sufficient to cover the liabilities represented by the benefits accrued to the valuation date, the law requires that this deficit be liquidated over a period of years. It is generally desirable to have such deficits liquidated as soon as possible, but some balance is always needed between a rapid liquidation of existing deficits, on the one hand, and appropriate modifications to the pension plan, on the other, to try to maintain benefits at an adequate rate.

The principal purpose of the Pension Benefits Standards Act is to require adequate financing of pension plans and thereby to increase the confidence employees have in the payment of their pensions when they reach retirement age. One cannot, of course, object to the provision of more information to employees and to their associations concerning the financial position of the plan, but it is not clear that the provision of such information would of itself serve to increase employee confidence. The existing legislation dealing with the requirements of funding is better designed for this purpose.

Some of the difficulties in legislating in this respect are illustrated by the terms of Bill C-5 itself. It refers to the trust deed or to pertinent financial information. Usually, the trust deed will be the terms of the arrangement between the employer and a trustee. The trustee will usually be the custodian of the assets of the pension plan fund, but his responsibilities will vary widely from one plan to another. In some cases he will be the custodian of the assets only and will be required to pay them out on direction from the pension committee or the employer. Thus, the trust deed would spell out the responsibilities of the trustee but would not contain any particular financial information. It is not likely that the terms of the trust deed would be helpful in ascertaining the current financial position of a pension fund.

The reference to pertinent financial information seems to be very imprecise. It might refer to the assets of the fund, to the interest rate earned on the assets, to contributions received from employees and from the employer, to special contributions in respect of unliquidated deficits, or to estimated liabilities under the plan. Uncertainty exists, also, as to the frequency with which such information would have to be provided. It is to be noted, also, that in many cases there would be no employees' association or employees' union. It would be uncertain, then, whether any information should be provided or not. One might note, also, that there are a number of plans to whose funds employees do not make any contribution. There is, thus, such a variety of cases that it is difficult to legislate the provision of information of this type. In many cases there are pension administration boards which include representation from employees as well as from the employer. Such a board would receive all financial information concerning the plan, and since there are representatives of the employees on it one would suppose that this would be an adequate disclosure of information for employee purposes.

I referred a while ago to the CNR pension plan, and I am sure that I got a smile from some hon. members on the other side when I did so. But I wish to end by saying I was pleased to hear from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who the other day also made representations on the subject during the debate on the address. He attended the meetings to which I referred a while ago; I believe he has been doing so for a number of years. I am not associating myself directly with him but indirectly I may say that in this instance, as in so many others, I wholeheartedly agree with him.

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the principle of the bill now before us is an excellent one and it is supported, I am sure, by all members of this House. The confidence of employees in contributory pension programs would be enhanced if more information were made available to employee contributors. The whole area of private pension plans has been attracting growing public concern. Their viability, and in some cases their integrity, has been questioned. While I believe they have been and can continue to be useful institutions, this area has not been reviewed for a long time and should be reviewed now. It is understandable that questions are being asked about their administration and their value. However, I regret that I cannot support this proposal as either a reasonable or practical measure.

We can easily support the suggestion of providing a copy of the trust agreement to the employees, but we cannot responsibly support the additional proposition which is worded "other pertinent financial information." It could end up requiring the disclosure of everything in a company's books, or almost nothing at all. To be effective and acceptable, there would need to be a definition of "pertinent" which could reliably be applied.

Turning to the general intent of the bill, that of confidence between employees and employers, I should like to make the following suggestions. First, a formal and extensive re-examination of the administration and value of private pension plans is long overdue. Such an inquiry is essential to maintain rational support for these institutions.

Second, the general challenge of confidence between employees and employers requires a fundamental change in economic policy. It is a change that I look forward to. I think, though, that we should be laying down a new economic policy, consistent with the logic of business and technology, that would coincide with the historic values of the Canadian people. The time has come for us to formulate a plan to accelerate the growth of the economy while simultaneously broadening the ownership of its production capital, so as to build the working population's future income increases on capital incomes—which, incidentally, do not raise prices—rather than upon increased pay for the same or less work input, the very essence of cost-push inflation.

Within the logic of our economy and within the logic of our morality, full employment in the production of goods and services relevant to the needs of the poor can only be based upon raising the legitimate incomes of consumers. There is no way to achieve this except by making the ownership of capital accessible to the approximately 95 per cent of the population who do not own it today on the same terms that have always been regarded as minimal by business: access to investments that normally will pay for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to use any more of the time allotted to me. I am sure that other members would like to speak, and I am anxious to hear what they have to say. I simply repeat that while we cannot support this proposal before us, we look forward to this parliament making meaningful progress in this area.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I want to add a few comments to those delivered by my colleague. I think he put his finger on the problem in the hon. member's bill when he indicated that he was quite content with the purpose and principle of the bill but drew the line when it got to the question of pertinent financial information. When I see members to the left of my party move amendments dealing with corporations, I certainly become a little nervous and get a little excited since I know their love for corporations and the financial structures of same.

I am all in favour of the free enterprise system and what it means in terms of reward for initiative, and this is why the hon. member's bill makes me a little nervous. I was pleased to hear the speaker from the government benches elaborate on the problem he saw in the hon. member's bill, and I should like to tell the hon. member, with respect, that I do not think he did any research into whether this sort of bill should be introduced following discussions with the provinces.

If I may touch lightly on the remark that the hon. member was forced to make regarding "Alexander's Ragtime Plan", it is in this area that I find it necessary not to go along with the New Democratic Party which wants to increase holus-bolus the minimum wage without having any kind of consultation or deliberation with the provinces.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Rose: It is a genuine point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to point out to Your Honour that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) objected, on a point of order, to lack of relevancy in certain of the remarks I made. I think he now is guilty of the same charge.

Mr. Alexander: You are right.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): The hon. member has heard the point of order. I give the floor back to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my friend the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose). He is quite right. But I did want just two or three seconds to make some rebuttal of his remarks. Surely we are all concerned about pensions and trust agreements on which pension plans are set up. I think we would all want to see employees in such a plan receive a copy of the trust agreement. Obviously, this would be to their benefit, and as I understand it, it would also be to the benefit of the employer.

The parliamentary secretary rambled on and on but never got to the meat of the matter sufficiently to say that he did not think the employees should have a copy of the trust agreement. He said that they could get this information, and in fact he read subsection (c) of the act, which I should like to reread in order to clarify the situation. To the best of my knowledge, all that an employee can obtain under the provisions of the present act is that which is contained in the legislation. Section (11)(c) provides as follows:

> (c) for a written explanation to be given to each member of the plan of the terms and conditions of the plan and any amendments thereto applicable to him, together with an explanation of the rights and duties of the member with reference to the benefits available to him under the terms of the plan and such other information as may be prescribed by the regulations.

That does not include the trust agreement, which is what the hon. member forcefully pointed out this evening. Employees who have every right to have a copy of the trust agreement placed in their hands are being denied that right, and certainly I believe the hon. member has made a valid point for our consideration. I am not saying that it is true of all, but some companies have a very high rate of investment compared to the pensions paid to their employees. Why should this be? Why do the employees not know this? Apparently they do not know because that sort of thing is not disclosed.

With regard to vesting, I understood the hon. member to say that vesting takes place at age 45 after ten years of service. This is an important step. I hoped the parliamentary secretary would indicate to his minister or to the department responsible that this is the kind of legislation in which the federal government should become involved. Although my knowledge of the meaning of vesting is somewhat limited, I think employees should be given more opportunity to know what is happening to their money.

I understand that something like $11 billion which is presently tied up in this country in various pension schemes could be redirected into housing, and I think here we have lost a great impetus. Perhaps those who are guiding our fortunes do not place very much importance on the provision of shelter, but I suggest each and every member of the House believes that this money could be redirected into housing, thus producing some very significant results in terms of increased housing starts, particularly for those on low incomes.

I think the hon. member's motion is excellent, but I make this one point. The hon. member is asking that the following be added:

—for a copy of the trust agreement or other pertinent financial information to the employee's organization or union.

• (1750)

I do not question the hon. member's motive in this regard, but knowing what he thinks of companies and financial structures I may feel that this is a devious way in which the hon. member can go into a company's books holus-bolus. Along with other hon. members, I would take a dim view of such a move on the part of an hon. member. Incidentally, I had a confidential conversation with the hon. member which I will now tell all hon. members about. In that conversation he explained that he did not mean what he appears to state. For us to support such a motion, the hon. member would have to be more explicit.

Knowing the expertise of hon. members on the other side in respect of drafting resolutions, I am quite shocked that they let the hon. member bring this one before the House. It is about as bad as my trying to obtain an amendment to the National Housing Act; although it was ruled out of order, the door was not closed in respect of forgiveness on loans for sewage systems. I do not have the expertise of those in the hon. member's party, but even though the bill does have some merit we must be continually concerned about movement in areas which call for consultation, deliberation and co-operation with the provinces. In this area alone I think the hon. member should have done a little more research.

An hon. Member: A private member?

Mr. Alexander: Whether it is a private member or a government member, one should not bring in a bill until he has attempted to research it. I think the hon. member has failed in this regard. The principle which has been brought before us deserves consideration.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), for whom I have a great deal of respect, has called for the question. I will sit down, even though I know someone on the other side is always prepared to kill a private member's bill. This is very unfortunate because I think that in order to make this place more meaningful we should have the opportunity of the government accepting private members' bills. In this way we could truly be part of the democratic process. As matters stand now, this is an exercise in frustration for hon. members because they know that someone on the other side will stand and talk out the bill. I see that one hon. member is ready to stand now, or just as soon as I sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I think he is going far beyond the principle of the bill before us.

Mr. Alexander: I agree, Mr. Speaker, but at least the latter part of my remarks was serious. There has to be more consideration of private members' bills or this hour becomes a farce, because they will never become legislation but will only give members an opportunity to be reported by the press so that people back home will know their member is trying to advance the type of program they deserve.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think first I should congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) on his good fortune in having his bill drawn first for discussion in private members' hour.

Before I heard the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) speak, I thought that this was a particularly good bill and one we might proceed with; but having heard the comments of the hon. member for Hamilton West I have come to the conclusion that there are definite defects in the bill. Perhaps the hon. member will want to reconsider his bill and reintroduce it in the next parliament which, hopefully, will not be for some time.

The hon. member for Hamilton West made some comments on the question of provincial co-operation with the federal government in the adjudication and supervision of pension plans. On the basis of that I obtained a copy of the report of the Superintendent of Insurance on the administration of the Pension Benefits Standards Act for the year ended March 31, 1972.

This is a very important area in federal-provincial relations. As hon. members to my right will understand, a great deal of the history of Canada has resulted from an attempt to deal adequately with conflicting claims of the provincial and federal governments regarding areas of jurisdiction. Here is an example where the provinces and the federal government have been able to work out an equitable relationship where in some cases pension plans which normally fall under the jurisdiction of the federal government are administered and supervised by the requisite provincial authority. Also, there have been provincial authorities which have attempted to provide for federal jurisdiction over matters of purely provincial interest.

I am sure hon. members will be delighted to know what the Superintendent of Insurance said in his report for the year ending March 31, 1972.

On December 17, 1970, the Minister of Finance and the appropriate authorities of the provinces having pension benefits legislation agreed to extend respective agreements indefinitely subject to the proviso that each party to the agreement can terminate the agreement by giving the other party three months' notice in writing.

This means that relationships between the federal government and provincial governments in this particular area are in very good hands indeed and that, for a change, instead of having to place all matters of jurisdiction under constant strain, with attack and counter-attack from each side, we have been able to work out a measure of co-operation and co-ordination.

In terms of the point raised by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay), the parliamentary secretary, concerning CNR and CPR pensions, a standing committee of the House of Commons received a reference from the House last year and conducted a fairly extensive investigation into the status of CNR and CPR plans in this respect.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): CN only.

Mr. Reid: I thank the hon. member. In the course of its hearing, the committee heard representations from Canadian Pacific which came before them to discuss investment policy followed by the CPR pension fund in order to compare and contrast it with that of the CNR pension fund.

I feel that the point raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, that individuals who must subscribe to these pension plans do not have sufficient information, is certainly true. In my opinion, and that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), if there is one constant gripe of employees of the CNR and CPR it is that they do not have enough information about their pension plans. Their particular grievance is not about the trust agreement; it is twofold—it is on the question of how that money is invested, and exactly what their pension rights are.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Their particular grievance now is that you have talked-out this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I might say, this being my first experience in private members' hour this year, that, like some of the new members, it is perhaps good to listen to hon. members at this time because sometimes they are the best speakers in the House.

The hour provided for private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOOD PRICES

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF SENATE AND HOUSE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray:

That a special joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to enquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends;

That 20 members of the House of Commons to be designated by the House at a later date be the members of the special joint committee and that Standing Order 65(5) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; to engage the services of counsel, accountants and such other clerical and technical personnel as may be deemed necessary and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed special joint committee.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock, along with others in the House, I was attempting to find some hope for those who need it most in the words of the motion placed before this House by the minister. If there is any glimmer of hope for any short-term relief for the housewife, the pensioner or the mothers of this nation, then I believe the minister will find the support he seeks. I seriously request him to look for that hope and not to hide behind this motion in the expectation that it will take the government out of the deep hole they have dug for themselves.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I welcome the motion before the House. I wish to remind hon. members that our party was in the forefront last session in attempting to get the government to do something about the increase in the cost of food. We wanted something done at that time because food prices were going up quite drastically. The government at that time did not listen to us. It was not until after the election of October 30 that the government decided to take the preliminary measure of establishing a committee to study the trend of increasing food prices in this country.

At the outset I wish to make it clear that I hope the committee will do more than study the increase in the price of food and will, indeed, make recommendations to the government upon which the government will act immediately. Our experience in the past has been that we have had commissions and committees of this House and of both Houses which have made very elaborate recommendations which have not been acted upon. The people of the country will no longer tolerate such action by this place or by the government of Canada.

During the last six years there have been two major studies carried out in respect of food prices in this country. One such study was carried out by a House of Commons and Senate committee in the mid-1960s, a committee on which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) served. There was also the Batten commission established by the governments of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan in the mid-1960s. Both these bodies made elaborate studies and investigations of food prices in this country. They also made serious recommendations. Some of those recommendations have been acted upon, and many others have been shoved aside or tossed into the wastepaper basket.

At the outset I wish to encourage this House to see to it that the committee takes up the work where the others left off and investigates the conglomerate structure involved in our food industry and the many other factors which go into the prices of food in this country. Also at the outset I should like to make it very clear that the farmer is not the person at whom the finger of blame should be pointed. The farmer has spent his fair share of the food dollar per year during the past 20 or 25 years. Very often there is no relationship between the price he receives for his commodity and the price the consumer, or the farmer's wife must pay for the commodities she buys.

When I was a young person living on a farm in Saskatchewan I was very often puzzled when I saw my family sell livestock or grain and then go to the grocery store and buy these commodities highly priced when processed at the other end of the chain. When we have this study we should not blame the farmer, because his share of the food dollar is going down every year. In 1949 the farmer received 57 per cent of every food dollar spent in this country. In 1972 he received 38 per cent of every food dollar spent in this country. The farmer's share had slumped to 37 per cent or 38 per cent. That is quite a drop in that particular period. As we have seen, the processors, marketers and middlemen are gobbling up more and more of the consumer food dollar each year, and the farmer is receiving less. This is true in respect of almost every food commodity one might take a look at.

I should like to refer to some figures taken from the "Saskatchewan Economic Review," based on Statistics Canada data for 1972. Here I compare the years 1961 and 1970. We find, in 1961, for wheat turned into bread the farmer's share was 12.9 per cent of the consumer dollar. In 1970 it was 9 per cent of the consumer dollar, a drop of 3.9 per cent in respect of what the farmer previously received. The same is true in respect of potatoes. In 1961 he received 37 per cent, and in 1970 he received 34 per cent of the consumer dollar. In respect of canned peas, in 1961 he received 18.4 per cent of the consumer dollar, and in 1970 he received 13 per cent.

So we see that the share of the consumer dollar the farmer is receiving has been going down during the past decade despite the increased cost of food to the consumer. It is very clear that when this committee commences its work it must look at the middlemen and not the primary producer in this country, because it is not at the doorstep of the farmer that the fault lies for the increase in food prices.

Over the past ten years in many communities farm income has declined; the farmer has not had a fair deal in respect of the pricing of commodities in this country. We all know that in the last few months the price of beef, and so on, has been increasing but that has not been the trend in general over the past few years. Indeed, the farmer has been receiving the short end of the stick.

Once again I wish to refer to the statistics for 1972 reported in the "Saskatchewan Economic Review". There are some figures here which show 1961 as the base year with an index of 100. We find, ten years later in 1971, that the index in respect of farm prices for Saskatchewan farmers had fallen to 89.7 per cent of what it was in 1961. I realize that in the past year this figure has risen and that perhaps now it is as high as it was in 1961.

Farm costs have been increasing very rapidly. The Barber commission report on the price of farm machinery, tabled in this House a year or so ago, stated that farm machinery prices increased by 85 per cent between 1949 and 1971. The price of farm machinery has increased more than that during the past few years, as also has the price of farm machinery parts which the farmer must buy in order to maintain his farm equipment.

Once again I want to refer to the statistics provided by the "Saskatchewan Economic Review" to show that the cost of farm equipment, and so on, has been increasing in the last few years. Taking the year 1961 as the base year with an index of 100, we find that by 1971 the index for farmland and farm buildings had increased to 155.5 and that farm machinery had increased to 127.4.

It is very obvious that the cost to the farmer of producing food in the last ten years has increased drastically while his income has not followed suit. In fact, the increase in farm income has been, in general, far behind the increase in the income of almost every major economic sector in this country, and that is one of the things the committee will have to keep in mind when investigating food prices and recommending action.

All the committee has to do is look at the population trends in this country to know that farmers have been receiving the short end of the stick. Between 1949 and 1969 the rural population in Canada dropped from three million to two million people. Between 1966 and 1971, 15 per cent of Canada's farms disappeared, all of this despite the fact that the productivity of the farmer has risen very rapidly. In fact, in the last few years his productivity has risen at twice the pace of the non-agricultural sector of our population, namely, our nation's industrial population. So when we commence the study of food prices in this country we must begin, not with the farmer but with the real culprit, namely, the middleman in the food industry.

The farmer has been shafted, the consumer is paying a very high price for food and in many cases the man working in the store as a clerk is not getting a sufficiently high wage. Indeed, there are people in other areas whom we must investigate very thoroughly in studying the price of food to the consumer. Some of these areas include the processing and the packaging of food, which has become very elaborate and expensive in the past few years. We must investigate in depth the distribution of food in this country, its transportation and freight rate costs. For some of us on the Prairies this is a very important factor because we feel we are often discriminated against, in terms of freight rates, to the benefit of some industries in central Canada.

We must investigate very thoroughly the advertising and promotional costs which go into the food industry today and look at much of the advertising gimmicks in the advertising of food. We must take a very close look at the conglomerate structure of the food industry in this country, at chain stores, at the profit these chain stores are making, at the proliferation of many supermarkets in the suburbs where you have on one street a supermarket and on the next corner another supermarket. Often the space in the supermarkets is not utilized to its fullest capacity; this means an additional cost to the consumer who shops for his groceries. These are just a few of the things the committee should investigate if we are to get to the crux of the problem regarding food prices in this country.

We must look, as well, at the lack of competition, at some of the huge near-monopolies such as the Garfield-Weston Company that has a controlling interest in about 60 companies in this country which are producing food. While we are doing this, we must make very clear that what we are looking at is the profits on equity investment rather than the profit on sales. I know that the leader of my party, when speaking in the House last week, referred to the example of Dominion Stores who say they make a profit of only .6 per cent on sales. When we look at the equity investment, we find that their profit is really some 11 per cent—and that is what counts when we look at the cost of food to the consumer in this country.

I believe it was either the Batten report or the report of another study which said that the profits reaped by food wholesalers and retailers are often above the profits reaped by wholesalers and retailers in other industries. In 1968 food retailers had a profit of 17.5 per cent. Food wholesalers had a profit of 19.5 per cent in the same year. These are the areas which we should study when we consider the price of food in this country.

I now want to urge upon hon. members, especially those who will be members of the committee, that one of the recommendations which we surely must make if we are to achieve anything in this area is one calling for the establishment of a prices review board, as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway earlier this afternoon. This prices review board must, when there is a huge jump in the price of food, have the power to demand that the company justify the increase and if it is not justified the board must have the power to control the price or, indeed, at times to roll it back. When I talk about justifying the price of food I am talking, first of all, about giving the farmer a fair deal as well as giving a fair deal to those who work in the food industry. I refer primarily to the close scrutiny which we should give to the middleman in the food industry.

I now want to say a word or two about the amendment that was moved in the House earlier by the spokesman for the Conservative Party regarding the exclusion of members of the Senate from the membership of this committee. I wonder how sincere the Conservative party is in wishing to abolish the Senate in this country, and whether it is just a move at this time—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: I know the hon. member does not mean it, but I do not think it is allowable for an hon. member to reflect on the motives of other hon. members. Of course, our motives are always well known and they are always perfectly honourable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Read your own speech about us.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member cannot comment on the motives which prompted the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) to move his motion. They are there and they speak for themselves.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might speak on the point of order that has been raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and say to him that it is not necessary to comment on the motives of the Conservative party; we know that they are—they are ulterior and selfish.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the points that have been raised and the language that has been used are not outside the realm of debate in this chamber. However, I do not think a point or order was raised.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), who has certainly departed from parliamentary practice. I must say that a party which, at least in the number of years that I have been here, has continually moved motions which have no chance of succeeding has no business to make this kind of statement. The hon. member is entirely out of order. His statements should not have been made; they are improper and I suggest to Your Honour that the hon. member should be cautioned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think perhaps hon. members on both sides have made their point. I now call on the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the conscience of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is bothering him since he interjected in this debate. It struck me, when the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) was speaking earlier in this debate, that he started off by saying the committee must be established quickly and must begin its study immediately; that for that reason Senators should not be members of the committee; they can set up their own group and go into the matter at a more leisurely pace; they may take their time in proceeding with the study because they have all kinds of time and connections. I wonder whether those two statements are not somewhat contradictory.

Our party has other reasons for being suspicious and for not wanting members of the Senate to be on the committee. First and foremost, members of the other place are not democratically elected by the people of this country. I believe that is a very important point which we should make. I hope that the members of the Conservative party, when others of us in this House move for abolition of the other place, will support us with the same enthusiasm as that with which they apparently moved this amendment. I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is fully expecting their support when his motion comes up for debate later this session.

In the next two or three minutes, Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to two or three matters which I think will throw a little light upon some of the members of the other place and why it might be preferable not to have them on this committee. I quote a short paragraph from the December issue of Saturday Night magazine as follows:

> Among themselves they share 180 corporation directorships and 53 senior executive positions. Eight of them are bank directors.

Many of them are also interested in the food industry. Many of them sit on the boards of directors of some of the food companies, or have interests in industries associated with food. We have Senator Beaubien, who is involved in the Dominion Sugar Company. Senator Desruisseaux is involved in Melchers Distilleries Ltd., Lucky One Beverages Inc., Standard Brands Ltd., and Canadian Cocoa and Chocolate Co. Senator Gélinas is involved in John Labatt Ltd., Montreal Refrigerating and Storage Ltd., the Canadian Salt Co. Ltd., the Ogilvie Flour Mills Co. Ltd., Distillers Corporation and Seagram Ltd. Then we have Senator Hayden, who is involved in Atlantic Sugar Refineries Co. Ltd., Acadia-Atlantic Sugar Co., Canadian Tuna Co. Ltd., Atlantic Fish Processors Ltd., and Scott's Restaurants Co. Ltd. Then there is Senator McLean, who is involved in Seal Cove Canning Ltd., Quoddy Seafoods Ltd., and Craft Canning Co. Ltd. There is Senator Molson, who I understand has some interest in Molson Industries Ltd., and Senator Robichaud who is involved in National Sea Products Ltd. These people do have an interest in food prices but they do not have the same interests as the average constituent, the farmers and consumers who live in my riding.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I appeal to this House to get on with its work, to study the increase in the cost of food, and to remember that the farmer is not responsible for that increase any more than the average worker employed in the industry who is not reaping the cream of the crop in terms of the increase in food prices. I hope we soon get down to work and study the conglomerate structure of the food industry, food transportation costs and promotion, advertising and packaging costs. It is in the middleman that I am sure the House and anyone interested in studying the increase in the cost of food will find the culprit.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to participate in this debate and, it being my first opportunity to speak in this parliament, I would like to congratulate you on your unanimous re-election. Those who previously served in this House gained the greatest respect for you, Sir; and I may warn new members that behind that velvet exterior lies a mailed fist.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I congratulate parliament on the precedent it set, not only in drawing the Deputy Speaker from the official opposition but on the quality of the individual selected. He is a man I have been privileged to serve with. He knows I am not put down easily and I may tell him that from previous experience he should know that, like the bishop's wife, I will try harder each time. That is a local joke between the Deputy Speaker and myself. We were once seated with a bishop of a diocese that will remain unnamed. His wife was with him and she mentioned that she was his second wife. I told her that being number two, she would have to try harder.

I appreciate the introductory remarks of the minister who put the problem and the reasons for setting up the committee in their proper context. I also appreciate the comments of my colleague from Bruce (Mr. Whicher) who was most forceful and interesting in his remarks regarding the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). Incidentally, I wish to congratulate the latter, (a) for being in order and (b) for keeping us alert. I have heard of the cut and thrust of debate in the provincial house and I am pleased to see that it is being brought here.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham stated the problems. Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any great trick to stating the problems. We all know what the problems are. Then he demanded action, but I never heard from him what his party's suggestions were. This is the quality of the opposition which wants to take over government simply because it wants to form a government. It is a highly commendable ambition. That is why we are here—we want to form a government too, but I would suggest that we do it with constructive suggestions.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham wanted action. He criticized the government and then he said he would support the establishment of the committee, with certain conditions. At that stage he began to get interesting. I thought he was going to come up with some intelligent suggestions. But what were these great conditions, Mr. Speaker? They were procedural. They had nothing to do with the cost of food. Of all things, they were procedural. He was disturbed because it was to be a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons—a joint committee because it was to be made up of members of this joint and members of the other joint.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Danson: I think that is a commendable thing. We are dealing with a very fundamental problem, but I do not believe this is the way to face it. We should not be debating the role of the Senate in this connection. Incidentally, it is a role with which they themselves continually struggle. I think it would be extremely valuable to have the contribution of Senators, because we want to know the response to rising food costs of people who are already living on a guaranteed annual income.

One thing that the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) suggested was that Senators should not contribute to the committee because of their experience. That is something that disturbs me as a businessman who came here to do what I can. Is he suggesting that I should hide whatever experience I have simply because I am a businessman? Farmers come here and speak on behalf of the interests of farmers, and I think that is legitimate. I do not think there is anything wrong with having people who are well motivated and trusted by their colleagues speaking on a matter of which they have experience. They would lend balance to such a committee.

Some of the things happening in this House, Mr. Speaker, are quite remarkable. I have never been in a minority government, yet some of the things we are able to do now in a spirit of co-operation and, incidentally, of survival on both sides are amazing to me. As a supporter of the government, I am delighted at the haste with which we are getting some things done, things that we could not get done when we were in a majority position. In fact, there is an advantage to being in a minority House.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) spoke earlier in the debate. I am always delighted to speak after her, Mr. Speaker, because she makes a unique contribution to this House. Up until this time she was the lone representative of the so-called weaker sex and I am delighted that we are now joined by other women who have a great contribution to make to this House. I always thought that it was a great weakness in the last parliament that it had only one, even though a very capable spokesman for the women's point of view, because in a debate of this nature when we are speaking about food costs, that point of view is most important. As is the case when speaking on abortion, it is very difficult for a man to go through it.

The hon. member's suggestion was a constructive one—it was repeated by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville—having to do with a prices review board. This is the sort of thing that will get to the guts of the problem. I think this is a progressive, though not a Progressive Conservative, suggestion. It is the type of thing we must do and to which the committee will bend its efforts.

If we look at the beginning of the Manitoba experience when they published the producer price and the retail price, we will recognize the gap between them. A lot of questions will be asked about that. As well motivated as farmers and businessmen are, it does not help to have someone looking over our shoulders all the time. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway overlooked the fact that pension increases are and will be tied to the rising cost of living. I think the committee should investigate the Swedish experience which the hon. member mentioned, as well as the United States experience. This is something which we all must consider.

We have avoided wage and price controls in this country. We have a good record in containing inflation relative to other nations, but still I think we must watch the American experience in this respect. It is true that controls have all but been lifted, but they have had an interesting impact on rising inflation. If prices start to rise now, it will indicate that controls are really not very effective. This is a situation which we might watch carefully.

I was interested to hear the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis) make his distinguished speech. He appears to be a distinguished Member of Parliament following a member who had a distinguished career on this side of the House. I wish the new member for Perth-Wilmot a distinguished and short career as well.

There is nothing magic in this situation, Mr. Speaker. In the last parliament the finance committee studied interest rates, but this time we really want to study the full question of inflation. We know that there are no magic solutions. We could say that this is a sort of motherhood operation, but no one except the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has offered suggestions as to what might be done. I think we have a responsibility in this House to look at those suggestions. Even if it were only educational, I think we would all want to know the answers and know that the right questions are being asked of the right people in the committee.

One cannot isolate food costs from all the other factors which create inflation—the psychology, the effect of wages, the effect of dividends and the return on investment. Things we do not have time to deal with in this House can be dealt with in detail in committee. We gentlemen in this House are not as familiar with this subject as are our wives. Just about 50 per cent of the married people in this country are women!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: I would like to keep it that way, Mr. Speaker. Food prices are highly visible and are reflected every day in the household budget. Women spend the highest percentage of our incomes and it is very important that they be given an opportunity to sit on this committee and to appear before it. In that sense it is a motherhood resolution because they are the people most deeply concerned.

There are many cost factors that we will have to consider in the committee. There is the question of consumer selection—"shopping" is the old-fashioned word. It will be my thirtieth wedding anniversary in a week or two, Mr. Speaker. We have raised four sons—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: That is on February 6, Mr. Speaker; and I believe it is the money anniversary, if any hon. members are sending gifts. I do not mean to get syrupy about it, but it has not been an easy thing to raise a young family. It was easier for me than for my wife. When she is shopping and lamb chops are expensive, she buys pork chops; and when they are too expensive, then she might buy cut-up chicken. It is not so terrible—

An hon. Member: What about boloney?

Mr. Danson: Boloney is not too bad. Its price will go down; with so many new members on the Conservative benches it should be in oversupply.

The other night I watched a television program called Viewpoint which comes on after the eleven o'clock news. Ruth Fremes spoke about consumer selection. She pointed out the options open to the shopper, and this is something we should bring out very strongly in the committee hearings. Perhaps we could have at the committee someone such as this lady, who was articulate and a home economist, someone who speaks to women in women's language and does not turn men off. Such a person could tell the committee about the choices we have.

If we need a certain amount of vitamins, we can get them in frozen orange juice at four cents an ounce, say, or in half a grapefruit at five cents. There is nothing wrong in sending out for pizza or Kentucky fried chicken, but it is not shopping. The choice is yours, as a consumer, and if you want frozen everything you can have it; but then do not say that you do not understand why food costs so much. The cost is rising because we want things prepared in different ways and in easier packages.

In the middle of the election campaign I remember one day going into the Ponderosa steakhouse when a mother came in with a family to buy inexpensive steaks—inexpensive by restaurant standards. She might have had good reason, of course, but I was shocked. It is easy for men to talk, because they do not have to stand over the stove, but still we must put these things in some sort of perspective.

Mr. Speaker, we have to see to it in this House that senior citizens have a fair chance in these periods of spiralling inflation. The rest of society can roll with it—can eat something else or go somewhere else. If everything were easy, fresh frozen and ready to go, life would be dull for us. But senior citizens do not have that flexibility; they cannot raise their income or go somewhere else, and they have to contend with rising food and drug costs. Sometimes the big question for them is whether to get proper medication or proper food. We have a special obligation to these people and we can discharge part of it by looking after the pension increase. But part of it we will have to deal with in the committee. Consideration of these obligations will help the whole of society and will help us get our priorities straight.

If each time we think of this problem, we think of senior citizens and those on fixed income who have to make a trade off between medication and nutrition, we will admit, if we are honest with ourselves, that we must examine this problem. That is why the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville were most interesting. He began to articulate, in an eloquent manner, the problems of the farmer. We have heard such speeches before. Certainly the hon. member has mentioned these problems many times, as have other hon. members such as the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and other distinguished members of the House who have spoken on behalf of farmers.

An hon. Member: They have not spoken well, but they have spoken.

Mr. Danson: Yes, they have not spoken well, but they have spoken. I do not think you will see farmers getting rich because of high food costs. I remember last year we debated, with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the entire question of food distribution and retail costs and costs associated with chain stores. There was some confusion in the minds of hon. members over the question of profits. There was a price war which didn't make for logical comparison. In some instances it actually lowered prices but raised the profits of an individual chain because its sales increased immensely. However, profits over-all have not increased at the same rate. We have not looked at the middleman, as the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville said, or the processor and distributor. Studies have been made in this area and it would be worth our while taking another look at it. I was surprised at the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville, an NDP member, referring to the middleman. I think we ought to call him the middleperson. I think that is male chauvinism at its worst.

The hon. member for Bruce mentioned one major United States-based food chain. He did not mention the one that is coming to the east from the west. May I say, without using any trade names, that this great chain that is coming to eastern Canada from western Canada is bringing a breath of fresh air with it. We are seeing our eastern chains being challenged by people who treat their customers as human beings. They care about them and appreciate them as customers. Perhaps we ought to talk about that also.

The other problem we must consider is the multiplicity of sizes and shapes with which we must contend. At one time, small sizes of anything were called sample sizes. Now they start as giant sizes; then there are the super-giant and magnificent-giant sizes. On the store shelves we find Whiz and Wham and Woof and Bam, each in ten different sizes. The poor retailer needs a mile-long shelf to handle all these sizes. That does not seem sensible in this modern day and age. Then, as well, we must consider increases in commodity prices. The price of coffee in Brazil might go up by two cents a pound, but back here in the supermarket the clerks immediately rush around to mark coffee prices up by ten cents a pound at the retail level before the coffee beans have even been taken off the bushes in Brazil.

An hon. Member: Include plastics, too.

Mr. Danson: I include plastics. Of course, there may be reasons for these sharp increases in costs; the chain may have lost money through decreases in prices of other foods. Nevertheless, let us find out how valid those arguments are, I suggest because prices are raised with indecent haste. We cannot look at this sort of thing in isolation, because it is part of a total, specific and visible problem. We want answers. We do not want to use this committee for playing games to see who is to be in government and who is not. Those sorts of games will be played soon enough. The committee must seek to serve the purposes of our senior citizens and others who are caught in the squeeze where they must make a trade-off—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him, as provided by order made earlier today, has expired unless he has unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, as the representative of a riding which is suffering from the evil dealt with in the motion before us, it is my duty to tell the House my way of thinking about the terrible problem called inflation. The failure in our industrial production system in the field of pricing is reflected in constant inflation to be curbed solely through deliberate limitation of production and incomes by means of monetary restrictions, which bring about generalized unemployment, innumerable bankruptcies and complete disruption of our economy.

Prices are at the heart of the problem of inflation. Incidentally, logic does not seem to have been the strong point of past or present governments. Every inquiry on the causes of inflation began by thorough research into the machinery of prices in relation to the monetary system. Instead of considering the normal machinery and concentrating efforts on the various contributing factors, such a study should include a thorough review of the operation of our monetary system through which a small number of rich people get richer and a greater number of poor people get poorer, thus creating such a gap that, tomorrow perhaps, it will be too late to fill it.

During the month of July 1969, more exactly July 2, 1969, a federal Prices and Incomes Commission was created under the chairmanship of Mr. John H. Young, dean of the Arts faculty of the University of British Columbia. The commissioners' terms of reference were to find the causes of inflation in our country. The present Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Basford) had then stated that, in view of their training and experience, these commissioners would be able, after their investigation, to make recommendations in order to cope with the acute problems resulting from inflation.

Four years have already gone by since that famous commission was established and I am still wondering about its findings. Has the government shelved the report or decided to ignore it? Anyway, these last four years inflation has been running its devastating course at the expense of the citizens of our country.

Today, we are asked by the government to set up another committee to study that virus. People, Mr. Speaker, are tired of studies and are asking for action. In the present circumstances, are we in a position to do better than Mr. Young and his commissioners? I doubt it, Mr. Speaker. As the same effects result from the same causes, we are in the same impasse as in 1969 as no measure has been taken following prior research. It seems that no solution has yet been found by the older parties.

To a great extent, inflation is caused by the usurious rates of interest the government and the citizens have to pay.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to point out the following facts to the House: In 1968, Canada's debt was $32,924 million and the interest $1,301 million. In 1972, the national debt amounted to $44,975 million and cost $2,080 million in interest. Bearing in mind the interest of $1,301 million paid on the debt of $32,924 million, we have to pay $959 million more in interest; this represents additional debts of $12 billion and therefore twice as much interest. Even if that is one of the causes of inflation, I should like to have additional information in view of the situation.

We Créditistes advocate an efficient solution, that of the compensated discount of 5 to 10 per cent on purchases so that prices might not increase, merchants might make the same profits and prices and salaries might remain the same. This would contain inflation.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

> "That the amendment be amended by replacing the period by a comma and adding the following:
> 'and that the said Committee be also appointed to inquire into the possibility of reducing the interest rates paid by consumers in order to increase their purchasing power for consumer goods.'

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member proposes as a subamendment the motion that he has just read. The Chair has serious doubts as to the acceptability of this amendment and would be happy to hear comments from hon. members who would like to help the Chair on this point. If there are no comments, I am ready to render my decision.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as I seconded the subamendment, I should like to draw the following fact to the Chair's attention. The main motion is to establish a committee to investigate this very serious problem and, as stated by an hon. member who spoke a moment ago, mothers are deeply concerned with this problem. Thus I consider that the proposed amendment would only clarify further the terms of reference of the committee allowing it to consider every aspect of the problem and to make recommendations to the House on ways to correct a situation that is deplored by everyone.

Mr. Speaker, this is why I think the amendment should be received, should this be your ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) for his comments to enlighten the Chair. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rimouski is obviously interesting but, as I said, I have serious doubts about its admissibility mainly because it tends to amend the main motion rather than the amendment.

In other words, what the hon. member proposes to the House is a new amendment rather than a subamendment. The hon. member tries, in other words, to amend the main motion before the House rather than the amendment which seeks to eliminate referral to the Senate. The subamendment should necessarily be connected with the subject covered by the amendment now before the House.

The hon. member could perhaps put a motion, such as the one he has just suggested, as amendment to the main motion.

However, I must warn the hon. member I do not say that even that motion would be in order, especially in view of citation 291 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition.

Anyhow, this is hypothetical and we have before us a quite specific amendment which, in my opinion, cannot be considered as an amendment to an amendment.

I must therefore regretfully make that decision which is moreover the one made a moment ago by the Deputy Speaker of the House in connection with an amendment put by an NDP representative.

It is therefore with regret that I advise the hon. member that his motion cannot be put to the House.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, if the House wishes the question to be put, I will gladly give way.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has been recognized. If an hon. member wishes to rise on a point of order, he may do so for that purpose. However, I believe that the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) wishes to speak, if the hon. member for Crowfoot does not wish to do so.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): I do, Mr. Speaker. In rising to address the House on this subject, I should like to tell hon. members that I have some good news and some bad news. The good news is that farm prices will continue to rise. This is good news for the farmers in Canada. The bad news is that in spite of the setting up of this committee, and even if the committee accepts the socialist idea of controlled prices and a price review board, consumer prices will still rise.

Why should this be the case? I shall try to convince the House that prices will rise. The first reason is that we are at the beginning of a rapid inflationary cycle. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has not brought down a budget, but anyone who looks at the economic indices will realize that we are now moving into a fast inflationary cycle. When there is a high rate of inflation, food prices rise along with everything else. In my view there is no question that this high inflation rate will continue to undermine the economy of the country.

Why is this inquiry being set up? I suggest it is because the government really has no solution; it is setting up a committee because it is afraid of an election soon and members opposite want to say they tried to do something about high food prices. This will merely be a road show, with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) coming before her committee with her tin cans and her loaves of bread suggesting that someone is making a huge profit.

If the committee has to study this question, I hope it will make full use of the terms of reference before us which allow counsel and accountants to be engaged. As I interpret the paragraph, counsel and accountants can travel across the country and delve fully into the question of the cost of transporting food. I believe much of the problem lies in high transportation costs—monopolistic, maybe.

Why should the food bill be the one which the consumer hates to pay? One explanation is that nowadays practically everything else can be bought on credit—a car, a television, even theatre tickets. The result is that at the end of the month the pay cheque is already spent. In many cases, the wife makes the monthly payments to which the family is committed. After those payments have been made, the food bill has still to be paid; and it has to be paid in cash. Then she realizes that not enough cash has been saved to meet the food bill.

The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) said that the food bill accounted for about 19 per cent of the take-home pay. Why do I believe that food prices will rise? I do so because we operate in the North American market, indeed, in a world market, and because there is a food shortage throughout the world. This will naturally be reflected here. I would point out that domestic production has been discouraged by the government for the past four years. Members opposite supported policies designed to get the small farmer off the land rather than helping him get into production most suitable to his holding. They paid him, for instance, to get rid of his chickens. The government did away with the subsidy because it did not want farmers to produce lambs in Canada. We are now importing 90 per cent of the lamb and about 12 per cent of the beef consumed in this country.

How did a world shortage of food come about? I have before me the "United States News and World Report" dated December 11, 1972, which refers to the fact that world food production has suddenly shrunk close to creating a global crisis. Food production in many of the poor countries did not improve enough this year even to keep pace with the rise in population in those countries. Russia has had its worst crop in 100 years. There has been government bungling, political disruption. The weather has caused a world food shortage. Russia is experiencing a difficult winter, with insufficient snow to cover the crop, and it is expected that there will be a very poor wheat crop.

What is the position in China? China has purchased 400,000 tons of wheat and 300,000 tons of corn from the United States, the first purchases by that country from the United States in 23 years. Russia also purchased 27 million tons of grain from the west over and above the purchases made by those two communist countries from this country.

India, it appears, is going to have a food shortage and will have to import food even from the United States, despite the fact that international relationships between those two countries are not good. So India looks as though it is headed for a food shortage too. The same can be said of other countries in Asia, such as Cambodia, Indonesia, Laos and Burma. Burma used to export rice, but rice production is down all over the world. Rice production during the last ten years has increased very little, if at all.

In Chile there will be enough food for the population if they go on a spartan diet; that will save them from mass starvation. In Argentina people are being told they cannot eat beef on two days a week in order to conserve the nation's beef supplies. In Australia, one of the world's major wheat suppliers, drought has cut production by nearly one-third. And so on down the list. In the less developed nations of the world we have had an increase of food production of 1 per cent, whereas population has increased by 4 per cent.

In some of the countries that are asking for more food we are seeing at the same time more wastage of food. A lot of food is wasted in this country. The food and agricultural organization of the United Nations has reported that the world's underdeveloped countries are falling behind in the race to match food output with growing populations. United Nations' experts estimate that roughly the same number of people remain undernourished today as ten years ago, namely, between 300 million and 500 million people. Yet we consumers in Canada think we should have lower food prices, having discouraged food production in this country and with most parts of the world being short of food.

No matter what this committee does we will not get cheaper food. The government thinks it can control inflation and thus lower food prices across the board. I say in this they have failed completely. As I started out to say, we are in the midst of a rapidly spiralling rate of inflation.

What will this proposed committee do, Mr. Speaker? I know it will concern itself mainly with the cost of meat. In view of the modern trends in meat production, meat processing and meat cutting, there will be some bad news for the Canadian consumer. Meat cutters are demanding $6 an hour to cut meat. A trend we will be seeing in the near future in slaughtering houses in the pre-cutting of meat in order to eliminate the $6 an hour meat-cutting that takes place in supermarkets and food chains. This will cause more wastage of beef, more spoilage and thus higher prices. The simple fact is that this is the trend today, and this committee will not be able to do anything about it.

A prices review board has been recommended. I recall the Prices and Incomes Commission did not really solve any problems. Six years ago a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons brought in a report having studied this question for two years, and their suggestion was the creation of a consumer affairs department. The consumer affairs department has increased the cost of food to Canadian consumers. The only thing that the consumer affairs department has done is to set up what I call a quasi-ombudsman to whom people write letters of complaint. The government has thus used its friendly persuasion on some companies to live up to the paper guarantees they have been giving out. However, through its regulations and controls the department of consumer affairs has increased the cost of food.

The prices review board suggested by the socialist party will take more people out of production and put them into management control and regulation. These people have to be paid. The more people we take out of the production of food, the higher the price paid for that food. This socialist concept of a marketing board actually increases the number of middlemen between farmer and market and, as I say, these middlemen have to be paid. Many people think that the problems of egg marketing are now solved because we have a marketing board. The rising price of feed grain would have kept the situation in balance, but the government did not leave it alone. They paid the farmers to get out of chicken production or to reduce production, just as they paid farmers to get out of wool production and reduced the subsidy on lamb.

We are not encouraging sufficient farmers to get into beef production. Nor are we encouraging sufficient farmers to get into hog production. We are afraid to encourage production of this sort. Under the small farms program, $3,000 will be given to farmers who get out of production and sell their land. Many of these small farms could produce any number of commodities, something that must be encouraged.

Another aspect of socialism in society today is that our city planners have devised a neat system for doing away with the corner-store through the erection of shopping centres. These shopping centres comprise malls in which you can spend all day. There is no snow to shovel and there are check-rooms for your coats. Who pays for all this? The consumer pays for this convenience, of course. I suggest the next time hon. members visit such a shopping centre they take a look at how the food is packaged. More and more pre-cut and pre-cooked food is on sale today, and more and more consumers are buying it. More and more people are eating out than ever before, and the trend is continuing.

This is part of the modern society we are living in. If a prices and review board places a freeze at the top, I suggest this will not change the trend. We cannot do away with large shopping centres and chain stores now supplying food. The cost will be there and the mark-up of 10 per cent or 20 per cent, whatever it is, for the distribution of food will still remain. If we put a ceiling on top, the farmer gets hurt. If he cannot make money by producing, and live the way other Canadians in other segments of our society are living, he will get out of the business. Farmers have been doing this because they have no encouragement to stay. What will happen when they get out of the business? We will depend more and more on world markets for food. We will not be importing 12 per cent of our beef; we will be importing 20 per cent. We will not be importing 90 per cent of our lamb; we will be importing 100 per cent. This will apply to hogs and everything else.

If we want to lower food prices in Canada, we must encourage production. If food is produced right here at home, the people of Canada can eat more cheaply than people in other parts of the world, because we will not have the transportation costs. If we discourage the production of food in Canada, we will encourage increased prices. If we allow inflation to run away and spiral upwards, that will result in increased food prices and the whole economy will be hurt.

If this committee is to do anything, let it hire experts to delve into the costs of distribution of food in this country. If the committee resorts to some kind of additional control, that will be wrong. What happened in Russia? They have experienced the worst crop in years because of controls. China has not done well, and other countries have had problems in respect of food supplies. The United States has not faced this difficulty, and Canada has not yet; but if we move along the socialist line we will have trouble.

The great province of Saskatchewan produces wheat but I suggest it has not intensified its agricultural industry enough, because of socialism. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) state recently that the province of Saskatchewan is intensifying its production. I hope it does. But I suggest that socialism, regulations and controls are not the answer. We must encourage more production in the country. If we then keep a check on distribution costs, we might have lower prices.

Let me end where I began. It will be a sad thing for the Canadian consumer, with food shortage and world hunger as it is today, if this committee cannot bring about a lowering of food prices in this country within the next six months or a year, because the world shortage of food will not disappear that quickly.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, judging from the tone of the comments of my friend to the right, it seems that this committee on food prices is off to a very bad start. It does not look as though any one of those members has any idea what to do about the rising cost of food, nor do they appear to have any faith in an investigation which might be of help.

I remember all the brave talk during the election campaign about how awful the Liberals were, and how the Conservatives would do something about bringing a downward trend in the cost of food. We are now starting off with a tough job before the committee, but even before it meets we are faced with all kinds of motions and speeches designed to frustrate its efforts. We hear all kinds of things about what we cannot do, about how hopeless the task is and how nothing will be done. I must conclude, sadly, that we are not to have a good start in this investigation.

When I first looked at the amendment of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) I was almost inclined to go along with it as a rather good joke. I should like to know what the Conservative party means when it says it will not go along with the establishment of a joint committee of the House of Commons and the other place. I like a good joke and I would like to go along with it, but I must control myself. I think I must remind them of something they are always bringing to our attention and vote on the side of morality.

I listened very carefully to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and I certainly would not want to raise any question about other people's motives, because we should not do that. I hope he does not mind if I express a few suspicions. Perhaps I might be allowed to wonder aloud why they have moved this kind of motion. I ask them why they do not want members of the Senate to participate. They are not in favour of abolishing the Senate. Perhaps they think the Senate is overworked and they do not want to put these gentlemen to the difficulty of coming to the committee. With that in mind, perhaps they feel we should exclude members of the Senate out of solicitude for the other place.

My party takes the position that we do not need the Senate and we think it should be abolished. Therefore, when we have on occasion moved amendments excluding Senators from committees, we have been able to explain our position. I should like to know the reason which leads the Conservative Party to move a motion excluding members of the other place.

[Mr. Horner (Crowfoot).]

I hate to raise this question, but I do so only because my friends to the right have continually reminded us about the danger we get into when we associate with undesirables. I listened very carefully to hon. members to my right and took their remarks to heart because even at my age I do not want to be considered impure. I am not sure that some of my colleagues would not feel that by supporting an amendment of this kind they would become involved in some kind of incestuous relationship with our friends to the right. I do not know how they would look upon that lapse in purity.

I do not know how the Conservatives can explain a motion of this kind which sort of arouses the sympathy and support of members of the New Democratic Party, particularly considering the terrible socialists from Saskatchewan, Manitoba and, now, British Columbia. The woods are full of them! I do not know how these members will go back to their constituencies and explain this consorting with terrible socialists. The next thing we know, they will be moving an amendment to incorporate the Regina manifesto. I must hasten to add that this would not work because there is a Winnipeg declaration which supersedes that manifesto. I want to prevent hon. members to my right getting into that position.

An hon. Member: It is our motion. Put your vote where your mouth is.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: You fellows are becoming such radicals that I do not wonder you want to exclude the other place from a committee of the House of Commons. I do not know what things are coming to.

Some hon. Members: Let's vote.

Mr. Nowlan: You are perpetuating this problem by your speech.

Mr. Saltsman: I am raising these questions only because I want you to help me out of the dilemma you have placed me in. You have placed before us a motion that kind of appeals to me, but I am wondering why you are changing your spots so quickly. I do not know why, and I have been asking myself why. You will have to excuse me if you think I have a suspicious mind, but the truth is that I have. I wonder whether we would have this amendment before us if the majority of the other place was Conservative rather than Liberal.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Saltsman: I would appreciate hearing from the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, publicly or privately, as to whether his view would be changed if the circumstances were otherwise. My party has never been very fussy about the other place, but I happen to have been a member of the Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Consumer Food Prices. To tell the truth, I was far more worried about the intention of the Conservatives on that committee to shaft anything we were attempting to do, than the Senate—much to my surprise.

I think you will have to excuse me when I say that my colleagues and I in this party instinctively sympathize with the underdog. I realize it stretches the imagination to consider the Senate as an underdog, but when I look at this motion and think how ungrateful it is in respect of friends and colleagues, I feel I must say something in an effort to put the matter in perspective. It might be misunderstood if I were simply to abstain or did not vote. Therefore, I prefer to offer an explanation, as a new member of this House who is anxious to learn and avoid making errors.

In fact, those from the other place who served on that committee did a good job. Senator Croll, the chairman of the committee, was far more to the left and far more eager to get things going than, I regret to say, were members of the Conservative party. Maybe they were shocked by the situation and wished to redress the balance. But in the final analysis, the reason the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was established was that the vote of one Senator swung it that way. I do not know whether that is a fair commentary on the Senate or on the Conservative party, but nevertheless that is the way it is.

The reasons advanced in explanation of the amendment are not totally satisfactory to me. I think perhaps my friends to the right have done a cute bit of grandstanding that everybody will see through. I ask those who point the finger at us and say, "Where are your CCF-ers, New Democrats and men of principle?" When they see an opportunity to provide a little embarrassment, "Where is the principle of the Conservative party?" I regret to say that these stalwarts to my right, these hon. gentlemen, have in fact placed statesmanship over principle.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief remarks concerning the amendment moved this afternoon by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence). The proposition placed before the House on behalf of the government was moved at about three o'clock by my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), recommending that a joint committee of the House of Commons and of the Senate be established to inquire into food prices in Canada.

We proposed that proposition and made that recommendation to the House because we believe, on the basis of experience, that members of the other place could make a contribution to an inquiry of this kind. We were justified in that belief because of the results of the last joint committee inquiry into prices in which Senators, including Senator Croll, made a very important contribution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Probably no person in Canadian public life, other than possibly the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), has been more identified with the interests of the consumer than Senator Croll. It was because of this we recommended to the House that the other place join with us in this inquiry. The hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) justified that conclusion, because he admitted quite frankly that the members of the other place did make a contribution. Now simply because 20 minutes later the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham presented an amendment to this House to the effect that we do not want the Senate, we on this side see no reason, either because of his argument or any evidence adduced since, to depart from the proposition put to the House by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I attempted to anticipate what might happen in this House. I must say I was only partly correct in my prediction. I knew there was an amendment to come. I told myself there would be an amendment to delete the participation of the Senate. I expected that amendment to come from members of the New Democratic Party. Imagine my surprise when the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, attempting to cast himself in the raiment of a radical just fresh from his association with all the financial and industrial interests of Bay Street, asks us to believe him when he says he does not believe the Senate ought to participate in this inquiry.

When the leader of the New Democratic Party stated in Toronto that the Conservative party would vote for the communist manifesto, I thought he was going too far. But I think his criticism was moderate in light of the about-face that was presented to the House today by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham of the official opposition. We have been charged with accepting stolen goods. Well, this is a great act of theft on the part of the Conservative party from the members of the New Democratic Party. I do not want to go on further in that vein.

The Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) made proposals to the constitutional conference in respect of the Constitution of Canada in which the government proposed that the Senate would continue as an integral part of the Canadian constitution and as part of our parliamentary system. A joint committee of the House of Commons and of the Senate studied the constitution and in its conclusions recommended the continuance of the Senate as part of the essential constitution of Canada. The members of the NDP have never accepted that proposition. Members of the official opposition, I understand, have accepted that proposition and it seems to me it is highly contradictory that in this move they should attempt to deny members of the other place the right to participate in a traditional role which they have performed under our system.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: We regard this for what it is, a cute little bit of grandstanding, an effort on the part of the official opposition to feel out the contours of the NDP bed. We do not deny them that pleasure for the weekend.

We cannot support this amendment. It is obvious from the speeches which have been made that probably the amendment will carry, and if it does carry we will accept the consequences.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. MacEachen: We will accept the consequences and attempt to make a committee of the House work constructively in this inquiry. I believe, in view of the circumstances in which we operate in this House, that we must become accustomed to the kind of development that is facing us tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Lawrence) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment carried. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether with unanimous consent we might forgo the "late show" this evening, in view of the time.

Mr. Speaker: It is not unanimous consent that is required, it is the consent of the three hon. members whose questions are listed on the adjournment proceedings. I believe there is agreement on the part of the hon. members in question to forgo the pleasure of the adjournment proceedings this evening.

It being long after ten o'clock, I do now leave the chair. This House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 10.25 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friray, January 19, 1973

The House met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

HOUSING

PROPOSED STUDY BY COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 43 to seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact the Urban Development Institute states that the shortage of reasonable cost housing in the urban centres of Canada has reached the proportions of a major social tragedy, I move:

That this House order that a standing committee of this House, known as housing and urban affairs, be set up to study matters which fall under the jursidiction of the Department of Housing and Urban Affairs, due to the fact that in some of the major cities of Canada only 4 per cent of the population can afford to buy a new house because of the outrageous cost and prices of same.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CLASSIFICATION OF POSITIONS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43, and I hope that before there are automatic noes from the other side hon. members will listen to the reasonableness of my proposal. In view of the fact it would assist in settling the present postal dispute if parliament were to declare itself on the basic issue, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard):

That the question of amending the Public Service Staff Relations Act to provide for the classification of positions in the federal public service to be subject to collective bargaining, and particularly to grievance and arbitration, be referred forthwith to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: The motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

DECLINE IN DAIRY EXPORTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave of the House to move a motion under Standing Order 43. The urgent and pressing necessity arises out of the continuing decline in our cheese, butter and other dairy exports to the United Kingdom and other European countries as a result of the expansion of the EEC. Therefore, if consent is given, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk):

That the Standing Committee of this House on Agriculture be instructed forthwith to examine the methods by which the drastic decline in Canada's dairy exports to Britain and the EEC countries may be halted, the effects of this decline on Canada's farmers and balance of payments position, and the possibility of finding alternative markets for dairy products.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—PROPOSED RUNWAY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask leave of the House to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. The urgency and necessity of my motion arise out of the apparent misunderstanding of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Davis) of the facts, the law and their responsibilities in respect of the expropriation proceedings at Vancouver International Airport.

Because of the fact that the Cora Brown expropriation hearings were not held as the hearing officer resigned and a new hearing officer has to be appointed and a new date set for hearings in the future, I therefore move, with consent, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Strathcona (Mr. Roche) that:

This House urges the Minister of Transport and the Minister of the Environment to proceed to Vancouver forthwith, there to meet with the members of the public concerned to discuss the expropriation proceedings and procedures and the environmental impact of the proposed runway.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity so the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POSITION RESPECTING IMMEDIATE RELIEF FROM RISING PRICES—UNEMPLOYMENT TARGET FOR 1973

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister arising out of a statement by the Minister of Finance yesterday that he saw no immediate relief from rising prices. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether that represents the policy and attitude of his government, whether the policy of the government is to accept the inevitability of continued increases in prices, and specifically whether this means that the committee the government proposes to set up in respect of food prices is a charade?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The words "immediate relief" I take it were spoken by the minister yesterday and they mean exactly that. The government is not on the verge of announcing price and wage controls, but we have stated repeatedly that it is something for which we have made contingency plans and which we are prepared to envisage when the time comes. Perhaps this committee which is to be set up by the House of Commons will indicate to us its views on that timing.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, if the government listens to that committee it will be the first time it has listened to views on economic policy except from its own advisers. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Finance that any suggestion that the jobless rate will remain at about 6 per cent is pessimistic, would the Prime Minister indicate to the House what the government's target is in respect of lowering unemployment during 1973?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is usual in the speech on the budget for the Minister of Finance to bring more precision to the kind of statement just quoted by the Leader of the Opposition. Perhaps he would wait until that time to hear it.

[Mr. Reynolds.]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's statement, can I have his assurance that in the budget presentation the Minister of Finance will provide the House with a precise statement of the government's objectives with regard to the lowering of unemployment during the year, a precise statement in terms of the percentage that the government hopes and expects to achieve?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot really say how precise it will be. I believe that the Minister of Finance indicated his view on the importance of statistics the other day in answer to a question by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is addressed to the Prime Minister. A few moments ago in reply to the Leader of the Opposition the Prime Minister said the government would be prepared to introduce price and wage controls when the time comes. Would he advise the House how much higher, in his opinion, inflation would have to rise before that time would come?

Mr. Trudeau: I think our position on that is not dissimilar to that of the Leader of the Opposition who has talked about price and wage controls if necessary, but not necessarily.

Mr. Hees: As the Prime Minister's government is responsible for bringing in such controls when the time does come, does he not think he has a responsibility to advise the country when he thinks inflation will be high enough to justify it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River.

DATE OF FORTHCOMING BUDGET

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Prime Minister indicated that something hangs upon the budget, would he now indicate exactly when the budget will be presented?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not remember what I said that hung on the budget—probably the life of the government.

Mr. Stanfield: You did not say that but it is probably true.

Mr. Trudeau: I cannot give an exact date, but the Minister of Finance has discussed dates in cabinet and I feel that very shortly he will be able to make that date public.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for a last supplementary, but I would hope that we would not become involved today in the same situation as yesterday when every frontbencher asked a supplementary at the expense, I suggest, of other hon. members. The hon. member for Trinity may ask a supplementary and then we will go to the hon. member for York South.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister indicate if it is fair to assume from his reply to the House that a 5.1 per cent annual increase in the cost of living index is a rate of inflation which, to quote the words of the Minister of Finance, "does not unduly erode incomes, particularly fixed incomes of Canadians"?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker; I do not think the hon. member should assume that. The government in recent years obviously has taken budgetary postures which were oriented toward the lowering of the rate of inflation. As has been obvious in our past and present policies, we are not happy with the rate of inflation. What we are saying is that it is not absolutely certain that price and wage controls at this particular time are the best way to stop that rate of inflation.

AMENDMENTS TO ACT INVOLVING DEFINITION OF "SUITABLE EMPLOYMENT", ETC.—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DRAFT AND PRESENT REGULATIONS—RECONSIDERATION OF PROPOSALS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two questions for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which he introduced on Wednesday seem to expand the discretion and powers of the Unemployment Insurance Commission with respect to the definition of certain matters now in the act, would the minister undertake to table the draft regulations being prepared to define "suitable employment" and other matters which are intended to go to the commission so that when we reach the debate on the bill we may know exactly what the intentions are?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take that suggestion into consideration very sympathetically regardless of whether it will be draft regulations or in another form, but I will wish to convey to hon. members what the ideas in the minds of the commissioners are with regard to that part of the amendments because I realize the tremendous importance of the discretionary powers with regard to applicants. I want hon. members to assist in advising us how the matter should be handled.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the interrogation—that is not too strong a word—of unemployment insurance applicants has already tightened the net and made many innocent unemployed people extremely unhappy, as well as having delayed the obtaining of benefits, has this been done as a result of the changing of rules and regulations and, if so, would the minister table those rules, regulations or directives that may have gone out from the Unemployment Insurance Commission to field officers, or any other information that would help us to know the basis on which action has so far been taken?

Mr. Andras: I wonder if the hon. member would permit me to take that question as notice, examine it in all its implications and get back to him.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that information was given to the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee yesterday and other information has been published that the number of people who abused the old regulations is, relatively, a very small proportion of the total, and in view of the fact that the proposals in Bill C-125 threaten the welfare of all the unemployed and propose powers for the employer that might have serious consequences for workers, may I ask the minister whether he and his advisers would reconsider some of the proposals now contained in Bill C-125 instead of proposing Draconian measures that would undoubtedly hurt many innocent people?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I would much prefer to have that whole subject matter debated thoroughly. I would hope that the hon. member's interpretation is based on too quick an analysis of the measures that we are proposing in the amendments to the act. I do not think that at this stage I would be prepared to commit myself to withdrawing them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse. I see four or five frontbenchers who have supplementary questions on this matter and I will recognize them subsequently.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ACCELERATION OF STUDY OF PROJECTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the acute unemployment problem and the fact that the government has invited the people to take an active part in the LIP projects, will the minister take the necessary steps to speed up the study of projects submitted so that they might be implemented as soon as possible?

• (1120)

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have already tried to reply to similar questions by many hon. members. I can advise the hon. member that we are now committed to $135 million of the total allocation of $165 million. I might also mention my favourite program's progress. The on-the-job training program is only subscribed to the extent of just under $13 million and there is a $50 million allocation for that, approvals for which we would like to see accelerated.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary.

In view of the figures the minister has just given us, I shall be more specific in my question. I know the figures that have been published but I would like to ask whether the department staff could not work more diligently that an answer might be given more quickly with regard to projects submitted and that they might be implemented as quickly as possible?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think this is a matter of opinion. It is certainly our desire to proceed with the implementation of the projects as quickly as possible and provide our advice of approval to sponsors of projects. In my opinion, under the circumstances the progress made to date compares favourably with last year.

DISCUSSION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the far-reaching social effects of the minister's proposed amendments, particularly when he says there will be a saving of $100 million, did he, in keeping with the practice of his predecessor, have any discussions with his provincial counterparts regarding the amendments he has now introduced in Bill C-125?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, that consultation has not taken place yet but it is being considered.

Mr. Alexander: In view of the fact there has been some concern about one of the expressions in the bill, which was not in the act, namely, "without just cause", has the minister had an opportunity during the past year to come up with a definition of that phrase by way of regulation, and will this be made available to the committee for its consideration?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is yes, and there is jurisprudence in this matter. I might add with regard to the application of that particular amendment that the wording is not different from what is in the present act. The real change is in the degree of postponement of benefits.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ALLEGED DELAY IN CONSIDERING APPLICATIONS FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Bellechasse. Can the Minister of Manpower and Immigration tell the House why it was in British Columbia that his department ordered the postponement of applications from municipalities?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the first approvals for municipal projects under the local initiatives program in British Columbia were granted on December 14. In all fairness I might add that I have requested people on my staff to contact the hon. member for details, which I have not been able to get. I would certainly react if I could get the specifics of his concern.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGENDA—PARTICIPATION BY MUNICIPAL REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs in reference to the tri-level national housing conference that is going to be held on Monday. In light of the fact the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities are very disappointed that they will not be able to participate, may I ask the minister whether the agenda has been agreed to by him and the provinces, and would he be prepared to file that agenda today? While he is on his feet, will he also tell us whether or not mayors and other municipal representatives will be able to participate in the conference and not just be there as observers?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I hope to publish the agenda today. I certainly hope it will be such as to allow all provinces and all participants to put forward whatever points of view they wish. One province has for the moment expressed a reservation about one item on the agenda, and I would like to clear that up before the agenda is published. If it is not made available today then this will certainly be done on Monday. I reiterate my hope that the agenda is so structured as to allow all points of view to be fully expressed.

With regard to the question of municipal representatives, I have expressed the hope in letters as far back as last September that provincial delegations would include municipal representatives. I think that was the proper position for me to take, and I would strongly urge the provinces to do that. I would also hope, and I will be proposing on Monday, that for the future there be a different system for the inclusion of municipal representatives. I refer hon. members to my speech of January 11th when I indicated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: There is just so much we can take.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—REQUEST THAT MEMBERS OF CONSERVATIVE HOUSING COMMITTEE BE ALLOWED TO ATTEND AS OBSERVERS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the importance of the federal-provincial housing conference to be held on Monday and Tuesday, will the minister make the necessary arrangements for members of the Progressive Conservative housing committee to attend as observers?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the conference is a conference between governments and hon. members opposite are not the government.

An hon. Member: Not yet.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—STAFF INVOLVED IN MAKING PREPARATIONS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the well known rivalry between officials in your ministry and officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stevens: —would the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member please resume his seat. Questions should be directed to the Chair. Hon. members should not put questions to a minister directly but should address themselves to the Chair. I make this remark for the benefit of all hon. members. Perhaps we should keep that in mind when posing questions.

Mr. Stevens: Would the minister inform the House whether he has relied mainly upon the staff of his own ministry or upon the staff of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in making preparations for the forthcoming conference?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that such a question can be asked at this time. This is debate, and I have serious doubts. We could go on for a long time with questions of this kind.

POSSIBLE REGIONAL TRI-LEVEL CONFERENCES—PAYMENT OF COST

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker, concerning the matter of tri-level conferences. We are now talking about a conference which ought properly to be a tri-level one. Can the minister inform the House whether the first large tri-level conference held last fall, which was supposed to act as a kind of broody hen for further regional tri-level conferences, has indeed brought forth this kind of issue? Are such conferences now planned, if so, how many, and does the government propose to help support the cost of these conferences?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for the conference held in Toronto the government bore and for future ones will bear a very substantial portion of the cost. I will be attending a planning meeting in Halifax in two weeks time to organize a second national tri-level meeting. I have had discussions in Toronto with the former provincial treasurer, Mr. MacNaughton, about plans for an Ontario regional tri-level conference, but to date that is the only province which has indicated a desire to hold such a regional conference. I stand ready to participate in the organization of conferences in the other four regions.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—AVAILABILITY OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT TO PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Has the minister made available, or will he do so before next Monday's federal-provincial conference on housing, to provincial government representatives his proposed amendments to the National Housing Act and the mortgage financing legislation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, an outline of the proposals will be given to provincial delegates. This will not be the precise bill because parliament would be entitled to the bill first, but the proposals that the government will be putting forward—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PURCHASE OF LAND TO ESTABLISH LAND BANKS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): I have a supplementary question for the same minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the lack of serviced land is clearly at the root of the housing problem and in view of the fact the minister has appropriated $500 million over five years—and I was going to say that is supposed to be a drop in the bucket but maybe it is only a fifth of a drop—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member ask the question?

Mr. Blenkarn: Will the minister advise the House to which city of or cities in Canada he will be allocating this $100 million per annum?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, I have doubts about a question such as this. I have noticed that some of the answers given by the minister have been rather long but perhaps they have had to be in light of the questions that have been asked. If the minister replied to a question such as this one I think he would be giving a statement which normally ought to be made on motions. The hon. member might like to rephrase the question.

• (1130)

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, will the government be buying land in and around metropolitan Toronto, land that the hon. member for York South has said is owned by large corporations, sometimes referred to as "bums".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we will be allocating very substantial increases in funds for land assembly and new communities. The location of the land to be purchased is a matter for consultation in a co-operative way with provincial and local governments.

Mr. Woolliams: Everybody knows that $100 million will not buy a land bank in Toronto.

POST OFFICE

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—EXAMINATION OF ISSUES BY CONCILIATION BOARD CHAIRMAN

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Can the minister tell us whether the chairman of the conciliation board is now in Ottawa examining the questions which are in dispute between the government and the unions and whether any progress has been made?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, he is now studying the question and we expect an answer over the weekend.

[English]

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—SUGGESTION THAT PRIME MINISTER TAKE ACTION TO ACHIEVE EARLY AGREEMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Now that the Postmaster General has committed the government to accepting the report of the conciliation board without amendments and in view of the positive vote of the postal workers on the same report, will the right hon. gentleman use his good offices to urge the President of the Treasury Board to instruct the negotiating team to reach early agreement on the matter, thus ending the present charade, so that the sorely tried Canadian public might be assured of at least a semblance of postal service?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Prime Minister might answer the question, although I have some doubts as to the terms in which it was framed.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I discussed this matter this morning with the Postmaster General. I feel that the good offices of both ministers are being used.

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—STEPS TO GET PARTIES TO RESUME NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General, Mr. Speaker. Now that Mr. Shime is back on the job, is the minister prepared to take whatever steps are necessary, including showing a more reasonable attitude, in order to get the parties back to the negotiating table so that we can be assured that there will be no further disruptions in postal service in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that Vancouver employees voted in favour of returning to work and have in fact already done so. I have also been informed that several employees want to do likewise in the Toronto area.

I believe union representatives should follow the example of their members and return to the negotiation table to sign a contract that we are also ready to sign.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUGGESTED EARLY INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO STAFF RELATIONS ACT AND REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would he not again consider using his good offices to urge upon his colleagues, particularly the government House leader, a change in attitude with respect to the priority they attach to amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act, so that they might be referred to the appropriate standing committee with a view to removing some of the difficulties that seem to arise in negotiations between the government and its various departments?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter of the order in which House business proceeds is discussed frequently by the leader of the House and myself. I will get in touch with him on this and other matters.

PUBLIC WORKS

EROSION ON ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—REQUEST TO MODIFY STANDARDS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF RETAINING WALLS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works.

Is the minister considering a change in the standards governing retaining walls along the banks of the St. Lawrence river?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not the government's present policy to change the standards as they are quite clear. When erosion is caused either by shipping or by the carrying out of federal works, the federal government is responsible. However, in the case of erosion due to natural causes, the owner himself has to repair his property.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question. Does the department consider building, in the near future, a retaining wall on the north shore of the St. Lawrence?

Mr. Speaker: This question could be put on the order paper. If the hon. member feels that there is some urgency, it could be discussed at the time of adjournment.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROTESTS RESPECTING PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Has he received protests from Canadian union leaders against the amendments to the unemployment insurance legislation proposed by the government?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

BAN ON WHALING—CLOSING OF NOVA SCOTIA PLANT—COMPENSATION TO OWNERS AND EMPLOYEES—ESTABLISHMENT OF NEW INDUSTRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. Since some 67 per cent of the production of the Blandford, Nova Scotia, whaling plant was sold for human consumption and the closing down of this industry places some one hundred shore employees plus ships' crews out of employment, is it the government's intention to establish a new industry in this area to take care of this unemployment, and will compensation be paid to the owners of the whaling plant and its employees?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we are looking into measures of the nature of adjustment assistance to help the owners of the property and also to assist the employees to find alternative occupations.

REQUEST FOR COMPENSATION TO FISHERMEN BECAUSE OF DECLINE IN TOTAL CATCH

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. It is more a related than a supplementary question. In view of the 25 per cent decline in the total fish catch in the Atlantic provinces and in view of what appear to be very serious ice conditions this year which will further reduce the catch, what steps is the minister taking to compensate the fishermen who will suffer severe financial loss as a result of these two factors?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report that the total income of fishermen on the east coast is up appreciably; it is up by 10 per cent over that of last year.

Mr. McGrath: You will not get anywhere with that kind of flippant answer, Jack.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Provencher has a supplementary to a previous question.

MANPOWER

ON-THE-JOB TRAINING PROGRAM—REASONS FOR LACK OF APPLICATIONS

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. The minister mentioned yesterday in the House, as well as today, that he was concerned that the department is not receiving an adequate number of applications for on-the-job training. Has the minister checked with officials in his department as to what might be some of the possible reasons for the lack of applications?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are having those discussions.

Mr. Epp: Would the minister please check whether or not officials from his department are asking businessmen and small businesses in rural areas questions which simply force these businessmen to opt out of the program because of the types of questions that are being asked?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton.

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE THAT USE OF PILOTS IN OPEN WATERS ON GREAT LAKES WILL NOT BE ELIMINATED

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the act of rising today gives me more exercise than I have had in three weeks. I have a question for the Minister of Transport. As foreign vessels using the Great Lakes often carry cargoes which are potentially dangerous pollutants, in view of the danger of collisions or groundings will the minister assure the House and the country that the use of pilots in the open waters of the Great Lakes will not be eliminated?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no question for the time being of eliminating the pilots.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PROMOTION BY COMPANY OF INSTALLATION OF EXTENSION TELEPHONES

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. As Bell Canada's November, 1972, campaign for the installation of additional telephone extensions free of charge will result in a number of exchanges being placed in more expensive monthly rate brackets, and as Bell customers were at no time advised that such action could result, has the minister considered undertaking an investigation under section 37 of the Combines Investigation Act dealing with misleading advertising?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have the officials of the department look into the matter.

Mr. Grier: Will the minister consider making a statement on motions within the next day or so?

Mr. Gray: I will be happy to see what information I can provide to the hon. member on this matter.

AIRPORTS

MOUNT HOPE, ONTARIO—RECONSIDERATION OF EXPANSION PLANS

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Last week I had the pleasure of asking the minister whether the government was reconsidering its plans for the expansion of Mount Hope airport and the minister provided me with an interesting reply relating to Pickering airport. In keeping with the generous and congenial attitude of the official opposition I shall now assume that the minister knows the location of Mount Hope airport and ask him whether the government has decided to cancel its plans for expansion of that airport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to cancel the expansion of Mount Hope airport. I think that construction is supposed to start some time in the spring. In the meantime we are ready to receive suggestions or recommendations from interested parties. I would like to know whether the hon. member has any opinion on this matter.

• (1140)

Mr. O'Sullivan: Can the minister inform the House whether his willingness to receive suggestions includes the holding of public hearings?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, before resorting to public hearings I might be interested—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: What do you mean, resorting?

Mr. Crouse: Have you never heard of the grass roots?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, we might first have the opinions of Members of Parliament who contend that they have been elected by the people, so if the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Mr. Grier.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May we have order please. The hon. member for Lethbridge has caught the Speaker's eye.

ROYAL VISIT

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER RECOMMEND THAT THE QUEEN INCLUDE FORT MACLEOD IN ITINERARY

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I really appreciate that. My red jacket is no reflection on Your Honour's capability as Speaker. It is because of your statement regarding supplementaries that I am now on my feet. I wish to address this question to the Prime Minister in the name of the people of the first home of the Northwest Mounted Police in Alberta. As both the RCMP and Fort MacLeod are celebrating their centenaries starting in June of this year, and as Her Majesty will be here during the time the musical ride will be performed in Fort MacLeod, will the Prime Minister recommend to Her Majesty the Queen that she seriously consider placing Fort MacLeod on her itinerary?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will realize that Her Majesty's schedule in Canada was established for a set number of days quite a few months ago. I think it is good that she has accepted to spend two days in the west, one in Alberta and one in Saskatchewan, to associate herself with the centennial of the RCMP. As to Her Majesty's exact movements in those provinces, I will gladly transmit the hon. member's suggestion to her. However, hon. members will have to realize that she cannot be everywhere in that one day. The hon. member will also realize that there are representations made on behalf of the premier of that province that she be elsewhere than Fort MacLeod on that day. I will transmit this suggestion to the Palace to see if it can be included in her schedule.

Mr. Hurlburt: Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the Prime Minister that Fort MacLeod was established in 1874 and Calgary was established in 1875.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED DISPOSAL OF OLD BARGES BY PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT IN LAKE OKANAGAN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of the Environment. Can the minister inform the House whether it is now government policy, on behalf of the environment, to bury all old barges and other refuse in beautiful Lake Okanagan?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question asked in those terms cannot be in order. The hon. member may wish to rephrase his question.

Mr. Reynolds: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will address this question to the Minister of Public Works. Did the Department of Public Works in fact bury three old barges in beautiful Lake Okanagan in late November, 1972?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question should be placed on the order paper.

[Later:]

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr.Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Earlier there was reference to three derelict barges having been sunk in Lake Okanagan in November. Before this method of disposal was decided upon, was there any consultation with the Department of the Environment? If so, did it receive the approval of the Department of the Environment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As we are dealing with something that happened a few months ago, that type of question normally ought to be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency, it can be considered at the time of adjournment.

DEVELOPMENT OF NEW GUIDELINES FOR TRANSPORTATION OF LIVESTOCK THROUGH COMMITTEE STUDY—REMOVAL OF CONTROL FROM CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister say whether there will be a special committee established to develop new guidelines for the safe, efficient transportation of livestock, particularly feeder cattle, and will legislation be presented to regulate this through the Department of Agriculture and remove it from the Criminal Code?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): That is under study at present, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister assure the House that the procedures followed in shipping cattle in 1972 will again be allowed in 1973 until new guidelines are established?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, until the legislation is changed the rules which have been in effect will remain in effect. As the Minister of Agriculture indicated, we are seriously looking at the question of the rules. We now have a report from a committee which we established to look at both the economics of the situation and the humane elements involved. These recommendations will soon emerge in the form of recommendations to the House.

FISHERIES

FRESHWATER FISH MARKETING CORPORATION—INVESTIGATION BY STANDING COMMITTEE OF OPERATIONS AND DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In light of recent events associated with the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, including the resignation and dismissal of a large number of the senior staff and the unfavourable profit and loss picture of that corporation, does the minister intend to refer the matter of the administration and operation of that corporation to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for investigation and report?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. As hon. members know, we have encountered management problems in that joint federal-provincial crown company's operations. This matter must be referred to the committee because of the financial losses involved.

FISHERIES

CONSTRUCTION ON WEST COAST OF VESSELS FOR SERVICE IN THAT AREA

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. It concerns additional fishing patrol vessels. In answer to the question, does this mean more work for Vancouver and Victoria shipbuilders, the minister stated over CJVI in Victoria on January 11 that certainly vessels to be operated on the west coast would be built on the west coast. In view of this, does the minister now wish to amend or correct the answer he gave to my question on January 17?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): In no way, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—PROPOSED PEACEKEEPING FORCE—NATURE OF CANADIAN ELEMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, before addressing my question to the Minister of National Defence I wish to thank you on behalf of those who sit at the back, whether we wear scarlet jackets or not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Can the Minister of National Defence inform the House whether the group that, according to information provided to the House within the past few days, is being prepared for a possible hasty departure to Viet Nam was formed as a result of voluntary option or selected by nomination from which there was no appeal? In other words, is it a volunteer or draft force?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the House that there are a number of contingency plans depending upon our requirements. All of those who would be going to Viet Nam, if the government should decide that is what they should do, would be going as volunteers.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Will the minister then inform us if it is true, as I have heard, that discharges—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question cannot be asked in those terms. The hon. member cannot ask the minister to clarify a statement made outside the House.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES—REQUEST THAT ACT OR REGULATIONS BE AMENDED TO ENSURE THAT PROMISED OLD AGE PENSION INCREASE NOT DEDUCTED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Is the minister giving consideration to an amendment to the War Veterans Allowance Act or to the regulations under that act to make sure that when there is the promised substantial increase in the old age pension this will not be subtracted from the war veterans allowance but will result in an actual addition to the income of our war veterans?

• (1150)

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, may I say that this question is now under study in the department.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE REINSTATEMENT OF FULL NAME ON "K" DIVISION HEADQUARTERS BUILDING, EDMONTON

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the previous reference to the RCMP and is directed to the Solicitor General. Bearing in mind the strong reaction throughout western Canada against changing the designation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, will the minister order the immediate reinstatement of the RCMP name in a size big enough to be seen on "K" division headquarters in Edmonton, which only yesterday reported having received no directive yet?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that there was never any intention to change the name of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Certainly I have no intention of changing the name. With respect to the signs on buildings, the RCMP is now consulting with the Attorneys General of the different provinces where the RCMP act as provincial police to see what kind of sign is most suitable in the provinces. As soon as those consultations are concluded the new sign will be installed.

Mr. Roche: Will the minister bear in mind that the prolonged delay in restoring the full designation of the RCMP is a continuing source of public friction and concern in this centennial year of the RCMP?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation or debate and I do not think the matter should be pursued.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. I regret having to call orders of the day. I appreciate that a number of members have supplementaries either to this question or to others. I will try particularly to give priority in the next question period to the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich and others.

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Roy (Timmins): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Since the beginning of the session, the French-speaking members have had a hard time obtaining their copies of Hansard before the beginning of the sitting. I would ask you to be kind enough to see that French copies of Hansard are distributed before the beginning of the sitting.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize that since the opening of parliament, especially when the sittings began at eleven o'clock, it was difficult to obtain a translation for ten or eleven o'clock. From now on, as in the past, the French and English versions of Hansard will be available very early the next day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOOD PRICES

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

The House resumed, from Thursday, January 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray:

That a special committee of this House be appointed to inquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends;

That 20 members of the House of Commons to be designated by the House at a later date be the members of the Special Committee and that Standing Order 65(5) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; to engage the services of counsel, accountants and such other clerical and technical personnel as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, in view of the fact that last night the House decided this committee might well be composed only of members of the House of Commons, perhaps we could facilitate the commencement of the proceedings of the committee and, through the usual channels before too long a time has elapsed, add by mutual arrangement an amendment to the motion setting out who will be the members on the committee. I raise this point now in the hope that members of all parties, through the usual channels, might have this kind of discussion, instead of having to come back with a further motion respecting those members who will be asked to sit on the committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might say a word on the same point of order. We would be quite glad to participate in such discussions so that the names of the members can be added to the motion, avoiding the necessity for another motion being made later. I wonder whether those discussions could also include the number of members on the committee. I do not wish to upstage the suggestion of the Progressive Conservatives for a committee of 19, but I should like to suggest that the number be 28 or 30, now that there are no Senators on the committee. This would give better representation to all parties in the House. However, I am merely suggesting that this matter be included in the discussions suggested by the Progressive Conservative House leader.

Mr. Speaker: As I understand the suggestions that have been made by the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, there will be discussions to consider certain aspects of the motion before the House. I assume that these discussions will take place, but for the time being we will proceed with consideration of the motion before us.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House today is very similar to a motion placed on the order paper by the government in 1966 calling for the setting up at that time of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons. I listened with great interest to the speech by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) in leading off the debate, but I am sorry to say that I found nothing new in what he had to say. His remarks were very similar to the speech made by the government representative in 1966 when a similar motion was introduced.

I was impressed, however, with the very excellent speech by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), and I might say that as a consequence of his intervention we now have before us a much more workable proposition, which hopefully will end up in the establishment of a much more workable committee. I listened as well with great interest, as I always try to do, to the speech by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). She has established herself in this House as an articulate and dedicated spokesman on consumer affairs. Hon. members of the government would do well to pay more attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

As I have said, this is not the first time that we have had a proposition like this put before us. I have already referred to the joint Senate and House of Commons committee set up in 1966 on April 21. This committee was given terms of reference almost identical to those we have before us today. Indeed, the terms of reference were identical to those of the committee that the government proposed to set up before the amendment placed before the House by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham was accepted last night.

It is interesting to look at the workings of that 1966 committee. As I say, it was set up in April of 1966. Its terms of reference were changed from the original consumer credit study to enable the committee to look into food prices. It submitted what was termed a progress report, which was in fact its final report, on April 25, 1967. The committee met on 59 different occasions in the city of Ottawa between September 28, 1966 and February 1967. In addition, the committee was constituted into two subcommittees in order to facilitate its work. It went across the country holding public hearings in 12 of the principal cities of Canada and the major recommendation to come out of that committee, as is a matter of record, was the establishment of the department of consumer affairs.

We then had the Senate committee on poverty which also did excellent work. It was set up on November 26, 1968 and submitted its report in the fall of 1970. This was a study of poverty in Canada, but anybody who has read the report and followed the deliberations of that committee will know it had to concern itself with the general proposition of the cost of food as it related to poverty in Canada. The two are interrelated.

Going back to 1966, we saw the establishment of a royal commission by the governments of the three prairie provinces to look into food prices. This committee, after exhaustive studies, issued its report in March, 1968. It, too, is a matter of record. About the same time a royal commission was at work in my own province of Newfoundland, again examining the high cost of living and the cost of food. Then, there was another senate committee study, undertaken by the Senate Committee on Finance. It was empowered by the other place to look into the problems of growth, employment and price stability. The report of that committee is now a matter of record and it contains certain precise recommendations in line with its terms of reference.

Of course, we cannot forget for a moment the late and unlamented Prices and Incomes Commission which was established by the present government as a move to hold the line on inflation. We hear little now about the Prices and Incomes Commission and one wonders what happened to the very substantial organization which was put together as a result of the establishment of that commission. I understand that some parts of this organization are still in existence within the government structure. Perhaps the services of those parts may be very usefully called upon to assist this committee when it embarks upon its study.

I refer to the establishment of these committees and commissions to underline my central point, and that is the advisability of another study at this particular time. Here again I refer and defer to my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, although in doing so I have very serious reservations about just exactly what this committee of the House can hope to achieve, especially in light of the statement which was made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) yesterday at the Federal-Provincial Conference simultaneous to the debate in this House on the setting up of this committee. The minister referred to the fact that he could see no improvement in the general situation so far as increases in food prices in Canada were concerned.

That utterance by the Minister of Finance was well stated today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and leads us to question the motivation of the government in setting up this committee. If the government hopes to be able to sweep the problem under the carpet or have it pigeon-holed in that place where all similar committee studies, reports and recommendations are placed, then it does not have a full appreciation of the constitution of this parliament.

The House of Commons and the members of this place are not prepared, notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance may have had to say yesterday, to see this matter become the subject of pigeon-holding, or to see the deliberations of this committee swept under the carpet. Neither are the members of this House, if I may say so, prepared to see a situation similar to that which we had in 1966 when the committee of the Senate and the House of Commons was set up. I do not think the members of this House are prepared to support what could very well turn out to be, if the government has its way, one big junket across the country for the members of this House. I do not think the members of this House are prepared for that, and neither, if I may say so, are the people of the country prepared to accept it.

There is sufficient data and there have been sufficient studies made, and I think one of the principal objectives of this committee should be to compile the principal recommendations of all of the committees to which I have just referred, because even though they may have been set up a few years ago, their findings and recommendations are still very relevant to the present situation we have in Canada. This is a serious problem, one that is far too serious to be swept under the carpet or to be pigeonholed after a long study by a Commons committee. This is serious because the people of Canada who are suffering the most today from inflation and from an increase in the cost of living are those on lower incomes, on middle incomes and those on fixed incomes; the poor, the working poor and our old age pensioners. We cannot afford to let too much time go by without addressing ourselves to this most serious problem facing our country today.

I happen to come from a province which enjoys the rather dubious distinction of having the highest per capita cost of living in the country and the lowest per capita income in the country. What has happened since this government came into office? About two years ago, we saw the government move to freeze freight rates. The consequence of their failure to do so has been nine increases in freight rates in two years. Every time the railways increase their freight rates, there is a concomitant increase in the cost of living, because an increase in freight rates must be passed on to the consumer who must ultimately pay the cost. Notwithstanding repeated pleas to the government to place an immediate freeze on freight rates, we are on the threshold of having further increases in freight rates. These increases are contributing to the high cost of living we have in the Atlantic provinces and all across Canada, for that matter. They are contributing substantially to the hardships we are imposing upon the poor, those on lower incomes and those on fixed incomes.

While I was encouraged by the reference in the Speech from the Throne to a conference the government proposes to convene with the five regions of the country and their provincial governments, on the whole area of freight rates and the influence freight rates have on the cost of living, I believe the problem is serious enough for the government to take steps now to bring a measure before this House which would place an immediate freeze on freight rates. In that way, the government would be demonstrating its good will and the fact that it is genuinely concerned about this matter. With the constitution of this parliament, who knows how long it will be before such a conference, badly needed as it is, can in fact take place?

Therefore, because of the urgency of the matter, because this is a serious situation, because it has been the subject of parliamentary committee studies before, because it has been the subject of study by royal commissions across the country and by provincial commissions, and in fact because we feel the matter has been studied sufficiently and is an urgent one, and in order to ensure that the committee will conduct itself in light of the urgency of the situation and report promptly to the House, I propose to place an amendment before the House.

I move, therefore, Mr. Speaker, seconded by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer):

That the motion be amended by inserting therein, next after the third paragraph thereof, the following:

"That the said committee shall make its final report and recommendations within the three months next following its appointment."

[Translation]

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, since this is the first time I rise in this House other than at the oral questions period, I should like, first of all, to congratulate you and your Deputy (Mr. McCleave) on your appointment to your respective posts.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, since yesterday I have been listening to the various remarks which have been made on the matter of the special committee of the House on food prices. I have been trying to thread my way through the rather tortuous logic. I could assume that the tortuous logic came from all quarters of the House, but we have had a very good sample of it from the benches immediately to my right. On the one hand, I hear that this is a matter of a crisis and a matter of enormous urgency. Precedents have been cited to the effect that there have been many studies made on the matter of food prices by this House, the other place and by the two places combined. This also leads me to believe the whole matter of food prices is an extremely complex and difficult one, that we really cannot study the whole matter of the rise in food prices within a very short time and make any real analysis of what causes this part of our economy go off kilter every once in a while or, as most housewives would indicate, go off kilter most of the time.

Usually this House and the country is enjoined by the members of the Progressive Conservative party—and here I speak traditionally and historically—to proceed with caution. Surely, it is the function of a Conservative group to advise the nation that care must be taken and haste made but made slowly. Yesterday, however, we heard there was a crisis at hand and heard accusations from the Tory benches to the effect that the government has been doing nothing and that action is needed. Mind you, in all these calls for action there have been no specific suggestions concerning what kind of action should be taken, so what we see now in this House is a shift in the Progressive Conservative "mot d'ordre". It is not a matter of making haste slowly but doing nothing swiftly. One may be allowed to suspect that the Tories—I am not talking about motives but rather reasons—have unspoken reasons for having the study of this very complex matter completed within three months. I just may be that the kind of action they are urging on the government, properly defined, is a form of inaction and that really what they want is that there be nothing done on this whole question but that it be done with dispatch.

Last night the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) read us a rather dreary list of people in the other place who have overt and open connections with the food industry in Canada. I am sure that if we were to project this list a little further we would find many members of the loyal opposition who also have direct and indirect interests in the food industry in Canada.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): And on the other side.

Mr. Harney: We will get to the other side eventually. I think what we really need to do is change the approach of this committee in such a way that it will be able to pursue the matter in depth and not be a nine-day or three-month wonder of a committee but rather a committee which will be able to solve a problem which has been besetting this country for a long time. It is a problem which has been facing every household with intensity. For this reason at least, we must charge this committee with the need to report to this House and to the nation this winter, particularly on some of the worst aspects and abuses of the pricing system in Canada.

It is not necessary to have a committee of this House to tell the average Canadian housewife that a good part of the price she pays for food must be attributable to the excessive cost of advertising. In my city of Toronto one day a week the great dailies publish enormous advertising sections detailing in print and in picture for the benefit of the poor housewife exactly what a roast of beef looks like. She would be quite satisfied with a simple little list printed in a certain part of the paper collating the prices of the various cuts of meat and various other foodstuffs store by store, and supermarket by supermarket. She has to plough through reams and reams of print and pages and pages of pictures which very often at best could be said to be misleading in respect of the actual economies she would receive if she pursued the urging of the advertisement. Certainly at that level a committee of inquiry such as we are discussing in this House could act very quickly. This is a problem which is obvious to practically everybody in this country, if not to every member in this House.

What we have before us is a very complex problem. It is one which is deep-rooted and which goes into the very nature of the production and distributive system in this country. At the same time, there are aspects of the problem which any person with any common sense could tell us are subject to immediate action. If we subscribe to the amendment from the Progressive Conservative benches proposed by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) not only would we be running the risk of doing nothing but would also be running the concomitant risk, to use his own words, of damaging one very important sector of our nation. Members of my party yesterday made the very important point that this House must not act swiftly to the point of detrimentally affecting the interests of the basic producers in this country. The people in this country who stand to lose the most and be hurt the most by hasty action on the whole question of the price of food, food production and distribution are the basic producers, the farmers of this country. As the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) pointed out, it is only recently that they have begun to receive something like a part of the kind of price they should have been receiving a long time ago.

Another sector of our nation and our economy that we should be careful not to hurt is those who are involved as workers in the packing and processing industries. Yesterday, I think someone in the House quoted the figure of $6 an hour with reference to workers working in the food processing industry. It is almost impossible, when looking at the statistics produced by Statistics Canada, to know exactly what it is that a food packer or processor receives on the average, but I can assure you from my knowledge of what food processors receive in Toronto that it is a long way from $6 an hour. So, there we have another very important segment of the food producing, processing and distributing industry in Canada which would be extremely vulnerable to hasty, inconsiderate action on the part of the House.

There are other reasons for not asking this committee to move to completion of its work within three months. The other reasons are of a much more positive nature than the ones I have just outlined. Many of us feel that there is something that is in need of a drastic change in the whole matter of food producing and distributing in this country. Many of us feel, too, that no matter what specific recommendations we put forward to change what now exists, we will have somehow failed if we do not start thinking and recommending other ways in which the whole matter of food distribution can be handled. For example, we have had attempts, some successful and some unsuccessful, in various communities in Canada to establish consumer based or indeed community based distribution systems for foodstuffs and household needs. We have seen in Halifax, for example, the successful establishment of a direct charge co-operative. We have seen a similar successful establishment in Hamilton, and there is an excellent one in Oshawa which has been able to establish and maintain itself successfully, mainly because it has had the effective backing of a very large and community sensitive part of that locality, that is the United Auto Workers.

Again, we can say that the case was more or less the same in Hamilton. If United Steel Workers of America had not supported fully the direct charge co-op in operation there, one could be allowed to wonder whether it would have moved at all. The direct charge co-op idea is a new idea in food distribution, not only in this country but in the whole of North America. It provides for a lot of excellent aspects. It provides, in effect, for real consumer control over the quantity, quality and pricing of the products that are put on the shelves. It provides for a very direct understanding on the part of consumers of exactly what goes into the pricing of the products they buy after the society gets the products from the wholesalers. It provides for a new establishment of confidence on the part of the consumer in the whole mechanism of distribution, because he feels he has some control over it and he begins to understand exactly why prices do go up in certain cases. It certainly provides for something which is extremely valuable and necessary in so many of our communities, and that is yet another way among the many needed ways to build up a sense of community among our people and to eliminate the alienation that so many of our citizens feel about the whole process by which this country is governed. Alienation among the citizens exists not only with regard to the political process but also with regard to private enterprise which is supposed to support society's basic economy and satisfy its basic needs.

[Mr. Harney.]

So, it would be very important for this committee to look into these positive areas to see what this House could do to help Canadians establish institutions, vending and supply institutions in which they would participate, institutions which they would control. There has been some talk in the past few years of participatory democracy, and a lot of it has been very much like the talk we have heard about the need for action. It has been action but no specifics, and participate but no specifics. We have here a very real case of citizens of this country, as consumers, participating in establishing at least a part of the economic democracy which we all wish to see established eventually.

Because there is a real need to go into this matter of food pricing in depth, and because there is a real need for this House to take action in some of the more immediate areas which are more susceptible to correction, such as the matter of advertising—and I have given the House simply one example—and because there is again a very real need for the House to inspect new areas of positive action to allow the Canadian consumer more real control over the economic conditions which he has to face every week as a consumer, and because there is a real need for the House to consider ways in which the government of this country could aid the citizens of this country establish their forms of economic democratic participation in the way that trade unions in this country have done, I would like to move an amendment modifying the amendment put forward by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the amendment be amended by deleting the words "within the three months next following its appointment", and by substituting therefor the following words: "upon the completion of its investigation, and that it shall make an interim report, including recommendations for action, within two months of its first meeting".

The clause as amended would then read as follows:

That the said committee shall make its final report and recommendations upon the completion of its investigation, and that it shall make an interim report, including recommendations for action, within two months of its first meeting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the subamendment?

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, since this is the first occasion which I have had to speak in the chamber in this particular session I want to express, along with others in the House, my congratulations to Mr. Speaker. It was my good fortune to be a member during the twenty-eighth parliament, and we found that all we had heard about Mr. Speaker at that time was most assuredly true. He conducted himself with dignity and, happily, with a great sense of humour.

I think, however, that the appointment which pleased me even more was your appointment, Sir, as Deputy Speaker because at long last the government had caught up with a proposition that I had made in the last House when we had a majority. At that time, I broke the rule by voting in the Committee on Veterans Affairs to appoint Mr. Chester MacRae, then Member of Parliament, as vice chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. So, the government has seen the wisdom of the step I took at that time. Since the government made that decision, I do not think it could have found a more appropriate member from Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to appoint to that high position. I also wish to pay my compliments very briefly to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. As one who had that happy experience in 1969, I can assure them that it is an honour they will cherish long after they have left this establishment.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, last night the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) said, as reported on page 454 of Hansard, and I quote:

Senator Robichaud who is involved in National Sea Products Ltd.

The Hon. Gérard Robichaud is no longer senator; he is Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick. Let us get our facts straight.

[English]

Hon. members will be happy to hear that that is the extent of my contribution to this debate in French.

No one can dispute that food costs are rising. It is a fact that is most familiar to those who are on fixed incomes, particularly our senior citizens. Most assuredly it is familiar to all of us to one degree or another. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) suggest that the government in some way was endeavouring to sweep the problem under the rug. I would remind him that it was the government which proposed this measure, pointing out that food costs are rising, and urging that a committee should study food costs to see what action can be taken to stop the rise in food prices. It is my hope that the committee can do just that.

But having criticized the setting up of the committee, and having suggested that it will sweep the problem under the rug, what constructive comment did we hear from him on how to make the committee work? Mr. Speaker, the official opposition seem to be more content to move from newspaper headline to newspaper headline than to make this house work as the people of Canada want it to work. Who is to blame? That is the question that is constantly asked with respect to food prices. The issue is not easy to determine. We have heard a recital of the series of committees and commissions that were established to see if something could be done to halt rising food prices. The last committee we established recommended the establishment of a department of consumer affairs, and that recommendation came to fruition as a result of action taken by a Liberal government. It is not correct to say that committee reports are only put on a shelf to gather dust. That committee made a recommendation, and the recommendation was accepted by the government. Today, we have the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

The next step was the establishment of the Prices and Incomes Commission by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. That commission was subjected to a great deal of criticism, but the criticism generated more heat than light. The commission fulfilled a definite function, a necessary function, at the time it was established. It pointed out to consumers that there were areas where people could curb the rise in wages, in prices and in incomes, also rises in salaries at the federal, provincial and municipal level. It pointed out the problems and the need for us, in this time of affluence, to show some form of restraint. In my view—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair finds itself in difficulty because, with the amendment and the subamendment, the compass of the debate is really very narrow. This works a hardship on members, such as the hon. member now speaking, who is delivering his general thoughts on this whole topic rather than confining himself to the question of whether there should be an interim report, including recommendations for action, within two months of the first meeting of the committee. Because of the rules of the House, that is precisely the confines of the debate.

I do not want to be overly strict because that would only prompt two speeches from the hon. member, one dealing with that particular point, and then one later on dealing with his general approach. This is something that might be given consideration before we meet again at two o'clock, to see whether the house leaders are agreed that the vote should be on Monday so that we may consider that we are on the general debate rather than on the particular amendment and subamendment. I really am in difficulty, and since we are starting off a new parliament it is rather important that we adhere to the usual practice.

Mr. MacEachen: Your Honour, may I make a comment on your very proper observation that if the speakers were to be held strictly to the amendment and subamendment it would indeed be a very narrow debate? Probably under the strict application of the rules of relevancy that ought to be the case, but it seems to me that from time to time we have overlooked the rules of relevancy, and no more recently than yesterday when the amendment before the House was upon the question of removal of the Senate from the proposed committee. At that time, most of the speeches were of a very general character and only touched tagentially on the question of Senate participation. I suggest that as a matter of agreement by the House, without asking you to associate yourself with any deterioration in the application of the rules, we might agree to allow the debate to be of a general character on all these subamendments that may come along today and later. That is the first point I want to make.

The second point I want to make is that I understand that it is not likely there will be a vote today. Certainly, I am operating on the assumption that there will not be a vote on either the subamendment of the amendment today. For that reason, this does provide an opportunity for members to talk generally. I hope these observations may be of some help to the Chair.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to make a contribution on this point?

Mr. Lawrence: I am not too sure that "contribution" is the right word. I just want to say that, as always, on this side of the house we are seeking truth and justice. It appears to us that the best way of doing it would be for the Chair to allow the widest latitude on the various subjects that hon. members want to bring up in respect of prices, inflation and the cost of living. It is also our understanding that due to the number of members in all parties who want to speak, probably there will be no vote until Monday.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the Chair gathers the mood of the House. I would have to agree with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) that this matter did not just erupt this morning, and that there were very wide ranging speeches yesterday. Before giving the floor again to the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), I wish to assure him that the time spent on this point will not be taken from his allocation of time. I also wish to apologize to him for raising the matter in the middle of this speech, in view of the fact that it could have been raised during speeches given in the House yesterday.

Mr. Cullen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I certainly do not feel put upon because I was interrupted. It gave me an opportunity to catch my breath and ask a Page for a glass of water. I was speaking first in a general vein because I thought this was necessary before going on to deal with the amendment and the subamendment. I think that the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) is a good one. It points out that the committee has an obligation at the beginning to do all it can within a two month period. If it can make recommendations that is well and good, and we can have an interim report. We will have to look at the involvement of governments, labour unions, farmers, supermarkets and that mysterious fellow, the middleman. But to attempt all this with a time limitation of three months does not seem to make much sense if the committee is to have any meaning at all. It seems to me that we need more time, but I think we can come up with an interim report.

Criticisms are often directed at farmers, at unions, at supermarkets and governments as well as other people. Much of this criticism has no basis in fact, and the charges are too often made from ignorance of the facts. A charge is often made against a government purely for political gain or by a consumer out of frustration and because he does not know the facts. That is why we need this committee and why it has to last longer than three months—why it will last longer than three months. Mr. Speaker, that is why I find the subamendment one which I can support.

If the committee is to be limited to the three-months period, it will be natural enough that the favourite target will be the government. It is always easy to establish a common bond against the government on almost any issue. The next favourite target is the supermarket moguls, they are fair game in our society. They are also adept at answering criticism and need no defence from me in this chamber. The thing that makes me happy is that less and less criticism is directed against the farmers. It seems that the farmers are getting their message across.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

The new Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has for many years been the champion of farmers. It must be very rewarding to hold a portfolio which gives the widest possible audience, in defence of and in appreciation of farmers. He is still at the same old stand, notwithstanding his new responsibilities.

I was extremely pleased to read the speech the minister made in Halifax in which he again put it to the farmers that they must get their message across and that they have an obligation to use the manpower services. This is the sort of thing that farmers will be reminded of when they come before the committee. In that speech, referred to in the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), according to the minister, when people were getting a bargain on food prices they were getting a bargain as far as the farmers were concerned, that farmers have had increased their productivity and so the Canadian consumer was getting a good deal. The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham should read the speech again and not take a sentence out of context, suggesting that the minister might be indicating that prices were not on the rise. The minister was simply indicating that in these circumstances the farmer is not to blame.

Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind your admonition, I am going to limit my remarks. I feel that the debate should not become too wide because we will have an opportunity before the committee to go into the many different aspects of this subject. I hope that we will see representatives of the Consumer Association of Canada before this committee. They have done a tremendous amount of research on this subject, and to confine the committee to a three-month period would do a disservice to them and others like them. They will need a good deal of time in order to present the results of their research to the committee. The supermarkets will also need time to establish their position before the committee. If profits are exorbitant, then the committee will have an obligation to say so in its report; if it is felt that controls are necessary then the committee should make that recommendation, bearing in mind, of course, that where there is a shortage of food, controls will not get at the basic issue. I hope that senior citizens will also appear before the committee to explain their difficulties. Perhaps they could show the young lady of today the proper way to shop as they have unhappily learned out of necessity. Perhaps a new horizons program is necessary.

I have been told by a lady who made a serious study of this, that by checking the newspaper ads, by listening to the radio as I do myself on my way to work—on Thursday mornings, CBO has a commentator who gives comparable meat prices and tells where the best bargains are—and by studying nutrition magazines, she found that she could feed her family better and save about $10 a week on her food bill. Consumers have an obligation to take that kind of action rather than to indulge a preference for prepackaged and prepared foods as seems to be the case in this day and age. If price is no object or if they can afford the luxury, more power to them, but there are many people who should be looking very carefully at their shopping lists and they should be able to appear before the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney). As a backbencher, I cannot speak on behalf of my party, but it seems to me that the subamendment makes good sense and is fair to the consumers of Canada. The supermarket operators, government representatives, the farmers, the unions and anyone else who wishes to appear before that committee should have the opportunity. I hope that this committee will make a serious attempt to solve the extremely difficult problem of rising food prices.

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): Mr. Speaker, one of the advantages of having a colleague from one's province in the chair is that he knows the name of one's constituency. This is appreciated, especially in my case, when my constituency became part of the former constituency of Colchester-Hants. As a result, I was often addressed as the hon. member for Northumberland-Colchester-Hants but with Your Honour in the chair I am now correctly known as the member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

Since this is the first time I have participated in debate in this parliament, I should like to offer to you, Sir, my congratulations in public as I have in private. I know that you will honour the position for which you have been chosen by all members of this House and I anticipate great things from you in the days ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) and, to a degree, appreciated what he said. I think all members of this House have an understanding of the problem that we face, the problem of spiralling costs, especially food costs. These increases make it difficult for anyone on a fixed income, and especially those living below the poverty level, to go into the supermarket and purchase foods in keeping with their income. They know and we know that this is important. Every day that goes by the task of making the dollar meet requirements is more difficult. We, as a party, are somewhat hesistant about endorsing the approach that the government has adopted in order to try to combat the problem.

The hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has pointed out why we are hesitant, why we are somewhat doubtful about the government's approach. While we believe that the matter is urgent, we do not believe that it will be solved by a committee. I agree, in part with what the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) was saying on this subject. He suggested, as did the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), that the report should not be made in three months because everyone who wishes to appear before the committee should be given the opportunity of having a say. Parliamentary committees and other committees established by governments to sit for a certain time usually exceed the time limit allocated to them before presenting a report. That limit is exceeded sometimes on two or three occasions. There are indications that this procedure has become the rule rather than the exception.

I am also concerned about parliamentary committees being democratic committees. Anyone who wants to appear before the committee should, as the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton suggested, be given the opportunity to say something. If this is what is wanted, in my opinion the other place should set up its own committee. It should travel across the country and, keeping in mind the long range point of view, secure the advice and opinion of all who want to appear before it. Then, that committee could produce a long range proposal somewhat similar to the report of the committee established by the other place on aging or on land use. I could assist the government in that way.

I think the consumer of this country is fed up with complaining. This committee will merely listen to complaints. It will travel from coast to coast and listen to people say what is wrong with this and that, and how the price of this and that has risen. What the consumer wants is action, Mr. Speaker, and not more reports, submissions and arguments as to who is at fault. Whether you like it or not, the administration of this country is at fault because prices are skyrocketing and it has not taken the necessary action to stop it. If this government is not capable of taking that action, if it has not formulated a plan, as it ought to have, to contain costs realistically, it should move out of the way and make room for somebody else who can do the job. I think my party could do it. I think my party ought to be in office now, and certainly this is the opinion of the electors of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Certainly, if they were given the opportunity tomorrow to indicate which party they prefer to run the affairs of this nation, they would indicate the party I support. Let me present evidence for my statement. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) said on January 18, as recorded in Hansard at page 431:

> In statistical terms the increase in food prices from December 1971 to December 1972 was 8.6 per cent. Over the same period, the rise for all items other than food in the consumer price index was 3.8 per cent.

I do not argue with what the minister says. If he says that, I am sure he is right. On the same date, as reported in the Globe and Mail, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) made a speech in Halifax to members of Canada's dairy industry. The report of that Speech reads:

> Mr. Whelan feels the public must be conditioned to expect to pay a more realistic price for food. An average Canadian wage earner is paying less proportionately of his income for food now, than he was 10 years ago, . . . If food costs had risen in the same proportion as the rest of the consumer price index items, beef farmers would now be getting 70 cents a pound for beef on the hoof, rather than 40 cents.

Then, the minister is reported to have said:

> I think we should be telling consumers what a fine job we have been doing, and what a bargain they are getting.

You can have it one way or the other, Mr. Speaker, not both ways. Either consumer food prices are going up faster than other prices, as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs suggests, or they are not, as the Minister of Agriculture suggests. The report continues:

Mr. Whelan said nobody seems to complain about increases in the price of beer, furs, snowmobiles and other luxuries. You don't hear a peep out of them. But if a couple of cents are added to food costs everybody is screaming.

I do not know what the Minister of Agriculture thinks, but I am not too greatly concerned about people who are buying snowmobiles, furs and other luxuries. Perhaps they are not screaming, for good reason. But the great majority of people in this country are screaming because food prices are going up and they just do not have money to buy food. Previous to the October 30 election, we underwent four and a half years of the present administration. What did we get from it? We got nothing for those on fixed incomes; they were not compensated for increases in living costs. That is why those people are screaming about increases in costs of food and consumer items. They do not have money in their pockets to buy those things. With the dollars left in their pockets they cannot buy sufficient food today to maintain their families. We must do something about that.

We can do something in several ways: First, by increasing the various types of federal pensions, thus giving certain people sufficient income to meet increases in living costs; second, by gearing those pensions to the cost of living increase; and, third, by controlling the sorts of increases that are being imposed everywhere at the present time in this country. May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, at one o'clock I was making some general statements about the committee that is proposed and some of the areas in which it might work. I wish to again refer to the comments of the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton, with regard to comparative consumer reports that are sometimes of value to food buyers. In that regard, it might be of some value to a consumer to know the comparative values in the various supermarkets when purchasing a certain item. However, it does not help very much when that item in all supermarkets has increased by 10 per cent or 20 per cent in one week. This does occur. I have encountered it.

I wish to make specific mention of two items which I purchased in a grocery store over a very short period of time. They both were significantly increased in price. One of these was a food item. I purchased this for 77 cents and, two or three weeks later, I paid 98 cents for this same item. That really shakes up a person. That is the type of increase that so-called discount operators are providing for consumers. Another item that came to my attention this past weekend was fuses. When I removed the last fuse from a container of three in my home, I noticed that the price on it was 22 cents. When I went to the food store to purchase a replacement, the price was 41 cents for three fuses. I do not know how long I had the first three fuses I referred to, but in was not a long period of time. In that period of time, the price had jumped almost 100 per cent. This is the sad situation that has been facing consumers all across this country.

There may be many areas the committee will have to study in order to determine what might be done to assist the purchasing public. One basic problem, certainly in Atlantic Canada and probably across the country, is the spiralling cost of feed concentrates to producers to be included in products destined for grocery stores, certainly in so far as meat is concerned. On November 20, I wrote a letter to the Minister of Agriculture similar to one I had written some time before to the former Minister of Transport. In that letter, I pointed out the unbelievable increases producers in the Atlantic provinces must pay for feed grains. I quote from my November 30 letter:

> The cost of feed additives has increased substantially. It is my understanding that the increase in the cost of soybean meal has been $55.00 per ton for meat meal and fish meal, the increase has been approximately $50.00 per ton.
> In so far as feed grains are concerned, as of October 23rd, barley has increased in price from $8.00 to $10.00 per ton, corn is up $12.00 per ton, No. 5 feed wheat is up $10.50 per ton, oats are up $14.00 to $15.00 per ton, mill feeds are up as much as $22.00 per ton, and hog grower and hog finisher are up $6.00 per ton.

There is no way the farmers of this country can stand that type of increase without receiving additional payment for their products. Unless there is something this government can do to assist the farmers, they will have to add on this cost to the price of their products. This has been happening over and over again. From the time that increase in cost goes from the producer to the purchaser, it is hard to believe how much of an increase the person buying that product has to pay. Certainly only a small portion of that goes into the pocket of the farmer who is trying to maintain a livelihood in extremely difficult circumstances. I also suggested to the Minister of Agriculture that as far as feed concentrates were concerned, there should be special action taken by the government that would be of material assistance to the farmers of Atlantic Canada.

I wish to put on record a resolution that was passed by the Maritime Farmers Council. This is a federation which includes the New Brunswick Federation of Agriculture, the Maritime Co-operative Services, the Nova Scotia Federation of Agriculture and the Prince Edward Island Confederation of Agriculture. Their resolution on feed concentrates reads as follows:

> Whereas animal and vegetable protein concentrates constitute approximately 13 per cent of hog feed rations, 15 per cent of broiler feed rations and 9 per cent of layer rations, and
> Whereas the price of all animal and vegetable protein concentrates is governed by the price of soybean meal, and
> Whereas during the past five months the cost of soybean meal has increased by more than 60 per cent from $140 per ton to $225 per ton, basis f.o.b. Moncton; with similar increases in other protein concentrates, and
> Whereas this is causing an increase of $4.25 in the cost of producing a market hog, with similar increases in livestock, dairy and poultry production, and

Whereas this represents an intolerable situation when combined with rising costs of feed grains, transportation, and other production input expenses, and

Whereas even at the greatly increased price there is a real danger that the supply of protein concentrates made available may not be sufficient to support our livestock and poultry industries,

Therefore be it resolved that we urge the federal government to authorize the Canadian Livestock Feed Board to buy soybean meal and/or other protein concentrates, and position these ingredients for our use, and

Be it further resolved that we ask that the price for these concentrates be protected at $130 per ton, basis f.o.b. carlot Toronto, for soybean meal.

If that action were taken, the purchasing public would have a substantial guarantee that there would not be the increases in food prices they are now facing. Everybody would enjoy some stability in the market place, and in the result there would be less inflation in this nation. Whether or not the committee hears complaints from people about food prices, this action is required in order to get some stability and end the spiral of inflation for an unprotected purchasing public. Whether the committee sits or does not sit, whether these facts are laid before the committee or not, the price of food will continue to go up and up and up without a corresponding increase in the amount of money in the pockets of Canadians to buy that food.

In the province of Nova Scotia, families are asked under the provincial social assistance scheme—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him under the House order passed yesterday has expired. He can continue with unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I can finish in a couple of sentences, and I thank the House for its courtesy in allowing me to continue. I was saying that under the social assistance plan in Nova Scotia, families are asked to try to maintain themselves, no matter what their size, on $200 a month. This means that people are going to starve to death under this spiralling increase in the cost of living.

We believe, and rightly so, that any committee of the House that is established to study food prices must get the job done quickly and report back within the shortest possible period of time. I think that three months, in itself, is almost too long; we should be taking action today. If we were the party forming the government of this country today, the people would get action today. But under the present government the people will have to wait at least three months. And the government is saying that three months is not long enough. It may not be enough for this government, but for many people who are trying to survive on next to nothing it is the devil of a long time. People are going to have a mighty hard winter if they have to wait for the committee to sit. It seems obvious from the comments that have come forth from government benches since the amendment was introduced that the government is not even satisfied with three months. They want the people to wait even longer for some remedy to their problem. It may be these people will no longer be on this earth when the government finally does take action on their behalf.

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have been paying close attention to this debate, which has been one of the more interesting debates. Speeches by individual members have been of high quality. However, I am afraid that the speeches particularly from members of the official opposition, have been very good in histrionics but very poor in terms of content.

The question is simply this. We are faced in the world today with spiralling prices. Such a condition is not unique to Canada. We do not have the highest rate of inflation or the highest increase in prices of any country in the world. Countries are doing worse than we are, and there are even a few who are doing better. But it is obvious that there is no easy answer.

I think all of us on this side of the House would have been impressed had the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), who admittedly is a new member in the House, been able to indicate exactly what was Tory policy. But there is no Tory policy, and this is why, to illustrate the poverty of their thought, hon. members opposite had to steal the sheets from the bed of the NDP.

Mr. Baker: That is the bed you are in.

Mr. Baldwin: Sheets that the Liberals have soiled.

Mr. Reid: After last night I hope they enjoyed their one night of bliss. I hope the NDP enjoyed it, too. Perhaps they will find that the "official" opposition are not their only bedmates.

Mr. Baldwin: They have already discovered that you are economically impotent.

Mr. Reid: I do not blame the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham for the kind of speech he made yesterday. It is something that we in this particular parliament have come to expect from the Tory benches—in other words, nothing. After all, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham is merely following in the steps of the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who had nothing to offer in terms of policy when he spoke in the throne speech debate. He was quite upset that the NDP looked at his speech and decided it contained nothing. That is why the NDP preferred to go along with the government, which has offered something concrete, a plan for action in the future. This is why the NDP has not supported the Tories. The NDP do not particularly like the government, and they do not particularly like hon. members opposite; but hon. members on that side have not even given the NDP anything to hang on to in order to encourage them to vote against us.

The attitude of the official opposition can be likened to that of the big bad wolf in the famous story who was going to huff and puff and blow the house down. They have certainly let out a lot of hot air; but the only time they have been able to get any support in the House, outside of their own, was when they borrowed the bed-sheets from the bed of the NDP and moved a motion that one would normally have expected the NDP to move, since the party has a long history of being opposed to the Senate. We were not aware that the Conservative party had suddenly changed its view overnight.

The idea they borrowed from the NDP was not even germane to the motion that was before the House. I think we can offer the official opposition a bit of advice. If they are really serious about defeating the government and want to come over on this side, they are not going to accomplish that objective with hot air. It is not going to be achieved by speeches such as that of the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham, or even by a speech like that of the hon. Leader of the Opposition during the throne speech debate. This can only be achieved by substantive policy recommendations. When hon. members really start to deal with the nitty-gritty issues facing this country today, then members on this side of the House may start to fear for their seats. When they start to do these things, then we will begin to have a debate in this House that is meaningful. We might then have debate in the House that will attract the attention of the ordinary person in Canada. Until that time, I am afraid this House of Commons is not going to attract that kind of attention.

An hon. Member: Tell us the price of beef; you have not mentioned that yet.

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I know the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) is enjoying the attention he is attracting, but the difficulty is that under our ancient practices the Chair is supposed to hear at least some of the speech which is now being interrupted. I would ask that the hon. member be allowed to continue without the number of interventions that have been taking place.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I say that we thoroughly agree with you, and we hope the hon. member will say something that we think is at least worth hearing.

Mr. Reid: I thank you very much for your intervention, Mr. Speaker, but I do not really fear that those hon. members opposite who have been yelling and screaming during my rather quiet remarks have been able to divert me from my purpose, which is to discuss some of the issues before us. I would like to direct some remarks to the amendment and the sub-amendment which have been moved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: The previous speaker indicated he felt the committee ought to complete its deliberations within a three month period. As former chairman of a committee, I have always taken the attitude that when a committee is given something to do it ought to have a time limit of some kind and ought to be under a greater degree of control by the House. However, it seems to me that to expect any group of hon. members in the House of Commons to look into the totality of factors that affect food prices in Canada within a short period of time is unrealistic. I think a far better proposition could be made, that the committee should be instructed to make substantive reports to the House of Commons from time to time in order that we might keep a running check on its activities and control more precisely what the committee is doing. Speaking for myself and not the government, I would think some form of amendment which indicated that we wanted the committee to report on an interim basis, say once every two or three months, would be acceptable to me as an individual and, I think, would be given serious consideration by the minister.

We all recognize that committee members become very much wrapped up in their own activities and do not spend much time following the will of the House. Sometimes they even substitute their own desires for those of the House. Because of the complexities involved in the factors surrounding food prices, it is not fair to force upon any group of men, even those from the opposition, a time limit within which they must produce a final and definitive report. That simply is not realistic.

An hon. Member: You are weaseling now.

Mr. Reid: One has only to examine the factors involved in food prices to understand the point I am trying to make.

Mr. Grafftey: Quick action is what we need from this government.

Mr. Reid: The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) says we need quick action. What quick action did his party ever propose? One has only to read his leader's speech on the throne speech debate or the speech of the lead-off speaker for his party to find out that nothing is proposed. I suggest that is what the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi stands for, nothing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reid: I say that with apologies to the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Reid: There are a number of items the committee must consider, one being that the increasing amount of food we consume today is not in the form of raw agricultural produce. Instead, we are eating much more processed food. When we purchase food, we are not purchasing the raw product in many cases but products subjected to a high degree of processing. In terms of volume alone last year in the United States there were more potatoes processed into frozen french fries and, goodness knows what other kinds, than sold in their natural state. The trend is probably the same in Canada.

We are dealing with a system in which people are demanding a higher degree of processing and, therefore, paying a higher price than would be paid for the product in its natural state. I suggest there are reasons for this situation. There has been a substantial change in the life style of Canadians within the last 10 or 15 years. Let us take the example of a man and wife who are both working. When they come home after a hard day's work they want a meal which can be prepared with a minimum of strain. They buy frozen meals, frozen french fried potatoes and other frozen products, all of which require a great deal of processing and the expenditure of a considerable amount of money. If people make that choice, are they really paying a higher price for food than they might had they purchased it in the natural state, or are they making a choice as to the disposition of the moneys they have left over after paying for necessities? This involves a question not so much of food prices but of how people spend their discretionary incomes.

In the last two or three months I have been making a tour of my constituency and interviewing a lot of small grocery store operators.

Mr. Fraser: What is discretionary about a price tag?

Mr. Reid: If a person wants to buy frozen potatoes instead of table potatoes and has to spend three times as much, is not that person making a discretionary purchase? I suggest that he is because he has a choice as to how he will spend his money for food.

Mr. Fraser: What choice has he got?

Mr. Reid: If the price of potatoes in their natural state were going up as fast as the price of potatoes in the processed state I would say we should really be concerned, but that is not the case.

An hon. Member: You are never concerned.

Mr. Reid: One merely has to read the speech of the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. Whicher) and other members who represent agricultural constituencies who spoke during this debate to learn that this is not so. Farmers are not making that much money, because farm prices are low. It is not the farmer who is making the money, it is the processor, the people who have caused this product to be in demand are the consumers who also have the opportunity of buying the product in its natural state. The consumer is spending his discretionary income, and apparently that is satisfactory. That is the simple point I wanted to make, and I think the hon. member now understands it.

An hon. Member: Thank you for making it, but how many months did it take you to come to that conclusion?

Mr. Reid: We are dealing with a society in which the life style has changed. We find ourselves in a situation in which we have added more links in the chain that brings the food from the farmer, through the processor, the wholesaler and the retailer to the consumer.

Before I was interrupted, I was talking about having interviews with people who operate small grocery stores in my constituency. They told me there were a number of reasons for the increase in prices last year. One individual told me quite bluntly that a substantial part of the increase over the last six months could be attributed to politicians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid: I was a little shocked by this statement. He said that a substantial part of this increase could be attributed to politicians who have been talking about the imposition of wage and price controls. As a result these companies, in order to protect themselves, increased the prices in case that event came about. It is difficult to say whether there is truth in that suggestion. If there is, there is a lesson for us to learn. We should be careful of what we are saying to those people who might actually believe that some of the members of this House are serious.

Mr. Fraser: Well, you are innocent. You have not talked about wage and price controls.

Mr. Reid: The committee must consider the sociological factors. Most members have not bothered to mention this aspect.

The committee must also consider questions in relation to long-term food supply. I have been reading a book called "The Limits of Growth" in which the Club of Rome and MIT computer studies indicate that no matter what is done in terms of decreasing population through birth control, and increasing the supply of food through the use of non-arable land that might be exploited, and increasing the yield from land now under cultivation, there is no way we can meet the challenge to produce enough food to feed the estimated population of the next 30 years.

This year we have had reports of the beginning of famine in the new country of Bangladesh and in India. We have seen the prices for food increase across the world simply because there seems to be a shortage. The hon. member who spoke before me mentioned the substantial increase in the price of feed grains. He would probably be interested to know that last fall the United States removed all quotas in order to encourage the import of beef and other meat products into the United States because of a scarcity in that type of protein. He would also be interested to know that the country perhaps most noted for tariffs, France, was also faced with a shortage of protein and removed its 7½ per cent value added tax recently. So, countries are attempting to cope with this shortage by removing tariffs and destroying the protection they built up in respect of their food industries. This indicates that the problem is not solely a Canadian one but is worldwide, not only in the long-term but also in the short-term.

It was interesting to me to note that, in applying its wage and price controls, the United States specifically decided to exclude raw agricultural products although these controls were applied to other products of the manufacturing sector of the food industry in that country. Unfortunately, even though my hon. friends across the way deny it, there really is no easy solution to the problem. Canada, as an international trading nation with 25 per cent of its gross national product based on foreign trade, and one job in five based on foreign trade, will not be immune to these inflationary factors which are outside our control. We try to operate in an international economy and must do so. There are certain consequences which fall upon us. It seems to me that the problems of inflation which beset not only Canada and the United States but the world as a whole, are not solvable at the local level but rather on an international level. It is a brutal fact of life that we do not have sovereignty over a number of things which affect us and our living standards. It has always been Canadian policy to try to work through international organizations such as FAO, the United Nations and the Group of Ten in an effort to solve problems common to all. I suggest this is a problem which will find its solution, not in the deliberations of this House of Commons but in the deliberations of worldwide bodies.

Now, I should like to come to the point related to the question of nutrition. In the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River there were four candidates during the last election. There was myself, the Conservative candidate, the NDP candidate and an independent candidate. The independent candidate ran on the platform of a guaranteed annual income as well as the matter of nutrition. The point he tried to make in that election campaign was that the nutrition value of the food we buy is not as good as it should be, and that there are other ways in which to acquire the nutrition our bodies need. The federal government has sponsored a nutrition study to find out how well Canadians are being fed and how well they choose their food from what is available as well as how well that food is actually prepared in order to keep the nutritional value intact. The preliminary reports of that study are not particularly encouraging, because the indication is that many Canadians do not take advantage of the nutritional value of the food we now have. Perhaps an anecodote will illustrate the point.

When talking to a grocer I asked him about the nutritional value of many foods, particularly prepared foods, and he said that the greatest tragedy—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him, as agreed by the House yesterday and extended because of the interjections earlier has now expired. The hon. member may continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not agreed. The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour.

Mr. Ed Nelson (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to devote part of my remarks to supporting the amendment advanced by the hon. member for Scarborough-West (Mr. Harney) this morning. In passing, may I comment to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) that in respect of time limits this government has had many years and the electorate has already imposed a time limit upon it. The electorate said to this government on October 30, "get off your butts and do something". We suggest it should be done now and within a time limit. I should like to echo the concern of my colleagues and other speakers about the rising cost of food in his country today. It is a concern that is reflected by the general public and by the media. It is also reflected in this House. In an editorial entitled "Let 'em eat Mackerel" the Vancouver Province of January 16 expresses skepticism that yet another Senate-Commons committee will produce the results that are needed. The editorial reads:

It is as though a gang of thieves were stealing from everyone's income and savings at a rate of 5.1 per cent a year (the living cost rise) and the best the government could do was to find out how it was being done.

As a new member in this House, I have often been puzzled by the terminology used here. Through my growing years I had always thought that there were only two places, and that the other place was the place you found when you looked down. Through the lengthy debates yesterday, I discovered that the other place is over there and that there are more than three places—the other place, the place occupied by our colleagues to my right and the one you find when you look down. My puzzlement is abated. I am happy that the members of the other place have been excluded from the committee. I urge that the committee scrupulously avoid, so far as possible, any conflict of interest among members no matter from which of the three places they come.

Regarding the cost of living, the urgency of the situation has been testified to by the figures quoted by my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) when she pointed out that the consumer price index has risen slightly over 17 per cent in the last two years. According to the Department of Agriculture, in the last five months food prices have risen 7.4 per cent. I do not need statistics and reports to tell me that the price of food has risen. The real authorities on the rise in the cost of living, however, are not the researchers from Statistics Canada or the various party groups, not the Association of Grocery Product Manufacturers or the retailers, but the person who goes into the supermarket and pays out his or her hard-earned money. These are the people whose representations should be sought, not in the form of sophisticated briefs but in whatever form their representation is brought to the committee in order that light might be shed on reasons for the rise in the prices. These people, if you ask them, do not blame the farmers because too many of them have lived on the farm in the past, as I have, and have seen what the normal standard of living of the farmer is.

We hear a great deal, of course, about the affluent Canadian society and we are very proud of our affluence. However, it is a sad and ironic reflection upon this affluent society that there are a great number of Canadian citizens living below the poverty level. So many of them live at this low level that it has become necessary for groups to join together in anti-poverty organizations, as it is necessary for our elderly people to join together for their own protection, indeed for their own survival. It may be that ultimately, the only course of action will be for the poor and needy to organize and to arouse the citizenry in order to put enough pressure on the government to force some kind of immediate action.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) mentioned nutrition. During the last campaign I spoke to several old and deprived people who told me that they were reduced to eating dog food. "Oh, sure", said one old gentleman, "I always eat it in the last week before my cheque comes. It is not bad stuff". Since then I have had several complaints from dog owners who claim that their dogs have been made ill by certain brands of dog food. If you look at the variety of products in this multi-million dollar industry and the lack of any uniformity in the identification of what ingredients are contained in their products, the thought of Canadian citizens being reduced to eating such junk is revolting.

Mr. Alexander: Right.

Mr. Nelson: It is easy to blame the farmer for increased food prices, but anyone who has had experience with farming knows that although the land may be strong it is not easy to become wealthy by farming this strong land.

Mr. Alexander: Not with those guys in power.

Mr. Nelson: According to the president of the Canadian Farmers Association, as reported in the Vancouver Sun of November 30, 1972, 94 per cent of farm products are bought up by big supermarket chains. Farmers, the editor pointed out, are powerless against the big food chains. They cannot strike like other workers because their produce spoils in the meantime. The result is that they have no real bargaining position. He pointed out that packaged, diced carrots sell for $350 a ton of which the farmer got $100. The label on a can of peas costs more than the peas inside, he said.

According to the Department of Agriculture, as reported across the country on September 13, 1972, the biggest culprits by far are the processors, packagers and distributors. According to the study prepared by the Department of Agriculture, 64 per cent of the $2.8 billion increase in food prices since 1961 has been accounted for by processors and merchants.

Consumer affairs minister of the government of Manitoba, Mr. Mackling is reported in the Globe and Mail of Friday, October 27, 1972 as saying that his department:

—can document cases that prove merchandisers are intentionally using inflation as a reason to increase their prices.

As a result of the provincial-federal division of authority, provincial governments cannot impose price controls. But surely this House, through a group demonstrably free of conflict of interest, can take action quickly in consultation with provincial ministers of consumers affairs and a prices review board as suggested by my colleagues.

Let us examine a not too hypothetical single instance to illustrate what happens to a head of lettuce from the time it leaves the farm until it is finally sold. The farmer may get 4 cents for a head of lettuce with a profit of perhaps 1 cent or 2 cents. Harvesting and packing add 4 cents. Now it costs 8 cents. Plastic film, freight costs and handling add 13 cents. Brokerage, spoilage, inspection, advertising, store overhead and profit add another 18 cents. The lettuce sells for 39 cents, unless it comes from California in which case there may be additional charges.

In this continuum of profit making, it seems to me that the areas to be investigated most quickly and most thoroughly, are those of packaging, distributing and price fixing. Aside from the scope of the committee's inquiry, what concerns me deeply is the period of time allowed for that investigation. Granted, time is needed for any kind of effective inquiry, but what happens in the meantime? It seems to me, therefore, that the imposition of a two months' time limit is preferable to a longer time and that in the meantime the Department of the Attorney General should be intensifying investigations and unjustified price increases.

I agree with the member from the government side who said that there is no easy answer. So long as food prices are controlled by a handful of corporate food chains, so long as the citizens of Canada labour under the maldistribution of wealth that is characteristic of the regimes of both old line parties, there will be no easy answer. The most we can hope for is something in the nature of reforms to alleviate the problems of Canada's people. At least that much I urge the government to do and do quickly.

• (1450)

Mr. Léopold Corriveau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is with legitimate and unconcealed pride that I intend to make some comments about the motion proposed and agreed to yesterday to establish a committee, which apparently will no longer be a joint one, to consider increases in food prices.

I would like to deal with the matter as a remote observer, as far as some technicalities of the problem are concerned, being neither a producer nor a dealer, but an ordinary consumer whose wife notices from time to time that such or such a product is more expensive than previously. This phenomenon, while rather disturbing, is not only a domestic but also an international one. I see however that the increase is not restricted to food, but also affects almost all other consumer goods sometimes less of a necessity than food.

Although apparently it does not cost any more today to buy food than it did 10 or 20 years ago, it is still recognized that the share of the family budget allotted to the purchase of food is smaller than what it was 10 or 20 years ago. We eat more and better today.

I for one find it illogical that, without complaining too much, people do not hesitate to spend more and more money to acquire luxury or recreative items. They complain a bit though resignedly, when every year the price of automobiles, skidoos and colour TV sets goes up. In this situation, we must admit that food prices have not increased as fast as wages and, as the minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was saying in Halifax this week, the Canadian consumer more than any other buys his food at bargain prices.

Mr. Speaker, the housewife is constantly hammered when she buys food at the retail store, and let me explain: When housewives go to the supermarket, they find packagings so attractive that they omit to check inside whether there is the right amount of the product.

I think that nowadays, because of information media, namely television and radio, our housewives are being constantly influenced by food chains mainly specialized in packaging. I am under the impression that after the inquiry we shall have discovered that the cost of packaging certain food products is higher than the cost of the actual contents. As one of my colleagues was saying a while ago, it is surprising that housewives, in their continual quest for the best processed and above all the most attractively packaged products, sometimes forget to reflect on the cost of the packaging. Formerly, there were few firms specializing in the retail food line, whereas today a host of processing plants are increasingly specializing in packaging food.

Mr. Speaker, if all segments of society had developed their products at the same rhythm as farmers, we would not be facing our present problems of inflation.

It is not the farmers who have failed to produce more, because they have shifted their production thus ensuring a tremendous improvement in the field of food products. As a matter of fact, some farms in our area that we used to believe were restricted to cattle and milk production have been shifted to market gardening and, given our well organized road system, farmers found that they were not so far away from the main centres and that they can produce and deliver quality products very quickly.

According to statistical data, Canadians do not hesitate to spend more on such luxury items as a summer cottage, a yacht or travel, than on essential commodities. I wonder to what extent and at what cost people prefer to escape reality. Has the consumer really been well informed as to the various factors that influence food prices or are we witnessing the birth of a new scale of values in which what used to be considered a luxury has now become a necessity?

Mr. Speaker, almost every Canadian family now has one or two cars; many have snowmobiles, boats and various other luxury items. When the cost of foodstuffs increases by a few cents, they protest very strongly but when the price of liquor goes up by $1 or $2 a quart or gallon, no one complains. But if the farmers or milk producers plan to increase the cost of milk by 2 cents a quart, it's front page news. Are we going to use the cost of food as a pretext to justify expenses considered of secondary importance until very recently?

Mr. Speaker, this is the situation, but is it logical or acceptable? I am asking myself and every Canadian that question. I trust that the committee soon to be set up will throw light on the problem. I was happy yesterday to hear the minister offer his full co-operation to the new committee that will be created to look into the problem of food prices in Canada. To our amazement we will probably discover that neither the farmers nor the producers make big profits but that instead the advertisers and manufacturers of containers do. They vie with one another as to who will produce the most glamorous packaging to better sell the product.

In closing, I express the wish that this committee will enlighten the House in this regard, and as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, to quote the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during his computerized courtship of the electorate during October last, "I love Canada." One of the things I like about it is that its people are not a violent sort. Even when they are provoked almost beyond endurance, they respond reasonably.

There have been times, when I used to sit in the gallery above, when I wondered why the people of Canada, looking down upon the proceedings in this House, did not delegate a body of people to rush down here and burn the place to the ground with all of us in it. I was left to wonder about that again just a few minutes ago as I listened to the 20 minutes of the concentrated puerility that we heard from the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). It was fatuous, supercilious and contemptible. It demonstrated for still another time, as though we needed another demonstration of it, this government's airy disregard for the problems of Canadian citizens.

I was particularly interested, during the course of that speech, in the hon. member's reference to the Speech from the Throne which he described—I believe I quote his correctly—as a blueprint for the future. One of the recommendations in the Speech from the Throne which is going to be offered up to the members of this House for their approval is the introduction of television cameras into this chamber so that the people of Canada can see what goes on here.

I say to him that he and his colleagues on that side of the House are fortunate the cameras are not already installed, and that the people of Canada have not been treated to his performance and to that of his Prime Minister during the last few days in the House. Mr. Speaker, if they had seen the performance of this government, if they had seen the demonstrable lack of concern for their problems evinced at every turn by those gentlemen and ladies, those same ladies and gentlemen would not have time to sit around in this House; they would be too busy elsewhere, answering their protest mail and telephones.

I do not know whether striking out Senate participation in the proposed committee will make much difference, or whether it will make any difference if the committee reports in two months or three months. But I believe one thing is certain—whatever the make-up of the committee, and whatever time it takes to produce either an interim or a final report, it will bring no relief at all to the people of Canada. It will not bring any good news to the old people who find it difficult to live in a reasonable measure of comfort on their inadequate pensions. Its deliberations and findings will not mean relief for the working poor whose tiny incomes and negligible bargaining power make them the natural victims of inflation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this committee will accomplish anything of value; in the historical context it would be unreasonable to expect that. Within the past few years we have had commissions, both royal and common, Senate committees, Commons committees and task forces on dozens of vital national questions; but the action which flowed from all that effort and expenditure of public money, could it be harnessed and converted into energy, would barely provide enough power to light this chamber for an afternoon.

We had a commission on the status of women, but the status of women has not changed. We had a Senate committee on poverty, but the poor have grown in number and diminished in the public consciousness since the committee reported. Everyone agreed that poverty was a national disgrace and that something should be done, but this kind of response could have been elicited before a committee was struck and goodness knows how many millions of dollars spent to make a finding of the obvious.

Mr. Speaker, I am reminded of a poem by a British humourist which goes as follows:

I saw an old man in the park
I asked the old man why
He watched the lovers after dark
And this was his strange reply
I am the royal commission on kissing
Appointed by Gladstone in '74
All of my colleagues are buried or missing
And our records were lost in the last Great War
But still I'm a royal commission
And my task I intend to see through
Tho I know, as an old politician,
Not a thing will be done if I do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I cannot seriously entertain the belief that there is one member of this House so naïve as to think that this committee will accomplish one meaningful thing. Even all the joyful whooping and hollering on this side of the House last night had a hollow ring to it. It was about as meaningful to the people who suffer inflation as though this House had found that 15 rather than 30 angels could dance upon the head of a pin. Establishing committees such as this is little more than a device for fooling the people and distracting their attention from the fact that they are being victimized, in my view. It is an attempt to persuade them that their Members of Parliament really care about their plight and intend to set things right. In my view, and on the record, nothing could be very much further from the truth.

In 1969, this government announced that inflation had become the most serious problem facing this country and that it proposed to do something about it. Very shortly it became obvious what that was. Using the old generalist economic approach, the idea that some kind of mix between fiscal jiggery-pokery and monetary meddling could fix things, they embarked upon a deliberate attempt to create unemployment in order that the age-old economic prophecy would be fulfilled and we would have less inflation.

When President Nixon took office in 1969 he called it fine-tuning the economy. One prominent economist replied that he might as well talk about fine-tuning the flood on the Mississippi River: it made about as much sense. There was another prophecy in 1969. It was made in the sixth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada. At page 163 of the report this statement appears:

> In Canada, it is difficult to maintain that current inflation is a reflection of excessive demand pressures, for the Canadian economy has been operating with at least a moderate over-all margin of slack since 1967. On the other hand, in the United States the problem of price and cost inflation has been very much one of excessive demand, aggravated by the impact on the economy of the war in Viet Nam. Until some easing of price and cost increases takes place in the United States, Canadian policies to deal with domestic price and cost problems will be handicapped.

Here comes the most relevant sentence of all, Mr. Speaker.

> Further fiscal and monetary restraint could conceivably result simply in higher rates of unemployment and economic slack with no more than marginal effects on current rates of increase in prices and costs.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the Economic Council of Canada and its chairman, Arthur Smith, was saying to the Prime Minister and his colleagues, "Don't do it—don't do what you say you are going to do because it will not cure the ills we are facing; it will not cure the ill of inflation and will only cause harmful and high unemployment in Canada". But that is precisely what happened, Mr. Speaker, and we are still paying the price for it.

Many times since, when the government has been berated for its failures in the field of economic forecasting, the response has been that this problem is so complex that no one could come up with the right answers. I point out, Mr. Speaker, that Arthur Smith was right and the Economic Council was right. For his pains, Mr. Smith was banished, and no attention has been paid to the Council since. Mr. Smith and the Council told the emperor that he had no clothes on, and so they had to go.

This morning the Prime Minister said that his policy was price and wage controls if necessary, but not necessarily price and wage controls. Fancy that, Mr. Speaker: from philosopher king to Mackenzie King in two weeks.

Mr. Lang: He said that was your leader's policy.

Mr. Stanfield: He said it was his too.

Mr. Reilly: My leader would not steal from Mackenzie King; he has better precedents than that.

Mr. Foster: You are lucky to have an entertainer over there.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I should like to review the bare bones of the inflationary picture as it has developed since this government took office. Between 1968 and 1972 the cost of living, over-all, has gone up by 20 per cent. To the wage earner in this country that means that what cost a dollar in 1968 now costs $1.20. Shelter has increased by 27.4 per cent in the past three years, food by 18.2 per cent, clothing by 10 per cent and health care by 17 per cent. Those are basic items, not fripperies, extravagances or self-indulgences. The plain and tragic fact is that there are many hundreds of thousands of people in this country who cannot afford them.

I had a telephone call from a constituent of mine, a man in his late sixties living with his wife on a pension. They pay nearly half their income for rent, and when all their essentials are taken care of they have less than $20 a week for food, clothes, transportation and whatever wild extravagances they can put their minds to when these needs have been exhausted. That man was nearly in tears on the telephone, Mr. Speaker, and it was not good to have to sit there in my beautifully appointed office, drawing $26,000 from the public purse, and listen to one of my fellow men, one of my neighbours, one of the many millions of people who put their trust, I hope, in me and in the other members of the House in the hope and belief that we would care for them and solve problems that they cannot solve, that they are powerless to solve. That was the most distressing incident I had to cope with since the House began to sit, but that was not the only time I had that kind of call.

• (1510)

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the hon. member. If he would like to rise to his feet, I will yield the floor to him.

An hon. Member: Get on with your speech.

Mr. Reilly: The hon. member will need to speak louder.

An hon. Member: Get on with your speech.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, what I want to know from the government or any member is, what do you tell these people? What do you tell them, while we sit around here boring the people in the galleries rigid with irrelevancies, diatribes and lectures. What the people want, need to know and have a palpable right to know is what precisely we intend to do about those problems that they cannot solve.

Prices have increased by 20 per cent in four years. Have pensions risen 20 per cent in four years? No, they have not. Have unemployment insurance benefits gone up by 20 per cent in four years? Has the minimum wage gone up by 20 per cent in four years? The only pensions on retirement, or welfare benefits if you care to call them that, that have gone up are the pensions members of this House are entitled to if they manage to hang on here for six years. We have not done very much for the people who cannot help themselves in this country, and I think it is about time we got around to doing just that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, as the economist Galbraith once put it, "Men of conservative temperament have long suspected that one thing follows the other." Nowhere, in my submission, is this proven better than in the field of economics. We have tried to hold inflation down by the tried and true method of setting it off against employment. That, for a variety of reasons, has failed. We have tried persuading management and unions to agree voluntarily to hold down wages and prices, and that course has failed.

The choices have dwindled to the point where in my opinion two are left. We can pursue the careless course we have followed, the course that shows disdain for the real problems affecting hundreds of thousands of citizens in this country, we can continue to plan for a country in which inflation is rampant and in which poverty is an equally predictable concomitant of it, a country in which people will never have a chance to dig themselves out of the mess we have made for them, or we can follow another course: we can attempt to regulate wages and prices. I am not talking here about guidelines or persuasion; those have been tried.

An hon. Member: What about other incomes, including ours?

[Mr. Reilly]

Mr. Reilly: I would agree with an income freeze right now. I would not have sat in the last parliament and legislated such an increase for myself if I had been here as a member.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member certainly was not here.

An hon. Member: But his colleagues were.

Mr. Reilly: If hon. members from the party which pretends to speak for the weak, the old and the poor mean to denigrate the things I have been saying with that kind of cheap, juvenile barracking, let them go ahead. I hope their remarks are on Hansard, and I hope it is recorded that they were made by members of the NDP.

An hon. Member: This is not a television game.

Mr. Reilly: It is marvellous to hear this kind of thing. I only regret that more of the people of Canada are not here to listen to the high level of debate practiced by the party to my left which thinks itself an intellectual party.

An hon. Member: You are not on television.

Mr. Reilly: Neither are you. As I said to the people across the aisle a few minutes ago, it is a good thing the hon. member is not on television.

It has been said that wage and price controls would hamper the operation of the free market. I do not believe that to be true, because the market in those areas which have a bearing on inflation is not free anyway. Prices and wages are fixed by powerful corporations and powerful unions; there is very little free movement in those areas that really affect the people of Canada. I believe that the public of Canada deserves a place in the councils of those organizations if we are to make certain that the public interest will be served when those in lofty positions make a move.

There is no need for me to become involved in the area of farm prices or small manufacturing prices, Mr. Speaker, because these, as nearly as I can determine, are regulated by the market and there is no need to interfere with it. The only place where we need to impose regulations is in that area where powerful corporations and powerful unions now make the rules. Perhaps we might include certain essential areas such as rent controls. Those controls need to be imposed, perhaps only temporarily, until we can determine how to bring those factors more into line with the incomes of so many thousands of Canadians who are not making it now. Those prices need to be frozen.

I think there is no doubt that the people who are suffering under rampant inflation want controls. They do not want guidelines or voluntary restraints that penalize those who co-operate and reward those who refuse to co-operate. They want firm, mandatory controls which will make certain that those on fixed incomes, the working poor and the unemployed, will be rescued from the relentless exploitation of the rich and powerful and selfish people of this country.

If this government and this House of Commons truly understands its responsibility to the people of this country, if hon. members have the vaguest understanding of the problems that bear so heavily on so many hundreds of thousands of unfortunate Canadian citizens, they will somehow summon the courage to take the drastic step. The government does not have that courage now.

There is still a chance for members to go out into the boondocks and see how real people live. Then they will move at once to consider price and wage controls, and impose them—because, Mr. Speaker, this move is no longer a debating point for an economics class: it is a very urgent need. We must help those who cannot help themselves. We, the members of this House, can help the people if we will. In my submission, we will not be helping the people through the mechanism of this committee, no matter when it reports.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the introductory efforts which the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) made the other day. His first three attempts to be recognized and gain the floor of this House were not very successful; he fell flat on his face.

Mr. Stanfield: I wish food prices would fall flat on their face.

Mr. Hopkins: He was certainly prominent before coming to this House.

Mr. McGrath: Which people fell flat on their faces last night?

Mr. Hopkins: I will have something to say about that later, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Alexander: Tell us now.

Mr. Hopkins: I am mentioning the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham at this time for this reason. He and his former colleagues in the Ontario government were so interested in serving the needs of the people on the hustings that they could not even maintain or build a bridge across the Petawawa River so that 12,000 people could reach the shopping plaza and buy food, no matter what its price was. They could not reach the bargains at the shopping plaza; and the hon. member was one of the super-ministers in the Ontario government at that time, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: What about northern Ontario? Was he responsible there, too?

Mr. Hopkins: One thing—

Mr. Stanfield: The party opposite was not very successful against the hon. member.

Mr. Hopkins: I am interested in seeing one thing, Mr. Speaker. I come from rural Ontario. I do not want to see farming communities of this country crucified for the sake of political gain. The cost of operating a farm today is very high, and the farmers must have a fair return for the risks they take.

Another extremely important matter—I am not sure whether it has been mentioned in this debate—is freight rates. For those who live some distance from the large urban markets, freight rates are very important when considering food prices. For example, farmers throughout eastern Ontario raise a lot of beef and hogs. They not only face the freight costs of shipping the animals to the slaughter-houses but they are faced with the cost of bringing the product back to the local market. For this reason, I compliment the government for including the matter of freight rates in the Speech from the Throne.

Anyone who wants to check former speeches I have delivered in this House will find that time and again I raised the question of freight rates not only on food but on manufactured goods. We must also consider the processing industry. A study of freight rates in Canada will also be of importance to the developing economy in this country. Whether it be food processing plants or any other type of industry, it is as important to this country to have equalized and fair freight rates for all areas of Canada as it is to have a regional development program. When I speak of food processing, I refer to fish in the Maritimes, wheat in the west, mixed farming in Ontario and the various plants which deal with these types of products. If we take a serious look at freight rates along with an investigation into food prices, we will be hitting the whole problem of food costs with a double-barrelled shotgun rather than with pellets travelling in various directions.

Many people criticize all outlets, from the foodliners to the small corner stores, for the high cost of food. I think it is fair to say that many retail outlets operate on a very small percentage of profit. I hope the committee will study all areas of this problem, including the farmers, the consumer making his purchases in the foodliners, and other food middlemen across Canada. We cannot permit the rumour to be spread, as it often is, that the farmer has it made. The farmer today works far longer hours than the average citizen in this country in order to keep his operation going. It is his business. His money is involved and he has deadlines and payments to meet.

I have spent a considerable amount of time in sessions of committees of this House. I think it is extremely important that the make-up of the proposed committee include a fair representation of people from all walks of life and all interests. We do not want a committee representing only one or two views. The same is true with regard to witnesses who will appear before the committee. When the steering committee decides who should appear before the committee, they should call for a good cross-section of people—the producer, the middleman and the retailer. Also, people involved in transporting food throughout Canada should be invited to appear before the committee in order to deal with transportation costs.

Mrs. MacInnis: What about consumers?

Mr. Hopkins: Without this guideline, it will be impossible to get a clear picture. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has served on many committees of this House, some of which I have chaired. I have very high regard for her conduct and what she has to offer. I heard her mention the word "consumers." Certainly, consumers' organizations should appear before the committee. What I am trying to say is that all groups should be represented. We should not merely load the gun in committee and then come back into this House with a report that is not viable.

The committee will be made up of members from all sides of this House. Because of our present make-up and the party system in this House, every member who serves on the committee should be sincere and dedicated. Hon. members should be interested in bringing a fair report to this House which will be in the interests of the consumer, the producer and all others involved in the food industry.

In my opening remarks I referred to the fact that farmers must pay for shipping their animals or food products to markets where they are processed and then returned. I think it important that we have regional slaughter-houses instead of shipping hogs, sheep and cattle to large centres where the industry is tied up in a few very large conglomerates. I think the committee should make an in-depth study of this aspect of the problem.

Another way to protect the farmer is to examine what has happened during the past 12 months. In eastern Ontario, stretching through to North Bay, there was a very serious wet weather problem and many farmers lost their year's crop. They are faced with additional expenditures this winter in order to bring their herds through the winter months.

Mr. Baker: The government did not do very much to help them.

Mr. Hopkins: The government gave them assistance. This was done here in Ottawa on the initiative of a number of members of the Liberal caucus on that day.

Mr. Baker: Why weren't they returned?

Mr. Clermont: I was one of them.

• (1530)

Mr. Hopkins: I am here today. I have travelled from farm to farm with delegates visiting these farmers, not only in my riding but elsewhere. We did receive some input and I would be willing to supply the hon. member with letters I received from satisfied farmers in the area. Those letters are one indication why I am back, contrary to what the hon. member across the way said a moment ago.

The chairman of this special committee must be a good diplomat, a fair-minded person who will have to know all the rules and operations of a committee. I think it will behove every member of the committee to try to give him respect in return for his or her fair play, just as it behooves us to give the same respect to the Chair in this House under similar circumstances.

The study of food prices in Canada will undoubtedly greatly be affected by what is happening in many Asian countries today. Right from the time western Canada started producing No. 1 wheat we have heard it said that Canada is the breadbasket of the world. Some nations of the world will obviously face great difficulty in the immediate years ahead. Surely there should be some international agency more effective than any to date which will provide, on a multinational level, funds for the production of food to help these needy nations over their difficult times. We cannot expect the farmers of Canada to produce food that is to be given away, with no return to them on their cost of transportation and operation within Canada as a whole.

As a nation highly respected in the eyes of the world, we have a responsibility to help nations that are in difficulty and this we have done over the years. In comparison with other nations of the world, I think Canada, by and large, has a pretty good record of being our brother's keeper. If we are to be sincere in our international relations and if other nations want to be sincere with us, we must find ways and means at the international level of getting food to areas in need, at least if we have any Christian, Hebrew or other ethics left in this country. And they are here, despite all the pessimistic views expressed about churches today.

In closing, I congratulate the government for bringing forward this motion. At the same time, I emphasize how important it is that the committee operates efficiently. Secondly, all elements of the food industry should be able to make representations to the committee. Thirdly, the cost of distributing food throughout Canada must be examined carefully. Lastly, we must bring back a report to the House that is not only logical and credible in the eyes of the House but also in the eyes of the Canadian people at large. Having brought back that report to the House, I know that the government will be prepared to consider it in all seriousness, as I am sure will all members of the House. Let us keep our eye on the basic interests of John Q. Public, not on John Jones, MP and on what we might gain in a cheap manner through political action.

I have many friends on both sides of this House, Mr. Speaker. When the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the throne speech spoke the other day, they reminded me of some words that I used in my maiden speech in this House—that if we can lay aside personalities, say the things to one another that we have to say and then walk out of the House as friends prepared to come back the next day and work constructively for the nation, then we can make this parliament work. We will be able to produce a good report on food costs, and if we give it a fair chance we will have probably one of the most effective committees in this twenty-ninth parliament.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of humility that I come to this House. The county of Peel and the riding of Peel South are once again represented properly by members on this side of the House in this party. The county of Peel is again happy and proud to be represented by a party that has been charged with greatness in the past. I have not had the chance to speak before in this House, so may I first of all congratulate you, Sir, on your election as Deputy Speaker, as well as the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lamoureux) on his election as Speaker of the House.

A lot has been said in this debate, and I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) that perhaps we are spending too much time talking rather than getting down to business. I should like to use some of my time to thank Mr. Alistair Fraser, the Clerk of the House, for the assistance he has given me as a new member.

Some months ago all of us here walked around our ridings, knocking on doors and hearing continual complaints about the price of a jar of coffee, a can of peas, a jar of Cheez-Whiz to make a sandwich for the kids' lunch, to say nothing of the cost of a pound of hamburger and other meat. The people of this country are pretty darned concerned about the prices they are having to pay for food and groceries, the necessities of life. If this government does not take more legislative action to deal with the rising cost of living in this country, and do so very quickly, I am sure the people will tell the government, more seriously than they did on October 30, what they think of it at the next election.

There is really no need for a protracted debate on the matter of setting up a committee to inquire into food prices. We have all been around and know pretty much what the problem is. We have had enough royal commissions and committee studies; but if we are to have another committee, let me say a few words about what that committee should explore.

A great deal has been said about farmers. Unfortunately, in my riding there is no longer any farmland; it has all been used for housing lots. As a lawyer, I have dealt with farmers for a long time and I say this to members of this House: I know of no business or industry which uses so much capital and labour for so little return. It is no wonder that the sons of farmers are leaving the farm to drive trucks and work in factories, and it is no wonder that some of the best agricultural land in Ontario lies fallow, growing weeds and producing no food.

No one can accuse those who produce farm products, in this province in particular, of creating the high price of food at the grocery store level. This committee inquiry must treat the words "price" and "food" in their broadest sense. The inquiry should consider all those things that are necessities of life, including shelter, clothing, services and, indeed, all costs to consumers.

I was amazed at the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) when she asked, "What about consumers?" Every member of this House, every person in the galleries—in fact everyone—is a consumer. What we must consider is the cost of production and the price of food. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) and his gang are often yelling and talking about the extortionate prices which supermarkets charge. Every indication I have is that the profit of supermarkets is less than 1 per cent of gross turnover. Let me remind hon. members of this House that if the price of an article was $1 and the profit was reduced by 1 cent, the market would just break even. If the price was reduced by 2 cents, the retailer would go broke.

We have had enough business failures in this country and we must consider why some of them have occurred. Perhaps some of these failures are the result of our cost-price structure. Some have said they should be blamed on labour. My inquiries would indicate that this is a highly labour-intensive industry and that most of the people are not well paid. Grocery store clerks, the people who move the produce and others in this industry are not well paid or wealthy, yet this is a highly labour-intensive industry. Every small pay increase is immediately reflected by an increase in price.

I think we must look deeper than the cost of labour, the cost of farming, the cost of distribution and transportation. We must consider the cost of incompetence on the part of the government which sits opposite. This government has saddled the Canadian people with incompetence which is reflected in the price the people must pay for everything they purchase.

During the election campaign I travelled throughout my constituency and talked to a number of operators of small businesses, as I am sure all hon. members did in their ridings. I am sure most hon. members have seen the statistical forms sent out to businessmen with a demand that they be completed and returned, or else. The cost of these forms, the red tape and the time involved is added to the overhead and passed on to the consumer. If the committee ever gets started, it should inquire into this type of cost because it also drives up prices.

There is a company in a neighbouring riding named Maple Lodge Farms. It is involved in processing chickens. A short time ago a health inspector closed down this operation because of a small dispute with management. The hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Madill) went to work on the matter and managed to get the plant back in operation within two hours. In the meantime 250 people stood around doing nothing while production in the plant was held up. There was nothing actually wrong and the issue involved only interference by a bureaucratic inspector. This is the kind of interference businessmen in this country face today. As long as this type of interference by this and other governments continues, prices will increase, because if a man is to stay in business he must pass the cost of interference and control on to consumers in the cost of production.

This government has interfered in another way. Less than a year ago it authorized the slaughter of a large number of chickens in order to increase the price of eggs. This is the kind of action that creates an increase in food costs. Only two years ago this government told the farmers of this country not to plant wheat and said it would pay them to reduce wheat acreage. How much government interference of this kind can the business community or the economy stand? This is the type of thing that continues to force prices up; I refer to inefficiency and bad decisions. If this committee inquires into the cost of interference by government in the business sector, it may do some good.

Another matter which is more dramatic than wages in relation to food prices is the government's vested interest in inflation, in terms of income tax. We have 5 per cent inflation today. Does the consumer need 5 cents extra on the dollar in order to pay the increased cost? I suggest the consumer must have at least 7 cents or 8 cents more, because of rapidly accelerating income taxes. The consumer needs this extra money just to stay even. This government continues to collect income tax on the basis of a vested interest in inflation, yet its members stand here in the House and suggest we should have an inquiry into prices. This matter was clearly discussed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in May, yet nothing has been said in the Speech from the Throne and nothing has been proposed to date to reduce the vested interest of this government in inflation.

It is easy for all parties to attack someone else. It is easy for the New Democratic Party to accuse the corporations. It is easy for us who live in the cities to say that the farmers, the producers or the transport people are responsible. It is easy for us to blame the developers for the high cost of rent. What this House must do, however, is look at itself and some of the legislation it has passed, as well as some of the red tape and regulations which have been created, and the effect this has on prices.

I suggest we should look at the incompetent government we have on the other side of this House. We have personal income taxes which start at 20 per cent and increase to 60 per cent or so. We have corporate taxes of 50 per cent or more. This government takes 20 per cent of the gross national product, and all other governments together increase that percentage to 37 per cent or 38 per cent. It is no wonder that those Canadians who rake asphalt for a living or serve in stores, as well as other Canadians, do not have sufficient money with which to buy the goods they require.

We must also inquire into the work ethic situation in respect of unemployment insurance and the welfare system in this country. The cost of welfare, the cost of payouts and handouts are all passed on in the tax system. All these costs add tremendously to the prices which must be paid. I do not say for a moment that we do not need to look into this aspect, because we do. We must look into the situation of the elderly people, the sick and the disabled in our community. We must realize, however, that the welfare system and the attack on prices does not require a commission or a committee in order to accomplish this.

In reference to the question of time, an amendment has been moved to the effect that this committee report in three months. A subamendment has been moved that an interim report be filed in 60 days. I do not know what the committee and its reports will establish, but I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is one of urgency. This debate has been carried on and on. I suggest that it be terminated next Monday at the latest and that the committee be forthwith appointed.

I would be delighted if the committee, as suggested by the New Democratic Party, could report in 60 days. We had the slogan "60 days of decision" by a previous Liberal government but I am not sure that those 60 days of decision produced anything. So while I am quite prepared to vote on the basis of a report in 60 days, I suggest that it should be a final report and that this House and the government get on with producing legislation which will solve the urgent economic problems of this country.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in commencing my remarks perhaps I should say I listened with a tremendous amount of interest to the comments of the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Blenkarn) who just resumed his seat. He made some valid points which I believe deserve looking into, one concerning the tons and tons of paper which Statistics Canada, or whoever is responsible, sends out to businessmen, which must be filled out and read but then is made little use of.

Incidentally, this is a situation which almost reached a peak during the time the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was prime minister. So be it; it is a valid point. This is an harassment particularly of small businessmen. If we can do anything to eliminate that problem we will be making a contribution at least in respect of making life easier for small businessmen. Quite frankly, I do not think it will have any effect on the price of food. I do not believe the hon. member thought it would; it was window-dressing on his part. But it will ease the burden of the businessman.

I also have some comments which I was enticed to make in respect of the speech, if I can call it that in polite terms, of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly); but inasmuch as he is like a hit-and-run driver, or slightly like a vulture who leaves his carrion and his droppings, and has left the chamber, I will wait until Monday in the hope that he will be here to listen to what I have to say concerning his attitude in this matter.

I see that you are becoming restless in the chair, Mr. Speaker, and I wonder if you are inclined to call it four o'clock. If so, I shall accede to your wishes in that regard.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

YOUTH

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF MINISTRY OF STATE FOR YOUTH AFFAIRS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the government consider the advisability of establishing a ministry of state to formulate new and comprehensive policies in relation to youth affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased at last to have an opportunity to make some representations on behalf of the people in my district and the country. I am particularly pleased to have the opportunity to introduce my private member's notice of motion which states:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that the government consider the advisability of establishing a ministry of state to formulate new and comprehensive policies in relation to youth affairs.

To my mind, governments have been groping in the dark about the problems in our country. We continue to react to emergencies that exist and then introduce ad hoc programs to try and combat the particular problems which exist. It is interesting to note that we have in this country five million poverty-stricken Canadians out of a total of 22 million. Many of them are children.

Here we are, in the year 1973, with problems which governments have not been able to cope with over the years and only grant more money to try to stop the cancer of poverty and sickness which keeps growing in spite of the efforts of governments to stop it. We keep reading and hearing every day about our inability to cope with the cost of medical services, and the experts cannot find a way to cope with these increased costs. We pour millions of dollars into studies to find out why people are getting cancer; studies on mental health problems, studies on nutrition, studies on the use of drugs.

We debate here in the House of Commons, in embarrassment, the problems of national unity, and we are at a stage today where the senior citizens of our country cannot cope with the cost of living. We have citizens in our country who in their later years cannot cope with society because of lack of education or because of the deterioration of their bodies. We are wondering why teenagers are reacting to the establishment, the supposed experts who are supposed to have all the answers about the future of our country. But we have failed miserably and are now at the stage where we must try to cure the ills with stopgap measures which are only temporary preventatives.

The problem is that we as legislators cannot see the forest for the trees. We are trying, through political bumbling, to direct efforts to ease the burden by an approach which will never solve the problem because we do not get to the source of the problem. To my mind, the answer is to concentrate our efforts toward our youth. We will never do it by creating programs with fancy names such as we have in our Department of National Health and Welfare—programs like Recreation Canada, Sports Canada, Hockey Canada, or by directing funds to create a few teams which will win championships. Neither will we do it by creating a few athletes who happen to have had the advantage of having the facilities provided because of political patronage. The answer is in youth development, the true development of the bodies of all our youth, whether they live in Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal or in the smallest hamlet in rural Canada.

It is a wonder to me why we seem to have such a hangup about becoming champions. I wonder what benefits have been derived from winning, for example, Olympic gold medals, and then we wonder why we cannot win a medal in spite of all the funds that are poured in. What have the great Olympic games proved over the years? To my mind, they proved in Germany last year that the competing countries of the world have no other objective in sending their athletes to the Olympic games, which are supposed to cement world unity, peace and understanding, than selfish, narrow aims. What did we accomplish in Germany other than the fact that some people of warped minds were able to ruin the games by the massacre of innocent athletes?

The answer, I say again, is youth development in Canada; it is to direct our efforts to the development of the bodies of our youngsters at primary school age. The answer is to provide a program to satisfy every child in our country, whether he lives in the largest city which provides many advantages or in the smallest hamlet where these advantages are all too few.

There is no one here more interested in the education of our youth than I am, but there is more to education than improvement of the mind. We must at the same time and coincidentally try to improve the development of the bodies of our children through a co-ordinated effort in education programs—to improve minds and bodies alike, not to create hockey champions or track champions to compete for the sole purpose of winning medals. We should direct our activities toward a co-ordinated effort to produce more healthy Canadian citizens for the good of the country.

The answer lies in creating a ministry of state for youth affairs to co-ordinate and direct an effort with the provinces to set up a youth program which would achieve the objective of developing better and healthier Canadian citizens. Under this ministry we could provide the leadership and the guidance that is necessary for all our youth, not only in direct sports but in physical fitness. We must teach the child teamwork, give him leadership training and teach him comradeship. We must let the child follow his natural instincts and prove his leadership qualities, instead of being left in the background because he does not have the attributes of the hockey player.

The future of our country lies in our youth, but we will not correct the problems of our youth by stopgap measures. We must get to the source of the problem. We must provide leadership and guidance to the youth at primary school age by a program designed to develop each individual's attributes toward his greater pride and distinction and, most important, make him feel that he is contributing as much as his comrades who have greater advantages.

Heretofore, Mr. Speaker, our program was narrow and downright stupid. Instead of using our common sense we have been listening to the supposed experts in the sports world who could not care less about our youth and our country other than to write a controversial column in the sports pages for their own selfish aims. They have all the answers because they are charged with the responsibility of preparing a sports column, but it is obvious, to me at least, that they could not care less what happens to the vast majority of the youth of our country.

There was no one more proud than I when Team Canada struggled to victory over Russia in the hockey series last year. But what did we accomplish other than the false pride of those few with advantages, while those who cheered in every nook and cranny of our country are suffering due to the lack of foresight of the leaders of our country in developing all of our youth rather than a chosen few.

I was dismayed last year when one of the best programs in physical fitness for youth, sponsored by the Canadian Legion, was discontinued by the federal government because of lack of finances. I was still more amazed at the fact that the Canadian Legion accepted the decision of the Department of National Health and Welfare to discontinue contributions. The discontinuance of this program is another example of the stupidity of our experts who seem to think that they know what is right for our country.

All provinces have departments concerned with correcting the problems of the youth of our country. Constitutionally, it is incumbent on the central government of Canada to co-ordinate these efforts by participating in discussions and negotiations with the provinces, and in particular those provincial departments which are concerned with youth programs, in particular employment of older youths and the development of other policies for the betterment of our youth.

A program should be designed, under a new federal department of youth affairs, to ensure that in future years our country will produce better citizens, so that we will not face the problems which we are facing today concerning the aged, the poor, the blind, the sick and the maimed. Programs concerned with aiding these poor people are poorly administered because those who are in charge of them have only their own selfish interests at heart.

If we create this ministry, we will be developing a healthy individual who is able to take his place in our country and in our society and is able to take advantage of the opportunities that are offered him. If we create this department, we will not be faced with the problems with which we are faced today. In the future, our senior citizens will not have to ask the government for assistance and will not have to cope with health costs, but will live in comfort as participants in our great country.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, for a parliamentarian, one of the best opportunities of realizing the importance of his office is no doubt when he has the opportunity, like I have today, of expressing in the House opinions and views on current topics.

Mr. Speaker, far from me the thought of suggesting that my remarks will have the importance and quality they ought to have. They come however from a Canadian who is deeply convinced that tomorrow's problems will be solved with the co-operation of all those who believe in a better Canada where all Canadians, regardless of their age, will have attained a proper standard of living.

When in addition to being a Member of Parliament, the speaker has the opportunity, through circumstances much more than because of his competence, of playing a rather important part in the government of his country, he is aware of the importance and seriousness of his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister did me the honour of appointing me Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), I felt quite unworthy considering the ability required from the holder of such an important office. I accepted, Mr. Speaker, counting mainly on the indulgence of my colleagues and being impressed by the person chosen as Secretary of State.

I did not know, Mr. Speaker, that I would be delivering this speech in the presence of the minister. I would not want my words to be construed as the expression of a wish to replace him. On the contrary. I believe he has the talent and, should I say, fortunately or unfortunately for those who wish to replace him, the youth and the competence to remain in his position as long, of course, as we have the confidence of the House and the electorate.

Mr. Speaker, I am particularly happy to take part in this debate on a subject which has been and will always be of prime importance for me. For many years already I have had the opportunity of taking part on a somewhat intensive scale in young people's activities in the Chambers of Commerce, Richelieu Clubs and youth associations, so I have been in a good position to understand young people's problems, their anxiety and their hopes. I am not one of those, and may God preserve me from ever being one, who are satisfied with making general judgments on young people and condemning them. I know, for having been young myself, that young people do not always fulfill the hopes we place in them. But there is nevertheless hope in that youth, hope which we must, not only as a government, but also as parliamentarians of any political association, channel, use and orient towards the best interest of our country.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of fairly numerous responsibilities, the Department of the Secretary of State devotes quite a lot of attention to that field. I believe I can say on behalf of my government, that it is not by showing a lack of understanding towards the young, by trying to isolate them from the world of today that we will solve their problems. The problems of they young are our problems. Their aspirations are those of people like us. The wishes of the young are those of people of all ages, of citizens of all categories who wish to live in a society that can give them the comfort, the happiness and the security to which we are all entitled.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, it would be a mistake—and I do not believe the government is willing to make that mistake—to accept that the young be isolated, that they not be considered as part of our society. With all due respect for my hon. friend who spoke before me, and whom I congratulate on the tone of his remarks, which were not agressive but constructive, I am not willing to accept his solution as being appropriate, even though I do agree with his remarks which did contain some elements of truth and some constructive suggestions, and which at the right moment will inspire us.

Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State was really and sincerely anxious to meet the needs of our young people, it established a committee a few years ago. As parliamentarians, we are often blamed for sitting on too many committees and doing too little. That committee on youth created a few years ago worked steadily I believe in an attempt to represent the wishes, needs and yearnings of our young people. As most hon. members know, its report was submitted to the Secretary of State and it will no doubt be the basis of a policy which we will submit to this House.

It is rather important to emphasize that the report, which was prepared by young people, is clear; the comments from those young people should bring enough pressure to bear on the government to guide its policy. The young people themselves were absolutely against the creation of a ministry of youth, the immediate or far-reaching result of which would have been to isolate them from the present and future society in which they want to participate fully.

And I can only rejoice at this firm response from the young people who, despite their uncertainties and problems, are willing to participate fully in our society of tomorrow and to contribute in a constructive way to the evolution towards which our efforts should lead and which will provide them, as well as other Canadian people, with the welfare they are entitled to.

Mr. Speaker, apart from that committee which was created and to which I just referred, we had the opportunity during this week, thanks to the initiative of a minister who was called to office only recently, to learn about measures that were not entirely new but improved, and which affect all young Canadian people. You have undoubtedly heard, Mr. Speaker, the statement made this week about some programs in which the government has invested and will invest $85 million this year in order to enable young people not only to earn money to carry on their studies but also to take active part in the improvement of various community services.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that the policies which we devised this week will meet all the needs and aspirations of young Canadians, because this has never been achieved and never will be. But the important thing is that governments are trying to find practical, viable and effective solutions so that young people, instead of feeling isolated, instead of feeling rejected by our society, may realize they can play a genuine role that not only would improve the society in which they live but also would provide them with an opportunity to experiment and to earn some money for their education.

Mr. Speaker, among these programs, the most prestigious,—if I may use this expression—is the Opportunities for Youth program. It may be interesting to recall that this idea, which was put forward two years ago already, is unique in the world. This year we have tried to make correction to it in the light of suggestions made by the people a few months ago. I hasten to add that the improvement of the Opportunities for Youth program will not meet with the approval of all citizens. But as a government we are prepared to meet—and that is our duty—the challenge of facing the problems of youth, and I think that we are in a position, in co-operation with all our colleagues in this House, to bring solutions which reflect the confidence that young people entertain toward Members of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, this policy of Opportunities for Youth is becoming so interesting—and I do not believe that I am betraying a secret by saying so—that people from the United States, Australia and Europe have inquired regarding our way of proceeding because they became interested in this new formula under which some 67,000 young Canadians will have, one way or another, the opportunity to take part in the improvement of our community.

It is obvious that the Opportunities for Youth program, for which $40 million will be earmarked this year, is part of a comprehensive program providing, for example, employment in the civil service. Out of this budget of $85 million which I mentioned earlier, $30 million will be allotted to hire young people for civil service jobs.

We were once blamed because the work of those young people was not always satisfactory. This year, we shall try to avoid such comments which are sometimes justified. That is why, instead of instructing the Public Service Commission to hire a certain number of students, we have asked the commission to define its needs. As a result of that assessment, the public service will perhaps be employing a smaller number of students, but on the other hand they will be performing more efficient, more positive work.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, it has been possible to devote $5 million more than last year to the Opportunities for Youth program which, incidentally, according to the evaluation of the Treasury Board, has been recognized as being the most efficient and productive of all the summer programs for young people.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that what should be retained from a speech like mine is that we want to impress the people of Canada and our colleagues with the fact that we, as a government, are prepared to recognize our mistakes, to face challenges and to work with all parties, and with the people as a whole in the interest of really integrating young people into our future society and in order that those who will be called upon to replace us may start their preparation and training right away for their leadership role. We have confidence in our youth, Mr. Speaker, a confidence shared, I am sure, by the people of Canada.

[English]

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). When I first read his private members' notice of motion I thought his proposal was more comprehensive than his detailed explanation suggested. According to his motion, he wants the government to consider the advisability of establishing a ministry of state to formulate new and comprehensive policies in relation to youth affairs. When describing the ministry of state that he wished to see set up, he tended to concentrate more on sports, on the development of the bodies of young people, on the development of healthy Canadian citizens, and he seemed to put the emphasis on the primary school level.

I think his motion has merit, but needs expanding. May I give a few reasons for my opinion. My background, before becoming a member of this House, was that of a high school teacher. I was greatly concerned about the increasing disillusionment on the part of many young people, especially my senior students. I would see many of them walking the streets after they had graduated from grade 13, and would be puzzled as to why students of such ability and intelligence had not gone on to university. They would say to me, "What is the use?" They became disillusioned over their prospects of finding a job and their future prospects in a country governed by Liberal and Conservative governments which seemed to do little to alleviate unemployment. This alarmed me, because I can think of no more dangerous or frightening prospect for our country than that of our young people becoming disillusioned.

I think the government began to realize this back in 1967. In that summer we began to witness the phenomenon of alienated youth. We saw thousands of young people forsaking their traditional role of working, and hitchhiking, instead, across the country. Also, the public became aware of the increasing incidence of drug use. In 1967 and in following years we saw college disturbances. There were riots in United States colleges and at Sir George Williams University in Canada. Learned gentlemen in the press and through the media spoke of the generation gap. We heard this often.

People began to wonder what was happening to young people who embarked on the new lifestyle and harboured new attitudes toward pollution. The government became worried. I would like to think it became worried out of a sense of genuine concern for young people. Perhaps there may have been concern on the part of some hon. members, but there was also the fear of social unrest. So something was done to placate these young people who seemed out of place in our society.

In 1969, the then secretary of state set up a committee on youth to investigate the problems I have just described. As the committee was investigating these problems it became apparent to all that rising unemployment involving young people had to be cured. In 1972, 11 per cent of those between 14 and 24 years of age were unemployed. So when we were witnessing this problem of alienation and unemployment the Department of the Secretary of State came forward with a program called Opportunities for Youth. On examining the history of that program we find that it has merit, although there are some great flaws in it. One of them is this: it has become an opportunities for students program, not necessarily an Opportunities for Youth program.

I am glad to see the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) and the parliamentary secretary present in the chamber this afternoon. A few days ago, during the question period, I asked the Secretary of State a question about the Opportunities for Youth program. Was it designed for students or was it designed for youth? In my opinion, I did not receive a satisfactory reply and intend to pursue this matter further on the "late show" in days to come. On examining the Opportunities for Youth program, we notice that the acceptance rate for projects submitted by university students is 31 per cent, or thereabouts, whereas the acceptance rate for programs submitted by non-students falls to about 18 per cent. One can appreciate what has been happening.

We should have a program that stresses youth of all income brackets and all backgrounds in life. As the program is now constituted, I am afraid the Liberal government is preoccupied with providing assistance to upper and middle-class students. Why is this, Mr. Speaker? The reason, I am afraid, is that upper and middle-class students are most articulate in designing their programs. They have a distinct advantage, therefore, over young people from disadvantaged families or socioeconomic environments. We may also surmise that it is the articulate, educated young people who will react most demonstrably if something is not done to alleviate the problems I mentioned earlier.

Therefore, I suggest that the motion proposed by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe for setting up this ministry of state ought to be comprehensive enough to include all youth, not just youth at the primary youth level on whom he seemed to concentrate. The motion should include young people of all ages right up to university level and from all social and economic backgrounds. If such a ministry were established, and if its activities encompassed all our youth as I suggest it should, then I think we should be going a long way toward dealing with the problem of alienation that affects so many of our young people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Symes: If we are interested in young people, I think we will find that there are great opportunities for putting their enthusiasm and talent to good use. I find that young people are much concerned about the quality of life, about our environment, about pollution and about all the destruction that they see. I am sure a ministry of state concerned with youth could put young people to work on programs such as cleaning up the environment and making this country a better place in which to live. I know young people are also concerned about social services and are willing to help others such as the disadvantaged and those living in slums. I am sure their expertise and enthusiasm could also be used in social services involving day care centres and the like. Young people are interested in peace and harmony, not only in the world but in our nation.

Such a ministry, Mr. Speaker, would give the young people of Canada an excellent opportunity to become acquainted with one another. I am thinking especially of young people of French Canadian or English Canadian backgrounds. Perhaps, if they come to know one another, we can overcome some of the differences that are the bane of adults in Canada. So if we are to provide opportunities for work in those areas, I think a ministry of state along the lines I have suggested would be very profitable.

If such a ministry is to be set up, it is essential that young people become involved in it. This is one of the merits of the Opportunities for Youth program. I commend the Secretary of State for the degree of involvement of young people in this program. If such a ministry is set up, the only way it will be a success is to involve young people in the planning, organization and execution of the projects that they themselves design.

In conclusion, the motion does have some merit but only if it is expanded to include young people and to the point of concentrating on providing meaningful jobs for these young people and not, as the mover seemed to express, a desire to concentrate on sports.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak on this very interesting motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall). I am pleased to note that the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) is here to listen to this debate. I hope he is establishing some kind of precedent, and other ministers will be present when we debate private members' bills which concern them. I am very serious about this suggestion. I specifically mention the Secretary of State because until now most of these matters have not been correctly placed under his department.

If we are to upgrade the importance of private members' hour, it is of real significance that, when possible, ministers be here to listen to comments which are made and, hopefully, from time to time to respond. I do not mean they should tie up a large section of private members' hour, but it might be useful to have even a brief comment from ministers somewhere near the conclusion of the debate so there can be some real interaction between private members and the government with regard to the proposals put forward.

I wish to take this opportunity to thank the Secretary of State for responding to some of the suggestions made by members on all sides of the House with regard to the Opportunities for Youth program. This week we received an outline of the format for the development of Opportunities for Youth projects. In the initial reading I have given to the proposal, I find great merit in it. It follows closely along the lines we pursued with interest during the past two years. However, there is still a major shortcoming. Perhaps it is best reflected in the proposition put before us this afternoon. That is, a basic lack of any kind of over-all policy, strategy or comprehensive approach to both the problems and opportunities of youth today. The comments made by the immediately preceding speaker are very much apropos the situation.

There are many tangible reasons why the government has moved to develop programs like Opportunities for Youth. Some of them obviously reflect a very serious situation that exists in the country today with regard to young people. Even though my life is not very long on the vine, I cannot recall a situation where young people of various classes and vocational opportunities have faced the kind of frustration and uncertainty, both vocationally and economically, that they face today.

Just last week we received the latest report of Statistics Canada with regard to the number of unemployed people under the age of 24. There are now some quarter of a million young people unemployed. Added to this, of course, will be an immense outpouring of young people as universities, technical colleges and high schools close their doors for the summer season. We have not faced, in a serious way, how we are going to deal in a constructive fashion with young people seeking to integrate themselves into the over-all pattern of Canadian society.

The parliamentary secretary issued a word of caution with regard to the hon. member's motion. He would not like to see the young people isolated. We have to be very frank and realize that, because of the situation, many hundreds of thousands of young people in recent years have found themselves to be very much isolated. It becomes a matter of very great isolation when young people are not able to find work, employment and a livelihood when they complete many years of training and education.

I have been a member of this House since 1965. During that time a variety of programs, suggestions and activities were put forward by both the Pearson government and the Trudeau government. In 1966 we were deeply involved in the establishment of the Company of Young Canadians. Who, here, remembers the Company of Young Canadians? I am told that it is alive, well and functioning in some areas of bureaucracy in Ottawa, but its shape and nature have changed drastically since those early years. As stated by the parliamentary secretary, we have since had the report of the committee on youth. He stated there will be some organized policy approach from the government on the report on the committee on youth, but to date we have not seen any evidence of that.

In the past two years we have had the development of certain programs directed basically toward summer employment, the principal of which, both in notoriety and expenditure, has been the Opportunities for Youth program. In that period we have not had any attempt at a comprehensive establishment of policy. Indeed, in its very impact the economic management of this country has created such a serious dislocation for so many of our young people that if we can call it a youth policy it has been in one of the most negative tones possible. Therefore, it becomes extremely important that there be an immediate approach on the basis of the hon. member's motion.

Some suggestion has been made that it has not been the request of young people that a separate ministry of youth be established. If the motion is examined, it will be seen that the hon. member is asking for a ministry of state, which is somewhat different. It would attempt to bring together a comprehensive approach to policy in relation to youth affairs. This is what we obviously and desperately need. I cannot understand why the government has resisted for so long and so strongly the development of such a youth policy. Members on this side of the House have suggested means whereby we might pursue this matter. Indeed, I have moved motions and suggested until I was blue in the face during the past year or two that we should establish a committee or use one of the committees available to this House to examine the various documents that have been presented to the Secretary of State, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Lalonde) and other ministers of the government, as well as an opportunity for general public reflections on how we should look at the chronic problems which face young people in our society today, the principal of which is tremendous economic dislocation.

On my way here this afternoon, just a few minutes ago, I met a young chap who told me that he was completing his course. When I asked him what he planned to do after completing that course, he replied, "I have no idea." He is not taking a trades course, or coming out of grade 7 or 8, or taking an upgrading program sponsored by the Department of Manpower; he is taking a post-graduate course in law. This man is regularly articled to the bar of Ontario, and he tells me that there are 500 others like him who have no real idea of the opportunities there may be for them.

When the hon. member to my far left suggests that the preoccupation of the Secretary of State's program has been toward the upper and middle classes, he is correct. The dislocations of unemployment now extend right through the whole range of society and have been creating problems for governments and politicians generally. The wonder of it is that the problems that have been created have not been greater.

If we were to argue only on the basis of fear, we might suggest that if we do not soon attend to these very serious problems, we may be faced with difficulties that are well beyond proportions easy to handle in a responsible and rational way. We are faced with a situation in which we have allowed through a policy of drift, training institutions, particularly universities, to carry on year after year without giving any real thought to the changing nature of society and of the economy in particular.

There has been no attempt to co-ordinate, either on a federal-provincial basis or directly with institutions of training across the country, the needs and requirements of society as at the present moment and as they will be over the next quarter of a century. More and more young people, we find, are increasingly becoming disillusioned. They find they have followed what they thought was the appropriate route to becoming positive and responsible members of society, only to discover that the door is slammed in their faces when they complete an extensive program of education. There is a most desperate need in this country for a comprehensive policy that is geared to youth, their education and employment. There has been no recognition given to that fact by the government.

I am pleased that we now have a new and young Secretary of State. I hope that in his brief time in office he will be able to provide some leadership in this very vital area. Even though his time may be short, his contribution may be great if he can deal with what is a very crucial area of social and economic difficulty facing Canadian society today.

I do not want to speak at further length because I am most anxious—

Mr. Faulkner: You still have another five minutes.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes, there are another five minutes before the debate terminates at five o'clock, unless of course we have a vote. But I would be most anxious to give the Secretary of State this opportunity briefly to indicate to the House how the government is going to move forward on this question and, hopefully, allow members of the House to engage in a serious way in the discussion of a comprehensive youth policy. I should also like him to indicate in what way his department's policies and plans will be moulded to deal with this problem.

All hon. members have had occasion to agonize during the past two years at the continued and increasing problems facing youth, at their inability, in all classes and in many different places, to become part of the economic and social life of the community. I hope that the Secretary of State might be able to indicate briefly this afternoon some ways in which he will provide leadership in this very vital area.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, along with all the hon. members who have spoken over the last two weeks I would like to pay my respects to the Chair on the occasion of my first speech in this parliament.

I think I have a special reason for taking part in the debate on this motion since I have had some experience with a department of youth affairs. I would like to state briefly how this department met with much success in my province of New Brunswick.

It was the government of Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud which undertook during the election of June 1960 to establish in New Brunswick a Department of Youth Affairs which was of course the first in the history of this province and among the first in Canada. This commitment was kept as soon as the Liberal government took office but the Department of Youth Affairs was connected with the Department of Welfare. I joined that department shortly after it was established first as information officer and later as assistant director. I thus gained some experience from the growing pains of the department and also had moments of deep satisfaction.

The department was initially responsible for the administration of a loan and scholarship program for students at the post-secondary, university and post-university levels and thousands of New Brunswick students took advantage of it. Later on we submitted to the provincial government a policy to develop amateur sport and to provide financial assistance to the recreational associations of many communities. This policy was implemented and a sports director was hired. A network of local offices connected the department to the communities through a degree of decentralization. Vocational guidance services were then established locally particularly to help the young victims of a high rate of school-age mortality, and in this matter as in the cases of other programs, we had problems of jurisdiction with the provincial department of education. In a new experimental field, it is quite normal that problems should be encountered, but we managed to find solutions afterwards.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hour provided for private members' business has now expired.

It being five o'clock this House stands adjourned until Monday at two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

IN-FLIGHT SAFETY STANDARDS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask leave of the House to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the accusations made by the Canadian Airline Flight Attendants Association that the government has not been properly enforcing in-flight safety standards on commercial flights, in particular hours of in-flight work, stewardess training and safety procedures. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That this House instructs the Minister of Transport to undertake an immediate inquiry into the enforcement of Department of Transport in-flight safety regulations, and to report back this week to the House, in order to assure the public that efforts will be made to ensure that these standards are enforced.

Mr. Speaker: This being a motion under Standing Order 43, it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

GRAIN

1973 PRODUCTION PROGRAMS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the terms of Standing Order 43 to seek unanimous consent to move a motion in a case of urgent and pressing necessity. The subject matter has to do with the two diverging positions taken on the one hand, by the Minister of Agriculture who has advised western farmers to plant 30 million acres of wheat and, on the other hand, by the minister in charge of the Wheat Board who has advised western farmers to continue with a program of diversification and to plant substantial amounts of barley and rapeseed. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly):

That the Standing Committee on Agriculture meet forthwith and examine the recommendations of the federal agricultural conference of last November and the recommendations of the Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board and that the Standing Committee on Agriculture report to the House as soon as possible on production programs for the coming season.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

REJECTED BALLOTS IN GENERAL ELECTIONS

Question No. 18—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. How many rejected ballots were there in the General Election of October 30, 1972?

2. What percentage of the total number of ballots cast on October 30, 1972, was the number of rejected ballots indicated in answer to Part 1?

3. What was the corresponding percentage of rejected ballots in the General Elections of June 25, 1968 and November 8, 1965?

4. Is consideration being given to altering the form of the ballot or to any other appropriate changes so that in future elections the number of rejected ballots might be reduced to a minimum?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Chief Electoral Officer as follows: 1. Preliminary total: 298,388.

2. Preliminary percentage: 2.99 per cent.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

3. June 25, 1968: 1.12 per cent; November 8, 1965: 1.06 per cent.

4. Consideration is being given to increasing the size of the circular space where the ballot is to be marked as well as some alterations in the rectangular spaces containing the candidates names. Any change of the ballot in substance would require legislative action.

Note: The figures in Parts 1 and 2 of the answer are shown as "Preliminary" as it will be several weeks before all election statistics can be verified and balanced.

EXPENDITURES BY COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES, 1968-72

Question No. 122—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What was the total amount of money spent in each of the fiscal years 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71, 1971-72 by the Commissioner of Official Languages on contracts to outside persons and organizations for research, development and other consulting services?

2. What are the names and addresses of these outside persons and organizations and what amounts of money were involved in each contract?

3. What was the purpose of each contract and title of each report submitted?

4. What are the names and addresses of outside persons and organizations who were awarded contracts for research, development and other consulting services in the current fiscal year, what are the amounts of money involved in each case and what is the purpose of each contract?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Commissioner of Official Languages reports directly to parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be made directly to him privately.

COMPENSATION TO CANADIAN CITIZENS FOR ASSETS CONFISCATED BY ROMANIAN GOVERNMENT

Question No. 215—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

Has the Government of Canada entered into negotiations with the Government of Romania to achieve agreement whereby Canadian citizens, whether of Romanian origin or otherwise, would be compensated in some measure for assets or properties owned by them in Romania and confiscated by the Romanian state authorities and, if so (a) what is the state of such negotiations and has Romania in fact agreed to set aside a fund to compensate such claims by Canadians (b) is the Canadian Foreign Claims Commission examining such claims and, if so, what are the bases of consideration for determining "who is to get what" (c) in the absence of documents evidencing title to the assets or properties, as the case may be, what may serve as a satisfactory substitute therefor?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): (a) An agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Socialist Republic of Romania, concerning the settlement of outstanding financial problems, was signed on July 31, 1971 and was ratified on December 14, 1971. Under this Agreement, the government of Romania undertook to pay to the Government of Canada the lump sum of Canadian dollars 1,400,000 in full and final indemnification of all claims including those of Canadian natural and juridical persons against the Socialist Republic of Romania and Romanian natural and juridical persons. (b) The Foreign Claims (Romania) Settlement Regulations were promulgated in Order in Council 1972-570 of March 28, 1972 to deal with those claims notice of which had been received on or before December 14th, 1971 for recommendation, as provided in the Regulations. The Canadian Foreign Claims Commission is examining such claims and has begun making recommendations with regard to them. (c) The recommendation in respect of each claim is based on the evidence submitted by claimants and/or received from other sources, including the Government of Romania. In regard to the various elements necessary to establish eligibility for an award under the Regulations, the Commissioners must be satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to support a decision of eligibility by the Ministers designated in the Order in Council.

COST OF PROSECUTION OF IRVING NEWSPAPER INTEREST UNDER COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Question No. 232—Mr. Howie:

1. How much money has been paid in legal fees to date for the prosecution of the Irving newspaper interest under the Combines Investigation Act?

2. To whom was this money paid?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. $47,627.50

2. William L. Hoyt, Hoyt, Mockler, Allen, Dixon & Godin, Fredericton, N.B.

REVEREND GERVIS BLACK AND RONALD HUCK

Question No. 233—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is the Reverend Gervis Black employed by the government and, if so (a) what is the nature of his appointment (b) what was the date of the appointment (c) what is his salary?

2. Is Ronald Huck employed by the government and, if so, (a) what is the nature of his appointment (b) what was the date of the appointment (c) what is his salary?

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Yes. (a) Special Assistant to the Minister of Transport; (b) January 4, 1973; (c) Pay and classification of Administrative Officer 6.

2. No.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Question No. 269—Mr. Lawrence:

1. What staff members previously associated with the Prices and Incomes Commission are presently employed with the government and what are their responsibilities?

2. How many staff members including secretarial support staff have been hired or released since the publication of the final report of the Prices and Incomes Commission?

3. Is there any support role envisioned for the support staff of PIC with regard to the proposed joint committee on prices and wages?

4. Has the government sent any official to consult with the Governments of the United States or the United Kingdom with regard to the price and wage controls used in those countries?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. One hundred and three staff members previously associated with the Prices and Incomes Commission are now employed with the government. Of these 79 returned or moved to government departments or agencies prior to the termination of the Commission on August 31, 1972. In their present positions they are responsible for performing a wide variety of clerical, secretarial, administrative and professional work. Twenty-one other former staff members of the Commission are now employed with a working group in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The responsibilities of the group are to continue the contingency planning work of the Commission, to complete the editing, translating and publishing of the Commission's studies and to continue research on the role of prices and incomes policy in dealing with inflation.

2. Since September 1, 1972, three former staff members of the Prices and Incomes Commission have been released from the working group to move to other government employment and one has resigned. One former staff member has been hired.

FEDERAL PROPOSAL RESPECTING SHARED-COST PROGRAMS IN HEALTH FIELD—ACCEPTANCE BY PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question arising out of a proposal he submitted to the provinces last week designed, among other things, to limit the risk of the federal government in respect of shared-cost programs in the health field. Can the minister tell the House whether any province has accepted the proposal?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that proposal was made to the provinces and it is, in our opinion, a substantial improvement over the proposal submitted a while ago. We have agreed with the provinces to meet again in about two months to discuss further the proposed formula and in the meantime, the federal officials will meet with their provincial counterparts to discuss that proposal more extensively.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, that is a long way to go about saying "none". I should like to ask the minister precisely what the proposal is and whether the proposal is that the provinces accept what the minister placed before them last week? If this is not agreeable to the provinces, will the present shared-cost arrangements continue, or is the situation that the provinces must accept this proposal and nothing else?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: The proposal submitted to the provinces, Mr. Speaker, will meet, we hope, with the approval of most if not of all the provinces and we are endeavouring at the present time to come to an agreement with the provinces in the next two months. As for the rest, I think it is hypothetical.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister had a more straightforward answer last week than I am getting today. I would like to ask him whether in view of the fact the proposal made by him restricts the financial responsibility of the federal government while providing no such security for the provinces, he expects any provincial treasurer or provincial premier in his right mind to accept that proposal?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

MEETING OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS—DATE OF BUDGET

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in the light of the reply given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and in view of the reply given last week by the Prime Minister—

[English]

May I now address a residual question, shall we say, to the Minister of Finance respecting the solutions to the problems. Will the Minister of Finance tell us whether he is prepared to make a statement indicating the nature of the discussions he held with the provincial ministers of finance relating to the financial aspects and also to matters of welfare, health and what have you? Will he also tell us when he proposes to deal with these matters in a budget, as referred to directly by the Prime Minister on Friday last?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am naturally open, if it is the disposition of the House, to answer any direct questions that the hon. gentleman would like to put to me. As to the ulterior part of the question, there will be an opportunity to answer that in the near future.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister gave us an indication on Friday that the Minister of Finance could be a little more precise today, particularly as to the date of the budget, and bearing in mind that the provincial ministers of finance have also been told that they must wait. Surely to goodness the situation in the country is such that the Minister of Finance must be honest with the people of Canada and say that the budget is going to be on such and such date. What is it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is argument.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

FEDERAL PROPOSAL RESPECTING SHARED-COST MEDICARE PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF PRESENT ARRANGEMENT PENDING DISCUSSIONS ON NEW FORMULA

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I start with a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Pending the discussions on the new formula he has presented, has the federal government agreed to extend the present shared-cost program for medicare for a time, for at least a year or more, while these discussions take place?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the proposals made are now being considered by the provinces. We are to meet in two months and we hope at that time we can establish whether there is sufficient consensus for an agreement. Failing such an agreement, of course, other means would have to be examined.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the minister that he is not meeting the urgency of the situation. Unless I am mistaken the five-year period terminates at the end of March, probably before the next meeting of the ministers involved. In view of that fact, and in view of the fact they may not be able to reach an agreement within two months and may require more time, is the government considering making a definite extension of the five-year period in order to meet these eventualities?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, that matter was raised by none of the provinces, it was not discussed and has apparently not been the special concern of any province.

Again, we shall do our best to reach an agreement within the specified period.

CAPITAL WORKS PROGRAM—AMOUNT OF FUNDS ALLOCATED TO PROVINCES AND MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I then ask a question of the Minister of Finance. I may say that this is in another area, Mr. Speaker, but I hope you will not mind. Has the amount in the capital works program announced several months ago, which was to be expanded this winter—his calculation was $65 million and mine is $50 million but the exact amount does not matter—already been spoken for by the provinces and municipalities? Has any part of that amount already been requested by the governments concerned and if the entire amount has not, what part of it has been?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in order to be fair to the hon. gentleman and to the House I would like to get precise figures for him. I might say, however, that a number of provinces found themselves in a position to disburse their allocation of that amount very shortly and certainly within the cash flow anticipated this winter.

HEALTH

DELAYING OF THRUST FUND—USE TO DEVELOP IMPROVED SERVICES AT REDUCED COST ON BASIS OF PROVINCIAL NEEDS—DISCUSSION AT CONFERENCE

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Could the minister indicate the reasons for delaying the thrust fund of $640 million from 1972-1973 to 1973-1974, and can he assure the House that the funds will be used to develop improved health services at reduced costs on the basis of provincial needs that are determined by the provincial health authorities?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question, the reason for the delay is that the whole program has been delayed by one year; the base year was 1971-72 and now it is 1972-73; what had been proposed before now has been changed and postponed by a full year. That is the reason this thrust fund amount is taking effect only next year. On the second part of the question, the answer is yes.

Mr. Holmes: Could the minister indicate if new proposals for extended health coverage were discussed at the recent federal-provincial conference at which health ministers were in attendance and, if so, will these proposals be presented to the House at an early date?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I apologize but I could not hear the first part of the question. Would the hon. member kindly repeat it?

Mr. Holmes: I shall be glad to, Mr. Speaker. At the recent federal-provincial conference where health ministers were in attendance, were new proposals for extended health service covered at that time and, if so, will the minister be good enough to present them to the House at an early date?

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, the only proposals that were made were in the nature of the amended formula that was put forward; there were no other schemes or proposals presented to the provinces—

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, come on; what about Quebec?

Mr. Lalonde: —in the field of health. If the Leader of the Opposition has heard of another formula I should be glad to hear of it, but what has been put forward has been—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

DOCTORS' INCOMES—DISCUSSION OF CONTROL AT HEALTH MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the professional earnings of active fee practice physicians across Canada have been going up enormously in the past few years and particularly in the province of Ontario between 1960 and 1970 when the earnings of practising physicians neatly doubled—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make a speech; he should ask a question. I think the observation I direct to the hon. member could very well be directed to others. Questions should be asked directly without prefacing them by statements of fact.

Mr. Harney: Mr. Speaker, as you were saying, I was merely prefacing my question. Were there any discussions at the conference between the minister and the provincial ministers of health on the matter of exercising some control over the ever-increasing incomes of fee practitioners across the country?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—PARTICIPATION OF MINISTER IN NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General.

Can he tell us whether or not he intends to take a more active part in the negotiations between the department and the workers?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am already very active in the matter. I can tell the hon. members that negotiations were resumed last night and that they are continuing today.

[English]

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to take it from the Postmaster General's observation that he is now in charge of the negotiations for the government, having taken over from the President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Woolliams: Thank God!

AIR TRANSPORT

IN-FLIGHT SAFETY STANDARDS—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO ENFORCEMENT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the in-flight safety standards of commercial air carriers and the application of the regulations thereto. It arises out of a specific request by the Canadian Airline Flight Attendants Association. Has the minister undertaken a special inquiry into whether commercial air carriers are following all in-flight safety standard requirements and, if not, is he going to undertake such an inquiry immediately?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I will take this question as notice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, last week the minister gave the House his assurance that the safety of passengers using Canada's commercial airlines would not be impaired in any way by the strikes, etc., which have been going on. In view of the allegations which were made over the weekend, could the minister advise the House whether he is reviewing the enforcement procedures to make sure that the carriers will follow the regulations as specified by the ministry of transport? Also, in order to reassure the public and the House, would the minister make a statement to this effect within the next week?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I think I mentioned in this House before—and I can repeat it—that we are following the application of safety rules very closely, especially in the case of Wardair, and that our inspectors make constant checks. So far, Wardair flights and maintenance services have been entirely in compliance with the department's standards.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate the minister's reply, but in view of the allegations made over the week end which implied that commercial air carriers—

[Editor's note: At this point a baby began to cry in the gallery.]

Mr. Mazankowski: I had not realized that I had that effect, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: That child wants candies.

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the allegations made over the weekend, which affect all commercial carriers including Wardair and, specifically, Air Canada, would the minister undertake to review immediately the enforcement procedures undertaken by his department.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, before reviewing the standard of security I am going to check on the facts which were reported.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the right hon. gentleman. The hon. member for St. Catharines is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Morgan: Mr. Speaker, I was going to say there is a stranger in the House. I wanted to ask a supplementary question but perhaps I can do so later.

GRAIN

PROVISION OF CARS BY RAILWAYS TO TRANSPORT WHEAT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport a serious situation on the Prairies where, although the quota has been opened up in many marketing areas, rail cars are not available to transport wheat. Will he have this looked into, because it is creating a very serious economic situation throughout western Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the railways are, as usual, working closely with the Canadian Wheat Board in providing cars for those delivery points which require them. Following the rapid opening up of quotas in the fall, some congestion certainly has resulted in some blocks. I am happy to report that at the meeting I had with the Canadian Wheat Board yesterday it was indicated to me that literally hundreds of cars are going into these blocks to relieve the congestion there in short order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would have thought the Minister of Transport would answer. I thank the minister of all the departments for his answer.

Mr. Baldwin: And master of none.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Could I ask the minister whether he will secure a promise of co-operation so that hundreds of cars will move from block to block? In portions of Saskatchewan there have not been cars since the latter part of December and the situation is serious. Even in the minister's own constituency—

An hon. Member: What is the question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am trying to help out.

REPORTED ADVICE BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE TO FARMERS ON AMOUNT OF WHEAT THAT SHOULD BE PLANTED

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In advising farmers to plant 30 million acres of wheat, did the minister take into account reports that the United States department of agriculture is going to release some 15 million acres for planting this year? Also, is the minister developing a storage program and, indeed, a transportation program to meet the increased production, which will be 50 per cent, and which the minister should be anticipating?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I advised the farmers of Canada, not just western Canada, to produce all kinds of grain. I did not put any acreage figure on it whatsoever. The records will show that. At every meeting that I held in western Canada with my provincial counterparts we discussed all grains, including rapeseed, those that are important not only for the feeding of livestock in this country but for the markets we have developed over the past four years. Anyone who says anything different is not stating the fact.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: Of course, that is up to the Minister of Agriculture. If he claims he did not say it, I do not know where the newsmen got their information. Can the House assume that the minister's advice to the farmers is any more reliable than that which the minister in charge of the Wheat Board—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN SUBSIDIES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

In answer to a question I put to him several days ago, the hon. minister said that there would be a meeting with the Canadian Dairy Commission. My question is: in view of the fact that recently production costs have climbed substantially because feed grain prices increased, can the minister tell the House if he recommended to the Canadian Dairy Commission to increase the dairy product subsidies in order that a certain balance can be achieved?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met with the dairy commission. I understand the national advisory commission to the dairy commission is meeting today in Ottawa. We are hoping that some recommendations will come from that meeting.

HOGS—PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. My question also pertains to subsidies. In view of the fact some farmers raise hogs in a joint program with feed companies or the prairie pools, has the government decided who receives the hog subsidy payment, the farmer or the wheat pool?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the farmer owns the hogs he receives the subsidy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will allow the hon. member a supplementary, although he will appreciate that his question was not entirely supplementary. I believe the hon. member for Richmond has a supplementary to the previous question. The hon. member may ask a supplementary and we will then return to the previous question.

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In any case where a pool or a feed company has received the payment, will the minister have the payment refunded and paid to the farmer concerned?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are constantly checking these submissions as they are made. There may have been errors or omissions in some of the applications. However, where there is just a straight contract to feed a hog for $2 until it is ready for market and you do not own the hog and you do not own the feed, you are a hired man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY RESPECTING INCREASE IN MILK PRODUCT PRICES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert).

In view of the minister's answer, can he tell us when he will announce to the House the departmental policies about a possible increase in milk prices paid to farmers?

Mr. Speaker, the minister has apparently not heard my question. When will he announce to the House the department's future policy regarding milk producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): I hope soon, Mr. Speaker.

PUBLIC WORKS

ALLEGED DISPOSAL OF OLD BARGES BY DEPARTMENT IN LAKE OKANAGAN—STEPS TO REMOVE

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Public Works. In view of the immediate hazard to navigation and safety caused by the attempted disposal by the government by sinking three derelict barges in beautiful Okanagan Lake, can the minister tell the House what steps are being taken to remove these barges and especially to ensure that the air-filled 45 gallon drums still attached to the barges are removed before they break from their rope ties and shoot to the surface? Mr. Speaker, I am told some of these drums—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot tell us what he has been told. He can ask a question. The minister might reply to the question.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the barges are not the property of the government and that they were sunk in a place where there is no danger to navigation. If there should be a danger to navigation they would be removed. However, they are not a contaminant.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe does not object to it we could allow the hon. member for Okanagan-Boundary to ask a supplementary question.

[English]

Mr. Whittaker: Can the Minister of Public Works tell us whether the government is contemplating using dynamite to remove these barges?

Mr. Dubé: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

COMMUNICATIONS

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF DAVEY REPORT

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications.

Is the government aware of the two statements made by Senator Davey in Peterborough on November 19 and in Toronto on January 16, urging the government to act on the recommendations contained in the Davey report and arising out of a study on information media that took place in 1970?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Wagner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister explain to this House why it has not to date acted on this report?

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer was in the Speech from the Throne which announces a document on government intentions concerning communications to come during the first few weeks of this session.

POWER

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDRO DEVELOPMENT—STUDY OF FEDERAL INTERESTS AFFECTED—AVAILABILITY TO PUBLIC

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. Has the Department of the Environment caused a study entitled "An Analysis of Federal Interests Affected by the Proposed James Bay Hydro Development" to be made and, if so, when is it going to be made public?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is a series of joint studies under way, joint in the sense they are federal-provincial studies. They are the only ones of which I am aware.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): This is a federal inquiry only. Will the minister check further with the department as there are a number of questions I wish to ask him about this study?

PROPOSED HYDRO DEVELOPMENT IN NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN—PARTICIPATION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN INVESTIGATION

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of the Environment. Is the minister also involved with the province of Saskatchewan in conducting an inquiry into the proposed hydro development project in the northern part of Saskatchewan in the Black Lake area? Is that a joint or a federal inquiry?

[Mr. Dubé.]

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the federal government is involved at this stage. The provincial government may be asking for federal assistance in such an inquiry.

Mr. Korchinski: Possibly the Minister of Indian Affairs may be able to assist the Minister of the Environment in answering this question. Is it a policy of the federal government to conduct separate inquiries with regard to the interests of the environmentalists and the Indian people, or will this be done jointly?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, the interests of the native people and the fishery in the area will definitely be taken into account.

ENERGY

ASSISTANCE TO ELDORADO NUCLEAR LIMITED IN NEGOTIATING CONTRACT FOR EXPORT OF URANIUM CONCENTRATE

Mr. Elias Nesdoly (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister please indicate to the House whether or not the government is contemplating helping the Crown corporation, Eldorado Nuclear Limited of Uranium City, Saskatchewan, to negotiate a contract for the export of uranium concentrate along the lines of the $29 million given to Denison Mines back in the 1970's?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take further note of that and respond to the hon. member at a later date.

Mr. Nesdoly: Would the minister be good enough to explain to the House the reasons for subsidizing a private corporation while at the same time neglecting a Crown corporation in Uranium City which has been laying off workers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question such as this is debate. I would suggest to the hon. member for Meadow Lake and to other hon. members who put questions asking the government to make an explanation that they are inviting a statement that ought normally to be made on motions.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—PROPOSED PEACEKEEPING FORCE—NATURE OF CANADIAN ELEMENT

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me the opportunity of rephrasing the question I had hoped to put on Friday to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the minister's answer to my question on that occasion about the force being prepared for possible service in Viet Nam, would he assure the House that since that force, as the minister said in Hansard at page 474, will be a volunteer force those who do not volunteer will not be confronted with delays affecting their normal discharge or release?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as I said last week, all personnel in the Canadian armed forces are volunteers, but when there are specific duties to be performed they are selected for those duties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: Wait till Mackenzie King hears that.

Mr. Richardson: To put it another way, Mr. Speaker, you only volunteer once and that is when you join up. You volunteer for service anywhere in the world. After that specific assignments are a matter of selection.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): For purposes of clarification, would the minister assure the House that those who have not been selected for this assignment—I am not sure whether they are going to volunteer or be selected for the assignment—will be exempt from any penalties respecting their discharge or retirement?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I tried to make it clear that personnel do not volunteer for specific assignments. They are selected for specific assignments.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ALLEGED EXCLUSION OF GAGETOWN FROM BASES SHARING FUNDS FOR LABOUR-INTENSIVE PROJECTS

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister tell the House why Base Gagetown in New Brunswick was omitted from the 40 bases sharing the $13.3 million allotted for federal labour-intensive projects?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question, I suggest, ought normally be placed on the order paper. If there is urgency it can be considered at the time of adjournment.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ACCEPT AS ITS OWN MOTION PROPOSING ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Wally Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government House leader. Would the government be willing to accept as its own motion motion No. 49 in my name on the order paper. I am referring to the notice of motion that a committee of the House be set up to look at all aspects of the aboriginal rights of the native peoples of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to examine the motion and discuss it with my colleagues, especially the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and advise my hon. friend later.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

APPROVAL BY MINISTER OF FINANCE OF CERTAIN ADVANCES OF FUNDS TO COMMISSION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he has approved the advances to the Unemployment Insurance Commission in excess of the $800 million statutory limit set by act of parliament?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, since this was done in accordance with the law, yes.

Mr. Baldwin: If advances were made in excess of $800 million, did the minister give his authorization under section 137? If it was in writing, would he table it, and would he give the legal opinion under which he saw fit to exceed the provision of an act of parliament?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I disagree fundamentally with the premise on which the hon. member bases his question. The authorization was given under section 23 of the Financial Administration Act and was part of a general authorization involving my collective responsibility in the cabinet which was behind the order in council.

Mr. Baldwin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member proceeds with his point of order I think I owe it to hon. members to remind the minister and the hon. member for Reace River that they are now engaging in a debate about a matter that has already been referred by the House to a committee. The hon. member for Peace River on a point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that I asked the minister a simple, clear question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: It may not be clear to people who break the law, but it is clear to me. I asked him whether he made an authorization under section 137 of the act, and he can answer that yes or no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River will appreciate that is hardly a point of order. He is asking for a second time the question he asked a moment ago.

PROJECTED COST FOR YEAR

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact the minister now has legislation on the order paper removing the statutory ceiling, and since I know he will have a projected cost figure if his intention is to get such legislation passed, can the minister advise whether he has any projected costs for the Unemployment Insurance Commission for the year 1972-73?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Unemployment Insurance Commission benefit pay-outs and administrative costs are based on the calendar year, not on the fiscal year, just as a matter of interest. When we have some indication of the kind of amendments that will be made to the act and their acceptability, as well as the kind of administrative changes to be made, I shall be glad to deal with them in detail before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the minister is debating my question; I asked a simple question. The minister must have some projected cost for the future regarding the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is simply repeating his question. He has asked the question once and he knows that he can ask a question but the minister does not have to reply.

Mr. Alexander: Would the minister undertake, if he cannot answer the question at this time, to table such projected costs before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration in order that the committee may be in a position to know whether or not the minister should receive a blank cheque in regard to this legislation?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, whether or not I will be able to table such a forecast is something I cannot commit myself on now, but I have no doubt that this question will be extensively discussed when it comes before the committee.

STATUS OF WOMEN

MINISTER DESIGNATED TO DEAL WITH RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister, one that is close both to his and to my own heart. Would the right hon. gentleman tell the House which member of the cabinet has been designated to deal with those matters relating to women arising out of the royal commission report on the status of women?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a minister who is very close to my heart, the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has a supplementary question and I will then recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, now that we know who is in charge of women's affairs, may I ask the minister whether he plans to introduce legislation at this session to implement the recommendations of the royal commission on the status of women?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I hope soon to be in a position to state the government's policy in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have just about reached the end of the question period. Perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway might ask her supplementary question and I will then recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West. I am afraid that afterwards I shall have to call orders of the day.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Labour would consider a statement very shortly on his priorities in introducing this legislation?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROVISION OF FUNDS TO PAY BENEFITS PENDING PASSAGE OF BILL

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since the government has not yet chosen to bring forward Bill C-124 for debate on second reading, will he advise the House how the government proposes to finance benefits after February 7 or February 8, referred to by the President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should think that question ought to be answered by way of a statement on motions. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, that it is difficult for the Chair to allow that question to be answered now. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOOD PRICES

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

The House resumed, from Friday, January 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray:

That a Special Committee of this House be appointed to enquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends;

That 20 Members of the House of Commons to be designated by the House at a later date be the members of the Special Committee and that Standing Order 65(5) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; to engage the services of counsel, accountants and such other clerical and technical personnel as may be deemed necessary.

And the amendment thereto of Mr. McGrath (page 477), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harney (Page 478).

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is with a little reluctance that we agreed to support the motion of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), partly because we doubt very much that the government is serious about dealing with the question of food prices and partly because we doubt that the Conservative party is serious about tackling this problem. That is why we proposed the amendments we have proposed and the additional ones that I think will be proposed. We wanted to put some teeth in the structure of the committee so it will be able to examine the question of rising food prices and make some clear, definitive recommendations.

Perhaps I might mention very briefly that we have before us an amendment and our own sub-amendment. I think the amendment for the three-month time limit on the activities of the committee is designed with no other purpose in mind than to see the committee die at the end of the three month period having accomplished nothing. The contemplation of the Conservative party is that within three months the committee will terminate and that there will be nothing further to be examined. I expect that they have either a crystal ball, which is probably the case, or that they intend to destroy whatever effectiveness the committee might have. That is why we moved the amendment we are now considering.

We envisage the possibility of continuing operations of this committee with the hope that it can examine many aspects of food prices within a minimum time following the establishment of the committee. Every Conservative member who has spoken, as I listened to them in any event, attempted to discredit the potential of the committee. They tried to establish doubts in the minds of everyone who listened to them by suggesting that the committee structure would be of no value. I think that is the prelude to their concept of the committee and what it may or may not be able to accomplish.

I see that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Andras) is not in the House at the moment, but I am sure he will be listening somewhere or will read these remarks at some time. In closing his remarks, he said that he would be quite prepared to appear as a witness before the committee to give it whatever information he had in his possession or that was available to him. I wonder seriously about the value of that. If the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has information which is of value, and which discloses what is taking place within the food processing industry, a more important course than presenting it to the committee would be for him to act on it. What would be more favourable would be for the minister and the government to say they know what is taking place and take some legislative action. If on the other hand the minister is not in possession of valuable information, then why should he appear before the committee with it? Why should he bother the committee by presenting something to it which does not appear to be of any value whatever? This is another reason I doubt the sincerity of the government in proposing this particular committee.

Let me consider some of the aspects of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I refer not to the corporate affairs section of the department, but the consumer affairs part. We all know that the purpose of the corporate affairs section of the department is to maintain an even flow of campaign funds into the treasury of the party to which the hon. minister belongs. The consumer affairs section has tipped its hand by indicating it is largely an apologist for rising prices, an explainer-away of exorbitant prices, and really is not serious about trying to deal with the problem. I want to make a brief reference to the same thing the minister mentioned when he spoke, namely coffee. In one of the publications of the minister's department, "Consumer Contact" of November, 1972, there is reference to coffee prices. Let me indicate what that reference is:

We had a letter the other day from a Member of Parliament complaining about the price Canadians pay for coffee. Our reply was enlightening but hardly satisfying. The truth is that we can't do much about it, because we don't grow coffee.

I suggest that exemplifies the response of the whole department. It just throws up its hands and says it is none of its business; it cannot do anything about it because coffee is grown outside the country. Therefore, it is powerless to take any action whatever in respect of it.

In the same publication on the front page, there is a paragraph devoted to the production of honey. Under the heading "Bees Do It", and I submit this is probably the most enlightening thing in the whole pamphlet as everybody knows that honey is produced in Canada, the article states:

You've probably noticed that domestic prices for honey have shot up in the last year.

It indicates that the price of No. 1 white honey increased by 24.4 per cent from July, 1971 to July 1972. Then, there is a long explanation of how bees do it and what happens. The article winds up by saying this:

Consumers are naturally annoyed at these price increases as it places an additional strain on the family budget.

What insight. I do not know how the minister or any of his colleagues could possible know that, but that is what it says. Probably the same man who said the department could not do anything about the price of coffee because we do not grow it here went on to say in respect of honey prices:

The best advice we can offer consumers is to shop wisely for less expensive products—

The taxpayer has to pay for this drivel that comes out of the consumer affairs section of the minister's department. I ask again in a rhetorical way, what possible value could there be in the minister appearing before the committee, unless it is to use this opportunity as a kind of grandstand on which to make some other simpering declarations about how concerned he is with food prices.

I think also that the Conservative party approach to the matter is suspect.

An hon. Member: Come on.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for horsefoot—I am sorry, Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) nods his head in agreement, that there is something suspect about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard: Perhaps I should point out that it is more than suspect, it is hypocritical. The hon. member for Crowfoot and all his buddies, most of them in the front benches, who were here when the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was Prime Minister, were confronted with the question of rising food prices. They took that time honoured Conservative way of dealing with the situation. They appointed a royal commission. In fact, that was the traditional way in which the Conservative party approached every problem. The only time they got into trouble was when they ran out of party hacks to appoint to royal commissions.

• (1500)

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): We never appointed royal commissions.

Mr. Howard: The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, when he was Prime Minister, appointed a royal commission. Someone said he did not. The hon. member for Crowfoot obviously was not paying attention at that time because, as is the case now, he was not interested in the subject matter. Dr. Stewart was chairman of that commission. In any event, a royal commission was appointed in respect of the price spreads of food in 1959. The report was published in blue. That should be recognized by the hon. gentlemen from the Conservative party.

Before anyone says, "Oh, but that is old stuff; that is not like us new Tories", let me point out that this whole front bench comprises the same gang who were here in 1959 and who hid from that subject. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) and the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) who are looking at me now were in that cabinet. They knew, and they have read that report. Let me tell you what the report had to say about the situation. It recommended the establishment of a permanent council on prices, productivity and incomes which would involve a review of the whole area of the food industry and which would bring in an early report to the Governor in Council. What has happened to that recommendation? This was before the government was defeated. The Conservatives ran away from that recommendation like a cockroach shuttling out of the light, yet they have the audacity to stand up in this House—the same ones who in those years had the largest majority in the history of our country—and tell us they are concerned about food prices. I just do not believe them, Mr. Speaker.

Let me now talk about the Liberal and Conservative conspiracy. At that time the Minister of Justice was Davie Fulton and the great leading Liberal light was Jack Pickersgill. The two of them, like long lost lovers who had not seen each other for years, embraced in the middle of this floor, put their arms around each other and gave the food industry in Canada the right to sit down and conspire to fix prices. They put that into the legislation. It is in the Combines Investigation Act at the present time. At that time in 1960 the Liberals and Conservatives conspired. Incidentally, the amendment which was accepted was introduced by Jack Pickersgill. The Combines Investigation Act provides that it is an offence to fix prices except that, I believe it is in subsection (4) of section 32, it provides:

> ... The court shall not convict the accused if the conspiracy, combination, agreement or arrangement relates only to the export of articles from Canada.

Does anyone mean to tell me that the fish-packing companies and food processing companies which are able to sit down and work out a price-fixing agreement for the export market forget all about that when they place goods on the shelves in Canada? They fix prices and this practice is sanctioned by the law. It is sanctioned by the Liberals and Conservatives. That is why I doubt the honesty and sincerity of the hon. gentlemen who belong to these parties and who have spoken in support of this measure.

One reason given by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) for moving his amendment in respect of the Senate was that the House of Commons committee must remain in Ottawa to examine these questions. I hope the committee does not remain in Ottawa. I hope it goes out into the country. I hope the members of the committee travel up north and into other such areas where they can see what it is like to spend a fortune on a can of beans, what it is like to live month after month on canned, processed or dried food. The only time people in such areas see fresh vegetables is when the carrots are like rubber and a head of lettuce looks like a dirty shirt which has been worn for a week. And these items are sold at exorbitant prices.

I ask the members of the committee and the government to consider this. I suggest they find out what it is like for the housewife and wage earner to have to attempt to make ends meet not only because we have a steady increase in food prices in the southern part of Canada but also because this situation exists in rural areas and in northern Canada. They should see what people have to put up with in those areas. I hope the Conservatives will retract the suggestion that members of the committee remain here in the comfort of the air conditioned committee rooms in these buildings and tell the consumers to come here instead of going out to see what the consumers have to endure. In that way the members of the committee would learn what the consumers have to put up with and would not be dealing with dry, impersonal statistics, cost items and figures in the comfort of the rooms of these buildings. I believe it is shameful to suggest to the consumers across this land that we are not prepared to go out and speak to them. It is shameful for the Conservative party to say to those people that they should travel great distances to see us.

There is no purpose in extolling again and again the importance of this question. Everybody knows the statistics in respect of food prices. There is no purpose in filling the records with additional statistics. This has been done before and probably will be done again. I believe that, more than anything else, we must think in terms of this committee coming up with an immediate answer in respect of staple items of food. I am not referring to chocolate-covered ants or butterfly wings or all these other rare, exotic foods which exist, or boiled cockroaches as my friend behind me suggests. I want to see some action in respect of bread, butter, meat, eggs, milk, fresh fruits and vegetables which are so necessary for a growing child and which many people are being denied. These are the things at which the committee must look. It should come up with some immediate recommendations and suggestions to deal with the price of those things, and then continue its deliberations into the more unusual aspects of food prices.

I suggest that the committee consider breaking into subcommittees so that those members who are afraid to go out and speak to the consumers may remain in Ottawa, look at the books, examine the corporate records and ascertain how the food industry is able, as the items proceed through the various segments of the chain to the retail shelves, to add an exorbitant percentage of mark-ups, even within the same company. Let us examine that. Let us see what the middleman is extracting and why the farmer is receiving the least possible amount of the food dollar. Let us see why the fisherman does not get a fair share of the food dollar. Let us find out who the middle man is and inhibit his ability and his opportunity to cheat Canadian prime producers, farmers, fishermen as well as consumers.

Let us have another part of that committee, do as the committee on agriculture did a few years ago. Let them out into the country and see what it is like in these areas; let them feel in their guts what it is like to have to stand in a grocery store with a few dollars available to you and debate which is the cheapest type of carbohydrate food that you can buy. You do not have to debate about buying protein food or buying beef or steaks. I know families, as I am sure other members in the House do, who do not see a steak from one year's end to the next. The hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) will confirm that there is what Indian people refer to as "Indian steak". Indian steak is baloney. That is about the limit of the meat purchases that many families can make. We all know that baloney is not a very nutritious food as compared with natural food products such as steaks, roasts and chops which are foreign to these people. Let the committee break up into sub-committees and go out into the country to see what the Canadian people have to endure. Perhaps we should even demand that members of the House try to live for a month on the income on which dozens and dozens of families in this country have to exist. Perhaps then they would come back into the comfort of the committee room and really try to write a report which would contain recommendations that were meaningful to the consumers of this nation.

If the committee is going to follow the Tory line, sit here in Ottawa and have formal presentations made to it, they will not get the least understanding of what the situation is, and will not be able to make any worthwhile recommendations.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I suppose because I am a new member I do not share the scepticism of some of my colleagues who told me that the Conservative party does not have a policy with respect to rising food prices. Perhaps I am more charitably disposed, but I have always felt that in fact they do have a policy but they have kept it secret very effectively.

Mr. Dinsdale: Ho, ho, ho!

Mr. McRae: They have kept it secret throughout the last election campaign and through most of this debate. I must commend the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) for his very fine rhetorical effort and for the fact that he spoke for 20 or 30 minutes during which time he was able to keep this secret. But you can imagine my surprise when, on Friday afternoon, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Reilly) blew the secret, at least I believe he did. He said: We must regulate wages and prices. I believe that that is the secret policy of the Conservative party. The reason I believe this is that the policy commends itself to that party. It is basically simple. It is not encumbered by extraneous ideas about, for example, how you control profits. It is not encumbered by abstractions such as information on world food prices. It is not encumbered by concerns about nutrition, and so on. It is a simple policy to deal with a simple problem as if we were still in 1950. But this is 1973. There are no simple problems, and therefore there are no simple answers.

Mr. Dinsdale: The problems have been compounded by the government.

Mr. McRae: I was much more impressed with the words of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and her suggestion for the establishment of a prices review board. She is well known in the field of food and consumer prices, and I think there is some merit in this solution. I do not know whether it should be adopted in exactly the way it is suggested, but there are some short-term problems which may be solved by the method she suggested.

There are other matters which I hope the committee will consider, such as the quantity of distribution outlets in this country. These are factors which bear on food prices. I believe the committee will have to give the hon. member's suggestion very serious consideration, and if it agrees with that suggestion, I will certainly support it.

As I mentioned earlier, we are living in a far more complex time than the 1950's to which I referred, and there are no basic and simple answers to this problem. I welcome the establishment of this committee, first, because I think it is time we put before the Canadian public and before members of the House the complexity of the problem of rising food prices in the world. I refer to world food prices because this is the crux of the whole problem. We are no longer dealing with a simple matter of shortages of food in Canada or rising prices in Canada.

We are dealing with global price increases. We have been told by such people as Brock Chisholm, by groups from the United Nations, by population experts and by a recent publication called "Limits to Growth" coming from M.I.T, that a growing population will create growing food problems. I contend that we are at a point where we will have to face these particular problems.

I think there are two aspects to world food problems that we must consider. First and foremost is the growing number of human beings on this earth. We are told that the world's population will double in 33 years, that it is growing at the rate of 2.1 per cent per year, and that that exponential growth rate will give us a population of around seven billion around the turn of the century, as opposed to 3.6 billion in 1970. We are told that the growth rate itself is rising. In the middle of the 17th century we had a growth rate of about .3 per cent; today it is 2.1 per cent. So, we have a massive problem. It is not such a great problem in areas of the world like Canada where the growth rate of the population is levelling off somewhat, but it is a great problem in many areas of the world where the population is still growing at an ever-increasing rate.

There is another problem in connection with the so-called affluent countries where the demand for food is growing at an excessive rate. This demand of the affluent nations on the food supply is serious. I hope the committee will take a real look at the food problem as a world problem, will take a look at the growing world population, and take a look at the excessive demands made by affluent nations on the supply of food.

I would make one or two suggestions to the committee as possible solutions. Canada, under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and government, has developed a very fine reputation in international circles. Mr. Speaker, we are a major producer of food. I think it would be a fine thing if, as a nation, we took it upon ourselves to present this problem in international circles and call for a world conference on food shortages, similar to the conference on the environment held in Sweden last spring, which we supported. Second, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the committee take a good look at food supplies. I am convinced that there has been too much movement from the farms to the cities in Canada. I believe there are areas of the country which could still be farmed, and farmed in the future, thus helping to reverse that trend.

I am convinced also that as an affluent nation we have not done a good job in developing better food supplies in the non-affluent, non-industrialized parts of the world. Production of food in some of those areas has not grown as it should have, partly because the measures taken were too grandiose to suit the social patterns of the peoples living in those countries. More effective methods must be sought. In the non-industrialized nations of the world over the last ten years, per capita production of food has remained just about even. In Latin America and Asia the curve has remained almost unchanged, while I notice that in Africa in the last two years it has actually moved in a downward direction. We are not helping to increase supplies of food in those areas in any substantial way.

The third suggestion I make is that all the countries of the world, and this includes the affluent nations, need a great deal more information about the nutritional value of foods. There is much that can be done to substitute some foods that are cheap for other foods that are expensive. This is another area the committee could examine.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to repeat that I welcome the establishment of the proposed committee because I think it is time for us to put away simple answers to highly complex questions. This committee will give us an opportunity to start understanding the complexity of world food shortages. The committee should not recommend just one simple solution. I hope it will make attempts on several fronts to solve the problem.

Mr. Stan Shellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, being one of the younger members of the House of Commons it gives me a great deal of pleasure to rise and speak. I am still slightly idealistic, however, and I wish members would stop talking, as some of the NDP and other people have been doing, and get right down to work on some of these problems.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shellenberger: Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself with other hon. members in congratulating you on your election to the high position you hold, and also in congratulating Mr. Deputy Speaker on his election to that post.

I do not think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is proposing anything new in his food prices probe. Indeed, the administration of which he was a part in 1966 made a similar last ditch effort to control a situation of which they had clearly lost control. This, to my way of thinking, is an act of desperation, an admission that the government's fiscal and economic policies were a failure, a disaster to all Canadians, calamitous to small business, ruinous to the farmer, and inexplicable to the general public. The general public can only suffer in their bewilderment, and await an opportunity to state their opinion at the ballot box, an opinion which they already gave on October 30 last but the implementation of which has been slightly held back by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I state that that is a judgment which will be rendered again very soon.

So, admitting that the collective responsibility and genius of the cabinet have failed, the government seeks to extend the responsibility to a committee. The supposedly wise men can no longer handle the problem. I doubt very much if they ever could. It is a convenient situation, Mr. Speaker, but I have no doubt that the committee will acquit itself well, especially since the Liberals will not have a majority on it.

Controls of any sort on the economy are abhorrent to a free society, to a free market economy, to people who love freedom and are convinced that the system under which we live is the best in the world. We believe this because the free enterprise system is a natural one. It is based on natural law. But because it is natural, its operations can be affected by the unnatural—the perversities which lurk in men, the machinations of the corporate agglomerations which control so much of our lives today. It is to eliminate these perversities that my leader has called for stern medicine to return Canada to the status quo.

Consumerism is a fashionable trend these days, and I think it is a pretty good one. The Canadian public, exposed to this movement and to its ideals, are fed up with the gimmickry and quasi-honest promotions that are now part of the advertising game. Here I must make reference to my colleague, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), who stated that consumers are to blame for this to some degree. They demand coloured Kleenex and coloured boxes instead of white Kleenex. They want enclosed shopping centres so that they do not have to cope with the weather. In so doing the cost of these things to some extent must be paid by them. But consumers are now demanding standard packaging. Mr. Speaker, I understans that soon there will be a series of upwards of 15,000 different packages. I would hope the public will want a pound that is a pound, an orange that is an orange, and a box of corn flakes that is a box of corn flakes, not corn flakes and air, with a toy whistle, or a decal with which children can smear their faces.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) says that there are rising costs in the food processing industry. I hope he is not referring to some of the farm establishments, and specifically to the feed grain industry. I believe his remarks had a general application. For example, the demands by producers for higher dairy subsidies, because of the government's bungling of preferential treatment for Canada resulting from the expansion of the EEC, will result in more price increases. I have spoken about this a number of times, Mr. Speaker, but so far have not received any answers. The public, he says, must be conditioned to pay a more realistic price for food. Perhaps he is proclaiming that we should tell the consumer what a fine job we have done. Let him tell that to the people who now pay 19 per cent of their income dollar for food and an ever-increasing percentage of their gross national product into the government's ever-expanding pockets.

Last year, Mr. Speaker, 38 per cent of the gross national product went to taxes. If the consumer is going to be conditioned to pay more for food, then the government had better start leading the way by lowering taxes. I for one, Mr. Speaker, would rather spend a dollar or two on a sirloin steak than pay it to the federal bureucracy any day of the week. A chicken in every pot is better than dollars into the quicksand, as is the case with the absorption of citizen's money by the tax authorities.

I want to make it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that I do not feel it is the farmer who is responsible for rising food costs but rather the processors, distributors and retail supermarket cartels. A day or two ago, Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada informed me that while the consumer price index went up by 39 per cent in the last 12 years, wages in the meat industry went up by 71 per cent. Farm income continues to shrink, however. Prices received by farmers for farm products have advanced by only 13 per cent since 1967, while the general wholesale price index has increased by 22 per cent.

We have been talking about solutions, Mr. Speaker, and I agree that they are not easy to find, especially solutions which guard our free enterprise system. However, it is time for the rights of the many to be considered as well as the rights of the few. It is far too late for the government to regain any popularity in the west by sending the Minister of Agriculture from Ontario to Halifax to reveal another phase of the government's deathbed repentence and discovery of the western farmer. The government already stands condemned because of its arrogance and ineptitude.

I believe that the provisions of Bill C-180 should be amended to take away the power now given to the Governor in Council to exempt certain products from the application of the act and give that power to parliament alone. The erosion of the powers of parliament and the assumption of quasi-presidential power by the cabinet is one of the most alarming trends in Canadian society. I shall refer to this question again at a later date, Mr. Speaker. Let us give the power back to parliament. We may be nobodies, Mr. Speaker, but I would rather leave the decision to 264 nobodies than 30 precious technocrats sitting in the front benches opposite.

Let us not forget that the farmer is a consumer, too, who must normally buy most of his food like anyone else. He is just as concerned as the rest of society with the rising costs of food—perhaps more so because as everyone knows, farming is generally not a high income occupation. Farm families are more likely to suffer diet deficiencies than non-farm families. They pay more of their limited income for the necessities of life; usually they live at a distance from the discount stores and volume dealers and so have less opportunity for comparison shopping.

One of the things I should like to add to this probe on food prices is an experience that I shared with some of the students at the University of Alberta. We conducted a research project covering approximately 40 stores in Edmonton. One of the food chains had approximately 60 per cent of the sales volume of the area and seemed to have most of the stores. We found that these stores were directly over-pricing in areas in which there were low income people and students. We gathered that this was because of the lack of mobility of these people. If nothing else, Mr. Speaker, I think we should ensure that there is price standardization in the provinces if not across Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I have made my remarks short because I have been suffering from a cold. As well, as I stated earlier, I am rather idealistic and I think we should get down to solving this problem as soon as possible.

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, when Statistics Canada published its most recent consumer price index, it was obvious that the highly desirable goal of reasonable price stability in this country had not been achieved by a long shot, certainly not in all sectors of the economy. The over-all cost of living during 1972 rose by 5.1 per cent but some prices rose faster than others.

Canadians paid 8.6 per cent more to eat and 5 per cent more to keep a roof over their heads. By contrast, durable goods which have the highest labour content, cost only fractionally more. Stoves, cars, vacuum cleaners, refrigerators, radio and television sets and furniture increased by only 0.6 per cent. That statistic fascinates me, Mr. Speaker, because we have heard it said so often that high labour costs are to blame for advancing prices in this country. The blame is laid so frequently on those who work in the shops and plants whenever we have to pay more in the market place for our goods. Here, we have some good evidence to show that such is not necessarily the case.

Rising food costs, the main concern of the committee that we are about to establish by this motion, are blamed on shortages not in Canada, but throughout the entire world. If, as a result of these shortages, producers of food are receiving more for what they grow and raise, it is hardly compensation enough for the years in which they received far, far too little, especially in relation to the huge investments that food producers have to make in their enterprises and the small returns which they usually enjoyed.

Feelings about inflation are, therefore, confused and ambivalent because really inflation has two opposite faces. Whether we welcome or fear it, depends upon the face at which we are looking; how it seems to affect our personal interests at the moment. Inflation sometimes does have harsh effects on wage earners, on farmers and on businessmen, but the inflation which each of these groups deplores is not the inflation of their own prices, but those of some other group. It is not the prices which they get for their own services which are so distressing but the prices which they have to pay for the goods and services of others. Sometimes it seems, Mr. Speaker, that those who gain the most from inflation are those who cry the loudest against it. Reasonable price stability must certainly be a goal of economic policy. There is no question about that because inflation produces an arbitrary and often capricious redistribution of income, causing hardships for many people. With a general increase in prices, some prices and money rates of return rise faster than others. As a result, persons or groups whose money incomes remain fixed, or rise more slowly than prices rise, lose command over goods and services. In so far as these people are unable to defend themselves against erosion of the real purchasing power of their incomes, inequity and hardship always accompany inflation.

The real evil of inflation, then, is that it redistributes wealth and income in a wanton fashion. Those who gain through inflation, such as land speculators, do so at the expense of others who lose. They cause great hardship to the economically weak. I have even read, Mr. Speaker, that certain prominent politicians have profited from large land deals. I sometimes wonder why provincial governments, especially the government of Ontario, are so slow in taking action to control rapidly rising land costs. Rising food costs are indeed perturbing, but inflated land values also punish families which must, as a result, pay higher rents and higher mortgages and thus do without so many of the other things they would like to have.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that inflation is like a twisted magnifying lens through which, if one views, everything is confused, distorted and out of focus, and few are able any more to see realities in their true proportions. Hon. members in this chamber have spoken elo-quently about the alarming rate of inflation, yet few have bothered to mention the significant increase in the weekly earnings of the majority of Canadians. We have just passed through a festive season which saw the biggest outlay of consumer cash and credit in our history. How was this money spent, Mr. Speaker? For the essentials and basic necessities of life? Of course. But it was also spent for an increasingly wide variety of luxury goods. Shoppers scurried about anxiously seeking that special item for the person who has everything.

Not everyone, however, was able to participate in this winter solstice spending splurge. Many pensioners, the unemployed, and large numbers of unorganized workers could do no more than barely meet their daily needs to keep body and soul together. Because this is so, Mr. Speaker, this House ought to move as quickly as possible to bring about measures which will alleviate this desperate situation facing a large number of Canadians. We must act to raise the basic old age pension and to increase the guaranteed income supplement. Family allowances must also be increased, especially for those on low incomes. As well, Mr. Speaker, there must be some generous income tax cuts, particularly for those with middle incomes and less who are trying to raise their families in an inflationary economy. Further, in amending the Unemployment Insurance Act, great care must be taken by us all to make sure that we do not unjustly punish those without jobs because of any misdirected sense that some few people are violating the work ethic. Before we jump with both feet on those people, we should deal as well with those in this country who are violating the business ethic, the professional ethic and the political ethic. I favour the establishment of a parliamentary committee that will look into the cost of food in Canada and I say, let us do it quickly; let us get on with it and then let us push on with some of those concrete measures which will assist the "economically disadvantaged", as we so euphemistically call the poor.

Reasonable price stability must be a goal of economic policy, because inflation results in an undesirable redistribution of income. That undesirable effect must be first and foremost in our minds. As well, Mr. Speaker, if our exports are to sell competitively in world markets, our costs and prices must not rise significantly more than they do in other countries. Inflation carries with it other dangers and other evils as well. Businessmen may come to consider continuous price increases as the normal course of events. Consequently, they may add to their inventories and plant, with the intention of escaping higher costs and prices in the future. Moreover, such businessmen will be inclined to proceed with less caution, in the hope that mistakes which may be made can easily be compensated by higher prices charged in the future. This is a lovely safety valve for those who have to make business decisions but are not always especially competent to do so. They think inflation will take care of any mistakes and errors they are likely to commit. As a result, inflation leads to the misdirected use of our resources. It leads to inefficiency and waste and finally to a destabilizing effect on the whole economy.

Also, Mr. Speaker, in an inflationary economy there is a natural tendency to switch from money into other assets as a hedge against rising prices. This results in prices being pushed even higher. Thus it is that inflation may become self-generating, ending in what some economists call hyperinflation, and leading to a general breakdown of the country's monetary system.

Reasonable price stability must be a goal of economic policy, but how to achieve this in a satisfactory way without disastrous and undesirable side effects remains, I gather, a big puzzle for economists. Only by bringing about such stability, it has been argued, can the inflation psychology be broken. So, some favour the idea of government controls. They think they are a panacea for curing the inflation under which we are now living. Proposing the introduction of price controls, however, leaves a great many questions unanswered. For example, how do you determine the price of a new product after the controls have been introduced? How do you cope with changes in a product during the period when these price controls are in effect? How do you decide what the price ought to be after those changes are made? In the service sector of our economy, how can you ever arrive at a satisfactory definition of "normal service", in order to set a price? The sheer volume of goods and services available in our consumer-oriented society defies any meaningful way for controlling and monitoring prices. If controls are temporary, will not the accumulated demand pressure bounce prices right back up when controls are lifted? If controls are selective, whose prices and whose wages are we going to regulate? Whose will be left alone? Who decides?

In Canada there is a further problem in administering price controls. I refer to the substantial regional variation in the cost of living. There is also a very large political question. Do we really want a further massive intrusion of government into the market place? Hopefully, this committee to examine food costs in Canada will also consider how effective controls could be implemented, if they decide that it is a desirable solution, and whether these controls would in fact do what we all know is desirable, namely having a reasonable price stability in this country. Meanwhile, I repeat, that while this committee is deliberating in earnest, while they are busy examining witnesses and reading documents, we in this House must deal with priority number one, that is helping those who are most hurt by inflation, redesigning our income redistribution programs to make them more effective and beneficial for those who are in serious need.

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong this debate unduly, but I wish to make a few observations before the vote is taken. First, I commend to this House the subamendment moved last Thursday by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) calling for a two-month interim report with recommendations for action from the committee, but opposing the three month absolute limit upon the committee's activities which was suggested in the amendment moved by a member of the Conservative party.

I feel the subamendment achieves the best of both worlds in that it requires the committee to bring before this House within 60 days some recommendations for action which will have an effect in the economy before the winter is over and, therefore, bring relief at least in part to Canadian consumers as early as possible, without restricting the efforts of the committee to what would be an unrealistically short period of time considering the immensity of the task we are giving to it. One of the dangers of compiling a final report within a period of 90 days is that there will inevitably be a tendency to come to the easy and glib solution of pointing the finger at those who are least able to defend themselves and most vulnerable to accusation.

In speeches in the past two or three days, members to my right referred fairly frequently to the advisability of a prices freeze. We should look at that kind of action carefully. The implication in a prices freeze is that the primary producer and the ordinary working family are likely to be affected most directly and least beneficially. What will follow from a prices freeze may very well be some kind of wage freeze or control. Neither of these approaches, the price freeze or wage freeze, will come to grips with the basic problems in the food industry.

Hon. members have referred to the undesirability of the government intruding into the market place by means of a price review mechanism. They even went so far as to suggest that the committee would be intruding. Intrusion into the market place it may be, but that is surely up to the market place. If the market place is prepared to provide decent goods to consumers at a fair price and to offer the consumers the benefit of the doubt, I suspect there will not be much in the way of intrusion. On the other hand, as I suspect is the case in the food industry, if retailers and merchandisers try to get away with what the traffic will bear, the government will be forced by public opinion to intrude into the market place. I suggest to those hon. members who fear a collapse of the free enterprise system that most of the recommendations for an inquiry are coming, not from any kind of ideological foundation, but from the demands of many hundreds of thousands of Canadians across the country who want some action taken. That is why this House of Commons is now faced with the proposition of a prices committee.

The committee should examine the corporate structure underlying the food industry and inquire into large agricultural business—I believe the term is agro-business—transportation, packaging, processing, distribution, displaying, promotion, retailing and all other aspects which pertain to the food industry and food pricing. In particular, commodity prices and tariffs should come within the terms of reference of the committee. It would be of interest to study the extent to which food price controls in the United States affect prices in Canada. That is, do multinational corporations partially make up for restricted prices in the United States by charging higher prices in Canada, among other countries? There have been charges by consumer associations that certain canned and packaged foods contain too small a portion of the main ingredient advertised. Some information has recently been brought to light about stews which consist largely of potatoes and gravy.

A special study should be made as to whether products should be standarized as to contents by weight or whether precise information on labels would be sufficient to protect consumers against receiving less than fair value for their food dollar. Studies should also be undertaken on price differences between supermarkets in poorer downtown neighbourhoods where there is little competition and affluent suburbs where the competition is usually stronger. The information that is available indicates that higher prices are charged to those who can least afford them.

Little information has so far been assembled about the nutritional needs of older people and the food costs incurred by an elderly person living alone who buys food in small quantities and accordingly pays higher prices than large families which can buy in bulk. Packaging costs are probably the most significant factor. A study should be made in this context. Some years ago a royal commission undertook a study of food pricing and food merchandising practices on the prairie provinces. This commission, known as the Batten commission, brought in its report in 1966. I just want to quote briefly from some of its findings since I think they are relevant to the work that will be assigned to the committee, the proposal to establish which we are discussing today.

In examining how prices are determined, the royal commission concluded that the power to raise prices is limited by the degree of market concentration. Where sales are concentrated in the hands of only a few sellers, those sellers recognize their mutual interdependence. It is usually in the mutual self-interest of sellers to avoid cutting prices and to agree, either tacitly or explicitly, on a price level that maximizes their joint profits. Without trying to pre-empt the conclusions of the special committee, I suspect that things have not changed very much since 1966. As one who represents a constituency where food prices are very much a matter of lively concern at this time, I am particularly anxious that the committee examine in great detail, and with as much searching light as can be applied, the subject of the pricing policies of the large food chains.

Amplifying on their conclusion, the commission stated that the largest sellers—it is true they were talking about the Prairies—had acquired sufficient power to enable prices to rise above competitive levels, thereby earning excess profits for the large chains. Second, excessive building of stores had led to what they called sub-optimal rates of utilization of stores, hence unnecessarily raising the cost of retailing groceries. Third, the position and power of the chains had led to and required the use of self-cancelling and costly advertising campaigns. And fourth, the luxurious and expensive supermarkets built to lure customers away from other stores had raised the cost of food distribution. All of these costs and price increases, and the factors leading thereto, had damaged the consumers' interest.

As our committee commences its work, I think we must bear in mind continually that it is the interests of the ordinary working consumer that must be paramount. I believe that they have a right to know what goes on in the matter of food pricing policy, just as, for example, the public feels it has the right to know what goes on in negotiations between the government and the postal workers, or in negotiations that are carried on in any form of collective bargaining.

[Mr. Grier.]

Just as the ordinary worker must justify, through elaborate machinery sanctioned and established by the government, his reason for wanting a wage increase, I believe that food merchandisers and retailers, as indeed many merchandisers and retailers of other products, must similarly be placed in the position of justifying to the public their reason for feeling that a price increase is necessary. All too often the consumer, when confronted by a sudden price increase, is advised that the reason for it is that the price of coffee in Brazil went up last week, or that there had been a strike in San Francisco, or some other reason is given usually relating to an event outside the country and well beyond the public source of information. Thus, the public has to take the retailer's word at its face value, and from time to time I think this has enabled merchandisers and retailers to take advantage of the consumer.

I hope that this committee will conclude that a permanent, on-going prices review mechanism, whose purview should range well beyond simply the subject of food prices, should be set up for the purpose of continually exposing to the public gaze and bringing to the public knowledge the facts behind food pricing. After the committee has concluded its investigation, I believe it will be hard-pressed not to come to some such conclusion.

I hope that the publicity attached to the committee's efforts will serve to keep food prices in check over the winter. Since I have great faith in the public having knowledge of the facts, I am convinced that a permanent prices review mechanism will serve over the long run to expose facts to the public gaze that will keep prices stable, thereby assuring that the hard-won wage increases of the working men and women of this country are not eaten away or used simply to bolster and to maintain the ever-increasing profits which our corporate economy demands.

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have some very grave concerns and reservations about the proposal before the House to set up a special committee to inquire into trends in food prices in Canada and to relate domestic and foreign influences to today's soaring costs. In the long run, it is true that the committee may come up with some proposals that will alleviate the situation, but I particularly hope that the committee finds an answer to why there is such a gap between what the producer receives and what the consumer pays. What concerns me most is the immediate need, the need that will have to be faced tomorrow, next week and in the coming months of long, hard winter, by hundreds of thousands of Canadians on fixed incomes. The winter will indeed be much longer and harder for some Canadians than for others.

The special Senate committee on poverty told us that six million Canadians, almost one-third of the population of our country, live on or below the poverty line. A single person, we were told by that committee, lives below the poverty line if he or she has an income of less than $2,140 annually. That was the 1969 figure. It is interesting to note that all our senior citizens whose income is limited to the old age pension and supplement are today living below the poverty line. My concern is what will happen to them in the cold, long months ahead while the committee is sitting and discussing its needs and expressing its concerns, while in the meantime prices continue to rise.

There are some 17,000 Canadians on disability pensions and their numbers increase by almost 1,000 a month. Do hon. members realize that some disability pensioners receive only $100 a month? If there are two children in the family, that amount is increased to $154 a month. People such as those on fixed incomes are finding that as a result of recent fuel oil increases they have to pay an average of $4 more per month for fuel oil. To them, $4 more for fuel oil means $4 less for food.

• (1610)

The department of health and welfare has just released figures from a year long study entitled "The World of the Welfare Recipient". This study shows that 62 per cent of women on welfare are single family heads and must look after the needs of dependents. In Ontario and Quebec alone there are 79,000 such women. Newfoundland, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia each have over 3,000 single mothers with at home families. There are 10,000 in Alberta and 14,000 single heads of families in British Columbia. I wonder how these women and others on fixed incomes reacted to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) last week. The minister is reported to have said during a speech in Halifax:

> The public must be conditioned to expect to pay a more realistic price for food. I think we should be telling consumers what a fine job we have been doing and what a bargain they are getting.

What a bargain, indeed! Is this government, according to this minister's statement, so callous and so insensitive it can tell all those on fixed incomes what a bargain they are getting as food prices increase? I really do wonder whether the minister would be prepared to meet concerned Canadians like consumers, people on welfare, old age pensioners, the working poor, the 615,000 unemployed, all those on fixed incomes, to tell them what a bargain they are getting?

About 10 per cent of the labour force of Quebec and the Maritimes is expected to be out of work by spring. Statistics Canada reports do not include the 100,000 people on manpower retraining programs and the 100,000 or so on LIP grants. All these people are on minimum incomes. How will they manage this winter? The Minister of Agriculture seems totally unaware of the fact that one of the most disadvantaged groups of consumers in Canada is the 6 million people living below the poverty line. Their inability to earn a decent living is only one side of their economic plight. It is also important how they spend what little income they have. If they are forced to pay more for goods they buy they are, in essence, being denied the benefits of their earning power. It is cold comfort to a woman on a widow's allowance to be told by the Minister of Agriculture she is getting a bargain in food prices. It is cold comfort to a mother eking out a living on a mother's allowance to be told a food inquiry will eventually provide answers to her current needs. It is cold comfort, indeed, to an old age pensioner to be told his pension will be increased some time before April, perhaps, while food prices go up day by day.

A food prices inquiry is a simple way, I would think, to blur what must seem to many to be a drastic situation. Can they really wait while the committee holds its hearings? The committee may have a psychological effect on some people in this country whose earnings keep pace with increasing food prices, but the committee hearings will bring no immediate relief. It is beyond my comprehension how the minister, in introducing this motion, can say the committee would report in a relatively short period of time and, in the same breath, say the study should include an evaluation of food prices and trends throughout the world. Surely, there is conflict in his thinking. To achieve these goals the committee should be sitting on a 24 hour basis, seven days a week. With fuzzily defined terms of reference and a committee report at some unspecified date, the minister seems hell-bent on taking his time. As my colleague, the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence), pointed out, while the committee plods along through the winter and into spring the responsibility for action would soon become the responsibility of the committee instead of that of the government which is the real culprit behind the current high cost of living.

Just what is it that we are concerned with here and now in these immediate days and weeks? I suggest it is Canada's food price increase statistics. From 1961 to December, 1972 food prices increased by 47.1 per cent. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) finds solace in the fact that the citizens of France have to pay more for food than we do. He also assures us that the government has contingency plans. What are these mysterious plans we keep hearing about and when are we going to hear them?

Do members realize that the price of major foods have increased, except for powdered milk, peanut butter and baby food? Perhaps we could recommend baby food as a bargain to the Minister of Agriculture. The Minister of Finance's (Mr. Turner) proud claim that Canada's inflation is lower than that of most European countries does not console those on limited incomes who must pay 36 or 37 cents for a quart of milk, and in some places much more? Does the minister realize that the average cost of a loaf of bread to the grocer jumped to 29.3 cents from 27.7 cents at the beginning of December? Does he realize that the price of eggs is up 11.2 per cent over that of this time last year, that the cost of vegetables is up 8.6 per cent and that the price of beef has climbed? The price of hamburger is up 17.3 per cent in 12 months, the price of beef liver is up 15.6 per cent and the price of stew meat is up almost 6 per cent. It is the cheaper cuts that have been increasing faster in cost. These are the cuts that are the staples for the 6 million Canadians who live below the poverty line.

If we think prices in most parts of Canada are out of line with people's earnings, those who live in remote areas and the periphery are in much worse shape. This applies particularly to the northern territories where food prices are always much higher than in the south. The rapid rise in prices in those areas in the last year has made them astronomical. While the prices rise, the quality of some foods like fresh fruits and vegetables deteriorates. I hope this unique situation will receive very extensive examination and special consideration by the committee.

I am sure we have all done analysis in respect of food prices in our own areas. In the Kingston area, basic food prices have gone up by as much as 50 per cent since 1968. I realized this when I started comparing current supermarket ads with those of four years ago. In 1968 staples like meat, vegetables, fruit, butter, eggs, cheese and coffee that I could have purchased for $18.68 would today cost $28. This is an increase of over 50 per cent.

Let me tell you that the primary producer is no better off than he was in 1968. The food price increases are not reaching the farmer. What is even worse, there appears to be no end in sight. Statistics Canada reports that the general food price index has risen 8.6 per cent from December, 1971 to December, 1972. The present government obviously does not know what is causing this spiralling and has been unwilling to attempt measures to stop it.

To the extent that the food inquiry might come to some basic conclusions about food increases, I hope that, unlike so many other reports, it does not get covered with dust or perhaps lost in some flour bin. Again, I ask what will happen in January, February and March of this year? There is a great fear that food speculators will have a free ride for these months and will take advantage of the time lag in getting the report of the committee. The urgency of the immediate situation bothers me. To get us through this period of winter seasonal hardship, the government should have considered companion action in the form of price freezes, voluntary wage and price controls or some other structure until the committee has had a chance to report. These are measures which could help those millions of Canadians who will suffer from deprivation this winter, rather than make them wait for the final outcome of the committee's report.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, of course some interesting contributions have been made during this debate. It is very difficult to come to grips with and even more difficult to find answers to, this situation within the system in which we live. In his contribution to this debate the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) promised to be brief and sharp. He promised to be sharper than the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray). Indeed he was brief, but it is very difficult to find in his speech, as recorded on page 433 of Hansard, any evidence that he was sharp. One highlight of his speech seemed to be this statement:

> The answer is simple: he is wrong and his colleagues are wrong. Food prices, like all prices, are simply running out of control today.

Having said that, he carries on and lays down a number of conditions in respect of the support of his party. He makes a tremendous contribution to the effect that it is the intention of the hon. member, on behalf of his party, to introduce an amendment which would reduce the number of members of the committee to 20.

Continuing on to the end of his speech, one finds very little evidence of a positive, constructive contribution that would permit members of this House and members of the committee to point to some guidelines or indications of what is in the hon. member's mind. At least the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) expressed the thought that what we have before us is a very complex problem. I agree. It seems to me that the question of price, be it in respect of food or other commodities or services, is a question that is integrated with wages, incomes and profits and that therefore when we speak of price we are speaking of an item that is the result of a number of factors including the salaries of individuals, the percentage of profit which takes place at the retail level and so on. Therefore, we really are analysing the whole structure of our society when we try to come to grips with the question of price.

[Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands).]

If we imply that we wish, in order to control the rising cost of food, to introduce a system of wage controls, I would think that it would be most unfair, particularly in respect of the category of salaried workers who are still desperately attempting to catch up with the remainder of society but who have not been fortunate enough to belong to powerful unions or powerful professional organizations over the years. This government—and I admit without success—asked Canadians to assume the responsibility of self-imposed voluntary controls. We all remember the experience of 1969-70. The suggestion was not well received. Perhaps it was not well explained. It was rejected, and here we find ourselves again, a few years later, facing what looks like another inflationary round still without a substantial knowledge of how to come to grips with this trend which affects not only Canada but apparently every other country which has a so-called free market society.

It seems to me, in light of the system we have and the society in which we live, the solution expressed at that time, which is still before us, that of voluntary self-imposed controls, is the most desirable one because it does not strike at the root of our system but invites, recommends and hopes that we can practise self-restraint. However, the reality of the situation is still that we are not ready for such an application. Therefore, what has happened in the intervening years is that the Liberal government in this country took measures in respect of redistributing the purchasing power of the people. It said it would take the purchasing power from those whose incomes are high through the means of income tax reform and the introduction of a capital gains tax. The government said it would redistribute this purchasing power and make it available to those at the lower income level by means of better pension programs, better support schemes, better developed and better funded public and low-cost housing and other such programs of reform introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner).

The other measure passed by the previous parliament, and just now being implemented, is the establishment of national marketing boards for a number of commodities. One which is now being put into practice is a national marketing board for the marketing of eggs. The purpose is to avoid the up and down cycles in respect of the price of eggs, to introduce some rationality into the production in that industry and in the end to protect the consumer from fluctuations in the prices of some of these basic commodities. I am looking forward to seeing what this committee will be able to establish, and what advice it will give to the government to resolve this very tough question as to whether, in a free society like ours prices can be controlled, an element can be introduced to slow down inflation when some of these elements are far beyond our control because they are part of an inflationary movement that is taking place outside Canada as well. Today, it seems to me that voluntary self-imposed controls are the ideal answer and that, failing our ability to introduce such controls, we would be hard put to find permanent, satisfactory answers because the experience in other countries where temporary control measures have been introduced has been that once the lid was taken off prices jumped up again and what had been gained during the period of controls was lost in a matter of days.

It seems to me that if we are able to keep inflation below the level of inflation in other countries so as to remain competitive, and if we are able to redistribute the purchasing power to a much greater extent than we have been able to do so far in favour of the low income groups so as to provide them with the purchasing power that they are losing as a result of inflation, we will be making at least some strides in the right direction.

Perhaps this committee will be able to discover that there are certain levels in the distribution chain of food products that are not necessary. Perhaps this committee might discover that an increase in the production of certain staples, certain goods, might have the effect of producing an over-supply that will push down the retail price. I really do not know whether this will be the case, but I do know that there is no easy answer to this question unless we are really prepared to change, perhaps profoundly so, the system which we have.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate and wish to assure all hon. members that I, too, share the great concern that has been expressed here by members from all parties in respect of the matter of increased food prices for all Canadians. I can assure you that my concern is certainly no less than that of any other hon. member in this House, but I do believe that it is fortunate that in this resolution we have singled out food prices because it can be well documented that in the whole gamut of cost of living increases food prices is but one of the major components. I think that while this committee which we are proposing to establish may well study increases in food prices, it would auger well for the House to seriously consider the other components that make up the cost of living index.

The committee may very well provide for a critical examination of all the factors that lead to increased food prices, such as production, processing and distribution. But I can assure you, Sir, that I will certainly not hold my breath while the committee comes up with a solution which would immediately relieve the pressures that have built up with respect to the rise in food prices.

It is interesting to note that our friends to the left, the NDP, are quite anxious to support this measure. When a similar joint committee was established in the House in 1966 to report, among other things, on the cost of living, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) stated, as reported at page 8312 of Hansard of September 9, 1966:

> But I suggest that the minister's motion is a mere ruse to shelve the problem which faces him, instead of solving it. It seems to me that it cannot be anything else than a political move to seem to be doing something, when in fact referring the subject matter to a parliamentary committee is doing nothing to deal with the problem of the cost of living.

I think it is rather significant that in 1966 the hon. member for York South had some serious reservations about the impact of the establishment of such a committee. We now find that he and his party are supporting it wholeheartedly. I suggest to you, Sir, that this is just another of their hypocritical approaches in solving some of the major problems that confront this country. Perhaps we could call it another NDP flip-flop.

I suggest to you that the committee will not come up with an absolute solution, an over-all panacea, to mitigate the rising costs in food or the rising cost of living. I think that we should be looking at something more positive to immediately compensate those people who are most seriously affected by the increase in food prices and other living costs. The plain fact of the matter, as has been pointed out by many other speakers here, is that we are in the midst of a very dangerous and rapid inflationary cycle. Of course, it is one of the many failures that has resulted from the inadequacy of this government, and I do not believe that anything is more blatant than this government's economic mismanagement, and particularly the manner in which it has approached the matter of inflation. I do not believe that we can study the increasing cost of food in isolation. I think we have to look at the problem of inflation, the problem of rising costs in every sector of our economy, in a more co-ordinated way.

Certainly, inflation has its detrimental effect on all Canadians, but it is more disastrous and more detrimental to those who are on fixed incomes, to the recipients of old age pensions. Basically, those people are at the bottom of the income scale. But there are others who are affected by the problem of inflation, namely, the primary producers. Farmers have borne the twin effects of inflation and low prices for the goods they produce. There is no other segment of our society that has been hurt more than the producer by the so-called cost-price squeeze. It is quite true that in recent times the prices to farmers have increased, thanks to the world food shortage. We hear from both sides of the House that the prices paid to farmers now are better than they used to be. Better than what, Mr. Speaker?

Are we comparing them with the price slumps of 1969 and 1970? Yes, I agree that prices to primary producers are somewhat better, but we only have to look at world wheat prices as reported in the 1970-71 Wheat Board Report. We noted that the receipts to the producers for wheat were the lowest in ten years. When we look at the prices of other commodities today, as compared those in 1951, we find that there has been only a moderate increase in the price of these products as received by the producer. If we take into consideration the inflationary effect, the devaluation in the purchasing power of the dollar, in essence we have a backward step. In other words, if the income is remaining constant, the purchasing power is much lower. Here I suggest that we look at the realized net income picture for the farming industry. These figures were reported by Statistics Canada.

In 1966, realized net farm income was in the order of $1.8 billion. It dropped to $1.2 billion in 1970, a drop of $600 million in a period of four years. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what other segment of society could withstand that sort of drop in net realized income and still remain viable? In 1971, realized net farm income improved to $1.3 billion, and the estimated 1972 figure is something in the order of $1.8 billion or $1.9 billion, which simply returns it to the level established in 1966. Therefore, I suggest that we must be very cautious in examining the whole matter of food prices so that the emphasis will not be placed in the wrong area. The farmer, by and large, takes what he can get for his product. He has no measure of collective bargaining at his disposal. He must take what the buyers will give him for his product. If there is a demand for his product he gets a good price. If there is a surplus of his product he tends to get a lower price.

What did the government do to help the farmer, Mr. Speaker? In 1968, after the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took office, it lifted the interest ceiling on farm improvement loans and farm credit loans, which at that time was frozen at 5 per cent, and within a year those interest rates rose to 8 3/4 per cent.

An hon. Member: And $3 wheat now.

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, $3 wheat now, but the domestic purchaser is not paying $3 per bushel for the wheat he purchases. The mills are paying $1.95 at Thunder Bay. Either we must take steps to subsidize our producers, if we want to achieve and maintain a healthy agricultural industry, or else the consumer must pay more. Immediately on assuming office, the government reduced the initial price of wheat. It removed the premium on the production of hogs, which was something in the order of $10 million. It unilaterally and indiscriminately destroyed the small dairy producers. The government received recommendations from the Royal Commission on the Price of Farm Machinery, but not one of those recommendations has been implemented.

Then we had a Prices and Incomes Commission that was another complete and total failure. It did nothing with respect to narrowing the gap. We had a Prime Minister who in December, 1970, said that inflation was licked. Mr. Speaker, it was licked then simply because there was a war on between the food chains, and also because the producers were getting very low returns for their produce.

What has happened to the cost of in-puts generally? Farm in-puts have risen from an index base of 100 in 1961 to 135.4 in 1971. Farm labour costs, based on 100 in 1961, have risen to 178.2. How has the farmer survived? He has survived simply by increasing his productive capacity. He has increased his productivity by 13 per cent per annum over the past two decades. Meanwhile, the cost of processing and distributing has increased about six times as rapidly as the return to the producer. This is manifested by the fact that in 1971, out of a total Canadian food bill of $7 billion, only 6 per cent of that went to the primary producer. This was a drop of 4 per cent since 1959. If you measure it in constant dollars, you would probably have to deduct a further 35 per cent from that figure. This simply means that 94 per cent of the consumer's dollar is received by someone other than the primary producer. I suggest that this is ridiculous and must be corrected. If this inquiry is going to be totally objective it will bear this out, and place the welfare of the producer in its proper perspective.

I suggest that the whole inflationary cycle which is upon us at this time is something that the government has failed to correct. I believe that its policies and non-policies have helped to exacerbate the problems of inflation. I know that the food processors and those charged with the distributing of food products are getting the major brunt of the blame in this particular area, but I am sure that they, too, have had their problems with increased costs. This part of the food industry has, in fact experienced a very sharp increase in costs, increased basic costs of labour, of transportation, higher taxes, higher costs of urban land—these have all risen rapidly due to inflationary forces.

Other things which have contributed to higher food costs include an increase in the degree to which foods are processed. Canadians are buying more of their food products in more highly processed forms. There are very few products sold now in their natural, raw state. There is a great deal more prepackaging of foods. Then, there is the matter of increased shopping convenience. As mentioned by other hon. members, there are the huge outlays of money on great shopping malls and supermarkets. Someone must pay for those costs, Mr. Speaker. Who pays? The consumer pays.

I do not think too many members have touched on the matter of imports. A large portion of our food bill is for imported foods. This is something over which we really have very limited control. The prices of foods that we import have risen sharply. We are victimized by high transportation costs. Many of the products imported are of a seasonal variety. Then, there is the matter of tariffs, particularly tariffs on those items that are highly processed.

To put this thing into perspective, Mr. Speaker, I wish to give a few figures. In 1969, for the first time in the history of Canada, we imported $35 million more worth of agricultural products than we exported. That is a shame in a country such as Canada, with its expertise in agricultural production and its ability to produce. We are still importing $1.3 billion worth of agricultural products per annum. As I say, we really do not have too much control over the cost of those products. I suggest that in large part many of those products could be produced in Canada. Instead of discouraging the production of many of these agricultural products, I think we might do well to diversify our production to take in some of the items which we import. At the present time we are encouraging and paying farmers to leave the land and limit production. I believe this is an area that the Department of Agriculture could look at in a positive and rational manner. Many of the items we import we could produce quite effectively at home.

There is a great need for diversification in our agricultural industry. We would do well to promote a healthy, viable agriculture industry by encouraging more diversification. In short, I believe we must maximize our production and we must diversify our production. It is important also that we take steps to bolster those sectors of our agriculture industry that from time to time may suffer depression. As we have experienced in previous years, if we get a recession in the wheat industry it tends to spread to the hog or livestock industry. This situation must be corrected by government action. I am suggesting here, Mr. Speaker, that the Department of Agriculture should look very positively at protecting those sectors of agriculture which depend upon one another.

It seems that the government is bent on maintaining a cheap food policy, but if we are to have that we must have subsidies to the producer. There is no way that we can maintain an effective, healthy and viable agriculture industry unless there is a return for it and we cannot maintain the return unless we get it from someone. That is the decision that we must make. If we do not get it from the consumer, we must get it from the Treasury and that means some kind of subsidization for the producer. Increased labour costs, taxes, increased machinery costs and all the other inputs that producers have been confronted with cannot continue to rise without a corresponding increase in returns to the producer. If we have only an income comparable to the level of 1951, it is unlikely that agriculture can survive as a healthy productive industry.

Another area that needs consideration is that of transportation costs. There are great discrepancies between the rates in the east and the rates in the west, particularly in the area of processed agricultural products.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think the government should examine its own expenditures because they, too, have a very inflationary effect upon the production, distribution and processing of agricultural products. Above all, I think government should refrain from further interference, further regimentation and further regulation of the industry. We have seen much of that in the past four years. Some of the programs thrust upon farmers have been so embossed with red tape that they have been difficult to implement. Less government interference would be welcome. I hope that the committee will take a very constructive approach to the examination of food prices, and I hope it will keep the welfare of the producer in its proper perspective.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I hope I can get a couple of thoughts in between now and five o'clock.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You will have some trouble.

Mr. Gleave: I will do what I can. Mr. Speaker, if the government intends to carry out this inquiry I hope that consideration of the percentage of the food dollar which goes to the farmer as a return for his labour will be a part of it. If I should have the opportunity to be a member of the committee, or even if I were to sit on the sidelines, I would make sure that the committee concerned itself with the farmers' contribution to the well-being of the Canadian people.

It does not become the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) to charge members of this party with hypocrisy because we want an investigation of food prices.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Gleave: Like myself, he is a prairie man.

Mr. Mazankowski: You have changed since 1966; that is what I said.

Mr. Gleave: The hon. member now qualifies it and says we are not hyprocritical in 1973 but we were in 1966.

Mr. Yewchuk: You were then and you are now.

Mr. Gleave: I thank the hon. member for Athabasca. He has the courage to stick with what the hon. member for Vegreville said.

Mr. Yewchuk: I wish you had the courage to stick with what you said.

Mr. Mazankowski: We have a lot of faith in you but not your leader.

Mr. Gleave: The hon. member for Vegreville said that we are encouraging farmers to leave the land. I point out to him that the government of Alberta has signed an agreement with the federal Department of Agriculture to carry out what they now call a farm development program. The name has changed; formerly it was the farm adjustment program but the federal government was getting a lot of flak so the name has been changed. I point out to the hon. member for Vegreville that this will progressively eliminate a number of farmers in Alberta.

An hon. Member: They will get $7 million.

Mr. Gleave: They will get $7 million. I am always interested when members on that side of the House start to read us a lesson, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mazankowski: We are not taking over the land.

Mr. Gleave: If there is anything left after you are through with it, it will be like a plucked chicken; there will only by the pin feathers left. I just want to point out to the gentlemen over here—

An hon. Member: Gentlemen?

Mr. Gleave: Well, I am a polite man, a courteous man.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: I will speak to my enemies. I want to point out, Mr. Speaker, that if they want to have a proper investigation conducted, then they should help the House to do it because this is a very serious problem. The Canadian people, like the people in the rest of the world, especially the western world, have believed it their God-given right and their heritage to have an unlimited supply of cheap food available at their door all the time. But it is not necessarily so, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that this House should take the matter very seriously.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member but it is five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the House will proceed to private members' notices of motion as found at page 23 of the order of business for today, but first it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order No. 40, to advise the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Humber-St.George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—Manpower—Local Initiative Programs—Request for statement on progress in approving projects; the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney)—Canadian National Railways—Terms of loan from pension fund to Fidinam (Ontario) Limited—Inquiry as to leasing by railway of part of Upper Canada Place; the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Air Transport—Northern Canada—Inquiry as to program for installation of improved navigational aids.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

SUGGESTED INCREASE TO $75,000 IN MAXIMUM AMOUNT OF LOANS

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Small Businesses Loans Act to increase the maximal amount of a loan thereunder to $75,000.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I discussed this notice of motion before bringing it before the House. We find no real objection to some of the items spelled out in the Small Businesses Loans Act. It first came into force 11 or 12 years ago, in 1961, for an initial period of three years and was subsequently amended to offer a wide range of opportunities for businessmen who wished to borrow money to improve their businesses. They could use such money for the purchase of fixed or movable equipment, the construction of premises or the improvement or modernization of premises. The act defines a small business as one with gross revenues not exceeding $500,000. From this point on, my colleagues and I begin to differ with the act. We feel that the maximum amount of $25,000 for a loan, as at present specified, in no way reflects what is reasonable for businessmen in Canada today. If one were in the construction business, $25,000 would not begin to buy some pieces of equipment; if one were in the manufacturing business, one could not buy much by way of raw materials for $25,000. In the wholesale business, $25,000 would not even buy you a decent stock of cigarettes, never mind anything else. In the transport business, you could not buy one truck of reasonable size for $25,000.

In my maiden speech in the House, I made a point of saying what I thought of the Industrial Development Bank. Supposedly, it is a court of last resort for businessmen. It operates in the high risk area but, at present, definitely does not fill the needs of businessmen. The bank is far too protective and asks for far too much by way of security for the types of loans it makes. I repeat, its interest rates are usurious, to say the least.

The Small Businesses Loans Act was meant to help smaller businesses, because it was thought smaller loans would be an asset to businessmen of the type I have described. We contend, however, that even in that particular area the Small Businesses Loans Act fails. On looking at the statistics relating to the Small Businesses Loans Act for 1971, we find that were 2,129 loans, amounting to $22.3 million, for an average of $10,460 per loan. Of those, service businesses accounted for 37 per cent, retail for 22 per cent, construction for 14 per cent and manufacturing for 13 per cent. These are exactly the types of businesses that the Industrial Development Bank pretends to service.

We do not quarrel with the percentage of loans made in various provinces. On reading the report one will find that they are spread pretty well across the provinces in proportion to population. The banks which actually administer the loans seem, if one considers their size in relation to that of the community, to grant a reasonable percentage of such loans. We are suggesting, Mr. Speaker, that if 40 per cent of the maximum is the average criterion in granting loans, the average loans being for $10,500, or approximately 40 per cent of $25,000 allowed as a maximum, that by increasing the maximum to $75,000 loans of a reasonable size could be granted to the business community.

In 1961, the average loan was in the order of $8,500. The increase of $2,000 in ten year to $10,500 in no way, shape or form reflects increases in costs that must be met. I suggest that if one considers true dollar purchasing power, the size of loans has actually gone down, not increased. I suggest that this does not reflect the sort of activity that one might expect from legislation first passed in 1961 and now 12 years old. We suggest that as more people become aware of the existence of this loan program, the size of loans granted would have increased as well.

I know that motions of the type I am presenting are usually talked out by members on the government side. I suggest this to hon. members on the government side: Are there not in their communities, perhaps, businessmen who might need some extra money for their businesses, whether those be manufacturing, retail or service businesses? Are there not businessmen in their ridings who want extra help in putting their businesses together? Or is it that members on the government side do not care whether businessmen in their areas want or need extra help with their businesses?

Members on the opposition side of the House have stated very carefully how they feel about small business and how we ought to proceed if we are to help small business which is the life blood of the Canadian economy. My colleagues and I think that the motion before the House covers the situation pretty well. This is not an attempt to give money away. The motion speaks of loans to businessmen. We are not asking for something for nothing. If indeed this notice of motion is talked out by my colleagues on the other side of the House, then I ask them to promise us that there will be action of some sort by way of a government bill that will do the same job as the motion would seek to do and increase in a reasonable way the amounts of business loans that are available to small businessmen.

If I may repeat, Mr. Speaker, the Industrial Development Bank is not doing its job. The Small Businesses Loans Act could be a tremendous support to small businessmen if they were allowed to borrow reasonable amounts of money. We suggest that the new maximum should be $75,000.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to congratulate the hon. member for Hastings on his bringing before the House this important motion which, I can assure you, is of concern to several members on this side of the House.

The hon. member mentioned that he wondered whether Liberal members were concerned with the problems of small businessmen. I can assure him of the government's continued concern with this matter and, looking at statistics, we recognize that the present government has undertaken many projects which have been very helpful to small businesses.

He also spoke of the Industrial Development Bank, saying that it did not do a good job. It must nevertheless be recognized that the Industrial Development Bank does achieve something. It is estimated that by 1975 the Industrial Development Bank will have granted total loans in excess of $1 billion. The bank also has branches throughout the country, which are continually expanding.

[English]

The government is interested in small businesses, Mr. Speaker. There are such programs of help. I might mention the Industrial Development Bank. There are other programs, as well, that help small businesses. Indeed, one of those coming under the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is the PAIT program. Over one third of grants under PAIT were given to companies with annual sales of less than $1 million. They can be characterized as small businesses. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) during his speech on the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne mentioned that the government would undertake a comprehensive study of all assistance to small businesses.

• (1710)

One thing to be studied will be a revision of the Small Businesses Loans Act which is being asked for by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis). He mentioned other programs, specifically the CASE program, Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprises. A very successful pilot project was initiated by the department. Former businessmen and retired businessmen who want to help other small businessmen by counselling them are being employed. The pilot project was initiated in Montreal and has now been extended to Winnipeg. It is the plan of the department to extend the program across the country to other regional offices.

I also wish to mention the Industrial Development Bank. The outstanding loans by 1975 are expected to be in the vicinity of $1 billion. The Industrial Development Bank has 46 branches across the country. In the past few years, it initiated a financial advice program whereby applicants and people who received loans were visited.

Mr. Woolliams: You are bankrupt by the time you receive a loan.

Mr. Breau: I did not hear the hon. member's interjection. If I had, I would respond to it.

Mr. Lefebvre: He said he does not need a loan.

Mr. Breau: That is good. Most of the business conducted by the Industrial Development Bank is small business. It has been increasing by 20 per cent yearly. This indicates that it must be doing some good.

Mr. Alexander: I heard about your speech.

Mr. Breau: I am glad the hon. member read that very good speech.

Mr. Alexander: I said I heard about it.

Mr. Breau: I wish he would advise his colleagues to read it.

Mr. Alexander: I heard about it, but I did not believe it.

Mr. Breau: That is too bad. When the business of a bank or organization increases by 20 per cent yearly, it indicates that businessmen across this country are using it. In the case of the IDB, it is mainly used by small businessmen. I have been involved in small business. There is no way I would be satisfied with any government program to help businessmen, regardless of whether the hon. member's party were in power or any other party.

Mr. Paproski: How do you know? Try us.

Mr. Breau: The people tried your party a few years back. It did not take them long to change their mind. When dealing with small businessmen, you do not necessarily satisfy them by only increasing the ceilings on loans or by making more money available to them. While government programs can improve a situation, many small businessmen may need counselling. They might not be able to afford proper marketing advice. They may not be able to afford proper counselling. This is one area being looked into by the government through the CASE program. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce wants to extend this program across the country because it might be very helpful to small businessmen.

Mr. Alexander: Why is it—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I must remind hon. members that private members hour should not become an instrument for debate across the floor of the House. The hon. member who has the floor should be given an opportunity to complete his speech.

Mr. Alexander: I certainly accept Your Honour's ruling. I hope Your Honour and hon. members listening to this very interesting and sometimes believable speech, will forgive my interjections.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): I thank the hon. member, but I was not referring only to him.

Mr. Alexander: I was the only one talking, Sir.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You just want to show that you are here this week.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member felt Your Honour was speaking about him. I will conclude my speech in order to give other members an opportunity to speak.

Another way in which the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is trying to help small businessmen is by further expanding the service offered in regional offices by trying to co-ordinate all government information that can be of assistance to small businessmen, whether it be under DREE, PAIT, the IDB or any other program. When a small businessman goes to the regional office of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, he will not be frustrated by being sent to another office. All information with regard to the IDB, including government and other financing, might be integrated.

These are some areas which the government is now considering. I sincerely hope that it will not take too long to complete these studies. The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is also studying ways to amend the GAAP program to make it applicable to manufacturing industries or services that are involved in increased costs of goods manufactured for export. This measure will also help small businessmen because many of these manufacturing firms are small businesses.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on the subject of small business because I believe it is an area of substantial strength in our economy and it offers perhaps the greatest potential for growth. I, therefore, thank the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) for bringing this matter to our attention. This is also an area in which I have had some experience, going through the incubation stage of a business, struggling through growth and seeing it mature. All of these are difficult stages, as only one who has been through them can really understand.

First, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) said in the throne speech debate, some 60 per cent of all employed Canadians work for enterprises which can be categorized as small businesses. They account for some 30 per cent of our gross national product or $31 billion in some 350,000 enterprises.

Second, and quite important, all large businesses were once small. It is too bad the hon. member who raised this motion said that this side of the House is not interested in this subject. His few words represented a peanut type approach that did not amount to anything more than the other two suggestions. I heard from the oppostion about small-thinking programs. The hon. member has left the chamber. I question whether he is really interested in small business.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger).]

Third, most small businesses are Canadian owned. Their growth offers real hope of Canadian ownership of our economy in the future in a non-restrictive, non-punitive and very positive way. In addition, small businesses offer opportunity and challenge for Canadian entrepreneurs, and help sustain bigger business both as a customer and supplier. This type of business helps small communities and contributes to the alleviation of regional economic disparities, as well as assuring competition in both products and prices. Such businesses are generally labour intensive and usually quite efficient. Very importantly, they are highly innovative, flexible and rapidly responsive to change or market conditions. Because they are less capital intensive, they can respond quickly to the stimulus of invested capital.

• (1720)

The question is, how can government help small business? I have had several thoughts based on my own experience, but in order to get a broader approach I have been meeting and working with a diverse group from the private sector over the past several months. In this process we met with the present and former ministers of industry, trade and commerce as well as their senior officials, and we also went to Washington to discuss the approach of the small businesses administration in the United States where we were warmly received by its chief, Mr. Tom Kleppe, and his advisers.

There is no one simple solution. It requires a multifaceted approach to respond to a variety of situations. In developing such a response I am indebted to a group that includes management consultants, venture capitalists, bankers, men who operate their own small and medium-sized businesses, and men such as John Bullock and John Earle of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. While I do not suggest that all of my views are theirs, their input has been invaluable, as has been the work of OECD and experience in other developed nations. In most cases, the cost to government is minimal. Indeed, when one considers the return to the economy and treasury, the gains are substantial.

The Small Business Administration in the United States operates on the principle of no giveaways. There are loans and guarantees, but they calculate that through proper programs they have created one new job for each $1,500, not in costs but in loans or guarantees. The direct losses are minimal, and if we are really to move in this direction, we should be prepared for an acceptable loss ratio. In the United States, the programs with the greatest losses have losses under 5 per cent, and most are well under this.

To really be of help, we have to make a commitment to be seriously and energetically interested in small business, as the hon. member for Hastings urges. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) has taken a very significant step in announcing one stop service when dealing with government and, very importantly, decentralizing this service across the country, as the parliamentary secretary has just said. There is nothing more frustrating to the small businessman, usually wearing a number of management hats, than to come to Ottawa trying to find the right man in the right department and leaving with a sheaf of applications in his hand. If he has time to fill them out, he does not have time to wait until they filter through the bureaucracy. When any legislation is passed, the interests of the small businessman and the impact of that legislation upon him must be considered.

Government itself must back up its commitment by directing an appropriate percentage of all government purchases to qualified small business. In addition, it must insist that all government business given to major contractors or vendors carries the stipulation that a given percentage of subcontracts or purchases come from small business. The Americans call this their "set aside program" and it has resulted in surprising new sources and savings as a consequence of shopping around for small suppliers, rather than taking the path of least resistance and going only to the other "big boys" they know so well. The impetus that this has given to smaller enterprises and the economy as a whole is incalculable.

There should also be national and regional advisory groups to government, largely comprised of small business representatives. They can offer valuable guidance to government, help tailor programs more closely to their needs, co-ordinate government efforts in the private sector, and generally work in partnership rather than in frustration or with a lesser impact than the potential of many excellent government programs.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business proposes an entrepreneurial council to carry out many of these roles and to actively seek out Canadian manufacturers to match many imports of products or components to existing or potential Canadian manufacturing facilities, establishing continuing mechanisms to maintain this co-ordination. Of vital importance—I am sorry that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) has left the chamber—is revising our sales tax regulations so they work to the benefit of the Canadian manufacturers as opposed to imported goods, as is often the case today.

The management programs already functioning and being expanded substantially are of considerable value, as proper management techniques are critical, often more critical than capital, to many small businessmen whose drive, expertise and experience can often be dissipated by inadequate management procedures.

But capital is also vitally important. The IDB has been eminently successful in responding to much of this need and I welcome the minister's announcement that this highly successful, and increasingly aggressive agency is reviewing its role so that its experience and expertise can be put to even greater use. I share the hon. member's frustrations regarding the IDB, though I thought he was a little unfair in his remarks in the throne speech debate. I felt that way when I came here and, after going into the matter further, I am certainly satisfied that it deserves a better look. Perhaps things will improve as a result of my speech.

The Small Businesses Loans Act that this motion is specifically directed to should also be amended substantially to make it more relevant to today's realities. This must mean considerably higher limits. The hon. member suggested $75,000; I prepared these remarks for the throne speech debate and was unable to get on, but I suggest a minimum of $100,000 and interest rates that will be competitive in attracting the necessary capital. The banks just will not go along with low rates, simply because they are unrealistic.

However—and this goes to the essence of the point contained in the hon. member's motion—this may not be necessary in view of the announcement of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce of a greatly expanded role for the general adjustment assistance plan, called GAAP. This, when available to all or to most businesses, may be even more effective, particularly when it already has its own administration and board. A similar program under the small businesses administration in the United States is its major program with $1¼ billion guaranteed last year, which amount is to be increased to $1.5 billion this year, and with a loss ratio of some 3.5 per cent. I think in crowing about high risk areas with a satisfactory profit picture we should also be prepared to accept a satisfactory loss ratio.

Another very interesting program of the small businesses administration of the United States is the small business investment company program. This program borrows money from conventional money markets, taking advantage of vast capital pools from insurance companies, mutual funds, foundation and pension funds, the latter a particularly fast growing source in Canada due to the requirement of our tax reform that 90 per cent of the assets of such bodies be invested in Canada. This is a good investment at a low but attractive rate due to the government guarantee. This money, then, is loaned to the SBIC, the Small Business Investment Corporation, at a rate of 1 per cent to 1.5 per cent additional, the current rate running at approximately 6.9 per cent. So it is not actually government money; it is merely the use of government guarantees.

The SBIC is a licensed venture capital company with good management experience and a good track record. For every dollar the SBIC invests of its own, the small businesses administration will lend up to $3. This is longer term money, lent over 15 to 20 years.

Since the term "venture capital" implies risk taking, this company usually gets involved in high potential and relatively high risk ventures, the kind which, when they do pay off, really add to the economy significantly. The losers generally show up early and the winners often take a long time coming. You have to hang tough with this sort of thing and be prepared for some losses in the early days. This fact has scared off the conventional money lenders, but there is a commitment to the program from good venture capital investors. I do not say that all of them are good, but many are.

In its initial stages, this program in the United States got off to a bad start as it was too loosely structured and monitored, if it was monitored at all. The number of licensed SBIC's in the United States has been reduced from 800 to some 300 effective organizations, and more consistently positive results are emerging. The speculator, the inefficient, the inexperienced have all been weeded out, and some of the vultures, too. They have tended to get in on the act and some very undesirable things happened, but as I say they have now been monitored out, largely as a result of the action of Tom Kleppe, the administrator over the last 18 months or so who has done a magnificent job. The whole thing has been a stimulating experience.

We are in a position to benefit from this experience and to adapt it to our own needs and know-how. Regionally established SBIC's in Canada could have an invigorating effect particularly on the economies of our disadvantaged regions and provide very real opportunities.

• (1730)

I suspect that in many parts of the country where their economies are based on fishing, forestry and other resource industries there is much talent but limited opportunity. Who could better see the opportunities, know the people and the markets than the businessmen in those areas, men who have a feel for the region and its potential who with adequate resources plus their skill and instinct can help the local people in new enterprises, with their attendant jobs, to get off the ground much faster and more economically than government agencies at all levels no matter how skilled and dedicated are our public servants. After all, local businessmen have their own money at stake too.

Without delaying action in the area of small business, I believe we should try to learn a great deal more about small business. It is surprising how little really reliable information on small businesses is available in this country. I would think that in more tranquil political times we could have the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs conduct a study in this area. In addition to this, however, an organization such as the conference board in Canada, under the direction of one of Canada's most distinguised economists, Dr. Arthur Smith, could and should undertake such a task. This could be done by a similar group with the professional expertise and research facilities necessary.

May I say that in thinking of business we have been inclined to place emphasis on manufacturing and exporting, both vital, but I believe we should give parallel attention to the rapidly growing and labour-intensive service sector. Some 40 per cent of our gross national product comes from that sector today, without counting government at all levels which would bring it up to about 70 per cent. With growing automation and sophistication and increasing leisure time, it will afford our greatest areas of opportunity, most of which cannot be replaced by imports. It can however, be foreign-owned. Indeed, the chances are that it will be if we do not nurture and encourage it in a Canadian context.

In this respect, I am pleased with the announcement by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) of increased assistance to the tourist industry; but that is only part of it. This is only highlighting a subject which deserves the very high priority it now appears to be getting from this government and I look forward to greater elaboration of the policies already announced and those yet to come in the budget. This priority attention must be sustained. In this respect I am happy to note the administrative changes in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, with two assistant deputy ministers so that one can concentrate on domestic industry and one on exports. This might bring a closer identity in each of these areas which existed before the department of industry and the department of trade and commerce were merged.

Frankly, I believe that the merger was a mistake because it reduced the political contact between the business community and the cabinet. Though the former minister and the present minister are men of outstanding ability and capacity, their concerns are about exports and trade agreements and it is very difficult for them to spread themselves so thinly. I think there are other able ministers in the cabinet today who are perhaps underutilized and who could go into the departments in an associate capacity and serve in the area of liaison with the private sector. This is something that would give added assistance to the small business area. The important thing is the recognition of small business, its importance to the economy and its potential for future development in a Canadian context. We must commit ourselves to its success and give Canadian businessmen and women of imagination and enterprise a fighting chance of survival over what are frequently overwhelming odds.

Having been through this, Mr. Speaker, there are three stages in starting a business. The first is that you must have the guts to leave your job and start. Nobody really thinks you can make it except you. You go to the bank for a little help but the banker thinks you are crazy and should have stayed at your own job. You are too involved and confused to worry about reports, returns on investment, deliveries and so forth.

Next is the adolescent stage when you are determined you can be successful. You may have a couple of people helping you, such as a girl in the office and a shipper in the shipping room, or another salesman. But you need extra capital, perhaps in the range of $50,000. The banks are not interested in talking to you; they are interested in sales projections, cash flows and such things. If you are fortunate enough to obtain the money, not that you really need it to stay in business, then you have the confidence that it gives you to invest in new people, new projects and new schemes.

Then we come to the third stage, not the final stage, which I have always called the menopause stage in business when you really develop and become a success. You may have reached the limits of your own managerial capacity although you may have had a great deal of difficulty. You are balancing your receivables against your payables and deliveries, and you have the bank manager on your back and your wife on your back because she wonders why you are working 60 or 80 hours a week. This gets pretty trying.

Then somebody in a similar business comes along, perhaps from Milwaukee or somewhere else and says, "Barney, how is business?" You say it is great, but you haven't the necessary cash flow and nobody is interested in giving you the money. He then says, "You don't have to worry any more; I can give you the $250,000", $500,000 or whatever it is. "We will give you a salary of $25,000," $35,000 or $50,000 "a year under a ten-year contract and 10 per cent of the profits". You haven't drawn a nickel in profit from your business in all this time and you think you are nuts not to accept the man's offer. As a result, the business is lost to Canada. The entrepreneur has made a good capital gain—although that is taxable now, and that is fair enough. He is on easy street. He is relatively independent and in most cases he establishes his estate, a high standard of living and never really has to worry. But the business is lost to Canada.

I suggest that we give this matter the attention it requires and really get involved by giving the small businessman a fighting chance. I think we can do this by making a firm commitment and taking a proper approach. If we help maintain small business as Canadian business, it will not only be good for the total economy of this country but we will find our economy more and more Canadian owned.

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for North York a question?

Mr. Danson: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the constituency is York North.

Mr. Ellis: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the hon. member a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Ellis: May I say that the hon. member across the way has made a delightful speech. If I understand correctly that he is in favour of this suggestion, will he impose his will on his colleagues to see if we can stop them from talking and bring this matter to a vote before six o'clock?

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I feel quite strongly about this matter and might like to see the amount increased to $100,000. I am pretty satisfied, and this is why I have reservations, with the extension of GAAP as mentioned in the throne speech and by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but my suggestion is that we could do much better. I am not enthusiastic about the small businesses loans program. If we were to have it in isolation and there was nothing else coming along, I would be agreeable. But I think we have much more flexibility with the extension of GAAP which was set up initially to take advantage of the Kennedy round agreement and is available to a broad sector of Canadian industry including the service sector. Without imposing limits I think it would be good, but I believe we could get something much better.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. Hon. members look forward with a great deal of enthusiasm to private members' hour. I suggest this is a perfect example of how hon. members can waste this limited time for private members by rising on points of order which require replies.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, being a new member this is the first time I have spoken in this House. I have listened with admiration to the remarks made to you and your deputies by hon. members. The courtesy you have shown to new members of all parties is proof to me that you are deserving of the numerous tributes paid to you by hon. members and I am pleased to join them in those tributes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Small Business Loans

Mr. Kempling: It is an honour for me to speak in support of the motion presented by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis). The motion asks that the government consider increasing the maximum loan available under the Small Businesses Loans Act from $25,000 to $75,000.

I am an operator of a small business and I know all the frustrations that face small businessmen. I also know what this increase will mean to thousands of people classed as small businessmen in Canada today. When you examine the sources of funds available to the small businessman you see the dilemma he faces. The chartered banks are in the retail credit business, automobile financing, residential mortgages and numerous other fields heretofore occupied by others. Each time the chartered banks enter a new field, the amount of money available to the small businessman diminishes. They will tell you this is not the case, but when one applies for a loan that is what one learns really is the situation.

For a moment let us consider the small businessman. He is a merchant, a small manufacturer, an agent or one of the thousands engaged in that broad category called the service industry. We have heard from previous speakers that these people are the largest employers in Canada. Collectively they have the capacity to significantly aid in the reduction of unemployment in Canada. Small businesses rarely lay off their staff during economic slowdowns. They are flexible and can expand rapidly when required. They are the stabilizing force in most communities and collectively import tremendous stability to the economy of Canada.

The single most pressing need is for funds to update or expand their businesses. To remain healthy they must keep abreast of the market in which they compete. Today's small businesses are the large businesses of tomorrow. They are almost 100 per cent Canadian-owned and operated. We should keep that in mind. We are discussing at some levels in this House foreign ownership policy and a screening board. Here we have Canadian-owned and operated businesses in need of assistance in the form of repayable loans at reasonable rates of interest. They do not seek grants or subsidies or floor prices. They only seek adequate funds to operate their businesses as only they know best.

Various other federal and provincial agencies do not normally have programs for businesses of the type I have mentioned. Probably the most significant move we can make is to help them by increasing the ceiling on loans available under the Small Businesses Loans Act from $25,000 to $75,000. I urge hon. members to adopt this motion.

I do not wish to speak very much about the IDB. I have done business with that agency and I know the situation. I understand the frustration in this area and the situation in respect of the interest rate at 11 per cent or 12 per cent, which is 3 per cent above that of the commercial banks whose rate was 9 per cent. I know what the IDB is all about. I can tell hon. members that the average small businessman does not want to deal with any government agency because of the red tape involved.

The businessmen with whom I am associated are probably the last persons who would go to a government agency for advice in respect of their businesses. When I hear about the offices which are to be opened for the purpose of advising businessmen, I shudder. I shall not say much about the CASE program because I am not very well informed in respect of it. However, as a practising businessman the last thing I would do would be to go to a government agency and ask for advice on how to run my business.

I think the most useful thing we can do to help the small businessman is to increase the ceiling on loans under this program from $25,000 to $75,000. I therefore urge hon. members to adopt this motion.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Has the hon. member the permission of the House to ask a question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) understands that the program suggested by the parliamentary secretary, and previously by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, is not in respect of people seeking advice from the government. I am sure the hon. member realizes that there is a myriad of government programs and that one can come to Ottawa and spend considerable time looking for the right people. This is an effort to co-ordinate the channels here so that someone will help them tiptoe through the tulips. I should like to ask the hon. member if that is an acceptable role for these regional offices in helping with programs such as PAIT, IRDIA and GAAP, as well as numerous other quite good programs of the government.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member let me say that most of the businessmen I speak with wish to have as few dealings as possible with the government. They do not want to be bothered with it; they do not want the involvement, they do not want the forms, they do not want the IDB or any of the red tape. They just want to run their businesses and build on what they have. If the government would keep off their backs it would be doing them a great favour. If the government would just let them have the money and let the banks administer it under this program, it would be doing them a great favour. But it should not become involved in the ins and outs of tiptoeing through the tulips because, quite frankly, they are businessmen and not horticulturists.

Mr. Danson: Should programs such as PAIT, IRDIA and GAAP, as well as various other programs that assist small and large business, be scrapped?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. I think perhaps we are entering into a debate.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, tonight it is with great pleasure that I take the floor for the first time since the opening of this 29th Parliament. I should like to congratulate the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker, the Deputy Chairman and the Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole House (Messrs. McCleave, Laniel; and Boulanger); I think that they perform exceptionally well in the House, granting to all hon. members the consideration they deserve, reflecting the confidence they have obtained from the electorate in their own constituencies.

Tonight, we are debating a notice of motion for raising to $75,000 the ceiling on loans available to small businesses. Mr. Speaker, I think that we should consider the problem in a much more comprehensive and general manner. At present, there are two ways of obtaining credit from the federal government for the small and medium businesses. First, there are the small business loans granted through the Industrial Development Bank. In my opinion, the hon. member for Hasting (Mr. Ellis) has well covered the matter of increasing the maximum amount of such loans, but I believe he ignored very important factors.

As concerns the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), he insisted mainly on the important role being assumed by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce concerning assistance bo businesses in general, and I believe that he too has discussed that role quite well, though very briefly.

The hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson) no doubt had worked somewhat harder on the speech he was to deliver in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, but I believe that he dealt here with almost all the important points to be considered.

The hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling) has underlined some weaknesses to be found in the current administration of such legislation.

Although I have been parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance for a few weeks only perhaps I might put forward some ideas on the subject.

• (1750)

In my opinion, the most important thing that we should consider is a complete revision of both programs. If we could find some means of combining and integrating those two programs into a single one perhaps we might partly solve our problem in view of the fact that in our modern world of 1973 it is very difficult to distinguish small businesses from medium-size businesses. I think that a turnover of $500,000 does not mean anything today nor does a maximum loan of $75,000.

The Speech from the Throne stated that great importance should be given to the medium-size businesses and the people who operate them. And what makes me rather optimistic in this connection is that the medium-size or small business is the most important source of employment for people 45 or over and most often not unskilled.

Having worked for a business firm I know from experience that the facts mentioned by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth are true to a certain extent. It is quite difficult for a medium-size business to have dealings with a government agency. In my opinion, this is not a flaw in the legislation but rather a gap in administration and personnel which in some cases should be filled.

Each week I receive a number of people 45 years old or over looking for a job. Big businesses and even government services find it very difficult to employ those people. And when they succeed in finding a job it is most often with a small or medium-size business.

While reviewing those pieces of legislation, I believe we should keep in mind the part played by average enterprises in the Canadian economy by providing work for these people who could not find work otherwise.

It was emphasized a while ago that small enterprises always managed to keep their employees twelve months a year because of their flexibility and ability to adjust to all circumstances.

I believe we should find some way of assisting, through grants, enterprises specializing to a certain extent in the employment of people who would otherwise be at grips with great financial difficulties and would probably have to rely one day or another on welfare benefits.

I believe it would be much more profitable for all governments at the federal or provincial level to subsidize employment rather than unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, the object of the notice of motion moved tonight is merely to increase the maximum of a loan from $25,000 to $75,000, which is entirely inadequate since it does not meet with current problems. The hon. member for York North dared mention the amount of $100,000: I for one cannot see why limits would be set when an application is justified.

If we make a quick review of the aims—

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hon. member for Champlain on a point of order.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, if the hon. member who has the floor now is in favour of this notice of motion, he could perhaps shorten his statement so that we can vote on the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, in view of his long experience in this House, knows very well that he cannot rise on a point of order in that case.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, I am not so much in favour of this notice of motion; I say so because it is not comprehensive and it covers only one very limited side of the problem.

This time, the Speech of the Throne seems to be approved by all opposition parties. Some people say it draws inspiration from the programs of different parties. However, one can find in the Speech of the Throne this importance given to the middle businessman, importance that will be granted to him in a more practical way within the weeks to come.

I know perfectly well that the Department of Finance is carrying out a study of the reform of these programs. Indeed I suggest that all governments continuously review programs of assistance to business as a whole.

As to the Small Businesses Loans Act, I am quite confident that in the coming weeks the committee will hand its report to the department and that before long the minister will announce new policies in that regard.

I should like to come back to the point raised by the hon. member for Hastings regarding the Small Businesses Loans Act and remind him that those loans are only complementary to all other sources of credit available from various private institutions. A small business will call on the government to obtain a loan under that act only when it cannot obtain loans at satisfactory terms.

Such loans are generally made for periods of up to ten years, but I think that all this—

[English]

Mr. Ellis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is saying that the only time one can turn to the Small Businesses Loans Act is when you cannot obtain funds anywhere else. That is not the case. It is the case with the Industrial Development Bank, but not with the Small Businesses Loans Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. This is a point of debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, what I wanted to say is that as a rule small businesses go to banks to obtain a loan under the Small Businesses Loans Act only when they are experiencing difficulties, and I am talking from experience. Indeed, as the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth said a while ago, people are generally somewhat hesitant to go to provincial or federal agencies to obtain a loan.

Mr. Speaker, judging from the Speech from the Throne, I think the hon. minister of Finance will be introducing concrete measures in his budget speech and the minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Gillespie) will be announcing new legislation to help those various businesses across Canada—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOOD PRICES

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray:

That a special committee of this House be appointed to enquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends;

That 20 members of the House of Commons to be designated by the House at a later date be the members of the special committee and that Standing Order 65(5) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; to engage the services of counsel, accountants and such other clerical and technical personnel as may be deemed necessary.

And the amendment of Mr. McGrath (p. 477), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harney (p. 478).

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I understand that there have been negotiations—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Reid: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I understand that there has been negotiation and agreement among the various parties to defer the vote on the amendment today, and if there is to be a vote of the House it should be tomorrow after the oral question period. I believe there is agreement to do that, and also that the votes be taken on any other amendments at that time.

Mr. Baldwin: I think that is correct, Mr. Speaker. There are a very large number of hon. members who because of the inclement weather have been unable to arrive here, and we certainly do not want to deprive them of their votes. Sometimes undue prominence is given to the fact that the number of those who vote is not as large as it might be, if the reason is not made plain. We are quite agreeable to this plan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, our position is substantially the same. We are not happy about postponing votes on amendments that are before the House, because we feel that generally the rule is correct that one issue should be cleared up before we deal with another one. But for the reasons stated by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) we think it would be appropriate not to have any votes this evening but, rather, to have the House order that there be recorded votes at the beginning of government business tomorrow on the amendment and the subamendment now before the House and on any other amendments that might be moved between now and the end of this debate at ten o'clock this evening.

I might say that my friend, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), has the floor on the subamendment that is before the House, but once this discussion is over I think you will find that his remarks, as usual, will be brief and to the point.

Mr. Baldwin: That will be a change.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger).]

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) does not appreciate the very kind words which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said about me. I thought everyone in the House appreciated my brilliance.

Mr. Baldwin: I was talking about your brevity; that is a different thing.

Mr. Gleave: Before the debate was interrupted at five o'clock I was answering a few of the points that had been made by the party to my right, and now I would like to make one or two further points. Some opposition was expressed to the point of view put forward by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) that food in this country was a bargain for Canadians. It certainly is so far as the farmer-producer is concerned. Someone said there would be long, cold months ahead for those on fixed incomes. This will depend upon how high or how low the incomes are fixed. For those who are comparatively well-to-do it is not a great problem. For those who are not in that position it creates an almost insurmountable problem. I hope that as a result of this proposed investigation we will arrive at some procedures or proposals to make food more readily available to those who are on limited incomes.

As has been pointed out by other hon. members, previous investigations and studies of food prices have been conducted in Canada. I would point out that in a relatively short time in terms of history, practically in one person's lifetime, there has been great change in farm practice and in the distribution and marketing of food. We have moved from subsistence to commercial farming.

There was a time when the consumer and the farmer met face to face over the sale of practically all farm products. Indeed, that can still happen here in Ottawa; consumers can still go to the Bytown market and buy flowers and vegetables directly from the growers. But that is the exception to the general rule. Over the years we have moved progressively to separate the consumer from the producer. This has proven to be a very expensive operation. It has cost both parties a great deal, and it is a continuing cost.

Recently the Manitoba department of agriculture began to publish the differences in retail and farm prices. A good example is eggs. A recent release states:

Traditionally, Winnipeg and Montreal have shared the dubious honour of having the largest spread between farm and retail prices for eggs, namely, 22 cents per dozen. By comparison, the average spread between farm and retail in Toronto has been 15 cents per dozen and in Regina 18 cents per dozen.

Nobody can really do very much about packaging an egg once the hen has laid it. About all that people in the chain from the producer to the consumer can do is wash it, put it in a carton and see that it gets on a shelf. For this the charge has been 22 cents a dozen in some Canadian cities. We should ask ourselves why this situation has taken place and why there is this wide difference in price. We often hear the story, "The consumer wants this kind of package. The consumer wants this done and that done." That really is not the whole story by a long shot. I have watched much of it unfold. Departments of agriculture have played a role in it. University extension departments have played an important role; they have said, "There has to be better quality. We have to look after the quality of eggs, pork, broilers and turkeys."

• (2010)

Mr. Speaker, upon examination it will be found that at least 50 per cent of the changes that have taken place to ensure quality and conformity of the product were not to please the purchaser or producer but, rather, were an effort to develop a product that would move uniformly through the processes of packaging, evisceration or counter display in the stores. The changes were designed to facilitate these steps and make it easier for the processor or retailer to reap a larger profit with less trouble.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: That was the reason for a good many of the changes. In many cases the benefit to the consumer was incidental, and in other cases it was the farmer who paid the price of the new regulations or controls. The dairy industry is a glaring example of this; it was so nearly run into the ground that the Canadian Dairy Commission had to be established in order to regulate it. If it were not for the commission, milk production would not have met the needs of the people of Canada. Indeed, even now cream producers have not been able to meet our needs because of these harsh regulations and for the last three years we have had to import butter, as we will again this year.

The other day the Minister of Agriculture said in the House that he faced this situation with equanimity, that our position is quite good. This country is one of the richest in agricultural resources of any western nation, yet the Minister of Agriculture is happy because we are not producing enough butter to look after our own people! This situation has developed at the expense of the farmer and the consumer and, in the process, control of some sectors of our agricultural industry has been turned over to multinational corporations whose concern for the consumer or producer is non-existent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: As we know, the Kraft Company has moved from thirty-second place to twenty-eighth place in the list of the largest corporations in North America. Last year its profits amounted to over $82 million. It operates in many countries of the world. Last summer the Standing Committee on Agriculture was trying to find out why at least one cheese factory, and perhaps more, could not get enough milk to manufacture cheese, and to this end had the dairy council appear before it. That factory had to close down, but at the same time the price of cheese to the consumer skyrocketed. This is part of the control process in our society with relation to the distribution of food.

A few years ago we had a surplus of grain, but not now. Some things should be realized when we tackle this question of food prices. The first is that the days of cheap land in Canada for agricultural purposes have just about come to an end, and the days of cheap labour are also coming to an end. This House can calculate what this will mean in relation to the question of cheap food. This year there is a world shortage of grain, especially rice. In some cases this has been the result of drought or flood in the rice producing regions, so we cannot continue to count on this bounty. Mr. Speaker, we will have to conserve our land and protect the people who farm it, otherwise the price of careless exploitation of the people or the land will be much higher than this society can afford.

If the standing committee which we are proposing can bring this one fact of life home to the Canadian people, then it will have accomplished something. If at the same time it can inform the consumers of Canada where the excess costs of food lie, that will be another very important contribution. Perhaps we can also cut down some of the barriers between consumer and producer both in terms of price and content. If we can do this, Mr. Speaker, we will have accomplished something.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the amendment. All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to special order made this day, the recorded division on the subamendment is deferred, to be taken tomorrow immediately after government orders are entered upon.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had in this parliament to speak in any debate. I should like to make my opening remarks quite brief and incorporate all the nice things that have been said about you, just adding one of my own. Not only are you most fair, Sir, but I think what makes you an able Speaker is your ability to read human behaviour and your sense of humour which can keep the House on an even keel at times—even when the person speaking happens to be the member for Calgary North.

We are again debating the motion to set up a special committee dealing with food prices. The first paragraph of the motion asks:

That a special committee of this House be appointed to inquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends—

Pursuant to another amendment passed, the other place has been deleted from membership on the committee. I intend to begin my remarks by saying that I propose at the end of my speech to move a further amendment which will reduce the number on this committee from 20 to 19. I intend to move that the figure "20" in the first line of the second paragraph be deleted and that the figure "19" be substituted therefor. My reason for moving the amendment is that in accordance with established precedent in this parliament there ought to be on all standing committees of the House eight government supporters, eight members from my party, two from the New Democratic Party and one from the other party, making a total of 19. I do not see why more than 19 should serve on this committee—this is the case with the supplementary estimate committee—and I think other hon. members will agree with me.

I shall now direct my remarks to the question of the price of food and other costs. Before doing so, I endorse fully the remarks made by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) regarding this committee. Certainly, I am prepared to see a committee of the House investigate high food prices. These prices have been going up and up. Between 1968 and 1972 they ran wild. We discussed this question during the election; it was one of the main election issues and I am happy to see that it has come before the House. But I am shocked, as a Member of this Parliament, that at this time, in view of the terrible shape the economy of this country is in, we should now be debating the setting up of a committee which at some time in the future will come up with some suggestions.

This reminds me of what the leader of the Creditiste party said; the government spent many millions of dollars on the B and B Commission to come to the conclusion that one part of the country speaks French and the other English. That commission cost $16 million. I say, when speaking about this committee, let us get down to brass tacks otherwise this committee is a sham. It is a farce, and shocks me. I was on the hustings, Mr. Speaker, and heard what many members of the NDP said about the government. They said it was doing nothing to cure inflation. According to some to them—and I agree—we are in worse shape now with regard to inflation than any other western nation. We have done nothing in the past four years to control it. Yet members of the NDP are now carrying this farce too far and behaving as if they were part of the government. That I find most shocking.

I should like the committee to look not only at food costs but at other costs, including shelter. The costs of shelter have risen by 60 per cent in the last short while. This affects drastically the wage earner, the pensioner, the man on fixed income, even the small businessman, because all need shelter. I do not think we need be concerned about food costs so much as about what our dollar will purchase. Money has become so inflated that people are not able to purchase as much food and shelter with their money as they could four years ago. That is the question we must study. What has happened to reduce the purchasing power of the dollar? In that regard we ought to discuss the government's position on taxation.

In the previous parliament—it is opportune to bring this to the attention of the House at this time because the committee should consider food costs and costs of shelter—a white paper on taxation was introduced. It was considered by a committee of this House for a considerable time. Then when the whole business was over, what was the result? The average, middle-income Canadian paid the highest amount he has ever paid in personal income tax. I do not have the figures before me relating to United States taxpayers; however, they pay less than the taxpayers of this country. As I said, we pay higher taxes than ever. The government is taxing the farmer, the processor, the wholesaler, the retailer and, finally, the consumer. The few dollars left in his pay envelope will not stretch far enough so that he can afford the necessary groceries and shelter that his family needs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: There is the problem. This government, by introducing its policy of high taxation in the last four years, has brought about the erosion of the dollar. It has aggravated the situation by permitting inflation which has been brought about through its taxation policies and its spending policies. I wish we could bring the estimates back before this House. This government has squandered millions of dollars. That, together with its policy of high taxation, has brought about inflation in the country. That is why we are debating the setting up of this committee, which I do not think will bring about any solution. By the time it reports, as hon. members know, inflation will have reached a new plateau and our people will be even shorter of cash. That is the situation.

I now want to talk about shelter costs and discuss what this government has done. Not long ago the then deputy prime minister of this country resigned. I am referring to the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer). He left the treasury benches because he could no longer go along with the economic policies of the government. That is why he resigned, Mr. Speaker. Today he is sitting on my side of the House. As I say, he resigned because he could no longer endorse economic policies which brought to this nation the highest rate of inflation among western nations.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: That was the main issue in the election. An article I hold in my hand is headlined, "Housing in Toronto is 'major social tragedy' ". The article reads.

> Less than 4 per cent of Toronto wage earners can afford a new home, says a study by the Urban Development Institute which calls the city's housing situation a major social tragedy.
> The study, released Wednesday, warns that 'unless drastic action is taken immediately, this situation will become more desperate.'
> The institute's figures are based on a comparison of 1961 and 1971 incomes.

I am about to illustrate the magnitude of our inflationary problem. In 1961 when my party was in office an annual wage of $5,284 was enough to buy a house. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation would lend a man earning such a salary enough money to obtain a mortgage, or would back a mortgage. So a man could buy a house if he earned a little over $5,000. In 1973, in Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Montreal or any other major centre, a person needs an income of $16,623 before he can qualify for a mortgage through CMHC. These are facts. This is inflation.

How did we reach this situation? In other words, why did the hon. member for Trinity resign from the government party? It will be remembered that the government had set up a task force on housing and then, when the hon. member brought in recommendations, refused to act on them. At present the minister responsible for urban affairs is attending a conference. He said in a recent speech that the government will set aside $500 million for setting up a land bank. The acquisition will be spread over five years, which boils down to $100 million per year.

C. D. Howe once asked, "What's a million?". Perhaps I should ask this government, what is $100 million today in considering its land bank policy? If you took 640 acres in the north of Toronto and divided it up at ten lots to the acre, how much would you accomplish? Add another half section of land, making a total of 960 acres, divided that up, and how much would you accomplish? How much land do you think you can buy for $100 million surrounding one city, Toronto? Why, that amount would not be enough to buy the land for a Toronto development. So the whole thing is a sham.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am under the impression that we are discussing food prices. The hon. member has not yet mentioned food prices. Is it permissible to speak about housing and everything else, or should the hon. member be speaking about food prices?

Mr. Woolliams: I will answer that question, Mr. Speaker. I am talking about the cost of living. If the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) thinks the only problem in his constituency is the cost of food, and he is not concerned about shelter, he had better go back to Lake Centre and not to Regina, because I do not think those people will agree with him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I want to continue with my thoughts about the cost of living. The problem today is that 60 per cent of the income earned by the average wage earner is needed to buy any form of shelter—and to give those people and their families any kind of dignity. That is the purpose of raising this question. I emphasize that a person must earn about $17,000 before he can qualify for a CMHC mortgage. That is three times greater than the salary required in 1961. Therefore with regard to how inflation is affecting the cost of houses, in the past ten years the situation has become three times worse because of this government's policies as far as inflation is concerned.

Let us look at another area. Let us go further west to Vancouver. I quote from the United Housing Foundation:

> The cost of a housing lot in the greater Vancouver area has jumped $2,000 and in some cases $3,000 in one year—an 18 per cent increase. The average industrial wage earner is already hard put to it to find suitable housing for his family. Anyone on a limited income is in trouble now—the situation will get worse. Non-profit and co-operatively owned housing are an effective way of putting a lid on the spiralling costs of at least some of our housing stock—

At least this article makes certain recommendations. The housing situation is now tragic. People are unable to buy decent homes. They cannot buy a decent place for themselves and their families. Therefore I wish to make a recommendation. The motion should have been broad enough to cover the whole cost of living. If this committee is going to be of any help to Canadians, it should not only cover the price of food but the whole cost of living as far as Canadians are concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Those on fixed pensions and incomes, with the exception of a few senior citizens who live in subsidized homes, are unable to purchase even the lowest priced house at the present time. Misery has been fanned everywhere by this government since 1968. A committee is now being established to look into the matter. Nothing whatsoever has been done since the last election in October, 1972. Perhaps the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) was correct: we see the same government, but the men are in different cabinet positions.

When the Minister of Finance told us what he thought of the new cabinet he gave a splendid answer, even though he was quoting somebody else. As far as this government is concerned, it is like somebody moving from one death chair to another on the Titanic. That is how bankrupt the government is. The Canadian people know that the government is bankrupt and has nothing to offer, and the quicker it goes to the people of Canada or gives up its job on the treasury benches, the better it will be for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Are you hungry, Eldon?

Mr. Woolliams: I say to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) that I am not hungry but the people of Canada are hungry tonight. That is who is hungry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to know why the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) mentioned my name instead of going to the person who made that particular comment. The only comment I would make is that he is anticipating a promotion. He did not mention anything about the cost of food. I think I know more about it than he has told us so far.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: I always like to flush out my good friend. If he was not talking at that time it must have been exceptional, because he is always talking from his seat. When I heard a remark from that direction, I naturally thought it was from him. If he denies it, I accept that.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): It makes sense when I speak.

Mr. Woolliams: You make a lot of sense.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Thank you.

Mr. Woolliams: What should we do immediately with regard to housing? We should legislate together with an agreement with the provinces in order to get land prices in major areas down to a reasonable amount. We should have a serious conference with the leaders of municipalities and urban centres—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I do not want to limit the hon. member, but points of order have been raised asking the hon. member to come to the subject matter of the motion before the House at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): I know the subjects of inflation and the cost of living are interesting to all members, but any remarks outside the ambit of food prices should be directed toward the motion before the House.

Mr. Woolliams: I respect Your Honour, but I might speak to the point of order without taking up my time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: At page 479 of yesterday's Hansard, Mr. Deputy Speaker and the government House leader stated that this debate should take place in the broadest terms. That certainly encompasses the factors I have raised in so far as the cost of living and the cost of housing are concerned. That ruling made yesterday is recorded at page 479 of Hansard; I bring that to Your Honour's attention.

Mr. Baldwin: They looked at the NDP when they said "broad".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I do not want to quarrel with the hon. member. I did not question the hon. member when he talked about the cost of housing and other factors of inflation, but when the hon. member goes as far as proposing solutions to specific problems such as housing and the cost of living, that is a little beyond the interpretation that might have been made by Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect, Sir, when talking about the price of housing surely it is relevant to discuss how to get it down to a fair price. There is another recommendation I wish to make. The sales tax on building equipment should now be abolished. If the government feels it cannot go that far, the very least it should do is refund to home owners when buying a new house the portion of the sales tax they paid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Having said that, I now wish to turn to my amendment. As I said in my opening remarks, the proper number of members on this committee should be 19, the same as on the standing committee. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That the motion be amended by striking out the figure "20" in the first line of the second paragraph thereof and substituting therefor the figure "19".

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate very briefly. Indeed, I rise for only one purpose, to suggest a different figure for the number of members who should constitute this committee. As hon. members are aware, I raised this question in the House a few days ago in the hope that we could settle it by consultation among representatives of the various parties. However, since we did not achieve unanimous agreement on the point, the only way we can now resolve it is by putting the matter to the House.

• (2040)

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has made the assertion that all the standing committees of the House now consist of 19 members and therefore that is the proper number for this committee. May I make a slight correction to this assertion. It is not true that all standing committees number 19, or even 20 as the book says. There are two that have over 30 members each, and there are at least two that have 12 members. There are also two or three committees with memberships of 21 and 23. So there really is not anything sacred about the number 20 or the figure 19. The only reason that 19 has been chosen for a large number of the standing committees in this session is so that there can be equal representation by the two larger parties in this House of Commons.

However, when it comes to this committee we happen to think it is an important one. We are aware of all the time that has been lost since my leader during the election campaign demanded an immediate inquiry into the price of food. Nevertheless, it is better that it get started now than not be started at all.

We feel that if this inquiry is going to be made, the representation on the committee should be as close as possible to the proportionate representation of the parties in the House of Commons. If hon. members will do some arithmetic, they will find that out of 19 members we would be entitled to about two and a half, but we get only two.

Mr. Alexander: I knew you had a point somewhere.

Mr. Knowles: (Winnipeg North Centre): Mind you, our two may well be worth two and a half. If there are 25 members, the fractions work out a little more fairly, and this is one reason for our suggestion that this committee consist of 25 members. These 25 members should be made up as follows: ten Liberals; ten Progressive Conservatives—you cannot tell the difference between them, so we might as well have the same number each—three New Democrats and two representatives from the Social Credit party.

I said the other day that we would be glad to make it 25 or 30 members but that we are now prepared to settle for 25 on the understanding that they be divided in the way I have suggested. Therefore, we hope that the House will accept a subamendment to that effect.

Originally the government proposed a committee consisting of 30 members. We kicked off ten who were not exactly useful to the committee, so we can new split the difference between 20 and 30 and have the committee consist of 25 members. I hope the House will accept this proposal which, as I say, we tried to reach by consultation among the parties. As it turned out, three representatives agreed to 25 but the fourth did not.

Mr. Baldwin: The most important one.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So, Mr. Speaker, we have no alternative but to move this subamendment. We hope that as a result of the additional representation on the committee from both the two older parties, from this party and from the Social Credit party the committee will be able to do a better job. Therefore, without taking any further time I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight):

That the proposed amendment be amended by deleting therefrom the figure "19" and by substituting therefor the figure "25".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I suppose procedurally the Chair cannot refuse the amendment, but it might not be the best way to find a solution. In any event, I hope hon. members will not come along with further amendments as to the number of members.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we would ask that the question be put, since we think the subamendment is not a proper one. We did hope that this might have resulted in the elevation of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) to the chair, but in the absence of that guarantee we have some doubts about it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): All those opposed will please say nay?

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Is it the understanding of the House that all the votes on the amendment and on any subamendments be deferred until tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Then according to the special order made this day, this vote stands deferred until tomorrow after the question period.

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I thought that when this committee was suggested with the number 20 as membership from the House of Commons, it was going to be a boondoggle participated in by members of this House, and at one point by members of the Senate. It is interesting that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) wants to increase the size of this boondoggle to 25. I would urge the members of the House, when the appropriate time comes, to restrict the number to 19 which seems more clearly to reflect the usefulness of the exercise.

At the outset of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I want to give notice that I will be moving a further amendment to the government motion before the House. This motion, in effect, will be to insert after the first paragraph, next after the word "Canada", the words "since 1967". The intention of the motion is to restrict the committee in its study of price and food trends to the years from 1967 to the present time. The motion is not in any way intended to restrict the effectiveness of the committee. Indeed, it is intended to increase effectiveness.

History has shown that we have had in this House a considerable number of committees examining the question of food prices. As so many speakers in this debate have pointed out, the most noteworthy committee in recent times was during the years 1966 and 1967. It seems to me that what the main motion before the House is doing is merely continuing that exercise which was terminated temporarily in 1967. It would assist whoever is chairing the committee and, indeed, the members and staff of the committee to focus on only immediate problems, those from 1967 to 1973.

Reference has been made in this House to a number of policy studies both by parliamentary committees and royal commissions. As early as 1935 there was a Commons committee on price spreads in the food industry. In 1948 there was another Commons committee, and in 1958 there was a royal commission. In 1967 there was a Commons committee. You can see how the cycle goes. In the mid-1950s royal commissions came into fashion. It seems to me the boondoggle was then transferred from members of this House to members of the civil service or those outside who happened to be friends of the government at a particular time. Then the boondoggle came back to this House in 1966-67. The studies have become a periodic ritual. But nothing was ever done.

There are many of us who will remember the activities of the 1966 committee as it travelled around the country holding hearings and then came back and held hearings in the city of Ottawa. During that time there were exposés on the front pages of many newspapers. There may have been some good work on the part of that committee, although that is sometimes difficult to discern.

I would honestly submit that we are engaged in the same old exercise which will have the same old results. It is high time the people of Canada had some new approach to problems in respect of food prices. We have not seen a new approach and I think the public is honestly looking for one. After all, this government does have other sources of information available to it. This committee is not going to uncover brand new questions for the first time and unearth facts, figures, views and concepts which will provide a startling and instant solution.

It is my understanding that there is, after all, a Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. This department apparently has officials who receive information from industry and a variety of sectors of the economy. Indeed, it was that department which sponsored the famous Bill C-256, the Competition Act, which was supposed to deal with combines and the exercise of a monopoly power in all sectors of the economy. This was an ill-conceived bill the likes of which this House had never seen. No doubt the new bill, if it ever comes, will be a significant improvement and more carefully drawn than the old one.

Mr. Baldwin: It could not be worse.

Mr. Atkey: Undoubtedly the new bill will be based on a wealth of information that many of us know the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has received during hearings and private meetings with the minister and members of his staff.

There has also been a prices and incomes commission in this country which apparently has done research on food prices. The members of this House and members of the public have not yet had the benefit of much of that research but it is hoped that it will be made available to members of the committee. Indeed, one would like to think there may be some wisdom emanating from that research on which the government might well have acted had it the will to act.

We also have in this country a Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act. I am sure members of this House are familiar with the powers of that gentleman and his staff, both his powers to investigate and the research carried on. One would hope that that sort of information could be available to the government and that it could act on it. One would hope the information will be available to members of the committee when they begin their investigation.

Finally, we have a body in this country called the Economic Council of Canada. It attempts to set economic goals and provide direction for the country on the frequent occasions when this government has not seen fit to do so. That council in its third annual report produced a document entitled "Prices, Productivity and Employment". That report and the background studies carried out pursuant to it provided useful documents for this government upon which it should have based a policy dealing with food prices. Again, these studies will be available to the committee. It represents part of the wealth of information available to this government upon which it should have acted.

With this wealth of information collected during the history of Commons committees, the shift to royal commissions and then back to Commons committees, and with the work of the Prices and Incomes Commission, the combines investigation branch, the officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Economic Council of Canada, we have almost exhausted the subject. It is very difficult to appreciate what useful purpose is to be served by yet another committee.

Lest we on this side of the House be understood as being completely negative in our approach, let me say that there are a few benefits which may result from this committee. I can think of the difficult position of the city dweller and his mystification about the very high and drastic increases in the price of food. I can understand his rather futile attempt to lay the blame at the doorstep of the most obvious and apparent person involved in the marketing of food, that is, the operator of the supermarket and the small, corner grocery store. One of the few useful purposes this committee might serve is to show the Canadian public that the problem is complex and that there is no single group to be blamed for the high price of food.

What the committee might do in its very detailed report, which we hope will eventually come out, is to set forth in skeleton form the structure of the food industry for the benefit of the Canadian people. In other words, the committee is an educational process. There are easier ways to educate the members of this House and the Canadian public, but if the committee has some value I suppose it should be viewed in this context.

Secondly, as the committee of 1966-67 pointed out, the very existence of a committee on food prices may have some short-term benefits in terms of a stabilization of food prices. It may be that with all the publicity given to the committee's hearings, housewives will attempt to shop more carefully and more selectively. This may be a short-term benefit.

Thirdly, there may be some benefit flowing from the committee in the sense it will encourage participants in the food industry to try harder to lower prices. One of the great revelations of the 1966-67 committee was the extent of monopoly power and control in the food industry. It may be that just the publicity given committee hearings will once again result in some voluntary price reductions by participants in the food industry, whether they be wholesalers, retailers or producers. They may choose to revise their particular structural organizations which will result in freer competition and lower prices for food.

All these are merely short-term, temporary solutions with marginal benefits at best. Certainly they are marginal when one compares them with the time to be invested by the committee members and the expense and the attention required of a large number of members of this House and others in what may prove to be a futile exercise.

As the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence) has indicated, we will co-operate in the conduct of the proceedings of this committee. I am not sure it will remedy the mystery which is still in the minds of a great many people throughout this country as to where the blame lies. But it will do one thing. It will prove more than ever that in recent years there is one party which could have done something about food prices but has not. That is the government. The government has not acted, and the Canadian people are going to realize that.

Therefore, to expedite the work of the committee I should like to formally move my amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). I move:

That the motion be amended by inserting in the first paragraph thereof, next after the word "Canada", the words "since 1967".

There is one additional matter I would raise in the context of this debate. It is the question of comparing food prices in the major cities in Canada with food prices in certain major cities of the country to the south of us. I raise this more as a question than as a matter of providing any definitive facts or answers. I am referring to a survey conducted by the Montreal Star which contains a comparison of the price of a typical grocery basket purchased by an average family in Canada in the month of June, 1972, and by an average family in the United States in the same period. Significantly, the Canadian cities proposed for this survey were Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver. The comparison was with the United States cities of New York, Chicago, St. Louis and San Francisco. One might say that this selection of cities represents a fair sampling of cities in the case of each country.

In all four Canadian cities the price of the average basket of groceries was significantly higher than the price in the United States cities. In my city of Toronto the price was $32.03 for the grocery basket selected, while the price for a similar grocery basket in the so-called expensive city of New York was $28.67. I would hope that the significant variations in food prices for those living north of the border in comparison to those living south of the border might become one of the major subjects of investigation by members of the committee. The answer might possibly be in the broader context of the special controls which might be instituted pursuant to a foreign investment policy by this or other governments, but I believe it is a question which should be dealt with.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I rise to indicate my intention to support the motion put forward by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) in respect of the setting up of a committee to look into the causes and reasons for the rapid increases in the price of food in Canada. There is no question but that inflation in this particular area is a most important and serious matter. I think something must be done about it and therefore welcome the initiative on the part of the government in proposing the establishment of this committee. Furthermore, this is one way in which the government can show it in fact meant what it said in the Speech from the Throne when it indicated its intention to look into this problem and to do something positive about it.

I also intend to support the amendment put forward by the New Democratic Party which asks that this committee should make an interim report and bring forward recommendations for action within two months. I support that because I believe the problem is indeed urgent. I welcome that amendment and take great pleasure in stating I shall vote in favour of it when it is before the House.

In respect of the original amendment put forward by the Conservative party which in effect suggests that the final report of this committee and its recommendations should be made within three months of its first being convened, I must say that this is an amendment I cannot support because it implies a rather simplistic approach to the question of prices in Canada. I do not really think the problem of inflation will be licked for all time by the establishment of such a committee. I believe the committee ought to meet on a more continuing basis and look into these problems as they develop from time to time. I am sorry the amendment put forward by the Conservative party earlier, which was supported by the New Democrats and by the Creditistes, removed the Senate—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I have to bring the hon. member to order because it is not permitted by the rules of this House to comment, pass judgment or reflect upon any vote taken earlier by this House.

Mr. Cafik: Perhaps I could say that I believe it would have been a good idea to have included on this committee people such as Senator Croll from the other place who could contribute a great deal to the work of the committee.

An hon. Member: You are out of order.

Mr. Cafik: In fact, I believe the addition of Senator Croll to the committee would have been of great benefit to the people of Canada. However, since I am not allowed to say that, Mr. Speaker, I shall not make any comment in that regard although I would have liked to indicate the immense contribution which they could have made in the work of this important committee.

I would hope this committee will in fact come forward with some specific recommendations to solve the problem of inflation in the food sector of our economy. I do not wish to prejudge what the recommendations might be but speaking for myself I would have no objection, and would certainly give careful consideration, to the possibility of introducing legislation affecting the cost of food. I hope the committee will look very carefully into the question of mark-ups by groceterias and supermarkets to see what effect this factor has on rising, inflationary costs. In conclusion, I take great pleasure in supporting this measure. I hope it will in fact do something significant and meaningful to stem the rising cost of food in Canada.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, originally I had no intention of taking part in this debate, not because I did not recognize that the subject is one of great importance but because the case has been well presented for our party by other spokesmen who have carefully developed our position. Indeed, there have been some recent converts, in terms of the recognition of the importance of this issue, on the government side and some of their contributions have yielded something of substance.

However, if ever one wanted to find a set of speeches which manifestly displayed the most cynical kind of political opportunism in Canada in recent years, one only would have to go through Hansard for the past four or five days and look at speeches by members of the Conservative party. This party had the audacity to say that they had the right to govern the country. This was completely strange to hear from the Conservative party, rejecting hundreds of years of constitutional history when they did not have the largest number of seats. In addition, this was strange to hear from a party which during the election campaign spoke about the importance of increasing food prices, documenting how terrible was the plight of the consumer, the pensioner and the disabled veteran and saying that from one end of Canada to the other during the election campaign. One would have hoped that in this debate there would have been one Conservative spokesman who would have risen in the House and said, "This is what we would do; this is our proposal for dealing with rising food prices." I for one would have welcomed that.

As a second alternative, one might have hoped that they would at least approach the committee study proposal with some degree of seriousness. Instead of that, what have they done? The first amendment they brought before the chamber would have astounded poor John A. Macdonald who recognized the Senate for what it is. It is never mentioned in Canadian history books, but some Tories on my right may recall that John A. Macdonald, in defending the Senate, said that he needed an institution in Canada to protect the rights of the minority.

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think in view of the fact that there is a motion for discussion before the House, a worthy motion, the hon. member who is now making his speech should not be referring to the first motion which was before the House and which dealt with the composition of the committee. I would respectfully suggest that the hon. member be brought to order and that he be reminded to deal with the motion now before the House.

Mr. Broadbent: That is precisely what I am doing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The point is well taken. I think hon. members should refrain from reflecting on any debates at the conclusion of which a decision had been rendered, and I would invite the hon. member to try to stay away from making such comments.

Mr. Broadbent: I will do that, Mr. Speaker, with as much sense of decorum as I can. The point I am making is that the amendment presented by the Conservative party illustrates very well their total lack of desire to deal with serious political problems and their total desire to bring down this government and to discredit serious politics in this country.

Mr. Korchinski: You must be kidding.

Mr. Broadbent: Let me conclude my comment on the observation of the great leader of the Conservative party at the time of confederation. He said that we needed a Senate because the Senate would protect the interests of the minority. And, Sir John A. Macdonald said, the rich are always a minority. Of course, that has been the history of the Senate in Canada. I found it a little surprising that members of the party to my right, for the first time in that party's history—and I noted that the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was away that day; perhaps it was accidental, perhaps it was not—should have come before the House and proposed the removal of the Senate from this committee. Cynicism?

The second amendment they brought before us was that the serious study made of the increase in food prices be completed after a mere three months. Anyone with an ounce of brains and two ounces of political commitment to this important issue should know that such an amendment is completely idiotic.

Finally, a new member of the House—I do not criticize him particularly since he is acting for that dishevelled crowd on my right—presented an amendment which provides that we cannot look at what causes rising food prices for a period antedating 1967. Is that not coincidental? Of course, we had a Liberal government elected in 1968.

Quite apart from that—perhaps a relevant political point of a cheap nature which they are trying to make—there is also the important intellectual and academic fact that you cannot talk about trends in food pricing, you cannot talk about the price-making policies of the large food chains, you cannot talk about anything of a serious nature in pricing in the economy if you look only at a three or four-year trend. What I am saying on this point is that every amendment brought by the Conservative party shows that they do not take the increase in food prices seriously. They show also that that party has no interest right now in making this parliament work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In my concluding comments I want to suggest as precisely as I can some important issues that this committee might consider and deal with in a concrete way, issues that could have an effect, not in six months perhaps but within a year in terms of a permanent, long-range pricing policy on food in Canada. That is what this kind of committee should deal with in part. In part, also, it should be making early recommendations to deal with the immediate crisis. That is why we have an amendment calling for an interim report to be presented to the House in two months. But the main thrust of the committee's work should be concerned with a recommendation to keep food prices in Canada down in the long run so that Canadians with an average income, and in particular those who are poor, can afford to eat well.

What can this committee do in a serious way that the Conservative party would not call boondoggling? First of all, it can find out who is getting the food dollar, the farmer or the middleman. We know some facts on this already. We know that in 1949, for example, the farmer was getting 57 cents of every dollar spent on food. In 1972, last year, his share had dropped to 38 cents. I have another statistic on the share that the farmer is getting and I think it should be brought before the House since I come from an urban constituency and think it is very important indeed to make it quite clear that farmers in Canada are by no means getting their share of the food dollar, at least on the basis of the preliminary evidence.

The net income of farmers from their farm operations declined in the last three-year period, when the average income of other Canadians was going up, from 1968 to 1971 by 8 per cent. In addition, those of us who will be working in the committee in a serious way might find out what real impact the packaging industry has on food prices, what real impact advertising has on the share of the dollar spent, and how it contributes to the rising cost of food. These are serious questions that have to be looked at in a serious way and, if I may say so, must be examined by our party also. We do not pretend to have all the answers.

Mr. Korchinski: Read the NDP advertising in the last campaign.

Mr. Broadbent: I make no comment on that. That is like the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who got up to make a speech on food prices and talked about housing. That a housing conference is going on in Ottawa is simply a curious, incidental fact.

The other matter the committee can look into and seriously consider is the feasibility of financing more direct charge co-ops. I know that in Halifax, Hamilton and in my own constituency, Oshawa, direct charge co-ops began operating in recent years and have been operating with some degree of success. Where they have not turned out well has been in a number of communities where the most important factor was the absence of significant financial resources. In Oshawa and Hamilton the organized trade union movement played an important part in their initial financing. I would like the committee to consider what role federal financing might play in the spread of direct charge co-ops across the country, as one means of keeping down food prices.

The third item the committee might consider is why there are significant disparities in food costs between one region of Canada and another. Just the other day one of the ministers of the British Columbia government was in town and some of us had a discussion with him. Just because we were debating this subject he mentioned that there was a small town north of the city of Vancouver where food prices were 30 per cent higher than in Vancouver. What are the reasons for this? Are there just two or three stores in that town that effectively eliminate competition? I do not immediately know the answer, but it is an important question.

This is also a problem within big cities. Studies have been conducted in Canada, and more particularly in the United States, which show that the large supermarkets charge poor people the most for their products. In the ghetto areas of large cities the costs of basic commodities such as meat, milk and bread are frequently higher than they are in upper-income suburbs. One of the reasons for this is that the mobility of lower-income citizens is substantially less than the more affluent, and thus stores in those areas have a captive market and, if you like, can gouge poor people. If that is the case, I for one think it should be stopped.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The fourth item the committee should examine is how different incomes result in very different kinds of diets for young children. Studies have been conducted among old age pensioners on this subject. Are they indicative of a trend across the country? If they are, this means that old age pensioners are eating a very substandard diet, a low protein diet, low in essential vitamins. A study that seriously looks at food prices must examine that question. The committee might come up with a particular solution—in this case it might be an increase in pensions—or it might be selective price control over certain essential commodities to ensure that all Canadians, regardless of income, are assured of a sound nutritional diet.

Fifthly, I suggest that the committee ought to summon before it the heads of large supermarkets. In this respect I give full credit to the government of the United States of which, on other grounds, I am frequently quite critical. The congressional system, in terms of public hearings, is simply light years ahead of the parliament of Canada. In the United States, when they look at such matters as automobile prices or food prices committees are given effective powers to call witnesses before them and those witnesses must provide the information requested.

I for one would like to get the heads of Loblaws, IGA, Steinberg's, Canadian Safeway and Dominion Stores before the committee to explain their profits. For example, Loblaws, after taxes, recently showed a profit of 6.5 per cent, IGA 6.7 per cent, Steinberg's 9.1 per cent, Canadian Safeway 10.2 per cent and Dominion Stores 11.2 per cent. In the case of the latter three it seems to me that exorbitant, unwarranted profits are being made. It may be that the heads of those companies could present testimony that would show they warrant these profit figures. I doubt it. However, I for one would like them to appear before the committee and present their evidence so that we can seriously consider it.

An hon. Member: What about co-ops?

Mr. Broadbent: A direct charge co-op sells products for cost plus 10 per cent. That means compared with the profit margins of these companies, in terms of their total assets they are operating at a profit of perhaps 1 per cent. That is why the direct charge co-ops are quite important.

Among the kinds of questions that we might ask the heads of supermarket chains are: do they think it is advantageous for the Canadian consumer to have 75 per cent of the grocery business in urban Canada transacted by five companies? Do they think that there is some effective manipulation of prices in Canada to bring this about? In effect, do they think that there is any competition in the food industry? Then the committee could call upon some economists with expertise on food pricing policies and ask them whether they think the Canadian consumer is getting what he ought to get from these five large companies which dominate the grocery business in Canada.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the committee can appraise the significance of a point made by government spokesmen in recent months, particularly during the election campaign. Government spokesmen throughout Canada have said that the only country where a consumer spends less on food as a share of his total spending dollar is the United States. It is true that on a comparison basis we are well off.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I regret having to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Alexander: May I ask the hon. member an important question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hon. member may not be asked a question unless he is allowed extended time. Is there consent to allow the hon. member to complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I was listening with a great deal of interest to the hon. member's speech. If he thinks things are so great for the supermarkets—here I have particular reference to the city of Hamilton—can he tell me why so many Loblaws stores are closing down? With his experience and knowledge, could he explain why Loblaws are closing down en masse across the country?

• (2130)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would not attempt to give a definitive answer and that is why I support the motion for a committee to look at the question. Perhaps one of the reasons is that if they are rationalizing the number of their outlets in the city so that they may get a better profit per store, in that way their overheads are going down; their rents, and so on.

The committee should consider the claim that our food costs are lower than those of many other countries, particularly those in the western world. The government takes the position that this has no critical meaning, that there is no problem, but we in this party say that is a fallacious conclusion, Mr. Speaker. Compared with the rest of the world, this country has one of the finest agricultural sectors that any nation could desire. It may well be that with a more efficient organization for the production of food and effective control of pricing and even the selective control, if need be, of certain key commodities our production could be even better and all the people in this country could get food at a reasonable price.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the hon. member a question? In view of the fact that his party has been amongst the strongest advocates of co-operatives in my province, could the hon. member tell us why they are struggling and why some have closed down?

Mr. Broadbent: First of all, Mr. Speaker, I am informed that co-operatives in Saskatchewan have only about 10 per cent of the food business. I do not pretend to have any expert knowledge of the function of co-operatives in Saskatchewan, but I think the committee should look into that matter.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. I would be ready to recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), but according to my information the hon. member was going to put an amendment. If I allow him to speak now and if he really intends to put an amendment, it would be difficult for him to do so, as we have not yet disposed of the amendment now under consideration. I therefore recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the motion now under consideration. I think that the special committee of the House which will be established to investigate the constant rise of food prices will have a very heavy task to perform. Its members will have to be very courageous if they truly want to go to the bottom of things, because the committee will surely face some big financial interests which will try to drive it off its course, since we know that there is in that field as in many others, a very powerful trust sponging on producers and consumers.

Obviously, if the committee looks into the matter in depth, it will discover many factors which contribute to the cost increase of food products, factors of which the public are unaware but which work against the consumer as well as the producer.

The people should not be led to believe that the increase in the cost of living depends only on the higher cost of food. Many other products have gone up too, and considerably, although we hear much less about them; they add to the rise in the cost of living, but consumers do not complain about them.

Let us take, for instance, the case of alcoholic beverages. Their price has gone up considerably, yet their consumption has also increased. Let us have a look at the statistics: beer consumption goes up every year. What about soft drinks: in 1968, some sold for 60 cents a quart or $24 per cwt. while industrial milk was paid 12 cents a quart or $4.80 per cwt. to the producer. Today, the same soft drink sells for $30 per cwt. while industrial milk with a 3.5 per cent fat content really costs the consumer only $5.50 per cwt. The cost of soft drinks has gone up considerably, in fact twice as much as that of milk.

We therefore cannot say that in the industrial sector the higher cost of milk products has contributed the most to the increase in the cost of living. Let us be logical: the farmer-producer is entitled to a bigger share of the national income, because it is in this area of our economy that the highest increase in production has been achieved, which has been more beneficial to the consumer since there has not been any price inflation in this area, none at least that could be attributed to the farmer-producer himself.

I am convinced that the consumer has been exploited by trusts which spend huge sums of money for often misleading publicity and which should be the object of very close scrutiny from the special committee.

To get back to the subject that I was talking about a short while ago, I dare suggest that some 20 years ago, the producers of raw agricultural materials were getting 28 cents out of every dollar spent on food by the consumer. According to a brief submitted to the Quebec cabinet in 1971, producers received 12 cents on every dollar spent in 1970. In 1972, that part of the consumer dollar going directly to the farmer was 10 cents only.

When retailers such as Steinberg, Dominion and others increase their retail prices in a prohibitive way claiming that crops have been hurt by bad weather, the committee should examine whether it is a pretext for increasing profits by fooling people through misrepresentation. The whole thing should be clarified. The farmer is allowed subsidies by the federal government as an income while the big operators of chain stores increase their profits on food prices.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the committee should have even broader terms of reference to enable it to examine to what extent direct and indirect taxes, high interest rates and the burden of the public debt contribute to the rise of food costs and to recommend in its report to this House the action that should be taken to correct the situation. In other words, if the committee only produces findings that were arrived at by other agencies such as the Economic Council of Canada and the Senate Committee on Poverty, and if the government does not use the means required to improve the situation, we shall simply be wasting time and the taxpayers' money without improving the lot of all consumers.

Consequently, for the committee to be really taken seriously and accomplish a very meaningful job, we should have given it somewhat broader terms of reference.

It would have been profitable for the people of Canada for the committee to scrutinize seriously the abuses of financing plans of all kinds that affect prices considerably, in order that once more a committee of this House should expose financing procedures that reduce the purchasing power of working people, the unemployed, older people, disabled people, widows, etc., while permitting exploiters to get richer.

However, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the committee will work seriously and quickly and that it will prepare a report which will include informative recommendations to the House so that steps can be taken to end the state of disorder before the year 2000.

But if the government is to ignore the report, we shall simply once more be wasting the time of hon. members and raising false hopes in the minds of consumers.

Has the government acted on the report of the Senate Committee on Poverty? Let the facts answer this question. The report was published and the government simply put it aside on the ground that the recommendations did not coincide with its views. This is precisely the reason why we are creating a committee; to inform the people whose responsibility it is to legislate so that legislation meets the needs of the people.

For instance, has the government taken any action about farm machinery following the Barber Commission report?

Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of any action taken after the pulication of that report to bring about some improvement in that area, to reduce the cost of producing foodstuffs, which would certainly have improved the lot of the farmer.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let us hope, in our century of speed, that parliament will act with a little more speed, that the committee will be able to carry out its task efficiently, wasting no time hearing witnesses who have already submitted briefs to other committees, will do a good job and demonstrate once more to the people that the proceedings of the House are not futile and that when a special House committee is set up it is because there is a specific problem to be considered and we do not want to legislate in a haphazard way.

I therefore hope that the sub-amendment brought forward by the New Democratic Party, specifying a deadline for the committee's report to the House, will be adopted and that the committee will carry out the wishes of the House and, in short, produce an adequate report which will prompt us to take the required steps to relieve the consumers who are hardest hit and increase their purchasing power in keeping with their requirements.

Mr. Speaker, those are the few thoughts I wanted to contribute to the debate and I feel sure that all of us together can find valid solutions to the problem we face.

• (2140)

[English]

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to the main motion, amendments and subamendments thereto, I feel rather fortunate in having heard this evening those who spoke before me. I feel the hon. member who spoke immediately before me raised many good points which members of this House could well endorse.

One thing was revealed to me tonight which I admit had puzzled me. I wondered what was the true reason behind this government's proposal for setting up this committee. I think that reason was given by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who pointed out that his leader, during the past election campaign, asked that this committee be established. I had not known until now that that proposal was part of his platform. Presumably part of the deal is that the committee shall be established and the NDP group is willing to support the action of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in that respect.

I have listened to various government spokesmen, including the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray), attempting to justify the establishment of this committee. I must admit I am greatly disappointed by the lack of factual information they have given to support their proposal. For example, a neighbour of mine, the hon. member for York North (Mr. Danson), said in his speech last Thursday evening that he had done intensive research into the subject and felt that the establishment of the committee was justified. Among his observations he said that just about 50 per cent of the married people in the country are women. I think that shows how seriously Liberal spokesmen are attempting to justify the establishment of the committee. They think such comments justify the need for this committee.

Prior to my speaking, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) indicated why they propose to support the main motion and certain amendments. I found it interesting to note that those two members, who come from adjoining ridings, gave almost similar reasons for supporting the proposal to establish this committee. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby made what he feels are five suggestions which the committee might adopt when it is formed. What the hon. member forgot is that a similar committee of this House was established several years ago. Its final conclusion was that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should be established. I note that in the current estimates the budget for that department is over $32 million. I suggest to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby that surely a department that has at its disposal a budget of $32 million could have undertaken a few of the studies it is now expecting from this committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: As has been mentioned earlier, with the establishment of the committee we shall see the seventh of such committees set up by this House. One was established back in 1935 by the Hon. H. H. Stevens—who is not related to me, I might remind the House—after that five more committees were established and the one presently being considered will be the seventh.

I point out that the Prices and Incomes Commission has carried out an extensive review of inflation in this country, at a total cost of $6 million. If I were a member of the government I would feel embarrassed to come to this House and suggest that another committee be established, a committee which will cost about $20,000 a week and will report, basically, on something that has already been reported on by the commission that was disbanded just last August.

I would also emphasize that in disbanding that commission the Prime Minister made it clear that he intended to establish a contingency working group, which is now operating I believe; that working group would be responsible for continuing research on the role of prices and incomes policy in dealing with inflation. In other words, there is a group that presumably is being paid to look into inflation and prices generally including, presumably, food prices.

I have supported our amendments to the main motion, Mr. Speaker, as I feel they have been an attempt to limit the time and cost that this special committee may entail; at the same time, they have not detracted from the committee's effectiveness. In fact, I believe that an early decision, as is contemplated in the 90-day amendment, will make the committee much more effective than if it is allowed to have a protracted life. As I have already mentioned, the Prices and Incomes Commission finished their study only last August. They made ten points, including suggestions to the government. After paying $600,000 for each one of those points, it is time the government took them into consideration before asking this House to form another committee to make further recommendations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I wish to point out, contrary to what was suggested by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, that we do take this committee seriously. Certainly I take it seriously. I only wish the committee had more effective terms of reference than have been suggested. I wish to elaborate. While it is true that food prices have been caught in our inflationary spiral, I wish to emphasize that the food industry and the agricultural industry generally have not been the main culprits contributing to this country's inflationary position.

In singling out the food industry and the farming community for this study, I suggest that the government has done so to create a scapegoat to distract public attention from matters which they feel would be much more embarrassing to them. That is why I feel that a three-month limitation is long enough for any scapegoat, even if the government has made some deal with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

Let it be known in this House and in this land that it is the Trudeau government that has sown the seeds of inflation throughout our economy. It is unworthy of any government to now attempt to mislead the public and the voters by an unfair attack on the food and agricultural industry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I do not want to defend the food industry nor the farmer particularly, but I suggest that the government in singling out this particular field has done so most unfairly.

In their motion the government asks the special committee to make recommendations. Isn't that a funny twist, Mr. Speaker? Here we have people who say they can lead this country, yet they come to parliament and say, "please form a committee so that the committee can make recommendations and tell us what we should be doing." Does this House need further evidence and, indeed, does the country need any more evidence to indicate that this government should not have the confidence of the House and, I sincerely hope, the public at large?

In various speeches made during this debate, including that of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, it has been stressed that the government is looking for suggestions and recommendations. We must bear in mind that this government, that claims it can lead, is asking parliament for help. Have they forgotten completely that it is the government that proposes and this parliament simply disposes? If this government is looking for suggestions, let me make a few to help them out. I hope the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is listening.

First, if the government truly wants to stop inflation in this country, they should start in their own back yard. Wasteful spending programs of government, and resulting governmental increases in our money supply have been the two largest contributors to inflation in Canada. If we want to appoint committees and if the government wants worthwhile recommendations, I suggest that parliament set up a special committee to inquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in government spending.

Let us not forget that this government spent many weeks and months drafting, studying and then proposing legislation, which they forced parliament to accept with the use of the guillotine, to empower them to extract taxes from the taxpayers of this country through perhaps the most extensive and complicated tax gathering process known in the world today. One wonders why they were so anxious to pass tax legislation before examining and studying government expenditures, including their own.

If some in this House feel a 90-day limitation on the committee is too short, let us expand the committee's terms of reference, including the government's spending spree, galloping taxation and monetary policies. Before the Prime Minister gained power in Ottawa, concern over the growth of public sector spending was expressed not only by the taxpayers but government officials. In an address to the annual conference of the Canadian Tax Foundation in April 1967, Hon. Mitchell Sharp, then minister of finance, invited assistance from outside government in the study of public expenditures which he described, as "the chief issue in our political life."

In the year ending March 31, 1967, Ottawa spent $8.8 billion. Today the government is spending at double that rate. It took 100 years to reach $8 billion in federal spending. The Trudeau government has doubled the figure in less than six years. On a per capita, real dollar basis this government is extracting 50 per cent more from every man, woman and child in this country than was taken in the last year of the Pearson government. I notice that Mr. Sharp, now the deputy prime minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I owe it to the hon. member and to all hon. members to remind them that when they make speeches in this House they should refer to hon. members by either their constituency or the title which they hold in the ministry. The hon. member has twice, inadvertently I am sure, made a mistake; he referred to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) by name. It is wrong for a member to refer to another member by his family name.

Mr. Stevens: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. If I may continue, I notice the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member, but we have reached the hour of ten o'clock. Before calling it ten o'clock I must inquire of hon. members whether it is the desire of the House that the question be put on the amendment now before the House. My understanding of the order made earlier today is that all motions should be submitted to the House at this time and that the divisions will take place tomorrow at the time of calling government business, except, of course, on the main motion. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Moved by Mr. Atkey, seconded by Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

That the motion be amended by inserting in the first paragraph thereof, next after the word "Canada", the words "since 1967".

All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed to the amendment will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: The recorded division will be deferred until tomorrow after the other amendments and subamendments have been dealt with, pursuant to order of the House agreed to earlier today.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

MANPOWER—LOCAL INITIATIVE PROGRAMS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROGRESS IN APPROVING PROJECTS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, on January 8 I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) for some explanation of the situation with regard to the concern of organizations and communities, particularly in high unemployment areas, over delays in having their projects approved. I also requested the minister to make a statement on motions outlining the reasons for the difficulties, the state of progress to this date, and the expected date of final approval.

• (2200)

I realize that many questions of a similar nature have been asked since and also that the minister has answered many of them piecemeal. However, I feel that if he would make a statement on motions as requested it would help clear up a number of ambiguities which exist. I am besieged daily with phone calls from organizations in my district seeking answers to these questions which could easily be cleared up by a statement giving all the details. Members could then help their constituents who are becoming more and more frustrated each day by the lack of answers.

The special co-ordinating group which will be delegated by the minister to look after these applications is just as frustrated because of its difficulty in coping with the situation. I might say, in reply to a suggestion made by the minister last week in the House to the effect that not enough use is being made of the on-the-job training program, that he might apply to his own department for such a program so that he can provide additional staff which would then be available to process applications, especially those over $75,000 which require much more detailed information. Many organizations and communities are unable to cope with the provision of this detailed information and are frustrated in their attempts to get their applications approved.

The other problem that exists is the disappointment being experienced by organizations that have already been notified that their projects have been turned down. This is destroying the initiative of citizens who are trying to carry out and achieve the objects of the program. Particularly disappointing is the fact that many projects approved last year could not be completed for lack of sufficient funds, and if they are not approved this year many will be left half done and will result in the waste of many dollars.

The common sense solution to the whole problem of "not enough money chasing too many projects" would be to make the program an on-going one, or at least a five-year program, so that communities can plan to provide the public services required to make them more self-sufficient, at the same time creating continuing employment over a longer period. Under a five-year program communities could plan their needs, such as water and sewage systems which are basic to every community in Canada, recreational facilities, roads to resources, farming and fishing facilities and other public service needs for which municipalities are not able to get money from the provinces or the federal government without much difficulty. I brought this idea to the attention of the former minister of manpower, who agreed with it and has since mentioned that the LIP program should be an on-going one. I hope the present minister will consider this idea carefully.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that in many government departments funds are allocated to provinces to fulfil the needs of many of the projects that are being turned down for lack of funds. I think it is time that consideration was given by each department to the allocation of funds for projects under LIP, thus making the Local Initiatives Program meangingful.

The minister also confirmed the fact in the House last week that a new supplemental program called LEAP—

Local Employment Assistance Program—was ready to be announced. As leaked to the press, this program is designed to offer funding of projects to disadvantaged Canadians and unemployables. The minister indicated that he would be making an announcement on this shortly and I hope that he will. I hope it will afford the opportunity for those organizations that had their projects turned down to resubmit them for consideration under this new program.

I agree with the concept of the Local Initiatives Program. My only objection is the lack of projected planning, the lack of co-ordinated effort to look at all aspects of its objectives and come up with a meaningful program to fit the needs of those to whom it is directed. I look to the minister to give me the answers I am seeking in a spirit of co-operation.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, approvals of LIP applications have been made as quickly as possible this year. Due to the large number of excellent applications received, the task of selecting the best projects has been a very difficult one indeed.

Perhaps a comparison with the program up to this date last year will be helpful. At this time last year some 2,045 projects, valued at $58 million, had been approved. This year, as of today we have approved about 5,000 projects for a total of $148 million. In fact, as the minister promised, applications for the bulk of LIP funds have been processed by today. Just to review the figures, the number of applications received this year amounts to 15,053 and the dollar value of those submissions is $480,500,000. The number of applications approved was 5,000, with a dollar value of $148 million, and the man-months of employment created were 304,000. As for training on the job, the figures as of January 18 are: applications received, 10,575; dollar value, $57,951,584; applications approved 5,001; dollar value, $50,270,257; and man-months of employment created, 58,925.

Perhaps part of the problem to which the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall) referred is due to the fact that in the case of many applications no decision has yet been made. I am sure that hon. members will appreciate that the minister does not wish to turn down applications when subsequently it may be possible to approve them. It is necessary to consider all the applications made, and some are made earlier than others. There is a desire to cast the net as widely as possible and this has led to delay in the making of some decisions.

In respect of the continuation of the program, of course those who received assistance from this program in the past and again this year are normally expected to complete their programs within a certain period. This is usually one of the terms. I will certainly take the suggestion of the hon. member to the minister and the department. A continuing program might indeed be something which we will have to look into in the future.

The LEAP is primarily for hardcore unemployed. It may apply to some of the cases my hon. friend has cited. If he wishes to have any of the applications in his area transferred to that program, I am sure this would be sympathetically considered by the department.

[Mr. Marshall.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TERMS OF LOAN FROM PENSION FUND TO FIDINAM (ONTARIO) LIMITED—INQUIRY AS TO LEASING BY RAILWAY OF PART OF UPPER CANADA PLACE

Mr. John Harney (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, on January 10 I asked a question of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) in respect of the loan made by the CNR pension fund to Fidinam (Ontario) Limited, allegedly amounting to some $33 million. My question had to do with the terms under which this loan was made. The minister at that time informed the House that he would take the question under notice and look into it.

Since then, with my meagre resource for research I have been able to dig up this information. Negotiations between Fidinam (Ontario) Limited and the CNR pension fund began in February, 1970. Then a letter of intent was signed between Fidinam and the Canadian National investment division on January 24, 1971, which provided for a first mortgage loan of $25 million and a second mortgage loan of $6 million, for a total of $31 million. This sum was raised subsequently to a total of $33 million.

Under the total agreement to build Upper Canada Place, a project in which Fidinam was involved, there was another $15 million to be loaned by the Workmen's Compensation Board of Ontario and Fidinam Corporation, which is the parent corporation, was to put up a total of $7 million of which $5.1 million was to be raised at the time of the commencement of the project.

My question at that time was simply, under what terms was this loan made? There are more questions raised under this same rubric. First of all there is the question of policy, or lack thereof, in respect of Canadian control, as to whether direct loans of debt capital can be made in this country. That is to say, to what kind of corporations can they be made, and whether they are Canadian or foreign-owned.

I raise the question because in this particular case we were not only dealing with trustee money held by a Canadian investment group, in this case the Canadian National investment division, but money which is held by it in trust which belongs to its workers, in this case Canadian workers in the parapublic service. It is rather strange that the savings of our workers in this country are being put to the service of foreign corporations in Canada, especially a foreign corporation such as Fidinam which has brought in very little capital from the outside and uses its leverage to borrow $48 million to build a building which is rents back in large part to public institutions in this country at a time when there is an enormous need for what could be called socially useful projects. A point was made, in an article today which appeared in the Toronto Star, by Ed Finn regarding the CNR pension fund. The article reads:

Almost one-third of the fund is now invested in mortgages, mostly for office buildings, hotels and luxury apartments. Ironically, many thousands of the CN employees whose money is being funnelled into high-priced real estate don't earn enough to qualify for NHA mortgages to buy homes of their own.

The other question raised is the matter of worker representation in respect of the investment policies of these funds. I have directed the question to the Minister of Transport because in this case we have a public institution the funds of which are being funnelled into the hands of foreign corporations. This fund is a rather large one; it is one of the largest trustee pension funds in this country.

I think it is important to note that these funds are beginning to form an enormous part of the capital savings of this country. Back in 1960 they amounted to some $3.5 billion, while the figure for 1970 is twice that amount, $11 billion. What is particularly striking is that a decreasing proportion of these funds is going into Canadian investment and that investment of these funds in stocks controlled by foreign companies increased seven and a half times between 1960 and 1970. I would very much like the Minister of Transport, through his parliamentary secretary, to table for the perusal of members of this House the letter of intent which I cited above.

I should like to ask the minister, further, if it would be possible to start developing a policy which first of all would prohibit the investment of Canadian workers' funds in foreign-controlled companies, so that they would be directed into Canadian-controlled projects and, secondly, to direct the investment of these funds into projects such as housing which would be a useful development and not simply just another corporate enterprise of this country.

Mr. Joseph-Phillipe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be specific because the question of the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney) referred to financing for the construction of office and commercial space at the corner of Bloor and Yonge Streets in Toronto. In this regard, I am informed by the CNR that the Canadian National pension trust fund, in keeping with its investment policy, has made a commitment to advance mortgage funds for the project. The relationship between the pension trust and the developer is solely that of mortgagee and mortgagor. It is not the practice to disclose terms and conditions of transactions with other parties.

In reply to the second part of the question, the answer is no.

AIR TRANSPORT—NORTHERN CANADA—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRAM FOR INSTALLATION OF IMPROVED NAVIGATIONAL AIDS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, tonight I welcome the opportunity to raise a very serious question of improved air navigational aids in respect of northern navigation as it relates to low altitude aircraft flying in the northern regions of Canada. I have had discussion with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) on this question and I have put questions to him in the House. I believe it is a subject which has evinced a great deal of interest in the last few months, particularly arising out of the recent accident involving Martin Hartwell.

I do not believe that we as members of this House should ever underestimate the amount of suffering and anxiety that is associated with the loss of an aircraft in the northern region, and above all I believe it behoves us all to consider the great expense of search and rescue operations every time an aircraft goes down in the north. I understand that the last search cost in excess of $1 million. Surely by now, with the equipment and the amount of money that has been spent on search and rescue, we should have enough to establish a navigational aids system in the north, at least to cover the main airline corridors.

I note that, for example, the CBC is asking for $30 million to extend television service to communities of 500 people or more. I also note that the Export Development Corporation agreed to lend Spain $16 million for the purpose of buying eight Canadian CL-215 water-bomber aircraft. I also note that Canada agreed to provide Turkey with $9.85 million in a long-term loan to help expand that country's telephone system. I have no objection to expenditures of this kind, but surely if we have that kind of money to spend it is time we seriously considered the importance of improving air navigational aids in the northern parts of our country.

Furthermore, I believe that with the kind of activity that is currently going on with respect to resource development, we can only expect that there will be more air traffic in that region and if that is the case, naturally we will be subject potentially to more losses. I believe it is important that this government and the Department of Transport in particular embark immediately upon a crash program of installation of suitable air navigational aids to ensure the safety of our planes, our pilots and our passengers. Surely pilots and passengers flying north of the sixtieth parallel deserve the same degree of safety as those flying in the south.

I ask the parliamentary secretary if the Department of Transport has a program on the drawing-board. I know that our present air navigational aids are far from adequate when compared with the United States northern air routes. I call on the parliamentary secretary to tell us what his department's priorities are in the field of air navigational aids.

He might also make reference to the $2 million network proposal which was cancelled approximately one year ago. I understand that it was rejected by the minister of transport at that time. I would also suggest to him that if an accelerated plan is not on the drawing-board at this time, he should discuss the matter thoroughly with his minister and with the officials of the Department of Transport in an effort to develop an air navigational system consisting of very high frequency omnirange and distance measuring equipment, at least along the two main airline corridors to the north extending from Edmonton which would connect Edmonton to Inuvik, and another which would connect with the Arctic islands, specifically Resolute Bay. This would be a very important first step in the development of an air navigational aids system and of a route along which other ancillary devices and necessary equipment may be installed as required.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I too share the concern of the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) pertaining to flights in the north. The ministry of transport has a program for expanding and upgrading air navigational facilities in the Arctic which includes the provision of facilities to meet both current and anticipated requirements. Part of this program calls for the installation of a number of very high frequency omnirange and distance measuring equipment facilities. Installations are now under way at Yellowknife, Resolute Bay, Whitehorse, Frobisher Bay and Cambridge Bay. Additional installations are planned for subsequent years.

The Cambridge Bay installation is of special interest as this will be the site of the environmental testing of a development, the "VOR/DME package", newly designed to meet the special requirements of the Arctic. Testing of this package will proceed after winter installation which is planned for completion next month. Aside from that portion of the plan that is included in the ministry's estimates, the implementation of improved or additional facilities is adjusted annually to meet high priority requirements as they develop.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

THE LATE LYNDON BAINES JOHNSON

TRIBUTES TO FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, little more than two weeks ago we performed in this House the sad task of paying tribute to a former president of the United States. Now we do so again, this time in memory of President Lyndon Johnson, a contemporary in public life of many hon. members.

Lyndon Johnson assumed the presidency from the office of vice-president, as did Harry Truman. And as President Truman had done before him, President Johnson was successful in seeking re-election in his own right. During his term in office, some of America's most progressive social legislation took form in response to his desire to eliminate disparities of all kinds from American life. Abroad, however, the tragedy of Viet Nam became increasingly intractable, and escaped attempts at resolution.

President Johnson visited Canada on three occasions. During one such trip he opened the impressive United States pavilion at Expo '67.

Mr. Johnson was, in many respects, larger than life; a man who mirrored faithfully the colour and character of a vast region in his country, reminding us in Canada of the variety and size of our vigorous neighbour. President Johnson's role both in the United States and the world is too recent to measure with adequate perspective. No one can doubt, however, the intense passion and dedication to his countrymen which he brought to the presidency.

To President Johnson's family and to the people of the United States, I offer sympathy and condolences.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister reminded us, this is the second time in a few short weeks that it has been our sad duty to pay tribute to a former president of the United States who has passed away. I did not know President Lyndon Johnson, but with my fellow citizens I followed his career with absorbing interest. Even though he was not working within the parliamentary system as we know it in Canada, I think it is fair to say—if it is not presumptuous of me to say this—that he was a great parliamentarian within the Congress of the United States. Probably no American of his generation was such a master of the legislative process in that country, and it seems to have been generally due to his skill in that area as a member of Congress that he was able to achieve such an enviable legislative record, first as leader in the Senate, then as vice-president of the United States, and finally as president of his great country.

He was a man of great courage who suffered a severe heart attack years ago but overcame it to seek and achieve the highest and most responsible office in his land. As president of his country he had, certainly, some agonizing decisions to make in the realm of foreign policy, and it is no secret that some of these caused division in his own country and in the world. It was surely to his great credit, both as a man and as a patriot, that under circumstances that are generally familiar to all of us he put the interest of his country before any desire he may have felt to continue to serve as president by seeking a further term in office.

I join the Prime Minister this afternoon in paying tribute to a man who for five years served as a powerful president of the United States and whose actions were certainly dictated by the good of his country as he saw it.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, after a long and successful career in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, Mr. Johnson was catapulted to the presidency of the United States on the assassination of President Kennedy. On that day the world saw him on a plane being sworn in as president and sympathized with the concern etched on his face as he committed himself to his awesome duties. The five years during which he held office as president were difficult and to some extent unhappy ones for the United States, both internally and externally. His death at a relatively early age may well have been the consequence of his heavy and sometimes frustrating burdens.

On behalf of my colleagues and myself I join in the expression of sympathy and condolences to Mrs. Johnson and the family.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the death of a man whose far-reaching importance put him in a position to determine the fate of the whole world comes as a shock to us particularly in view of its unexpectedness.

The former president of the United States took over the leadership of the most powerful western country under tragic circumstances that we all remember. The task that was his was only equalled by the enormous responsibilities attached to it. History will assess the work of Mr. Johnson.

We grieve over the death of this prominent statesman. However, we also think about the thousands of human lives sacrificed in Viet Nam. May these days of mourning afflicting our southern neighbours coincide with peace in Viet Nam.

VANCOUVER MARINE AERADIO STATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask leave of the House to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. In November, 1972, the Minister of Transport undertook an austerity program. One result was to cut back the staff of professional radio operators at the Vancouver Marine Aeradio station. This has reduced the staff to the point where adequate service cannot be provided—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make a speech in support of a motion under Standing Order 43. I have had occasion in the past to remind hon. members of the very special circumstances which attach to a proposed motion under Standing Order 43. Because there is no opportunity for reply or debate, such a motion should be accompanied only by a brief statement indicating the urgency. There should not be argument in support of the proposed motion.

Mr. Reynolds: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will now make the motion. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker):

That the Minister of Transport take action to ensure that Vancouver Marine Aeradio station be allocated sufficient job categories of appropriate classification so that the station is adequately and efficiently manned at all times to provide effective air-sea search and rescue service.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. This motion, proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity; the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

ATLANTIC CANADA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the following serious matters relating to the economic well-being of Atlantic Canada, namely, the reported phasing out of Nova Scotia's joint federal-provincial planning board, the impending decision involving federal aid to the vitally needed $32 million Pock-Wock water development for the city of Halifax, and the withdrawal of Volkswagen Limited from Saint John, New Brunswick, because of lack of port facilities and infrastructure, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That these matters be immediately referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development for serious and detailed consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

BELL CANADA RATE INCREASE APPLICATION—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing rise in Bell Canada profits and earnings per share I move, pursuant to Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney):

That the federal government do now formally appear before the Canadian Transport Commission to state its opposition to Bell Canada's application for further rate increases.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

AIRPORTS

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—DECISION ON PROCEEDING WITH CONSTRUCTION—AVAILABILITY OF DOCUMENTS AND REPORTS TO INTERESTED PARTIES

Mr. Ron Atkey (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister made up his mind on whether to proceed with a second Toronto airport at Pickering? Both he and the Minister of Public Works have had the report from the public hearings since January 5, and I wonder whether we can have a decision today?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this decision is not to be taken by the Minister of Transport alone but by the cabinet; it will probably be made in a few days.

Mr. Atkey: Is the Minister of Transport prepared to honour the undertaking of his predecessor, the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, made in the House on April 18 of last year, that all documentation and reports relevant to expropriations in the Pickering area have been made public, and that those persons objecting to the expropriations will not in the future be caught by surprise through new material previously unavailable? I might add that this undertaking—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now making a speech. He should ask his question as briefly as possible. Perhaps the minister might reply to the hon. member's question now.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, if my predecessor made an undertaking of course it will be respected, but I want to have an opportunity to check the undertaking.

Mr. Nowlan: Oh, he is checking on you, Don!

Mr. Jamieson: Wouldn't you?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Atkey: Are the minister and the cabinet, in reaching a decision on the need for a second airport and the half billion dollars required to build it, considering alternative social needs in metropolitan Toronto such as increased federal assistance for housing, public transit and the preservation of a green belt and prime agricultural land?

PICKERING TOWNSHIP SITE—OPPORTUNITY FOR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT FROM TORONTO AREA TO MAKE REPRESENTATIONS REGARDING DECISION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Minister of Transport whether it is his intention to invite Members of Parliament from the Toronto area to make representations with regard to the decision on the proposed airport?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think it was made clear by the former minister of transport and by the Prime Minister that the government intends to give not only Members of Parliament but the general public in the Toronto region the opportunity to make representations on the new airport, the new facilities, and the way in which transportation development should take place in the area.

MOUNT HOPE, ONTARIO—INQUIRY WHETHER EXPANSION WILL PROCEED

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): In view of the continuing uncertainty concerning the expansion of airport facilities at Hamilton, Ontario, will the minister advise the House in the clearest possible terms whether this project will proceed in the spring of 1973?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I already stated that the Port Hope airport is going to be expanded. If this is what the hon. member has in mind, I think we have decided to go ahead.

STEPS TO REDUCE AIRCRAFT NOISE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Peel South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Regardless of what happens at Pickering, are the Minister of Transport and the government prepared to take immediate steps to reduce aircraft noise by requiring airlines to replace noisy engines with quieter models now being developed?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts whether this is a supplementary question but, having been asked, the minister might reply. The Chair will then recognize the hon. member for York South.

POST OFFICE

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—ACCEPTANCE BY GOVERNMENT OF CONCILIATION BOARD PROPOSAL RESPECTING CLASSIFICATION GRIEVANCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General or the President of the Treasury Board. In view of reports that the conciliation board which dealt with the dispute between the Council of Postal Unions and the Post Office has now unanimously made a new proposal with respect to grievance on classifications, may I ask whether the recommendation or proposal of the conciliation board has been received by the government and whether, since the proposal would seem to lay a basis for settlement of the dispute, the government can announce its acceptance of the present proposal?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I understand that Mr. Shime actually transmitted explanatory notes to Mr. Finkelman. This document has not been made public yet but whether it was or not there has already been a first meeting between the two parties. I understand that there is to be today new meetings between the parties at the negotiation table and the hon. member will realize that under the circumstances it is preferable to let the parties come to an agreement without making any further public statement.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: I knew that the document was in the hands of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, but the minister did not say whether he has seen it. I am going to pose my question on the assumption that he has seen it. I appreciate that this is a matter for negotiation. May I ask the minister whether the government's stated acceptance of the report of the board of conciliation necessarily includes acceptance of this additional clarification or proposal of the same board of conciliation?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: I understand, Mr. Speaker, that remarks to clarify the situation were made to both parties, that both parties accepted those points of clarification and that they have since gone back to the negotiation table.

Therefore, I do not wish to add anything at this stage which might cause embarassment to those who are now negotiating a contract.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the issue was a very simple one, namely, whether or not the amendment to section 903 is to be introduced into section 904 of the collective bargaining agreement so that the words "except classification matters" are deleted from both clauses, and in view of the fact that Mr. Shime—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly ask the question. It seems to me that his supplementary is somewhat involved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, with great respect, I do not think it is involved, at least not for the minister, nor is it involved for those who know anything about it. There may be a few gentlemen on my right who know something about it.

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Lewis: May I proceed, Mr. Speaker, and ask the minister my question. In view of the fact the dispute is a simple one, namely, whether or not the same amendment should be made to section 904 as was made to section 903 in the collective agreement—

Some hon. Members: Question!

An hon. Member: Whereas, whereas, whereas!

An hon. Member: Hold your tongue!

Mr. Lewis: That pleases me, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member might ask his question. He will recognize that he has had the floor for some time now. Perhaps he should ask the question and give us a chance to proceed further on this subject.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the question. You might ask the gentlemen on my right and on your left—

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Lewis: —not to keep on interrupting me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he cannot now inform the House whether the government will accept this additional amendment to the contract so that the dispute may finally be settled?

[Mr. Ouellet.]

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment as long as that clarification report has not been made public.

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—INTERVENTION OF MINISTER

Mr. Jean-Marie Boisvert (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Has the minister himself contributed to clarify the situation?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, if I must account for all my hours of work, I can tell the hon. member that I worked very hard during the weekend.

[English]

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS ACT

Mr. Peter Reilly (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that this and other disputes involving the public service and adjacent areas have been complicated by certain sections of the Public Service Staff Relations Act which circumscribe the free collective bargaining process, and in view of the fact the government has had before it a report dealing with this matter since the middle of June, 1971, will the minister now say when he proposes to bring forward the proposed changes to that act?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think this question was asked and answered a few days ago.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta on a supplementary.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. This is an airport question, Mr. Speaker. A few days ago he informed me that the contracts for the Hudson Street bridge—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I was under the impression that the hon. member wanted to ask a supplementary question. He will be recognized in a moment. I believe the hon. member for St. John's East has a supplementary on the matter being discussed.

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—ACCEPTANCE BY GOVERNMENT OF CONCILIATION BOARD PROPOSAL RESPECTING CLASSIFICATION GRIEVANCES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Postmaster General whether a representative of the government yesterday signed an agreement whereby the government would accept Mr. Shime's interpretation of the report of the conciliation board dealing with sections 903 and 904?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the government representatives at the bargaining table have received a very precise mandate to sign a collective agreement. We hope that the meeting scheduled for today will lead to a positive conclusion, that is the signature of the agreement.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether a statement of intent was signed yesterday on behalf of the government by a government representative, together with the chairman of the conciliation board and a union representative?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, we shall certainly honour the commitments of the government representative who signed a document.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ALLEGED PREFERENCE GIVEN IMMIGRANTS FOR WORK AT CHÂTEAU LAURIER HOTEL

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Is the minister aware that the Château Laurier is giving preference to immigrants newly arrived from Europe by hiring them instead of qualified Canadians. Can the hon. minister inform us of the Canadian National policy in this respect?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am totally unaware of the facts just reported. If the hon. member can specify concrete grievances, I shall gladly discuss them with Canadian National authorities.

TRADE

IMPOSITION BY UNITED STATES OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES ON MICHELIN TIRES IMPORTED FROM CANADA—REPRESENTATIONS BY GOVERNMENT APART FROM NOTE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to either the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Following the trip of the premier of Nova Scotia to Washington after consultation with the Prime Minister over the United States countervailing duties on Michelin tires, what new efforts, apart from handing notes of protest to the United States Department of State as was done last week, is the government making in this matter? Also, is the matter now of sufficiently high priority to join the list of so-called economic irritants which need solving at the highest level of discussion between Canada and the United States?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the note to the United States government was tabled yesterday, I believe. We made our representations in that note and we are awaiting the reply of the United States government before taking further action.

Mr. MacKay: As a supplementary question—

Mr. Reilly: A point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West rises on a point of order.

Mr. Reilly: Mr. Speaker, my point of order concerns the answer given me a few minutes ago by the President of the Treasury Board. He said that my question had been answered a couple of days ago. According to my best information, that is not the case. I would like an answer to the question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Central Nova on a supplementary.

PREPARATION OF POLICY ON DREE GRANTS AND TRADE PRACTICES FOR PRESENTATION TO GATT MEETINGS—EEC POSITION ON COUNTERVAILING DUTIES

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a further question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or to his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is the government now preparing a comprehensive policy as far as DREE grants are concerned and trade practices generally to be presented at the next round of GATT? Also, have they been in touch with the European Economic Community to understand precisely what the position of the community is with regard to countervailing duties?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet discussed the question of countervailing duties, as it applies in principle to the Michelin case, with the officials of the EEC. Undoubtedly, this question will be included with other questions of non-tariff barriers when the GATT hearings get under way later this year.

POSSIBILITY OF PRIOR CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES BEFORE LAUNCHING REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS IN FUTURE

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my supplementary question to either the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the 6.6 per cent countervailing duty imposed by the United States on Michelin tires, will it be the minister's policy to consult the United States in future before launching development programs dependent on export markets in order to prevent this type of economic conflict?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be quite improper to ask another country whether we should go ahead with plans that we think are legitimate and in the interests of our own country.

PROTEST TO GATT RESPECTING UNITED STATES' IMPOSITION OF COUNTERVAILING DUTY ON MICHELIN TIRES IMPORTED FROM CANADA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Regardless of the discussion in principle with the GATT officials at the next meeting, has there been a formal protest to GATT about the imposition of a countervailing duty by the American government? If not, why not?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nowlan: Why not?

POSSIBILITY OF COUNTERVAILING DUTIES BEING IMPOSED ON IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES OF PRODUCTS MANUFACTURED UNDER DISC PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I also have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the appeal procedures in the United States with regard to the countervailing duty make it possible for Michelin to actually launch an appeal until the end of 1973, which might be a little late in terms of preserving jobs, and in view of the fact the memo sent by the government of Canada to the United States makes no reference to the granddaddy of all protective measures, namely, the United States DISC program, can the minister inform the House whether the Canadian government is considering levying countervailing duties on the products of all firms in the United States which are exporting to Canada under DISC?

• (1430)

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the last part of the question is no; we are not considering that action at this time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

RECOVERY OF INCOME TAX FROM EMPLOYEES STATIONED IN UNITED STATES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State and is a follow-up to a question I asked a while ago concerning a report made to the House by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. Has the minister consulted with the CBC, and have steps been taken to collect these income taxes?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have consulted with members and the president of the corporation and I should have an answer to the specific question in the next day or two.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact I asked this question two weeks ago, I would ask the minister to give an answer as soon as possible.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF PROMOTION BY COMPANY OF INSTALLATION OF EXTENSION TELEPHONES

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, last week the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was kind enough to indicate that he would ask his departmental officials to investigate the possibility of misleading advertising by Bell Canada. I wonder whether such an investigation has now taken place and is the minister now in a position to report to the House?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am advised that certain advertisements in this connection have been considered in light of the misleading advertising provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. I am further advised that the investigation did not disclose any grounds of violation. However, I would be pleased to transmit to the officials of the combines branch any further information the hon. member might have so it could be looked into further.

CANADIAN CULTURE

POLICY ON ESTABLISHMENT OF ADVISORY COUNCIL ON MULTICULTURALISM—METHOD OF APPOINTING MEMBERS—TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Can he tell the House whether it is now official government policy that an advisory council to deal with questions of multiculturalism be established?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the policy of the government.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister responsible for multiculturalism. Can he indicate what method will be used in appointing members to this council? Will this simply be done by appointment by the government or will the various cultural groups be asked to put forward names?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his interest in the federal government's multicultural policy and the advisory council. I wish to inform him that the leaders of ethnic cultural organizations have been asked for suggestions and recommendations. I am reviewing the suggestions, which were very positive and numerous, and I hope to submit a report to the Prime Minister as soon as possible.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister responsible for multiculturalism. Can he indicate what the terms of reference of the advisory council will be and when the council is expected to hold its first meeting?

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I would rather make a statement on motions later in respect of this question.

An hon. Member: When?

MULTICULTURALISM POLICY—RESPONSIBILITY FOR ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it relates to the same matter. Can he indicate what portion, if any, of the Department of the Secretary of State is answerable directly to the minister responsible for multiculturalism?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister is responsible for this area of policy and questions should be addressed to him.

Mr. Haliburton: Can the minister responsible advise the House whether in fact there are plans to transfer the administrative duties of that section of the Department of the Secretary of State to him?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of administration for the government and I do not wish to discuss it in the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State—

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville on a supplementary question. I will then recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, my question is not a supplementary. I should like to direct it—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville and then recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

PORTS

CHURCHILL—ACTION TO ACHIEVE GREATER UTILIZATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I direct my question to the congenial Minister of Transport. On January 11 he said he would consider the greater utilization of the port of Churchill and would make a decision in a few weeks. Can he tell us now whether he has made a decision in respect of the greater utilization of this port which is so important to the Prairies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is something our department is concerned with. We are now completing studies on costs and profits. As soon as these are ready, we shall be able to inform the House of the government's decisions.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact we have been getting answers like this for years—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Nystrom: —can the minister tell us by what date we can expect a final decision on the greater utilization of that port?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to give the exact date.

MULTICULTURALISM—RESEARCH STUDY

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: This is a very simple question for the minister.

An hon. Member: It always is.

Mr. Paproski: I should like to ask the Minister of State in charge of multiculturalism to advise the House to what extent research programs are being undertaken in his department to produce information on language maintenance and cultural development?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz (Minister of State): Mr. Speaker, this study is now being undertaken by a special research team and I hope to have a report within the next few months.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, we have been waiting for two years now for at least one concrete proposal. When are we going to have it?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that a report will be made as soon as I receive my report.

Mr. Paproski: You are beginning to sound like the Prime Minister.

TRANSPORT

RECALL OF DEFECTIVE AUTOMOBILES—MEASURES TO ASSURE EFFICIENCY

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Has the minister been in touch in the last 48 hours with representatives of the automobile industry with regard to the automobiles that have been recalled in Canada, and can he give the House the assurance that the federal government intends to take steps to make sure those recalls are made efficiently?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe we should allow the Minister of Transport to answer that question.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, this time I should like to put my question to the Minister of Transport.

Has he been in touch within the last 48 hours with representatives of the automobile industry concerning the automobiles that have been recalled in Canada, and can he give the house the assurance that the federal government intends to take steps to ensure that those recalls are made efficiently?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I doubt that this falls within my jurisdiction. In any event, I will take the question as notice and answer it later on.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: It was never like this in the old days.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I will then ask the minister responsible, and I am surprised that it is not the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

An hon. Member: There is no responsible minister.

An hon. Member: Get a better executive assistant.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister responsible for automobile safety standards whether he has communicated with the automobile industry in the last 48 hours in relation to the mass recall of unsafe automobiles and, if so, can the minister responsible assure the House that he will verify immediately the effectiveness of these recalls?

An hon. Member: Will the real minister stand up?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I simply wish to say that whenever I do not know the answer to a question, instead of talking through my hat, I shall take the question as notice. Members of the opposition enjoy a laugh, but they will laugh until their dying day.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DISPOSAL OF OLD BARGES IN LAKE OKANAGAN—POSSIBILITY OF HAZARD TO ENVIRONMENT OR RECREATION

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the answer given yesterday by the Minister of Public Works that the three derelict barges disposed of by the department by sinking them in Okanagan Lake are not a hazard to navigation, will the minister assure the House that these barges do not constitute a hazard to either the environment or the recreational use of Okanagan Lake?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, we are checking into the matter and if the barges are a hazard either in respect of navigation or to the environment we will take appropriate action.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister whether he can assure the House that the government has established procedures to ensure that acts of this nature will not be repeated until they have first received consideration by the Department of the Environment as to whether such acts are a contravention of Section 33 of the Fisheries Act of Canada?

• (1440)

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I think each department, like each developer, has a responsibility to look after matters of this kind. My department meanwhile will do its best to work with these developers or departments to make sure that the environment is protected.

Mr. Fraser: In view of my previous question, may I ask whether the minister is aware that prosecutions have taken place in the province of British Columbia against logging companies for dumping sinker logs in lakes, which is practically the same sort of act?

Mr. Davis: Yes, and they have been taken principally by my department.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of the Environment whether his colleague the Minister of Public Works consulted him in his capacity as Minister of the Environment before these barges were sunk in this beautiful lake?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and also the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for St. John's West.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF LAND ACT TO ASSIST VETERANS NOW SEEKING TO ACQUIRE LAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, it is so long since you have recognized me that you have me over at the other end of the island.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marshall: I have built up a good friendship with the Minister of Veterans Affairs because we have had lots of time. In view of the difficulties being experienced by many war veterans in acquiring land for homes because of the restrictions under the Veterans Land Act, and particularly because of the October 16 deadline, would the minister indicate whether he intends to bring in amendments to the act to satisfy the needs of these veterans?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question may I inform the House that in 1965 legislation was proposed and enacted, with applications for qualification to be submitted by the deadline date of October 31, 1968. This gave veterans an opportunity to make a loan application. The closing date for loan applications is 1974, and there was also a provision for additional loans to be made up to 1977. In further reply to the question may I say we have not received many requests in this respect, and unless further interest is shown at this time my department does not intend to enact any further legislation.

Mr. Marshall: In view of the fact that many veterans now retiring as well as many servicemen now retiring wish to make application under the act but are restricted by it as to the location of their homes, would the minister reconsider, because many more applications are coming in, amending the Veterans Land Act?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are always ready and willing to reconsider, and we will take a look at the number of applications coming in.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BAIL REFORM LAW—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION IN LIGHT OF CERTAIN EVENTS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. Would the minister reconsider the answer he gave me a couple of weeks ago and take another look at the bail reform legislation in view of a grand jury recommendation made recently in Toronto, and also in view of the arrest today of a suspect alleged to be involved in over a dozen offences, including twice failing to respond to bench warrants while at large by virtue of this legislation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated on many occasions that we would be willing to look at the bail act again as it began to be lived with and would make changes if they seemed to be required. However, I should like to confirm to the hon. member that I have followed up on the point I made to him on the previous occasion and have written to the Attorneys General across the country, drawing to their attention the need for appropriate action by both police and Crown prosecutors as well as the appropriateness of taking action against those who do not respond to summonses, so that in fact the bail law will work effectively.

ALLEGED IMPEDING OF INVESTIGATION OF NARCOTICS OFFENCES BY BAIL REFORM LAW

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Justice in connection with a story carried on the front page of this morning's Globe and Mail. Is the minister's department inquiring into the suggestion that the bail reform legislation as it now stands is impeding investigation of narcotics offences in the country? If so, is he or the government considering altering the instructions that went out to the provincial Attorneys General earlier last year respecting the treatment of accused persons appearing before the courts on possession charges?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, those are two completely separate questions and I certainly would not relate them in any way. We will be looking at any report having to do with the operation of the bail law. I have had and will continue to have discussions with my provincial counterparts about this question.

CRIMINAL CODE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT RESPECTING DECISION TO UNDERGO ABORTION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the decision of the United States Supreme Court which will result in broadly liberalized abortion laws in 46 states, and in view of the Canadian Gallup poll published on January 4 of this year which showed that 61 per cent of Canadian adults agree that the decision on abortion should be made solely by the woman and her doctor, is the government planning to introduce legislation this session to amend the Criminal Code to this effect?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Is the government prepared to arrange for a debate on this matter, such as was promised but not had before, during the present session?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there has certainly been no decision to have one at the present time. We would have to consider the time of the House and the other pressing business before us.

Oral Questions

ABORTION—REQUEST THAT CALGARY BIRTH CONTROL ASSOCIATION BE PROHIBITED FROM REOPENING CLINIC

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I will direct to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that the Calgary Birth Control Association has just received a second year grant from LIP for $45,200, and this association last year opened abortion clinics which promoted easy abortion and set a precedent in the use of government money for abortion, will the minister prohibit the Calgary Birth Control Association from reopening its abortion clinic?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the hon. member's allegations, my understanding is that they may not be correct. In checking into this we found that an unfortunate error was made in a newspaper report about this project some months ago which stimulated a great deal of criticism of this project. We doublechecked it and found that most local citizens considered it a very worthy one. My understanding is that this association does not operate an abortion clinic.

AIRPORTS

MOUNT HOPE, ONTARIO—PUBLIC HEARINGS ON EXPANSION PLANS

Mr. Sean O'Sullivan (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to return to the question of airports and direct my question to my good friend the Minister of Transport. Just when we had gained some confidence that the minister was aware of the difference between Mount Hope and Pickering, the minister advised us today that his department does intend to go ahead with the expansion at Port Hope. This must come as some surprise—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has to take into account that other hon. members want to ask questions. It is very easy to preface a question with a speech but I do not think that is proper. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. O'Sullivan: I appreciate your guidance, Mr. Speaker, but I was trying to make sure that the Minister of Transport knew of that of which I speak. I now ask the Minister of Transport, who gave us the assurance that he would live up to the commitments of his predecessor, whether there will be public hearings into the proposed expansion of Mount Hope airport?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I realize the hon. member wants to make his colleague laugh and I know this is easy to do. The public has been consulted widely enough in Hamilton, but if further consultations are needed, we shall not only gladly hold them but we shall also hear any person wishing to be heard.

[Mr. Lang.]

[Later:]

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplemental and is addressed to the Minister of Transport concerning airport matters. I should like to ask the minister when he will make some statement and provide some assistance to the airports at Fort St. James, Vanderhoof, Burns Lake, Smithers and Terrace?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—SUGGESTED EXPANSION TO PROVIDE FOR BUILDING OF DIKES AND EARTHWORKS ON LONG POINT ISLAND, LAKE ERIE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Would the minister immediately expand his LIP program so as to provide for a desperately urgent works program to build dikes, earthworks or the taking of other appropriate measures to prevent imminent disaster to hundreds of homes and cottages on Long Point Island in Lake Erie?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether there has been an application for a local initiatives project for that purpose but I shall take note of the hon. member's representation, with sympathy.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary which I should like to direct to the Minister of the Environment and also the Minister of Transport. Has the Minister of the Environment discussed with his colleague the Minister of Transport measures that may be taken on Lake Erie? I raise this matter because of the terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act over which the Minister of Transport and the Minister of the Environment seem to have jurisdiction.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am sorry, Your Honour, but if they have discussed this matter what do they intend to do about it?

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

ADEQUACY OF INFORMATION SUPPLIED BY STATISTICS CANADA

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister responsible for Statistics Canada with reference to information they have provided concerning the question of capital punishment to Members of Parliament and the national press. From the point of view of categorizing and breaking down the information and in view of the increase of 100 per cent in murders and violent crimes, why was that information not sent with the other information? Was there any reason?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that these statistics were prepared for publication in Murder Statistics, 1971 and Murders Reported, 1961-1970. Due to the time requirements of the printing process, these publications will not become available for approximately two months. It is Statistics Canada's normal policy, especially if there is prior evidence of public interest or concern, to provide advance information regarding forthcoming publications just as soon as the relevant data are available.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I might divide it into two parts. First of all, has the minister taken note of the fact that the national newspapers say they could not obtain this information and will it now be supplied to all Members of Parliament and the national press at their request?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, the Murder Statistics tabulations are complete and the data are available upon request. I can inform the hon. member of the telephone number if he would like it.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—APPROVAL OF PROJECTS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

In view of the fact that many people who submitted local initiatives projects have not received an answer yet, may I ask the minister when these requests will be approved or turned down?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this was dealt with on the late show last night to a degree, as I believe the hon. member opposite mentioned. At the moment $148 million of the $165 million allocated has been approved, including some 5,000 projects. This is 5,000 out of 15,053 projects for a total of $480 million in applications received. We are holding about $10 million to look after the special section for entrepreneurial, co-operative and business projects, which we will hold for a little while longer to deal with such special applications. The rest will go generally to administration. So we are very close to the end of the allocation this year, and all project sponsors will be advised shortly as to whether or not their projects have been approved.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—ANNOUNCEMENT OF PROJECTS BY MEMBERS OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration responsible for the Local Initiatives Program.

Could he tell us whether it is the policy of his department to allow municipal LIP projects to be announced by members or ministers of provincial legislative assemblies before these projects are approved by the federal government?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. That is not the policy of the department. If the hon. member can give me some examples I would be glad to look into how it might have happened.

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—PROPOSED RUNWAY—DATE OF COMPLETION OF EXPROPRIATION HEARINGS

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport regarding the Hudson Street bridge contract. In the minister's telegram to me on January 16 he assured me that any contracts which are directly affected by the outcome of the Burkeville area expropriation hearings will not be awarded until after the results of the hearings are known. When does the minister expect these expropriation hearings to be over?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to ask those who are conducting the hearings when they think the hearings will be over. I do not know now.

Mr. Reynolds: Will the minister now tell the House when these expropriation hearings will start? They have not yet started.

HEALTH

INDEMNIFICATION OF VICTIMS OF THALIDOMIDE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Owing to the recent decision rendered in Great Britain which has compelled the company responsible for the distribution of thalidomide to assume the financial responsibility for afflicted children, can the minister assure the House and the country that the government is seriously considering the matter, in order to find the means to help the 82 victims of that drug who are still alive in Canada?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as early as 1962, the Canadian government, in co-operation with the provinces, was one of the first governments in the world, I think, to develop a joint program of full services for thalidomide victims. This program is available to all thalidomide victims, and all parents of a child who has been affected by this drug may benefit from this program.

Furthermore, officials have recently held a meeting with representatives of the firm responsible for the production of this drug, and I understand that the representatives of this firm are negotiating with the parents of all these children in order to come to a settlement in this matter.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, I am, Sir. It is understandable that the backbenchers on the other side might not have full opportunity to obtain information but it is carrying things a little to the extreme for parliamentary secretaries to set up questions and answers like this. The next thing that will happen is that we will have ministers asking ministers questions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1500)

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On the question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is perhaps more a point of order than a question of privilege. If the minister wishes to address himself to the point of order he may do so.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think Your Honour decided some time ago that parliamentary secretaries are entitled to put questions to ministers as long as the questions are put to ministers other than their own. The hon. gentleman has been here long enough to know that this is perfectly legitimate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Saint-Denis on the point of order.

[Translation]

Is the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Prud'homme: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Last week I said that unless the Chair advises us otherwise I intended to discharge my duties as well as any other member. Unless the Chair advises us otherwise, I would like to assure the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that I fully intend to continue discharging my duties, and taking as much interest as he is taking in current problems.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to get into any controversy with the Minister of Finance, but it is not the practice for parliamentary secretaries to ask questions in the House. I realize that they need information, but if they do not get better and more complete answers than we do from ministers they are welcome to the opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would point out that discussion of this point of order could continue for a long time. We have gone beyond the question period. I tried to recognize the hon. member for Lethbridge at the same time that I recognized the hon. member for St. Denis. Perhaps before we call orders of the day we might give an opportunity to the hon. member for Lethbridge to ask his question.

GRAIN

RAPESEED AND FLAX—INQUIRY AS TO PLEBISCITE ON INCLUSION UNDER WHEAT BOARD FOR MARKETING PURPOSES

Mr. Ken Hurlburt (Lethbridge): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was becoming a little concerned as I took my red jacket back to the rental outfit. My question is for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Is the government going to initiate a plebiscite on whether rapeseed and flax should be included in Wheat Board marketing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as has been stated many times in the past number of months, we intend to consult producers concerning this matter. Some of the producer organizations are still quite concerned that adequate information is not available on the subject in a way which will expedite a good decision. We are discussing this further, and I hope to be able to have a decision from the prairie producers in the near future.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members want to ask supplementary questions but we have gone ten minutes beyond the question period. I think we should call orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOOD PRICES

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

The House resumed, from Monday, January 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray:

That a Special Committee of this House be appointed to inquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends:

That 20 Members of the House of Commons to be designated by the House at a later date be the members of the Special Committee and that Standing Order 65(5) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; to engage the services of counsel, accountants and such other clerical and technical personnel as may be deemed necessary.

And the amendment thereto of Mr. McGrath (p. 477), and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Harney (p. 478); the amendment, Mr. Woolliams (p. 536), and the amendment to the amendment, Mr. Knowles (p. 537); the amendment, Mr. Atkey (p. 538).

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with the special order made at yesterday's sitting, the House will now proceed to the taking of deferred divisions and to the putting of any other question necessary to dispose of the amendments now before the House in relation to the motion to appoint a special committee to inquire into the trends in food prices.

The first question will be on the sub-amendment proposed by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Harney), seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes).

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Harney) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the subamendment carried.

The amendment as amended will now be put to the House.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of saving time, now that we have heard the sweet mating call of the NDP and the Liberals, we see no reason to put the motion as amended. It is obvious that the Liberals and the NDP will agree to it and, as far as we are concerned, there is no reason to put it.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, we would not want to break up that happy marriage.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House wish to withdraw the motion?

An hon. Member: On division.

Mr. Speaker: Is it carried on division?

An hon. Member: Carried on division.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now return to consideration of the main motion as amended.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to rise to discuss some of the important matters and criteria that this committee should examine in respect of food prices. I was somewhat amazed by some of the amendments moved. We have now entered an era in which that great party of tradition and protection in this country has moved an amendment to eliminate the other place. This has been quite a change.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I simply want to remind the hon. member that he cannot reflect on a vote. There should not be any debate on a matter that has been decided by a vote in the House.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knight: Mr. Speaker, in this nation we have had a series of committees examining the matter of food prices as they affect the consumer. Quite often those committees have not considered the problems that are faced by the producers. Certainly, there is ample evidence to indicate a need for a revision of the entire food industry from the primary producer to the consumer. The criteria outlined for the study could well be expanded to include a considerable number of items in addition to those in the terms of reference. This is certainly true when we consider that in 1949 farmers were receiving 57 per cent of the food dollar, while in 1972 they are receiving only 38 per cent of that food dollar. Surely, this is an area which ought to be examined as well.

I am not so much concerned about the kind of debate which has taken place, and some of it has been very good. What disturbs me is that before this motion to establish a committee was put forward the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) consulted with the food industry to determine whether there should be an examination of the food industry. He wanted to know if it would be all right to examine this whole area as well as the corporate interests involved. There was no minister of finance in the constituency of Assiniboia asking the farmers about a study of food prices as they related to them. There was no minister of finance asking the consumers of this nation what effect an examination of food prices would have on them. The minister went to the food industry for consultation, which indicates the relationship between the corporate interests and the present government. He wanted to know if it would be all right to have an investigation of the situation.

When the measure is adopted we will have a committee of 25 members with the old line parties having equal membership, and with three members from the NDP. I can see how the consumers and farmers of this country can be helped by that situation. There ought to be a clear examination of the structure of corporate power within this nation and how it relates to food prices.

Mr. Mazankowski: Who voted with the government?

Mr. Knight: I am sure that the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) can find some kind of agreement in his Tory heart. He knows the plight of the farmers. He knows that wheat is selling to the milling companies for $1.95 a bushel while domestic wheat is bringing, on the average, $2.63 a bushel.

Mr. Mazankowski: You supported the government.

Mr. Knight: The price is $1.95½ for milling wheat, but the actual market price is up to $2.63 a bushel. I suggest the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) should learn that farmers are not going to be fooled by the two-price system which allows the price of wheat to milling companies to stand at $1.95½ per bushel. There has been no sign from that group that there will be any change in this kind of situation, certainly not by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski). The Minister of Finance had an interview with the members of the food industry with regard to what could be done, and this parliament, through amendments, has now strengthened the role that this committee should play; I think that is important.

• (1600)

What has brought this issue to a head? Some interesting facts were pointed out in the Gazette. For example, the bag of groceries that the housewife bought in December cost her 8.6 per cent more than it cost a year ago, thus squeezing the family budget and eroding the purchasing power of those on fixed incomes. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) has referred to the situation faced by many people on fixed incomes when they buy food. Indeed, many of them have no incomes at all, and to them a steak is a slice of bologna. In this nation of so much wealth and possibility, these are questions that ought to be examined by the committee and some answers to them brought forward.

Then, we have the corporate side of the food industry. Supermarkets state that their profit range is less than 1.5 per cent of sales. However, they neglect to point out that profit on investment is closer to 11 per cent. We are used to hearing these kinds of figures from the old line parties, but we are not used to hearing these kinds of figures from the food industry—that is, unless you are a farmer, in which case you have been hearing them for years. A profit of 11 per cent is more the kind of tune they should be playing.

Let me give some further information about the corporate side of the food industry. In 1966, five corporate chains controlled more than 75 per cent of the grocery business in urban areas, and since then that control has been increasing all the time. During this debate reference was made to the termination of the investigation that was made in 1967. My family has been involved in the food industry, either as a producer or as a small retail operator, for quite a long time and could tell a lot about the corporate interests in this country, as well as what has happened to small businessmen as a result of the growth of large corporations. We have seen chain store after chain store built on every corner of every street, almost to the point where they are like garages. What a waste of capital expenditure.

In the city of Weyburn there is a co-operative which does offer some competition to the monopolies. There is also an OK Economy store and a Safeway, and there is not a block between the three of them. The co-op does very well and I believe that Safeway does very well, but the OK Economy store might as well have never been built. This is an illustration of waste and it is the sort of thing the committee should examine to determine the best use of capital by large chain stores.

In one part of the food processing industry one firm controlled 100 per cent of the market in the Maritimes and western Canada and 80 per cent of the market in Quebec and Ontario. What does this kind of control do to prices, Mr. Speaker? It allows monopolistic capitalism to set the price that the consumer pays and which the producer receives for his commodity. I assume that the two old line parties call this free enterprise, but to me it is the kind of free enterprise that is free only for those who can gouge.

I have already referred to the domestic price of wheat and how it is affecting producers in western Canada. We have had the Lift program and Lord knows what other kind of programs offered by this government which have been let-downs. I remember the hue and cry on the part of some members of the opposition in this House at the small farm development program, yet two Tory governments were the first to participate in that program.

In 1972 the farmer, particularly in the west, was simply getting to the position where he should have been in terms of income. This committee should examine with real seriousness farm income and how it relates to the price of food. How many realize that only one and three quarter cents of a 30 cent loaf of bread goes to the producer? I include the three quarters of a cent since the price of bread has risen on the world market, though the millers are still paying $1.95½ per bushel for wheat. Let me use as a further example the price of another product. A 48-ounce can of apple juice sells today for 40 cents. Do you assume, Mr. Speaker, that the producer gets 20 cents of that 40 cents? No, Sir, he does not. Would you assume that he gets 15 cents? All he gets, Mr. Speaker, is seven cents of that 40 cents.

The average return on an acre of land in western Canada during the last five years does not even amount to $1, which would produce a net income of $640 per section. The net return is not even 50 cents, it is a mere 44 cents an acre. This is an atrocious situation in terms of trying to keep farmers on the land and illustrates the problems faced by producers. In 1949 the net income of a farmer was $1,383. By 1971 it had climbed a little and had reached $1,570. If an individual can look at those figures and fail to recognize that there have to be some fundamental answers to the problems facing producers, then he cannot see beyond his own nose.

Cash receipts received by western farmers in the year 1951 amounted to $694 million. If I may go back to 1949, the total was $682 million. Instead of increasing in step with the rest of the economy, these cash receipts had dropped to $533 million by 1969. In 1970, they totalled $570 million and in 1971 $575 million. No producer can get fat off the land with a return like that. As I say, the committee ought to examine what is the farmer's share of the food dollar in relation to the price paid for his commodities by the consumer. The committee should examine the whole question of pricing in the large urban centres. In a certain end of the town when it is known that the workingman is buying hamburger, bologna or other cheaper cuts, the prices are increased. At the other end of the town where the more well-to-do people live—

An hon. Member: The Conservatives.

Mr. Knight: —the food prices remain the same. Another matter the committee should examine is the relationship between the price the farmer receives for his commodities and the cost of production. When people say that the price of food has increased, in terms of what the farmer is receiving,—and I am not talking about retail prices—they never examine the cost of the various items connected with production such as the price of farm machinery which is skyrocketing, the price of fertilizer which increased $10 a ton in one week or the gouging in respect of land in western Canada which is the greatest it has been in five years. These things should be kept in mind by the committee when it examines the food industry.

Finally, the committee should look into the area of corporate expenditures related to the construction of fancy buildings, the use of fancy advertising and so on. Furthermore, the committee should take some initiative or show some imagination by examining the possibility of having a program to help those people in Canada who are in need of a proper diet and proper nutrition. For example, one might examine the idea of an internal food aid program. This would be the type of program that would ensure that Canadians on low incomes, and perhaps those in some isolated areas of this nation, would have a proper diet. If we were to examine the kind of program outlined by the United States government, perhaps we would find that such a program could be generated for the farmers of this nation, particularly the farmers of eastern Canada and the Maritimes rather than the wheat producers. Through an internal aid food program, we could generate something in the neighbourhood of $200 million for the benefit of the producers and at the same time solve the problems of the needy people in this country where one Canadian in every four still lives below the poverty line. That kind of redistribution in terms of food should be given serious consideration.

I asked in this House for a copy of a report by the United States Department of Agriculture under its internal food aid program, as did the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) previously. When one asks for information on such a program what is the result? We are told that the publication of this report is not in the public interest. It is not in the public interest because federal governments, either the Tweedledee's or the Tweedledum's, have not had the imagination to develop this kind of program which would be of assistance to the primary producers of this country. This is one area into which I hope the committee will look.

I have a letter, if I may call it a letter—perhaps it is more in the form of a petition—from the Federated Co-operatives Limited in Saskatchewan. It is addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who just stepped out. This organization is interested in the matter of the inflated costs. It reads:

WHEREAS the Prices and Incomes Commission in its final report—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him under the order of last week has expired. He could continue, however, if there is unanimous consent of the House. Is this agreed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knight: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I also thank my fellow members for their courtesy in giving me this extra time, including the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I shall proceed to the part of this letter containing the resolution:

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that we urge the Government of Canada to reconsider the report of the Prices and Incomes Commission and to initiate, with the least possible delay, a program of measures designed to control inflation and to stabilize prices in Canada;

AND BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED that such measures be contrived and applied in such a manner as to avoid placing the preponderance of its consequences upon wage earners or persons of fixed income, but in fair and just manner, apply to all forms of individual, corporate and institutional income and include prices, profits, interest, salaries and wages, and tax-derived revenues.

This is something we would never get from the Tory party. When this committee draws its report, I suggest it may come to the conclusion that there must be a program of income support or support prices for the producer's commodities, perhaps in the form of guaranteed minimum prices. On the other end, in terms of the consumers, the committee may conclude that there should be a program of income redistribution in this country so that people will have the money necessary to purchase those consumer goods, such as food, which everyone needs.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to take part in this debate I wish to say that as a member of this House of Commons I am somewhat shocked by the blasphemies heaped upon the members of my party by my friends to the left, especially when we were so generous in permitting the hon. member a few moments of extra time.

Like everyone else who has preceded me in this debate, I am concerned about the price of food and how it keeps rising. I am concerned about the effect of these increases on pensioners and others on fixed incomes. Frankly, I do not understand how some people are able to raise a family of three or four children with all the necessities in respect of clothing, housing and so on, on the incomes they have. I am concerned about what is happening to these people in the communities. They are taxed at one end of the scale by the Department of National Revenue, by sales taxes, by municipal taxes, by education taxes, by the excise tax, and on the other end of the scale they are taxed by the fact that the value of the dollar they have dwindles and disappears. I agree with many hon. members who have spoken from both sides of this House that if this increase in food costs had in some way supported the farmers or producers of Canada in a realistic manner then maybe the public would not be so concerned. But that has not happened.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) spoke of the abandoned farms in the west. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we have them in eastern Ontario as well. The government has embarked on a marketing policy that is putting producers out of the market. As if that process needed any help, a capital gains tax has been placed on farmlands, even when they are passed within a family. The basic herd principle has been abandoned. All these factors not only drive producers off the land but ensure that very few new producers can come on the land to take their place. I remember this past spring and fall that the farmers of eastern Ontario, particularly in Dundas, Grenville and Carleton counties, were having difficulty in even getting onto the land to see whether they could harvest their stunted crops. When they could not get on the land to do that, when they needed cash to help them, when they needed a policy to help stabilize the price of feed, when they needed real help, this government came through with a pittance in comparison with the size of the problem. In fact, one farmer in my constituency said to me that what he got from the government in the form of aid in that crisis would not pay the legal fees of a good lawyer in the foreclosure action that he faced.

• (1620)

The NDP, that party to the left, lash out at conglomerates, the big chains, the retailers, but they never mention the unions. They take us on a trip that starts at the corner store, continues to Loblaws and finally ends up in Sweden. We always seem to end up in Sweden.

What of this government? The minister says that the government is determined to contain inflation and to protect the dollar. I ask you: when did they develop this concern? I suggest that they started to develop it in the election of 1972. The problem has been with us for four years. They like to say that this is a lesson they learned from the election. I put it to you, Sir, that I would be forgiven if I called it a deathbed repentance. They called it a world-wide problem. They blame it on poor food crops. They compare Canada with countries with which there is no valid comparison and, when all else fails, they blame it on the weather. They never face up to the fact that they could have done something about it, but they did not even try. The best they have been able to do for a country that is waiting for answers has been to wring their hands and to form a committee.

I share the doubts of members of the House on both sides on the question of whether this committee will ever be effective. But as members of this House, we cannot throw up our hands in despair. Our duty is to make that committee work, if it will work, and to make that committee as effective as possible. That is why I supported the motion not to include the members of the other place, as well as the other motions. However, the House has voted on those motions.

There are some hon. members who have advocated the imposition of price and wage controls, and who have suggested that it be done immediately. I hope that the situation in this country can be such that we will never need this kind of control of our economy. But it is a matter which the committee must consider and upon which it must make a recommendation. Speaking for myself and judging from the calls I have had from the people in my constituency as well as the letters that I have received from my constituents and other people, I am satisfied that the mood of the country, if it can be measured on the basis of telephone calls, letters and conversations, is such that the people would now accept at least a temporary freeze on wages and prices. The committee has a duty to consider this remedy, but the government has a duty to the House and to the country in that regard. No one would expect the government to announce a system of wage and price controls unless it is debated in the House first, and after they have determined to impose such a remedy, if they ever do. But everyone expects this government to come clean with the committee and with the country. Everyone expects the government to lay its cards on the table.

The Trudeau government has said that they have contingency plans. They have a duty to this committee, this House and this country to produce plans. The country should know how far the government intends to go if it decides to impose wage and price controls. Would their plan include a prices and wages review board? What other machinery would be included in their contingency plan? Indeed, do these plans go beyond the mere control of food prices and do they venture into the field of rent, housing, and other incomes as well as all the other components in the total inflation picture?

The government has said that these contingency plans are in existence. They should not be hidden behind the words "in due course". The government should now take this country into its confidence. More important, they have said that they will impose these contingency plans "when the time comes". They have a duty to tell this committee, to tell the House and the country what criteria they will consider in determining when the time has come. I say this, and I say this with some sorrow, that I am satisfied that the indecisive and unresponsive attitude of this government in all matters, whether in postal disputes, industrial disputes or even on the matter of prices, has encouraged rather than discouraged changes and increases in prices. I am satisfied as well that the government has contributed to an attitude in Canada where large price increases are now considered inevitable by all those engaged in the market, and as a result those who now ask us for remedies find themselves in the midst of a crisis.

The government has a duty to make a full disclosure. If they do not, then the committee may well be a charade, and I hope it never becomes that. If they do make a disclosure, then I put it to you that it is reasonable to expect that the glimmer of optimism which some of us still hold may be justified. I do not think I shall take up any more of the time of the House in this debate. There are other hon. members who wish to speak on the question and instruct the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, once more the members are forging ahead in a debate on inflation. Indeed, the problem of increasing cost of living and salaries continues to haunt the government and once again we realize that the government does not have ready solutions to solve it.

Faced with this situation, the government suggests as usual that a committee be created to study the trends in food prices across Canada as well as their causes.

Mr. Speaker, by asking the House to form a committee to study the higher food costs, the government recognizes the total failure of the studies made by the famous Young commission on inflation. I remember the bitter debates in this House when the Young commission was created, when the government thought it had found a miracle solution to check inflation. In fact it was decided that a special commission would be assigned the task, by Parliament, of looking into all the elements, domestic and foreign, which contribute to the rise in prices and salaries, and taking the necessary steps to check, inflation. As it happens, the work of that commission gave absolutely no results.

• (1630)

Inflation—to use a favorite expression of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)—keeps "galloping", prices and salaries keep going up, and poverty exists among riches. Quite paradoxically, the price of commodities keeps rising, while the Canadian people are getting deeper and deeper into debt because they lack the purchasing power to buy them, and the government keeps taking that power away from them by picking their pockets and then, we are in a vicious circle.

Mr. Speaker, this committee the government proposes to appoint will have to report and make recommendations on the trends of food prices. There is no need to appoint a committee to do that. Every Canadian will agree with me that prices are going up. Therefore, there is no need to appoint a committee in order to determine the trend of prices because they are obviously going up. And I suppose that if the government is now making a further attempt by giving such responsibilities to that committee it is probably because the Young Commission, with all its studies that cost thousands of dollars, did not succeed in finding whether prices were going up or down.

It is indeed incredible that we should be satisfied with marking time and still ask ourselves whether prices are rising. Such studies will not give one cent more to any Canadian consumer, except to the officials travelling with the committee.

The second responsibility entrusted to that committee is to study the factors domestic and foreign which account for the trends of food prices.

Mr. Speaker, as concerns the factors likely to have a bearing on prices, no new information will crop up. If you consider the results of the Barber Commission on the prices of farming implements mentioned in his speech last night by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert)—a report which has been shelved under a ten-inch thick layer of dust—you will find conclusions about the foreign and domestic factors that influence price increases.

If you go through the reports submitted by the Canadian Economic Council since its establishment, you will realize that the foreign and domestic factors of consumer price increases have been identified by that organization but here again these conclusions remain the bedside book of the Right hon. Prime Minister and of the Leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). They do not go any further because the governments, Progressive Conservative or Liberal, of the last 100 years have been the main factors of price and salary increases through their policy which only results in depriving taxpayers of their purchasing power, thus creating an imbalance between consumption and production which only leads to more inflation.

Among the factors which influence consumer prices, one should consider indirect taxation instead of direct taxation, and particularly the sales tax on building materials which causes consumer prices to go up. One should also consider personal income tax which still reduces the purchasing power. What happens under such circumstances? The income of the Canadian citizen is subjected to all kinds of taxes and inevitably he is unable to buy the goods which he himself produced. Why? Because between production and consumption the governments always step in to reduce the purchasing power, but they never dare think one minute that perhaps they should do the opposite in order to solve this problem, that is increase the individual purchasing power.

[Mr. Fortin.]

It is rather paradoxical that in spite of an overproduction in Canada, not only the findings of studies but even some members say that underconsumption exists because prices are too high. It is strange to find that everyone is playing around the real problem, but nobody attacks it.

Social Crediters have been laughed at for a long time because some said they were advocating a silly doctrine and intended to operate a money machine. Today all serious-minded people know that this is false. In explaining their doctrine, Creditistes have often indicated that the individual is the cornerstone of the economic system and that, inasmuch as the individual really takes part in the economic life of his country, it is soundly administered and the government truly achieves its end which is to make financially possible what is physically desirable for the Canadian citizen.

Mr. Speaker, the various succeeding governments always went in for getting more money from the taxpayers' pockets in order to finance countless government programs in social security, regional economic expansion or any other fields, thus reducing the taxpayers' purchasing power.

Given this fact and spiraling prices and wages, Social Crediters suggest two solutions. First, as thd major problem is the lack of purchasing power it would be imperative to recommend the establishment of a guaranteed annual income for each citizen, whatever his situation, his language, his race or his religion so as to enable him to get his share of the national production and this without any rise in prices or in wages. Each and every one, according to his age and certain categories and taking into account the present economic situation, should be granted an income which will ensure not only that individual work is encouraged, but also that the individual has the financial means to take part in production and consumption by purchasing products on the market.

Mr. Speaker, ministers of finance gorge themselves with nice talk when they say that Canada has a very high national product. In his next budget speech, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) will tell that due to the good administration of the government, gross national product has once again increased by so much per cent. In the meantime however, the purchasing power of the consumer will also have been eroded, poverty will have increased and the administration of social security schemes will cost more and more. The wage-earner is heavily taxed in order that those who do not work may be given something and finally the economic wheel of our country is not turning well.

We therefore propose granting each Canadian citizen a guaranteed annual income whose amount would be scientifically calculated to enable him to purchase the share of the national production which he either earns through his work or is fully entitled to as a Canadian citizen.

In the second place, Mr. Speaker, this legislation would certainly increase Canadian production without necessarily boosting prices, but of course prices might still go up.

Because of this, the Social Credit party has long been advocating legislation entirely in contradiction with the philosophy of the old parties which have been succeeding each other over the past 100 years, namely compensated discount to be granted to consumers through the dealer with reimbursement guaranteed by the government. This program is contrary to price and salary controls in that it leaves the consumer free to purchase where he will and the dealer free to participate or not to the program. Moreover, this compensated discount program would allow the government to take direct action relative to prices.

Mr. Speaker, that is a scientific economic project worthy of examination. To my great regret, once again the government is about to set up a task force to study studies carried out by other task forces, all of which will result in more reports which will sit on shelves, without any positive recommendation being brought forward.

• (1640)

Under the influence of the New Democratic Party, they will propose controls over prices and salaries.

Through the backward policy of the old political parties, the consumer today is caught in a vise and unable to participate in production. As for the merchant, he must in turn face price increases, wage increases, taxes on capital gains, so that the businessman, the industrialist and the private sector are also trapped in a vise. This is why we say that we are heading more and more toward a socialist system.

But, Mr. Speaker, I shall oppose with all my strength any control over prices and salaries in Canada because, having observed the course of this debate, I realize very clearly that this will be one of the findings of the committee's report and I fully intend to keep on proposing in this House a compensated discount.

The compensated discount, as I summed it up a moment ago, is a concrete step. Nothing is forced upon anyone and price increases are directly affected. Those dealers who want to opt out may do so. However, they will have to face a fair competition, because Social Credit respects and promotes the healthy and normal development of free enterprise in our country, that is private enterprise.

The dealer who chooses to join the compensated discount scheme can then give, according to the present economic conditions and the indications of the Minister of Finance, a discount up to 5 per cent for specific economic conditions.

Thus, any consumer is free to do business with a dealer who takes part in the compensated discount scheme or with another who does not. Moreover, the dealer is entirely free to accept or not the compensated discount program.

The consumer buying from a dealer who has joined the program will get a product at 5 per cent less. The consumer pays 5 per cent less for the product and the dealer files a claim with the government at the end of the month so as to compensate for his loss; thus the selling price of a product for the dealer taking part in the program is the same as for the dealer who has not joined it, except that in the case of the consumer there is a 5 per cent saving.

Food Prices Committee

Why is the government creating a committee to investigate consumer prices? It is precisely because they want to yap, to clamour from one ocean to another that prices are going up, that people's incomes do not enable them to buy those products, and that they are therefore getting into debt with finance companies that will take advantage of them through publicity by making them pay hidden interest rates.

Supermarkets are exploiting consumers as they create in their stores such an atmosphere that consumers cannot help buying. The consumer is also deceived by the false publicity as well as by middlemen between producers and consumers, so much that an item which should have cost very little in the first place is finally sold at an outrageous and abusive price because a whole series of middlemen took their share of profit without taking part in the production.

Mr. Speaker, if the government is aware of price increases and if in creating this third or fifth committee on prices it recognizes the failure of its earlier committees, I wonder whether it is trustworthy, serious and really sincere in its attempt at finding a solution. I wonder therefore why it would not consider, through the action of this committee, the possibility of using the Social Credit's scientific mechanism for prices, namely the consumer's compensated discount. The government would then show that it is responsible because, while respecting the freedom of the dealers, it would respect that of the consumers and would encourage a greater consumption. Consequently, production would have to be stepped up. Unemployment would be reduced and free enterprise would be respected. For once, it would get some encouragement from the government.

Mr. Speaker, we of the Social Credit party of Canada have taken a vote earlier in favour of an amendment designed to increase the membership of this committee from 20 to 25, because when there was a membership of 20 our party had only one representative on this committee. By increasing that number to 25, we shall have two spokesmen who will surely propose to other committee members the adoption of a compensated discount scheme which is a logical, modern and advanced solution. Perhaps this is why it is so badly understood, too advanced as it is for the retrograded minds of the federal cabinets which have succeeded each other for many years.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the goodwill of my colleagues from all political parties that they have at least the moral earnestness to consider the proposed compensated discount before falling into the clutches of socialism with all its implications: a general control over prices and wages, impeding the rights of individuals and businesses in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we must never forget that the keystone of our economy and of our country is personal initiative, the development of the individual, his desire to progress, to improve his standard of living by taking part in a business by his work or otherwise. The day when we finally achieve such a total control over prices and wages, for whatever period of time, we shall display moral dishonesty because there are many other positive and efficient solutions, like the compensated discount. Moreover, we shall hamper all, personal initiative.

Before going back to my seat, Mr. Speaker, I shall give a typical example: There are families which live on welfare, on unemployment insurance benefits, families whose head is working for Rubin Bros. Clothiers Ltd. or Utex Corporation, in Victoriaville, for a low salary or working for an industry in Three Rivers, Chicoutimi, Sherbrooke, St. Hyacinthe or elsewhere for a very low salary. When this worker goes home, he gives his pay cheque to his wife, looks at his children, smokes his cigarette and feels rather depressed. It is not an incentive for him.

Two unpleasant things happen which show the extent to which government policy is stupid, irrational and backward. First, the only course open to this worker is to push his union to get him a salary increase, and then prices unavoidably go up, and he is faced with the same problem. Second, when the mother of the family does her shopping, she does not buy her groceries according to the needs of her family but rather according to the pay cheque of her husband because of this crazy system protected by both the Grits and the Tories.

Mr. Speaker, that is where we stand in this economic system, where people are deterred from participating in production and from helping themselves, requesting from the various levels of government more and more social security measures to provide for what they lack, and what they lack is a purchasing power that will allow them to participate in the economic life of their country.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I urge this government, as well as their advisers and protectors, the NDP members to consider seriously the proposals brought forth by the Social Credit Party in opposition to the present policy which actually reduces the purchasing power. We say: let us give each Canadian citizen his share of the national output by means of a guaranteed annual income and let us give him protection against production costs and consumer prices by accepting this solution which is not a magic solution but an economic one, administered by men, that is a compensated discount which will allow us to respect the freedom of individuals and at the same time reach for the goal that this government and we are seeking to achieve, that is to make sure that prices will no longer be a nightmare for Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Terry O'Connor (Halton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to address this august body for the first time. May I briefly but sincerely congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, and your deputy for your well deserved elections to the status of being just a little more equal than the rest of us equals.

Mr. Speaker, it is of some encouragement to me that the government has at last formally acknowledged the existence of one of the serious problems facing this country today. Canadians have at their disposal many methods of communication with the federal government. But undoubtedly the most effective tool available to them in order to make their voices heard is the ballot box. It took this ultimate weapon to bring to them the realization of what committees, provincial governments, opposition parties and many ordinary citizens of this country have been telling them for years: that is, that inflation is a serious national problem in both economic and human terms. As encouraging as it is that their attention has finally been directed to the problem, albeit with a sledge hammer, it is just as discouraging to look at the solution they propose.

As previous speakers have pointed out there is a plethora of committees, joint and otherwise, as well as royal commissions dating back to the depression. These have not solved anything. In fact in our modern setting, they may well contribute to our inflationary problem in the short run. Their very existence, with the possibility of recommendations involving some sort of controls, may tend to create panic price increases in anticipation of these controls.

• (1650)

No, Mr. Speaker, along with most observers of the political scene, we in the official opposition are not optimistic that this grudging acknowledgement of the problem by the government will solve anything. Notwithstanding this, we are determined to try to achieve some beneficial results from the exercise. Thus, we have moved our amendments to this motion to eliminate Senate representation, to limit sitting time to 90 days and to limit the costs to the taxpayers by restricting travel and the use of outside support staff. In place of "outside support staff" we may well substitute the words, "defeated Liberal candidates".

Surely, the precedents set during previous severe inflationary periods have proven the truth of these comments and established the necessity for the amendments proposed. We have endured a history of four or five committees sitting interminably, travelling luxuriously and exhibiting for all Canadians to wonder at, the usual three ring circus of House of Commons balancing artists, Senate clowns and government trained seals. And what has this recurring circus accomplished over the years? For an answer, we need only ask any Canadian housewife. Prices continue to rise and the scramble of wage and other income earners to keep up has severely accelerated the inflationary spiral.

I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that even the government knows that we can hope for little in the way of concrete results. They have attacked and resisted our amendments. But when such eminent government apologists as the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and the editor of the Toronto Globe and Mail impugn, not the amendments themselves, but our motives for moving them, they are admitting the necessity of the amendments. I will resist the temptation to comment on the motives of any member or party in this House. Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that the government moved this motion and proposed this committee for any but the most noble of reasons.

This committee will have an opportunity to make some contribution towards solving the serious problem of inflationary food prices only if it assiduously analyses all facets of the food producing and distributing industry. It must act with despatch, sit continuously and call responsible and knowledgeable advisers and economic analysts. Further, it must do something entirely unnatural and unaccustomed, to this type of committees. It must actually listen to the economic advice proffered, weigh it and be prepared to recommend to this House strong practical economic measures which will effectively combat the problem. The answers are economic, Mr. Speaker, and they relate to the state of the entire economy. It is inconceivable to me that this body can hope to examine the face of the coin and fail to turn it over. Inflation is related to prices and incomes. To look at just one aspect is to perform just half of the task before the committee.

However, given the narrow terms of reference, I suggest that the committee spend no time determining that food prices are high and getting higher. We know this already. Nor should it spend undue time examining the causes of inflation in the food industry. I suggest that causes have been analysed ad nauseam. We on this side of the House, as well as the people of Canada, want a few solutions. We want practical solutions, strong solutions that are capable of legislative implementation.

Such a course of action would receive the unanimous approval of this House and the undying gratitude, including the political gratitude, of the people of Canada. Further, the committee must attempt to profit from the experiences of previous committees studying this subject, if only to know what not to recommend. For instance, the government must now be painfully aware of the fact that it cannot fight rising food prices or rising prices in any other sector of the economy by deliberately encouraging unemployment. They must now be aware that voluntary restraints by one side of the labour-management combination will not be effective.

A prices review board, as suggested by our friends on the left, is not the answer.

Mr. Knight: What is?

Mr. O'Connor: I will come to that. A logical extension of their argument would surely be a wages review board, then an interest review board, then a profit review board and, finally, a review board to review the review boards. We should not resort to the proliferation of government agencies. Direct bureaucratic involvement in our lives should be employed only as a last resort.

The problem must be attacked uniformly throughout all sectors of the economy and must not be left to individual members of individual boards or commissions to adjudicate, perhaps unequally, in individual cases. The problem of food prices faces every single Canadian every single day of his life. The solutions must be applied equally throughout society so that no geographic or economic sector bears the burden of rising prices or, more importantly, bears the burden of the solution to rising prices more than any other sector. The solutions, Mr. Speaker, lie either in a comprehensive short term program of prices and incomes controls or in income tax provisions which eliminate the effect of inflation on the individual consumer.

The first solution, prices and incomes controls, attacks the problem by preventing its happening. The second solution, income tax amendments, relieves the effect of inflation when it occurs. I refer, here, of course, to our party's real income proposal introduced to this House by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in response to the budget of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) last May. He proposed a simple formula which negated the effect of increases in income tax due to inflation and eliminated the government's vested interest in the inflationary spiral. Both of these approaches have been urged by our party over the past year for at least the consideration of the government. Both have been rejected out of hand. Well, the election has very forcefully gained the attention of the government donkey. Perhaps this commission, by examining the proposals I have suggested and others made to it and by making strong and specific recommendations can force the donkey to take a forward step.

As I said at the outset, Mr. Speaker, we in the official opposition are not optimistic. The record of this government in accepting suggestions and recommendations of others is dismal. On the other hand, the silver lining in this grey cloud is the real possibility that by the time the committee reports, Canada will have a new government, one with ideas and initiative which responds positively to the needs of this country.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is five o'clock. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order No. 40 to advise the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. Mackay)—Regional Economic Expansion—Request for explanation of disappearance of certain jobs; the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth)—Northern Affairs—Northwest Territories—Maintenance of employment for Indians on clearing of right of way; the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark)—Youth—Opportunities for Youth Program—Request for indication of criteria for establishment of local selection committees.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, beginning with public bills.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I understand there is agreement in the House for standing items 1 and 2 on the order paper. Will Your Honour, therefore, be kind enough to call the third item listed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO ABOLISH INDICTMENT PROCEDURE AND INCREASE TERM OF IMPRISONMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved that Bill C-8, to amend the Income Tax Act (Section 239) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words. On hearing the debate on my bill this afternoon, Your Honour may say that it sounds like old-home week. I do not want to accomplish my purpose by lèse-magesté or otherwise, but at the time of the lengthy debate on Bill C-259, you were my colleague in dealing with many of the matters in that bill and, therefore, know full well the subject on which I now speak. Perhaps the discretion of the Chair is proving greater than the valour and Your Honour is now moving to another place.

• (1700)

I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members, particularly those who are of more recent vintage, that although there are many provisions in the Income Tax Act to which hon. members would take exception, there is one that I doubt 95 per cent of the members of this House know exists. I refer to Section 239, the subject matter of the intention of my bill.

If any hon. members are interested, I invite them to refer to the debate of November 30, 1971, page 10018. It was a rather lengthy debate and is where this provision had its start. Section 239(2) reads as follows:

> Every person who has failed to comply with or contravened subsection 116(3), 153(1) or 227(5), or section 230 or 231—

This by the way, covers a lot of territory.

> —is guilty of an offence and, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, is liable on summary conviction to
> (a) a fine of not less than $200 and not exceeding $10,000, or
> (b) both the fine described in paragraph (a) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding 6 months.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I read section 238(2). Section 239(2) is as follows:

> Every person who is charged with an offence described by subsection (1) may, at the election of the Attorney General of Canada, be prosecuted upon indictment and, if convicted, is, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding 5 years and not less than 2 months.

My undying opposition to that section is that it is an official of the government, normally the Attorney General of Canada but in actual practice either the deputy minister of the Department of Justice or the Director of Prosecutions, who decides in what way a man shall go to court and to jail. The magistrate or the judge, depending upon the jurisdiction, has no power whatsoever to relieve against the penalty of imprisonment when proceedings are by way of indictment.

The minimum penalty of imprisonment is two months. This is not one of those cases where there can be a technical offence. Because of the action taken by an individual, or if it is a matter that can be considered less serious, the judge might impose a sentence of one day or, as is done with many other offences, grant a conditional discharge. Under this section, there is a minimum period of incarceration of two months or a maximum of up to five years. This is because some offence has been committed under the Income Tax Act. Section 239(1) includes all sorts of offences, even the offence of refusing to file an income tax return. There is no way a magistrate or judge can give relief. The individual must go to jail. The court of appeal can reduce a fine or a jail sentence, but it cannot go below two months.

We can comb the Criminal Code or the offence provisions of all sorts of statutes and we will not find anything as barbaric as this. Because there has been some offence, even the suppression of some records, the individual goes to jail at the whim of the Director of Prosecutions. Perhaps that is the wrong term. I should say at the discretion of the Director of Prosecutions. There is no other provincial or federal jurisdiction where there is this absolute discretion in a government official who is not answerable to anyone and whose decision is not reviewable by the Court of Appeal, unless the Court of Appeal finds that no offence has been disclosed. However, all too often, we know that the offence has been committed.

One only has to read the terms of the regulations or the statutory provisions of the Income Tax Act to find that there are offences aplenty. Almost by turning around or signing a document, one may be said to mislead. I am not trying to excuse the offences, but I find it passing strange that in an act that was supposed to contain great reforms, this provision was carried forward. Hon. members on the government side sprained their shoulders by patting themselves on the back when boasting about these great income tax reforms. That bill was piloted through the House by the former member for Calgary South. He was a parliamentary secretary at the time. He and others on the government side refused to budge on this. The government has introduced bail reform bills, bills dealing with first offenders and other matters. However, with regard to income tax, the state is going to extract its pound of flesh and quart of blood as well because a transgression under the Income Tax Act seems the most heinous of all offences.

We as Canadians have a strange quirk. In no country in the world are people jailed for so many types of offences, and here we have a classic example. Under summary procedure, however, one does appear before the magistrate who has the right to impose a jail sentence. If we look at Section 239(1)(f) we see that if there has been a further offence, in addition to any penalty otherwise provided, the individual is liable on summary conviction to a fine not less than 25 per cent and not more than double the amount of the tax sought to be evaded, or both the fine described in paragraph (f) and imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

So you see, if the crime is flagrant enough, and goodness knows there are some, the provincial judge or magistrate has the right to impose a pecuniary penalty of up to double the tax sought to be evaded and, in addition, send the offender off to jail for two years. So there is not a question of a rich man buying his way out. These are penalties in addition to those I have described before, including a fine of up to $10,000.

My amendment proposes that we strike out this procedure of the indictment route which guarantees that a man goes to jail, willy-nilly on the initial and binding decision of a bureaucrat. In order to compensate, why could not the judge or the magistrate, if the case before him is severe enough, increase the period of incarceration up to five years? This would be no greater than that now provided by the indictment procedure, but at least the judge would have the option and it surely must be a court that finds a man guilty, not some faceless bureaucrat.

I will admit there may be all sorts of preliminary screenings and so forth and so on in the department, but I invite hon. members to read what I had to say back on November 30. The debate at that time lasted right through to December 6, as we came back to this section several times. I invite hon. members to consider why there should be a provision in the Income Tax Act whereby the indictment procedure can be used at the discretion of an official of the Department of Justice, with the least penalty prescribed as a mandatory two months imprisonment. Regardless of anything else, there must be a minimum of two months imprisonment. We do not have such a provision anywhere else and I find it extremely difficult to see why we must maintain this type of provision in this act.

As I pointed out during the debate over a year ago, I have known firms and individuals whose fraud on the income tax was considerable, yet somehow or other, because of either political influence or some other consideration, they were proceeded against by way of summary conviction. They paid dearly, but nobody went to jail. We know of other cases in which there may have been other considerations, yet the Crown proceeded via the indictment route with no valid explanation for the distinction. This is the point I want to make. There is no way one can confront the Attorney General of Canada or the individuals who make the decisions and ask why they proceeded by way of indictment rather than summary conviction. One cannot inquire of the Attorney General of Canada about a case that is sub-judice. He will not answer questions about the case while it is in process. When it is finished, it is too late. The individual has gone to jail. Nor can one question the Deputy Attorney General of Canada or the Director of Prosecutions.

I would invite the sincere consideration of all members of this House in support of this bill. Members have all taken some humanitarian steps in respect of other aspects of the justice process. Here is one that I maintain is deserving of such a consideration, because the decision to proceed by way of indictment is almost like the ancient "lettre de cachet" of 15th and 16th century France. The decision to proceed by way of indictment is not reviewed, yet it commits a man to jail should there be the likely conviction under the Income Tax Act. I would invite hon. members to accept this motion that the bill be now read a second time and sent to the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so it can hear further representations, if need be, and examine the officials of the Department of Justice. This is something that demands immediate attention. I thank hon. members for the careful attention they have paid to my remarks, and I hope they will be moved to accept the motion.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has entertained us with an impassioned plea on behalf of the tax offender. Who is this tax offender he is defending and for whom he has urged our consideration?

I should like to direct your attention to Section 239(1) of the Income Tax Act which informs us that the people who are in the situation about which my hon. friend is speaking are those people who have made, or participated in, assented to or acquiesced in the making of false or deceptive statements in a return, or those who have tried to evade payment of a tax imposed by this act or destroyed, altered, mutilated, secreted or otherwise disposed of the records of books of account. The section also refers to those who have made false or deceptive entries in tax returns, and to those people who have wilfully or in any manner evaded or attempted to evade the tax imposed by the act. The hon. member is not referring to a man who has paid his tax late or who has made a mistake in his income tax return. He is referring to a man who has in some way wilfully sought to evade the payment of part or all of his income tax. This is the gentleman on whose behalf we are asked to be so solicitous.

I think we should look at the elements of the offence presented here. First, there is the element of the laying of the charge, as provided for in Section 239(1) and (2). Taking them together, the Crown can proceed either by way of summary conviction or by way of indictment on the election of the Crown. This is not an unusual provision in our law. The Criminal Code of Canada is filled with instances where such discretion is given to the Crown. It may be as my hon. friend has asserted that this is not a matter on which the Attorney General of Canada can be directly called to order in this House, but the fact remains that this is a usual power that the Attorney General of Canada has in the administration of criminal or quasi-criminal statutes. The onus for its exercise is by statute placed squarely on the Attorney General of Canada. It may be that he will see fit to delegate his power to the Director of Prosecutions, but even so this is an official in his department to whom he would normally refer for advice in the exercise of his power in other cases. Therefore, it is not an unusual power for the Director of Prosecutions to exercise under the Minister of Justice, nor is it an unusual power for the minister himself to exercise. Therefore, I see no novelty in this kind of option being given to the Crown. It seems to me that if we are to take seriously the claim that is being made by the hon. member for Edmonton West, we must look to the other elements of the offence for the gravamen of the change he would seek to make to the act.

• (1720)

The second element, I would suggest, concerns the finding of the court. We must not overlook the fact that the gentleman upon whom a fine or a sentence of imprisonment would be imposed is a person who has been convicted by a court. The imposition of such a penalty is not a decision taken by the Attorney General of Canada; only after a court, following due process of law, has formally convicted an accused of a charge laid under section 239 can the penalties come into effect at all. This is the usual course of justice and there is nothing here that is very surprising to a student of law.

Therefore, I suggest we must turn to the third element, the penalty element, before we can find any novelty whatsoever. The element here that may seem to the hon. member for Edmonton West to be one of novelty is the prescription of a minimim penalty. In the case of an indictable offence the minimum penalty is one involving imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years and not less than two months; that is provided for by section 239(2). Thus, when the Attorney General of Canada chooses to proceed by way of indictment, and when a conviction is registered by the court, the option of the court in imposing sentence is thereby narrowed.

It is true that this is not the general principle of the law. It is not the general custom, though I submit it is highly justifiable in a case of this kind. In order to see how justifiable it is, I think we must take a broader look at the question and at the kind of morality that holds sway in society, or at what I submit are the conflicting moralities that exist in this area.

I believe that we have here, on the one hand, a business morality, not to say a big business morality, and on the other hand a social morality. It does not surprise me that the hon. member for Edmonton West, who is the financial spokesman of a party that traditionally has been the party of big business in this country, defends the big business morality in a case of this kind.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is the little guy who gets hit.

Mr. MacGuigan: I do not agree that it is the little guy who gets hit. It is not the little guy who usually has a stake in wilfully evading the payment of his taxes; rather it is the malefactor about whom my hon. friend is concerned, the one who has a heavier tax burden.

This is one view of morality which claims the allegiance of some people in our society, and I suggest it may claim the allegiance of too many. It would seem to many in our society that the person who commits what is sometimes called a white collar crime, a crime not involving violence, a crime that is not habitually associated with those committed by the less well off in our society, often escapes the penalty of the law. I do not believe that is true, but it sometimes seems that way when such a person receives a penalty that is regarded by some as being too light.

In considering legislation such as this we must bear in mind that a different social morality must be taken into account. The big businessman who offends against the law should not receive a penalty that is ineffective in his position in society. It may be that in order to give public credence to the administration of justice it is necessary to impose a minimum sentence; indeed, I believe that to be the case. If the Crown decides to proceed by way of indictment, in the case of a conviction the sentence imposed here is a minimum sentence of only two months, certainly not a long sentence. If I am right in thinking that it is the humiliation of the imposition of a jail sentence that serves as an effective deterrent in a case like this, then I believe a jail sentence of two months, indeed any jail sentence that has more than a purely nominal effect, constitutes a considerable deterrent to those who might become involved in crimes of this kind.

I think it is just as important that there be a symbol to the people of the country that the parliament of Canada is determined to see to it that the law is upheld equally by all; that those who are better off in our society are going to be discouraged from breaking the law and committing crimes just as much as those who are less well off. This is why I suggest we cannot take a narrow look at a provision such as this. Experience in the courts suggests that such a provision is necessary, and I believe I find support for this contention from the need of our society for a social morality and for a proclamation by the parliament of Canada through legislation of this kind that it adheres to a social morality in which white collar crime does not have some kind of special place.

For these reasons, I am unable to support the bill that has been presented to us by the hon. member for Edmonton West. Despite the fact that it appears to make only a small change in the law, I believe that the change that he proposes is large and significant.

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I found it an honour to listen to him during the debate on tax reform, and I also listened to the argument raised in support of this amendment when it came before the House on a previous occasion. I also found the remarks of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) somewhat entertaining.

I am always amused when members of the Liberal or Conservative parties debate that which is totally irrelevant. In a tax system which has all the loopholes and protection for the rich already built in, the amendment of the hon. member for Edmonton West is not worth much at all. We can cry crocodile tears for the workingman, but it is not he who is in a situation where he breaks the law by evading payment of tax. The system is such that those with large amounts of income or who receive large profits from certain areas of activity already get special tax breaks. This is something that both parties quite often ignore.

If we had a tax system in which a dollar was a dollar and was taxed as such, then we might be able to look at this amendment a little differently. But our present tax system protects the rich, and certainly they do not need any added protection of the kind suggested by the hon. member for Edmonton West.

• (1730)

If a workingman earns $10,000 he pays income tax of $2,285. If a man is a wheeler-dealer and obtains $10,000 in the form of a capital gain, and has no other income, he pays income tax of $833 in our so-called just society. The man who collects dividends from shares in the Canadian stock-market and benefits by $10,000 does not pay nearly as much income tax as the workingman who pays $2,285 or the man with a capital gain who pays $833; he pays $197. This is a matter which should be debated in this chamber.

I know my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is quite a capable man in the area of taxation. He has strong views on how the tax system should work under the method we have adopted. I agree with the hon. member for Edmonton West that all the talk about tax reform and the time we spent last fall was wasted because we failed to provide the type of protection we had previously. That debate ought to have created a happy situation for the hon. member in respect of tax reform because it was no more than a cover for the special privileges which existed then and which continue now. In this case, the hon. member for Edmonton West wants to get back to the area of further special protection for his privileged group.

I cannot get very excited about this bill, although it does give us an opportunity to again debate the question of instituting a fundamental tax system in our country. Those who are offenders in relation to section 239(1) of the act are people who have, as was very aptly pointed out by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville, a refuge which enables them to make false statements, and so on. I have no sympathy for them when I know that most wage earners in this country have income tax taken off at the source. This system may allow the government to collect a considerable amount of money that they can play with. However, I believe the provision should remain in the act.

I have no reason to support the bill. I was very attentive to the remarks of the hon. member for Edmonton West, but when he made the statement that this was not a measure to protect the rich he looked at me and I was suspicious that he thought he was introducing in the bill a principle at variance to my socialist philosophy. It is. I oppose this bill introduced by the hon. member, as I opposed the hon. member on his views in respect of the taxation of co-operatives and credit unions and the question of foreign takeovers. He is the financial critic for his party. He does very well to defend the status quo in this nation and to show us in the New Democratic Party that if in fact we change the Tweedledees for the Tweedledums there will be no fundamental change in the serious problems which affect this country.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) stated in his remarks, it is somewhat like old home week this afternoon in respect of the debate we had previously on Bill C-259. In the last parliament the hon. member introduced an amendment on November 30, 1971 which in substance was the same as the bill he has now introduced. His amendment at that time was debated at some length.

The problem under section 239 is twofold. In the first place, the section permits the Attorney General of Canada to prosecute an offence either by way of summary conviction or by way of indictment. If the prosecution is by way of summary conviction, then a court may impose a monetary fine or a monetary fine coupled with a prison sentence for a term not exceeding two years. If the prosecution is by way of indictment, then only a prison sentence can be imposed but in this instance the term of the sentence cannot exceed five years and cannot be less than two months. The criticism levelled at this choice of procedure is that two taxpayers, having committed an identical offence, can be punished in two different ways depending upon the choice of procedure by the government. This choice of procedure parallels the procedures to be found under the Criminal Code and other federal statutes.

I suspect that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Stanbury) would wish to retain this option on procedure, with its consequent difference in penalty, because it performs a useful deterrent service. In some instances there is a possibility that a fine would simply be regarded as a cost of doing business and would have no deterrent effect. It seems to me that it is important, in a system which depends to a large degree on self-assessment, that the threat of imprisonment be a real deterrent.

In passing, we should note that the constitutional validity of this optional procedure was recently examined by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Smythe case. Although the court carefully refrained from expressing a policy view on this issue, it unequivocally held that such a practice was intra vires and did not offend the Bill of Rights.

In the debate on this subject on December 6, 1971, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) expressed puzzlement as to whether the Minister of Justice or the courts should decide whether an individual should go to jail. The then hon. member for Calgary South replied as follows:

> What does happen is that the Minister of Justice may determine in this particular case, as I understand he can in some others, that the matter is of such a serious nature that it should proceed by indictment rather than by summary conviction before a magistrate; in other words, that it must proceed by indictment to the Supreme Court. At that point the court must still decide, on the evidence presented to it, whether an offence has been committed and whether a conviction is warranted. Once the court decides that, then certainly this section does come into operation: it does provide a minimum penalty of two months' imprisonment. But it is not the Minister of Justice who determines whether a person is guilty or innocent, or what the penalty will be. That decision is the decision of the court.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say a few words during this debate. I do not pretend to be a taxation expert as the hon. member for Edmonton-West (Mr. Lambert) and during the few years I have been sitting in the House, I have always closely followed his comments and his amendments on almost any tax measure or reform.

I was pleased to hear the speech of my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacGuigan), who comprehensively outlined the problem. I think that his arguments were quite valid and that we can rightfully object to that amendment which, while being apparently very harmless, completely alters the subject matter of the clause.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If you are in favour, you take one path and if you are against, you take another.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, I also liked the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight) who held an opinion quite different from that of the hon. member for Edmonton West. The latter brought up an interesting point, namely that the worker, the wage earner has no problem with that section since his tax is withheld each week. I feel that is quite an important point and that the deterrent effect of the section is excellent since it prevents professionals of taxation from seeking potential over-convenient loop-holes. This fear of imprisonment remains an excellent deterrent measure and I hope that will be kept in mind because we shall soon be debating in this House another subject where fear will be quite an important consideration.

As stressed before, it might be necessary to carry out a new reform of our fiscal system rather than try to alter it by bits and pieces if it does not really meet present requirements. As for the amendment, which I might consider minor, I cannot support it for the good reason that I am one of those who are convinced we should maintain in our legislation the fear of imprisonment which has a very serious deterrent effect.

This, Mr. Speaker, allows discussion about a debate like this one—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A public servant makes the decision.

Mr. Comtois: —Yes, the civil servant.

Mr. Speaker, in reply to the observation of the hon. member for Edmonton West, I would say that the judge decides in the case we are concerned with here. The civil servant decides on the procedure to be followed, but the judge passes judgment and imposes the penalty within the limits of the law.

It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that the discussion of clauses like this one gives several hon. members, including myself the opportunity to learn quite a lot about the law on income tax, perhaps because we have never before run into those problems. We realize that swindlers can be prosecuted in two very different ways, by imposing very different penalties. For instance, they may be prosecuted upon indictement in which case they are liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years and not less than two months. However, there are cases where imprisonment cannot be avoided and that is the restriction the hon. member would have us do away with. For the reasons stated earlier as well as for . . .

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much that the parliamentary secretary means to mislead the House, but I must suggest to him hat under the act there is, further to any other penalty, a monetary penalty as well as a compulsory jail sentence, while according to another view there is this monetary penalty and—to the judge's discretion not that of a bureaucrat—imprisonment.

Mr. Comtois: I thank the hon. member for Edmonton West for his corrections. I had probably misunderstood his remarks. I also expected the hon. member to present his plea in both official languages since he is perfectly bilingual, but the interpretation is rather difficult to follow and I apologize for having misinterpreted his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by simply repeating that I disapprove of this legislation because the fear of imprisonment is enough reason I think to prevent a great many people from misusing the law by evading it and the monetary penalty alone is insufficient in my opinion.

I hope therefore that hon. members will realize that in our judicial system we must maintain certain penalties which may constitute significant prevention factors.

[English]

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, Bill C-8, is substantially the same as the series of amendments which the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) moved in the last parliament during the tax reform debate. Basically, it provides for a change in the way in which the Minister of Justice or the Attorney General representing the Minister of Justice may proceed in dealing with certain cases arising out of the Income Tax Act.

I have had an opportunity to look at Hansard of December 6, 1971, pages 10192 and 10193. The argument which the hon. member for Edmonton West at that time put to the then parliamentary secretary to the minister of finance who was piloting the bill through the House was basically summed up in what he said as recorded at page 10192. He said:

> I do not think there is one hon. member across the way who would want to be in the position of the minister who has to decide whether a taxpayer should go to jail. The Minister of Justice, as Attorney General for Canada, has the right to do that under section 239(2) because non-compliance with the act within the terms of the section is a matter of fact. Wilfully refusing to file a return demands a great number of actions under section 239. These are matters of fact. There is no question that there may be other than a finding of guilty or a plea of guilty, yet by the minister proceeding through the indictment route there is a mandatory jail sentence.

I think that that is the essence of the argument which the hon. member put forward today. The whip for the NDP, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Knight), raised the issue in terms of a different proceeding for somebody who has committed a crime similar to that but of a different nature from one committed under the Income Tax Act. He raised the very real problem that in the case of crimes of a similar nature the courts should be in a position to consider crimes of different magnitude because they had been committed under different acts of parliament, in this case the Criminal Code and the Income Tax Act.

I think the answer to that proposition was put forward by the then parliamentary secretary in the debate as reported at page 10192 of Hansard for December 6, 1971.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is why he is no longer here.

Mr. Reid: That may well be. He said the following in response to the hon. member for Edmondon West and to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

• (1750)

> I think the hon. member for Edmonton West is both over-dramatizing and over-simplifying the situation. It is not the Minister of Justice who decides whether someone will go to jail; that is a determination made by the courts.
> What does happen is that the Minister of Justice may determine in this particular case, as I understand he can in some others, that the matter is of such a serious nature that it should proceed by indictment rather than by summary conviction before a magistrate; in other words, that it must proceed by indictment to the Supreme Court. At that point the court must still decide, on the evidence presented to it, whether an offence has been committed and whether a conviction is warranted. Once the court decides that, then certainly this section does come into operation; it does provide a minimum penalty of two months' imprisonment. But it is not the Minister of Justice who determines whether a person is guilty or innocent, or what the penalty will be. That decision is the decision of the court.

I think that is the essence of the proposition which we have before us. Are we going to set up a situation in which the penalties as outlined in the law are to be changed for the convenience of people who have committed a certain kind of crime, a financial crime, as opposed to crime that took place under other laws?

The argument put forward by the hon. member for Assiniboia is one that appeals to me very strongly in that there ought not to be any differentiation in the way in which crimes against money, so to speak, and crimes against property are dealt with in our system. In some cases it could be argued that crimes under the Income Tax Act, since we use the Income Tax Act as a considerable leveller of wealth, in many respects are far more serious than crimes committed under the Criminal Code. If that hypothesis is accepted, it can be argued that the weakening of the Income Tax Act as proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West in Bill C-8 is a matter of some concern to all hon. members, and particularly to those people who might have occasion to be proceeded against under the Income Tax Act.

Basically, our Income Tax Act depends upon trust. The number of income tax returns made in Canada is considerably over six million. We do not have facilities at present to investigate all returns and I would hope we would never find it necessary to do so. This feeling of trust has been built up over a considerable period of time. It implies that with respect to those people who are caught in violation of the Income Tax Act the country does have a responsibility to deal with them fairly harshly.

The Income Tax Act is far more than just a means of raising money for the ordinary expenditures of the federal government. It is a means by which a considerable amount of social justice is applied in terms of levelling out incomes, in giving the government the funds it requires for the development of social programs such as old age pensions—now that the special 4 per cent surtax has been removed—in giving funds to finance programs such as family allowances and the expansion of family allowances as proposed by the government in the last parliament, in providing moneys for the funding of programs such as the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the whole purpose of which is to take funds collected from the urban centres and disperse them in those parts of Canada which are not so well favoured in terms of industrial growth, and in providing moneys for other programs such as agricultural subsidies in order to give a proper return on investment and work to those people working in the farming industry.

I believe we should give very careful consideration to this whole matter before we act to remove from the Income Tax Act the flexibility which is sometimes desirable or to reduce the severity of sentences that might be applicable under the act.

There is always a problem in trying to discuss matters of taxation in the House of Commons because if there is one kind of law which touches almost everything a person does, particularly since most of the taxes we pay are taken off at source, we find the Income Tax Act, in many of its applications, to be far more pervasive throughout our system than even the Criminal Code itself. Consequently, the penalties that are prescribed in the Income Tax Act with respect to various aspects of its application have a tendency to be perhaps far more severe than one might gauge at first view. As I said before, Mr. Speaker, this is not something that has been approached by accident. I suspect it is something which successive governments have done by design, simply because of the pervasive nature and impact of the Income Tax Act as it applies to the conduct of our ordinary affairs.

It is quite true that in many cases the Income Tax Act is silent. It is quite true that there are grey areas in it. I can recall a specific case in my own district where a group of men came together to launch a project. At that time there were no particular laws on capital gains. They hired a lawyer, he gave them the advice that was current at that time and they proceeded to construct their affairs in accordance with what they believed the law to be at that time and what the jurisprudence at that time indicated was in fact the law.

Unfortunately, the law in respect of the interpretation of the Income Tax Act was in the process of being changed. These people found themselves in the embarrassing position, having spent a considerable amount of money on a lawyer, having consulted with officials of the Department of National Revenue and having filed their papers in accordance with the advice they received both from the lawyer and the department, of one morning suddenly waking up to find themselves being brought into court on a charge of evading the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

It seems to me that the section of which we are speaking attempts to deal with both these cases. It attempts to deal with the case of those who deliberately go out to conduct their affairs in a way which might be considered fraudulent, in order to avoid the incidence of tax. At the same time, the section provides an opportunity for those people who have affairs in the grey areas of the Income Tax Act to construct their affairs in a way which is not fraudulent, so that they are able to take advantage of the way in which the act is written and of the loopholes which creep into the writing of all legislation. They are not proceeding on fraudulent grounds; they are proceeding in accordance with the well known dictum that a man may arrange his affairs so as to avoid the incidence of taxation. In this particular case the people in my constituency found themselves in conflict with the law as it was evolving.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Food Prices Committee

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FOOD PRICES

MOTION TO APPOINT SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray:

That a special committee of this House be appointed to enquire into and make recommendations upon the trends in food prices in Canada and factors domestic and foreign which account for these trends;

That 20 members of the House of Commons to be designated by the House at a later date be the members of the special committee and that Standing Order 65(5) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; to sit during periods when the House stands adjourned; to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be deemed advisable; to delegate to subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report direct to the House; to engage the services of counsel, accountants and such other clerical and technical personnel as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have spoken in this House so I should like to take the opportunity to congratulate Your Honour on your election, as has been so ably done by many hon. members who have already spoken.

I realize that we are now debating the setting up of a committee to study food prices so I shall not take time to tell the House about the riding that I represent in beautiful British Columbia. I think it is one of the best ridings in Canada, as many people have discovered who have come there to retire. I hope to speak about my riding at a later time, because many members have spoken about theirs in glowing terms and I do not think that anyone represents a riding which is in any way better than mine.

Mr. Speaker, the easiest place to hide is behind a study, especially if one can have everyone else studied but oneself. A study can go on for a long time in the hope that the problem will right itself, be accepted or somehow go away. If and when this committee study gets going the government's agricultural policy on food should be investigated to see if it is contributing to the percentage rise in food prices. Producers know that over the years certain foods have been imported into Canada, driving the producer price down. Producers have been telling the government that sooner or later the chickens would come to roost and the cost of food would spiral.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) said that the farmer should not worry. Mr. Speaker, whenever anyone is talking about the cost of food, I can tell you that the farmer becomes very worried. He knows very well that when the squeeze is on, the place where it is felt most is at the farm gate. Everyone else gets their due; everyone else has a set price that they receive, or a set income, and invariably the squeeze ends up at the farm gate.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel).]

A prize example of this, and there are many, is a situation which occurred this year in Winnipeg with regard to the marketing of apples. In order that the producers of the Okanagan Valley could meet the price of apples at the retail level, a reduction on the f.o.b. price of 20 per cent had to be effected. This meant that the price to the producer decreased by 80 per cent. There was absolutely no way that he could make a living and meet this type of competition. It is said that it is the retailers and wholesalers who make the money, but in this case there was competition and the squeeze was on at the farm gate.

The policy of the Liberal government regarding imports almost ruined the apple juice business in Canada. It took us three years to convince the government that imports of cheap, highly subsidized concentrate would ruin the apple juice business for Canadian producers. We finally got a tribunal which showed beyond a shadow of doubt that we were correct, and then we got some action—three years later! However, the overproduction of concentrate in the world dried up, and today if you can get apple juice in its pure form—and about the only place in eastern Canada where you can get it is Nova Scotia—the price to the consumer is higher than it should be. This is mainly because of what went on over the years at the producer level and the importation of cheap, highly subsidized concentrate rather than building the industry within Canada.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which was born of the last investigation has helped to raise prices to the consumer, not lower them. There is ample evidence of this, Mr. Speaker. In many cases it is the producer who has to absorb the squeeze on price, not the consumer. The cost of goods and services to farmers has been rising much faster than the price he receives for his goods. Such things as gas, fertilizer, machinery and labour—not necessarily the direct labour that he hires himself but the labour that is hired throughout Canada in the process of distributing, handling, packaging and selling his goods—have sent his costs soaring.

Farmers would also like to have these areas investigated. An investigation into the cost of farm machinery was held a few years ago, but as far as I am concerned the only result was that the supply of cheap tractors from England dried up. As far as labour is concerned, the farmer would like to have the same deal that labour has in Canada. He is not jealous of labour's position nor is he against it. He knows, however, that there is almost free entry into Canada of foods such as fruits and vegetables. They come from places in the world where labour is cheap and he is competing against countries which subsidize their products.

When labourers come into Canada, they work under laws that specify a minimum wage; they start at wage levels that unions have negotiated for them. We are not against this but we would certainly like to be given the same opportunities. Somewhere in the world there are people who can do a job more cheaply than it can be done in Canada.

The wholesaler is always considered the bad guy. The hazards that have to be faced in the wholesale business, and the lack of profit, have resulted in that business being accumulated largely in the hands of a few large organizations. Bigness is not always best and big firms are not always the least costly, even though the Liberal government over past years may have left the impression that it is best and that big firms are least costly. One prime reason which leads me to believe that the fruit and vegetable wholesale business is not very remunerative but, instead, is hazardous is that Federated Co-op, the largest co-op in Canada, has chosen to stay out of this business. I believe they have also chosen to stay out of the meat business.

We often hear NDP members saying that co-ops can distribute food more cheaply. I have had considerable experience in the co-operative field and have had the good fortune of travelling quite frequently to the markets of western Canada and observing the fruit and vegetable industry. I also know that no sooner had the NDP government been elected in British Columbia than they were saying the co-ops could distribute food more cheaply to the consumer.

Mr. Neale (Vancouver East): And we will prove it.

Mr. Whittaker: My friend from Vancouver East (Mr. Neale) says they will prove it. I should not like to hold my breath until they do. If I thought that by acting co-operatively I could distribute food to the consumers of Canada for 15 or 25 per cent less, then that is the vocation I would have chosen; I would not have become a politician and would not have come here. I would have done that because I would have been doing something for the consumer of Canada, something I enjoyed. I am not talking about figures in the neighbourhood of 2 or 3 per cent; it has been proven that consumers will not pay much attention to 2 or 3 per cent. I have an open mind, Mr. Speaker; certainly it is not closed. If there is any magic under the NDP in B.C., then that government could do this. What is more, I would be all for it. I would very quickly be behind them 100 per cent. I would enjoy seeing this magic at work, if there were any magic.

Under the NDP government in Saskatchewan the price of fruits and vegetables, according to my observation, was higher than in any other place to which I travelled. Why was the magic not used there? Why could not Federated Co-op, the largest co-op in Canada, perform the magic for that province? Supermarkets at one time were supposed to distribute food more cheaply to consumers. I do not believe they did but, rather, they provided an atmosphere that the majority of consumers liked but which cost more. Consider the wages paid; butchers are paid $6 an hour.

A few minutes ago I spoke about the marketing of McIntosh apples in Winnipeg and the squeeze that was put on our producers there. It so happens that these apples were being marketed in a package that we did not want any part of. My friends to the left said to me the other day that packaging was being forced on the consumer by somebody. My experience has shown that the consumer has forced the packaging on the producer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whittaker: I invite those people to go into the marketplace and observe what is going on, because it is obvious they are staying home writing speeches and dreaming. The package I am talking about is the six-quart basket. We find it costly. It does not sell enough of the product and we want no part of that package. However, if we put apples in the stores in anything else, we will not sell more. The consumer is picking up the six-quart package; it must be put in the stores because that is the one the consumer likes.

I notice that my hon. friend from Vancouver-Kingsway is not here. Over the years I have read some of the things she has said. As well, I have read some of the things that some so-called food experts have been saying. Mr. Speaker, I have been to the marketplace and observed what happens, and those remarks just do not add up. What the consumer is doing and what people like the hon. member are saying are entirely different. I should like to see the consumer doing what people like the hon. member says should be done, but they have not been able to convince the consumer to do that. Therefore, we are compelled to do what the consumer wants.

An hon. Member: That is the psychology of selling.

Mr. Whittaker: I think, if we are to get down to the nuts and bolts of what is necessary, we need a cooling-off period in Canada during which we might institute price and wage controls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: How about dividends?

Mr. Kempling: You never invested a nickel in your life.

Mr. Whittaker: We need controls that would deal with the total cost of living, that would attack inflation and do something for the people my hon. friends are talking about, those below the poverty line and those who must live on fixed incomes. Such controls would help all the people in Canada. I submit that many people in Canada today are living below the poverty line, and if they were given all their food for nothing they would still not be above the poverty line.

We are not going to help people like that and we will not solve this problem by hiding behind a mere study of food prices. However, if this is what we have to do, and it appears it is because this is the majority will of this parliament, let us do the job quickly, thoroughly, fairly and objectively. Let us not try to find one area that someone likes that is politically expedient, hide behind it and for the next five to ten years keep on calling for a study. This committee should not be the comfortable refuge of defeated Liberal candidates and supporters.

• (2020)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Whittaker: Surely by now these are well looked after and the housewives, pensioners, mothers and farmers of this nation have no obligation to them. If this committee needs professional assistance, let it not be found in the tattered ranks of the vanquished, for in those ranks are only the defeated and disheartened. Our consumers need the assistance of men and women who are understanding, sympathetic and devoted to the cause of the desperate. Let us give this committee the integrity it deserves. Let it not be a vehicle for political escapism.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Whittaker), prompted me to make a few remarks on the motion before the House. We in the New Democratic Party support the motion that a special committee be set up to inquire into food prices and food trends and to make recommendations to the House.

I noted in the speech of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) that his attitude was one of reluctant support with regard to setting up this committee. His remarks were brief and not very stimulating. It seems he is backing into the proposition of setting up a food committee. Possibly he remembers the experience of the government in 1966-67 when a similar committee was set up to investigate food prices. The only thing of real note to come out of that committee was the setting up of a ministry of consumer and corporate affairs. This was probably a very worthy result, but very little action was taken by the government with regard to rising prices.

The substance of this motion is restricted to the question of food prices. Many hon. members would like to see the motion extended to include shelter costs and high interest rates. The attitude of the Progressive Conservative party has been most disappointing. Their attitude has been: Let the public be damned; we want power.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gilbert: The substance of their speeches has been more in the nature of destructive rather than constructive criticism. When I look at the last three rows of the Conservative benches, I draw the inference that maybe they are disappointed in their front bench with regard to the ideas they have suggested for solving the problem.

One of the vital issues in the recent election campaign was the high cost of living. Any member who campaigned came in contact with this issue. He probably heard criticisms from many housewives about their experiences in the chain stores. They told us that when they went into a chain store to buy certain products, they found three or four labels on the products indicating different prices; the top label indicated 49 cents, when they removed this label they found a 39 cent label, and when they removed that they found another label with the price of 29 cents on it. This type of conduct by the food and chain stores annoys and concerns housewives. When the first attack was made on chain stores in 1966-67, they attempted to act as good corporate persons. There was an immediate drop in prices. After a month or two they started their old game of increasing prices. Prices gradually went up until today most people in Canada find them almost unbearable.

It was indicated in the recent election campaign that people with low incomes and those on fixed incomes were the hardest hit by the food prices to which we are now subjected. It would be very easy to place the blame on the farmer. I am happy that the speeches so far have suggested that the farmers are in no way responsible for the price increases that have resulted. Studies conducted in 1949 showed that the farmer received 49 cents of the food dollar. In 1972 he received 38 cents. The inference to be drawn is that he is suffering as a result of high prices.

During the election campaign we in the New Democratic Party stated that two things should happen. First, a prices review board should be established to study the prices of various products. By dint of persuasion and government action we hope that prices will come down. If chain stores will accept their corporate and social responsibility there will be a downward trend in prices. Second, there should be an immediate investigation into food prices. Not only should there be a prices review board but there should be a study with regard to the trends that have developed, and a special study concerning chain stores.

In the last study that was made, in 1966-67, evidence was presented of the corporate chains and their sophisticated method with regard to setting up corporations which almost amount to a corporate jungle for the purpose of evading, in many instances, taxes. When you look at the corporate set-up of the various chain stores, you appreciate that they are part of a sophisticated method of avoiding taxes and that they have been able to persuade and control the public to their way of thinking.

• (2030)

The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary suggested that the consumer was responsible for the type of packages we now see in the stores. Can you imagine laying the blame on the average housewife for having three or four different sized boxes for different soaps, three or four different sizes for cereals, three or four different sizes for toothpaste and three or four different sizes for coffee?

Some hon. Members: Sure.

Mr. Gilbert: The average housewife goes into the store, determines the number of ounces in a package in relation to the price and then calculate which is the better buy.

An hon. Member: There is probably no difference.

Mr. Gilbert: If we had some uniformity in respect of packaging and an indication of the price per ounce that an individual was paying, this would be of great assistance to the housewife. We are all aware of the advertising techniques and gimmicks that chain stores indulge in. Hon. members well know that Dominion Stores advertise that it is "mainly because of the meat". Other chain stores suggest they have "deep discount" prices. Every Wednesday and Thursday the newspapers are filled with advertising in an attempt to persuade the innocent housewife to go into the store and take advantage of these deep discount prices when, in fact, the majority of the prices are fixed or predetermined by the corporation before the goods even go on the shelf. Those prices bear very little or no resemblance to the actual cost of producing the article. These are some of the things we feel the committee should study in depth in the over-all study of rising food prices in Canada.

An hon. Member: The same old story.

Mr. Gilbert: The previous speaker referred to co-operatives. We have two types of co-operatives in this country, discount co-operatives and consumer co-operatives. City fellows like myself have only been exposed to consumer co-operatives. We find that consumer co-ops have patronage dividends in an attempt to help the producer reduce his price, but they have not been successful in the cities. Probably the reason they have not been successful can be related to the pressure of the large chain stores.

An hon. Member: Be careful now, John.

Mr. Gilbert: Recently, co-operatives have taken a new approach to the problem by putting on a direct service charge for the service rendered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. It is very hard for the Chair to follow the speech of the hon. member. The speech is not being made in my mother tongue, but I am attempting to learn the English language and when hon. members conduct themselves as they do it is difficult for the Chair to follow the debate.

Mr. Gilbert: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure hon. members to my right are attempting to assist in their usual kind way. I enjoy their banter as it stimulates my thinking, and wisdom usually comes from the clash of ideas.

To get back to co-operatives, they now have the idea that there should be a direct service charge for services rendered. They have experienced almost instant success in these efforts in different cities across the country, more especially those in the maritime provinces as well as in Oshawa, Toronto and Hamilton. It has been pointed out that these co-operatives have received financial assistance in many cases from trade unions. It seems to me that the committee should delve deeply into the possibility of encouraging co-ops in their efforts in this important field.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) has indicated the experience of the United States, England and Sweden in respect of prices and wage control. I think we should give some time in the committee to a study of this matter. One would be foolish to adopt the methods and techniques adopted by these countries but we should not ignore them. We in the NDP want the fullest study possible on effective controls which might result in lower food costs to Canadians, always keeping in mind that at this stage the farmer is not getting for his produce a fair share of the food dollar.

The previous speaker was critical of labour costs as they relate to price increases. Let me point out to him that less than 35 per cent of all Canadian labourers belong to trade unions. Many people working in the labour market are completely unprotected in respect of bargaining for wages and working conditions. To place the blame on the trade union movement as the hon. member has done indicates that his sympathy lies with the corporate giants which in many ways and on many occasions contribute substantially to the political party he supports.

It is for the reasons I have outlined that we in the NDP will support this motion. I note the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) looking over with some scepticism about our support of this motion. I would repeat to him what was said by members of our party this afternoon. We were disappointed in the Minister of Finance when he conducted a survey of food companies and chain stores after the election, inquiring of them whether they would be agreeable to a study being made. That is not worthy of the Minister of Finance; I think he is more progressive.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What do you base that on, John?

Mr. Lewis: That is what I would like to know.

Mr. Gilbert: I thought the minister might have been concerned enough about Canadians to bring this matter immediately to their attention with recommendations that would result in lower food prices.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, for these reasons we in the NDP will support this motion. We hope that the Liberal members of the committee will have the determination and vigour to pursue these matters and bring forth recommendations which will result in lower food costs for all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it being the first time I rise to speak in this House, I would like to wish you, as the other speakers have done before me, all possible success in the performance of your duties in these difficult circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to say a few words in support of the motion which is now before the House.

[English]

An hon. Member: He doesn't look like Perry Ryan.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It doesn't sound like him, either.

An hon. Member: Thank God!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stollery: This is a motion that is consistent with the direction of the Speech from the Throne as well as the spirit. If my addition is correct, I am the fifty-first member to speak on this subject. I suggest that if there is any real interest in launching this committee, the motion should be passed with the least possible delay, certainly after a debate less wordy than the debate we have had so far.

• (2040)

The rapid rise in food costs since last summer has been of serious concern to Canadians everywhere. In fact, the whole mysterious business of food prices occupies a unique position in the economy, one that seems to be least understood. For example, why do various chain stores have such a disproportionate rate of profit? According to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), who made some very pertinent remarks last night in my opinion, IGA showed a profit after taxes of 6.7 per cent, whereas Dominion Stores showed a profit of 11.2 per cent.

An hon. Member: Which year was that?

Mr. Stollery: He did not mention that. What exactly is the correct story? On the one hand it is claimed by large department stores that they cannot make any money. It is not their fault, they say, that prices are skyrocketing? It is plain that the reason IGA is not making any money is that they have too many stores doing too little business. Dominion has got rid of most of the neighbourhood stores in Toronto and claims that by making its new stores larger and more efficient it makes a larger profit. The French have had experience with very large supermarkets, the largest in the world and the most efficient. It is claimed by some that these efficient super-supermarkets have contributed to the price stabilization that has occurred in France over the past few months.

I for one am a merchandiser, coming from a family of merchandisers who until we sold our business three years ago had a significant effect on stabilizing the price of shirts in this country. I should like to know whether any of these stores are making any money or whether they share in the larger responsibility for food prices in this country. We also have the middlemen, the packagers, the processors and the jobbers; they say they also do not make any money. Evidently nobody in the food business makes any money.

The New Democratic Party say that middlemen are unnecessary; at least, that was the inference I drew from the remarks about unnecessary packaging. On the other hand, people work in the packaging industry, which provides jobs, a problem to which I thought the NDP was addressing itself. I must admit that when I fight my way into a package of vacuum-packed bacon I also wonder about the necessity for a packaging industry. Perhaps the committee will be able to throw some light on this matter.

Not long ago I attended the annual meeting of Ontario food processors along with the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies). His solution to the problem, he said, was to allow the industry to rationalize. According to him, it would become more efficient that way. However, it did occur to me that the 200 members in the audience on that occasion might shrink to about 20 members at the next annual meeting in 1973 who would be discussing behind closed doors how to fix prices on food. In our own business the industry was dominated by a few large shirt manufacturers, and I recall Cluett, Peabody and Company removing their merchandise from our store because we refused to sell their shirts at the suggested retail price.

The approach of the Conservative party to this committee has been very obscure. On the one hand there seems to be a suggestion of support for the committee to investigate prices and to make recommendations; on the other hand there seems to be a bias against informing the Canadian public. The other day the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald) referred to the important work done by the Senate Committee on Poverty and I know she will agree with me that it is unfortunate that the chairman of that committee will not serve on this proposed committee.

I have referred to two of the three areas that affect the price of food. Like the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), I too am a city boy. Coming from the city, I do not know the first thing about farms or farm prices. However, I do not see anything in this motion referring to farmers or farms and I have seen no reference to them in any amendment. Nor do I see anything in the motion that I am supporting singling out farmers as opposed to middlemen, merchandisers or anybody else.

I am surprised at the members of the Conservative party, being at their most negative, assuming that this whole proposal is a plot against or attack on the farmers of this country. Surely the idea here is to investigate in a positive way the exceptional rise in food prices over the past 12 months. Equally, one cannot investigate food prices unless we investigate them at the farm level, at the producer level. All I know about eggs is that they always seem to be stale, in spite of what the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) had to say last night about the quality of their shells. Certainly when you buy eggs in Toronto you can hardly cook them, they are so stale. I should like to know why this is the case and possibly I will get this information from the committee.

In any event, I was most surprised at the assumption last night that this House was preparing an attack on farmers. The hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), in defence of farmers, made some references that I would have thought would be better reserved for the representations that he will undoubtedly be making to the committee, which after all is what this committee is for. Surely the motion is very clear, to the effect that the committee will investigate the cost of this inordinate price rise.

We want information concerning why food prices have risen so sharply in such a short period, what constitutes those prices and what percentage represents what. We also must ask why this mysterious business of food is so unknown to everybody in Canada. Members of the New Democratic Party and members of the Conservative party could undoubtedly comment on the reason for the rise. However, no one really knows. I think we should allow the committee to do a thorough job of investigation in order to clarify the situation and bring forward solid recommendations.

For some time I have wondered why the price of beef in 1961 and 1962 rose and then dropped eight points. I have also wondered why eggs are always so stale, particularly on the other side of this House. In supporting the motion I shall conclude by wishing the committee well. I hope it will act positively and not give in to the negative attitudes displayed on the other side of the House. I would hope that after 53 people have spoken in various ways on this subject, this should be enough. I would now like to see us get down to business.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I begin by saying that it is a most humbling experience to be called upon to speak for the first time in the presence of so many distinguished parliamentarians and accomplished orators. I would also like to add my congratulations to those of my colleagues to Your Honour on your appointment as Speaker of the House. In addition, I wish to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) on his appointment to the office of Deputy Speaker and chairman of committees of the whole House. He brings a wealth of experience and judgment to that office and I am sure he will serve with distinction.

With respect to the motion before the House, Mr. Speaker, it is one that any member of this House would find it difficult to quarrel with, but on the other hand one would have to ask the question, "Why was it left to this session to deal with a matter that has been one of great concern and immediacy for such a long time?" The great P. T. Barnum has been credited with saying, "There is nothing new under the sun". I feel that we could say the same about the motion we are debating. The problem has been around for so long, and so much has been said about it, that it would be difficult to add anything new to the arguments that have been presented.

Previous speakers in the past few days have pointed out that the serious problem of inflation in the specific area of food prices has been with us for a number of years. The problem has been debated over and over again. Many speakers of the Conservative party, including our very able leader, have been for the past four years urging the government to come to grips with the matter and propose specific measures that would root out the factors involved and provide solutions. My colleagues on this side of the House have called for expressions of concern by the government and they have called on the government to provide some evidence that it is willing and able to exercise leadership in this area of concern to so many Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of establishing a committee such as the one proposed in the government's motion. I am in favour of any sort of machinery that might be effective in assessing factors involved in trends and fluctuations in food prices. However, we are debating a measure that will become effective only at some time in the future, and desirable as that might be I would have preferred to have the government begin by asking the House to approve a crash program that would have become effective immediately. I would have preferred to see the House set into motion some type of interim machinery, such as a task force, that would be looking into the problem and suggesting remedies during the weeks or months that it will take the committee to become operational.

Many of the factors involved in the recent spiral of food cost inflation are already known to us. Many others might be brought to light quickly and easily by a task force and at least some action might be undertaken before the committee can be assembled and its terms of reference approved. I realize that it might be interpreted as brash or presumptuous for a new member to suggest that this House is approaching the problem of inflation in respect of food prices from the wrong direction, but I hope that that interpretation will not be placed on my remarks. I am simply expressing deep concern over a matter that has concerned me for a number of years, long before my election to parliament.

Any of my colleagues who watch television even occasionally will be aware of the constant barrage of television advertising inflicted on the consuming public by the national chain store operators. It is constant and it is, in my experience at least, telecast in prime viewing time and this is expensive. I should note at this point that one advertising campaign features the Canadian actor who starred in the television series "Star Trek", a series that dealt with outer space. I do not know whether or not he was selected on the merits of that particular show, but it is appropriate because some of the stuff he delivers to his audience is pretty far out.

It is my view that in this particular case we are dealing with two factors which figure largely in the present high rate of increase in food costs. We have a prime example of saturation-type advertising on the most expensive of our media, and obviously the cost of this advertising must be borne by the consumer. Secondly, as a consumer I would question the claims that are made on some television commercials. This is one of the areas where I feel a task force might make some immediate assessments and press home to the food industry as a whole that it is about to come under the scrutiny of a very concerned House of Commons.

There are other factors that are known to us which figure in a very significant way in food costs. Food retailing is moving more and more in the direction of a controlled industry operating out of the multi-million dollar shopping plaza concept. This is supposed to take all the pain and inconvenience out of shopping, but there is a real danger now that the concept has been oversold. With regard to the claim that the glittering plaza takes the pain out of shopping, those who make this claim do not take into account that people who suffer most in the process are those who can least afford it. The great shopping plazas and the new concept of prepackaged foods add to the cost of the products being merchandised. Add to this the massive and expensive advertising campaigns and other gimmicks that have become a part of grocery merchandising, and you have the ingredients of a process that tends to militate against a very significant segment of the buying public.

Those who are being hit hardest by this situation are in the low and middle income brackets. Statistics have shown that consumers in the low income bracket spend as much as 27 to 28 per cent of their total income on food. Those in the middle income groups spend 18 to 20 per cent of their total income on food. As food becomes increasingly more expensive, these people spend an increasingly larger percentage of their total income on food.

This is a vicious and cruel spiral. While one could say that those who are forced to suffer most from the spiralling cost of food are defenceless, that is not quite true. We are their defence, Mr. Speaker. We, their representatives in parliament, are their defence. That is the main reason I feel we must move with speed in coming to grips with this problem. We might find that the retailing of food and other necessities of life is concentrated in a few hands. We might find that the needs and the well-being of the buying public are being disregarded in this tendency toward bigness in the food industry, as in other industries. We might find that either now or in the near future our anti-combines laws will have to be called into play to curb this alarming tendency toward bigness.

I do not want to give the impression that I favour measures designed to stifle or hamper the growth of industry and commerce in our country. I do not want to imply that I fear healthy and measured progress in our corporate community. I leave that sort of alarmist gimmickry to the socialists. I only want to examine and explore every effect and every cause of the problem facing people who are paying too much for the necessities of life. I believe this can be done without damage to the very desirable growth of our food and livestock industries.

Another aspect of this problem that interests me is consumer education. I do not believe that enough money or effort is expended in this area of teaching people how to get the most for their shopping dollar. I know that many advertising campaigns today are billed as consumer education programs, but they are designed to push products rather than to educate the buying public. What I have in mind is a government-sponsored program. It could be applied at any level of government considered to be the most effective for the purpose. It would be designed expressly to inform the financially disadvantaged consumer how he or she could get the most out of the shopping dollar.

I have not worked out the mechanics of how such a program should or would work, but I feel that such an avenue is worth exploring. I feel, also, that we have a responsibility to consider the desirability of upgrading consumer knowledge. We spend tens of thousands of dollars every year to get people to buy this product or that product. Why not spend some of the money teaching people how to buy?

Mr. Speaker, I have not tried in my remarks to show with figures how serious is the plight of the consumer nor how serious it might become. My purpose has been only to point out that inflation is not something which occurred a few weeks or a few months ago. It has been with us for a very long time. It has been with us for too long, and I would like to see an early start on positive action to determine the causes of and to seek the earliest possible solutions to the problem.

In conclusion, I would like to express the hope once more that every effort be made to ensure the committee will get into action and become effective in the shortest possible time. I am heartened by the note of urgency I have detected in the speeches made so far in this debate. I have reason to believe that before long the real winners in this exercise will be those who are now the losers. I refer, of course, to the financially disadvantaged Canadian consumers.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the only reason that I rise to speak on this matter is that I believe in all sincerity that too many speeches have been made so far on the matter of rising food prices, matters which should really be discussed in the committee which we are about to establish. What we should really be debating at this time is the formation of the committee. The discussion here will not solve the problem nor will it benefit the consumer, and while we are using the time of the House as we have done in the speeches made in the last few days, the price of food is going up. Certainly this is not to the benefit of the Canadian people.

The sooner everyone in the House allows this matter to go to the committee to give an opportunity to the members of the committee to perform the fact finding task which they will be called upon to perform, the better will we be able to say in all sincerity that the Canadian people will be given a chance to benefit from that fact finding of such a committee.

In the meantime, I would suggest a vote as we had this afternoon is merely a delaying tactic. In fact one might think, on hearing the speeches which have been made in the last few days, that most members are again taking part in the debate on the throne speech and they are making speeches just for the sake of speaking. I believe it is the responsibility of the committee to do the job of fact finding, and not the responsibility of those who are making speeches here. The sooner this motion is passed, the sooner we will be able to say in all truthfulness and sincerity that we are forming a committee to do the job. We should stop speechmaking in the House and hand over the responsibility to the committee which this afternoon we voted to establish.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say a few words on the motion presently being considered. It is certainly always important to establish committees to do studies, but I will say that several committees have been formed since I have been sitting in this House to do various studies.

If my memory is good, Mr. Speaker, I believe that a committee was formed to study both the increase in prices and the means of helping the consumers. This, I believe, cost Canadians about 32 or 33 million dollars and the prices have kept on increasing. Therefore, what has been done to solve the problem? What will the committee and its 25 members be able to accomplish? We are all in favour of studies but what solutions will they bring about to solve the problem?

Mr. Speaker, this is an economic issue and as long as we do not get to the root of the problem we will never succeed in properly stabilizing incomes, expenses and profits.

Mr. Speaker, farmers for instance have many expenses but their income is not sufficient. The price of food depends mostly on agriculture but what was done by the government or the appointed commissions to remedy this situation? The incomes of farmers and big corporations have kept on decreasing.

They say that the retailers are not making any money either. According to the NDP members, those retailers make profits, but others say they do not especially when it comes to selling of food. Then nobody makes any profits. Farmers do not make any money and the merchants who have to stock those goods and to pack them, once they have paid for everything, do not make any profit either and the cost of living keeps on increasing.

Why is the cost of living going up? Because when the farmer needs more buildings he has to pay 11 to 12 per cent sales tax on building materials and 11 to 12 per cent tax on the farming equipment he needs. This, Mr. Speaker, is a factor which increases the cost of living for the farmer as well as his costs. What should we do to restore balance to the economy?

The committee should be responsible for investigating the role of the price and income policy in the fight against inflation, including food prices. This is why the committee should be appointed. However, a similar committee and other committees have already been established and they have prepared many studies and made many suggestions but prices keep on increasing. We only hear about price increases and people complaining that each week the cost of living is going up.

If the cost of living is higher, only a few drastic measures should be taken. In my opinion, no member of the House actually described the true situation. I do not believe either that any member has made any practical suggestions to reduce prices. We do not need higher prices but lower prices. To reduce prices we must lower taxes and allow compensated discounts on prices.

Inflated prices give rise to certain factors, which we cannot cope with at the present time. And prices keep spiralling up and we cannot put a stop to that. Therefore we should appraise total production as well as total consumption in this country and if total production greatly exceeds total consumption, it would be wise to set up a total compensated discount which would lower prices and enable citizens to buy more.

We could begin by lowering prices of agricultural machinery and buildings. It should be a good thing also to abolish taxes so as to lower prices. But an increase in taxes and wages will automatically bring an increase in prices, especially in transportation. Therefore prices begin to spiral and there is no solution as there is nobody to suggest any.

Therefore in order to solve that problem which affects us all, we should first lower food and shelter prices, because housing is almost as important as food.

We can get neither food nor shelter at a low price on account of the taxes and of the outrageous interest on loans. As a matter of fact, as early as 1955, farmers were paying around 5 per cent interest on the money they borrowed. Today they pay an interest rate of 8 to 9 per cent. Therefore, the government proved remiss when failing to check interest rates, for their consequence is soaring prices for products.

If the committee fails to deal with interest rates, to devise technical means likely to cause lower prices and a return to a properly balanced economy, thus allowing our citizens to live decently and pay reasonable prices for what they need, the appointment of such a committee will be useless.

The members of this committee could possibly not have enough guts, enough heart, enough courage to take the bull by the horns and to restore, once and for all, the balance of an economy which gets out of kilter day after day. The more our present techniques are applied, the more the cost of living increases and the more it is difficult to live for the citizens of this country. The real problems must be considered.

I respectfully submit these reforms to the House and I ask the government to look into them because if reforms other than those we know presently are not considered, things will go from bad to worse. To solve the problem, we must strike at its roots. The real problem is of an economic and financial nature, and if we go on favouring financial institutions and allowing interest rates to go up, the present economic imbalance will persist and worsen.

All hon. members seem concerned about the matter, and prepared to seek solutions. However, solutions have been considered before and I am sure the committee will come back with the same findings, which means there will not be the slightest change in our present unfortunate economic situation. The more this system is used, the worse the situation gets.

There are many solutions we could consider and I am sure that if we did so seriously, we could successfully bring down prices not only of food, but also of housing, and the cost of living in general as well.

The whole economy should be reviewed and it should be put to rights if we want to get somewhere. At the present time, we are getting nowhere. Our economy is hardly viable and far from sure. We have modernized our farm production; why not then modernize our financial means in order to ensure distribution of that production? It exists for the purpose of consumption and not to remain on shelves. If there is excess production as is the case this year—our excess production being of the order of some $40 billion—it is easy, through technical means, to cash in on that production and have it distributed at low price to our citizens. That would allow them to live, it would lower the general cost of living and would solve current problems once and for all, especially the main economic problems that we are now experiencing.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate without making apologies such as have been made by some hon. members. It seems to me only appropriate that members on all sides should point out areas in the context of the price of food which they believe are problems which should be examined by the committee and upon which the committee should report and recommend. I do not think it is wrong for any member of the House to point out the problems in his part of the country or to point to other aspects of rising food prices.

This whole issue is a political and economic one right across the country. I wish to say only one thing about food prices in relation to the problems of producers. Between 1961 and 1971, Canada's food bill increased by $4 billion but realized net farm income during the same period increased by only $600 million, or 16 per cent of the total increase. Surely that is an indication that the rise in food prices has not been related to any significant increase in the income of primary producers.

There are a number of areas that I think the committee should look into. Last September the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) made some statements on this subject and I hope the committee will call upon him to support them. The committee should also ascertain what portion of food costs encompasses transportation costs; how much freight rates contribute to rising food prices.

The committee probably would not be in a position to make a great number of recommendations within 60 days, but during the life of the committee I hope they will make suggestions that will be useful to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he meets the western premiers to discuss freight rates, because this is a significant factor in the cost of food in all parts of Canada. Our freight rates structure does not relate to our geography or our climate; it relates only to the individual modes of transportation and the profitability of each.

This country is 4,500 miles wide, comprising an area of 2½ million or 3 million square miles, with 22 million people scattered throughout and as far north as you can go. Why are people in outlying areas penalized for living there with high transportation costs? This is an area in which the committee must bring forward concrete recommendations.

My colleagues, the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Nesdoly) and the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), were good enough to provide me with some examples of what transportation costs mean to them. I have here a copy of an advertisement for the Bay Food Mart which appeared in the Inuvik Drum on January 4, 1973. A 48-ounce can of apple drink—not pure apple juice—costs 59 cents. That is double the price in Regina, Mr. Speaker, and it is a sale price. I hope the committee will find out what the regular price is in Inuvik, because the normal price in this part of the country is three cans for 99 cents. Two 16-ounce cans of pork and beans were advertised for 79 cents. In the more settled parts of Canada it is two for 38 cents or 40 cents.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the difference in price is due to higher transportation costs in the north. The price of cut green beans is double what it would be in Regina, Toronto or Montreal. I am not at all suggesting that the transportation costs are not legitimate, but I am asking the committee to look for ways and means for sharing the transportation costs amongst the entire population of Canada. This could be done partly through equalized freight rates and partly through subsidized freight rates so that the person who lives in Inuvik is not victimized because of geography.

In a place like Fond du Lac in northern Saskatchewan a quart of milk costs 94 cents because of the air freight. What family on a low or medium income can supply the children with a sufficient quantity of a basic necessity at 94 cents a quart? In Buffalo Narrows it is 44 cents a quart, which is 12 cents more than the price where it originates. Surely some equalization of the cost of distributing goods to the people from one coast to the other is long overdue. Members of Parliament have been fighting these freight rates; farmers, farm associations and the co-operative movement have been fighting them for years.

Another thing—this could almost be considered a crime against humanity—is the cost of beer in Yellowknife, at $4.20 a case.

An hon. Member: What brand?

Mr. Benjamin: Any brand. Of that, $1.25 is the cost of transportation. Why could not the beer drinkers in Ottawa pay a nickel a case more and lessen the cost for beer in Yellowknife?

Last September, when the election campaign was in full swing, a great deal was being said by consumers, politicians and many others regarding food prices. On September 19 the Minister of Finance made a statement in this city which was reported in the Ottawa Citizen by Mike Pasternak. He quotes the Minister of Finance as saying:

> Food prices will continue to climb and there is little the federal government can do to control them.

At that time the Minister of Finance was a member of a majority government. If he was right then, I would like to know why the government put a motion on the order paper proposing a committee of the House of Commons to look into food prices. If there was little that the federal government could do about it in September, why bother now? The article goes on to quote the minister as follows:

> I'm afraid we're in for higher prices—that's all there is to it.

Now, why is the government submitting this motion to the House?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. That particular report was denied by me and the denial was carried by Canadian Press about three hours later.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that. They did not carry the denial in Regina, 1,854 miles from here, but they did carry the original story. If the Minister of Finance was misquoted, that is the best news I have had all night. But, Mr. Speaker, it has also done away with about ten minutes of my speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: That is the best news we have had all night.

Mr. Benjamin: However, that is not going to stop me. I should like to know, before I read further from this clipping, if the Minister of Finance says that everything in this article is incorrect. He may just indicate by a nod. Is the entire story wrong?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): No, just that statement.

Mr. Benjamin: Then we will go on to the juicier parts. The minister is reported to have said that a food shortage is causing prices to escalate. A food shortage in Canada, Mr. Speaker? We are up to our backsides in wheat and barley, tomatoes and potatoes, beef and pork. We have a food shortage in Canada, Mr. Speaker? I should like to know about that. Except during wartime we have always been able to bring in more than sufficient food to meet our needs. I should like the Minister of Finance to explain about the food shortage in Canada and how it is causing prices to escalate. He should explain that to the committee if requested to appear as a witness. The other red herring the Minister of Finance threw out last September 19 was, I suspect, the biggest red herring that has ever been thrown out with regard to food prices. According to this report he said:

• (2130)

> I ask myself whether people in Canada would put up with rationing in peacetime.

Mr. Speaker, even if the minister were correct, let me point out that the productive capability of the farmers of this country is unmatched by those of countries anywhere in the world. We are second to none as food producers. Let him ask his colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang), who has been paying farmers not to grow food. I repeat, we are unmatched in our ability to produce food. Considering that, let me say the minister threw out a red herring on September 19 by saying that if we were even to contemplate or implement any kind of price control, price freeze or regulation, the result would be rationing. That red herring is redder than most and smells more than most.

I hope the minister is willing to volunteer to appear as a witness before the committee and explain why any kind of control, regulation or investigation of food price or review of price increases could come close to causing rationing. Let me quote further what the Minister of Finance is reported to have said. The minister was comparing Canada to the United States which has wage and price restraints, and he said:

—prices in Canada other than food, but including housing, have risen less than in the United States—

You will notice that he said "other than food".

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Benjamin: I continue:

—and far less than any other country in the industrialized world.

Again, he was speaking of items other than food. Then he said:

That is very little comfort to the ordinary Canadian but it happens to be a fact—

As if the average Canadian did not already know that. Then he said:

It also is an answer to those who say price and wage controls would be an immediate solution.

I do not know, but judging from what little I do know, and I am not an economist, I do not think price and wage controls would bring an immediate solution. I think that for a number of reasons. First, if you try to control wages only, without controlling incomes generally, you will be a born loser, especially if you try to implement those controls. Such a wage freeze has been mentioned a number of times by members of the official opposition and also, I believe, by some on the government side. It seems passing strange to me that every time those people have spoken about controls, they have always spoken about prices and wages. We have yet to hear some of those people say something about prices and incomes generally.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: When we say incomes, Mr. Speaker, we mean all forms of income. When we speak of incomes, we mean incomes that start at the top, the incomes of financial institutions and incomes derived from exorbitant interest rates. It is these interest rates that make supermarkets all the more expensive to build. Those interest rates add to the food costs of Canadian consumers. They are interest rates that food corporations are willing to pay because they can pass them on to Mrs. Joe Citizen who is shopping in the shopping centre in her town or city.

High interest rates have not been a deterrent in the building of more shopping centres. We need more shopping centres in my city like we need a hole in the head, but we are getting more. You can go to any one of them on a mid-week afternoon and fire a cannon down the deserted aisles lined with goods and not hit anybody. You may find two clerks standing there, but that is all.

There you will find a large building, heavily capitalized and carrying a high interest rate. It is not being used for a number of hours several days each week. And what does the food industry do? Those great free enterprisers that my friends in the old parties support and make excuses for, they build more shopping centres and pass on their increased costs by increasing the cost of food, thus increasing the cost of living for consumers.

I hope the committee will bring in specific recommendations for both immediate and long term action in the area of transportation costs. One recommendation which might apply in the short run is for the immediate establishment of a prices review board; at least such a board could examine prices. The government could, when necessary, impose selective controls. If the situation became bad enough there ought to be controls right across the board on incomes, beginning with those at the highest levels. I submit that the incomes of the presidents of the food chains should be the first to be controlled. Let us work our way down from there, and the last person we need worry about is the woman working on the cash register at minimum wages in the supermarkets. Such people ought to be the last to be considered in the imposition of income controls.

Much has been said about the middleman. I refer to an article in the Regina Leader-Post of September 13 under the byline of Dave Thomas. This is a Canadian Press story. It reads:

Processors, packagers and distributors are by far the biggest culprits in the continuous climb of food prices, the agriculture department said Tuesday.

I am presuming that means the federal Department of Agriculture. I hope the committee will ask the new Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to appear as a witness. It had better ask the old one to appear as well, because he was the minister when members of his department said this. They pointed out who are the main culprits in the continuing climb in food prices. According to this report, food prices rose by 7.4 per cent between August, 1971, and August, 1972. A departmental bulletin placed the blame for most of the rise in food prices on the industry's middlemen. The article reads, speaking about the bulletin:

—processors and dealers account for 64 per cent of the $2.8 billion increase in farm food prices since 1961, with farmers themselves benefiting from only 36 per cent.

I notice that the federal Department of Agriculture disagreed with the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, who said in an election announcement that increased prices at the farm level were largely to blame. Again, Mr. Speaker, I think the committee should ask the present Minister of Agriculture and the former minister to appear before it, and the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) as well as the former minister. It should also ask the middlemen to appear, to justify their share of the increase in food prices that they enjoyed between 1961 and 1971.

If the previous House of Commons and Senate Committee examined this question up to 1966, that is fine; we will look into it with regard to the time after 1966. If the Batten commission on the Prairies has looked at the situation in the prairie provinces, that is fine; let us look into the situation affecting the rest of Canada, especially since 1966. I tend to think that the bulletin put out by the Department of Agriculture last September is largely correct. I think the department pointed to the main culprit responsible for rising food prices.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are ready to rise and cut me off. I hope the committee will report back to the House on the items I have mentioned.

Mr. Charles E. Haliburton (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, like so many hon. members who have spoken in this debate, I am rising for my first speech in this House. I rise with a great deal of humility. It is a great distinction to speak here. However, the degree of humility I feel has been somewhat lessened in the last two or three weeks, I must confess; it has been lessened by the debates I have listened to in this House. It seems to me, as a new member, that perhaps that degree of statesmanship and wisdom that I had expected to find here is not entirely present.

I was interested the other evening to hear the leader of the New Democratic Party indicate on a television broadcast that in his opinion the members of the party I support are obsessed with power and that the entire program of my party, as evident during the proceedings of the House, was aimed at gaining power.

An hon. Member: You are right there.

Mr. Benjamin: Don't apologize.

• (2140)

Mr. Haliburton: Obsessed may be putting it a little strongly, but I would say that the members of this party are concerned about the quality of leadership which this House and this country is receiving.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Haliburton: It has now been several weeks since this session began. This party has made every effort to facilitate the business of the House. Our suggestions have been ignored. On each occasion we have ended up with a fairly lengthy debate.

There is another matter which was mentioned by the leader of the New Democratic Party. It seemed to be more or less an afterthought. He said that his party will do everything in its power to ensure that the committee which is to be established will bring in some concrete results. I listened with interest to the members of that party to try to filter out the concrete results which they hope will result from the committee. As nearly as I can tell, the objective they seek is the establishment of a prices or wages review board. That may be of help but, as has been pointed out, there was the prices and incomes commission which only recently retired, and the continuing task force which is presumably operating and advising the government on this matter.

What policy does this government have with regard to rising food costs and inflation in general? Does the government propose to put its future policy in the hands of this parliamentary committee which will, quite properly, be made up of representatives of all parties in this House? Do they intend to call on the opposition, which will comprise the majority of that committee, to advise them on policy in these circumstances? Are we being led by a government which calls on the opposition to give them their program? If that is the case, it is high time the government acknowledged that that is their position and moved over to make room for a party that has its own policies.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Haliburton: Why is a committee being established? I suggest that the reason is lack of any cohesive or coherent program on the part of the government. They are asking this committee to give them a program.

I intended to speak on why the time should be limited for this committee to bring in its report. In view of the circumstances in this House we are not speaking of a continuing committee in terms of one which will be operating for a very lengthy period. The members of the committee would do well to consider that they will have, at most, three months or six months to bring forward their final report. If it is possible for a committee to bring in a meaningful preliminary report after 60 days, it should be possible to bring in its final report very shortly after that.

During the course of this debate many members have spoken about one particular price or another and compared it to other prices. I do not intend to involve myself in that aspect of the matter. Contrary to what the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Guay) said a few moments ago about the uselessness of this debate, I think it is incumbent upon this House to provide some ideas and guidelines for the committee.

If the findings of the committee are to be effective or valid, the committee will have to deal with a very broad area of policies, not just food prices. I am sure that members opposite realize that food prices cannot be dealt with in isolation. They are a product of an economic policy of the government. Unless the committee is prepared to look into the entire economic policy of the government, and unless the government is prepared to review its entire economic policy, the deliberations of this committee will be a wasted effort, certainly as far as any short-term effects on food prices are concerned.

If the committee is going to determine the reason for the rise in food costs, how can it justify ignoring the rise in the cost of shelter which has increased 4 per cent more than the cost of food in the past year? The rise in the cost of food is serious, but it cannot be viewed in isolation. There are short-term factors that affect the price of food, such as supply and demand.

A member of the New Democratic Party a few minutes ago mentioned a surplus. Can we imagine a shortage of eggs, chickens, beef and wheat in this country? In fact, we are a net importer of agricultural products. While we do not have a genuine shortage in the sense that we cannot supply our food needs, nevertheless the supply of food is obviously a factor in pricing.

In the past two or three years there has been a price fluctuation in the poultry business. The price is governed by supply and demand. It prompted producers to endeavour to create marketing boards and concur in the government's proposal for the creation of marketing boards. That certainly has beneficial effects on the agricultural community which specializes in those products. However, far from being any rip-off, it will take some years before the poultry producers are able to recoup the losses they suffered in the past two or three years when prices were disastrously low.

Strangely enough, Canada is experiencing a shortage of potatoes. The price is indicative of this. Obviously, the government had some difficulty in programming wheat production. This was brought to the attention of the government and the public. The price of wheat is governed by short-term factors such as supply and demand; this is well known.

Previous speakers mentioned the impact of transportation costs on food. As a member from the maritime provinces, I know that is a substantial factor. That is one reason we in the Maritimes feel our cost of living is higher than it is in most areas of Canada. It is certainly higher than in the large centres where distribution is centralized and, therefore, more economical. Transportation problems in transporting food and other goods affect the cost of living in outlying areas. This is aggravated by rationalizing railroads and trucking service and diminishing production. The growing multiplicity of regulations affects both rail and road transportation. All these factors in fact cut off effective competition because these areas of endeavour are controlled as my friends to the left would like to have them controlled. The effect of these controls in the transportation industry has been, obviously, the limitation of competition and increases in prices.

Another factor to be considered is the increase in wages in the service industries, and by service industries I refer to services in the food industry. I have in mind the $6 per hour figure for meat cutters. One hon. gentleman in the NDP apparently misunderstood that comment in that he felt it referred to somebody in a meat packing plant. Let me point out to him that it had reference to the horrible practice of large food chains employing meat cutters at $6 to $8 an hour. Certainly that is to be resented by a wage earner getting by on a minimum wage. If a meat cutter is getting $6 or $8 an hour for mincing 25 pounds of hamburger, one can imagine the effect on the price the store charges.

Another factor mentioned during my presence in the House by a member of the Creditiste party was the effect of taxes levied on our citizens by the federal government. These taxes have increased at a fantastic rate over the past few years and they have a direct bearing on food prices because they have a direct bearing on wages. Anyone who pays tax on profit or on wages will require larger profits or larger take-home pay in order to pay the higher tax. Indeed, anyone with an ounce of sense can readily appreciate that a wage earner or a businessman earning a salary or making a profit of $10,000 a year and paying increased tax must organize his affairs in such a way that his take-home pay is not affected. The only way he can do that is by demanding a higher wage or increased profits.

If I understood correctly the statistics I read, the price of food increased from 1961 to 1972 at an average rate in the vicinity of 5 per cent or 6 per cent. From 1961 to 1965 the food index increased by about 10 per cent; during 1967 it increased about 8 per cent, in 1968 by about 4 per cent and in 1969 by approximately 4 per cent. I hasten to say that these figures are fairly rough. In 1970 the food price index increased by about 3 per cent, and in 1972 it increased by 8.6 per cent. These increases are substantial.

Let us compare these increases with the increases in federal revenues. I might say that these increases have a direct bearing on the gross incomes people require in order to pay the additional tax. As I understand it, in 1969 the revenue of the government was $10.1 billion. In 1970 this increased to $12.3 billion. According to my calculation this is an increase of 23 per cent. In 1971, government revenues increased to $12.8 billion, an increase of about 4 per cent; a very modest increase. In 1972 it increased to $14.2 billion, an increase of 10 per cent.

With such an increase in revenue there must be an increase in gross wages earned in order to meet increased taxes and maintain the same take-home pay. Businessmen must also increase their profits. This increase is required by food chains, farmers, meat packing plants and wholesalers in order to meet increased taxes. I submit that this is one of the most important aspects of increasing costs.

I realize I am running out of time, but I should like to mention one other important aspect. This matter was referred to by another hon. member. As the representative of South Western Nova, this aspect is of particular interest in my area. I refer to increasing costs in terms of food as related to the multiplicity of government regulations. I realize that hon. members, whether they sit on this side or the other side of you, Mr. Speaker, may have a great deal of difficulty controlling regulations which are largely, I suspect, conceived in the minds of civil servants or those in the employ of the government who believe it is their duty to protect those people and products within their areas of responsibility.

As an example, let me refer to the multiplicity of regulations in effect in the fishing industry. They are forcing many small fish producing firms out of business. Most of these firms are in competition with each other. I have even heard it said that it is government policy that such regulations should have the effect over a period of a few years of reducing the number of firms in the fish business in Canada to five. At the present time there are hundreds of these firms. What is to become of these independent fish producers? What will become of all these independent agents presently competing in terms of prices paid to the fishermen and prices paid at the marketplace?

One other illustration of inflationary prices is that in respect of the cost of fishing boats. It came to my attention recently that a lobster fisherman has been paying in the neighbourhood of $10,000 for the construction of his boat. Regulations recently put into effect, which according to steamship inspectors have nothing to do with safety and are not wanted by fishermen or builders, have resulted in ships deemed to be over 15 tons costing about 15 per cent more. In one fell swoop another $1,500 is taken out of the pockets of the fishermen who are only earning about $5,000 a year.

I would ask the committee to consider carefully the effect of multiplying government regulation in relation to the increasing cost of food and of doing business in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The question is on the main motion as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The main motion is carried on division.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As amended.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The main motion as amended is carried on division.

Motion (Mr. Gray) agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF DISAPPEARANCE OF CERTAIN JOBS

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, recently in answer to my question concerning the apparent disappearance of approximately 3,800 jobs for which the government claimed credit through DREE projects, the minister said he owed it to the public to explain what occurred. Pursuant to the minister's professed intentions in this regard, I have some suggestions by which more information could be made available from his department.

I suggest that section 16 of the Regional Development Incentives Act be amended so that reports can be issued every month regardless of whether or not parliament is sitting. If DREE is going to turn out press releases outlining the various new jobs allegedly created, information should also be made available showing whether companies refused initial offers of the approved grants or whether they were withdrawn by the department at a later date. Monthly reports should have a table showing, by province, the net accepted projects, expected eligible capital costs, the estimated expected new direct jobs and the estimated incentives. The minister should also follow the advice offered to his predecessor and prepare a table showing regional levels of unemployment in relation to the amount of grants awarded in each region of the country. Not that unemployment levels should be the sole criterion, but they are relevant factors.

Reports pursuant to section 16 should be published each month in the same way as statistics on employment and statistics on the consumer price index, to form part of a co-ordinated total economic picture. Efforts should be made to determine if Statistics Canada could assess the DREE figures. I would think the minister would be glad to have Statistics Canada do this because it would give his department more credibility; something this government and this department needs badly. There is something incongruous about DREE assessing its own performance.

Mr. Speaker, speaking of performance, and owing an explanation to the public, may I say through you to the minister that we are waiting for an explanation of exactly what he means by the term "decentralization". The switching of bureaucrats from Ottawa to the local level could simply be an empty exercise unless accompanied by a restructuring of present programs. There are qualified people at the scene who know local conditions and what needs to be done. Shipping out DREE personnel and retaining highly paid consultants is unnecessary. I believe that municipal, civic and regional planning agencies should be invited to submit local development plans to DREE, which could facilitate plans which have merit by dealing through the provinces and expediting with them development schemes.

Special area agreements are administered by joint planning committees, with representation from the federal and provincial governments. If meaningful decentralization is to take place, it would be well to give municipalities greater representation on these joint planning committees. The federal government should be prudent in maintaining a proper check through DREE on the funds allocated through special area agreements. However, its role should be more of a conciliator and facilitator between the province and the municipality instead of playing the role of an economic czar. There must be more co-ordination between DREE and other federal and provincial government departments and development agencies. Transportation problems must be taken into account. For example, DREE cannot work to expand the economy of this nation if other government departments are trying to slow it down, as was the case when the former minister was in charge of this department.

It may be necessary to establish a more independent review board, like an advisory board to a bank or a trust company, instead of the present quasi-judicial one. While the actual power of an advisory board can be downplayed, its influence must be a factor in the department's decision-making, otherwise why was it formed? In any event, such an arrangement should be improved.

In expanding the IDB pursuant to the proposal outlined in the Speech from the Throne, the minister should consider co-ordinating it more closely with DREE in order that DREE could use the expertise of the IDB both in an advisory and a supervisory capacity. It should be possible to establish a risk capital, or venture capital, division for the IDB using DREE funds. This should be looked into since IDB already has regional organizations, considerable expertise in business practice and advisory capabilities; and with the IDB being used in an advisory capacity there is less chance of conflict of interest situations arising.

A new emphasis on massive infrastructure programs for strategic areas must be considered. Infrastructure developments such as roads, port facilities, etc., are tangible assets and remain reasonably permanent inducements and advantages to potential investors, unlike grants which are subject to the vagaries of policy changes, of which this department is a particularly good example.

In summary, there is still a great need for the minister to inform the Canadian public what the new policies of his department are going to involve. I trust that we will not have to wait much longer for a comprehensive announcement in this regard.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to offer my personal congratulations to the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) on assuming the responsibility of regional economic expansion critic for his party in the House of Commons. I am, of course, very pleased to respond to the question which he put to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Jamieson) on January 11 and which he has presented in greater detail this evening.

Specifically, the question relates to the release of information concerning incentive grants from DREE to business or private companies which were offered but which were subsequently withdrawn. The minister in his reply referred briefly to the difficulty of determining accurately on a projection basis jobs which may be created when companies are made an offer of assistance. Certainly, in making public these offers the department refers to them specifically as offers. Rates relating to capital costs, the expenditure per job and other relative statistics are disclosed. I think this is a desirable objective.

Mr. Speaker, each offer is subject to conditions specified in the Regional Development Incentives Act. Therefore, there are instances where the applicant may decide for his own reasons not to proceed. But, more important, there are instances where the department is required to withdraw an offer because the company has not lived up to the conditions. This is a measure of protection to the public purse and it is the reason for publishing and distributing monthly reports to parliament containing summary statistics sections on figures of total capital costs, incentives and expected employment of those offers which were subsequently withdrawn and declined.

In respect of explaining the decentralization policy announced by the minister, which was not the subject of the question raised by the hon. member, I am sure that in the very near future we will have an opportunity to elaborate on this new policy of decentralization. Also, so far as the new policy of the department is concerned, I am sure we will have occasion to work very closely with other interested members. I am sure, also, from the question asked by the hon. member for Central Nova, that he is interested in DREE programs. We are all interested, as is evident from questions and suggestions such as those of the hon. member. I am sure DREE will be a good program and that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will serve its purpose in helping the non-developed areas of this country.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—MAINTENANCE OF EMPLOYMENT FOR INDIANS AND CLEARING OF RIGHT OF WAY

Mr. Walter Firth (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments about the Hire North project which involves a group of labourers working under the able leadership of Rudy Steiner out of Hay River. These people work on the clearing of the right of way over a stretch of highway between Fort Simpson and Camsell Bend, a distance of approximately 50 miles.

A few weeks ago I was concerned, in respect of the Hire North project, that it would turn into a "fire north project" as some people were being laid off. I am now informed that many people are going back to work, although not necessarily on the Hire North project. These people originally worked mainly with hand tools on a 49 or 50-mile stretch; they were three months ahead of schedule and therefore worked their way out of work. The people employed on the job were northern natives who were very proud of the work they were doing, and justly so.

I am sure that given the time, the money and some equipment the native peoples of the Northwest Territories can build that highway from Fort Simpson to Tuktoyaktuk on the Arctic Ocean. These people are very proud of the work they have been doing, and they have been doing very careful work because it is in a part of the country which they know best. Many of them are familiar with the bush and are well trained to look after themselves in the bush. I should like to make it very clear that I and the people who are on the project know very well that they can build this highway themselves using common sense and northern experience.

I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker, in asking some very important questions of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Marchand). Let me point out that it seems a little ironical to me, or perhaps somewhat strange, that a Metis on this side of the House should be asking a question of an Indian on the other side of the House.

The first question is: On what section of the clearing of the right of way will Hire North be allowed to proceed with the work, and could this information be passed along to Hire North as soon as possible?

My second question is: How much money will Hire North be allowed for the vocational training part of the project, and could this information also be passed along to Hire North as soon as possible? This information is most important as Hire North will have to obtain some equipment on the site to carry out this training program and this must be done during the winter months when the land is frozen, for very obvious reasons.

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the hon. member that I do not have the specific answers to the two last questions he has raised this evening. Perhaps we could consult a little further on the exact nature of his intervention tonight. However, I will obtain the exact information and pass it on to the hon. member as well as to the people whom he wished to be informed.

Hire North, an agency organized by the Northwest Territories government to employ native people on the Mackenzie Highway project, is now employing some 30 native people on clearing and other labour-intensive work on the highway between Fort Simpson and Camsell Bend. This is the work force that will be built up after the Christmas work break which started on December 16 to allow workers to return home for Christmas. Work was completed on December 15, 1972, on the original contract for clearing the Mackenzie Highway between Fort Simpson and Camsell Bend by Hire North and it provided during this time 8,517 man-days of employment. This provided a total of $346,915 in wages and benefits.

Along with the rather obvious benefits of Hire North such as the wages paid to the native people, some very important intangible benefits arising from the work experience have accrued to the people employed on the project. I believe my hon. friend mentioned this. Hire North is also being used as a training project to assist native people to adapt to the needs of a wage earning environment.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has been very pleased with the way in which this project has succeeded. I am also pleased that the hon. member has expressed a similar view on behalf of the native people in that area. We are very encouraged by the results of this program and we have every intention of carrying on the program throughout the winter.

YOUTH—OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INDICATION OF CRITERIA FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF LOCAL SELECTION COMMITTEES

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on January 16 I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) to provide terms of reference which would indicate what criteria the government would follow in establishing a local selection committee for the Opportunities for Youth Program. So far, to my knowledge, no criteria have been given and no answer has been given. I want to raise the question of OFY tonight, not on that narrow point but on the larger matter of the purpose of the program and the ability of parliament, which is paying the piper, to gain at least some inkling of the tune.

From the beginning this program has been kept away from parliament. This year, for the third straight year, it was announced outside the House. There has never been an attempt by the government to come to parliament with a description of the purposes of the program or of its performance. Indeed, the government cannot come before parliament with a full report because the government refuses to give a statutory base to the program. It exists at the whim of the government, a whim with a big budget but with no more accountability and no more assurance of survival than the Prime Minister's assurance that we have licked inflation.

No matter how glowing the terms in which the government might describe OFY, it remains a program it refuses to embrace. It is an orphan, disclaimed at its birth and in perpetual danger of abandonment. It is a shocking situation that the only time this program comes before the House of Commons—and it is a program which will cost almost $40 million this year—is when the opposition parties bring it here either by questions or by debate on one of our days.

Those in the country who believe in the principles of a program like OFY should look with unease upon the persistent refusal of the government to grant it permanent status. No one who remembers the emasculation of the Company of Young Canadians can avoid the apprehension that on the day that OFY no longer serves the private and partisan designs of the government it will simply disappear. That is one danger with the present program, the danger that it will be done away with in the dark of night by a government whose highest principle is its own survival.

Another danger is that in some naïve corners of the land there might actually persist the belief that the program is in some way related to an attack on unemployment. Indeed, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced that the government had programs up its sleeve for young Canadians he made explicit reference to job creating potential. He struck the chord and, as so often has happened, his ministers and minions have dutifully sung it.

OFY is the flag ship of the government's attack on unemployment among the young—and not only the flagship; it is the whole fleet. But it is in an entirely different ocean. The OFY program has little or nothing to do with the crisis in unemployment among the young. It is an excuse for inaction, not an instrument for action. To argue, as the government does, that it is an effective answer to youth unemployment is fraudulent. As an innovative social program it has considerable potential; as an attack upon unemployment it is a fraud.

It is aimed at providing jobs for the young in summer. Look at its rate of success in the summer of 1972. In April, 1972, the unemployment rate, seasonally adjusted, for the age group 14 to 24 years was 10.2 per cent. The next month the program began and the rate of unemployment went up to 10.8 per cent. In August, 1972, the effect of the summer employment program was most clear; the rate of unemployment in that age group soared to 12.1 per cent, the highest in over ten years and double the national total of 6.7 per cent for the same period.

Last year some 30,000 young people were listed as being employed as a result of OFY. That is a figure that is almost invisible in the shadow of the 1,306,000 young people described by the then minister of manpower and immigration as intending to seek employment in that summer. There is no way of knowing how many of those 30,000 would have found other jobs, including some kind of seasonal work such as that on farms which went without takers last summer and work with volunteer social agencies which, because they cannot compete with OFY rates, went without young workers in parts of Canada last summer.

The stated figure of 30,000 jobs is negligible enough in light of the total number seeking work. It might be more negligible still if we had a chance to examine the workings of individual programs. Members of Parliament have asked for a full evaluation of projects, but in keeping with the Liberal principle of denying information to parliament only a partial assessment has been provided—a sample of less than one-sixth of the total projects.

In a very serious sense the OFY program contributes to the record levels of unemployment among young Canadians because it gives the government an excuse to do nothing concrete. Whenever they are pressed about youth unemployment, they point with empty pride to OFY. In that sense the program has been of much more use to the government than it has been to the young people of the country.

As a first priority we in this party demand that the government stops the sham of pretending that OFY is a remedy to youthful unemployment. Instead, as a start we want the government to work with the private sector and the provinces to develop a seasonal employment program that works and that provides the basis on which grant and incentive programs might work. We propose the establishment of a Canadian youth employment directorate whose initial responsibility would be to determine the causes of youth unemployment and to work out practical programs which meet the needs of the unemployed. That approach would begin with the recognition that youth unemployment remains a Canadian crisis, whereas the government today treats it as a matter which mere press agentry can dismiss.

But if it is a fraud in the fight against unemployment, OFY remains an important innovative program, an instrument to enlist both the creative proposals and the energy of young people across the land. Clearly the program should continue. But is should continue without the burden of its disguise, without the pretence that it is designed to do something it patently cannot do. We in this party particularly approve the reliance upon local initiative and ingenuity. It is a principle we introduced into Canadian legislation with the ARDA program and we hate to see it abused in ARDA or in OFY.

If the government would stop pretending the purpose of OFY is to fight unemployment and would recognize its great potential to put money where the needs are, the program can succeed. We want to see some major modifications. In rural areas in particular there should be a much greater attempt to tie in to the recognized priorities of the regions where the projects proceed. Everywhere there should be an attempt to have projects staffed and inspired by people who know local needs because they are local residents. When projects are seen to work, there should be substantial attention given to ensuring that they return next year and are not mere one-summer wonders.

As a start, the government should bring the program to parliament, ensure the impartiality and the permanence of OFY by enshrining it in statute, announce new programs in the House of Commons and let parliament, as the representative of all the people, participate creatively in the development of guidelines and priorities.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner) pointed out in his press release of January 15, 1973, this summer's program will mainly emphasize benefits to the communities. Our experience of last year with some local advisory committees will be repeated, but on a wider scale, to involve more people. Young people and other designated persons will be called upon to take part in these local advisory committees, which will provide an additional source of consultation for the review and eventual selection of the projects.

Officials of the Department of the Secretary of State, in co-operation with representatives of the provincial governments, have started to identify areas within each provinces where it would be possible to set up local advisory committees. The selection of these areas will be based on economic and geographical grounds. The committees, where any, will be responsible for providing the officials of the Opportunities for Youth program with additional information on priority needs and on existing services in the communities they represent.

To ensure that these committees really represent the interests of the people they serve, spokesmen for youth, for communities as well as for provincial governments will be invited to participate in these committees. Their thorough knowledge of their surroundings will enable them to determine the primary needs of their community and the resources which will be available. Moreover, representatives elected to sit on these committees will already have an experience of working with youth as well as of social service activities. As far as possible, we shall add representatives from groups which benefit from services provided through community projects of Opportunities for Youth.

Mr. Speaker, within the few minutes left I shall not have the opportunity of taking up the challenge that my hon. friend has sent me and saying more about the Opportunities for Youth program but I can assure him of one thing: I accepted to become affiliated to a party because I believe in the earnestness of this party, and I shall not accept that this program be used as a cover by a political party. It will be—and I am now committing myself—a service reserved for youth and the whole people of our country. During the weeks to come I shall have the opportunity of speaking at some length about the Opportunities for Youth program.

At 10:27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—STATEMENT ON CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING PARTICIPATION IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION FOLLOWING CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, last night President Nixon said that a cease-fire in Viet Nam has been agreed upon. The government is profoundly relieved at this historic news and profoundly grateful for it, as I am sure are all members of the House and all the Canadian people. At long last, it seems, agreement has been reached to stop the fighting in Viet Nam. The way to peace will then lie open. All Canadians will welcome this.

It is now necessary to decide what contribution Canada can make to ensure that peace does indeed come to Viet Nam. What is now in our interests to do, and what can we do effectively? These are the questions we face.

Canada, in our view, will also wish to help in the immense task of relief and reconstruction in Viet Nam. The government has already announced its willingness to do so. The destruction in both North and South Viet Nam is immense. Canada has some experience in providing aid to South Viet Nam but none, of course, in North Viet Nam. The government does not yet know what may be asked of us nor how a larger Canadian program may relate to the efforts of other countries and international organizations. We will have to find the answers to these questions as quickly as Viet Nam returns to conditions in which aid can be effective. As always, we will offer to do what we are best able to do. We will be willing to help in this task anywhere in Viet Nam where we are welcome and where we can be useful.

On November 2 last year, when it seemed a cease-fire agreement was near, the government made a proposal. That proposal was intended to meet the apparent concern of the parties that there should be some form of international presence immediately on the ground from the time of the cease-fire. The proposal was that, for the initial period, Canada would be prepared to place at the disposal of the new international supervisory body the Canadian delegation to the existing international commission, the ICC, as it is commonly called, augmented as necessary.

Our concern was to enable the initial cease-fire arrangements to proceed without delay if the parties so wished. That is very much the problem now.

The government subsequently stated publicly the conditions and considerations on which it would require assurances before it could take a decision on more complete participation in a new commission. It told the parties what these conditions were.

We have only just received the documents which embody the agreement between the United States and North Viet Nam. There has been no time yet to study them carefully, as they will have to be studied. A first look suggests that the conditions and considerations which we communicated to the parties have to some degree contributed to the terms which have been agreed on for the establishment of a new commission.

These are complicated and important documents. It will not be possible to say how far they meet our conditions until they are carefully studied. We already know that an immediate answer to that question will not be possible, if only because we are dealing with documents which have so far been initialed by only two parties. They will not be signed by all four parties until Saturday of this week, only hours before the agreement envisages an international presence on the ground.

In short the situation is this: the government is faced with a choice. It can accept, with whatever reservations are necessary, the role the parties have defined. We are capable of doing so. But this would mean committing Canada to full participation before we knew with any certainty to what extent Canada's conditions are met. At the other extreme, we could refuse to participate because we do not yet know to what degree those conditions are met. But to do this would risk our standing in the way of an end to the fighting, which all Canadians ardently desire to see ended.

The government has concluded that both these extremes are unacceptable. It has therefore decided that when the documents have been accepted by all four parties, and when all four parties have clearly invited Canada to take part, the government will then confirm that Canada is ready to take part initially. This initial participation will be consistent with the position announced on November 2 last.

Canada will be prepared to serve on this limited basis for an initial period of 60 days. Canada will be prepared, during that period, to do what it can to discharge the obligations which would flow from full membership in the new commission. A full and formal reply to the invitation for full membership, however, will have to await a number of things: first, it will have to await a very thorough study and analysis of all the agreements and of the full nature of the parties' commitment to the agreements. It will also have to await the lessons of our experience of participation in the initial stages. It is no secret to anyone that we have serious doubts about what we are being asked to undertake. Our more formal decision will have to await our judgment of the degree to which our doubts turn out to be justified in practice. We will form that judgment in the initial period of participation, and our full reply to the invitation will be given, with whatever reservations we may find necessary, before the end of that 60-day period.

Meanwhile, let there be no misunderstanding about what Canada will be doing in Viet Nam. We will not be there to keep the peace ourselves; that is for the parties to the cease-fire. What we can do is observe how the parties are fulfilling their obligations under the cease-fire, and report upon this. From time to time, we may be able to help them through mediation. But it is not up to us whether or not there will be peace in Viet Nam. If the parties fulfil their obligations, there can be peace; if they do not, then nothing Canada or any other country on the commission can do will prevent the cease-fire from being broken.

The government will want these interim conclusions to be discussed in parliament. It will introduce a resolution to provide a basis for this debate. Meanwhile, it will provide the cease-fire documents to all parties in the House as quickly as it can. When everyone has had a reasonable opportunity to consider these texts, a time for debate will be fixed by agreement of the House leaders. For its part, the government would be ready to have this debate take place some time next week.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Viet Nam have endured beyond measure a tragedy of indescribable proportions. Every Canadian prays that the cease-fire will lead to a lasting peace. We can do nothing less than seek some means of contributing effectively to such a peace and to the reconstruction of that suffering region.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, to the remarks just made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) I want to add that we all heartily welcome the announcement of peace in Viet Nam. This is a great day for humanity as a whole. Statements made from Washington and Hanoi meet the aspirations of all inhabitants of our planet and also of Canadians who, like their brethren throughout the world, now have greater faith than ever in negotiation as the real means of settling conflicts.

We hope and believe, Mr. Speaker, that the agreement reached yesterday in Paris will bring to Viet Nam a durable peace extending to all Southeast Asia and that the agreement will contribute to the future of peace throughout the world.

Such objectives incite us, as Canadians, to co-operate with other nations in ensuring that the agreement is carried out and in building up peace in Viet Nam and Indochina. This last concern must make us accept Canada's participation to the international conference which, under the very terms of the cease-fire agreement, must be held within the next 30 days. We would then sit with China, France, the Soviet Union and Great Britain.

Before agreeing to any participation by Canada in an international body in order to see that the peace agreement is observed, we have the responsibility to make sure about the nature and effectiveness of the role which would be ours.

We have a particular responsibility to assume toward all our fellow Canadians, our soldiers, our peace officers, all other countries and, precisely, toward our eventual partners.

Our responsibility in the highly humanitarian task of building a lasting peace urges us, with regard to our participation in the peace control commission, to act with due reflection. We ponder over the pertinent points. It behoves the present government to enlighten the Canadian parliament, the Canadian people, even before a decision is taken. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I welcome with enthusiasm the suggestion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that a debate be held in this House. In anticipation of this debate, I should like to mention a few questions on which the Secretary of State could reflect and to which he could perhaps give us an answer.

It seems to me that the government has had ample time to consider all the implications of the situation. For months now, the Department of External affairs has endeavoured to anticipate the problems involved in our eventual role in Viet Nam. We therefore ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs when and how the last consultations were held with the Canadian ambassador in Paris and in Washington. To what extent did the political authorities of South Viet Nam participate in the Kissinger-Le Duc Tho agreement, notably with regard to the presence of North Viet Namese troops in South Viet Namese territory?

Does the Secretary of State know that the Paris agreement deals essentially with Viet Nam and little or not at all with Cambodia and Laos? Could he, in his statement, comment on the attitude of the government in this regard?

Could the minister inform the House and the Canadian people about the conditions of Canada's participation in the peace control operations in Vietnam, when and how, on each occasion, have those conditions been expressed and to what parties to the conflict? To this day, which party has accepted or refused the conditions put forward by Canada? In each case, what were those conditions?

More specifically still, to this day what position was taken by the outside organization to whom report is to be made? Will this organization be able to intervene in case of disputes?

What is exactly the clause of free access to every part of Viet Nam? Can this free access be extended to Cambodia and Laos?

Where does the present government stand as to the duration of a mission in Viet Nam?

Could the Department of External Affairs be getting ready to accept a provisional mandate as to the nature and duration of this mission so that it could later decide to continue or to withdraw?

Which countries will pay the costs of peacekeeping operations? Have representations been made to date in this respect? How many Canadians will be involved in the force?

Is the government aware that Canadian missionaries or others are held prisoners in Viet Nam, Cambodia or Laos? What has the government done in this respect, and what does it intend to do in the near future? If necessary, has Canada contacted Indonesia, Hungary or Poland or will it do so?

These are questions that arose in our minds and also in the minds of a good many Canadians.

We are willing to fulfil our international role and participate in the peace effort, but we want to accomplish our noble duties with the considered responsibility of an autonomous country, knowing why and to what we are committing ourselves.

We do not want Canada to go once more through what it has experienced on the International Control Commission since 1954 or what it has experienced in Cyprus.

The reputation and image of Canada abroad require an enlightened and utterly lucid decision.

[English]

While we rejoice in the achievement of a cease-fire members of the House will note that we feel it necessary to raise several questions as to the terms that would govern Canadian participation in any peacekeeping effort in Indochina. Our party takes the position that not only should Canada be prepared to co-operate with the international community in helping to secure a peace but that we owe it to ourselves and to our brethren across the globe to ensure that our participation be effective and sufficiently potent to guarantee some measure of success. There can be little doubt of our country's direct responsibility to participate in any peacekeeping effort. There can be less doubt about our right as a nation to insist on firm and clearcut conditions to our participation.

Essential to our effective participation is a clearcut position on the part of the minister that this parliament and the people of Canada be taken into the government's confidence with regard to the exact way in which our forces might participate. There is no room for anything aside from an open and honest discussion as to the best way for Canadians to discharge their international responsibilities.

It is clear to me, Mr. Speaker, that we have an opportunity to once again activate the middle power role in world affairs authored by the Hon. Howard Green—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wagner: —and so brilliantly put to work by the late Right Hon. Lester Pearson.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: You laughed too soon.

Mr. Wagner: We must avoid the pious platitudes and naïve hopes that can characterize, all too often, the international efforts that never fully succeed. Our posture must be clearcut and direct. We will have a job to do. We are prepared to do our job. We demand the right to ensure that we can do the job properly. I know that the minister shares with all members of the House the desire for effective participation and successful organization of our peacekeeping effort. I urge him to deal with strength and wisdom in determining the conditions under which Canada will lend its helping hand. In this way members of all parties in the House can join in endorsing and supporting a very necessary and significant gesture on the part of our nation in the interest of a better and more peaceful world for us all.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, the conscience of the whole world has been deeply troubled by the long war in Viet Nam. The whole world can breathe a sigh of relief because this long, bloody, brutal and tragic war is now apparently about to be ended. We are concerned with Canada's contribution to ensure that the peace there is a lasting peace. We can say proudly that Canada has always been ready to make a contribution to assist the world through providing peacekeeping forces and through its efforts in respect of reconstruction in parts of the world devastated by war.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: Therefore we welcome the statement the minister has made. We have been good members of the world community. Although there have been many, many difficulties and many, many doubts, we cannot turn down now the opportunity presented to us to contribute to the maintenance of a stable peace in war-torn Viet Nam.

I am glad, however, that the minister has made it clear that he will look very cautiously into the documents, the conditions and the terms in respect of our contribution. I am glad we are to go there as observers only. I know that the parties there, certainly those with whom I have been in touch recently in North Viet Nam, do not want a military force. What they want is observers to ensure that the peace will be kept but not to make peace themselves nor to intervene in any military sense of the word.

I am more than happy to see that Canada proposes to participate in the reconstruction of both North and South Viet Nam. They have been sorely ravaged in one of the most brutal wars in our history. We should do our part in an effort to build up this wounded country.

The minister mentioned one condition which we think is of the utmost importance. It is absolutely vital that there should be an international authority to whom the members of the commission may report. We suggest that the best possible authority in this regard should be the United Nations or its Security Council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Brewin: I am pleased to see the minister applaud because I really believe the United Nations exists for the purpose of being able to aid in situations like this. It is the expression of the world's conscience, and unless we can build the United Nations we will never have an effective world community.

We in this party are quite determined that no Canadian force should go overseas in any capacity whatever without the approval of this parliament. As I understand the minister's proposal, it is that the matter will be discussed in parliament before that happens. We think parliament is the authority that should determine this matter.

There are one or two other matters I should like to mention, although I realize this is an occasion for a brief rather than a long statement. I agree with what the minister said, that no arrangement, no international machinery, can work without the good will of the people concerned, without the good will of the parties themselves in Viet Nam. As some hon. members know, I recently had the opportunity of talking to government officials in North Viet Nam and I must say I was impressed with the sincerity of their desire to maintain peace and to maintain their belief in the unity of Viet Nam as a country. Their aim remains the reunification of that country. They now say—and I hope and believe they mean what they say—that this will be achieved by a process of national reconciliation, not by force of arms. If that is the attitude of both parties, then let us hope that once foreign troops are removed from the area the Vietnamese themselves will settle their own problems. I believe I can say that the situation will be approached by one side at least with an attitude of good will and a determination to make that aim succeed.

• (1430)

There was some reference in the settlement, and rightly so, to the return of United States prisoners of war in North Viet Nam. We rejoice that they will be allowed to go home quickly. But this reminds us that in addition there are prisoners in South Viet Nam. I am informed that nearly 300,000 persons, mostly political prisoners, are in the jails of South Viet Nam. The solution to that problem must be part of the solution that is sought in this international reconciliation.

Many of us in this House have for many years had a feeling of agony and unhappiness about Viet Nam. We earnestly pray that a new chapter is opening, and we hope that Canada will be able to play a constructive part in that new chapter of history.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in his statement the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has nearly promised us a much more important debate for next week after studying the whole text of the agreement just concluded and giving us copies of it. For these reasons, I do not intend to unduly prolong the time allotted to statements today.

However, my colleagues from the Social Credit Party, all other hon. members and myself were very pleased last night to hear the President of the United States proclaim the end of this war which has been lasting for nearly 30 years now.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has inquired about our contribution when the interested parties will not only ask us to oversee the cease-fire but also and especially to establish peace. In brief, what the parties have requested and what American President Nixon refused was not only the end of the war but mainly the assurance of a durable peace and that this assurance be an example for peace throughout the world.

I have noted that in his statement last night Mr. Nixon used the words "peace with honour" at least six times.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Depending on how they are interpreted the problem is not only to save the American honour but rather to gain the honour of a true peace by ending this war. The Secretary of State for External Affairs does not know exactly what will be the Canadian participation following this war, but it seems however that some decisions have been taken for some time because almost 450 military personnel have already been vaccinated and prepared to be sent to Viet Nam following the signature of this agreement. Therefore, this means that certain conversations have already taken place between Canada and the American government. Since this war has lasted so long I think it should be possible for the present generation to love peace as it has not known anything else but a climate of war.

Of course, many thing have to be rebuilt; surely there are many wounded to cure and readapt. In addition to the 450 troops which Canada can dispatch, it would be desirable to mobilize some doctors and nurses to assist the Vietnamese people in recovering from this war.

Mr. Speaker, when we will know more about the complete text of the agreement which will be signed by the parties concerned, then we will be in a better position to give our opinion, to support, to advise the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs on Canada's participation. I think there should be participation even if it is only a humanitarian participation.

Perhaps indirectly, Canada benefited from that war but I think we should help bring back peace to that important part of the world that is Viet Nam.

As the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner) mentioned a while ago, there still remains the question of Laos and Cambodia. Not too long ago Prince Sihanouk made a rather disturbing statement. I think that those two countries very close to Viet Nam are very important and suffered the backlash of that war. I think we must also be concerned with finding out what they desire in the establishment of that peace and what they are prepared to do.

Everything considered, Mr. Speaker, I think that the next hours or the days to come will allow us to see to what extent each party is anxious to see a true peace in that part of the world.

HOUSING

TABLING OF COMMUNIQUÉ ISSUED FOLLOWING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2) I should like to table in both official languages the communiqué issued yesterday by the federal-provincial conference on housing that was held on January 22 and 23.

AGRICULTURE

CROP DAMAGE, NORTHERN ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the adverse weather conditions which have ruined the grain and vegetable crops of thousands of farmers in the Peace River country of British Columbia and northern Alberta, in view of the inadequate government assistance they have been promised, and in view of the fact this disaster has become a matter of national concern, as indicated in the Globe and Mail this morning, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

• (1440)

That the government immediately take action to assist these and other farmers by ensuring a stable price for grain, compensation payments that reflect true loss, and a moratorium on capital credit payments and interest.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 and requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the hon. member's motion cannot be put.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Yes, (a) a re-assessment of space requirements will be completed by 1974. (b) In 1971 the estimated cost was $300,000. This is due to be revised in 1974. (c) Estimated start: 1974; Estimated completion: 1975.

MANPOWER STRENGTH, CANADIAN FORCES BASE, CORNWALLIS

Question No. 44—Mr. Haliburton:

1. What is the military personnel complement of CFB Cornwallis at present?

2. How many individuals have been trained on the base each year since 1963?

3. How many civil employees have been laid off in each of the past three years?

4. What capital expenditures have been made on the base in each of the past three years?

5. What expenditures have been made in renovations on the base in each of the past three years?

6. What is the projected amount to be spent in the next three years?

7. (a) For what purpose is CFB Cornwallis presently being used (b) are there to be changes in the near future concerning these uses?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): 1. 411.

2. Statistics prior to 1968 are not available. The following number of recruits have received training at CFB Cornwallis: 1969-70, 5,222; 1970-71, 3,736; 1971-72, 2,402; 1972-73, 3,476 (forecast). In addition, 1,500 Sea Cadets undergo training each summer.

3. 1969-70, 22 term and 1 indeterminate; 1970-71, 17 term and 1 indeterminate; 1971-72, 16 term; 1972-73, 152 term (1 Apr-Dec 31).

4. 1969-70, $138,000; 1970-71, $226,000; 1971-72, $930,000; 1972-73, $492,700 (estimated).

5. 1969-70, $639,700; 1970-71, $562,500; 1971-72, $932,300; 1972-73, $954,000 (estimated).

6. The construction and maintenance allotments for the next three years are still under review and no firm figures can be given at this time.

7. (a) CFB Cornwallis provides base support for the Canadian Forces Recruit School, and summer training of Sea Cadets. (b) In an endeavour to realize operation and maintenance savings and therefore increase the cost/effectiveness of a total base support, a continuous review is carried out to plan base posture for the whole of the Candaian Forces. As of this date, no specific recommendation has been formulated in regard to any change in the future of CFB Cornwallis.

*WHEAT—DELIVERY UNDER CONTRACTS WITH MAINLAND CHINA AND THE SOVIET UNION

Question No. 54—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. How many bushels of wheat as of (a) July 30, 1972 (b) December 31, 1972 remained to be delivered under existing contracts with (i) Mainland China (ii) the Soviet Union?

2. At what dates do existing contracts with both Mainland China and the Soviet Union expire?

Hon. Otto Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is as follows: 1. (i) (a) At July 31 110.5 million bushels remained to be delivered against two outstanding contracts with the People's Republic of China, (b) At December 31 98.1 million bushels remained to be delivered against three outstanding contracts with the People's Republic of China, a third contract having been entered into on November 8, (ii) (a) At July 31, 190.2 million bushels remained to be delivered against two outstanding contracts with the U.S.S.R. (b) At December 31 100.1 million bushels remained to be delivered.

2. Existing contracts with the People's Republic of China will have all expired by October 31, 1973. Existing contracts with the U.S.S.R. will have expired by July 31 except for an option to extend shipments of minor quantities of wheat and flour to Cuba to the end of December.

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM

Question No. 236—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Can a person employed by the government, by one of its departments or by any federal Commission be responsible for or sponsor a Local Initiatives Program and, if not, for what reason?

[Translation]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes. However, a person employed by the government, by one of its departments or by any federal Commission is not eligible for financial remuneration for being responsible for or sponsoring a project under the Programme.

CANADA MANPOWER MOBILITY PROGRAM—NUMBER OF APPLICATIONS

Question No. 245—Mr. Leggatt:

1. What was the total number of applications received under the Canada Manpower Mobility program for assistance in the fiscal year ended 1972, by province?

2. How many of these applications were approved, by province?

3. How many of these applications were rejected, by province?

4. What was the total operating cost for the program for the fiscal year ended 1972, by province?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. No records of applications have been kept between March 31, 1969 and June 1, 1972 due to a revised method of maintaining statistics on the program. It is therefore not possible to identify applications during that period which includes the fiscal year ending on March 31, 1972.

PATENTS HELD BY NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL

Question No. 249—Mr. Andre:

1. How many patents are held by or on behalf of the National Research Council?

2. From how many patents are royalties being realized and what was the cumulative amount realized during the fiscal year 1971-72?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): In so far as the National Research Council of Canada and Canadian Patents and Development Limited are concerned, the answer is as follows: 1. As at March 31, 1972, Canadian Patents and Development Limited administered 350 inventions originating at the National Research Council of Canada; 124 of these inventions were licensed.

2. During the fiscal year 1971-72, Canadian Patents and Development Limited received royalties of $146,904.83 from licences covering 108 inventions.

PUBLIC WORKS—PURCHASE OF PROPERTIES, WELLINGTON STREET, OTTAWA

Question No. 287—Mr. Hees:

1. Has the government made any purchase or are they in the process of making a purchase of any property or properties on the south side of Wellington Street between Elgin Street and Bank Street and, if so, what property or properties is or are involved, and what is the purchase price of each?

2. If expropriation proceedings are not being used, was any pressure brought to bear on any owner to sell to the government?

3. Does the government intend to use any building that is so acquired and, if so, for what purpose?

Hon. Jean Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes. Negotiations have been completed for the purchase of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company land and building on Wellington Street and, in addition, the Orme property also owned by Metropolitan Life, on the north side of Sparks Street, which is complementary to the Metropolitan Life site frontage on Sparks Street. The purchase price of the Metropolitan Life building and holdings is $15,200,000 and the estimated cost of relocation of computer equipment is $250,000.

2. No.

[Mr. Andras.]

3. Yes. The Government is urgently in need of additional office accommodation in Ottawa and the Metropolitan Life building is ideally located for government needs and is in good condition. There are a number of departmental requirements which could be met in this building having regard for the termination date of a number of existing leases and as well it would be equally available for alternative use such as parliamentary support groups or any parliamentary requirement.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. John M. Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers Nos. 1, 30, and 46 are acceptable to the government. Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No.—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. parliamentary secretary hold his fire for just one moment. I believe he has referred to notices of motions Nos. 1, 30 and 46. Is it the pleasure of the House that these notices of motions be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COPY OF RETURN SHOWING ELECTION EXPENSES ON BEHALF OF CANDIDATES IN GENERAL ELECTION, OCTOBER 30, 1972

Motion No. 1—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That an Order of the House do issue for a return showing, by electoral districts, the total amount of election expenses on behalf of each candidate in the General Election of October 30, 1972, as indicated in the return respecting election expenses submitted on behalf of each candidate, as required under the provisions of Section 63 of the Canada Elections Act; and showing also the names, by electoral districts, of any candidates on whose behalf election expense returns have not been submitted.

Motion agreed to.

COPIES OF FEDERAL PLEBESCITES OR REFERENDA HELD SINCE 1867

Motion No. 30—Mr. Forrestall:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all federal plebescites or referenda held since 1867, with the wording as it appeared on the ballot, the results and the statutory provision in each case.

Motion agreed to.

COPY OF LIST OF PHARMACEUTICAL COMPANIES PREPARED BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ADVISORY BOARD

Motion No. 46—Mr. Orlikow:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the list of pharmaceutical companies that comply with government standard 74-GP-1(c) prepared for the government by the Canadian Government Advisory Board on Drug Procurement.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 2 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the House that notice of motion No. 2 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COPIES OF ALL CORRESPONDENCE INVOLVED IN REORGANIZATION OF CUSTOMS DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Motion No. 2—Mr. Coates:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, telegrams, memoranda, and other documents involved in the reorganization and computerization of the Customs Division of the Department of National Revenue.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, I ask that all the other notices of motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Baldwin: Pretty poor service.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—TIME OF DEBATE ON CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION IN RELATION TO DISPATCHING OF PERSONNEL

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising from his statement today. I should like to ask whether the government intends to have the debate on the resolution dealt with by the House before any of the Canadian participants under this new proposal leave the country, or is the minister reserving the position he expressed in the House last week, that the government might find it necessary to dispatch participants before the matter comes before the House?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the second position enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition is the position the government takes. We have been asked to have some of our observers on site as soon as possible. If in fact the agreements are signed and we are asked to participate by all four parties, we would intend to send some personnel without delay, probably over the weekend.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—DISCUSSION WITH OTHER PROPOSED PARTICIPANTS IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION—METHOD OF REPORTING

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he or the government has had any discussions with the other three proposed participants in this operation, particularly as to how the operation will function in view of what I understand to have been difficulties in the past regarding the ICC being able to operate in an effective manner?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, now that the government has made the decision I have announced in the House today we are in a position to talk to the other proposed members. It is our plan this afternoon to provide the United States, the North Vietnamese, Saigon and the Viet Cong or P.R.G. with copies of the statement, and also to provide copies to the other proposed members of the commission and to ask them what their intentions are. Once we know whether they intend to participate we will then be in a position to proceed to have talks with them about the functioning of the proposed commission.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it the intention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to insist that the Canadian participants should be able to report on their own, or is it the intention that the combined organization of countries would have to report as a unit?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have examined the sections of the protocol dealing with this question and I think they meet our position fairly well. There is a rule of unanimity on reports made by the commission to any of the parties, but it is also provided that the individual countries may make individual reports.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—NAMING OF FOUR MEMBERS OF SUPERVISORY COMMISSION IN PROTOCOL—NATURE OF INVITATION TO CANADA TO PARTICIPATE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct one or two questions to the minister in relation to his statement. Do I gather from his statement and the answers to the questions asked that the four countries mentioned in press reports are actually named in the protocol dealing with the observer force after the cease-fire—Canada, Indonesia, Hungary and Poland? Are they named in the protocol which presumably will be signed by all parties to the war next Saturday?

• (1450)

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I cannot answer that. I can say that they are the intended members. I am sorry I have not examined the protocol in sufficient detail to find out whether the names are actually there, but each of the proposed members has been notified by the members who are parties to the proposed agreement that they are being asked to participate.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I follow up the question because I think it is basic to the possibility of the commission working well. Has Canada been asked by all the parties to the unfortunate war or have we been asked by only one of the parties, and if we have so far been approached directly by only one of the parties, will the government undertake not to dispatch forces from Canada until it has a clear invitation from all the parties who are to be signatories to the agreement?

Mr. Sharp: I can be quite categorical. We will not dispatch any troops unless we have had a clear invitation from all the parties to the proposed truce which will be expressed in a formal document that we hope will be signed on Saturday in Paris. We will not send any troops or any observers of any kind until we are satisfied that we have been invited by all the parties.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South for a further supplementary question and then the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings for his supplementary.

Mr. Lewis: To follow that up, Mr. Speaker, may I then ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he expects that the government may likely dispatch forces this weekend and, if not, is it not possible for parliament to have the debate he suggested next Monday before any forces are sent from this country?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in the protocol, which we did not negotiate but which has now been submitted to us, it is contemplated that members of the supervisory commission will be in place in Viet Nam within 48 hours after the signing of the agreement. We are not bound by this document; we did not negotiate it. The question we have to decide is whether we accept the obligations. However, we do think it highly desirable that as soon as possible after the truce is signed we discharge our responsibilities as I have outlined them in the statement I made today. Therefore it is our intention, if in fact we are invited by signature of the agreements on Saturday by all four parties, to begin without delay to send some men or some observers to Viet Nam. So the answer is that over this weekend it may well be that some of the Canadian observers will be travelling to Viet Nam.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—SIZE OF CANADIAN ELEMENT IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION—STATE OF READINESS AND EQUIPMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Defence. As Canada has now indicated its willingness to serve on the cease-fire supervisory force, at least for the first 60 days, and as the days immediately following next Saturday are the most critical for the success of the cease-fire, would the minister advise the House now as to the size of the force Canada has ready to dispatch as of Saturday, if the proper clearances are completed, when that force will be ready to leave, and what kind of arms it will be equipped with?

[Mr. Sharp.]

Hon. James A. Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first part of the question, it looks now as though the total number of personnel that Canada will be asked to provide is 290. That includes support personnel as well as those who will be observing. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs said, we will be ready to send the first plane as soon as the agreement has been signed on the weekend. As to armament, this is not an armed force but some of the personnel, perhaps all of them, will carry a sidearm, a pistol, for personal protection.

VIET NAM—ACTION TO SECURE FREEDOM OF LLOYD OPPEL, BELIEVED TO BE HELD NEAR HANOI

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question with reference to our agreement to send a supervisory force to Viet Nam. Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs assure the House that during negotiations leading up to the cease-fire, in which we all rejoice, every effort has been made to secure the freedom of the Canadian missionary, Mr. Lloyd Oppel, who was taken prisoner in Laos last October and is now believed to be held near Hanoi?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As I have said, Canada was not involved in the negotiation of any of these agreements. Needless to say, we are not in the war in Viet Nam. However, we have been endeavouring to obtain the release of this missionary.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH NORTH AND SOUTH

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact the statement he has made contemplates increased contacts and relationships with both North Viet Nam and South Viet Nam, will steps be taken to establish diplomatic relations so that we can have an adequate staff to look after matters in these countries?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of the establishment of diplomatic relations with North and South Viet Nam is under review now.

[Translation]

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL MEDICAL PERSONNEL

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State a supplementary question.

Besides examining the possibility of sending military personnel to Viet Nam, did the minister also consider increasing the medical personnel to help the wounded of that country recover?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are already providing some medical personnel in South Viet Nam, and certainly we would be prepared to help in the reconstruction and rehabilitation of those two war-ravaged parts of Viet Nam by providing medical personnel.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—PAYMENT OF CANADIAN EXPENDITURES RESPECTING SUPERVISORY COMMISSION OTHER THAN PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF PERSONNEL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the question I ask arises because of the fact that we have a supervisory force in Cyprus and have had for several years. Canada is the only nation that pays all its expenditures connected with that force, totalling some $3 million a year. Will the extra expenditures over and above pay and allowances for this new force be paid by Canada or by the United Nations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish I could join the right hon. gentleman in being so certain that the United Nations will be involved. I take the same view as the spokesman for the New Democratic Party, that it would be very useful if the United Nations could be involved in this matter. But the position at the present time, according to the protocol, is that the pay and allowances of the forces provided by each of the participants in the supervisory force would be met by that country. In other words, this is a contribution by each country to the cause of peace. There is some question about the payment of what might be termed the operating expenses of the commission. Originally, when this was first put to us, it was suggested that we should be prepared to think in terms of putting up, in addition to pay and allowances, 10 per cent of the budget of the commission. I took great exception to this and said that we were not preaching for a call, we did not want to buy our way into this organization. Therefore it appears—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure the House would like to know what the minister has in mind and would grant him the opportunity to finish his answer because he is always so terse.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously the minister had not yet reached the terse part of his statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister now proceed to tell us what the answer is?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the right hon. member for Prince Albert wishes to ask the minister a supplementary question, and that will give the minister an opportunity to complete his statement.

• (1500)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can go as far as to bundle the same way as the hon. gentleman has with the NDP again.

Mr. MacEachen: You should have been here last Thursday. You missed that party.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask him this: have we his assurance that Canada will not again be in the same position as it is now in Cyprus, and has been for the last several years, of having to spend millions of dollars a year financing a force there which should have been financed by the United Nations? Has he been in touch with the United Nations for the purpose of ascertaining whether that body is going to co-operate and assure that expenditures are not divided among the several countries making their contribution?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, neither North Viet Nam nor South Viet Nam is a member of the United Nations. They have not been involved in these discussions. It is our hope that the Secretary General of the United Nations might be invited to the international peace conference. In that way we might get the United Nations involved. May I complete the last sentence of my previous statement, Mr. Speaker, namely, that in the protocol which has come to hand today it is suggested that each of the members of the supervisory commission, in addition to paying the pay and allowances of their own personnel, should pay 2 per cent of the budget of the commission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the estimate of that?

Mr. Sharp: The amounts involved are quite small; I do not think that more than some thousands of dollars are involved.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are rising to ask supplementaries. Perhaps we could have two or three further supplementaries and then go to the next subject. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich has a further supplementary.

VIET NAM—ACTION TO SECURE FREEDOM OF LLOYD OPPEL, BELIEVED TO BE HELD NEAR HANOI

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, is the House to take it from the answer given earlier by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that as of the moment we have no assurance of the release of Lloyd Oppel?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would have to make inquiries. Perhaps I can then be more re-assuring than I have been.

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—COMPOSITION OF PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since he has seen the cease-fire agreement and the protocols, may I ask him if they envisage the calling of an international conference after the signing of the agreement next Saturday, what nations will be represented at that conference, and is it envisaged from the protocols that such a conference would set up the necessary machinery to which the observers may report violations from time to time, and which can take action upon them?

Oral Questions

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet perused the documents themselves. They arrived in Ottawa just a few minutes before the House met. However, I am advised that they do provide for the calling of an international conference 30 days from the date of the truce and that, if we were a member of the international commission, we would be invited. The other members would be the permanent members of the Security Council, plus the belligerents in Viet Nam.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REDISTRIBUTION OF RIDINGS SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT TO MAINTAIN PRESENT LEVEL OF MEMBERSHIP IN CERTAIN PROVINCES

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the House whether the government is considering the possibility of amending the Canadian constitution in order to increase the number of members, so that certain provinces will not be without an adequate representation in parliament after the next redistribution?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that I said last week or the week before that the problem had actually been drawn to the attention of the cabinet which is now considering it. As I then pointed out, the House must understand that one of the solutions would be to increase substantially the number of members and that the ratio of members would still be the same, regardless of their number, because under the constitution and also in all fairness, I believe, representation must be proportional to the population.

Consequently, even though the total number of members were increased, the ratio would remain the same.

REDISTRIBUTION OF RIDINGS—SUGGESTION THAT QUEBEC REPRESENTATION BE USED AS BASIS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister if, among the schemes considered by the cabinet, there is one which could be based on a quotient established in the province of Quebec, by constituency, and which would be used to establish the number of members for other provinces so that the number of members would be increased and the representation would be more equitable.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member does recall, the formula he suggests was prevailing at the beginning of the constitution of Canada and had been ratified by the British North America Act of 1867. Previous parliaments have altered the formula so that the number of Quebec members would not be fixed but could differ from the other provinces. I do not think that hon. members would wish to go back to the previous situation as suggested by the hon. member.

[Mr. Douglas.]

[Later:]

[English]

REDISTRIBUTION OF RIDINGS—MAINTENANCE OF PRESENT LEVEL OF MEMBERSHIP IN CERTAIN PROVINCES BY ADDRESS TO WESTMINSTER OR PASSAGE OF STATUTE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Prime Minister and is related to the answer he has just given, as well as the one he gave me last week, respecting increasing the number of members in the chamber, thereby avoiding the necessity of there being any reduction in the representation of the provinces of Newfoundland, Quebec, Nova Scotia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. In view of the fact that consideration is being given to this by the government, in the event that a change is to be made, has the government in mind having an address passed by parliament to the parliament at Westminster to make the necessary constitutional change—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It isn't necessary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —or has consideration been given to whether such changes could be made by a statute passed by this parliament? I do not accept that, but I wonder if consideration is being given to it?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the view which would prevail would probably be that under section 91(1) of the BNA Act it could be done by statute of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —but I do realize, Mr. Speaker, that the other view could be held by people who believe it to be in provincial interests. I must say that this problem has not been studied to this point by the government. It is one on which studies have been made in the past. I do not think that it is really the difficult problem facing this House. The difficult problem, as I just stated in my answer to the hon. member who belongs to the Social Credit party, is to realize that even if we increased the number of members in the House of Commons the provinces with lesser populations or lessening populations would still have the same proportion, or a lesser proportion of members, compared with those provinces that have increasing populations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question in order to be perfectly clear. Does the Prime Minister suggest that a change can be made in the membership of the House, in view of the provisions in the British North America Act as well as all amendments to that act that have taken place, by the simple act of a statute passed by this parliament? Does he say that the law officers of the Crown have that view? If he does, it is the end of the constitution.

Mr. Baldwin: They will probably do it by Governor General's warrant.

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE PENSIONS—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE INCREASE—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the munificent Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can he advise whether he still intends to present legislation at an early date fulfilling his promise of a substantial increase in old age security pensions, or has he now decided to hold discussions with his provincial counterparts before bringing in this measure of relief for Canada's senior citizens?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have contacted my provincial colleagues these past few days and, following these consultations, I have invited them to a meeting called for next Friday, February 2—that is for one day only—in order to discuss this whole question and I hope I can then introduce the required legislation in a near enough future.

[English]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if the timing and the amount of this pension increase and indeed, the introduction of the legislation are geared to approval by the provincial counterparts of the minister, or does he plan to hold to his original promise to the House to proceed in any case?

Mr. Lalonde: The answer is no to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker. Obviously the discussions taking place are consultations, and no veto power is envisaged for any or all of the provinces.

Mr. Macquarrie: Do I take it that the minister is in fact going to proceed with his own plan regardless of the views of the provinces? In that case, what is the purpose of the conference?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSING

LAND ASSEMBLY PROGRAM—ALLEGED REJECTION BY PROVINCES OF AMOUNT OF FEDERAL FUND

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, Mr. Speaker. Following the conference held the past few days in Ottawa and following the presentation by the minister of the proposal of the federal government to provide $100 million for the assembly of land and that proposal having been universally rejected by the provinces as being inadequate, would the minister inform the House whether he is considering substantially increasing that amount before he brings the proposed amendments to the National Housing Act before the House?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): First of all, Mr. Speaker, that budgetary level is not provided for in the amendments; second, the figure was not universally rejected; third, it is more than double any figure the provinces have spent in the past and I have urged them to spend at least what they are permitted. I would be interested to see action in this regard. Fourth, I suggested, and it was agreed, that there should be immediate intergovernmental consultation on the development of a coherent land strategy for such purposes as determining what the appropriate investment, federally, provincially and municipally, in land assembly should be.

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN REGULATIONS DEFINING FAMILY

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I can see that we are going to get no change in that respect so I shall try another. In view of the fact that the proposed changes as outlined by the government define a family as constituting three people and as that would exclude the thousands of families with only two members already existing in the country, in the same government revisions is the minister proposing to change his proposed definition and bring it in line with the desires expressed by some provinces?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is referring to is suggestions made by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation about what possible regulations there might be. I have not accepted the size of a family as being two or three or otherwise. There were representations made for the purpose of the regulations on behalf of single parent families and I think the regulations should take into account the provision within the section that the hon. member has referred to of single parent families.

LAND ASSEMBLY PROGRAM—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR FORMULA TO REDUCE LAND COSTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In light of answer just given by the minister with regard to provincial representations concerning the $100 million, which everybody agrees is inadequate, and in view of the high cost of building houses on land in urban centres, may I ask the minister whether any formula was agreed to that would bring down the cost of land so that more than 4 per cent of the population of Toronto could afford to buy a new home?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the amount that the hon. member says is inadequate is over five times more than his party indicated its contribution would be during the election campaign.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that the minister and the hon. member asking the question will appreciate that this is debate. Perhaps the hon. member has a supplementary question.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the minister would mind answering whether there was any discussion of the high cost of land which is preventing most of the average income group from buying new homes? Was there any agreement between the federal government and the representatives from the various provinces on a formula or was there not? Could I have a categorical answer, yes or no?

An hon. Member: Louder!

Mr. Basford: Yes, there was, Mr. Speaker. I was very pleased and delighted that the provinces accepted my proposals on this subject at the conference.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, would the minister mind telling the House briefly what the formula is to bring down the high cost of land which is preventing the average income group from purchasing homes in the various urban centres?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that if he wants to convey this information he should do so by way of a statement on motions.

DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCES AT CONFERENCE ON REDUCTION OF MORTGAGE INTEREST RATES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Were there any discussions with regard to the high interest rates on mortgages and what proposals did the minister make to bring these down so that ordinary folk may buy homes?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that particular subject is not referred to in the communiqué but there were discussions at the conference about the bill on financial mechanisms which I hope to introduce shortly and which is designed to bring more money into the capital market for housing.

Mr. Speaker: There are a number of hon. members who want to ask supplementaries, but we will be running out of time very soon. I suggest that hon. members try to cut down on the number of supplementaries so as to give other members an opportunity to ask their questions. Perhaps there might be two or three supplementaries at the most on this subject and then we will go to the next matter.

PUBLIC HOUSING PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR CONTINUED SUPPORT BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): In view of the fact that the assisted home ownership program still assists purchasers with incomes between $6,000 and $9,000 and that the present subsidized rental program assists people with incomes below $5,000, would the minister assure the House that there will be no reduction in the capital allocation with regard to the subsidized rental program and no curtailment or phasing out of that program?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I assured the provinces of our continued support within the law of CMHC public housing programs. The amount of budget to be allocated to it would be a matter of consultation and co-ordination with each province involved. I think the provinces that have public housing programs were quite satisfied with my undertakings in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: Again, I bring to the attention of hon. members that we will be running short of time. Perhaps we might have a last supplementary from the hon. member for St. John's West, and then we should go on to the next subject. If we have run out of questioners before the end of the question period, we might return to this subject.

LAND ASSEMBLY PROGRAM—POSSIBLE DISCUSSION WITH MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the municipalities were not directly represented at the recent conference, as promised by the minister in the House on January 16, will the municipalities be involved in the minister's federal-provincial land strategy which he referred to a moment ago?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to get agreement that housing would be discussed at the tri-level conference next November where the municipalities will be represented, and that the land development strategy would come up for consideration then.

LABOUR RELATIONS

WARDAIR STEWARDESSES' STRIKE—POSSIBLE INTERVENTION OF FEDERAL DEPARTMENT

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Would the minister use his good offices to intervene in the current Wardair strike? I ask this question because of the national implications which threaten air traffic across Canada.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. An officer of my department is endeavouring to get in touch with the parties for the purpose of finding some basis to arrive at a settlement.

AIR TRANSPORT

ENFORCEMENT OF IN-FLIGHT SAFETY STANDARDS

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a related question for the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now in a position to answer the question regarding the enforcement of air flight safety regulations, as promised by him on January 22?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question in the House. In all cases where there is a strike we monitor the flights. We are implementing the regulations and are very strict about air flight standards.

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ANNOUNCED IN SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Can he tell us when he will introduce in this House the legislative measure announced in the Speech from the Throne and which purports to bring a solution to the serious problems of feed grains which heavily affect eastern agricultural producers?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we have promised that before the new crop year that will be done.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION—HEARING OF APPEALS OF VISITORS REQUESTING LANDED STATUS

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Manpower and Immigration if it is the government's intention to introduce amendments in the very near future to the Immigration Act so that the confusion surrounding the arbitrary order in council can be clarified?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as announced in the Speech from the Throne it is the government's intention to introduce legislation amending the Immigration Appeal Board Act.

• (1520)

Mr. Skoreyko: Can the minister advise the House whether all the so-called visitor immigrants to Canada will have an opportunity to be heard by the Immigration Appeal Board before any further action is taken by the government?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, if that question refers to all the visitors in Canada I think that would give rise to an impossible situation since there are several hundred thousand visitors here at any given moment.

Mr. Skoreyko: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is misunderstanding me. I am talking about the visitor immigrants in Canada who wish to obtain landed status and are waiting to have their appeals heard by the Immigration Appeal Board. Will they be heard by the Immigration Appeal Board before any further action is taken?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the Immigration Appeal Board has a backlog of some 12,000 appeals before it and its ability to handle them is limited to a capacity of 1,500 a year. Obviously, this matter will form the subject matter of some of the amendments that we hope to bring before the House to relieve this congestion. Therefore it would be impossible for the board to hear all those appeals before the legislation is brought before the House, unless that is done several years from now.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CHECKING OF SCIENTIFIC EVIDENCE GIVEN AT HEARINGS IN WHICH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT HAS INTEREST

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. First, I should like to take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. lady on her appointment to this important position.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: Is the minister arranging to have scientific evidence tabulated, checked for accuracy and assessed for judgment when given at judicial or quasi-judicial hearings involving federal projects or projects in which the federal government has an interest? I am referring to the hearings—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked his question. Perhaps the minister might reply. If the hon. member has a supplementary he may ask it afterwards.

[Translation]

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take note of this question.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the fact that the hearing I was referring to is the James Bay hearing, perhaps the Minister of Transport or the Minister of the Environment could provide an answer.

Mr. Baldwin: They have enough trouble as it is.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, may I address one final supplementary to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister consider reorganizing the cabinet responsibilities so that the various ministers concerned will know which minister is responsible, if any is, and for what? None of them seems to know now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation, not a question. The hon. member must assume that it will be taken into consideration.

SOCIAL SECURITY

RETIRED RAILWAY WORKERS—REPRESENTATIONS BY MINISTER RESPECTING INCREASE IN PENSIONS

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Sainte-Marie): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for having noticed that the member for Sainte-Marie now sits on the other side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether there have been new developments with regard to pensioned-off railroaders, which question concerns thousands of Canadian railroaders?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have been advised of a beneficial development in this area. As I understand it, the company, as a result of representations made to it by an organization representing the employees, has agreed to raise the pension by 2 per cent, effective on January 1.

RETIRED PUBLIC SERVANTS, ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL AND RCMP PENSIONS—STATUS OF CONSIDERATION OF RAISING OR REMOVING CEILING ON ESCALATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the assurance given by the minister toward the end of the previous session that consideration would be given to raising or removing the 2 per cent ceiling on the escalation of pensions of retired public servants and also retired armed forces and RCMP personnel, can the minister say what is now the status of that consideration?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in view of the genesis of the 2 per cent figure in the Superannuation Act, namely, its relationship to the Canada Pension Plan, perhaps these two matters could be looked at together.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister also tell us what is the status of the consideration being given to providing for the escalation of the pensions of armed forces and RCMP personnel compulsorily retired prior to the age of 60, in order that their escalation may commence without their having to wait until they are 60?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think I assured the hon. gentleman in the previous session that this was being sympathetically considered. I think, if we are to open up the Superannuation Act and the Armed Forces Pension Act, they should be opened up at the same time in order to cut down debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let us do it now, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Speaker.]

AIRPORTS

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL—POSSIBLE EXPROPRIATION OF BURKEVILLE AREA OF SEA ISLAND

Mr. John Reynolds (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of his answer yesterday. Does the government now intend to expropriate the Burkeville area of Sea Island?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure how urgent the matter is. Perhaps the minister might reply. I suggest that normally a question of this nature should be placed on the order paper. If the minister can answer he may do so.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think all these questions concerning expropriation should be directed to the Minister of Public Works who is in charge of such matters.

Mr. Stanfield: At present he is too busy sinking barges.

Mr. Reynolds: Mr. Speaker, may I direct the same question to the Minister of Public Works. Does the government now intend to expropriate the Burkeville area of Sea Island?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, a hearing has taken place with respect to the Burkeville area and the hearing officer submitted his report two days ago. A decision will be taken shortly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has a supplementary to the previous question.

PUBLIC SERVICE

AUTHORITY FOR COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF PUBLIC SERVANTS, ARMED FORCES AND RCMP PERSONNEL

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and relates to the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The hon. member asked a question about compulsory retirement of members of the armed forces and the RCMP. I did not catch the minister's answer. Is it not a fact that there is no authority for retiring anybody compulsorily and that those forcibly retired, whether members of the RCMP or of the armed forces, are entitled to the same privileges that the government now provides to civil servants?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made any reference to compulsory retirement. He was discussing another topic.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Of course, I would need to be supported on my question of privilege by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I distinctly heard the reference made to members of the armed forces and the RCMP being compulsorily retired or forced into retirement before the age of 60. I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to verify that part of the question he put to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre does that, perhaps I might suggest that this matter might be raised other than as a question of privilege. I must bring to the attention of hon. members that we have reached the end of the question period.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further question of privilege. When a question is put to a minister I do not think that minister should impute motives or imply that the question was not properly asked in the first place. The minister has no right to imply that I have put an improper question, or that I made a reference to another hon. member's question improperly. I made a proper reference to that question and I do not think it is the minister's place to deny me that privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

POST OFFICE

DISPUTE WITH WORKERS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SETTLEMENT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder, before Your Honour calls orders of the day, if I might direct a question to the Postmaster General in view of the fact that the government is now adopting a more reasonable attitude.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member who has been trying to get the floor for some time. I would have liked to recognize him but we ran out of time about three minutes ago. He may ask the question with the consent of the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ouellet: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the matter could be held in abeyance until tomorrow, when I will give the hon. member priority.

Mr. Ouellet: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be of interest to this House to know that a protocol d'entente was signed at 3.15 this afternoon.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On the backs of the Canadian public.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister having used a question of privilege to make an announcement to the House, I think hon. members will recognize that, in all fairness, the hon. member for St. John's East should be allowed to ask his question now.

Mr. McGrath: The Postmaster General anticipated my question. We are all pleased to know that this long-standing dispute is now settled. My question to the Prime Minister is this: In view of the success of the Postmaster General in concluding a satisfactory agreement on this long-standing dispute, will he now ask the Postmaster General to take over from the President of the Treasury Board all further negotiations with public servants?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the minister is rising on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I rise to say I support the suggestion of the hon. gentleman. In all future negotiations with the Post Office, the Postmaster General should conduct them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT (No. 1)

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION TO BE DEEMED ADVANCE

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the Speech from the Throne, reference was made to the government's intention to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act as a result of its review of the unemployment insurance program. Subsequently, in fact last Wednesday, two bills were tabled in this House, Bill C-124 and Bill C-125, containing those amendments. The first one, Bill C-124, is before us today. It deals specifically with the ceiling on cash advances.

As I indicated before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates the other day, there is extreme urgency in considering this bill since current advances available to the Unemployment Insurance Commission are, I am advised by the commission, sufficient only until February 7, give or take a day or two. I hope to find all members of that committee and, indeed, all members of this House in agreement that we should not arrive at a situation where benefits to the unemployed of this country would be cut off.

There are three main reasons why advances are required. First, as hon. members are no doubt aware, when the unemployment level exceeds 4 per cent, the government pays the resulting additional benefit costs. However, the government's share of the total costs for a given calendar year is not paid to the commission until April of the following year. Therefore, the government is responsible in law for advancing moneys to cover that cash requirement.

Second, since the amounts of employers and employees contributions and employee benefits are dependent upon the level of employment and unemployment, this creates weekly fluctuations in the unemployment insurance account so as to require advances at various times.

Third, when revenue from employers and employees during the calendar year is not sufficient to completely cover their share of the costs of unemployment insurance benefits, and of administration advances are required to cover that deficiency.

The benefits paid out for the calendar year 1972 were $1,879 million and the administration costs were approximately $120 million for a total program cash requirement of roughly $2 billion. Of this, $890 million, approximately, was the government's direct cost and this will be reflected in the main estimates to be tabled by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) later in this session. The remainder, $1,109 million, is chargeable to the employer-employee premium account. Received from the Department of National Revenue, the collecting agency, for that premium account was $715 million during 1972, based upon estimates of anticipated premium receipts. The final figure of actual premium remittances will not be known until mid-summer 1973 when all income tax returns and T-4 slips are in and tallied.

If that amount of $715 million turns out to have been accurate, and noting that the opening unemployment insurance account balance was $236 million, this means that there will have been an accounting shortfall of $394 million in premium revenue and a cash deficit for 1972 of $158 million in the employer-employee account. Advances required, then, as these figures would indicate, reached an amount in excess of $1 billion for the calendar year 1972.

The Unemployment Insurance Act, section 137(4), establishes a ceiling of $800 million on cash advances. On October 5, 1972 when Parliament was not in session, a Governor General's warrant was obtained in the amount of $234 million because that limit on cash advances was being reached. This was necessary to permit the Unemployment Insurance Commission to discharge its obligation under the law of paying benefits to persons claiming and entitled to unemployment insurance. That warrant was expected to cover the requirements until December 31 and, in fact, did. Payments under that warrant began on October 31.

In early December, a further review by the commission indicated that authorized funds would run out by the beginning of January. Considering that parliament had been recalled for January 4, considering also that funds would probably run out before that, a second warrant was obtained on December 14 in the amount of $220 million. In fact, payments under the first warrant continued until January 3 and payments under the December warrant began on January 4. The funds thus obtained under the second warrant were calculated and are expected to be sufficient until early in February.

The government was, of course, under obligation to table before this House, at the first opportunity, a supplementary estimate to cover the sums so obtained. My colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, did so on January 8 and they included an item for these two warrants. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that on January 18 the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee of this House had the opportunity of reviewing the financial operation of the program and, I understand, I am to appear again tomorrow before that committee.

These actions, Mr. Speaker, that is the obtaining of Governor General's warrants, are the normal procedures used when parliament is not in session and when such circumstances arise. In this particular process, the law officers of the Crown were consulted at every step of the way and they were and are of the opinion that the commission and the government were acting in accordance with the law governing the use of Governor General's warrants, with particular reference to section 23 of the Financial Administration Act.

There have been attempts to suggest that the government knew before the end of 1972 that the advances provided to the Unemployment Insurance Commission would definitely run out by a particular date, and that the government should have reported this to the House when the House convened in late August. In point of fact, while the commission was becoming concerned that the ceiling could be surpassed in the period between the beginning of November and the end of December, it was completely reasonable and quite proper for the chairman of the commission, who had just recently been appointed to his position, to ensure that he had all of the facts at his disposal so that he could make an accurate estimate and a complete and detailed report to the government on the actual situation. Furthermore, as an administrator he had to assume that parliament would be back in session on September 28 and, therefore, presume that an amending bill could be presented in sufficient time for passage before the situation became critical.

As stated by the chairman of the commission before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee last week, he weighed and checked all the factors and finally, after learning of the new and increased unemployment figures issued by Statistics Canada on September 12, he made his decision and recommended to his minister to apply for a Governor General's warrant. That warrant was requested by him on September 29, and authorized on October 5.

The suggestion that there was something sinister about this course of action or that either the government or the Unemployment Insurance Commission—which is a semi-autonomous body—was attempting to conceal the facts from the Canadian public is not correct. It may be politically tempting to constantly draw attention to the fact that unemployment levels in 1972 were higher than the government had anticipated. But the political accounting for that error took place on October 30. It certainly is not politic to repeatedly suggest that the payment of benefits to the unemployed under a formula established by a statute of parliament in its wisdom was not either correct or legal. As my predecessor has said on many occasions, our government may have erred in not accurately forecasting unemployment in 1972, but we did not err in seeking to protect the victims of unemployment. For if unemployment is high, unemployment benefit expenditures will be high, and there is nothing illegal or scandalous in that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The end justifies the means, I suppose.

Mr. Andras: When the chairman of the commission appeared before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee the other day he was forthright and sincere in his answers, and it was noted by committee members that he is administering the commission with dedication, concern and competence in the face of many difficulties. On that particular point, I was distressed to say the least, to note that, as reported on pages 353 to 357 of Hansard for January 16, the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) named and attacked in very precise terms a public servant. This has not been the practice in this House, particularly in recognition of the special immunity granted to Members of Parliament, on the one hand, and the inhibitions placed upon public servants to respond and defend themselves publicly, on the other. The chairman of the commission has my confidence, that of my colleagues and I am sure that of all reasonable members.

The bill before us provides for two things. It provides for the removal of the existing ceiling of $800 million. It also provides that the funds obtained through the vehicle of Governor General's warrants are not to be considered as appropriations granted to the commission but rather as advances repayable to the Minister of Finance under the conditions prescribed in the Act.

I believe it would be helpful to hon. members if I were to give a brief overview and history of the manner in which the unemployment insurance program has been and is now financed. Under the previous Unemployment Insurance Act, the government's contribution for the fiscal year was voted by parliament through main estimates and/or supplementary estimates. The government's share was 20 per cent of the contributions of employers and employees plus the administrative costs of the program. The government did not assume greater responsibility when the unemployment rate was high, except that when the balance in the unemployment insurance fund was insufficient to pay benefits as it was in 1964, the Minister of Finance, through an appropriations act, was authorized to make loans to the Unemployment Insurance Commission to effect the payment of benefits. These were then repaid from subsequent contributions. I might add that there was no legal limit on the amount of loans that might be made in such a situation.

Under the current act, the cost of paying benefits is financed both by revenues received regularly from employer-employee contributions and ultimately by the reimbursement to the commission of the government's share of the total costs. This latter, as I indicated at the beginning of my remarks, is not received by the commission until the next fiscal year following the end of any calendar year.

To summarize, therefore, the advances from the Consolidated Revenue Fund which are obtained by virtue of Section 137(a) of the Unemployment Insurance Act serve a threefold purpose: First, to provide for the government's share of the current year until it is precisely calculated and paid in the following year. The effect, of course, is that against the advance ceiling will be charged 15 months—January 1, 1972 to March 31, 1973—of government cost, prior to receiving the voted funds. Second, to cover any cash deficiencies in premiums received from the private sector when the employer-employee account is not sufficient for the payment of its share of benefits, plus the cost of administration. Third, to compensate for periodic short-falls between revenues and disbursements due to fluctuations in the unemployment rate.

There is no question in my mind now that when the Unemployment Insurance Act was dealt with last, the imposition of a ceiling on advances to the unemployment insurance account was unfortunate. It was put in because it was felt that it might provide a measure of control on costs. Such is not the case, however, because a variety of circumstances make it difficult to forecast accurately what the total cost to the government will be. Such forecasting is difficult because of dependence upon national and regional unemployment rates. The amount of the ceiling must take into account the number of persons unemployed since this has a direct impact upon the government's share of the total benefit costs. You will appreciate that unemployment varies greatly from any given point in time.

Another factor is that employer and employee contribution rates are based on the average experience of the preceding three years, beginning in 1975—so we are in a period at this time of building experience concerning what that rate may be—whereas benefits are paid depending upon the current unemployment rate. This, too, creates fluctuations in the unemployment insurance account.

Advances under section 137 are, of course, at a maximum at times of high unemployment, because of large government cost on the one hand, as well as relatively lower contributions from employers and employees on the other hand. Other factors, such as labour force growth, higher earnings of claimants, length of time of benefits, which are not easily predictable in the very short run, have a direct impact upon the cost of benefits paid at any given point in time. In the face of these variations in cash requirements, either the ceiling has to be set at an extremely high level in order to take account of any unforeseen contingency, in which case it would represent virtually no constraint at all, or it could be set at a relatively low level, which might necessitate amending the act almost every year.

It is clear, therefore, that a fixed limit on advances is not practical. It is also, I submit, unnecessary, since there are many other automatic requirements in the act whereby parliament can review the administration costs and program expenditures under this act on several occasions each year. First of all, the minister must submit an annual report to parliament together with the report of the Auditor General; second, parliament can review the expenditures under the act when public accounts are tabled, which contain a report on the Unemployment Insurance Commission's operations as well as on the government's share of the cost of benefits.

Furthermore, since the estimates are reviewed by a parliamentary committee, this provides a further occasion for hon. members to review in detail the commission's operations, both financial and administrative. In addition, all advances made by the Department of Finance by virtue of the act are published in the monthly financial statements which are tabled in this House. Thus hon. members have several opportunities for obtaining information concerning the financial aspect of the program and for calling the commission or the government to task.

But most of all, the ceiling is inappropriate because payments to claimants are statutory and not discretionary as far as the Unemployment Insurance Commission is concerned. It is essential in any circumstances that the commission always have access to sufficient funds to pay the legal claims of the unemployed, no matter what the level of unemployment might be. If the commission had discretionary power over how many claims could be honoured in any year, then it could be appropriate to have a fixed dollar limit upon advances to the unemployment insurance account. But I cannot visualize this House ever seriously considering the denial of benefits to qualified claimants.

The fact of the matter is that parliament, in its wisdom, has enacted the terms and conditions of payment of benefits, on the one hand, and this act, on the other hand, by imposing a ceiling is restricting the availability of funds and may prevent the commission from implementing that very legislation. Therefore, I now move that Bill C-124 be referred immediately to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for study and report to this House.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my few remarks I have a point I want to make to the Chair. In the opinion of this party and myself there are some doubts as to the right of the government at this time to move this bill, having in mind the presence in the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates of the item L30a. I do not propose to deal with this point or to raise it as a point of order; I merely call it to the attention of the Chair. My colleague the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) will, in due course, be dealing with this matter and he will raise the question and enlarge upon it.

We are dealing with this bill today because of the miscalculation, the deceit, the improper conduct and the illegal actions of this government. These I will deal with later in detail. Because of these facts, the whole course of the administration of unemployment insurance has been brought to the brink of disaster. I have to say that the actions of the government must not be allowed to obscure the fact that there are unemployed persons who are properly entitled to benefits, and it is for this House so to exercise its ingenuity that it ensures that these people are not made to suffer for the sins of the government. This I will deal with later and, with my colleagues, advance proposals and amendments from time to time, both during the course of this debate and later, so that we can bring about this most desirable objective.

If the directors of a joint stock company planning to float a bond debenture or to offer stock to the public are guilty of deception, either by making false statements or by non-disclosure, they face penalties and could well go to jail. Deception is recognized in our modern society. As a matter of fact, section 88(a) of this act provides that any person who makes a false or deceptive statement is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine and/or imprisonment.

What if a government, the board of directors of this country, in issuing a prospectus to the public when seeking a new mandate to govern, is guilty of the most flagrant kind of deception with regard to this very legislation? If they had done in non-government life, or in public life outside of the government, the things that they have done in connection with this bill, they would be promptly charged with a course of conduct for which they could be severely penalized and face a fine and/or jail. That is my view of what the government has done in the interval between last summer and today in connection with this very bill. There they sit; sleek, arrogant, smug, feeling assured of power with the support of others in this House. I say quite sincerely that I hope that members of the party to my left will examine with care and with caution what the government has done in this regard so that they will not be found guilty of being accessories after the fact.

Let me now deal step by step with the facts that I shall produce to justify the very serious charges that I have made, and which I shall substantiate with the aid of my hon. friends and colleagues before this debate concludes. The Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 was dealt with during that year. After second reading, the bill went to committee. I have not had too much time to go through the proceedings of the committee, but I have found some very interesting comments on the particular sections with which we are dealing now. As reported in issue No. 24 of the minutes of proceedings of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration for Wednesday, May 19, 1971, officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission were questioned on the terms of the proposed legislation. At that time they were considering the proposals that brought into effect what is now section 137, and in particular section 137(4). Mr. Steele, one of the officials of the commission who was produced by this government, the sponsor of this bill, as their expert witness in this regard was being questioned by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who conducted his usual brilliant cross-examination. From page 24:28 I read these questions and answers:

• (1600)

MR. ALEXANDER: Then there is another question. I notice in Clause 137(4) that you have struck an amount:

". . . shall not exceed eight hundred million dollars."

I am talking about advances. How did you arrive at that figure?

This is the first time I can recall, or have found as a result of examination, that this figure representing the ceiling on advances was being discussed. The answer was:

MR. STEELE: Mr. Allan can correct me if I am wrong, but the $800 million include the government advance for a year. In a year of high unemployment the government advance might reach $500 or $600 million because it would be getting on to 15 to 18 months of payment of benefits before the amounts were credited to the account.

The hon. gentleman who introduced this bill mentioned this but did not give these figures. The answer continued:

In addition, the shortfall on the employer-employee account could vary anywhere between $50 and $100 million for any given year, just as the surplus could vary: it could be as much as $50 or $100 million.

Later on, we find the following:

MR. ALEXANDER: Have the figures that you have given with respect to the total cost taken in the end result in that statement that you have made?

MR. STEELE: Oh, no. The costs which we have given you are our estimates of what the costs will be.

Then later, we find:

MR. ALEXANDER: Yes. What percentage, with respect to the unemployment rate was used in part to arrive at the $800 million?

This is the ceiling the government had seen fit to establish in respect of advances, after careful consideration and examination of this issue. We find this answer:

MR. ALLAN: Mr. Chairman, the $800 million represented, as an upper limit on the amount of advances, presumably the worst possible case we could think of in terms of a deficit. As Mr. Steele said, suppose we run 15 or 18 months behind while we wait for the government contribution, in the facts and figures which we supplied last year we estimated an excess of $400 million if the unemployment rate were in excess of 7 per cent.

That is the information given to the committee on the strength of which the committee and the House, in due course, were persuaded to pass this legislation. What utter garbage! If there ever was a case of obtaining legislation by false pretenses, that was it. I continue quoting from the report:

MR. ALEXANDER: So you used 7 per cent then?

MR. ALLAN: We used 7 per cent and then some. We later calculated a figure that could represent the worst possible case and then we added in another $100 million or so for good measure.

Then, Mr. Alexander said: "What is $100 million."

Mr. Hellyer: He was prophetic.

Mr. Baldwin: In other words, the government produced witnesses and, on the strength of their evidence, it asked the committee to accept this ceiling of $800 million by suggesting that on the worst possible projection of more than 7 per cent unemployment, in its view the highest that deficit would go was $700 million. Apparently, the government took that figure and added another $100 million. Am I not justified in saying through you, Sir, to the members of this House, that I have established beyond any shadow of doubt that in securing the passage of this legislation this government was guilty of the most flagrant kind of deception?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: The committee was shafted.

Mr. Baldwin: I then go on to the final answer by Mr. Allan, and he was taking into account the element of inflation. He said:

Inflation has affected everything. If the unemployment rate not only implied a high government contribution, which we were waiting on at the rate of $400 million or so for a year—and we were waiting for more than a year of contributions, say $500 or $600 million—and if in addition the unemployment rate had brought some slowing of the rate of growth in the wage and salary base, then the premiums that we would have got when we related the 4 per cent cost—plus the sickness, the maternity and the administration—to the insurable earning pace for the previous three years, would mean we were lacking $100 million. If the insurable earning pace then slackened off because of a real recession, then we thought we could be, as Mr. Steele mentioned, lacking 100 million dollars or more on that side. So, if we were to take 500 or 600 million dollars from the government account or if we were to be lacking that and 100 million dollars or more from the employee-employer account, we could be in the neighbourhood of 600 to 700 million dollars. That is that we put 100 million dollars in for good measure.

Mr. Woolliams: Some measure.

Mr. Andras: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Baldwin: I am developing my case, and I am trying to make these interesting points. The minister may foul them up as I go along.

The government underestimated sadly its capacity to create not only unemployment, but conditions under which this fund got into the sickening state it is in at the present time.

Let me go on from there. In 1972, at which time the estimates of the department were before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, no information or figures had been produced, but as usual my earnest, inquiring and indefatigable friend, the hon. member for Hamilton West was there seeking information. In Issue No. 18 for Tuesday, May 30, 1972, at page 18:37 we find that the then Minister of Manpower and Immigration, who has since retired to a much less odourous position than being associated with this government, was being questioned. Mr. Alexander said:

While he is looking at that, will you still claim that the scheme is actuarially sound, Mr. Minister?

MR. MACKASEY: Yes, much sounder than the other scheme. The other scheme had no actuarial basis at all. Perhaps Mr. Third will get those figures. But in the meantime, this plan is actuarially sound and our predictions are pretty well on.

These are the predictions which were made before the committee which was considering this bill in the first place.

Mr. Andras: And before the amendments were brought before the House.

Mr. Baldwin: To repeat, the minister said:

. . . our predictions are pretty well on. We are paying out, perhaps, a little more than we had anticipated and $63 is slightly higher. On the other hand, other areas are a little lower.

That was the minister's view and he was obviously speaking for the government in May 1972.

Let me refer to the same committee minutes of an earlier date, April 25, 1972 at page 2:20. Mr. Steele, apparently not very contrite, was being examined by Mr. Downey. Mr. Downey stated:

I believe there were some figures that came from an accountant in Toronto to the effect that there might be a possible deficit—

My goodness, someone dared to suggest there might possibly be a deficit in this account. He went on to state:

. . . there might be a possible deficit in the account at the end of the current fiscal year, something like $700 or $800 million.

Mr. Steele replied in part:

Any deficits—and it may be a small one this year—on the employers and employees can be amortized over three years,—

• (1610)

So, back in April and in May, the then minister said that the plan was actuarially sound. I realize what he means by that because, so long as he has the taxpayer into whose pocket he can dig, and so long as he has the legal means to extract from it, the plan continues to be actuarially sound. Mr. Steele said that the deficit may be a small one for that year.

I am not finished yet, Mr. Speaker. The then minister, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), was being further examined. He is a very pleasant fellow. He kept on coming back to the committee.

Mr. Nielsen: He's a sucker for punishment.

Mr. Baldwin: On September 1, 1972, the date when that parliament was dissolved,—and I shall establish later that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) must have known what the situation was—the date on which the right hon. gentleman dissolved the parliament and plunged this country headlong into a general election—

Mr. Andras: How do you plunge into an election?

Mr. Baldwin: Hon. members opposite did plunge, and they have not stopped plunging yet.

We heard from the minister, and now I intend to tell the House what the facts are. At page 3936 of Hansard, again we find that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) took part in the debate.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, I was busy but I was being deceived all the time.

Mr. Whelan: You were the only one who was.

Mr. Baldwin: He might have been deceived at first but then he realized that something was wrong, that something was smelling pretty bad. The question reads:

MR. LINCOLN M. ALEXANDER (HAMILTON WEST): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this is a related question in that it involves the Unemployment Insurance Commission. During the debate on the Unemployment Insurance Commission the minister continually advised the House that the plan was actuarially sound and he staked his reputation on that.

Of course, we know what happened. He staked more than his reputation, he staked his job. The question goes on:

I ask the minister whether, now that he has had an opportunity to review the facts, particularly in the last week, he can in fact now state that the plan is actuarially sound?

HON. BRYCE MACKASEY (MINISTER OF MANPOWER AND IMMIGRATION): Mr. Speaker, I will explain it again and I will be glad to stake my reputation on my statement.

During the course of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, which was sitting recently, Mr. Cousineau appeared. The minister has already opened up this matter and thus allowed us to take advantage of it. At that time, Mr. Cousineau made a categorical statement, which will be referred to by my colleagues later, that at least in August of that year it was quite obvious that the limit of advances of $800 million was in danger of being exceeded. Those were the facts. If that was the knowledge of the officials, it had to be the knowledge of the minister. If it was the knowledge of the minister, it must be taken that it was the knowledge of the government. That was in August, before the right hon. gentleman dissolved the House and called the election.

I suggest, Sir, that from the evidence I have quoted,—and I could go on to quote the evidence given yesterday by the Auditor General, although I will not do that because it will be done later—it is absolutely certain that it must have been within the knowledge of those members of the government who held responsibility that this fund was sliding disastrously into bankruptcy. During the period from May to September, the public and parliament, as proven by what I have read, were being expressly and by implication told that the scheme was all right financially, everything was going according to plan. The minister even said on that day that it was "actuarially sound".

In fact, however, if we apply in the House the standards that reasonable people should be entitled to use in the conduct of their own everyday affairs, the fund was sliding into bankruptcy, was disastrously, shockingly, bankrupt. The commission had run so far behind they had just about used up the statutory lending limit of $800 million at the time the House was dissolved. They knew then that they were so close to it that it would not take too long for the warrant to be required. On October 5, Order in Council number PC1/1972 2487 was issued for a special Governor General's warrant for $234 million for the Unemployment Insurance Commission. You do not get Governor General's warrants in five minutes. My submission is that there must have been consultations, discussions and telephone calls for some time before that Governor General's warrant was obtained. The government must have known what was happening to the fund, and they must have known it on September 1.

As a matter of fact, on October 5, the same day the Governor General's warrant was formally obtained, the then minister was interviewed by the press and the following appeared in the Globe and Mail of that day:

At a press conference yesterday, he also promised that Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau would give a detailed accounting of the financial operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. He refused to indicate when, except to say that it would be "at the appropriate moment" and—

Obviously, what he meant by that was that it would not be made before the election. He went on to say:

—"in ample time before the election."

No such statement was ever made. The voters of this country were allowed to go to the polls suffering from the deliberate deception which had been practiced upon them, as it was practiced upon this House, by this government which sits opposite and now says that on that record it should be entitled to govern this country.

The press report reads:

Looking very tired, he repeatedly tried to explain that there is no deficit in the insurance fund because there is no fund.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: The report continues:

There is a cost to the government in operating the scheme because above a 4 per cent unemployment rate workers' premium for the insurance are supplemented by the Treasury—

The following words are significant.

—up to $800 million a year.

This statement was made on the very day the Governor General's warrant was being secured for an amount which would permit this $800 million ceiling to be increased. The minister was making statements which, in effect, intimated that $800 million was the limit to which the government was entitled to go.

I want to say that I disagree to some extent, and in some ways, on various issues with the minister. I admire him. At least he had the courage of his conviction. He stayed with his case, whether or not it was a good case. The case he made, which was the case of the government, was that all of them must share the responsibility. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) told me the other day in response to a question I asked him on this issue, he shared in the decision; it was a collective decision of the cabinet. What happened then? The former minister was made a scapegoat; he was ditched; he was discharged. He was the man who had the courage, rightly or wrongly, to stick up for his principles. I give him credit for having the best motives, and he made a very good case. I disagree with part of it, but not all of it. But the responsibility for this case was shared by his friends opposite. When this disaster came about, what do we find with respect to him? He is ditched. He is made the scapegoat, and he is thrown out.

• (1620)

I suggest to you, Sir, that there was a meeting of minds between different members of the government before this magic date of September 1 was picked. They knew what the situation was. They knew what they faced with regard to this fund. They knew the honest, the honourable, the decent, the only method which should have been or could have been employed by a responsible parliamentary government, which predicates its life on the basis of financial responsibility to the people of this country and to the members of this House. Such a government would have said, "Here is the situation. We were wrong. We miscalculated. We now ask this House to help us put it right." And, Mr. Speaker, the House was in session at the time. We were brought together for a special purpose. That was the time when the government, as any proper government would have done, should have beat its breast, told the truth and said, "Because of these facts we ask for an amendment to this legislation, or we are bringing in a supplementary estimate to cover this amount."

Such a course might have meant a delay in the election, but I assume that what happened was that members of the government who were aware of this, and there was certainly a collective awareness, said, "If we disclose these facts, if we tell the truth—" of course that comes hard for them in any event, politically speaking I want to add because, Mr. Speaker, I am putting this on a political basis—"in the light of what we have said before, and in the light of the facts it would be disastrous for us politically." So, they saw fit to hide the facts, to hide the truth, to call the election, and to allow members of this House to depart. They saw fit to allow the electors of the country to go to the polls without an awareness of what the true situation was. Any government which embarks upon a course of conduct of that nature has an awful gall to come into this House, as the minister did today, and now ask to be given a blank cheque. That is precisely what the government is asking.

If any rational, intelligent and unbiased jury were asked about this situation, they could bring in no other verdict than that the government was guilty of incredible stupidity or deceit, or both. I suppose this was probably one of the reasons which tipped the scales in favour of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) calling the election. Otherwise, if he had seen fit to come back later last fall, to meet the House again in the last parliament, these facts by then would have been known and he would have had to face that situation. Instead he said, "We will call an election and the election will be over and done with before any of this becomes known." That is virtually what happened. The election was over before the government was compelled to tell the truth—or part of the truth. I do not think we have got it all yet.

Some question also arises on the issue of legality. I want to conclude this part of my remarks by saying that this cynical, devious government wanted an election on the most favourable terms it could get. If the government had acted legally, it would have meant full disclosure of this financial debacle; it would have meant telling the press, the public and the people that they had badly miscalculated and were guilty of the most scandalous incompetence. So, the government and the establishment which surrounds it, have become increasingly authoritarian and have discovered smooth and adept ways of ignoring all financial guidelines.

Not so long ago I was discussing this with someone who should know well what the score was. We were talking about the situation some years ago when the precedessor of this government had substantially exceeded or was going to exceed by some tens of millions of dollars, a program which had a statutory limit laid down by parliament. This official said to the person involved, who knew about the excess and in fact was responsible for it, "Don't you think you are going to get caught in this? Don't you think that at some time or other this will be brought back to you"? And that person turned his thumb in the direction of parliament and replied, "Who is going to catch us—those fellows up there?" That is the position, that is the attitude we now find increasingly in the government and in those who work for the government at the highest levels. We can ignore the guidelines, ignore parliament, ignore the financial responsibility; we can do what we want to do, and they will never catch up to us.

Perhaps I belong to an old fashioned school, Mr. Speaker, but I believe there is a strong case to be made for the fact that the taxpayers of this country are entitled to have the most scrupulous adherence, in matters of finance and taxation, to the guidelines laid down by this parliament,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: —and that anybody, government or not, who exceeds those guidelines deliberately must be brought to trial by public opinion.

What about the question of Governor General's warrants and legality? Yesterday the Auditor General, in a very full and complete statement, went back into the history of how this particular process had evolved. He particularly dealt with the situation from 1958 on because the present—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair is in difficulty, and I think many members of the House realize whence the difficulty comes. It relates to the reference of certain estimates to a committee of the House. There is a long standing rule—I will read it from Beauchesne, citation 324—which states:

Until the report and evidence have been laid upon the Table, it is irregular to refer to them in debate, or to put questions in reference to the proceedings of the committee.

The Chair is also aware that to establish the timetable of events as to when facts became known, which is important to the argument of the minister, to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and to other hon. members who will be taking part in the debate, one cannot leave chronological blanks. So, when the minister made the first reference, and the hon. member for Peace River made the second reference to evidence in the committee, I did not raise this point of order then. But I think that at least I would be content at the moment, without giving a detailed ruling, if the evidence were used simply to provide the chronology of events leading up to the legislation we are now considering, rather than getting into a discussion of the evidence itself in the committee. The hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Baldwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact I did have a number—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I am raising a point of order in order to seek clarification for my participation in the debate which, I can assure you, will be very soon. In view of your admonition with respect to past practice, will I now be denied the right to make reference to the proceedings of the committee that is presently functioning? For instance, the hon. gentleman has made some rather serious charges against me personally—

Mr. Baldwin: No, no.

Mr. Mackasey: —which could, so far as I am concerned, place my seat in jeopardy because I, too, will have charges to make. They are based on allegations made today and on statements made before the committee by Mr. Cousineau, and I wonder if I will have the same opportunity in reply to refer to the same extent to the hearings of the Committee presently constituted.

• (1630)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is precisely the point at which the Chair finds itself in difficulty. My suggestion is that the allegation, other than the particular time schedule of which I spoke, should not be referred to in debate at this time. This leaves the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) free to pursue his remedy, if he feels himself aggrieved, in the committee where the allegations have been made. I was not aware that matters which arose strictly in that committee were put on the record here. If I am wrong, then the hon. member will have a chance to correct that and make his own defence when he is recognized.

[Translation]

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

It is my intention to reply to the previous speaker because I was present at all the proceedings of the standing committee to which he made frequent reference. He told us things that are not quite accurate about the statements made by Mr. Guy Cousineau, the Chairman of the Unemployment Insurance Commission and he also put his own interpretations on statements of the auditor general. I feel we should have the same privilege when we take part in the debate, namely be able to refer to the same sources as the others, and to reply.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: You are supposed to be the impartial chairman of the committee.

Mr. Nielsen: On the point of order raised by the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and I have not heard him, contrary to the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken, make any reference that was in any way not in keeping with the evidence adduced before the committee. The minister was the first offender in that regard. Perhaps Your Honour did not hear me at the time the minister commenced referring to the committee evidence. I asked for order and the Chair did not intervene. I mean no disrespect when I suggest this, Mr. Speaker. At the time that I called for order and since, the minister was given full latitude to discuss the evidence of the committee at his pleasure. While I appreciate the difficulty of the Chair, I think the door is open now in this regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The point that the Chair was trying to make was that the references by the minister, as I recall it, and the references by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) again as I recall it, arising from the evidence given in that particular committee were to supply information to fill in a timetable of events leading up to the legislation we are dealing with at the present time. Perhaps some of the references went a bit too far, but I am now asking for the co-operation of hon. members not to refer to evidence given in a committee that has not reported to the House. It is a very elementary rule of our Procedure that this is irregular.

Mr. Nielsen: Curtail the minister, then.

Mr. Baldwin: I shall be glad to make my point with a simple reference to facts within my knowledge. There may be some facts which have been referred to in the committee, but they are facts which I know as well. I want to say right away, however, that as far as the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) is concerned, no personal allegation was made against him. There were statements made that the government was responsible.

Mr. MacEachen: Is deceit not a personal allegation?

Mr. Baldwin: The government was responsible for deceit. The government is a corporate body—I think it is a dying body but the government was deceitful.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Our last respects to the deceased.

Mr. MacEachen: You can't weasel out of it that way. The charge was deceit against the minister personally, and members of the government.

Mr. Baldwin: I am charging the government with deceit.

Mr. MacEachen: You do not have the courage to do that personally.

Mr. Baldwin: I will repeat, I am charging this government with deceit in their practices in relation to this matter.

Mr. MacEachen: Why don't you have the guts to make the charge directly? You don't have the courage to do it directly.

Mr. Baldwin: I have made it directly, Mr. Speaker, and I have proven it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, with regard to this question of financial responsibility, not only with regard to evidence taken before this particular section of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee—and I will adhere to your ruling—but at a time when I had the honour to be chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, this question arose about the question of Governor General's warrants. The Auditor General made statements in 1962, 1963 and again I think in 1968 which were virtually the same as he has made in other meetings which are now not to be referred to in this House.

At that time the hon. gentleman pointed out, and he was supported by the Public Accounts Committee, that this was an exceedingly iniquitous practice. The first time that the Auditor General had occasion to refer to it, to my knowledge, was when dealing with the Governor General's warrants issued by a government which was of another party. It is not a question of a political issue; it is a question of belief as to the purity and sanctity of the manner in which the finances of this country are managed. In 1957, for example, Governor General's warrants were issued and complaints were lodged by hon. members now sitting on the other side of the House. As a result, the then minister of finance, Mr. Fleming, introduced legislation for the purpose of amending the Financial Administration Act.

I have read the proceedings of that debate. At that time, an amendment was introduced and passed by parliament and what is now section 23 of the Financial Administration Act was inserted in place of the former section 28 and became section 28. In reading the debates, it is interesting to note that the minister admitted that the purpose of the amendment was simply to put in more modern and conventional form the wording of that section of the Financial Administration Act which gave this power to a government. The wording of the then section 28 was:

> Where an accident happens to any public work or building when parliament is not in session and an expenditure for the repair or renewal thereof is urgently required, or where any other matter arises when parliament is not in session in respect of which an expenditure not foreseen or provided for by parliament is urgently required for the public good,

That makes perfectly plain what, prior to 1958, was the intention and the circumstances under which Governor General's warrants could be used. No one can seriously disagree that succeeding governments have invaded that principle. It is true that the act was changed and the wording reduced to "urgently required for the public good". Mr. Speaker, it was surely never intended to permit any government, particularly this government with its record of illegality, to be free to legislate by Governor General's warrants. But that is what they are doing, Mr. Speaker, there is no question about it.

There was a statutory limit of $800 million. I know that my friends opposite are seeking ways and means of evading this particular limitation. They are now saying that they do not proceed under section 137 when there is a statutory limit, they simply proceed by way of an appropriation. I call to the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, that in the order in Council they used words that made it quite plain that it was an advance. The wording in the Governor General's warrants and the wording in the Order in Council was:

> such advance to be repaid in such manner and such terms and conditions as the minister of finance may prescribe.

• (1640)

How can that be deemed anything but a loan or advance to be made to the Unemployment Insurance Commission by the government. Of course, it is an advance; there cannot be any other interpretation. The contention that the government was not proceeding under section 137 but was proceeding, instead, in some airy fairy way which it cannot describe, is simply an attempt to circumvent the positive restrictions in section 137, subsection 4. There is no way at all by which the government can extricate itself from this dilemma. It obtained, by governor general's warrants, the alleged right to advance to the Unemployment Insurance Commission an additional $454 million over and above the $800 million set as a statutory limit. That was to be repaid on such terms and conditions as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) may prescribe. Those words were included, in contemplation that the government would come back to this House and attempt to make legal what is illegal. It was an attempt to bring the government back under section 137 of the act. Mr. Speaker, section 137 reads:

> (1) Where the amount standing to the credit of the Unemployment Insurance Account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund is not sufficient for the payment of benefits and costs of administration under this Act, the Minister of Finance, when requested by the Commission, may authorize the advance to the Unemployment Insurance Account from the Consolidated Revenue of an amount sufficient to meet the payments required to be made in the operation of this Act.
> (2) An advance made under subsection (1) shall be credited to the Unemployment Insurance Account and be repaid in such manner and on such terms and conditions as the Minister of Finance may prescribe.

The government made a barefaced attempt to evade the provisions of section 137 by saying, "This is simply a grant; we will use the same words as are used in section 137 but come back to parliament later on, after we have won the election, shove this bill through, and make legal what was illegal so that these moneys shall be deemed to be an advance under section 137." That is what the government has attempted and that is what it is now asking this House to do. It is asking this House to legalize an illegal action, to ratify and confirm an action which was wrong and which had the effect of evading the financial responsibility and accountability of the government to this House. That is what the government is now asking this House to do.

As I said earlier, surely ways and means could be found of doing this properly. We have no intention, if we can help it, of countenancing the government's attempt to perpetrate this illegality. Surely, ways and means could be found, either through supplementary estimates or by other means on which there could be a common meeting ground, to arrange for the funding by way of advances or otherwise of such moneys as may be required by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to meet its commitments under the existing legislation. I object to the government using this type of blackmail and saying, "If you do not pass this bill legalizing this illegality and raising the ceiling to an unlimited amount, the unemployed will not get their money." We have made our position clear. We are prepared to meet the government in order that this may be done properly. If the government does not offer amendments, we will. This matter can be dealt with in a better way than by passing this legislation without amendment.

Mr. Nielsen: We will not ratify deceit.

Mr. Baldwin: Before sitting down, I like to think that my friends on my left, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), believe in the financial responsibility and accountability of the government. The government is responsible to parliament. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) I believe feels the same way. My hon. friends may laugh and chortle.

Mr. MacEachen: It is the mating call.

Mr. Baldwin: If they go along with the government in all respects on this legislation, if they help the government to pass the bill in its present form and so sanction and legalize an illegality, they would be seriously inhibited, or even estopped, in future in complaining that this government is not acting as it ought to in accordance with parliamentary proprieties and its financial responsibilities. I seriously ask my friends to consider this when they state their position on this legislation.

I almost sat down, Mr. Speaker. I was so carried away with exhorting my friends to my left that I forgot to do what I came here to do, that is move an amendment. I have just made a few remarks preceding the amendment, Mr. Speaker. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey)—

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member said, "seconded by the hon. member for Verdun".

Mr. Baldwin: I did not mean the hon. member.

Mr. Mackasey: I am still the member for Verdun. The hon. member for Saint Hyacinthe had a chance to change that, but did not do so.

An hon. Member: You blew that, Jed.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I was just drawing a long bow. I hoped my hon. friend would be so persuaded by my eloquence that he would say this is a great amendment. The hon. member refused to second the amendment even before hearing it. It is seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Wagner), formerly a very distinguished and honoured member of the National Assembly for Verdun. I move that all the words after "that" be struck out and the following added:

This House, while accepting the need to provide funds for payment of unemployment insurance benefits to those entitled, declines to approve a measure which, on the one hand, removes all restrictions on advances under Section 137 of the Unemployment Insurance Act 1971, and, on the other hand, seeks to legalize and ratify the improper and illegal actions of the government in making advances in excess of the statutory limit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will hear remarks on the point of order.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, in view of the time, if Your Honour wishes to wait until tomorrow, I will be happy to present argument then.

An hon. Member: Come on, Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: If it is Your Honour's wish to deal with the regularity of the motion, I should like to raise a number of objections. There are several objections; but I will probably mention only one. If it is irregular on one point it cannot survive, even if it is perfect on all others. It really is not perfect in any aspect or from any point of view.

• (1650)

The amendment suggests an objection to the removal of all restrictions on advances under section 137 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It is true that section 137(4) is to be repealed. Of course, this part of the amendment relates very directly to the clauses of the bill.

One of the well-know principles of moving reasoned amendments on second reading is that one cannot propose to amend on the second reading a clause of the bill. It would be open to the hon. member, once the bill were in committee and once the clauses were under examination, to deal with the matter which he has attempted to deal with in this part of the bill, namely removing all restrictions on advances under section 137. If that is the subject matter of this amendment or part of the subject matter, it can be dealt with directly when clause 1 of the bill is under discussion. That course is open to the hon. member and can be done at that stage if he wishes.

I wish to make one furtner argument. The final part of the amendment is not relevant. This part of the amendment reads:

—and on the other hand seeks to legalize and ratify the improper and illegal actions of the government in making advances in excess of the statutory limit.

Any careful examination of the two clauses of the bill would fail to find any material in either clause which is related or pertinent to the subject matter of the bill. What the hon. member has done has been to confuse this bill with the subject matter that is now being dealt with in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee. That committee has been asked to deal with the supplementary estimates, which include the warrants to which the hon. member has taken exception. There is no effort in this bill to legalize and ratify actions of the government in making advances in excess of the statutory limit. There is nothing in clause 1 or clause 2 which attempts to do anything of that kind. It is not there.

Mr. Nielsen: You say.

Mr. MacEachen: I suggest that a reading of clause 1 or clause 2 will sustain that. I believe the amendment is quite irrelevant. It merely strikes out the repealing section which will make it possible after the expiry of the warrants in February to make advances. It does not have anything to do with what happens up until the moment of February 8 to legalize or not legalize.

Clause 2 merely asks the House to treat the proposal that is made in the supplementary estimates as an advance rather than as an appropriation. If that is not clarified and if the supplementary estimates and the subsequent appropriation bill are approved, the advances "authorized by the warrants" will find their way into the fund. Under the section of the Unemployment Insurance Act, if they find their way into the fund, they can only be used for payment out of the fund for administrative costs because they will be thereby defined under the section of the Unemployment Insurance Act as an appropriation. This is really to remedy that. It has nothing to do with an effort to legalize and ratify any alleged improper and illegal action of the government. Of course, I do not make a political argument that can be made as to the use of this kind of pejorative language in an amendment, improper and illegal action of the government. That is not an amendment. That is florid debate. I am surprised that a lawyer of the standing of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) would use such language in a purely legal framework.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon on the same point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, normally when we listen to the Government House Leader, we hear a more useful contribution on points of order such as this. This amendment does not deal with sections, as he is asking hon. members to believe. It does not deal with any specific sections of the bill, as he suggests. It is a general amendment which seeks to decline approval of this House to extending the purpose of the legislation, which is twofold.

The bill before us seeks to extend the ceiling that is now imposed by section 137(4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act. It also seeks to legalize something which, on the face of it, is unlawful. The minister indicated that he does not agree with this. He placed his argument on the basis that the second part of the amendment is not relevant.

The minister has been here and in government long enough to know that what he asked members to believe a moment ago, that once the supplementary estimate is approved and an appropriation bill is passed by the House, the money, by way of advances, would find its way into the unemployment insurance fund, is not correct. He knows very well that the money advanced by that warrant has already been spent under that vote of the estimates. With regard to the money advanced by the second warrant, a portion has been spent since January 4.

The illegality lies in the fact that payments are made by virtue of payments made under section 23 of the Financial Administration Act and any future requirements. One must take judicial notice of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act. On the face of it, the action is illegal. The vote of the House referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates is an ill description in terms of the law applying in terms of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act.

In my submission, what the amendment seeks to do is perfectly in order. It seeks the approval of this House to decline to ratify something which was done in a manner that was patently wrong. Let us forget about the terms illegality and impropriety. What the government has done is manifestly wrong on the basis of the existing Statutes of Canada. All the amendment seeks to do is obtain the approval of the House to reject the government's attempt, first to take away the parliamentary privilege of improving all appropriations and, second, to retroactively cure something they were not authorized to do in the first place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit for Your Honour's consideration that this amendment does not meet the rules that normally apply to a reasoned amendment on second reading. One of the standard principles with respect to such amendments is that they cannot have it both ways. They cannot both approve and disapprove of a measure before the House. This amendment is drawn in language that suggests that the movers of it accept a certain aspect of the legislation, namely the need to supply funds, but they are opposed to what the bill actually does. I submit therefore that it falls on that ground.

• (1700)

The second point I should like to make is in support of the remarks made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), although I shall bring forward a couple of citations. In looking at page 170 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, paragraphs (12) and (14) of citation 202, I find that paragraph 12 reads as follows:

> An amendment proposing a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order.

Then paragraph 14 reads:

> An amendment which would produce the same result as if the original motion were simply negatived is out of order.

I submit that is precisely what this amendment is. It is nothing more nor less than a direct negative. The movers of this amendment are opposed to the second reading of this bill. They can achieve the same purpose by voting against the bill. Therefore, this amendment, as a direct negative, is out of order.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) tries to say that the President of the Privy Council is talking about the clauses of the bill rather than the bill itself. I submit the only thing this bill does is remove the $800 million ceiling.

Mr. Nielsen: Oh, no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Yukon says "Oh, no". That other clause he is dragging into the discussion does not do anything new. It has nothing to do with the way in which Governor General's warrants are drawn. It merely says that any money parliament appropriates by adopting the miscellaneous estimate now before the standing committee shall be treated as an advance and not as an appropriation.

Mr. Nielsen: Then, you have not seen the arguments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is making the same nonsense from a seat which is not his own as he does from his own seat. This bill is as clear as a bill can be. It does one thing. It deals only with that $800 million ceiling. I accept the right of my friends in the Conservative party to argue that that ceiling should be maintained, but they can do so by voting against the second reading of this bill. It is, therefore, not proper for them to try to do it by means of a direct negative.

In respect of the third part of the motion, I will merely say what has already been stated. It seems to me it is irrelevant to the bill. It implies that in some way or other the bill is legalizing what has already been done. This bill does not do that. The legalizing of the Governor General's warrants will come when the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates submits its report and the House deals with it here. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on these three counts I submit that you should find the amendment out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière, on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments on this point of order. I agree with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said. However, I regret that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has only been drafted in English—besides being contradictory, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said.

Indeed, the first part of the amendment states that benefits should still be paid because he would not want to antagonize the recipients. Yet the rest of it is contradictory and amounts to a sort of nonconfidence motion.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has quoted paragraphs (12), (13) and (14) of citation 202, on page 170 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. Mr. Speaker, I should like to bring to your attention paragraph (15) of the same citation, which reads as follows:

(15) An amendment approving part of a motion and disapproving the remainder is out of order.

Such is the nature of the motion moved by the hon. member for Peace River. It tends to approve part of the clause because payment of benefits is desired, but on the other hand it is a sort of non confidence motion.

However, Mr. Speaker, paragraph (15) adds, and I quote:

On the 20th October, 1932, the Prime Minister moved that the House approve a Trade Agreement entered into between Canada and the United Kingdom. An amendment was moved that the House welcomed certain terms of the Agreement and condemned several features of it. The Speaker ruled it out because (a) the portion of the amendment which approved the Agreement was useless as it suggested no change in the main motion, and also, (b), an amendment to disapprove what the main motion approves is nothing but an expanded negative.

This is why I suggest that this is not only a non confidence motion in disguise but a contradictory amendment and that, therefore, the Chair should rule it out.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) let me say that I have never disguised my lack of confidence in this government. In introducing this legislation, the minister made quite plain that the obvious purpose of the bill in part, particularly clause (1) which removes this ceiling, is to provide that there should be an opportunity to supply benefits to the unemployed which does not now exist. There is no question about that. He said that in his introduction, and it is quite plain that this is what it purports to do. It would remove a ceiling which has already been exceeded, and there would be an opportunity to make payment of those benefits. We are now carrying on the 1973 version of the battle of reasoned amendments.

Under citation 382 of Beauchesne—which is precisely the British practice and the practice carried on here—we find the following:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a Bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill.

In the first place, we are met here in this bill with two different principles, if there are any in the bill at all, about which I have my doubts. The first of two principles, if there are any, is the raising of the ceiling. Quite unrelated to that is the question of saying that advances made under Governor General's warrants shall be deemed to be advances made under the act. I shall come to that in a moment.

We approve that principle which we find in the legislation which says that because of the incompetence of this government in administering this act it is now in a position where, after February 8, benefits cannot be paid to those who are entitled to receive them. We say that to that extent we accept the principle.

Dealing with the other aspect of the bill, a certain ruling has been made over and over again, certainly in the United Kingdom and here as well. There was an occasion last session when Mr. Speaker indicated his approval of an amendment moved by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). We were saying at that time that if we do not like all the relevant and surrounding circumstances involved in a bill, but do not want to be placed in the position of rejecting all of it, there is reason to say that we accept part but do not like the other principles involved. Our declaration of that particular fact is on record. That is what we are doing.

We say we are ready to accept that aspect of the bill which says a way must be found—the government has provided a way which might not be the right way—to make available these benefits, but we do not like the other aspect of the principles involved. We do not like the other aspects and principles involved, so how else can we do it? I suggest this is the purpose of a reasoned amendment.

• (1710)

I have about 25 precedents before me, all of them amendments similar to mine, which were moved and accepted in the United Kingdom parliament. It may well be that this House does not want to listen any more to reasoned amendments. It may well be that we prefer to reach a yes or no conclusion, but I do not think that is a correct course of action. There should be ways and means by which hon. members can say that there are aspects of the legislation that are acceptable, but that they should be free to express their dissatisfaction with other parts of the legislation and should not have to wait until clause by clause study of the bill is reached.

These are my reasons for urging that this amendment be accepted. I do not want to take the time of the House and spoil the address of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who is champing at the bit, but I have a number of decisions before me, which were extracted from Hansard, citing particular amendments almost similar to the one I have moved.

An hon. Member: Almost.

Mr. Baldwin: They deal with subject matters debated in the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom government would not engage in illegality of this kind. Since this will be an issue that will be raised over and over again, I ask the Chair to consider these, if he sees fit to do so, on the basis that I submit there is a good case to be made for the Chair to hold that an amendment in the terms of that which I have moved is one that is in fact acceptable, thus permitting hon. members to express an opinion with regard to principles contained in this bill that they do not think they can support.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I can indicate to the House that it is my intention to reserve my decision. Therefore, it might be helpful if the hon. member for Peace River were to give the Chair one or two examples of stronger precedents for my guidance when I sit down to make my decision on this very important matter.

Mr. Baldwin: Does Your Honour wish me to do that now or shall I send them to you?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think some of them should be put on the record. After all, this may turn out to be a landmark decision.

Mr. Baldwin: In the United Kingdom Hansard for February 9, 1970, Mr. Speaker indicated that he did not select the following amendment. I might point out that the practice in the United Kingdom is that a number of amendments are offered, and the fact that an amendment is not accepted simply means that Mr. Speaker, from among a number of amendments that have passed the test of legality, selects the one that he thinks is most appropriate. This particular amendment was moved by the hon. member for Buckinghamshire South:

Unemployment Insurance Act

That this House, while accepting the general desirability of equal payment for work of equal value, does not believe that legislation is appropriate in this field and declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which wholly conflicts with the view of the Royal Commission on Equal Pay.

As reported on page 230 of Hansard for November 10, 1970 this amendment, moved by Mrs. Shirley Williams, appears:

"this House, while welcoming measures to help families in poverty, believes the Government's Family Income Supplements Scheme will assist only a tiny minority, further extend the complex system of a means-tested society which is an essential element in the policy of Her Majesty's Government, and will do nothing to encourage employers to improve very low wages in certain occupations."

A further amendment, moved on February 8, 1971, by Dr. J. Dickson Mabon, reads as follows:

"this House declines to give a Second Reading to a measure which, in rewarding those engaged in intensive animal production of a kind which can in no sense be called agricultural, penalises the ratepayers as a whole."

There are about 20 more, Mr. Speaker, but I just give those few as examples. There are others which I think are an even closer parallel to the amendment that I was persuaded to move in the House today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Sudbury is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) started by saying that he never disguises his want of confidence in this government. What he was disguising I suggest, was his own knowledge of the rules. Perhaps, rather than disguising his knowledge of them, what he was in fact doing was parading his ignorance of them, except that I know differently. I know that he has an extensive knowledge of the rules, so he was not being cynical or any more cynical than one can infer from the remarks that he contributed to the debate this afternoon.

Mr. Baldwin: Are you accusing me of deceit?

Mr. Jerome: Clearly what the hon. member was doing, in his attempt to criticize the government for breaking some of the rules, was that he himself was breaking the rules that he knows so well, condoning his own breach of the rules in his attempt to criticize the government. I suppose that one's judgment of the correctness and sanctity of one's actions depends on which side of the House one sits. The hon. member seems to be able to excuse breaches of the rules on his part when he wants to criticize the government for what he contends is a similar breach.

The hon. member asked how else was he able to get on the record the question contained in this motion. He has several legitimate methods of getting his viewpoint on the record. First of all, as clearly pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the effect of the motion is not in any way to amend the bill before the House but is simply to negative it. The reasons for so doing are properly a subject matter for commentary and debate.

What the hon. member is seeking to do, through what in no way can be dignified by being considered an amendment, is to do nothing more than to suggest that the members of the House vote against the government and give a reason for so doing. As he knows, that is the function of debate, and this is one way that he can place his viewpoint on the record without putting forward what I suggest is an illegal amendment.

The second thing he can do is to move that the bill be not read the second time now, but that it be read some other time. He can also put forward a different principle from that urged by the government in its handling of this particular situation, since he does accept that it is a problem that has to be handled.

Another thing he can do—and there are many others—is move a motion that the matter be given further consideration and study in order to determine whether the principles that he wishes to put forward should gain support from some other committee or group already designated. All of those methods would give the hon. member, as he well knows, the legitimate right to put forward his views.

What the hon. member is attempting to do by quoting precedents to the effect that members are entitled to give their reasons for being opposed to second reading in an amendment is to attach a privilege to the giving of reasons in an amendment, thereby legitimizing any amendment that contains such reasons. If one were to follow that argument, then I suggest it would be a trap that would lead one to the curious situation where any amendment put forward that happened to contain a paragraph taken from any other accepted amendment would have to be accepted by the House, regardless of how many other ways it offended the rules that are before us.

I submit that clearly the interpretation of those precedents is that an hon. member is entitled to give his reasons for objecting to second reading at this time, provided his amendment on second reading stage is in order. This is the very point to which the hon. member refused to address himself during the course of his remarks. I suggest that obviously the amendment that he has put forward is nothing more than the negation of the motion and therefore is not in order. The fact it attaches reasons makes it all the more offensive and in no way supports his argument.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would like to thank those hon. members who have taken part in the discussion of this interesting point of order. My decision is reserved. I now call on the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I earnestly hope that in my contribution to this debate I shall be able to avoid participating in the charges and countercharges that have marked a good deal of the discussion that has taken place this afternoon. Indeed, I want to thank the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) for giving me a cue for the opening of my remarks. He said at the end of his speech, at the point where he had forgotten to move his amendment, that he hoped I would demonstrate my belief in the rule of law or my belief in the accountability of the government, or whatever the phrase was, and that is exactly the point I want to make.

• (1720)

We believe in the rule of law. The Unemployment Insurance Act is a law of this land, passed by this parliament. That act provides very clearly that the benefits set out in the act shall be paid to those who are entitled to receive them. Lest there be any doubt on that point may I draw attention to Section 135(1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act which reads in part as follows:

> There shall be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and charged to the Unemployment Insurance Account
> (a) all amounts paid as or on account of benefits under this Act; and
>
> (b) the costs of administration of this Act.
> (2) Notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, amounts referred to in paragraph (a) of subsection (1) shall be paid by special warrants drawn on the Receiver General, issued by the Commission, and bearing the printed signature of the Chairman and Secretary of the Commission.

That is part of the fundamental law of this land, that unemployment insurance benefits are to be paid. I submit that if the government found itself in some difficulty because of misleading estimates, because of bungling here and there, or what have you, it still had an absolute responsibility to keep that law and to pay those benefits. If there were any difficulties that stood in the way it was bound to find a way to get around those difficulties.

I say to you that if because of a negative amount in the unemployment insurance account the government had broken that law by refusing to pay unemployment insurance benefits, I do not know what the Tories might have done—

Mr. Nielsen: You know very well.

Mr. Baldwin: We would have done it legally.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —but we would have raised the roof and the people of this country would have said it is up to the government to keep the law. The government, as I say, had a clear responsibility to pay these benefits, and when it discovered there was not enough money in the unemployment insurance account, or perhaps I should say enough credit in that account to pay them, or when it found there was going to be a negative figure in due course, it had a responsibility to find a legal way to put that account into a position so that those benefits could be paid. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I submit that it was only doing its duty when it relied on Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act.

A short while ago the hon. member for Peace River pointed out, as I intended to do for a different reason, that the terms of the Financial Administration Act were altered in two or three respects around about 1958. The hon. member for Peace River earlier today quoted that section of the Financial Administration Act as it used to read. It implied that it was to be used mainly in the case of an accident to a bridge, a building or a public work. The hon. member said that the change in the wording dropped that and put it in general terms.

I submit that dropping that miniscule sort of provision in respect of a bridge, a building or a public work, and putting that sanction in broad general terms, had the effect of giving the government the power to cope with any financial emergency that might face it. That is precisely the effect of Section 23(1) of the Financial Administration Act in its present form. I should like to put it on record as it now reads:

> Where a payment is urgently required for the public good when Parliament is not in session and there is no other appropriation pursuant to which the payment may be made, the Governor in Council, upon the report of the President of the Treasury Board that there is no appropriation for the payment and the report of the appropriate Minister that the payment is urgently required for the public good, may by order direct the preparation of a special warrant to be signed by the Governor General authorizing the payment to be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

How anyone can argue that the terms of that section have been violated is beyond my comprehension.

It is crystal clear that the time came when the unemployment insurance account was running into a deficit position. The Unemployment Insurance Act says that benefits must be paid. That law had to be kept. I submit that if anything ever met the definition of "public good" it is that. In the name of the public good, these unemployment insurance benefits had to be paid. At the same time, there was no other appropriation on which the government could draw to put credit into that unemployment insurance account. It had used up the $800 million the Minister of Finance could extend by way of advances. He could not advance any more money that way. There was no other appropriation on which the government could draw.

Therefore, I submit that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration at that time, the present hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey), and the President of the Treasury Board were quite within their legal rights. In fact, they were only doing their duty when they took before the Governor in Council the need to pass the appropriate Governor General's warrants so the law which required the payment of unemployment insurance benefits could be kept.

If we are going to talk about keeping the law and maintaining financial accountability, I suggest we put it on the proper basis. It would have been a case of breaking the law if the government said it had no money in the fund and could not pay these benefits. What would have happened in this country if that had taken place in the middle of the election period? I submit it would have been a lot more serious than what happened because of the backlash against unemployment insurance which was fanned and developed during the election period.

I submit that for time to be spent in this session trying to accuse the government of breaking the law is missing the point altogether. That is what Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act is for. It does not follow the wording of 100 years ago, that you can draw special money only to repair a bridge that has been hit by lightning. It is there for any emergency in which the public good has to be met and where there is not an appropriation on which the government can draw.

I may point out, although it is not completely relevant to the point I am making—yes, maybe it is—that another change was made in 1958 by the Conservative government at that time, and I give that government full credit for it. Prior to 1958 the Financial Administration Act, and before that the Consolidated Revenue Act as it used to be called, permitted Governor General's warrants to be used when parliament was not in session. There was no necessity for those warrants to be confirmed later by parliament. I remember, when we were going out of here for the 1958 election, I put the question to the then prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), as to what he was going to do about Governor General's warrants during that election period. He made the promise, either here in the House or out on the hustings, that if his government came back, it would amend the law to require that Governor General's warrants be confirmed by a succeeding session of parliament. I give him full marks. He kept the promise, and the law was changed.

So now, we have the benefit of that change. It is now in the law. It is there in later subsections of section 23 that the money obtained by a warrant must be approved by a supplementary estimate. That is what is happening in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee right now. I am not a lawyer as is the hon. member for Peace River. I have to look at these things in a very practical, commonsense, way. But as I read the law, it seems to me that the members of the government, faced with the tremendous social problem of unemployment insurance benefits having to be paid—granted, because they had no plans, no policy to deal with unemployment—found a legal way to do it, and it is now going through the further legal process of getting parliament to approve those warrants that were passed at that time. I submit that the roasting or the shadow boxing to which they are being subjected now is nothing compared with the opprobrium that would have been heaped upon them if they had not kept the law and paid the benefits as they should.

Because I have some memory of these things around here, I also find it strange that members of the Progressive Conservative party are complaining about executive action when parliament is not in session. I happen to remember very well the events of June, 1962, just after the election of that year. As hon. members will recall, everything was rosy just before the election of June 18, 1962, but right afterward there was a dollar crisis, a crisis in trade, and so on, between this country and the United States. So the minority government of that day passed by order in council a surcharge on imports, order PC 1962-902. The effect of this was to increase import duties. This was done by executive action. How did they do it? The law of the land does not permit the members of the cabinet to raise duties on imports or to pass an order-in-council for doing something which does not have statutory basis. However, they were pretty smart in those days. They passed a double-barrelled order in council.

On the one hand, they looked into the Customs Tariff and they found that although they could not raise duties, they could transfer categories of goods from one column to another and that this could have the effect of increasing the duties charged on those goods.

An hon. Member: That is called cooking the books.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So, they transferred certain categories of goods from one column to another. But the trouble with that was that it raised the duties by too much. It raised them by 20 per cent or 25 per cent in some cases, and they did not want to do that; they wanted them raised by only 5 per cent, 10 per cent or 15 per cent. So they looked in the Financial Administration Act—this Bible which is now being quoted—and they found in a section which is now section 17 the power to remit or to forgive taxes or charges. So they passed a blanket provision that these duties, which they had raised by transferring them from one column to another, were to be forgiven to the extent necessary so that they would be brought down to duties of 5 per cent, 10 per cent or 15 per cent for the various categories listed in that order. This is about as devious and unusual an order in council as we have ever had. I remember being at home in Winnipeg just after the election and hearing about it on television. I just could not believe it.

Well, we came down here that fall for the session. Some hon. members from the Liberal side, or one or two of them who have gone to their reward—in some cases it is to another world, in some cases it is to another place—picked up the cue from us. We were sitting over where the Social Credit party now sits. They fought this order bitterly. They said it was an illegal order in council. The right hon. member for Prince Albert said no, that they had the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, they had the opinion of the Department of Justice, that this was a perfectly proper order in council. We fought hard, the Liberals and our party, but we got nowhere with them. In due course the session ended, there was an election, and the Liberals came to power in 1963.

An hon. Member: What's the difference?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In the meantime, of course, some pretty big companies in this country which were affected rather seriously by these higher duties of 5 per cent, 10 per cent or 15 per cent, decided that they would go to court claiming that the order in council was invalid.

So the Liberal government, which was by then in power, went to the same law officers of the Crown, to the same people in the Department of Justice, and asked: What is your opinion now? These were the very same law officers of the Crown who had told the Tories that the order in council was legal. Now, they told the Liberals that it was not and that they had to do something about it.

Mr. Jamieson: Same old gang!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So the Liberals brought in a bill. In this situation big sums of money were at stake. I want to say that if the 1972 election had gone the other way, the Tories, who are now complaining about these Governor General's warrants, would have got them themselves, in order to pay unemployment insurance claims. Or if they had found warrants already there that had been passed by the Liberals, as probably would have been the case, they would have brought in supplementary estimates approving what the Liberals had done. They would have had no other course.

So let us not have this nonsense about getting legal opinions. I am not going to use the man's name, but the actual official in the department who one year said it was legal was the same official who the next year said it was illegal.

An hon. Member: He got his reward.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No, he did not. He is now in the academic world somewhere.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Let us not get lost in this argument about what is legal and what is illegal. The basic fact so far as the law is concerned is that the unemployment insurance benefits had to be paid, and that there was a provision in the Financial Administration Act that enabled the government to cope with the crisis which, I admit, had come about because members of the government bungled the administration. They had received poor statistics from the Department of Finance, Statistics Canada, or somewhere else, and fundamentally they had not really come to grips with the problem of unemployment. If they had not allowed unemployment to become so high this whole problem would not have arisen. The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Mackasey) is perfectly right when he points out that that is the real issue, and not the Unemployment Insurance Act.

• (1740)

When people talk about the law and make these complaints about whether it is being kept or not, I want to refer to something else. When Mr. Benson had before us that big bill amending the Income Tax Act, which I think we passed in December, 1971, it provided a change with respect to the income tax exemption for senior citizens. The provision in that bill was that at age 65 every taxpayer would get an extra $650 exemption. That became law effective January 1, 1972.

That is still the law, Mr. Speaker. It has not been changed. That is the law for 1972, that the extra exemption for taxpayers 65 years of age and over is $650. But last May 8 the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) in his budget speech proposed that that figure of $650 be raised to $1,000. No bill to make this change was ever introduced, but it was promised, and the promise was that it would be effective as at January 1, 1972.

This got thrown around a lot during the recent election campaign. In fact, it was even mentioned in the literature that went out with the old age security cheques. You know, Mr. Speaker, the government never puts propaganda into the literature it sends out, but there it was. It said, "We have asked parliament for this increase to $1,000 and, if parliament agrees, this will apply as of January 1, 1972." It is a good provision. I like it and welcome it. But, Mr. Speaker, it has not been passed. It is not the law of the land. The law of the land is $650.

I wonder if any hon. members have looked at the income tax forms that have recently been issued. The new income tax form says that at age 65 the exemption is $1,000. Why don't my Tory friends get up and raise the roof about the fact that the government is breaking the law, that it is letting the Department of National Revenue put out an income tax form that is at variance with what the law says? Like all of us, they are the friends of the old age pensioners. They wanted us to adjourn for a day a while ago. What good that would do for the old age pensioners I do not know. But in any case the Tories are not saying a word about this departure from the law, or maybe they are not aware of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, Oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is it not a fact, and I put this forward for a purpose, that some time this year whatever government is here—Liberal, Conservative or New Democratic—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Or Social Credit.

Mr. Jamieson: Or a combination thereof.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I want to show my impartiality and so I had better mention Social Credit too—is it not a fact that that law will be passed, and that at some point that change from $650 to $1,000 will be confirmed? I cannot imagine that the government, after our older people have all filed their income tax returns according to that form, would send out a notice saying, "You have to pay so much more because you did not conform with the law." No, Mr. Speaker, parliament will make the law conform with the form. This goes on all the time. We complain about it, but it goes on. Money gets spent before it is actually approved. Taxes are imposed as of midnight on the day the Minister of Finance makes a budget speech, subject to their being approved later.

I am glad that that exemption is there on the income tax form for the old age pensioners, in the knowledge that this parliament will approve it, as we shall certainly do. I think that with respect to unemployment insurance the situation is parallel, that what the government has done has been to find a way to pay that money, knowing that this parliament would approve of that action.

I submit that even my hon. friends in the Conservative party, who want to lambaste the government for what it is doing, have shown by their very motion that they do not dare vote against the approval of the money that was used to pay unemployment insurance benefits. That is what it is all about, Mr. Speaker. For those reasons it is our intention to endorse the course the government has taken in this respect, and to vote for this bill, Bill C-124. This does not mean that we approve of the way in which the government has handled unemployment insurance, and I give notice to the government that Bill C-125 is a different kettle of fish. We don't like that bill at all. Don't look to us for support on that. If you want support on that one you will have to get it from the Tories.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If anything, that bill is an appeal to the Tory backlash. So, if you want support on that get it from them.

This bill, Bill C-124, as I pointed out when we were on the point of order, really does just one thing. It removes the $800 million ceiling. Frankly, I think it ought to be removed. I don't think it should ever have been put in there.

This afternoon the Minister of Manpower and Immigration gave good arguments as to why it should be removed. I noted his arguments as to why it was put there. He said it was put there in the belief that it might exercise some form of control. Of course it did not do that at all. I do not suppose we will ever really know why it was put there, but I have a suspicion of why it was put there. I think that figure was put there so that the then minister of finance would not have to give any estimate of how much he would have to pay out in unemployment insurance benefits. In other words, he would not have to give any estimates of what future unemployment might be. So, he protected himself, as he thought to the limit, by giving the figure of $800 million as a limit on advances at any one time. But it did not work, and now we are in this trouble.

I submit that if the Unemployment Insurance Act, the law of the land, says that if people meet certain conditions then they get unemployment insurance benefits, there should not be any law anywhere else, or any $800 million ceiling, or any other provision that could have the effect of denying them the right to draw those benefits. I call on my hon. friends in the Conservative party to support that position, that whatever benefits are provided to our people should get through to them without any question of financial limitation. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we think that this bill should be passed quickly and sent to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, so that it can come back here and become the law, and so that we do not have to worry about that $800 million ceiling. Remember, all we are talking about is advances, which for the most part get paid back in due course.

We also think that the other transaction, the Governor General's warrants, should be approved quickly so that there will be no question along about the 8th or 9th of February about the government running out of money to pay unemployment insurance benefits. Parliament is sitting here now, and under the terms of the Financial Administration Act Governor General's warrants cannot be sought. The government has to depend on parliament. I hope parliament will realize that it has a responsibility to see that this law is upheld, to see that the commitments in the contract involved in the Unemployment Insurance Act are kept so far as the people of Canada are concerned.

We know that there are other changes that might have to be made to the act, perhaps some rather sweeping changes. But they are not the changes that are in Bill C-125. They are not the changes my hon. friends to my right would like to see. We think there should be more guarantees as to the rights of the people who come under that act. We hope that when Bill C-125, or its subject matter, gets to committee we will be able to go fully into this question. As it stands, we cannot and will not support Bill C-125.

However, that is not before us at the moment. We are on Bill C-124, and what is before us is simply the question of the $800 million ceiling. I could join in the lament about the bungling, about the lack of sufficient statistical information, about the fact that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration were probably getting their statistics from different sources, and about the fact that there was a lot of confusion and inefficiency. I could talk about the ways in which they yielded because of the backlash during the election campaign, but we can sort all that out later. What I insist on right now is that we have had enough of this playing with the unemployed by suggesting that it was illegal for the government to get their payments to them when, in point of fact, the law required that this be done. Let us now tell the government to get on with the job of coping with unemployment itself. That is the real problem.

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to waste the time of the House because I feel that the bill now under consideration is a mere joke.

During the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, I stated that I was surprised by the cheekiness of the government members who said one thing, but acted otherwise.

Today, once again the government shows its inconsistency. When I compare the comments of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) in his statement before the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates with the bill now under consideration, I am disgusted.

A press release dated January 17, 1973 and entitled "Comments on proposed amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act concerning total advances" reads in part as follows:

> This bill recommends the elimination of the $800 million ceiling on total advances. Such a ceiling is not realistic since it is based on unstable factors such as national and regional unemployment rates, average income rates and labour force expansion.

In committee the necessity of ceilings is confirmed while in the House it is denied. One could believe that the government is taking us for clowns or more exactly for chickens. It is intellectual indecency or unconsciousness on the part of the government. Perhaps you think that I am joking but I will quote the President of the Treasury Board.

On page 25 of issue No. 2 of the Minutes of Proceedings of the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates you will find the following question from the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and I quote:

> MR. NIELSEN: There seems little purpose in having a ceiling at all in the act under those conditions.
> MR. DRURY: No, Mr. Chairman, I suggest there is a very good purpose in having a ceiling. This particular ceiling, I suggest, was put in in order that Parliament would have an opportunity to examine the reasons for the circumstances surrounding any sums in excess of this, which is precisely what we are engaged in now.

It was precisely what we were also engaged in at that time. This is what we were doing. We were trying to determine why the $800 million ceiling had been exceeded. But those lines were hardly printed when the government rejected any studies of this kind. They want to establish an arbitrary system, without ceiling and intended mainly to prevent parliament from looking into the matter. And I further quote the minister:

> I do not want to make a great thing of this. Parliament would have an opportunity . . .
> . . of inquiring into the operation of the fund if the amount of the advances exceeded $800 million. If the ceiling had been set at a hypothetical figure, $5 billion, there would have been no occasion for the issue of Governor General's warrants. There would have been no occasion for a parliamentary examination of the operations of the fund or the commission. By placing this limitation, the executive is required to come before Parliament to explain how and why it happened and what changes should be made.

Mr. Speaker, what is the purpose of all this? Why should a minister who claims to be responsible bring forward such an argument when his own party suggests the opposite? Is that cabinet loyalty? No wonder problems are never solved. Are government members striving to get us mixed up or are they themselves so mixed up that they don't know what to do?

Overnight, ceilings are removed and the worst of it is that, although there is no money, they are promising reimbursement plus interest.

To seek to remove the $800 million ceiling because it is impossible to make accurate estimates, to make an adequate assessment of the fluctuations of unemployment rates, well and good. I am even prepared to accept the minister's indirect recognition of his department's inefficiency.

In fact, whether there is a ceiling or not on the estimates is irrelevant. Workers do not want to know which measures the government intends to take to control unemployment insurance to its advantage but they do want means to be taken so that the government will fulfil its commitments on their behalf.

Even if in committee the official opposition wanted to be overcritical about the illegality of the procedure and even if today the government tries to cover up its mistake by bringing in this bill, we want action, amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act, a speedier procedure for payment of benefits and especially deference for the right of the worker to the benefits which he has paid when he was working and which are now due to him. These are the things we ask for.

Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to accept the proposal of the government, but why promise reimbursement plus interest when we already know the preference of the department? Once again the worker will be penalized by the accountants and employees of the state.

Mr. Speaker, has anyone ever heard of a civil servant working for the Unemployment Insurance Commission having to wait for 15 weeks to get his salary? No. The one who pays is penalized; he has to wait; he is made to play hide-and-seek. But we make sure the parasite is reimbursed, and we even pay him interest, dividends. But who pays the bill? Again as always, the taxpayer, the worker.

Mr. Speaker, is this bill going to change the worker's situation in any way? It does nothing positive. It only gives the government the guarantee of being able to dig into the pockets of taxpayers without parliament—according to the President of the Treasury Board—asking any questions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Caouette (Charlevoix): Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

COMMUNICATIONS

TELESAT CANADA—STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON LETTERS PATENT

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, letters patent issued by my Colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in favour of Telesat Canada, were tabled in the House on January 4. These letters patent pursuant to Section 33 of the Telesat Canada Act provide for the amendment of the corporation's objects to enable it to render service by satellite to and between locations outside Canada and to provide managerial and engineering services to interested parties wherever they are located. At present the Telesat Canada Act gives the Corporation the legal capacity to provide service between locations in Canada.

The letters patent become effective on the thirtieth sitting day after they have been laid before parliament unless before that day either House resolves that the letters patent shall be annulled.

The reason that Telesat service to locations outside Canada is possible, is that the beams from the Telesat satellites, which focus on Canada, spill over and cover adjacent areas such as part of Alaska and some of the contiguous States of the South.

Telesat applied for the letters patent because early last year it saw the possibility of doing some very useful out-of-Canada business. It had been receiving repeated enquiries from American companies who were anxious to use the Telesat satellites. Telesat Canada already has entered into tentative agreements with some of its potential United States customers, and these have been reported in the press.

I would like now to turn to some of the considerations which surround the new development. The first of these are Canada's obligations under the inter-governmental agreement which controls the International Telecommunication Satellite Organization (Intelsat). One of the important provisions of the agreement is that all of the member countries are obliged to give Intelsat—and thus their own investments in it—a measure of protection against the establishment of competing satellite systems which might also be used for international purposes. Thus any proposal that Telesat may make for providing international service will require consultation with the Assembly of Intelsat prior to deciding on its implementation. Here I should explain that "international Service" is one that is rendered between locations in different countries.

[English]

Officials of the Department of External Affairs, of my department and of Telesat have held several discussions with their counterparts in the United States government on this question and an understanding has been reached on the precise modalities to be associated with the Intelsat consultation.

In the course of the discussions with the United States, both parties realized that it would be useful also to deal with the question of how the Telesat satellites, or future United States domestic satellites, might be utilized, in mutual assistance fashion, to provide services in or to the other country. Examples of possible service involving the United States and Canada fall into three broad categories. The first is a straightforward support to the other country in the event of a catastrophic failure in its own system. The second is the provision of a domestic service within the other country, on an interim basis, when its own facilities have not yet been established or it is temporarily short of capacity. The third is an extension of what is essentially a domestic service across the border to include points in the other country. Such an extension, which clearly is international by definition, would be no more than of an incidental and peripheral nature but it may be of long-term duration. Communications in support of pipelines could be in this category.

In all cases a particular proposal would be subject to the approval of the appropriate authorities in both countries and through this safeguard each country can be sure that its own interests are being served. These procedures and principles have been embodied in letters exchanged in November with the United States.

So far as Canada is concerned, the appropriate authority will be the Minister of Communications pursuant to his licensing powers under the Radio Act. Also, Telesat Canada will have to meet any applicable requirements of other legislation, including that administered by the Canadian Transport Commission. As Telesat moves forward to implement the expanded powers, I know that its board and its management have every intention of ensuring that Canadian interests, both present and future, will have priority consideration in system planning and use and I know that the tentative agreements already entered into so provide. However, in case there is any doubt I am prepared to state categorically that Canadian interests must have priority and that I have the power to ensure that this policy will in fact be respected.

• (1410)

Important in this matter when international communication is involved is the position of the Crown corporation, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation. The statute under which it operates gives the corporation the legal capacity to establish and operate external telecommunication services with the telecommunications services of other nations. "External" in this context means between Canada and any place outside Canada.

In the satellite communication field the position of the COTC takes on special significance by virtue of the corporation being the signatory for Canada to the Intelsat operating agreement, thus providing Canada's representative on the board of governors of that organization. The future of international communication is complex; it will require the careful attention of all concerned to ensure that Canada's interests are being served. This in turn demands that the COTC be a strong entity, one that Canada can regard as her primary instrument in this important field.

I am sure hon. members will agree that if, as planned, Telesat expands its role to embrace international services, even though these may seem small by comparison, there should be appropriate recognition given to the position of the COTC. In my capacity as the minister responsible, I intend that this will be done.

[Translation]

In summary, this new Telesat development, coming on the heels of considerable success in promoting its Canadian services, should be a very stimulating one for Canada. Not only will Telesat benefit, but there may well be new opportunities for Canadian engineers and manufacturers. The opportunities for effectively using satellite communication in and around a country such as ours are virtually unlimited.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not responding to the minister's statement. That response will be made in due course by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan). My point of order is that I wish to bring to the attention of the House and to the attention of members of the ministry that Standing Order 15(3) provides that on motions a minister may make an announcement or statement respecting government policy but any such announcement or statement should be limited to facts. I am not going to be critical of the minister; he has simply done what other ministers have done. But I point out that this statement deals with the reasons behind the letters patent that have been filed and, as the minister said, this may be the subject of debate in the House.

There is an opportunity, within 30 sitting days after the letters patent have been filed, for the House by way of resolution to debate and discuss this issue. The minister has given reasons why, in his view, these letters patent should have been presented and why the course the government has undertaken is a fit and proper policy. Under those conditions it would be quite possible to embark on a debate at this time. I do not know what the hon. member for Annapolis Valley will say. I hope he does not involve himself in debate to which there could be responses. And so it could go, down the line. However, I think I am entitled to bring this matter to the attention of the ministers and the members who respond so that there will be proper use made of this Standing Order.

[Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga).]

Mr. Speaker: Before calling on the hon. member for Annapolis Valley I might say that I appreciate the point made by the hon. member for Peace River. I thought yesterday that there was, to some extent, an abuse of the provisions of the Standing Order, not necessarily on the part of the minister but rather on the part of those who responded to the minister's statement. This might be an opportunity to bring to the attention of both the ministry and hon. members who respond to statements by ministers that under the terms of Standing Order 15 their statements must be brief. My recollection is that after a seven or eight minute statement made by a minister yesterday there were comments in response which were much longer. I was of the opinion that the statements were too long but, because it was such an important matter, I felt I should not intervene and I did not. I appreciate the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River. I think ministers should limit the length of their statements under the terms of Standing Order 15, and I would hope that members who speak in response to those statements will also be brief.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I certainly intend to be brief. I am glad we can honour your direction to be brief. I usually am brief.

I thank the minister for giving notice of his statement. We on this side of the House are glad to hear some communication from the Minister of Communications (Mr. Pelletier), who has been one of the more reticent ministers in the House. While some statements may be long and verbose in terms of the rules of the House, we on this side would like the minister to give more shorter and terser statements from time to time rather than sit in the vacuum of silence he has maintained for such a long time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) wants to make his statement on the budget now. We are waiting for that, and it will be terse.

The letters patent tabled by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Gray) on January 4 in favour of Telesat Canada represent a substantial modification of the objectives laid out in the Telesat Canada Act. The minister's statement sheds little light on the obvious implications of modifying section 5 of the Telesat Canada Act which limits the company to establishing satellite telecommunication services between locations in Canada. The possibilities of Canadian operated satellites being able to cover contiguous parts of the North American continent have always been evident.

There is some doubt in my mind concerning the propriety of effecting such an important and substantive change in the legislation passed by parliament in this way. As it stands, the letters patent tabled by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will become effective on the 30th sitting day after they have been laid before parliament. At this time, careful consideration must be given to the implications of the changed orientation of Telesat services and it may therefore be necessary for the House to debate fully whether such letters patent should be annulled.

Certainly there is a serious question in my mind concerning the implication that providing services to our continental neighbour will enjoy a higher priority than providing telecommunication facilities to the northern parts of Canada. Until this latter question has been clarified adequately, it will be impossible for members of this party to welcome the changes as outlined by the Minister of Communications in his statement. In sharing our technology and the service that Telesat can give to North America, we want to make sure we do not sell ourselves short. I think that is important.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I and members of my party welcome today's statement on the expanding role of Telesat Canada, a Crown corporation, in the increasingly complex and expanding role of domestic and international communications. We also thank the minister for providing the various parties with advance copies of his statement, as we do the president of Telesat for the trouble he took to inform all parties of the rationale behind the corporation's request for expanded powers. Thus we are in a position to provide something more than an off-the-cuff reply today.

It is important to say that members of my party expressed some concern that the expansion of powers through the amendments to the letters patent tabled earlier this session deleted the previous sections limiting the company to domestic or Canadian users, thereby leaving the possibility that Canadian firms might in future be denied access to channels because of contract commitments made between the corporation and non-resident firms that may offer more lucrative terms. In short, neither the Telesat Canada Act nor the amending letters patent make it explicit that Canadian interests will be served first and that any contracts made to service foreign needs will be temporary and secondary and, further, limited to our unused or back-up capacity. We are grateful, therefore, that the minister in his statement has taken the opportunity to articulate the government's position on this subject by saying, as found on page three of his statement:

• (1420)

As Telesat moves forward to implement the expanded powers I know that its board and its management have every intention of ensuring that Canadian interests, both present and future, will have priority consideration in system planning and use and I know that the tentative agreements already entered into so provide. However, in case there is any doubt I am prepared to state categorically that Canadian interests must have priority and that I have the power to ensure that this policy will in fact be respected.

Therefore we are reassured that the minister has the necessary powers, and I am certain that as long as the minister is in office he will respect Canadian interests. My party, however, would be even more reassured by a statement in the minutes of a meeting of the corporation's board confirming what the minister has told us.

We are pleased by the fact that Telesat at present is roughly 60 per cent publicly owned and we desire it to remain that way. This party opposes the provision whereby the structure is to be one-third public, one-third carriers and one-third private shareholders. We consider that the present arrangement is more democratic and more suitable to Canadian needs now and in the future.

We congratulate Telesat on being a Canadian company which has a considerable and virtually unique lead in this new field of advanced technology in global telecommunications. We congratulate Telesat on the successful launching of Anik I at Cape Kennedy last fall and express our best wishes for Anik II this spring. We appreciate Telesat's sympathetic response to Canadian manufacturers in the development of Canadian expertise in this field in the future. We believe that Telesat demonstrates that a mixed private-public corporation can be successful. Telesat is successful, and we in this party want it to continue to be just that.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the minister's statement seems to contain the necessary arguments allowing us to support him more especially as Telesat officials were kind enough to provide us with the useful information which will enable us to make a better judgment about that new policy.

That enlargement of Telesat services will be all the more beneficial if the income thus gained speed up telecommunication services in this country. We are especially referring to television services in certain remote and even in not so remote areas such as the northern part of my constituency, for example, where people are still waiting for that essential service.

We hope that this policy will benefit all Canadians.

FOOD PRICES

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. T. Lefebvre (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, there have been the usual consultations among the parties in the House regarding the membership of the special committee on food prices. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster):

That the members of the Special Committee on Food Prices be Messrs. Atkey, Boisvert, Cullen, Danforth, Fleming, Fox, Gauthier (Ottawa East), Gauthier (Roberval), Gleave, Graffiey, Horner (Crowfoot), Lawrence, Leblanc (Westmorland-Kent), Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway), Messrs. McGrath, Mitges, Mrs. Morin, Messrs. Murta, Penner, Roy (Laval), Saltsman, Scott, Whicher, Whittaker and Yanakis.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: What an army! It is an NDP-Liberal committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

DISCREPANCIES IN REPORTS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Elmer MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise, pursuant to Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Several of the monthly reports recently submitted pursuant to section 16 of the Regional Development Incentives Act contain differences and discrepancies as between the versions in both official languages. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this serious matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Regional Development for appropriate study and action.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Central Nova. The motion is proposed under Standing Order 43 and requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: If there were any nays I did not hear them. I think I should indicate to hon. members that if any member objects to a motion under Standing Order 43 it should be made clear to the House. I do not think there is any obligation on the part of the Chair to assume that such a motion will not receive unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I think the nays were clearer that time. There is not unanimous consent. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that it appears there are documents before the House that are inconsistent in that they contain discrepancies. My point of order is that the minister should either make a statement on motions to clarify the matter or he should take the documents from the table and replace them with the correct versions.

Mr. Speaker: I see the minister wishes to reply, but I do not think I can accept that as a point of order. It is obviously a point of debate and the matter should not be pursued at this time.

SPORTS

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43.

Recognizing the national character of the 1976 Olympic games in Montreal, realizing it would be unfair for Montrealers alone to pay all expenditures entailed, and taking into account the financial requirements that are essential to the success of those games, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme):

That a special debate be held as soon as possible to define the financial responsibility of this parliament with regard to those Olympic games.

Mr. Speaker: The House heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Joliette. The unanimous consent of the House is required, pursuant to Standing Order 43. Does the House agree unanimously?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: As the House is not unanimous, the motion cannot be put.

PUBLIC SERVICE

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT—CORRECTION OF ANSWER BY PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in response to a question asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) I replied that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) had not made any reference to compulsory retirement. On reading Hansard I discovered that I was in error and that in fact the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had used the term "compulsory retirement". I had understood that in his question he was referring to those who had been retired normally by reason of the regulations governing age rather than it being disciplinary retirement.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am happy that the minister has recognized in the House use of the word "compulsory". I would ask him at his earliest possible convenience to indicate on what authority a Crown corporation, the Cape Breton Development Corporation, can compulsorily retire miners at the age of 60.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have not yet reached the question period. Perhaps the question might be asked of the minister then and he can attempt to reply at that time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS ON DISC PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT INDICATING POINTS OF DIFFERENCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The publication of figures in respect of the trade deficit of the United States reminds us of the controversy between our two countries in regard to trade problems. Has the United States government requested any resumption of the discussions on the points of difference between our two countries in respect of matters of trade and, if so, when will these discussions resume?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any formal request on the part of the United States government for resumption of the discussions. I noted the same point the hon. Leader of the Opposition has in respect of their trade deficit. I would point out to him that the United States and Canada do have similar international problems. We, too, have a deficit on current account and we are looking at those areas, to those countries, where there is a surplus on current account.

Mr. Stanfield: Has the minister made any representations to the United States recently with regard to the so-called United States DISC program with relation to the tax advantages this program allegedly affords U.S. competitors of Canadian industries?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, over a period of time we have made our views known to the United States government about the DISC program. Recently my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, indicated that the monitoring measures that were introduced last fall have been successful in helping us to assess the effects of DISC on Canadian prices. So far it would appear that United States corporations have not taken advantage of DISC by lowering their prices on Canadian markets to the disadvantage of Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting but unfortunate to note that the minister is not concerned about this problem which seems to be giving great concern to the premier of Ontario. Will the minister at his early convenience make a statement to the House on motions outlining the special matters of difference between the government of the United States and the government of Canada in respect of trade and our relationships generally so that we will all be as up to date as I hope he is regarding these discussions?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to indicate that I am not concerned about DISC. Of course I am concerned, and the government is. The tax measures introduced in the May budget by the Minister of Finance made very clear at that time that among other things they were aimed at offsetting the effects of DISC on Canadian manufacturers.

Mr. Stanfield: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, I would not normally ask another supplementary question but I would like the minister to answer the question I asked. Will he inform the House as to the subject matters of the differences between the two countries in their commercial and trade relationships so that members of the House will be as up to date on the areas of difference as I presume the minister is?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would be prepared to consider that representation and report back later.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question. In view of the fact his predecessor listed a series of what he called "irritants" in relation to trade relations between the United States and Canada, which were being discussed by officials of both countries as a preliminary to a meeting at a higher level, may I ask now whether these irritants have been resolved to the government's satisfaction and, if not, why has the Canadian government not asked for further meetings to resolve these differences?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that two countries doing as much trade as our country and the United States will ever remove all the irritants. From time to time there will be irritants between our two countries just in the very nature of things. As to the second point in the hon. member's question, I think it has been made clear in the past that following the vote of confidence in the House we would be sitting down to discuss some of our outstanding differences with the United States authorities and, indeed, Mr. Speaker, that is our intention.

Mr. Baldwin: Maybe you better do it pretty quickly.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether the Canadian government has asked for such meetings, what has been the response, and when are such meetings likely to take place?

Mr. Gillespie: There has been no formal request on the part of the Canadian government or the United States government, Mr. Speaker. I would expect, though, that there would be preliminary or exploratory meetings in a few weeks time.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Trinity on a last supplementary question and then go to the next subject. Perhaps we can return to this matter later.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, did the minister indicate in his answer to the first part of the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition that in our negotiations with the United States we would insist on maintaining a balance which includes not just current account but also the outflow of Canadian dollars to the United States in respect of interest payments and dividends?

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would define current account to include non-merchandise matters as well as merchandise matters.

GRAIN

CONTINUATION OF GRANT TO GRAINS COUNCIL IN LIGHT OF WITHDRAWAL FROM MEMBERSHIP BY WHEAT POOLS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the decision of the three prairie wheat pools to withdraw from membership and support of the Canada Grains Council, leaving that organization largely representative only of the private grain trade, will the minister advise the House whether it is the intention of the government to continue the grant of some $50,000 a year to the council?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the government's intention. The Canada Grains Council has, of course, increased its membership over the years with other producer organizations. In addition, at the time the pools indicated to me their intention to withdraw they also indicated their willingness to continue working with the council on very important committees in order that their points of views and that of the producers would be represented there.

POSSIBILITY OF RESTRUCTURING OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE TO CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary in connection with the grain trade. Has the minister been approached by farm organizations such as the Palliser Wheat Growers' Association to restructure the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board in order to give more representation to the private grain trade and, if so, can he tell the House what the government's position is in respect of the advisory committee?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Palliser Wheat Growers' Association and some other groups have indicated a desire to review the make-up of the Wheat Board advisory committee, but not to give additional representation to the grain trade, private or otherwise. Indeed, their representations have been in the direction that representatives of the grain trade ought not to be on the advisory committee and that we ought to find a way to have more direct producer representation on it.

PROVISION OF CARS BY RAILWAYS TO TRANSPORT WHEAT

Mr. Bill Knight (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that at this time many country elevators are plugged and there is a lack of rolling stock, can the minister inform the House of any action to alleviate this very urgent problem?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I indicated to the House the other day, at a meeting last Sunday with the Wheat Board I was informed there were still some places where congestion was serious, particularly in the region represented by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The Wheat Board has taken special steps to see that cars to move the grain from that area will be going there in very large numbers, so I think the situation will be alleviated fairly shortly.

ALLEGED DISCOVERY OF ANTI-AIRCRAFT GUN IN ARMS CACHE

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Since the Quebec police recently found a cache of firearms in which there was an anti-aircraft gun, could the minister tell us if this weapon comes from a Canadian Forces Base? In the affirmative, could he say how many of these weapons have been reported missing by military authorities?

[English]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would have to have information about the weapon before I could say where it originated.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—MINISTER HAVING JURISDICTION—REPLY TO STAMP, COIN AND LOTTERY SCHEME PROPOSED BY COMMITTEE

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Could the Prime Minister please tell the House whether in fact the subject of the Olympic Games has been passed from the Ministry of Health and Welfare, under whose jurisdiction the Fitness and Amateur Sport Act is administered, and, if so, why and to whom has it been passed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Perhaps I can be helpful, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the present situation. I cannot recall that it was under the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Perhaps in the previous parliament it was, but certainly when this cabinet was formed at the time this parliament was elected the jurisdiction was put under the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, and it rests there now.

Mr. Stanfield: "Rests" is right.

Mr. Trudeau: I see there is some restlessness in the ranks of the Conservative party. Both he and I have been dealing with this matter and we are prepared to continue doing so.

Mr. Jelinek: As a supplementary question I would like to ask the Minister of State for Urban Affairs whether he could explain why there has been no reply to the request made last November by the Montreal Olympic Committee to approve the proposed scheme involving special stamps, coins and lotteries, necessary to finance the games, and in view of the fact the Montreal Olympic Committee must report to Lausanne by February 2, can the minister tell the House what the decision is with regard to their requests?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, those requests and proposals of the organizing committee are still being analysed by the department.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN CITY AND FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE OF NO FINANCIAL CONTRIBUTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I would like the Prime Minister to let the people of Canada know what the present position is concerning discussions between the city of Montreal and the government of Canada in respect of assistance to be given by the government of Canada. Can he give the country as a whole the assurance that, in view of the tremendous expenditures being made today, Canada is not going to make a contribution to the Olympic Games?

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Without commenting on the representation contained in the question, I certainly would be prepared to repeat what has been the government's stand from the outset, that there would be no special assistance, no special financial aid from the federal government to Montreal or to COJO for the holding of the Olympics. The correspondence and the discussions have always been to this effect. My statements have been to this effect. In fact, Mayor Drapeau's statements have confirmed that he understood that to be our position and he accepted it. I should add that a letter addressed to me by the Commissioner General just in the last few days is to that effect also. They understand that there is no commitment, nor do they request that the federal government make any special contribution to the holding of the Olympics. If I can go on, Mr. Speaker, there was a question of coinage which was alluded to—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister has made it very clear now, and I thank him. Does special assistance include loans because, if it does not, Canada will be milked again if loans are made by the federal government?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question of loans has not, to my knowledge, been brought up by either the mayor of Montreal or by COJO. I think the words should be taken to mean exactly that that if loans were to be at some cost to the Canadian taxpayer generally they would not be contemplated by the government.

I might add that there have been special requests in the area of coinage, stamps and so on. Our reply, as indicated by the minister a moment ago, has been that we did not want to give an answer, that we might be prepared to consider it sympathetically if it had the support of the other parties but we did not want to give an answer to this until we had an assurance that, if any deficit were possible, provision would be made for it to be picked up by somebody other than the federal government.

MONTREAL OLYMPIC GAMES, 1976—POSSIBILITY OF LOANS BY CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Will the organizing committee of the Olympic games be able at least to take advantage of what is available from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation concerning required funds for this purpose?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the answer to this question must be affirmative, as regards the normal programs of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If the City of Montreal, together with the Quebec government, intended to use the funds that we normally make available to this province, if they wanted to affect them to purposes which actually would be those of the Olympic games, we would not see any objection to this, but we do not intend to make any special contributions. These would be normal contributions which incidentally are quite substantial and paid yearly to all provinces.

AIR TRANSPORT

ADVANCE BOOKING CHARTER REGULATIONS—ASSURANCE THAT TRAVELLERS WILL BE PROTECTED AGAINST PRICE FIXING

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the recent regulations regarding advance booking charters announced by the Canadian Transport Commission. In view of the fact that the new regulations will have the effect of appreciably increasing fares on all overseas travel by charter flights, and in view of the fact such rates will be established virtually on a non-competitive basis, can the minister advise the House whether he has been in touch with the CTC and/or the airlines to ensure that the Canadian travelling public will not be victimized by price fixing by the domestic air carriers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is generally known that new regulations have been enacted regarding advance booking charters and published on January 8. I feel it is somewhat premature to draw conclusions on the implementation of the new policy because when preparing these regulations we consulted the Transport Commission and other authorities involved. As and when we became aware that the risks pointed out by the hon. member can really materialize, we shall certainly review the regulations.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact there is some suggestion that the rates are being established on a non-competitive basis, could the minister advise the House whether his department has undertaken any steps to ensure that the charter air traveller will be getting a fair deal as a result of the new ABC regulations?

ADVANCE BOOKING CHARTER REGULATIONS—
ASSESSMENT OF IMPLICATIONS BY TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. Does he have someone in his department assessing the implications of these new air charter regulations so that he will be able to come into the House and say they are in the public interest and not in the interests of the carriers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely what the department is for and we are watching the situation very closely. We hope the new regulations will benefit the public in general and not a limited number of private interests.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: In that assessment will the minister please take into consideration existing or intended fare schedules which discriminate against Canadians travelling to England in that an Englishman taking the same Canadian charter flight, travelling on the same route and with the same air crew, can come to Canada for $100 less?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will take that into consideration.

Mr. Mazankowski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was listening when I addressed my question to him, and I wonder if I might be permitted to repeat it?

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF MINISTER TO SUBMIT TO AIRPORT SAFETY CHECK

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

There is the question of rates as well as that of security. I would like to ask the Minister of Transport if he can tell the House whether the bill he has now introduced is important because, according to information obtained lately, he refused to submit to a security check as everybody else does in the interest of passengers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will admit that such a question is out of order.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to repeat the question I directed earlier to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Has his department undertaken to look into the new regulations and their impact on the air charter traveller with a view to ensuring that such persons will have a fair deal and that the interests of the public will be upheld?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to have this matter looked into to the extent that it comes under the jurisdiction of my department as distinct from that of the Canadian Transport Commission.

COMMUNICATIONS

BELL CANADA—SUGGESTED HALTING OF GRANTS TO SUBSIDIARIES AND REFUND OF AMOUNTS PAID

Mr. Terry Grier (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the Canadian taxpayer appears to be at least indirectly subsidizing research and development costs of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, according to unchallenged evidence adduced before the Canadian Transport Commission recently, is the minister considering the halting of all grants to Bell subsidiaries, and is he considering asking for the refunding of all or part of the sum $43 million paid to Bell subsidiaries since 1965-66?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise on which the question was asked so my answer is no.

Mr. Grier: In that case, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he will consider investigating the allegations with a view to assuring the House that such funds have not been put to improper use?

HEALTH

DISCUSSION OF COST OF DRUGS TO SENIOR CITIZENS AT CONFERENCE ON OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the meeting scheduled for next Friday between the minister and his provincial counterparts to discuss the long overdue increase in old age security pensions, may I ask whether drug care will be discussed having in mind the difficult problem posed by the cost of medication for ailing senior citizens?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rynard: A supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister would put this on the agenda for discussion?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING ABOLISHING OF CERTAIN TELECOMMUNICATION JOBS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport on the very urgent matter of job abolishment by Canadian National Telecommunications. The CN Telecommunications union has been informed that their public telegraph service members are to suffer severe job abolishment in their respective trades. I wrote to the minister on this matter—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member resume his seat? The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of asking a question and should ask it as quickly as possible.

Mr. McKenzie: I am at the question now, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister assure the House and the union that these lay-offs will not take place? Also, is the CNR trying to get out of the telecommunication business?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member would receive a faster answer if he addressed the question to the proper minister, the Minister of Communications.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

ABOLISHING OF CERTAIN TELECOMMUNICATION JOBS—PRIORITY FOR EMPLOYMENT IN POST OFFICE TELEPOST SERVICE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and is directed to the Postmaster General. Is it the minister's intention to establish a telepost service within the Post Office department and, if so, will the employees who are laid off by CN-CP Telecommunications be given priority in filling these new positions?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the telepost is only used to complement the present mail and telegram services. Hence, I cannot accept the hon. member's statement that employees of the Canadian National would be laid off because of this service since it is only offered to people who are already using Telex.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker, this time to the Minister of Communications. In the event of the lay-offs referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, can the minister give the House an assurance that job security, no matter how it is accomplished, whether through the new branch being contemplated by the Post Office, will be assured to the employees affected?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that this question is hypothetical.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare is related to the meeting next week between the federal and provincial ministers of health. Is the government considering lowering the eligibility age for the old age pension and, second, is the government considering providing a pension for the wife of a husband who receives the old age pension even though the wife has not reached the age of 65?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have serious doubts about this kind of question. The hon. member will appreciate that it anticipates a bill to come before the House.

ROBERT BURNS

ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister. Is he aware of the fact that today marks the anniversary of the birth of the world's greatest poet, Robert Burns?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I perhaps would like to qualify on the grounds of poetry, but I have on my left a man who can qualify by having the ethnic and cultural background, so perhaps he should reply.

An hon. Member: He hasn't got a kilt on.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we are alive to the day and its significance as the feast day of Robert Burns whose immortal memory will be celebrated throughout the world today. Members of this House, many of whom have Scottish blood in their veins—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: —including such unlikely gentlemen as the right hon. Prime Minister and the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, will want to associate themselves with the many tributes that will be paid to the genius of Robert Burns today.

I congratulate the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) on their elegant and beautiful garb. I had intended wearing the kilt myself today but I decided against it. I thought that as House leader of a government in a minority situation I was sufficiently exposed!

LABOUR RELATIONS

ELEVATOR WORKERS STRIKE—ASSISTANCE BY MANPOWER DEPARTMENT TO PERSONS FACING LAY-OFFS—ACTION TO ACHIEVE SETTLEMENT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration concerning the elevator strike which certainly has national consequences. Is he aware of the fact that as a result of the elevator strike Otis Elevator in Hamilton is contemplating laying off 500 people? If not, will he look into the circumstances in order that his department may assist in this very grave matter?

• (1500)

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will ensure that the department is in communication with the company in question and that all possible action is taken.

Mr. Alexander: May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact the elevator strike has reached national proportions, and even though it may be under provincial jurisdiction, has the minister determined if there is any way in which he can be involved? Has he been approached by his provincial counterparts? If so, what has been the result of any discussions?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I must advise the hon. member that I have not been approached. However, being equally as concerned as the hon. member over how serious the situation is, I contacted the provincial Minister of Labour, or his department, within the last couple of days. There is some hope, I understand, that the parties will come together again in the near future, hopefully leading to a settlement. It seems to be quite clear that the federal government has no jurisdiction in the matter.

Mr. Alexander: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As the minister has shown some initiative in this regard—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I give him credit. Don't get excited. In view of the national effect of the strike in terms of inconvenience and financial loss, will the minister continue to stick his nose into this area in order that he can report to the House day by day or week by week?

least one salmon stream, is he prepared to request the approval of parliament for a beefed-up appropriation in order to catch up with the longstanding backlog of neglected salmon spawning streams in the province of British Columbia?

Can the minister advise the House why all copies of a government study entitled, "An Analysis of Federal Interests Affected by the Proposed James Bay Hydro Development", have been collected from members of his own department who had such copies and why copies of this report are now being kept secret.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, copies of this report are not being kept secret. They were prepared by a summer student in 1971. There is a disclaimer on the front to the effect that this report does not represent departmental or government policy.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise the House whether such copies are still drifting around the department or have they all been collected and taken out of circulation?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I have collected a number. If hon. members want copies, I will be glad to let them have same.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—URGENCY OF RESUMPTION OF DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I return to the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition—

An hon. Member: Which one?

Mr. Grafftey: If I may return to the question relating to imminent trade meetings with the United States, may I ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether, because of Britain's recent entry into the Common Market and the obvious effect on Canadian trade patterns, he does not regard those meetings with the United States as being of extraordinary urgency?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, of course they are important, but the point with respect to the EEC raises another issue, that of our multilateral negotiations under GATT which we expect to be entering into during the course of this year.

Mr. Grafftey: Has the minister specific statistics relating to trade with the United States and trade with the United Kingdom, especially as it affects the province of Quebec? This is one of the reasons, apart from national considerations why it is extraordinarily urgent that these meetings be called with the United States, in view especially of the effect on the province of Quebec—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we are entering the field of debate.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly resume his seat? He has asked his question and the minister has replied, and the subsequent question he asked is much the same as the one which was asked in the first instance. If the minister can reply briefly, he may do so. I will then recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate who also has a supplementary.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, we are concerned about the effects of the enlargement of the EEC from the standpoint of all provinces of Canada, not just from the standpoint of one province of Canada. I think it might be worth while saying that our trade with the EEC has been expanding at a more rapid rate than it has been with the United Kingdom, so we are hopeful that the enlargement will provide a very much larger market for Canadian goods in years to come.

CANADA-UNITED STATES—INQUIRY AS TO RECENT COMMUNICATION FROM UNITED STATES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he has received, in the last 48 hours, any response or inquiry from his American counterpart or from any other United States official relating to trade relations between Canada and the United States? If so, can he tell us the nature of that communication?

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any special communication within the last 48 hours.

AIR TRANSPORT

SCOPE OF APPLICATION OF SAFETY CHECK AT AIRPORTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I would like to repeat the question I asked earlier.

Can the Minister of Transport tell us if the legislation authorizing air companies to search every person boarding a commercial aircraft in Canada will apply to all Canadians who travel by air or if some exceptions are provided?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): There are no exceptions, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member refers to the information published yesterday in La Presse it is baseless because Friday I was not in Montreal, at Dorval or at the airport. I was here in Ottawa and La Presse has promised that it would retract and apologize for what it has published.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF IMPORTS AND SUBSEQUENT INCREASE IN DOMESTIC PRODUCTION OF SUGAR

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question, if I may, to the Minister of Agriculture. It is based on his very commendable efforts to reintroduce a sugar industry in southwestern Ontario. Can the minister indicate to the House that the government, by reason of negotiation or conversation, has reason to believe that Canada's present commitments under the international sugar agreement can be terminated and a new restriction on cane sugar imports imposed so as to increase the percentage of sugar produced from domestic sources?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have every reason to believe that we can increase the domestic production of sugar in Canada.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, the minister missed the purport of my question. I know we can increase our domestic production. Is there reason to believe that we can change the agreement on the importation of cane sugar to the degree that we can supply more of our market for this sugar from domestic production?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am still confident that we can do that, too.

SUGAR BEETS—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN ALLOCATION TO WESTERN PROVINCES

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. As the minister has said that a new sugar policy would increase the percentage of the market reserved for domestic sugar, would the minister indicate how much of that increased percentage would be allocated to the western provinces?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have met the chairmen of the Alberta Sugar Beet Growers Association, of the Manitoba Sugar Beet Growers Association, of the Quebec Sugar Beet Growers Association and the national sugar beet growers association. They are all agreed that this matter can be worked out in a proper manner between the different areas.

SUGAR BEETS—APPROXIMATE NUMBER OF ACRES NEEDED FOR EFFICIENT OPERATION OF REFINERIES

Mr. J. R. Holmes (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. On the basis of the minister's assertion regarding the promotion of the sugar beet industry in southwestern Ontario, can the minister say if the 40 per cent committed acreage is the absolute minimum or will a lower figure of, say, 25,000 acres encourage the minister to take action?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, according to my discussions with interested people, specialists in sugar beet refineries and operations, it is estimated, roughly, that an efficient operation would require approximately 30,000 acres. It may be of importance for hon. members to know, Mr. Speaker, that growers pledged over 15,000 acres during the meeting which was held in Chatham last Saturday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are nearing the end of the question period. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to recognize a few hon. members who have not had an opportunity to ask questions.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DAY-CARE SERVICES—FEDERAL SHARE OF COST

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the report just released by his department that federal expenditures on day-care services may reach $8 million this year, does the government intend to take more vigorous steps to implement the full cost-sharing program of $400 million proposed by the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this matter is essentially under provincial responsibility. It is being discussed with provincial welfare ministers on a consulting basis.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Is the minister aware that if the federal government's share of this $400 million program were to be $200 million, at the rate the government is now proceeding with increases of $4 million each year—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is argument.

POST OFFICE

BELLEVILLE, ONTARIO—POSSIBLE INTERVENTION BY MINISTER IN DISPUTE WITH EMPLOYEES

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Postmaster General. Will the Postmaster General advise the House whether he intends to intervene in the local postal strike in Belleville, Ontario, and meet the reasonable request of the employees so that regular service can be restored?

Hon. André Ouellet (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR BEETS—REQUEST FOR ALLOCATION TO ATLANTIC AREA

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. If there is to be an increase in domestic production of sugar, is consideration being given to an allocation of this production to the Atlantic area?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, at the present time there is no production of sugar beets in the Atlantic area for commercial use. If there is, we will certainly investigate it. As the Minister of Agriculture for Canadian producers, I will do what I can to help them.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE RAILWAYS CAN TRANSPORT INCREASED VOLUME

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture. In light of the minister's recent statement with regard to exports of wheat for the next crop year, can the minister inform the House whether he has received any assurance from the railroads that they will be able to transport such volumes promptly and, if not, is he going to seek such an assurance?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the past record of performance of the railways in increasing their carriage of grain proves that the railroads can do even better if they so desire. With all the hopper cars now being provided, I am confident we can now do more than we have done in the past.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, this question is addressed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the high unemployment in Canada and the fact that only one-third of the LIP projects have been approved, will the minister consider assigning more money to this program so that areas like my own can employ people?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question has been asked and the representation has already been made.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has allowed an extra two or three minutes, taking into account that we have spent some time on poets, to try to recognize some of the members in the back rows who had not been seen previously. I appreciate that during this time some of the frontbenchers and parliamentary secretaries have not been recognized. We will now call orders of the day and try to give the hon. member for Edmonton Centre and the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond an opportunity to ask their questions tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Can the government House leader indicate the business for the rest of this week and next week, particularly with respect to Bill C-125, the second unemployment insurance bill, which the minister implied last Wednesday would follow the present debate? Is it the intention of the government to stand or withdraw that bill for further change in light of the fact that yesterday the New Democratic Party indicated it could not support it in its present form?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the present debate today and continue it until it is completed. When it is completed, today or tomorrow, the next item will be the amendment to the Criminal Code, capital punishment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I wish to advise hon. members that I would like to call very early the bill on the order paper relating to pilotage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: See what influence you have, Stan.

Mr. MacEachen: After reading the bill, hon. members will understand that it has a certain relevance to the first of February because certain regulations expire unless action is taken by the House. That is why this bill is being brought forward. With regard to the final part of the hon. member's question, if he will just tell me where he stands on that bill, maybe I will be able to decide when to call it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the order of business, may I ask the government House leader to tell us what priority or lack of priority he gives to Bill C-132, the bill having to do with foreign investment. Is that on the list for early consideration—

Mr. Paproski: Only if you want it there, Stan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —or will the government consider referring the subject matter of the bill to committee so that some inprovements might be made before we proceed with it?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the government attaches a high priority to this bill. It will be called in the orderly process of events.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member in a moment. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond wishes to rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for raising this question of privilege. I have exhausted every possible means to find an answer. My question of privilege involves the integrity of the House and the welfare of the Cape Breton miners. I may say that the former Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and I were beginning to find a way in the maze of problems. The present minister is doing likewise. A question of legality arises. It is the question of legality that is the basis of this question of privilege, since I want consideration given to the recent federal court case. I wish to ask the President of the Treasury Board if Treasury Board can authorize the compulsory retirement of any person prior to the normal retirement age of 65.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may wish to ask the question of the minister. Perhaps the minister wishes to give a legal opinion or reply in some way to the hon. member. However, that matter certainly cannot be raised by way of a question of privilege. I appreciate how important the matter is, particularly to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, but I do not think that our Standing Orders and practice make it possible to seek information, relevant and important though it may be, under the heading of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I ask the guidance of the House or anyone in the House who can give me an answer. With regard to the good legislation that was passed in this House in June, 1967, how does the government make this work?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I ask the guidance of any member of this House who can give it to me.

Mr. Speaker: I understand very well the matter being raised by the hon. member. It has been raised from time to time in the House. It has been considered in committee. There is an awareness of the situation on the part of a number of hon. members. Again, I doubt whether the difficulty can be solved, or the problem settled, either on a point of order or a question of privilege.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further point of order. I do not wish to continue arguing this point. I want to get rid of it. How do I get a legal opinion when I seek it from the Crown? Who will give me that legal opinion? If the Federal Court of Canada withdrew this authority from treasury, how can it be applied to the miners in Cape Breton?

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. I apologize to the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate. He wishes to raise a point of order. I recognized first the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond. He was entitled to priority for his question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I hope I am in order in asking the government House leader if he can give us some indication of the position in the government's structure of priorities of the Family Income Security Plan which was alluded to in the Speech from the Throne and about which I am sure many members are getting hundreds of inquiries. Is the government planning to bring in this bill?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the government is definitely planning to bring in this bill. I am not certain I can assure my hon. friend that it will be brought in shortly. I do not expect it will be brought in in the early part of the session.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT (No. 1)

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION TO BE DEEMED ADVANCE

The House resumed from Wednesday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No 1), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Baldwin (page 620).

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Caouette) wish to complete the remarks he began yesterday?

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, to follow up yesterday's remarks, I must say that I quite appreciated the speech of the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who spoke before me.

I said I was astonished by the government about-face but I gradually learned that this is common policy for Liberal and Progressive Conservative members. The hon. member clearly illustrated the whims of the old parties.

But despite the accusations and the comments made on the bill under debate, I cannot find in this legislation any corrective to the problems posed by the Unemployment Insurance Act. As I said yesterday, this is only a cover for the incompetence of the minister and of his department.

They prefer delaying and perpetuating the farce by introducing new legislation such as Bill C-125.

But as a Conservative member said this bill is in fact a blank check for this government and nothing else. Why should we lose our time? On the one hand the government tries to justify its attitude and on the other the official opposition obviously wants to replace this government, though it would probably act in the same way.

What course would the Progressive Conservative party have taken in similar circumstances? Exactly the same as this government, which in fact amounts to saving one's face or saving one's skin.

Saving their face is more important than solving problems. Why not once and for all stop pursuing an ostrich policy and introduce a bill serving the interests of the Canadian people instead of those of the political schemers.

The important point is to give justice to the people but, generally speaking, the Unemployment Insurance Act is nothing more than a palliative for the sores caused by backward administrations.

They still persist in playing at being inquisitors. Indeed, even unemployment insurance officials are fed up with that legislation and they are the first to say that the problems keep growing from day to day since this new act came into force.

Above all, let us not question the workers. I know some who have already proferred threats and who are ready to clean out the local offices. I am prepared to cool or restrain their temper a bit, but never, Mr. Speaker, shall I defend the present system of inquisition under which individual integrity is jeopardized. Why wouldn't the government introduce a bill on a guaranteed minimum salary for all people or on that national dividend advocated by the Social Credit party?

Mr. Speaker, such a formula would not cast doubts on a person's integrity but would ensure a living to the worker, despite disruption of his employment, and that at the very moment he has no work.

The unemployment man would not be forced as he is now to wait for ten, 12 or even 15 weeks to obtain what he is entitled to, what is his due, what today a silly legislation takes away from him or makes available to him only after delays accountable to lack of funds, as now is the case.

Mr. Speaker, I will go even further. The national dividend formula would not put the government in the situation where it is now because it would be possible to do the estimates, which would be better than using variables and imponderables as a basis. The junior experts of the government would evaluate real data such as population, production, and the consumers' purchasing power. On a quarterly basis, these data would indicate the amount available for each individual. Willingly or not, whether it found funny or not our requests for higher old age security pensions in 1962, 1963, 1965, 1968 and again today, the government will have to use this solution. I believe of course that it might prefer to be mentioned in history as an expert in concealment. But I think, for its information, that the time has come to find modern solutions to modern problems. Unlike some of my colleagues, I do not think that the government is responsible because I do not consider it intelligent enough to cause the problems. It is satisfied with justifying its errors by introducing legislation such as Bill C-124.

Mr. Speaker, it is infortunate to say so, but have we ever seen anything more stupid than a man who refuses to understand? Let us look at the group of members to my left and we will understand. Take them individually, and speak to them. They are intelligent, they accept our points of view, they suggest theirs but when they get together, no dice. It is impossible to get the tiniest spark of intelligence out of them.

Frankly, it is frustrating to see the inability of the government to get off the beaten path. Perhaps we should tell them about Henry Ford's technique when he was confronted with a problem that appeared insoluble. For example, when he wanted to install a one piece windshield on automobiles, he consulted his engineers and his experts who mathematically proved the impossibility of realizing such a dream. Mr. Ford then went to students, non-experts, and he ordered them to solve the problem by organizing contests and he finally got the results we know of. Why such success? Merely because Henry Ford applied the first major principle in administration: when you are faced with a problem, don't limit yourselves to the particulars. Wider the scope. Get off the beaten track. Stop patching the inner tube and invent the tubeless tire. That is the solution.

The government should stop introducing bills to excuse itself and bring forth legislation that really meets the needs and the rights of the individuals: then and only then it will respect its mandate as the people's representative instead of the financiers' who prefer to take advantage of the poeple.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I would like to bring up the subject again and ask hon. members how much interest they pay when they take a $1 bill from their right pocket and change it for four quarters which they put in their left pocket? I am sure that you would all answer: Are you crazy? Why should I charge myself interest? I therefore ask them to read carefully clause 2 of the bill and to transpose my question. Then they will understand the spirit of the bill and the Social Credit argument.

Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, since the funds provided under the warrants which the bill seeks to bury are already spent or will soon be, I think that it is advisable to let bygones be bygones and let it pass as an administrative experience, hoping that the government will learn one day to introduce realistic bills.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I recognize the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), perhaps I could deal with the point of order which arose yesterday. The point of order arose concerning the amendment presented by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). In technical terms, this is a reasoned amendment and most reasoned amendments present extraordinary difficulties to the chair. This one fits that category of difficulty.

The amendment proposed by the hon. member reads as follows:

This House, while accepting the need to provide funds for payment of unemployment insurance benefits to those entitled, declines to approve a measure which, on the one hand removes all restrictions on advances under section 137 of the Unemployment Insurance Act 1971, and, on the other hand, seeks to legalize and ratify the improper and illegal actions of the government in making advances in excess of the statutory limit.

• (1530)

Various members have made arguments to me, either to support its validity or to ask that it be rejected. One point of objection is that the motion is really an expanded negative; that is, an attempt to defeat the motion for second reading by giving reasons why the bill should not be proceeded with. If this were so, the motion of the hon. member for Peace River would have to fail, because it is very clear that, to quote from Beauchesne:

An amendment proposing a direct negative, though it may be covered up by verbiage, is out of order.

Page 170 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition contains that statement, as well as other sentences making the same point, and the point is quite clear. I then had to ask myself whether, in fact, the proposed motion was an expanded negative. The recommendation which is printed in the bill sets forth the principle of that bill. Actually, there are two principles. The first would remove the ceiling on advances under section 137 of the act, and the second would provide that an amount authorized under manpower and immigration vote L30a shall be deemed an advance under section 137.

It seemed to me upon reading the motion that it did indeed deal with these two principles. The question then arose, did it do so in such a way as to be given the protection that the rules relating to reasoned amendments will give? Hon. members will find this protection dealt with shortly in citation 382 of Beauchesne as follows:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information in relation to the bill by committees, commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of judges.

My initial reaction upon reading this citation, studying cases dealt with thereunder, and studying the more elaborate references in the 18th edition of Erskine May on Parliamentary Practice as set out at page 487 and 488, was that the protection given to a reasoned amendment would apply in this case. The point about the restrictions on advances, to me, clearly was declaratory of a principle differing from one of the principles of the bill.

That being so, and having some doubt about the whole issue, I would have been inclined at that point to leave the motion up to the judgment of the House. But I was disturbed by the opening lines of the motion of the hon. member for Peace River which read:

—while accepting the need to provide funds for payment of unemployment insurance benefits to those entitled—

The use of these words, in my opinion, takes the motion outside the purview of the bill now before the House, though it does seem relevant to Bill C-125. While I dislike making a ruling on narrow, technical ground, I feel that this must be done if reasoned amendments are to be meaningful, and I accordingly rule the one presented to be out of order.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I rise this afternoon to address myself to several fairly straightforward questions and not to repeat the arguments in the presentation made by my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) in connection with the short and straightforward bill that is before the House. Some suggestions have been made, in their usual intemperate manner, by some members opposite to the effect that there has been some illegality or taint in connection with the action of the government in recent days in relation to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I should like to have an opportunity of dealing briefly with those points.

Hon. members are well aware that the Financial Administration Act has for many years been an instrument by which urgent and important matters could be dealt with by a government when parliament was not in session, a time, therefore, when money could not be provided by parliament in one of its usual ways of so doing.

The provisions of the Financial Administration Act, which have been referred to by other hon. members, are fairly broad in their terms. Section 23 refers to situations of this character:

Where a payment is urgently required for the public good when Parliament is not in session—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I would draw to the attention of the Chair and the House that we are presently engaged upon an argument or on a course of debate that is in two forums. The present bill is drawing forward certain arguments about the legality of orders in council, a matter which incidentally has been referred by this House to a committee, where it has also been the subject matter of discussion, debate and opinion over the past two or three weeks. It seems to me that this House will stand frustrated in this debate in that it will be unable to refer to what is said in the committee until the committee reports. Similarly, the committee will be frustrated since the members concerned will have made their statements in this House, and the opinions given in this House will not be part of the record of the committee.

Therefore, I put this problem to the Chair. As has already been pointed out, we have before us a short bill, one part of which seeks to make an amendment to remove a financial limitation. That has nothing to do with orders in council. The other part of the bill seeks to deem such appropriations made under warrants advances. I put it to Your Honour that at this moment there is a problem here, and it may be that the Chair will have to consider the question of relevancy, or may have to direct the House that, having taken the action of referring the matter to committee, it cannot refer to the matter in debate here at this time. I am disturbed about this matter because I suggest there is no way that a debate can go on in both places at the same time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. This point was dealt with by the Chair yesterday. I would have to say to the hon. member for Edmonton West that, in his contribution so far, the Minister of Justice has stayed within the rules of relevancy as they relate to debate in this chamber. Perhaps I should note for the record, since I noted for the record yesterday, the dilemma in which the Chair finds itself. This morning I checked over the contributions which were made yesterday and there was a reference by the sponsor of this bill to remarks made by the hon. member for Hastings in the committee. Those references might have been out of order and perhaps should not have been referred to in the House.

The Chair realizes that when matters are dealt with both in committee and in the House we do run into extraordinary problems, but I shall do my best to observe the rule of relevancy when I think that relevancy needs to be mentioned. However, so far I rule that the Minister of Justice has stayed within the relevancy rule in his contribution.

• (1540)

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, although I regret the necessity, to draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that in my comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) I, in fact, indicated the page number and the date of Hansard, the record of debates in this Chamber and not in the standing committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank the minister for drawing this omission to the attention of the Chair.

Mr. Lang: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. I have noted the discussion of yesterday, and I will certainly try to be sure that I do not refer to matters being studied elsewhere.

I was quite intrigued by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) rising to make his point of order at this particular point in time. He talks about the frustrations in this place or another place. Of course, it is quite frequently a key tactic on the part of members of his party to frustrate both places by rising on the same matter of nonsense in both places at the same time. I took particular note of the fact that he objects to me making reference to any part of this subject matter, yet we listened to his colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) rail and rant about it at some length in this House yesterday.

I was speaking about the clear words of the Financial Administration Act empowering the use of warrants where a public good is to be served and there is an urgent requirement when parliament is not in session. Hon. members know the history of the use of this section which has been the subject matter of debate during parliamentary history for many years. It has been the subject of comment by authorities, writers and auditors general, yet during that period it has been seen by members to be a fundamental requirement for the purposes of government in those circumstances when parliament is not available to deal with urgent matters.

The early history of the section, as was indicated in the House yesterday, shows that its use was fairly narrowly restricted to the repair of public buildings, the kind of things that probably were the types of emergencies seen in days long ago. Since that time, with the growth of government and its complexity in serving the public in many different ways, a similar kind of requirement to meet public need was seen to be clear in this House of Commons over the years, and Section 23 as it now stands is the result of that understanding and that realization. Indeed, the House had occasion to look at the section from time to time, with these comments from writers and auditors general in mind, and in the course of these years left these words intact. In 1958, however, it was looked at specifically by the House and a provision was added, which is the reason or the main part of the reason, for Clause 2 of the bill before us. A provision was added which required that warrants which were issued pursuant to Section 23 should become part of a subsequent supplementary estimate so they would, in that fashion, be before the House for discussion and comment by members; and that is significant.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister permit a question? Is he saying that Clause 2 is there because of the 1958 amendment only?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I said it has a part to play in it, and I will enlighten the hon. member further later on this afternoon.

The clear need, therefore, for this kind of power was recognized by the House of Commons and by governments, not only for the maintenance of the section but in the use of it. Its use has been very wide. The words themselves are wide and, therefore, they support that use, yet governments and members, conscious of the desirability for parliamentary control over spending, realized also that there was a need for governments to be in a position, when parliament was not available, to meet these urgent requirements for the public good. Therefore, this is a section which stands broad in its application, and the action taken is subject to examination by parliament in subsequent estimates. It is very broad, indeed, as a basis for action in those circumstances where parliament is not in session and where the basic words of the section are complied with, as was done in this case, about which there has been very little argument in this House.

There have been some suggestions in some quarters, and I must say not by lawyers and I am not even sure there has been this suggestion by the partisan, pettifoggers opposite who plead cases sometimes in this House, that in some fashion the word "payment" referred to in Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act requires payment to be made in relation to specific, direct debts rather than payment to a body which thereby will perform certain functions and carry out certain obligations imposed upon it for the public good. I know of no reason to think that is the case.

In the case before us the payment which was urgently required was a payment of funds to the Unemployment Insurance Commission so it could carry out its obligations under the Unemployment Insurance Act to meet the just and legal claims of persons who are entitled to benefits under that act. That is what the warrants did. The public good which was being served and the urgent requirement surely cannot be questioned by hon. members of this House looking at the situation with any reasonable mind at all.

Hon. members opposite have pointed, however, to Section 137(4) of the act to suggest that this changes the situation. I think it is clear that this is a complete misreading of the situation and the basic purpose and intent of warrants. Certainly, Section 137(4) would not have been less strong if it had constituted an appropriation or statutory allocation of $800 million or some other similar fund to the commission. The fact that an advance technique was used a technique that allowed advances up to a certain limit, meant only the use of a method of allowing money to be transferred to the fund up to that point.

The point is that the Financial Administration Act is used time after time where the amount of money available has been limited. In fact, its only point of use is when money which may be available for a purpose or a variety of purposes is limited, and when there is not enough money to provide for special circumstances which have arisen. So a limit is practically always to be found associated with the use of warrants where money additional to that which has been limited or appropriated by parliament is, in fact made available.

In this particular case Section 137(4) allowed the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) to make advances up to that limit. I was clear that when advances had been made up to that limit there was no further power in that section to accomplish a transferring of money to the Unemployment Insurance Commission. At that point when the Unemployment Insurance Commission needed money, it had to obtain it from some other source. That is where the warrant came in, and the use of them within the terms of Section 23, to provide that money.

The money which was provided under warrants was not provided under the authority of Section 137 and that is completely clear. This, then is the simple proposition, and, indeed, I do not think hon. members opposite thought otherwise or even began to say anything to the contrary until about the time Bill C-124 was being presented to the House and the recommendation appeared on the order paper. That recommendation lead them to think—

An hon. Member: We were saying it in the committee.

Mr. Lang: —some things, and though they really understood rather more clearly when Bill C-124 came before the House,—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was said a lot earlier than that.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would allow me one question to set the House straight. I am a little confused now about his interpretation of the law. As I read Section 137(4) the words state "shall not". I was wondering whether he had another interpretation of those two words. I am sorry to interrupt at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to repeat what I said for the hon. member's benefit. The essential point of those words is that the advances empowered under section 137 are by subsection (4) limited to the $800 million. I would refer the hon. member to the words in this section. Section 137(4) reads:

• (1550)

> The total amount outstanding at any time in advances made under this section shall not exceed eight hundred million dollars.

As I indicated to the hon. member whether there has been an appropriation of $800 million straightforwardly into the fund, or advances to be repaid, the authority of that section was exhausted when $800 million was paid into the fund.

Hon. members opposite would not be objecting to the use of warrants if it had been an outright appropriation, but when they found it was an advance up to a certain limit they suggested that this made it less possible to use warrants. I suggest that the only way that section could be read in that fashion would be if it explicitly said it was overriding section 23 of the Financial Administration Act, and so that even if money were required for the public good that section could not be used. That is the only way in which that section could be read to limit the power under warrants of giving further moneys or payments to the Unemployment Insurance Commission for its purposes. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said yesterday, the money was urgently required to meet legal obligations which the commission had to meet, and the payments to it were made under section 23.

Hon. members opposite have said that we should hire a good lawyer. I suggest to them that it would be very difficult indeed for them to find a reasonable, non-partisan lawyer who would take their view or would stand with them for one moment after he read those sections and after he saw the report.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister accept a question?

Mr. Lang: I would like to conclude my remarks before I deal with questions. In the time I have available to me I would like to deal briefly with clause 2 of the bill. It was clause 2 of the bill which, as I said, intrigued hon. members opposite and may well have innocently led them astray, particularly when they read the recommendation without having read the clause itself. And having taken a position they are not likely to move from it upon reading the clause. That would not be in keeping with their practice in this place.

Clause 2 is technical in its nature, and there may be a certain amount of extra caution provided in connection with the manner of raising and the using of money provided under the warrants which are being included in the supplementary estimates. There are a couple of sections in the Unemployment Insurance Act which make it desirable to make clear that the money which was put into the hands of the commission for the purpose of paying its obligations, in that period when parliament could not appropriate money to it, are charged then to the account as an advance.

With respect to advances under section 137; it was appropriate, it seemed to us, that the moneys put forward in this way should be treated as advances, in the sense of being made accountable out of the fund subsequently, and not treated as a special or extraordinary appropriation to the fund. There was a question of whether the fund could in fact repay the moneys made available to it under warrants. If there were to be any doubts about this it was reasonable to clarify it so that it would be open to the fund in future days to repay the money put into the hands of the commission under the warrants which have been described and discussed.

In addition there is the fact that the warrants are included in supplementary estimates, as a result of the amendments which were made in 1958, to bring them before parliament at an early opportunity. When a supplementary estimate is passed or approved in the form of an appropriations act, the Financial Administration Act indicates that at that point in time the amount thus approved in the appropriations act is treated as an appropriation and not a duplication of other amounts. This, read together with section 33(d) of the Unemployment Insurance Act again could have raised some argument about whether a further credit to the fund was in fact required at this stage. That of course was not intended.

Clause 2 says in laymen's language that it would be well to treat the moneys put into the hands of the commission under the warrants in the same way as though they had been, in fact, advances made under section 137, for the purposes of repayment, for accounting and so on. This then will be done in an orderly fashion, and there will be no question about how those moneys are to be treated, and about the obligation or power of the commission to repay the amounts put into its hands under the warrants. That is the sum and substance of the situation before us.

The key and substance of the bill is the removal of section 137(4) in order, at this particular point in time, that more money may be put into the hands of the commission to meet the obligations that will be pressing upon it in the carrying out of its functions under that act. It seems to me that it is important that this money be made available to the commission. There is still a public good which is to be served, a public good about which there is urgent requirement. I urge hon. members to get on with this business, as well as other business in the House, by moving this legislation forward to committee so that we can be sure the unemployed who have legitimate claims under the Unemployment Insurance Act may indeed receive their benefits in a regular fashion.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras), as recorded at page 611 of Hansard, said:

> I hope to find all members of that committee—
>
> Referring to the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee
> —and, indeed, all members of this House in agreement that we should not arrive at a situation where benefits to the unemployed of this country would be cut off.

We on this side in this party endorse that statement wholeheartedly. You will not find us, either here or in committee, conducting ourselves in any way so as to impede parliament from dealing with these matters; so that anyone who is legitimately entitled to unemployment insurance benefits will be able to claim and obtain such benefits.

However, I have a few things to say about the legality of what was done. Before embarking on that, I want to deal with a few comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) yesterday. I have sat here for quite a number of years and listened to that hon. member extolling the virtues of the maintenance of parliamentary privileges. He has been referred to by the media and other sources as being one of the great watchdogs of parliament. Yet yesterday, by his remarks, he prostituted all those great principles which he has been espousing in this House over the years for the political expediency of justifying what his party intends to do in the vote on this bill.

I do not attribute this motivation to him and to those who sit behind him to my left as being wilfully brought about because it may well be, and I believe it was, that the hon. member does not appreciate one or two of the refinements of the argument. Perhaps it is because the responsibility has not been his to carry the matter in the committee or in the House. There are one or two things that the hon. member has overlooked, and I hope to be able to convince him that there has, in fact, been illegality here. I also hope to be able to convince hon. members behind him, and perhaps raise some doubts even in the heads behind the minister.

• (1600)

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said yesterday "We believe in the law of the land" indicating himself and his supporters. Mr. Speaker, who does not? Who would be so sanctimonious as to think that he is the only person in the House who believes in the law of the land? We all do. We know that benefits must be paid and we are going to see to it that they are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: There is a difference between paying them legally and paying them illegally, and I hope to make a case to support the assertion that they are being paid illegally here.

I want to clear up something that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) said a moment ago. He said, "It is important that money be made available to the fund". He was speaking on clause 2 of the bill, I presume.

Mr. Lang: Clause 1.

Mr. Nielsen: All right, clause 1. We cleared that matter up in discussions in another place because clause 2 of the bill, if it does not pass, will not impede payments in any way, shape or form to unemployed persons having legitimate claims and entitled to benefits. Those moneys are already available. They are in the UIC fund in order that payment may be made up till February 7.

The government had to find a legal way to pay these benefits because, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, unemployment insurance legislation places an obligation on the government to make those payments. We agree, but it had to be in a legal way. They said there was no other way to do it, because parliament was not in session, than by the use of Governor General's warrants. Rubbish, Mr. Speaker. The officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission knew as early as mid-August that they were going to run out of money and exceed that ceiling. Now, it is a fact that parliament convened at the end of August and could have dealt with the matter by way of a supplementary estimate at that time or it could have dealt with the matter by way of a grant at that time. Parliament could have been convened in December to deal with the matter. These are three legal alternatives that were available to the government without the use of warrants. Even if they had to have access to warrants, they could have used the warrants properly and not improperly as they did.

The Minister of Justice says that we on this side are engaging in partisan pettifoggery by taking the position that the word "payment" in section 23 of the Financial Administration Act has some meaning. The Auditor General certainly thought that it had meaning. He said the situation with respect to the use of those warrants was unique. No other single instance had occurred in the last 15 years where a warrant had been used to exceed a statutory limit—

Mr. Blais: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Nipissing rises on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the last comment made on this subject, I thought the ruling of the Chair was that any comments that may have been made in committee or any dealings that may have taken place in committee were not to be dealt with in this particular debate nor in this House. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is trying to get in through the back door what he could not get in by the front door by making mention of evidence that he alleges has been given in committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I was not aware that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) had brought out anything that occurred in committee, so I shall ask him to continue.

Mr. Nielsen: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I may point out to the hon. member who raised this spurious point of order that he should perhaps keep up with his reading of the press, because it certainly was dealt with extensively in the press the other day. I say that no amount of squirming, no amount of wriggling on the part of the New Democratic Party can disguise that what they are doing here is abdicating their responsibility as Members of Parliament to insist that every appropriation must have the approval of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: They are quite happy to give this government a blank cheque by removing the ceiling entirely, but even more serious in my view, they are quite happy to ratify something that this government has done illegally. Section 23 of the Financial Administration Act is very specific. It is broad in the sense that a fairly broad interpretation can be applied to the term "urgent and public good". However, the use of the word "payment" is specific. Surely, the minister does not suggest that a warrant can be obtained for the purpose of meeting future requirements. If the law had intended that, then the word would not have been used. The word "payment" I suggest to the minister means a current obligation, a debt. Surely, that section does not permit and surely the minister does not suggest that it should be interpreted so broadly as to enable a warrant to be obtained for six months' supply. That is what he would have us believe.

Mr. Lang: It is not that word; it is the other words.

Mr. Nielsen: "When parliament is not sitting". I might say it has been done. I could cite a precedent that occurred in 1958, but I do not like citing that because we were in office. However, it was wrong and everybody, including the member for Winnipeg North Centre, said it was wrong. Apparently what was wrong then is right now, simply because his party wants to support the government.

I should like now, Mr. Speaker, to get into a point of order which I am embodying in my remarks. It is a point of order which I have to leave with Your Honour because of the likelihood of the result being a bad precedent in the Journals of this House if it is not raised and dealt with. I have not raised it sooner in the debate because I did not want to appear to be impeding the progress of the bill or to be opposed to the general principle involved in making moneys available for payment to unemployed persons.

On January 8, the government referred Supplementary Estimates (A) 1972-73 to the Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. The committee held its first organizational meeting on January 11. These estimates, at page 28, include the following and I shall read from the description of the estimate itself. The heading is "Non-Budgetary, Vote L30a":

> Advances for the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, to be applied by the Unemployment Insurance Commission toward the payment of benefits and costs of administration under that act, such advances to be repaid in such manner and on such terms and conditions as the Minister of Finance may prescribe.

That is the description, Sir, and I draw the attention of the House specifically to the words in the title "Non-Budgetary" and to the use of the term "advances" in the vote. My submission is, quite apart from other minor imperfections in what has been done—for instance the description in that non-budgetary item so-called not tallying with the words of the Order in Council on warrant—that there are other very serious defects which give rise to this point of order.

In the bill before us, Bill C-124, Your Honour will note that the first line in clause 2 reads "The amount authorized for the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Act" and so it goes on. I draw Your Honour's attention to the use of the word "authorized". The word is being used in the past tense. I also draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that Vote L30a has not been authorized by the standing committee. I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is listening, because I would be grateful for his support, knowing his vast knowledge of the rules of this House.

We are being asked to pass a bill which refers to a vote that has not been authorized in committee. Mr. Speaker, that vote has not been authorized. In effect, if we were to pass this bill now we should be authorizing something that has not been authorized. On that basis, but not only that, Sir, I submit the bill offends against the rule regarding anticipation. I will be glad to give Your Honour some references and citations in that regard in a minute. At present, the effect of this proposed amendment would be to provide that the supplementary estimate of $454 million is a loan to the Unemployment Insurance Commission and not an outright grant.

I again seek the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in view of what he said yesterday. This is the second point I wish to make, a point he may have overlooked in his remarks yesterday. The amendment if passed would provide that the supplementary estimate is a loan to the fund and not an outright grant. I am sure the hon. member is aware that section 23 of the Financial Administration Act stipulates that whatever moneys are obtained by virtue of that section are deemed to be an appropriation. The effect would be that these moneys, being an appropriation, would come out of general revenues. The effect of the amendment, if passed, is that it would alter the situation; it would convert the appropriation to an advance, thereby requiring the blue collar workers, the people who draw unemployment benefits, to repay the fund.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Nielsen: Is that what my hon. friends to my left want?

An hon. Member: Absolutely not!

Mr. Nielsen: But that precisely would be the effect of it.

Mr. Andras: Nonsense!

Mr. Nielsen: If the party that calls itself the party of the lunch bucket set—

Mr. Brewin: Discuss the bill.

Mr. Nielsen: —supports the government, the party that purports to support the man with the lunch bucket will be imposing on that man a burden in future of $454 million. It is that simple.

There is another point to this. If this amount of approximately half a billion dollars given to the Unemployment Insurance Commission is a grant, and that is what it would be if this amendment does not pass, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) must include that amount in his figures when he casts his accounts and announces the fiscal or budgetary position of Canada for the 1972-73 fiscal year. This would bring consequent changes in the 1973-74 fiscal year. On the other hand, if the amount is a loan to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, then the minister need not account for the sums when giving the fiscal or budgetary position of the country, except to report under "Loans and Investments" that this sum was given to the Unemployment Insurance Commission by way of a loan. What does this mean? What would be the effect, Sir?

It means, Sir, that the government, by using this device, has $454 million with which to woo more parliamentary support from NDP members, because that amount comes off the deficit in the budget and the minister can say to the House, "Look we are $454 million richer than we would be if we had not passed that loan." Hon. members to my left are being sucked into this device. Not only are those hon. members imposing a burden on the working man who must repay the loan; they are being sucked into a charade, because the minister can come along with all his goodies and say, "This is not costing us any more money; I do not have to raise taxes because we now have this windfall of $454 million by virtue simply of passing clause 2 of this bill."

A further result would be this, Mr. Speaker. I am still speaking on the point of order. If the amount is a grant, then the contributors to the Unemployment Insurance account benefit accordingly and do not need to make up that amount by any increase in contributions. The amount is paid for out of general revenues contributed by all sources of taxation. If it is a loan, then, of course, the contributors must pay the loan back by increased contributions or by decreased benefits, or by a proportionate adjustment of the ratio of contribution to benefits, or by a restriction on eligibility. There are no other possible results than those. That is the burden we are placing on the working people. That is the burden my friends to my left would place on them by supporting the second clause of this bill.

Mr. Andras: Nonsense.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has something to say, I wish he would stand up and say it. I do not like remarks I have not heard being smuggled on to Hansard.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is not totally ignorant of the fact that the advance will include the government's share of the cost of this program, and that will not be calculated or even known until the main estimates and votes are introduced more than one year after the fact.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He knows that.

Mr. Nielsen: Fair enough; but it still does not excuse the action. The government is still placing the burden on the contributor. The whole amount still has to be repaid.

Mr. Andras: But the act called for that in the first place.

Mr. Nielsen: There must have been some reason for the words "any sums obtained by warrant shall be deemed appropriations" to be included in section 23.

I now wish to quote, in support of the point of order, from May's most recent edition, the eighteenth. I shall read brief excerpts from pages 364 and 365.

A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the House . . . whether it be a bill or an adjourned debate upon a motion. . . .

Stated generally, the rule against anticipation (which applies to other proceedings as well as motions) is that a matter must not be anticipated if it is contained in a more effective form of proceeding than the proceeding by which it is sought to be anticipated . . .

but it may be anticipated if it is contained in an equally or less effective form. A bill or other order of the day is more effective than a motion; a substantive motion more effective than a motion for the adjournment of the House . . . A matter already appointed for consideration by the House cannot be anticipated by a motion . . .

There is a matter that has been appointed for consideration, namely, the referral by this House of vote L30a with which clause 2 of this bill purports to deal. It has been referred to a standing committee of this House; there is no doubt about that. A motion is before us; there can be no doubt about that. Therefore, Sir, the rule that a matter already appointed for consideration by the House cannot be anticipated by motion applies, in my submission. Anticipating some possible advice to Your Honour, let me read the sentence at the foot of page 365:

The reference of a matter to a select committee does not prevent the consideration of the same matter by the House . . .

It might be argued that vote L30a is the same as the matter we are dealing with in this bill. In my submission a distinction must be drawn, because this bill deals not only with L30a but also with section 137(4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, a matter that we are precluded from dealing with in the committee. On the basis of that citation, I suggest that we cannot possibly proceed with further discussion of this measure until one of two occurrences take place; either there must be a vote in committee that item L30a be referred back to this House for further consideration or, second, that the item is approved. I do not think it is any secret that we have set a date for reporting finally to this House. That date will be February 2.

• (1620)

However, I am afraid until the report comes out, it will be against the rule prohibiting anticipation for us to proceed with the debate. I make the submission, Mr. Speaker. Because of its complexity, Your Honour might wish to take it under advisement. There is some urgency to bringing down a ruling on this rather than having the debate continue. We are in a rather impossible position with the minister being required to be here in the conduct of this debate and in committee in the conduct of a debate on the same item. It makes things a little difficult, to say the least.

Now that I have made those points, I have another matter which Your Honour probably expects. I am going to introduce an amendment at this stage based on the points I have raised in this debate. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander):

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after "that" and substituting therefor the following: This House, noting that by clause 2 of Bill C-124 the government proposes to change the law so as to burden the present and future workers of Canada and their employers with the payment of the sum of $454 million to the detriment of the unemployment insurance plan; and further noting that the government thereby would avoid having to account for this sum in its statement of budgetary revenues and expenditures for the present fiscal year; and further noting that the government thereby would avoid having to seek supply for this sum from Parliament as a budgetary expense and to propose ways and means by which this sum might be raised by additional taxation upon individual and corporate taxpayers, as the law presently requires, resolves that Bill C-124 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

That is the third alternative to the point of order I have raised and with which Your Honour is now seized. Either the estimate has to be authorized so that we can proceed with the bill, the committee has to report to the House or this bill can go to committee and both of them dealt with at that time. To proceed in this way is not only offensive to the rules, but it is an impossible practice for members to be confronted with this kind of situation. In my submission, that is precisely the reason for the rule. I leave that point of order with you, Sir, and hope that we can have an early ruling on it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion moved by the hon. member for Yukon, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton West. The hon. member has also raised a point of order with which the Chair will have to deal. At this time, perhaps the Chair could ask for any comments upon the motion before making a ruling on that as well. I propose to give a ruling on the other matter at eight o'clock.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in favour of the motion. It is very evident what has happened in this instance. Bill C-124 was drafted in such a way that it anticipated the passing of Vote L30a which is presently being discussed in the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. We are dealing with Vote L30a, but unfortunately and to the embarrassment of the government, as I will shortly point out, that has not been passed, nor has it been dealt with completely. If I am correct in that statement, the moneys referred to, $454 million, have not been authorized. The only place the authorization can come from is the committee which is now dealing with this matter. This is the basis of this bill, particularly clause 2.

On the merits, there is a prima facie case that has been built up. In my opinion, the ultimate conclusion is that this bill is an anticipatory bill and we have no rules nor authority to deal with it. In order to substantiate my point, I refer Your Honour to clause 2 of the bill, and I note the first line for your edification. I quote:

The amount authorized for the purposes . . .

I place great emphasis on the word "authorized". The only proper interpretation with respect to the word "authorized" is that it has been passed and approved. Without being repetitious, if I am correct in those statements, surely we must be out of order at this time. The only way this defect can be cured is that it is in the competence of this House to amend the bill in such a way that it will be in conformity with what we are dealing in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee. I do not think we can.

What is the other alternative? The only alternative, I respectfully suggest, is to send this bill, regardless of what we may think of the preamble, to the committee or we cannot deal with it at this time. Surely, we cannot deal with a bill that is asking us to pass something which is authorized, as stated in this bill, but which in fact has not been authorized. If I am right in my submission, the answer must be that we cannot deal with this bill at this time.

In no way do we on this side advance our arguments to the detriment of those who are entitled to benefits after having paid into this fund. This situation results from the trickery and the devious methods of both the government and my friends to the left, because we are attempting to uphold the law. I would think that anybody involved in parliament or even those who are acquiring benefits would want us to uphold the law. We are in no sense developing these arguments because we are trying to hoodwink someone or in any way trying to deprive those who are rightly entitled to payments under the Unemployment Insurance Act. But we must follow the law. I say there are two laws involved here. Perhaps I am getting away from the subject now.

• (1630)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Hon. members should not laugh. I am developing an argument because I heard hon. members saying that there was one law to ensure that those who are entitled to it receive their benefits. I say there is another law which indicates that the ceiling should not be broken. However, I am getting away from the matter at hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Hon. members should show some patience. I know they would like to rise and express their views in the way that I can articulate mine. However, since they know they do not have the opportunity to do so at this time, they are straining at the bit.

Let me say in conclusion that the point is certainly well taken. We are dealing with a bill that is unlawful in the first place because it states that what we are dealing with in the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee has been authorized. I state respectfully that it has not been authorized and has not been approved. Therefore, let me say with all due respect that the motion of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) must be accepted in the way it is drafted. I hope sincerely that hon. members will be able to approach this matter in a non-partisan way and that they will accept the motion in order to ensure that we proceed in an orderly fashion. I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is here. I hope he can appreciate the argument which has been placed before the House by the hon. member for the Yukon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should like to hear contributions from as many hon members as possible on the point that has been raised, but first I should like to ask the hon. member for Yukon if he would confirm to the Chair whether I am faced with one request or two requests. Am I faced simply with making a ruling upon the amendment that has been presented or is there also a suggestion, previously made by the hon. member for the Yukon, that the Chair should withhold further proceedings on this measure because of the point of anticipation that he had made? Is he asking for a ruling by the Chair on both points, or simply on the amendment that has been presented?

Mr. Nielsen: I thought I had made that clear, Mr. Speaker, and this is the reason that I raised the point of order in the sequence that I did before presenting Your Honour with the amendment. As far as I am concerned, my participation in the debate is concluded.

In speaking to the point of order, I suggested to Your Honour that now the Chair is seized of it the House may be disposed to accede to the suggestion of Your Honour that you will wait until eight o'clock before handing down your ruling and that in the meantime the debate will proceed to fill in time. But if Your Honour agrees that the point I raised is a valid one and comes to the conclusion that we are out of order in discussing the measure, then of course that time would be wasted time by the House.

On the point of order, may I say that there was one matter to which I omitted to refer Your Honour and which might be of assistance. I would ask Your Honour to note that estimate L30a in Supplementary Estimates (A) is misleadingly entitled "Non-Budgetary". This classification anticipates that a proposed amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act will be passed, which proposed amendment is in itself an admission that the vote is budgetary. Section 137 of the Unemployment Insurance Act authorizes the government to make non-budgetary advances to the Unemployment Insurance Commission up to $800 million. Any amount in excess of that amount is a budgetary appropriation under section 133 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. Here we have the item entitled "Non-Budgetary" in the Supplementary Estimates, which leads me irresistably to the conclusion that we are anticipating that the amendment will be passed.

I suggest, for the consideration of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) as well as that of the well noted expert on the rules from the NDP, that the proper order should have been first, to deal with the supplementary estimate item L30a, second, the passage of an appropriation bill to support that item, and lastly, the passage of Bill C-124 with which we are dealing now, because I cannot conceive how the second clause in Bill C-124 can be passed in its present form without the estimate having been approved and an appropriation bill having passed parliament.

Mr. Baldwin: The government is like the rabble retreating from Moscow.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair will make a ruling on the two points of order and will now ask for contributions.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say, particularly in response to the last remarks of the hon. member for Yukon, that the Supplementary Estimates are very frequently anticipatory in the sense that items are described in the way they will be at the conclusion of the passage of those estimates. If the hon. member will look at the item in the Supplementary Estimates to which he refers as being described as non-budgetary, he will see that, in itself, it contains a reference to a requirement to be repaid. In that sense, it is non-budgetary in its nature. As I indicated to the House in my earlier remarks, clause two of the bill may clarify a situation in relation to obligations, permissions and powers of the fund to make the repayment if such a clarification were necessary but hardly changes the characterization of the amount being voted which, in the terms of the appropriation in the estimates, is described as being repayable.

The same can be said about the other points the hon. member made in his first point of order. I have some difficulty in knowing how to understand his point of order described in the form of an amendment. Clearly one is simply a repetition of the other and they should fall together. He spoke about the question of whether or not the item was a budgetary or a non-budgetary item in relation to the requirements of the government to raise revenue. This surprises me, coming as it does from the hon. member who has been reading the budgets and statements of the ministers of finance both in this government and its predecessor and the clear indications that total cash requirements, rather than the simple, rather old-fashioned, view of budgetary and non-budgetary items, are the key to the requirement of the government in the way of taxation. In the course of putting his amendment to the House, he made reference to this material. I suggest that it would be rather bad practice to allow the hon. member to include such allegations in an amendment which, if kept in a much simpler form, would be in order. In that simpler form, it would disclose the desire of hon. members opposite, perhaps, to stop the bill from proceeding in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister permit a question with regard to the discussion on the first point of order? He heard me deal with the matter of the use of the word "authorized" in clause two of the bill. Surely, he must agree that the use of that word anticipates the authorization of that item in the Supplementary Estimates by the committee, and if that be so, it is clearly anticipatory.

Mr. Lang: I thank the hon. member for drawing my attention to it. In view of the existence of the words in the Financial Administration Act which require that matters contained in warrants be contained in subsequent supplementary estimates, there is a need to deal with them in this fashion in certain circumstances in relation to a bill such as the Unemployment Insurance Commission bill. It could not happen in most cases, but I think that is a fair explanation of that word in this case.

• (1640)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief but serious contribution to the discussion of both of these points of order. However, before I get serious I wonder whether I could make the remark that if my hon. friend's point of order about the House having no right to continue with this debate is sustained, then we cannot even consider his amendment. So perhaps Your Honour would be saved the problem of ruling on this amendment if you were to rule that we cannot continue with the debate at this time.

I may say also that I support the contention of the hon. member for Yukon that it might be a good idea for the debate to continue until five o'clock, leaving Your Honour the opportunity, between five o'clock and eight o'clock, to do some homework. I am sure that the gentlemen at the table who serve us so well are used to going without their dinners; I can see that they will have some homework to do this evening.

Mr. Speaker, with regard to the point as to whether or not we should proceed with this bill, I confess I have been wracking my brain trying to recall something that has happened in this area, but I am sure that the gentlemen at the table will be able to find it. I believe there have been rulings that would support the contention of my hon. friend to this extent, that it would not be procedurally correct for the House of Commons to give the bill third and final reading—in other words, not possible to pass the bill finally—if it contained in it a reference to something that was not at that point a fact. I do not think we could give third and final reading to the bill until the House had authorized the supplementary estimate referred to therein.

However, it seems to me that that does not interfere with the right of this House and of the committee, if the bill is referred thereto, to proceed with the earlier stages of this legislation. I make that assertion because I am quite confident that a similar ruling has been made a number of times in the past. All you have to do, Mr. Speaker, is to ask your able assistants to find those precedents and then you can give a learned ruling from the Chair tonight at eight o'clock, just as if you had poured over the matter yourself for three hours.

If I may turn now to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Yukon, it does pose some difficulty for the Chair. However, on balance, relying on that old cliché about giving an hon. member the benefit of the doubt, I think you will have great difficulty in ruling it out of order.

If this amendment merely read that this House—missing out all that verbiage—resolves that Bill C-124 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, then there would be no question that it would be in order. To use a phrase that I used the other day, if the pith and substance of this amendment were simply that the subject matter of the bill be referred to the committee, then of course that is in order. But I wonder whether it is in order to import between the first two words and the pith and substance at the end all of the argument and debate contained in the many words in this amendment?

I would differ very strongly with the assertions that are contained in the verbiage of the amendment. That does not bother me, because I do not think that the bill should be delayed in this way and I shall vote against the amendment, if it is in order, because I think that instead of referring the subject matter to the committee we should pass the bill itself. However, I do not think it is good form to import into what is otherwise a proper amendment a couple of paragraphs of argument and debate.

I often give this advice to some of my colleagues when they are drafting motions to present under Standing Order 43, although no matter how one drafts them there seem to be difficulties. The problem is where you draw the line between what is debate or preamble and what is the actual motion. In this case I think the hon. member has put too much debate and argument, which I refute, into his motion, although I concede that that may not invalidate it. If it does, then all the hon. member has to do is to ask to strike out all the verbiage, and simply move that this House deny second reading of the bill and refer the subject matter thereof to the committee. As I say, there is certainly no problem in all of this for us because we would vote against such an amendment whichever way it is put.

So these are my two suggestions: first, that with regard to continuing the debate Your Honour should find it is appropriate for us to do so, but that we cannot give third and final reading to the bill until the estimate has been passed; and second, I think it might be a good idea if the Chair were to give some avuncular advice to his former colleague and suggest that amendments should be amendments and not full dress speeches.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend to my left that we might usefully employ the time between now and five o'clock to continue this debate, but I should like to make a very brief point. I recall the difficulty that this House was in about two years ago, I think it was, when the government introduced the grain stabilization bill which contained a provision repealing a certain section of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act providing for payment of certain funds. At that time my hon. friends to my left saw the value of the point we were making, the hon. member for Crowfoot and myself, and supported us. They agreed that, despite the fact that the grain stabilization bill purported to repeal a section of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act which provided for certain payments, it was nevertheless incumbent upon the government to maintain its position in law and make these payments. Indeed, the party of my hon. friends to my left—not the federal party but the Saskatchewan offshoot—took action in the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan asking for a mandamus, and I say quite rightly since it was a valid point that they made at that time.

The point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is that we should proceed with our debate of this bill up to third reading stage, and then wait until this particular estimate passes the miscellaneous estimates committee. I suggest that should not be the case, sir, because we would then be anticipating its passage. We would be anticipating that the committee report will come into this House, will be attached to an appropriation bill and that that bill itself will be passed. I say there is no reason to assume those things.

It may well be that because of the rather close relationship that exists at the present time, my hon. friends may be convinced in their minds that the bill is going to be passed because they will add their numbers to those of the government party to ensure its passage. But the Chair cannot take judicial notice of that fact. Rather, I think the Chair can take judicial notice of the fact that this House would be in a very precarious position in that, up until yesterday, the government was planning to introduce Bill C-125 following this measure. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) may shake his head, but that is certainly the impression we have had all along. Just because the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre frowns and says they are not going to support Bill C-125, we immediately see the government in rout, confusion and retreat.

• (1650)

An hon. Member: Are you going to vote for Bill C-125?

Mr. Baldwin: In spite of the loud noise in the House from my left, Mr. Speaker, there is no assurance that can be given to Your Honour that the appropriation bill upon which is based the estimate before the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee is going to be passed. I urge the Chair to take that into account when a decision is being made.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question before he sits down?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, I would love one.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member tell us where his party stands in respect of Bill C-125?

Mr. Baldwin: Whenever the government has enough guts to introduce it, it will then find out what we are going to do.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief remarks about the point of order that has been raised that this discussion should be terminated. It seems to me that it is a well established practice of the House that if a point of order is to be raised it must be raised promptly, and it must be raised at the moment the irregularity takes place.

An hon. Member: That is a privilege.

Mr. Stanfield: When did Robert Burns ever say that?

Mr. MacEachen: In Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, Citation 74 we find it stated that a point of order against procedure must be raised promptly.

Mr. Baldwin: I raised it.

Mr. MacEachen: Here we have a situation in which the official opposition is of the view that this bill should not be proceeded with, but nevertheless, confident of its own irregularity if not confident of the regularity of the bill, it proceeded yesterday to debate the issue, to move an amendment and to ask the House to deal with a point of order and the Chair to rule on it. After that happened and after the debate has gone on for a day, they come in and say to Mr. Speaker that we are out of order.

I submit that, in the first case, if a point of order was to be taken it should have been taken yesterday when the bill was moved for second reading, and should not be taken today. I further suggest that it is quite invalid to argue that because the bill before the House refers to supplementary estimates we should not proceed with it. If the officers of the House take the advice of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I am sure they will find ample precedent to justify that course of action on the part of the House.

I agree in respect of the amendment which has been made to Bill C-124, that if it had been confined solely to the last part, that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, probably it would be a proper amendment which could not be contested. The amendment does not appear in that form but is loaded with argument and fabrication which is irrelevant to the motion before the House. Because the hon. member has imported all these irrelevancies into the amendment, it must fall and cannot be accepted.

On April 28, 1953, during the debate on the National Housing Act, the Chair laid down very clearly that an amendment could not be partly in order and partly out of order. If it is partly out of order it is totally out of order. If another precedent is required I would refer you to a ruling the Chair made in 1971. A motion was made to refer the subject matter of a bill to a committee. That was ruled procedurally improper because, in addition to the actual moving of the subject matter to the committee, the motion contained additional material that was quite irrelevant to the main motion. The Chair ruled the amendment out of order on the ground that the amendment was irrelevant because it imported into it a considerable number of other matters. I suggest, without making any long argument about it, unfortunately this amendment is also out of order. However, we anticipate that the official opposition can do better.

Mr. Baldwin: Like Governor General's warrants, they cannot be a little bit in order and a little bit out of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather that contributions, for which the Chair is grateful, are concluded. A ruling or rulings will be made at eight o'clock. Perhaps we can now agree that it is five o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, should you not also express gratitude on behalf of those at the table?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Some will be at the table over the supper period, but I am afraid those at the table will not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order No. 40, to advise the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—External Affairs—Viet Nam—Proposed peacekeeping force—Source of funds to cover cost of Canadian participation; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Old age security—Inquiry as to increase in basic amount and lowering of age of eligibility; the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty)—Communications—Bell Canada rate increase application—Inquiry as to opposition by government.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions and public bills. There are no private bills or notices of motions listed on the order paper, so the House will proceed to public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

ADMINISTRATIVE DISCLOSURE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR PUBLIC'S FREEDOM OF ACCESS TO DOCUMENTS AND INFORMATION ABOUT GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock) moved that Bill C-9, to better assure the public's rights to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration (administrative disclosure) be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the fourth time I have put forward this particular bill in this place. On previous occasions hon. members have talked the measure out, and I have but little hope that anything other than the same fate awaits it this evening. I do urge hon. members to give serious thought to at least sending the subject matter proposed in the bill to the appropriate committee which was indicated by Mr. Speaker.

• (1700)

In the interval since 1965, following successive re-introduction of the bill, the government took two or three tentative steps in the direction proposed by the bill, the aim of which is that the public should have the right to know, without hinderance, how the government and parliament conduct the public's business. I will refer to those two or three tentative steps later, but first I would like to read the two clauses of the bill. Its title is:

An Act to better assure the public's rights to freedom of access to public documents and information about government administration (administrative disclosure)

Clause 1 reads:

Every administrative or ministerial commission, power and authority shall make its records and information concerning its doings available to any person at his request in reasonable manner and time.

Clause 2 states the exceptions to that general rule. It reads:

Section 1 does not apply to records or information

(a) affecting national security;

(b) concerning matters that are exempted by statute from disclosure;

(c) concerning trade secrets, and commercial or financial matters of a privileged or confidential nature, obtained from private persons;

(d) concerning any matter of private interest to the degree that the right to personal privacy excludes the public interest.

If this proposal were endorsed and legislation along this line enacted, it seems to me the appropriate administrative authority would be the Federal Court of Canada. My bill puts into words a basic parliamentary principle that public affairs should be conducted publicly. I think that the exceptions listed in clause 2 provide adequate safeguards to the state.

In support of the bill the Globe and Mail editorialized as follows at its first introduction:

> One bad side effect of the prodigious growth of government in this century is that it has become exceedingly difficult to keep track of. Not only are governments themselves much more deeply and widely involved in the life of the people, but their tasks have become so numerous that they have had to delegate much of their authority to boards and commissions. Accompanying this governmental growth has been a disinclination on the part of governments and their creatures to keep the public informed about what they are doing.
> A private bill has been presented to the House of Commons which could do much to open these many closed doors and keep the public informed about what is, after all, its own business . . . . The bill would require that "every administrative or ministerial commission, power and authority shall make its records and information available to any person at his request in reasonable manner and time."

The editorial then listed the exceptions contained in clause 2, and concluded:

> The government should put its blessing on the bill and ensure its passage.

I said earlier that the government had taken one or two tentative steps in the general direction proposed by this bill. One of those steps was taken in 1969 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced a policy which, he said, was to make available for research and other public use as large a portion of Canadian government records prior to July 1, 1939, as would be consistent with national interest.

He said that the cabinet secretariat and the departments and agencies of government were being asked to transfer to the Public Archives official records which were more than 30 years old, and to make them available to the public. In other words, classified documents were to be declassified after 30 years and their contents made available to journalists, students and other interested persons. In April, 1972, the Prime Minister announced that the minutes of the war cabinet from the start of 1942 until the end of the Second World War had been turned over to the Dominion Archivist for public examination.

I understand that in regard to the departments and agencies of government being encouraged to make their documents and records available to the Archives, a special committee drafted regulations to govern that procedure, but the documents in large measure are still not on the shelves in the Public Archives. I urge that the government take steps to speed up the passage of these documents to public view. That is one aspect of the situation which this bill seeks to rectify.

Another aspect, of more practical and political interest, relates to the difficulty experienced by Members of Parliament, the representatives of the public, in securing access to information on government data on the basis of which government departments and agencies have made their decisions, which decisions in turn affect the lives of the people of the country. On the order paper there are 34 notices of motions for the production of papers. As hon. members know, they may remain on the order paper for a long period of time, and in fact may die on it. Very few of them will be effectively answered, and very few of the records will be turned over for examination. It is quite common for the hon. member answering on behalf of the government to say that for this reason or that reason—in fact it seems to many of us for no particular reason—it is impossible to provide the information sought by a representative of the public. I believe that this is wrong, Mr. Speaker.

The situation in Canada is quite opposite to that which has prevailed in Sweden where everything which is not specified as being secret is available to the public for its information and examination. Here the reverse is the case. Here everything is secret unless it is specified as being otherwise.

I believe that real good could be achieved if the papers and data upon which the government makes its decisions were made available to the members of this chamber who are the representatives of the people affected by the government's decisions. I find it a particularly strange situation at present when the public is paying scores of millions of dollars annually for Information Canada and departmental information agencies to produce and distribute the sort of information which the government wants the public to get. This is at a time when information that the public wants to receive from its elected representatives is not available. There are obstacles in the way. I think a much healthier situation would be for the government to take steps to make this information available to the public, within reason.

• (1710)

I know that hon. members are likely to find faults in the details of the clauses in which my proposals are couched. I can understand that, Mr. Speaker, and I make no claim that the bill is perfect. However, I would urge hon. members, when considering the clauses, to view this as a matter of considerable importance to all Canadians. It deserves study and referral to an appropriate committee. I think the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs would be the most appropriate one.

The last time this bill was before the House, April, 1970, the hon. member who is now the Secretary of State (Mr. Faulkner), said that it did not go far enough. It may well be, Mr. Speaker, that the bill still does not go far enough but I would urge the House to at least let it go somewhere, and I think that should be to a committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, concerning the legislation proposed by my hon. colleague, I do not feel that one may object to the public having access to any information that should be released to them.

However, making available to the public all documents of the various departments might perhaps not be in line with security rules. I think we must also ensure that this bill is not misleading or does not prevent any initiative on the part of officials.

I should like to give a few examples. If, for some reason, we ask a public servant to make an analysis of a given project, which would lead him to give details concerning his work or express his view, I think that the immediate release of this information, without the thoughtful consent of the government, might be detrimental to the public and give them the wrong impression that this government or Parliament, or yet a small group of officials or a study commission, are in favour of such or such idea. I think it is extremely dangerous—and this is the point I want to make—to seek to publish everything that is done in departments.

You remember when newspapermen published a few details on the famous Gray report which however was not a government policy. What happened is that everybody imagined that it was government policy.

Indeed, whether the government or the opposition are concerned, such things are prejudicial to the administration and are apt to prevent civil servants from dealing with the public weal or to voice such or such view liable to influence a decision.

I think that when we ask the officials to express their views, the security of the state is perhaps not implicated. It would be advisable to allow public employees to state their opinions, without running the risk of annoying the government or the opposition members. I believe this is exceedingly dangerous.

We already have a tremendous apparatus in the public service and if we intend to publish every study made in a department, we might reduce the efficiency of the public servants and this, in my opinion, will not serve the public interest.

I should like to quote an excerpt from a manifesto entitled "Freedom of Information" which gave rise to lots of criticism. It was signed by reporter Claude-Jean de Virieux who was commenting on accessibility to information—information per se being an intellectual approach—as follows:

> To get information, one must first of all long for it, and therefore the information must draw attention and rouse interest. Information must be attractive.

If public servants prepare a study, they need not add comments to make information attractive. Now, the public will get acquainted with lots of information on which they will pass judgment and which they will not necessarily find attractive, and that information will not either necessarily help understand the position taken by a government or a political party.

I resume the quotation:

> In Spoken news, information will be made attractive by broadcasting, by music used, by audio or visual presentations . . .

One must also realize that if information is to be made public, a whole procedure is at stake. Is it to be made public in the current style or recorded on a sound track in order, if necessary, to make it available to people, especially if questions deemed important are involved?

However, if it is a case of communications between departments, for instance about the construction of a sewer in a parish or a constituency, or else about deals between a municipality and a department, then, no doubt the documents can be said to be public, according to the provisions of the bill now before the House. I see no useful purpose in treating such documents as confidential.

I believe there should be a selection of the type of information intended for publication. First of all, it is extremely difficult to decide what is actually information. The type of information the public expects should be determined. Does the public expect to receive the tons of documents published day after day by public servants? Are the documents intended for publication of interest to one particular province or to Canada as a whole?

If information is geared to Canada as a whole, people in Quebec, for instance, will say: Look here, you publish piles of documents, but we in Quebec are not necessarily concerned with what is happening in Nova Scotia. And Newfoundlanders will probably say the same.

The potential danger of the bill lies in its adverse effect on initiative. I come back to this time and again and I am referring to the initiative of public servants in their quest for ideas, in their effort to help the government to operate. In future, such people, for fear of being quoted on radio or television, will no longer readily express working hypotheses which might well some day become the law of the land. I rather feel that giving too much information at that stage, as called for in the bill, would be extremely dangerous.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that a careful assessment of the public's information requirements be made. What do the people want to be informed of? This could be done through various channels. Information Canada has a definite function and it would be interesting to have the statistical data related to requests for information received by the agency from the Canadian public.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that before passing such legislation we should seek the answers to several questions. In my opinion, the final goal of this bill would not be achieved. On the contrary, it could be harmful because objective information would no longer exist. Whenever departmental officers would be asked to write something, they would say: Sir, I must think twice about it because this will be published. Then, we shall no longer have real objectivity from our public servants. And what are they going to do? They will use only the telephone and at worst, there will be no more correspondence.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this kind of thing is extremely dangerous. It is essential—and I agree with the sponsor of this bill—that some documents be made public because the Canadian people have elected us. If the people wish to examine certain documents, hon. members must rise in the House and ask: Could you table such document? I do not know whether it would be a service rendered to the public if everything were to be published.

I call the attention of this House to the fact that one should be cautious as regards the secrecy of information, and above all to be careful not to put an end to personal initiatives in this area.

That is all I had to say, Mr. Speaker.

• (1720)

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier). I do not agree with him but think he said the best that could be said against the bill proposed by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather). He disagrees, and he spoke eloquently. I disagree with him. I do not know whether his speech was his maiden contribution; it was a very good speech and I thoroughly enjoyed it. I intend to support the proposal.

On a collateral aspect, I would remind the House that it is my hope that private members' public bills, which for many years have not been as effective as they might be under present practices because the private members' hour is limited to one hour and because it has been the practice of all governments to talk them out, will be more effectively dealt with. I think we should look at the present practice. I will put before this House some suggestions which hon. members might consider and which the committee on procedure might also consider.

I would like to think that during the course of this parliament, or the next parliament, a minimum of 20 bills will be placed on the order paper through a system of draws or otherwise, and that these bills shall be heard between 9.30 and eleven o'clock during the early part of the session. The Standing Orders could be amended to provide that all questions would need to be put with regard to those 20 bills so that they would come to a vote in the House. That does not mean the government would need to accept them. If the government does not like them, the government has a safety salve, inasmuch as no private member can bring forward a bill for the spending of money. That can only be done by a minister of the Crown with the recommendation of His Excellency. I am not dealing with the case of money bills. Of course, if a private member's public bill contains a principle repugnant to the policies of the government, the government has every right to call its members to vote against it. I think the idea of new members bringing fresh ideas and new bills forward is excellent and valuable because those very bills ultimately become government policy. The period of gestation is fairly long, several years perhaps, but I think it would be accelerated if my proposal were adopted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order, please. As I understand it, the hon. member is talking about the way the procedure for private members' hour ought to be improved. To stay in order the hon. member once in a while should mention Bill C-9; then, I suppose, hon. members and the Chair will tolerate the hon. member's remarks. He must stay within the subject matter of the bill as much as possible.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the correctness of what Your Honour is saying, and I will mention Bill C-9 right away. I have mentioned it already. I will mention it at least once in every three or four sentences. I recognize that hon. members can call me to order. I bring this proposal forward now since this may be a short lived parliament, and this may be the only chance I shall have for mentioning this subject. Let us take Bill C-9 as an example.

If my views were to prevail, Bill C-9 might have had the luck of the draw and been before the House between 9.30 and eleven o'clock on some day fixed by the Standing Orders. Then, all questions would have to be put on the bill and possible amendments thereto so that a decision could be taken on second reading. The bill would then go to committee and come back for the report stage. The changes in the Standing Orders that I envisage would provide that on ten instances at the report stage, and at third reading, all questions would need to be put with respect to the bill. That would bring a bill like C-9 to a vote on the report stage and on third reading. I submit that on at least ten occasions during a session ten bills would stand the chance of passing this House and being considered in the other place. I am speaking of ten bills of a public nature sponsored by private members. Before dealing with the bill before us, may I say that I trust my suggestions will come to the attention of the appropriate members on the procedure committee. Such a procedure I think would be of great value.

One might say that Bill C-9 is a typical bill. I am sponsoring a bill as well, Bill C-52, which in some ways is very much like Bill C-9. There, Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned the bill again.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member will be all right now for ten minutes.

Mr. Baldwin: I am saying this for the benefit of my hon. friends to my left, hoping they see the error of their ways. Nevertheless, I support the bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You have to be right once in a while.

Mr. Baldwin: As I say, I support the principle of the bill. I cannot allude to Bill C-52. The bill provides for sanctions and for machinery by way of the court acting as intervenor to see if the type of information and document requested should be disclosed to the public. As the hon. member sponsoring this bill supported mine in the previous session, so do I support his now.

I support it for another reason. It is known that my leader during the course of the election campaign made a categorical commitment that if and then he should form the government he would provide for better and fuller disclosure. The government would disclose more fully documents and information. That was a firm commitment. It is one I support and which many members of the House will support notwithstanding their political leanings.

I support the bill for a third reason, and I think the debate we have witnessed recently will illustrate my reasons for that support. If a bill of this nature or in the nature of the one which I have not yet brought to the attention of the House, Bill C-52, were to be in effect, anybody wanting information about the condition of the unemployment insurance account, say, would only need to apply and obtain it. We would have known on September 1, 1972, the condition of that fund. I do not want to rub salt into wounds and exascerbate the feelings of hon. members.

My final reason for supporting it is this. Two days from today we expect that a formal truce will be signed ending one of the most savage and vicious wars of recent decades. It is interesting to note that at the same time as the war is ending there is taking place in the United States the trial of a man known as Daniel Ellsberg. I think there are other defendants with him. These men are charged with stealing and disclosing documents from the Pentagon. The documents disclose a good deal of the factual and background information dealing with the acceleration of that war some six or seven years ago. I am talking about the Pentagon papers case. I expect hon. members probably know about it. I do not have to take sides on the merits of it, although I can say this: At the time in question the forces of the United States in viet Nam were quite limited in number. An incident took place known as the Gulf of Tonkin incident. It was made to appear that vessels of the United States of America had been attacked by units of North Viet Nam forces, that damage had been inflicted and casualties caused. Because of that, the Congress of the United States armed the president with power and authority to continue and wage that war, to the extent to which it accelerated over the next few years. That war now appear to be over.

It is quite possible, and it will only be known after the trial has ended, that many of the incidents, many of the factors involved in the incident to do with the Gulf of Tonkin, were fabricated. It now appears possible that many of the incidents and factors involved in the Daniel Ellsberg case were fabricated in order to provide an opportunity for the executive branch of the United States government to vigorously prosecute that war and ultimately send to Viet Nam several hundred thousand members of the armed forces.

I do not want to go into the merits of that case. However, if the documents of the Pentagon which were apparently taken by Daniel Ellsberg and his co-defendants and published in United States newspapers had been within the knowledge of the American people in 1964 and 1965, it is very likely that that conflict would never have reached the stage to which it ultimately grew. Those are the facts. I am not going to pass judgment in advance of the trial because nobody knows what will be its result. However, I have a great deal more respect for the public than most governments have. Governments work themselves into positions of anonymity and secrecy; they have no confidence in the people.

The public may make errors. Sometimes people make mistakes in the members they send to this House. However, in the final analysis the ultimate decision of all the people in the country is a sound, rational and good decision. Such a decision cannot be properly taken unless the public is armed with the facts. Speaking as a Member of Parliament, we do not get many more facts than the public; we do not know all the facts. For that reason I support the proposal of the hon. member and I think all hon. members should support it.

We cannot have good, sound, democratic government unless the public is informed of the facts in issue. Failure to do this causes tragedies such as the Viet Nam war. Possibly a settlement could have been brought about six or seven years ago which would have been not very different from the settlement made recently. Thousands of casualties, countless sorrows and tragedies of war could possibly have been avoided.

I hope that before this parliament with a minority government is concluded serious attention will be given to this very difficult problem. The public has the right to know all the connotations and facts in order to make an adequate decision. The public has a right to the facts so that its representatives in this House and in the legislative assemblies are able to proceed under pressure with instructions from constituents who are fully informed. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am most happy to support this motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like first of all to congratulate the hon. member who introduced this bill and submitted valid arguments to convince the House of its usefulness.

I am pleased to see that this bill is truly objective, that it wants the public to be well-informed on the different activities of the departments, commissions and boards working under the authority of the Canadian government. However, the bill already makes exceptions which are truly valid since in certain cases it is quite reasonable to have information kept confidential for a better guarantee of the security of our territory, our population and our country.

However, I noted on several occasions that it is really difficult to obtain information that would be very useful to us to enable us to fulfill our responsibilities more effectively vis-à-vis the population that we represent.

Unfortunately, what happens is that information is not always very accurate and I am referring to things that are published, facts that are reported. We had a good sample of this today in this House when an hon. member put a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Transport in his reply categorically denied being where he was alleged to have been in the news reported in a leading Montreal daily newspaper. So this is what I call bad information. Facts are falsified to incriminate those in power and if the public does not see the other side of the information coming directly from an authorized source, it thinks it is being wronged, treated differently from those who are in a position of authority.

I think that the bill should be passed by this House in order to authorize the government and commissions to publish information when Canadians request it and are interested in getting it. This would certainly be to the advantage of our society.

Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to the speech given by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). He quoted very eloquent facts that urge us to support this bill in order to better inform the population.

I can knowledgeably say that the better informed the population is, the easier it becomes for those responsible for the administration and those who are in a position of authority to run the county effectively.

When I was secretary-treasurer in my own community, I often noticed that when the people were informed of the proceedings of the municipal council and when the decisions made by the council were published, the people would co-operate because they knew about the decisions. Conversely when the municipal authorities tried to work in a rather underhanded fashion, many questions were asked and the rate payers were not willing to co-operate with the municipal council because they were not sufficiently informed. I think that if these problems exist at the local level of municipal or school administration, they also exist at the federal level.

That is why I support the bill, in order that we the people's representatives be not always in a difficult position where we are asked information by our electors and we cannot always answer their request because we ourselves have not been provided with information which should be available to us.

We must submit motions for papers which are sometimes satisfied reluctantly by ministers; these papers are often absolutely essential to ensure good administration in the areas of particular concern to us.

Mr. Speaker, I examined the bill with peasure. It is very short but significant.

I support it wholeheartedly because I think it is a step towards true democracy.

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the private member's bill before us I would like to refer to the comments of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) on the entire role of private members' bills. Of course, not having been here as long as the hon. member I cannot approach this matter with the same depth of knowledge and authority as him. However, I would like the opportunity of sponsoring something that would in time become legislation. Surely this is the practice we carry on every day through caucus and other activities; either supporting or opposing government legislation. To have bills sponsored by members of the opposition passed, and the type of information referred to made known to the public, would take away a basic responsibility of the government, upon which it will be judged in the next election.

With regard to the bill put forward by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather), in principle I support it. I think any member of the House would find it difficult to oppose the principle of access to public documents and information about government administration so that people can better understand just what the government is doing and how well or how badly it is handling its affairs.

In these times when bureaucracy has grown so large it is especially important for people to be secure in the knowledge that they have access to information from and about the government, as well as information referred to in the bill of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock. He said that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had made a move in this direction back in 1969 when some research was made available for the years prior to 1939. While it is frustrating when one hopes for much more, there should be some satisfaction in knowing that a move has been made in this direction.

Historically, there can be some tracing of what stood behind government moves, and a better understanding of what powers and pressures brought about legislation or the direction of events which the government controlled at the time. However, I do have very serious reservations about this bill because it is not a simple matter when you start to deal with the various types of information available to the government.

The hon. member asked us not to be too specific and not to argue too long or hard on particular points in the legislation. I appreciate what he means by that. I am worried that when you say some information may be released by the government in order to give people confidence and an understanding of what is happening, you are still left with a judgment decision as to what shall or shall not be made public. There is an element of censorship that remains. I am worried about the constitutionality of such action without agreement from other levels of government, because so many of our records are duplicated by them and are shared records, not ours alone.

In the private sector the provinces have more control than we do. I know the province of Ontario has taken some initiative, or at least has expressed a desire to do so, by suggesting legislation in order to provide public protection in areas where private information about individuals can be very misleading and wrong but the individual concerned is not aware of it.

We talk about government making this kind of information available. I think, for instance, that where the Department of External Affairs is concerned there should be limitations on disclosure. The hon. member who sponsored this bill agreed that there should be limitations. However, in discussions also there are new angles, leanings and particular postures taken in order to bargain for a position internationally. Much of our style and the approach of the Department of External Affairs, which I believe has quite a high reputation in the world, might be damaged if it were possible to trace a particular stance and approach by having access to all the records, even though it might not be a matter of endangering national security. So there is this danger.

This comment would apply also to national defence. I am sure the other parties would love the opportunity to have information on such fiascos as the Bonaventure; that certainly is an embarrassment to me as a member on this side. But that type of thing does happen, and if we have warning we can take action and avoid it happening in the future. What the hon. member proposes would give us further power in checking out the possibility of such fiascos and ensuring that they do not take place. But wanting a particular piece of information at a particular time and demanding that it be made public, when you put all the pieces together some information might be divulged that would be damaging to our security.

I think we must be very precise in the information that we divulge about businesses because of the competition which exists between one business and another. In making certain statistics public, we must be careful that damage to another company does not result.

People are very frustrated when they have to deal with the massive bureaucracy which exists today. Of course, the great majority of civil servants are well meaning, talented people. Nevertheless, they form a massive wall which many people find hard to penetrate. It is important for people to know that they can obtain knowledge and information, find out about government action and what is going on so as to have a better understanding of what the government is doing. This would make the House a better place; it would give us better understanding and would give the opposition greater ability to criticize and to attack. Surely that would make for better government no matter which party sat on this side of the House.

However, this is not such a simple matter that we can set it out in a bill such as the one before us. While this matter is being aired now, nevertheless I would be loth to see the bill passed in this form without a great deal of in-depth consideration being given to the whole question. I know I am not supposed to refer to future legislation, but the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) said he had something more exacting in mind that he might bring out at a later time. I think a great deal more should be done in the private sector. I think the problem is not so much misinformation as fear of misinformation; therefore action in this direction may be beneficial.

I do not think I need debate issues that we cannot act upon here, such as credit bureaux, and so on. We live in an age when our privacy is seriously hampered by all sorts of mechanical devices such as personnel agencies, detective agencies and credit bureaux which can find out about us and make reports. Sometimes we fear them much more than is warranted. If action such as that proposed in this bill were taken by the federal government, followed through provincially and legislation passed at the appropriate levels to affect business as well, we could make public information to which people have a right especially when it involves themselves. This would be beneficial to us all. However, I do make the reservation that it would have to be well thought out and after it had received thorough debate.

• (1750)

In conclusion, although I am aware of the exercise we go through in private members' hour, I nevertheless most sincerely appreciate the principle put forward in the hon. member's bill, even though I have expressed serious reservations about it. When he finds support for it from all sides of the House, moving to a point in time where it has been thought out and fully discussed, then I think we may well see such legislation before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Raynald Guay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, Canada has inherited democratic parliamentary traditions which she cherishes and, at the same time, administrative secrecy which constitutes one of the major barriers between the citizen and the federal government and to a great extent conditions the spirit in which the latter discharges its information duties. Canadians scholars are aware of this basic conflict which exists between administrative secrecy and the need for information services in participatory democracy.

At the top of our political system decisions are made, within the cabinet, by ministers who have taken the oath of office to keep as absolute secrets all matters considered, discussed in and disposed of in the Privy Council.

The press, the public, the opposition parties, even the ordinary members of Parliament, often find they are unable to get some information which affects the administration of the country.

No legislation in Canada, except the Official Secrets Act, prohibits or authorizes access to official files. An order-in-council is being prepared to establish procedures permitting access to those files. On May 1, 1969, the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) announced that our country was also getting ready to initiate a policy to make available for research and other uses as many records of the federal government prior to July 1, 1939 as national interest will allow. The Prime Minister further indicated that this new policy shows the government's desire to stimulate interest and participation by Canadians generally in the affairs of the State. It was stated in the House of Commons that this was a pretty poor measure and it was suggested outside that it did not go far enough. The Royal Commission on National Security has proposed to remind departments and officials on a continuing basis of the advisability of lowering the security classification of documents. However, it has also added that the minister concerned must be allowed to exercise discretion as far as possible.

For instance, access to public documents, either directly or through government publications, has always been easier in Canada and in the United States than in most other western democracies.

Sometime in June 1967, in a memorandum on the application of the act on public disclosure, the Attorney-General of the United States said, and I quote:

> ... public disclosure of information must be the rule and not the exception, all citizens have equal rights of access to information and the burden of justifying the secret nature of a document rest with the government and not the claimant.

For the first time the new act will provide judicial procedures to enable the citizen who feels wronged to lodge a complaint against the agency that refuses, without cause, to give him access to its documents. Federal courts have the right to punish, for disobedience, the heads of official agencies.

With regard to public access to state documents, the French system seems even more restrictive than the others we studied, including that in Canada. Archives cease to be confidential or secret the very day a minister authorizes the publication of documents on a given period. In this regard, there is no automatic rule in France comparable to the 30-year deadline set in the United States and in Great Britain, and which has also applied here for a few years.

In Sweden, for almost 200 years now, state documents are recognized as public unless they have been declared restricted judicially. The Swedish system and its administration are worthy of our admiration but they are not necessarily easy to adopt in Canada. The Swedish type of responsible government does not resemble ours much. Because of that, it might be difficult to transplant here in Canada the modes of access to public documents in use in Sweden.

In Great Britain, where our parliamentary system was born, the tradition of the administrative secret was contested by academics and was the object of a committee inquiry into the civil service.

Canada is lagging behind other countries, namely Great Britain, the United States and especially Sweden, with regard to allowing access to administrative documents to mere citizens, members of parliament and journalists. But the American experience has shown that there is something else besides legislating. Law can be evaded and its intent distorted. Vigilance must be constant in order to ensure that freedom of access to information, once provided in the statutes, exists in practice. Sometimes the fear of the effects of the principle of freedom of access to information is exaggerated. Nobody has ever talked seriously about unrestricted access to documents. Even in Sweden there are severe restrictions. The Swedish system has the advantage of allowing citizens to see the practical application of their democracy. However, I think it is logical to think that a person, a citizen and a taxpayer should have the right to consult certain documents of interest to him particularly, but telling him without any reservation certain details on others when such information might do wrong to the people involved is altogether different and I think there is a principle of prudence to respect. In discussing this legislation . . .

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Boulanger): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971 (No. 1)

PROVISION FOR APPROPRIATION TO BE DEEMED ADVANCE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andras that Bill C-124, to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (No. 1), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Deputy Speaker Order. The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has raised an interesting point upon which I shall now make a ruling. The hon. member has pointed out that clause 2 of Bill C-124 now before us contains reference to an estimate which is currently under study in one of the committees of this House. This situation prompted him to ask whether the Chair should not rule that further discussion of Bill C-124 is out of order at this time.

The hon. gentleman in his presentation referred to the eighteenth edition of Erskine May's "Parliamentary Practice," page 364 where it is stated:

> A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the House, whether it be a bill or an adjourned debate upon a motion.

The member also quoted from the following page in May's where reference is made to what could be considered a descending order of values for matters in the parliamentary process. The quotation is:

> —that a matter must not be anticipated if it is contained in a more effective form of proceeding than the proceeding by which it is sought to be anticipated but it may be anticipated if it is contained in an equally or less effective form.

The estimate has not really come before the House and the House has made no decision upon it except to send it to a committee for study. The bill has, however, been given first reading and the House is now considering the question whether it should have second reading. It seems to me that the bill before the House is the more effective form of proceeding in relation to the estimate which is now being considered. Bill C-124 would give a statutory basis and the estimate would be a consequential proceeding.

I am reinforced in my decision by reference to page 731 of Erskine May's eighteenth edition. One finds there this passage:

> Expenditure in anticipation of statutory authority. A case analogous to those mentioned above is where an estimate is presented and money spent on a service in anticipation of the passing of a bill of the same session authorizing that service.
>
> In their second report of session 1931-32 (para. 5) the Public Accounts Committee commented adversely on two classes of cases in which this practice had occurred. The Treasury justified the inclusion of such items of expenditure in the estimates as necessary for the information of the House, but agreed:
> (1) that a note should be added to the estimates indicating that they were subject to further statutory authority; and
> (2) that the authorizing bill must become law before the authorization of the relevant estimate by the Appropriation Act

This ruling is made without prejudice to the point raised by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) that the hon. member for Yukon should have raised this matter at an earlier stage of the debate. I would, however, note that some notice was given in this House yesterday. As I say, this point remains an open one. Nor am I overlooking the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) with respect to third reading; but it, too, remains an open one.

One should perhaps also note that the Chair, by long custom and discretion, does not involve itself in legal or constitutional questions. It is sufficient for the Chair to deal with questions of procedure.

I think the Chair would want to thank the hon. member for Yukon for raising this matter. It is perhaps one that would have gathered considerable decisions over the years, but strangely enough it has lurked in the shadows of parliamentary practice. The hon. member has brought it fairly and skilfully out into the open and has directed us into considering the most precise method of procedure.

The Chair must also decide the validity of the motion presented by the hon. member for Yukon. Since considerable time was spent over the dinner period on the first major issue, I crave the indulgence of the hon. member and the House before making another ruling.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my remarks, I should like it to be clearly understood that I am not speaking as chairman of the miscellaneous estimates committee too which I have the honour of belonging. Nonetheless, I should like to take this opportunity of thanking members of that committee for the confidence they showed in me by electing me as their chairman and also for their cooperation with the Chair during committee hearings.

Yesterday, the hon. member for St. John East (Mr. McGrath) made the following remarks which I quote as recorded on page 618 of Hansard:

> You are supposed to be the impartial chairman of the committee.

I do not know whether he meant thereby that I am not impartial because if he did, I of course protest emphatically. And besides, if he means that because I am the chairman of a committee I am not entitled to speak on the subject before us, there I must tell him that I disagree because as a member of this House I have the right to express my opinion on any subject when I believe it is my duty to do so.

I should also like to take this opportunity to mention that during the debate on January 12 the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) expressed himself as follows:

> The chairman of the standing committee admitted yesterday—he let it slip out—that there is a firm date, February 8, when the minister intends to bring the budget down.

It is absolutely not true that I said this, not only because I do not know myself for sure the date on which the budget will be brought down, but because I think even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Turner) does not know it. I cannot see why I have been made to say that the budget would be brought down on February 8.

The bill now before us is very important, and it is essential that all parties recognize its urgency, since the effect of the special warrants that were issued to authorize the payment of unemployment benefits to certain recipients will terminate February 7, which means that on that date the money provided for will run out and consequently it is imperative that Bill C-124 be passed by both Houses and given Royal Assent as soon as possible.

Being sure that all hon. members agree as to the importance of this bill, I hope we will waste no time in considering it.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) clearly showed the need to pass this bill and I do not intend of course to go over that again.

Let me add that it has not been proven that the aforesaid warrants were illegal, although the hon. member for Peace River attempted to prove it through an amendment and I quote:

> —and, on the other hand, seeks to legalize and ratify the improper and illegal actions of the government in making advances in excess of the statutory limit.

I rather believe that our friends are trying to make of this bill a political question, to create a scandal where there is none and to prove that there is illegality. But to date nobody has proven that there has been any illegality, for instance in the way the special warrants were issued and in the way the Treasury Board behaved on that occasion.

This to me is a storm in a teacup and here again we have proof that opposition members were frustrated by the voice of the people on October 30 and that they are trying, through every possible means, to secure the power that escaped them.

I believe they should accept, as we did and as the other parties did, that verdict from the people and accept their fate willingly.

This merely has to do, I believe, with technicalities when advances are mentioned instead of appropriations. Of course there are more than technicalities for there is a pretty clear-cut difference between advances and appropriations but there again, like good lawyers, there are many who attempt to interpret what happened to their best advantage but unfortunately, the people do not accept their arguments and those expecting to get unemployment insurance benefits are anxious for this bill to be passed, to be sure that they will get what they are entitled to from February 8 onwards.

Of course when one speaks of the gap between an $800 million ceiling and a total amount of $1,879 million, it means an enormous difference and the minister recognized there surely had been a mistake somewhere when the ceiling was set in the act. But I am positive that the minister is not responsible for such a situation and that the reasons then justifying the appropriation of $800 million probably no longer exist. The $800 million were exceeded mainly because of the benefits and the increase in administrative costs. The cost of benefits depends on the changes which have occurred from the time the white paper was tabled and the day the legislation was passed, on the extension of the benefit period, on rising wages and on the number of workers in Canada.

I do not think it is necessary, Mr. Speaker, to insist any longer on that point but if there had not been that ceiling clause the bill would have been passed just the same and today, evidently, we would not be talking about amending this section of the act.

Besides, it is not the sole section which is called in question again because Bill C-125 still aims at correcting certain effects of the original bill.

According to the speeches delivered here, the public think that funds are given to the government as a blank cheque, which is completely false because government funds are first examined by our watch-dog, the Auditor General, then by committees, more especially by the Committee of Public Accounts where all parties are represented; they are also submitted to a control by various departments which make sure that funds granted to the government will be spent according to proposed appropriations and the law.

Mr. Speaker, I think that some other members wish to speak, among whom the former minister, and I am sure that they will find stronger arguments than mine. This is why I will cut my comments short to recommend once again to the House the early passage of the bill, hoping that it will soon be deferred to the proper committee for a more thorough consideration.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander).

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Hear, hear!

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I note that the parliamentary secretary from St. Boniface has interjected even before I have uttered my first word. It is nice to see that he is here awake, not sleeping or creating devilment.

I am particularly pleased to participate in this debate following the sound foundation that has been laid by my colleagues, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Theirs has been a significant contribution dealing with the impropriety of the government's actions with respect to unemployment insurance. The arguments presented by those two hon. members will have to be considered seriously by all of us because, in effect, the government is seeking a blank cheque. As a result of the arguments of my colleagues it will be difficult to support Bill C-124 unless it is amended.

I recall the debates in May and June of 1971 when this monstrosity of a bill was first introduced by the government. It was to be a new principle; the government launched a new birth. There was in the legislation an all-embracing principle with regard to unemployment insurance, welfare payments and a guaranteed annual income; as a result, the government became involved in an inextricable mess. I recall distinctly the former minister of labour, always prepared to give of his Irish wit, periodically coming before our committee and offering words of wisdom in trying to sell Bill C-229 which in his words was supposed to contain the best unemployment insurance plan the world had ever known. The only thing he did not say was that it would become a more expensive plan than anybody could possibly dream of.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: He did not tell us that. I say with all fairness, I think the minister tried to speak honestly. I think he came to us with a message, but with all due respect I think he was duped. That is the only way I can put it. I know the minister would not deliberately deceive the friendly member for Hamilton West, the friendly member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) or the friendly member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie). We all worked together over the months in an attempt to develop a scheme that would be best for Canadians.

I think the advice the minister received was wrong. I do not know whether he got it from Statistics Canada, the Department of National Revenue or the economic advisers of the government. They were all totally wrong and they all grossly miscalculated the end results of this scheme. Of course, after the minister discovered that, he was committed to the bill and had to stand behind it. He had no choice; he was trapped. The penalty for remaining true to one's conscience in the long run is that he will sit immediately to the right of the Speaker. All the glory has gone; yet the minister made his mark. In all fairness, he said that the scheme was actuarially sound.

I see the former minister looking at me. If he said that once, he said it five times. I see he is already looking through the record to find out when he said this scheme was actuarially sound. I presume that is what he meant when he raised his hand just now. He staked his seat on this assertion. I did not know what actuarially sound meant; I thought he was speaking in terms of insurance principles. The hon. member for Peace River said that actuarially sound meant that as long as the public purse was open, you could dip your hand into it. I do not want to say the hon. member was right in that regard but I think that is the only definition we can arrive at at this time; it is the only definition the Canadian people can arrive at.

Mr. Paproski: There was a lot of hanky-panky.

Mr. Alexander: But that is not all. We tried to determine what was the limit and that is how we reached the figure of $800 million. Oh yes, those were the good days, Mr. Speaker! We were sure from the evidence we had that the figures the minister was presenting were totally wrong. But oh no; the minister used charm. All the others involved in the scheme, men like Mr. Steel and Mr. Allen—I remember them all—said, "You need not worry." The minister said, "With all the expertise at our disposal, all the statistics, all our wherewithal and ability to make predictions, you need not worry." We were told that even under the worst conditions, if we took into account all variables no matter what they could be the most the fund would have to pay out in government contributions would be $700 million. I am looking at the President of the Privy Council. He is watching me.

An hon. Member: He is fascinated.

Mr. Alexander: We were told, just to take into account some unfortunate act of God, in case something had been forgotten, that the government would throw in another $100 million. That is how we arrived at $800 million. After probing continually, after asking questions continually we were left with the assurance that that was all the government's contribution would amount to. As Your Honour knows, the contributions involve three sectors, the employer, the employee and the government. As far as we are concerned and as far as the Canadian people are concerned, we were talking about $800 million. I was not naïve in those days although I was a new member. After all, when the minister spoke, considering all the expertise that was available to him who was the member for Hamilton West to say he was wrong? Sooner or later one had to accept the minister's word.

An hon. Member: But there was hanky-panky.

Mr. Alexander: Oh, I knew there was hanky-panky. However, on the basis of what we were told and accepted, and I think we had a right to accept it, we took those figures. We could not do anything else; we did not have anywhere else to go. When we presented our views we were always out of order, always wrong.

Mr. Benjamin: That is true.

Mr. Alexander: We lacked research facilities; we lacked everything necessary to make our position credible.

Mr. Andras: That is your whole problem.

Mr. Alexander: We in the committee bought it all, we in the House of Commons bought it; and the people of Canada bought it, Mr. Speaker, and that is the unfortunate part. The people of Canada were prepared to believe this government when it said that under the worst circumstances you could think of, taking into account all variables, the most this government would need to pay under the scheme was $800 million. And what are we talking about now? We are contemplating nearly $2 billion—an astronomical figure compared with the one presented to us in 1971. Yet the former minister said, "It is only a drop in the bucket." Can you beat that—only a drop in the bucket? He was talking about the taxpayers' money. That was what the election was all about. My friends across the aisle know that, too. The bucket is only so deep. Unfortunately, all the taxpayers own that bucket and the bucket is only so deep. Therefore, what do we have here? Because of gross miscalculation and astonishing ignorance, the government has introduced this infamous Bill C-124.

An hon. Member: Tut, tut!

Mr. Alexander: I hear somebody saying, "Tut, tut!" I appreciate the moderation of his language.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And there is no French translation.

Mr. Alexander: As a result of gross miscalculation and gross ignorance, the government has introduced this bill to the detriment of the employer and employee.

Mr. Stanfield: And the taxpayer.

Mr. Alexander: They will all be penalized, yes. That is what Bill C-124 is all about. This government is now looking for a blank cheque.

Mr. Stanfield: It is looking for absolution.

Mr. Alexander: It is looking for a blank cheque.

Mr. Stanfield: Absolution is what they are looking for.

Mr. Alexander: My leader says they are looking for absolution. I think they are also looking for a blank cheque. Why, Mr. Speaker? I ask that question because it is so difficult to support this bill in view of all the government told the committee and the House of Commons.

Mr. Benjamin: Well, are you going to support it or not?

Mr. Alexander: All the people of Canada know the government is asking them for a blank cheque. Let me read something the minister said by way of a press release dated January 17, 1973. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Andras) was putting forward his reasons for wanting a blank cheque. The press release reads:

> Such a ceiling is unrealistic in the light of constantly-changing and unpredictable factors as the national and regional unemployment rates, constantly changing average earnings, and the growth of the labour force which make such a ceiling impractical.

So what else is new? They knew this back in 1971. The same conditions existed then as exist now. We had the same ever-changing and unpredictable factors; we had the same national and regional unemployment rates and the same sort of average earnings; there was the same sort of growth rate in the work force. They knew all that before. Notwithstanding that, they said we still had to have a ceiling.

[Mr. Alexander.]

• (2030)

Now, what has changed? No different criteria now exist; the criteria that existed then exist now. At one time the government said we would have a ceiling notwithstanding all these variables. Now there has been a complete flip-flop and they say that because of the variables we cannot have a ceiling.

The government must be credible. I do not know what they do in caucus, but when they come out of caucus into the House of Commons and become involved with the people they have to be credible. This is why I question what they are doing. The minister says that committee members, members of the House and others do not have to worry about that because there are sufficient controls. I again quote from his press release of January 17:

> There are sufficient controls, through annual reports, Auditor General reports and public accounts to ensure an adequate review of the financial operation of the program.

Cutting away all the verbiage, what the minister is saying there is, "After everything has happened you can look at it and tell us whether you like it." That is what he is asking us to do. Is this right? Is this why we are here? The government has set a precedent with regard to controls which require parliamentary approval. I do not know the reason. Perhaps if you knew this thing was such a mish-mash you would say, "Fool them all and throw in a figure, because with the figure we really have this bill will never pass." They threw in that figure hoping to dupe the people into accepting it. Then when you find you cannot dupe them any longer you say, "Wipe it out, repeal the section and give us a blank cheque."

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) gave us a marvellous lesson today on sections 23 and 28 of the Financial Administration Act. He showed how we can move into areas when we have a ceiling that we can hide or bypass and forget all about the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: You will get your chance to speak, friend, if you have the nerve to stand up and speak, but don't continually bug me. I am trying to make a worth while contribution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: He is still my friend. He is an interesting type of person.

An hon. Member: Part of the coalition government.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, he is part of that group that wooed another, went through the courtship and entered into marriage. In the past week and a half we have seen how the marriage has been finally consummated—cementlike: they could not budge. I have watched them playing hanky-panky with one another.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Alexander: This is interesting because I watched that same gang on my left, with all due respect, in the last parliament when they were concerned about the problems of the nation in terms of high unemployment and the cost of living. My friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, was concerned about pensions and rising prices. This was their being. I was impressed with that gentlemanly crowd—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: —until they wanted to get married. Then things happened. I don't know how it could have happened. I do not know how anyone could sell their principles for political expediency. This party brought a motion that pinpointed the problems of our nation because the government was not dealing with unemployment, rising costs and inflation. Guess who voted against it? I do not want to mention any names, but just look to my left.

I listened to the Minister of Justice give us a great lesson on the interpretation of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act. He went through a whole lot of things. He was very concerned. He said that payment was required to meet the just and legal claims of those who were entitled to benefit. Let me say this: we on this side are equally concerned about that. We are equally concerned—

Mr. Orlikow: Tell us.

Mr. Alexander: There's another one. I understand that member is going to be speaking next. He will tell us all about it. We are just as concerned. Let the record show that in no way will this party hold up payments to those who are legally entitled to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: You just don't sign the cheques, that is all.

Mr. Alexander: The minister is getting involved. I say to the minister that when we give our word he can rest assured that it is final.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: It is not like the night we had a gentleman's agreement here. We were not supposed to have a recorded vote. Guess who turned out to be the bad fellows? After a little conversation on the opposite side, they forced a vote. What I am saying is, I do not know whether we can trust them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I do not see anyone standing up on a question of privilege. If they do, we will talk all night about that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is the point you are trying to make?

Mr. Alexander: Now we hear from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He is always talking. This is my first opportunity to put my thoughts on the record and I am being interrupted unduly and in an ungentlemanly fashion. I cannot understand it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Alexander: I have made my point. We say they will get their money in due time, but in the meantime this government must be chastised, criticized and put in its place. That is the role of the opposition, constructive criticism. In no way will we abdicate that responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: In trying to interpret this section, the Minister of Justice referred to section 137(4) which relates to the limit. I will read it for the edification of hon. members:

The total amount outstanding at any time of advances made under this section shall not exceed $800 million.

We have had a legal opinion on this, Mr. Speaker. That is not final. What this House debated in 1971 does not mean a thing. The minister said we can forget about it. He then said the law is the law in terms of section 23 of the Financial Administration Act. He interpreted it his way, we interpreted it our way. I say this is why we have judges and courts. There is no way I will ever accept any legal opinion coming from a minister, with all due respect to him as a law professor and Member of Parliament, because I saw the grain stabilization program in force at one time. They had a legal opinion then, but they backed away from that.

The minister interpreted the law and so did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Parliament is paramount when it decides on a statutory limit. That is the law. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre leaves the law to Mr. Speaker. I must say this, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is certainly well versed in the intricacies of the rules, regulations and laws of the House of Commons. I think that he deserves a hand in that regard.

• (2040)

The hon. member says there is one law that says we must pay the benefits. I say that he is quite correct. However, I also say that there is another law which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has conveniently forgotten, and that is the law which says that the figure shall not exceed $800 million. This is the limit that was set by parliament. When it comes to deciding which is the more urgent of the two, I respecfully submit that parliament stands ahead. The money will be acquired but not in a devious, clandestine way, not in an illegal way such as was perpetrated by this government. I think that both have to be read together.

An hon. Member: Which law are you in favour of?

Mr. Alexander: Again there is the same noise in the background. I think the prerogative and the integrity of parliament must be maintained. I say that parliament is paramount. I say that parliament has not only the right but the obligation to control spending. In every instance parliament must have some means whereby its approval is sought with respect to spending. In other words, we must have some interest in the purse-strings.

That is what happened in 1971. The government believed in all those principles which I enunciated with respect to the prerogative and integrity of parliament; that is why they brought in section 137(4) and section 133(b). The only other way they could get money is under section 133(b) which reads:

—any other amounts provided out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for any purpose related to unemployment insurance that is authorized by an appropriation—

I say that authorization by appropriation means that it must be done with the consent of parliament. This is the institution which stands supreme when it comes to this bill. The paragraph continues:

—by parliament and the administration of which falls to the commission.

That is what it is all about. That was the control which was accepted by the committee and by all members of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, my time is extremely limited. I would like to accommodate the hon. member, but he has had his opportunity. He has had 40 minutes, and now I would like to pursue the theme of my remarks. If there is any time left, I will be happy to allow him a question.

What happened? By the middle of August, I respectfully submit, and at the time when we came back to deal with the B.C. port strike, the government knew the exact state of the unemployment insurance fund and it knew it was running into difficulty. Knowing that—and I say that it did—by September 1, they could have informed parliament of the predicament in which they found themselves. They would have had to tell the truth then, and who knows what they were thinking about in terms of the election. We all know that they could not afford to let any cats out of the bag at that time.

I heard them on the other side saying that is not true; they did not know anything until the middle of September. I do not buy that nonsense. Knowing that they could not divulge anything, in their own devious and sneaky way they looked to section 23 of the Financial Administration Act. I submit that what they tried to do was to legislate not by parliament but by Governor General's warrant. They increased the limit that was set by parliament—the limit that was accepted by everyone—in the first instance by $234 million and that is when they ran into trouble.

We do not question the use of these warrants. What we question is the government's timing. I have heard it said, and I have read that this has been one of the most unique situations that some people have ever seen. It borders on impropriety, on illegality and on disrespect not only for the House of Commons but for the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Alexander: The whole approach was calculated to deceive. They knew they were in trouble by the middle of August, 1972, but they remained silent. I think this government should be criticized for this in most profound terms. Knowing that they were in trouble, knowing that the people of Canada should be told, knowing that parliament should be informed, they remained silent until it was convenient for them to let the cat out of the bag.

[Mr. Alexander.]

When can warrants be sought? I will not be repetitious in this regard, but let me just point out that, as has been stated by those on this side of the House and by some hon. members on the other side, they can be sought when parliament is not in session, when payment is urgently required for the public good, when there is no appropriation for the payment, or the need for payment was not foreseeable when parliament was last in session.

I should like to state that parliament was dissolved on September 1, 1972, yet on October 5 a warrant was issued. I say, read between the lines.

There was a continuing situation from mid-August, yet they want us to believe that they had no idea of the unhealthy state of the fund, a situation which should have required them to make an immediate disclosure, to inform the House and the people of Canada. They say that it was not that bad. I cannot buy it. I understand that if the government had acted as it should have acted in the interest of the country, it would have asked for the issuance of Governor General's warrants for immediate payments, not anticipatory payments. Yet this is what the government did; they asked for $234 million, which was beyond what was required for immediate payments.

If parliament is not sitting, Governor General's warrants can be acquired when necessary. But the government cannot legislate by way of Governor General's warrants. The government could have asked for warrants as time and circumstances demanded, but instead they went too far. A special warrant cannot be granted when the legislative authority does not exist. It provides funds only for expenditures for which parliamentary authority exists. In the case of the two special warrants for the UIC account the case against granting warrants is even stronger, because under section 137(4) parliament expressly and succinctly provided that the total amount paid under the section shall not exceed $800 million.

What have they tried to do? They have brought in Bill C-124. We have already had some discussion about dealing with it in the other place in terms of one vote. What have they done? As I read the explanatory note of Bill C-124 as it applies to clause 2. I find these words:

This clause would provide that the appropriation described therein will not be treated as an appropriation referred to in paragraph 133(b) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, but instead will be dealt with as an advance, which is repayable with interest in accordance with section 137 of that act.

• (2050)

This means that section 23, as I understand it, relates to appropriations. Appropriations are grants. If this is a grant, then obviously the Minister of Finance would have to make some record with respect to his budgetary statements in the future. If it is a grant, then it comes from the general tax coffers. I respectfully submit that that is really what happened.

Notwithstanding the fact that section 23 refers to it as an appropriation, the government says, using tricky legal language, that it shall be deemed to be an advance. In other words, when we are through dealing with all the intricacies of the bill the ceiling will be wiped out, the sum of $454 million will be in the unemployment insurance account as an advance, which in turn means that employers and employees will have to carry the burden of the mismanagement, miscalculation and ineptitude of the government.

An hon. Member: That is not so.

Mr. Alexander: My hon. friend says no. That is exactly what it means. This amount will go into the fund and on such terms and conditions as the Minister of Finance sees fit to make, the loan will be paid back. The only people interested in the fund are employers and employees; that is why the methods used by the government are so disastrous.

In conclusion, one would hope that the arguments that we on this side of the House have presented will not be misinterpreted. I think they have been; the responsible minister is nodding his head, saying either yes or no. But what we are trying to do is to bring to light what we believe is wrong, what we believe the government should be chastised for and for which ultimately they will have to account. It is as simple as that.

I close by saying that we do not intend to put up any more speakers on this side of the House. Our points have been made, so let us bring this matter to a vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) seeking to ask the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) a question?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My question is a legal one and is right up my hon. friend's alley. In view of the charge that there has been an illegal expenditure of money, can the hon. member for Hamilton West say whether, looking at section 137(4) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, the total amount of advances outstanding under this section exceeds $800 million?

Mr. Baldwin: The Auditor General has already said there was $980 million on December 22.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, it appears as a result of information received that the answer to that question is yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member seeking to ask another question?

Mr. Alexander: No, that is all he is going to get. I thought he had a good question, but now he has been stamped on he wants a second go.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All I can say is: chicken!

Mr. Baldwin: May I ask the hon. member for Hamilton West a question!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pelletier (Hochelaga): He said he did not want any more.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Chair will permit a question, but I would ask hon. members to abate their excitment sufficiently to allow some of these exchanges to work their way to the front.

Mr. Baldwin: Would the hon. member for Hamilton West advise the House whether in a public statement the Auditor General said that on December 22, 1972, there were $982 million of advances received by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, some $180 million higher than the $800 million ceiling that was set?

Mr. Alexander: To the best of my knowledge, yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have a great suspicion that those remarks were made, but for some time the Chair has been trying to divide the debate that has been going on in committee from the debate that has been going in the House. Earlier in this sitting the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) proposed the following motion:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after "That" and substituting therefor the following:
> "this House, noting that by clause 2 of Bill C-124 the government proposes to change the law so as to burden the present and future workers of Canada and their employers with the payment of the sum of 454,000,000 dollars to the detriment of the unemployment insurance plan; and further noting that the government thereby would avoid having to account for this sum in its statement of budgetary revenues and expenditures for the present fiscal year; and further noting that the government thereby would avoid having to seek supply for this sum from parliament as a budgetary expense and to propose ways and means by which this sum might be raised by additional taxation upon individual and corporate taxpayers, as the law presently requires, resolves that Bill C-124 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates."

By the indulgence of the House, the question of the validity of the motion was put aside in order to deal with another point. There is a standard form of amendment to the effect that the subject matter of a bill may be referred to a standing committee. This motion, the Chair suggests, should be in a pure form and should not contain assertions which could only be considered points for debate. However, other matters are set forth in the motion and they make the motion unacceptable.

As Mr. Speaker ruled on January 26, 1971:

> It is not a reasoned amendment. It is largely a deviation or a change from the old established form of amendment which provides that the subject matter of a bill or a motion before the House be referred to a special committee or a standing committee. What I believe is objectionable from a procedural standpoint in connection with this proposed amendment is that it goes into the details of the bill.

I also have some reservations about the suggestion that the bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates, but I have made my ruling on the point I first referred to. I now call on the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, if you will permit me to speak to your ruling for a moment, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated, as did the government House leader, when we were discussing the point of order that had the verbiage, as it was referred to, been stripped from the amendment it would have likely been in order. Hon. members of this House know that I am very non-partisan in these matters. However, the amendment would be really meaningless if the truth were stripped from it, so I shall not ask for the indulgence of the House to remove those words.

Unemployment Insurance Act

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the proposal before us calls for the removal of the ceiling on advances under section 137 of the Unemployment Insurance Act; it removes the limit of $800 million. We in this party intend to support that proposal because we believe it is necessary, just as the warrants for the period from January 4 to February 7 were necessary. If unemployed people have qualified for unemployment insurance benefits, they are entitled under law to those benefits.

We have heard a number of speeches from the hatchetmen in the official opposition including the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). In the 11 years I have been here, in all the times he has brandished his hatchet only once did it accomplish what he intended. I remember rumours and stories about bankruptcies in Quebec, but when the chips were down the hatchet disappeared because the hon. member could not produce the evidence. Similarly with his speech today; it provided little evidence.

Members of the official opposition have argued that the warrants were illegal and that this bill is needed because the government has acted illegally. I am not going to deal with the legal aspects because my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), dealt with them in his speech last night in a way in which I could not possibly duplicate. He demonstrated to anybody who wanted to listen that not only were they legal but that the action the Conservative government took when it was in power was much worse than anything this government has done. I noticed that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), who argued some of the supposed constitutional and legal points, disappeared while the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking. Perhaps when he realized the hon. member's argument was so powerful he decided not to stick around.

We intend to support this bill because we want the unemployed to receive their benefits. We have heard a great deal from the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) about being married to the government because we are supporting this bill. Let me say to the hon. member, who has quite a few unemployed in his constituency who want their benefits, that when the government brings forward Bill C-125, which is going to make the qualification for unemployment insurance benefits much more difficult—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They are not going to bring it forward.

Mr. Orlikow: —we are not going to support that bill. The Conservative party has talked consistently about the need to tighten up the regulations. If they support that bill we will then see who is in bed with whom at that time. The hon. member for Hamilton West and other members of the official opposition who have spoken have expressed surprise and concern that the fund is so much in the red. They say the government should have known this. Of course the government should have known, but a government which has been so wrong on every economic matter—

Mr. Benjamin: Stupid.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Orlikow: A government that has been so stupid, as the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) says—

An hon. Member: You have supported them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why doesn't that sheep from Burlington shut up.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not mind his interjections because the more he interjects, the more stupid he appears on the record. A government that has been so wrong in the last four years about the economic situation in this country had to be wrong about this situation.

In December, 1969, when unemployment was a good deal lower than it is now, both in percentage figures and in total numbers, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said the major concern in the country was the rapidly rising cost of living and he was going to stop that by slowing down the economy. He succeeded brilliantly: in 1970 we had a cost of living increase of about 2 per cent. Of course, the rate of unemployment, as we had predicted, went up very substantially and has been going up ever since.

What member who has been here from 1968 does not remember the speeches we heard from the former minister of finance? He was rewarded for the brilliant job he did by being appointed president of the Canadian Transport Commission. Month after month as Statistics Canada brought out the unemployment figures the minister stood in his place and told us that prosperity was just around the corner. He said the government was instituting a program which would see unemployment begin to fall.

On one occasion—I do not have the quotation here—the then minister of finance challenged the Leader of the Official Opposition to resign if unemployment was not below 5 per cent by the end of the year. Of course, that did not happen. I remember the minister's first speech after he was appointed in which he said he did not want to deal with the mundane and routine numbers game. He said as far as he was concerned any unemployment was too much and what he wanted was full employment. He did not succeed. In fact, things are worse than they were under the former finance minister.

We on this side of the House began in 1969 to say that the government's policies were wrong. We said then, as we have said since, that what the government should do is follow an expansionary policy in order to put people back to work. Our advice was ignored. After the former minister of manpower and immigration left office he said it would have been a lot better had the government asked for the resignation of some of its top economic advisers. If there ever has been a government that received bad advice, it is the government we have had since 1968. That government has been wrong about unemployment ever since the Prime Minister took office.

This government promised that unemployment would be reduced, when in fact it has steadily gone up. That is the real reason the unemployment insurance fund is in financial difficulty. I will refer in a moment to the position taken by members of the official opposition in that regard. It is amazing how people can be wise after the event. Members of the official opposition said they knew all along that the unemployment insurance bill was a terrible bill.

It seems to me that the director of the Canada Council on Social Development is preaching for a call as the deputy minister of national health and welfare under a Conservative government. He says now that the Unemployment Insurance Act is a disaster, but when that bill was first being discussed he praised it to the hilt. We are now hearing from the Auditor General, another friend of the official opposition, about what should have been done.

The real reason the fund is in trouble is that we have had in almost every month of the last three years more than 6 per cent unemployment on a seasonally adjusted basis. When the Unemployment Insurance Act was being amended, the government said the premiums it proposed employees and employers would pay would keep the fund solid provided unemployment remained at 4 per cent or less, and if it went over 4 per cent the government would pick up the deficit in the fund. When that bill was going through parliament and the committee, the unemployment rate was 6 per cent and it has remained at 6 per cent or more every month since then. Is it any wonder that the fund is now in a deficit position? Of course it is in a deficit position if the premium was set too low to meet the cost of carrying the fund when you have 6 per cent unemployment. That is the real reason the fund is in trouble.

But the official opposition want to get rid of the government. They want to take over. I cannot blame them. That is part of the political game. We all want to get more support, more power for the parties we represent. What I resent is that members of the official opposition are trying to play both sides of the game. They are trying to cater to a backlash which they detect and which, unfortunately, is present, a backlash against welfare and unemployment insurance, and at the same time they do not have the guts to do what they ought to do if they mean what they are saying—that is, to vote against the bill. They know that if this bill is not passed the unemployed will not get their benefits, and they are certainly not prepared to face up to that responsibility.

What were the criticisms of the hon. member for Hamilton West and others who say that the act was a disaster? I say that what they criticized played a very minor role in the deficit with which the fund was faced. They suggested that instead of qualifying after eight weeks of employment, people should work a minimum of 12 weeks before qualifying for benefit. I suggest that the number of people who are drawing benefits after eight weeks is relatively small and that the amount of money which they get has very little effect on the fund.

They also object to the sickness provisions. I note that that great humanitarian, Mr. Baetz, the executive director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, also suggests that the sickness provisions should not be in the bill. But what does Mr. Baetz suggest as a solution for the people who are sick? He says let them be included in the provincial medicare plans. Mr. Speaker, all Members of Parliament know how short of money all provinces are and there is not the slightest chance that the provinces would agree to pay sickness benefits to people who are unemployed. Mr. Baetz is simply suggesting that we cut those people off unemployment insurance benefit and let them look after themselves. That is a great approach from somebody who is supposed to give leadership in the welfare field. What about maternity benefits?

Mr. Baetz also pointed out that certain groups of workers do not work long enough ever to pay unemployment insurance premiums to cover the amount which they will draw. He is right, Mr. Speaker. But who are those people? The main group I can think of comprises the fishermen on the east coast. I would like to know whether members who represent the fishermen in the maritime provinces, most of them Conservatives, agree with their friend Mr. Baetz. Do they want the fishermen cut off? Mr. Baetz says the fishermen should get the help they need from provincial or local welfare organizations. I am not a resident of the maritime provinces but I know something about the less than generous rates paid to people on welfare in the most prosperous provinces and I am sure the maritime provinces, with their financial difficulties, are not in a position to be very generous.

It is not often I agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West, but he did say one thing with which I must agree. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government should have known in August that the fund would be in trouble. I join him in his criticism of that. Yes, the government should have had parliament deal with it then, and it did not; parliament was dissolved. Now we have questions here and in the committee about whether the Governor General's warrants were genuine to meet unemployment insurance benefits from January 4 to January 11. There are questions about whether those warrants were proper and legal. We had the Auditor General suggest that there was no need for the last warrant because parliament was meeting on January 4, and the first day it met a bill should have been introduced by the government in order to provide the money.

I can just imagine the howl of rage that would have come from the official opposition when parliament met on January 4 if the government, before it introduced the Speech from the Throne and had a vote which demonstrated that it had the confidence of the House, had introduced a bill to provide money for the unemployment insurance fund. We would have had a fantastic number of speeches from members of the official opposition telling the people of Canada that the government was not following the tried and true rules of the parliamentary system.

I agree that the government should have known better about the financial needs of the fund, just as for four years or more we said that the government should have known better about the number of people who would be unemployed.

An hon. Member: Why are you supporting it?

Mr. Orlikow: Because I want the people who are unemployed in my city, in Toronto, in Hamilton, in Halifax and in every other city and village, the people who have paid their unemployment insurance premiums and have qualified to receive benefits under the act which is now the law of the land, to get their benefits. Like every Member of Parliament, I get telephone calls and visits from constituents every day of the week. I said in committee, and I say it again tonight, that Winnipeg is not a city which has the highest rate of unemployment. I guess I am pretty lucky; I get only two or three phone calls a day. My colleague from Nickel Belt tells me he is dealing with 50 cases a week, and Conservative members from the Maritimes tell me they have a hundred or more cases every week. I want those people to get the money to which they are entitled. I do not want them to do what one of my constituents told me today he had to do when he did not receive the benefits he was entitled to for eight weeks; he had to sell a savings bond. That man should receive the benefits to which he is entitled and which he needs.

Yes, the government was wrong. Yes, the government was stupid. I might even agree with the hon. member for Hamilton West that the government has been somewhat devious about the matter. But now the crunch is here. Are the unemployed who are entitled to benefits going to get their benefits or not? This bill will ensure that they will get their benefits. I have no hesitation in, nor am I the slightest bit ashamed of voting in favour of it. Members of the official opposition can call me any names they want. I am going to do whatever is necessary to see that people who are unemployed and who are in real difficulty get what they are entitled to by law, and I will leave it to members of the official opposition to play politics with this very serious situation.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I assure you that I do not intend to be involved in arguments as to whether warrants were issued legally or illegally, whether this or that section applies or does not apply, because that should not even be part of the present debate. The present debate is on whether or not a particular section of the Unemployment Insurance Act should be deleted in order that the act may function better in future. The question of whether the warrants are legal or illegal is for another body to decide. What we have succeeded in doing in this debate is to prejudge the report that will inevitably be made by the miscellaneous estimates committee. That should not be done and is something the Speaker quite properly prevented yesterday.

I hoped when I spoke in the throne speech debate that that would be my last speech. I tried to be reasonable and tried not to be partisan. I do not think I was. But it was very obvious to me, listening as I did yesterday and this evening, that the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who played such an important part in the formation of this bill still does not understand the purpose of the $800 million.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: He spoke of a deficit. When he talked of the deficit, that shows that he still does not understand. I am going to try to explain it to him in very simple language so that once and for all he will understand what is the meaning of the $800 million.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why didn't you listen.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Mackasey: I have been listening. I have always tried to listen; that has been one of my traits. I am not afraid to debate on another occasion why we were so grossly out in the estimates.

Mr. Paproski: That is not what you said on television.

Mr. Mackasey: What is the purpose of the $800 million? If one could sit and visualize how the unemployment insurance plan is funded or financed—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It was not funded, that is the trouble.

Mr. Mackasey: —it would be very simple. The cost of benefits and of administration in unemployment rates of between zero and 4 per cent is borne by the employers and the employees of Canada and that is reflected in the weekly contributions they make. These vary from year to year and I believe the present minister properly raised them, according to the act, to approximately $1 per hundred. That, I think, is the employee's contribution at the moment and that of the employer is slightly higher.

The hon. member for Hamilton West should remember that when we were before the committee we allowed for privisions for the adjustment of that rate based on a three-year moving average. Since the cost of that particular part of the scheme relating to unemployment between zero and 4 per cent will vary very little unless certain factors are changed, for instance unless rates of unemployment change up or down or the cost of administration changes slightly, we can almost perfectly predict for a five-year period what those particular contributions shall be. As the work force grows and as this cost remains fairly stable, it is very obvious that sooner or later the annual contributions of the employer and those of the employee will drop.

Mr. Alexander: That is another prediction.

Mr. Mackasey: In addition, there is no fund. Hon. members keep using that word. The purpose of the act is not to tie up, as we did in the old days, $500 million or $800 million or $900 million. When the Tory government in 1958 took power there was $980 million in the fund; when they left there was less than $200 million.

Mr. Nielsen: And now there is nothing.

Mr. Mackasey: There is no fund and it was never intended that there should be. That is exactly the point, and hon. members still have not understood it. They do not understand it, either because they are stupid or because they do not want to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: The point is that the opposition critic should know exactly why I am saying that the law provides no obligation with respect to a fund. This the hon. member for Hamilton West failed to point out. On the other hand, if there is a surplus as a result of more employer-employee contributions, that must be reflected by law in the rate that is assigned to employers and employees in the following year. So, the purpose is not to accumulate funds, not to keep huge surpluses or acquire huge deficits year by year; the purpose is to adjust the contributions of the employer and employee so as to finance the benefits that are available between zero and 4 per cent rates of unemployment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is welfare and not insurance at all.

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman has just stated his philosophy. He is against welfare and against the poor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in being diverted by attacks on the poor.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: I want to explain something—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Go ahead by all means.

Mr. Mackasey: I want to explain something, and if you want to learn something you might just listen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: The cost of benefits that come into play at unemployment rates over 4 per cent—I am talking of the extended period—and the sickness and maternity benefits, the help to fishermen, and so on, is borne by the government. That particular provision is nothing more than a commitment by the federal government to absorb that cost since, in the final analysis, it is responsible for keeping unemployment to tolerable levels in this country. At least we have had the courage as a party, despite high unemployment, to recognize our obligations to the unemployed and to assume them by introducing what I still maintain to be the most progessive unemployment insurance plan in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: To illustrate, let us just visualize for a moment a business. There are many businessmen here, many honest economists and also, I hope, open-minded people and they are listening. If you can visualize a business that as it sells its products is not paid in cash but accumulates accounts receivable, you can understand what the purpose of the $800 million is. The contributions of employers and employees are paid at the same time as the moneys are sent in for income tax and the Canada Pension Plan. Those moneys are transferred to the department dealing with unemployment insurance from the Department of National Revenue which has the responsibility of collecting it.

Large companies make bulk payments and the Unemployment Insurance Commission accumulates accounts receivable. The purpose of the $800 million is nothing more than to lend the Unemployment Insurance Commission the cash to finance its accounts receivable, including those from that large debtor which happens to be the government of this country. So hon. members have completely misunderstood the purpose of the $800 million. It is to finance accounts receivable. It is to finance the revenues of the commission and to finance what is paid out week by week as unemployment fluctuates from region to region.

Mr. Stanfield: We understand that.

Mr. Mackasey: However, Mr. Speaker, experience indicates that $800 million is not sufficient to finance the accounts receivable that are accumulated by the Unemployment Insurance Commission—

Mr. Nielsen: Why was the ceiling put on?

Mr. Mackasey: —so that section is better struck out of the act.

Mr. Nielsen: Why was the ceiling put on?

Mr. Mackasey: Why was the ceiling put on? In all probability, to avoid the necessity of trying to predict rates of unemployment in this country. I will be honest. That should please you people on the other side because, confidentially, for the last six weeks, and during the election campaign you tried to become the party in power by riding to power on the backs of the poor, and you are not going to do it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: We are going to ride in on your backs, that's what we will do.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, my role has not been the easiest one in this country.

An hon. Member: Don't speak like a demagogue.

Mr. Mackasey: I at least will walk out of here with the integrity with which I came here ten years ago, which is more than some of those who are trying to speak out of both sides of their mouths can say.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: You are the people who created the unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: The $800 million question has been constantly raised and constantly misunderstood. It is almost impossible to imagine how, collectively, one hundred or more people can be so stupid that no one understands the purpose for which the $800 million was put in the act.

• (2130)

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, unemployment insurance runs on a calendar year. We now know to the copper, according to the minister's statement, what it will cost in paid-outs. The minister's statement is worth reading. Hon. members should read it because it is factual. This plan has cost the Canadian people approximately $200 million. In fact, the minister was specific to the copper. We do not yet know all the revenue. We will have to wait until the T4 slips are analysed some time this summer. The payments from companies and employees are in the revenue fund; they have to be separated by the Department of National Revenue and appropriated to the departments, including unemployment insurance.

All we have heard about all day is costs. There are ways of cutting costs. I have gone through them before. It is not too late now, at twenty-five minutes to ten in the evening, to make other amendments to cut costs so we will not need $800 million. I can review them as I did the other night. One hon. member said we should cut out self-employed fishermen on the east coast. Others have suggested that we reduce the benefits and increase the waiting period from eight weeks to twelve weeks or, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) suggested in supporting Reuben Baetz, 20 weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: Go to it, increase it to 20. Members opposite can explain this to the 300,000 or 400,000 people who will be eliminated from unemployment insurance. If you do that you will at least be consistent, but you cannot have it both ways; you cannot pretend you are concerned about the unemployed by voting for this if at the same time you say you are helpless with regard to bringing in amendments to the act. You can bring in amendments right now. Cut out the fishermen, the woodworker, the women's maternity benefits—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I am sure hon. members want to be fair to the hon. member who has the floor and, at the same time, to the Chair.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the deficit for which the act provides adjustments in the employer-employee contributions, according to the figures the minister read the other day, is precisely $159 million. Hon. members must realize that almost two million people came on the rolls, under the guise of universality, at preferred rates of 40 per cent. This year this will be up to 80 per cent and next year it will be 100 per cent. Hon. members should realize the flexibility we have to adjust the rate a nickel or a dime. That is about all that will probably happen in the next five years. It will still be less than the $1.40 of five years ago.

It is obvious that the $160 million will be repaid to the government. The fund, as I suggested, will remain in relative balance. If at the end of the year there is an increase, this will be reflected in lower rates. If there is a deficit, there will be higher rates. It is in the bill. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) spent all his time on the bill, but he does not understand it. Don't blame the government. It was my responsibility to inform the government if I thought we were going to run out of money. I was informed by the appropriate officials in September that we could be in trouble by December if we were not careful. I am quite sure that in September I decided the cabinet should be notified.

There is something I did not like in the minutes of the miscellaneous estimates committee. Everyone so far in the debate has used the evidence from the committee. This will be my only reference. There was an attempt to drag into the political arena the chief commissioner of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, who is one of the hardest working people in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: There were members who had questions. Before he was given a chance to answer, the chief commissioner was asked whether his answer would be truth or fiction. That is an insult. The chief commissioner should have told that Member of Parliament that it is an insult to a senior civil servant to presume he would lie before a committee of the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I said I would not get involved in the committee hearings. However, I say to you that anything I have said in this House during the past ten years has been accurate. I would never deliberately mislead the House. I did not inform my colleagues, nor was I informed that it might be necessary or should have been necessary to obtain warrants during the emergency period when we came back to deal with the strike. I might have been irresponsible and I might have made a bad error in judgment, but the important point is that that is my responsibility, not the government's.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mackasey: What is more important is the way the opposition has used this issue to try, as someone just said, to use the reactionary forces in this country while at the same time telling the unemployed, "We are your friends because we are voting for the $800 million." Don't vote for it. We don't need your support. We want you to be honest, consistent and men of integrity. If you do not believe in the cost of unemployment insurance, vote against it; that is all you have to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: If members opposite think it is too costly, they should bring in the amendments I suggested. If they want to bring in amendments, we are quite prepared to lay them on the table. Why won't you bring them in?

Mr. Nielsen: There is no bill.

Mr. Mackasey: We will bring in a bill.

Mr. Stanfield: Bring it in.

Mr. Mackasey: The Leader of the Opposition said that if he had the opportunity he would reduce and remove some of the benefits in the present Unemployment Insurance Act.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Mackasey: I am asking an honest question. The opposition are saying we should bring in a bill to change the present act so that we can put people back on welfare. We can bring back the $35 benefit which we had in 1960 when unemployment was even higher. The Leader of the Opposition knows the terrible rate of unemployment, the degradation and the loss of dignity of the people of Nova Scotia when he was premier of that province. It should be plainly on the record that the Leader of the Opposition did not get up to repudiate that statement. You cannot have it both ways; that is a lesson everybody in this House should understand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis).

Some hon. Members: Shame.

• (2140)

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, all those Quebec members seem to know so much about Nova Scotia. Would the minister take the time, now that he has brought Nova Scotia into the picture, to tell us why and how he, as a former minister, could make the judgment that 10 per cent of UIC benefits belong to the people and not to the company? In other words, we will give the UIC 10 per cent and the government 9 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member should not take advantage of a point of order to ask a question. If he wants to ask a question he should seek permission from the hon. member who has the floor. Also, the question cannot be asked in the manner in which it was asked by the hon. member because it is an argument.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which arises from your decision. I did not rise on a point of order; I asked the former minister for permission to put a question.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): You did not hear me. Wait until Hansard comes out tomorrow. You will then see, also, that one of your ministers got caught because he was not listening.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. I wish to remind the hon. member that the Chair did not find the question to be proper as to form.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, if I were a bitter man, which I am not, maybe I would have risen on a point of order to point out that the hon. member called me a minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: May I say this in conclusion: the $800 million is nothing more than a sum of money upon which the Unemployment Insurance commission can borrow from time to time for the daily operations which are necessary under the act and are accountable to government and to the people through the annual statement. Whatever they borrow is repayable to the government. The government in turn will pay its debt to the Unemployment Insurance Commission when it has tallied up some time in April or May, and that of course is the debt that results from the fact that unemployment at the present moment is over 4 per cent. I might must say that when the rate of unemployment gets down below 4 per cent—

Some hon. Members: When?

Mr. Mackasey: —and it will, the maximum benefit period will be 25 weeks instead of 52 weeks. The people on minor attachment will be limited to 18 weeks. which should please the opposition. In other words, we would be saving money, which is our concern, and the people will be back to work, about which everybody will be happy. But we cannot have it both ways, and I say this very sincerely. The act is costing more than anticipated for logical reasons which the minister mentioned.

In Canada there are 8,500,000 or more who are working and who are earning more money than ever before. This country is affluent and can well afford to pay the 90 cents or $1 a week to those who are less fortunate. If we cannot that is unfortunate, or if we do not want to that is even more unfortunate. But if we are going to reduce unemployment, and we will—and I say "we" collectively in this House because I do not think anybody particularly appreciates it—then in the interval we cannot do as the opposition has tried to do, ridicule the unemployment insurance plan; but it did not quite succeed because people came to their senses in time.

If they want to further emasculate the plan, they are not helpless. If they want to put a stigma on it, they are going about it the right way. But sooner or later sanity will prevail in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mackasey: People will then understand the Liberal party in the last election. Those who seek to exploit the poor will find out that the poor do not forget that easily.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Laniel): Order, please. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) seeks the floor for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member a question. He referred to the accounts receivable situation. Is it not a fact that the employers' and the employees' contributions are paid in by the fifteenth of the following month, throughout the year? Why is it, then, that the Department of National Revenue does not have a running record of the payments month by month, so we do not have to wait until the T4 forms are in?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is, as usual, fairly accurate. There is a statute that says that the Department of National Revenue must accumulate these contributions monthly, and eventually they do get the unemployment insurance. But in the meantime we borrow from the $800 million. I do not want to suggest that this is just to finance the employer-employee side; it is also to obtain sums of money which the government owes. But we must not forget that unemployment insurance is taxable and substantial sums of money will be coming in as the result of unemployment insurance being added to the regular income earned by the unemployed in the last eight or nine months in the year, which will form the basis of the T4 assessment and taxation. That extra revenue will come to the government and has to be calculated as part and parcel of the final and precise cost to the government of unemployment insurance.

The precise cost to the employer-employee fund is fairly well known. I have quoted it as $159 million. It is obvious that the $800 million is too low to finance day to day operations at a time when unemployment is running high, but more particularly when we are paying $68 a week rather than $51. If that was a miscalculation, it was a happy one because it reflects that the people who are working are earning a better salary than they ever earned, or that we predicted three years ago, under a progressive government.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, tonight we have listened to an impassioned defence of the indefensible by the former minister who was responsible to this House for the unemployment insurance fund. In many ways, much of what was said was, regrettably, irrelevant to the bill before us. There was a great deal of passion. I have listened to the hon. member in the past and I have found him to be great at this; he would confuse the issue with irrelevancies. If he wants to talk about the reaction of the poor, I invite him to come out to western Canada—he would not dare to—where the working people are the people who voted against this scheme.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let us not have any more of this demagogic nonsense. We have tried to make fair criticism. Those who should hang their heads in shame are those who put the former minister out to dry on a clothes-line after they had wrung him out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He was made the scapegoat for a collective decision of cabinet. If it were possible to refer to information that has come to us in another way, it would be easy to demonstrate that month by month, through statements made by the Minister of Finance, we had an indication as to the progression of advances to the fund. We did not have to wait until September to know that they were out; this was apparent in June. The statements were not tabled in July, or in August, or in September. Parliament was not sitting—how convenient! So it could be demonstrated, certainly before August, that the fund was in dire trouble and would soon go through the $800 million.

The attitude of government supporters, including those to my left, is that if we owe a debt to the fund—and of course we owe a debt to the unemployed; we have an obligation to pay them their benefits—then we have to pay that debt. But it matters not how you get the money. It is the same as if one of us owed $500 on an automobile or on a mortgage payment and got the money at the point of a gun and tried to justify it. Certainly that would be an illegal act. Or suppose we took it from somebody else's drawer; that too would be an illegal act. Such an act on the part of the government is contrary to a statute of parliament. They did not have the courage to come before parliament and the people of this country and admit they had mismanaged or misjudged affairs. Misjudged they certainly had.

The point we are arguing is this. The ceiling must remain because parliament is responsible under the act, not the cabinet. If there was ever a classic example of why there must be a ceiling, it is this particular occasion when the administration has been called to task to explain what it has done. The former minister, I think sincerely, advanced reasons for the action that was taken, but he has had to do it on behalf of the government.

We are told that if no ceiling is imposed then there will be an accounting to parliament. I ask, when? After the event, months later when the Auditor General's report comes out; and all that would greet the pecadilloes of the government at that time would be a big, big yawn. Since the government and its agencies are involved here, they must be accountable to parliament. This is why there must be a ceiling. There is no magic about the figure of $800 million, but there must be an accounting to parliament.

As for the other point, I will be frank. I regret to say it, but as a result of the decision that the Chair may feel compelled to render, firstly with regard to the amendment of my colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and secondly with regard to the point of order raised by my colleague from Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), this House has been placed in an impossible and an illogical position. The adoption of the government's motion will mean that this bill will go to the committee that deals with labour matters. The committee will consider clause 2 which deals with item L30a in the supplementary estimates. That committee, unless of course it follows direction, will arrive at its opinion and will report to the House. This same item, by decision of the House, has been referred to the miscellaneous estimates committee and that committee is coming to its decision.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): A bright one at the back of me asks when. Obviously he is not on the committee. There is an undertaking that the report will be here by February 2. The decision in that report may be different from the decision of the other committee. So there is the position, Mr. Speaker; the same item is being considered under two separate motions of this House, and there is no way that can be done. What might have been done was to split the bill and send item L30a to the miscellaneous estimates committee. But this House has been placed in an impossible position as a result of the action of the government. I suppose we shall have to face the consequences. I must confess that I think there were some fatal flaws in the reasoning that denied the point of order raised by my colleague from Yukon. Nevertheless, since I feel there must be a ceiling, I do not like this bill.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I know hon. members, myself included, would have liked to see the debate on this stage of the bill ended tonight.

Mr. Nielsen: Then let us vote now.

Mr. Lewis: I am sorry I want to take a minute or two, if I may, to say three things as simply as I can. The first is that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) entered into another fallacy when he said that we have to have a ceiling in the act in order for parliament to supervise the expenditures. I say to him that the opposite is the case. The ceiling in the statute enables the government to make advances without reference to parliament, whereas if there is no ceiling such money will have to be put in the estimates and parliament will have to consider and study such expenditure.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member for York South. I have no alternative but to call it ten o'clock, unless there is unanimous agreement to continue.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we would suggest that the debate continue and be concluded tonight.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are quite agreeable to allowing the debate to continue until the hon. member concludes his remarks, and then if it is the wish of the House we will stay to dispose of the second reading motion.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, much as I might think of words that I want to utter, I do not think they are important enough for me to inconvenience Members of Parliament, and my remarks are ended.

• (2200)

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Andras) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Reid: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there might be agreement in the House to postpone the "late show" this evening.

Mr. Forrestall: I don't know why.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being after ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At 10.38 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—PRICE DIFFERENTIAL BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby is seeking the consent of the House to return to motions for the purpose of proposing a motion. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Thank you for your courtesy, Mr. Speaker. I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43. The motion arises out of the revelation in an article in the Financial Post of tomorrow's date in which the president of General Motors of Canada asserts that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce made no serious effort to get his company to bring down the prices of their automobiles.

The Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, specifically asserted that this year's 7 per cent reduction in corporation tax had better be reflected in lower prices for automobiles. However, the president of General Motors had anticipated that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would appropriately threaten the withdrawal of the tax reduction from the automotive industry, having said, "Hell, that's where the strength was."

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member. He knows what the rule is. He should indicate what the motion is that he proposes to present to the House.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will move to the motion. If I may finish the quotation, the president of the company went on to say, "I kept waiting for Mr. Gillespie to bring up tax cuts on the phone, but he never mentioned them." Therefore, in view of the continuing unjustified price differential between North American cars sold in Canada and the United States, I move, seconded, by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this subject be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before putting the hon. member's motion to the House I must again bring to the attention of hon. members my qualms and doubts as to the propriety of including accusations or charges in motions brought under Standing Order 43. Hon. members know that this Standing Order, as we have interpreted it in recent years, does not make it possible for other members whose conduct may be impugned in the statement made in proposing a motion under Standing Order 43 to be given an opportunity for reply. I would think the kind of statement included in the hon. member's proposed motion is a debate and I very much doubt that it is in order. Normally I would hesitate to accept the motion, but to save time and to avoid becoming involved in a long point of order I will ask whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX—EFFECT ON COST OF LIVING—MEASURES TO MITIGATE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs a question in light of the increase of 11 per cent in the wholesale price index in the past 12 months. May I ask the minister whether the government has made any projection as to the effect of an increase in wholesale prices of this magnitude upon the cost of living index and whether, in light of any such projection, the government is taking any special measures to mitigate the effect of this increase in wholesale prices on the cost of living other than establishing a committee of the House to study food prices?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government is following the situation very closely. With respect to questions like this dealing with general trends in the economy, perhaps the Minister of Finance would be the more appropriate minister to whom to direct such questions.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the Minister of Finance for putting him on the spot at the request of his colleague. Can he tell us whether the government has made any projection of the effect of the 11 per cent increase in wholesale prices upon the cost of living index in the country and whether, in light of any such projection, which I assume it is the responsibility of the government to make, the government is taking any measures to mitigate the consequential increase in the cost of living other than the establishment of a committee of the House on food prices.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be able to go into that problem in more detail on an appropriate occasion. I have studied these wholesale price rises and also the industrial price index. One has accelerated a bit and the other has decelerated. They are still at higher levels than I would like to see and may well work their way through the retail index. I might say to the hon. gentleman that in the United States the wholesale price index of food rose at an annual rate of 14 per cent despite a price and wage control imposition during the period. This is a problem that needs solution in a number of ways, but I would not want to invite any suggestion in the House that I have in any way changed my mind either as to the inevitability or the appropriateness of price and wage controls to meet that situation.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the minister said about the United States but we have to accept our own responsibilities. I was not asking about food prices. However, since food prices have been mentioned I would ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether, in view of the 5.1 per cent increase in the wholesale food index last month, the government has met or is meeting with representatives of the food industry in order to devise methods that might be implemented immediately to reduce the impact of this increase upon the retail prices of food, or is the minister simply going to leave this to the committee?

• (1110)

Mr. Gray: I have not as yet contemplated the holding of such meetings. The Prime Minister has already pointed out the work on contingency planning which the government has been undertaking with respect to controls. Hopefully, the committee will begin meetings soon, and this subject can be gone into in depth in that forum.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the extraordinarily complacent attitude of the two ministers toward this problem—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition has the floor, of course, for the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the minister whether he has yet had an opportunity to study the studies concerning food prices made by the Prices and Incomes Commission, with which he was not familiar when I asked him a question on the subject last week? May I ask him what studies have been done, and whether this work will be available to the committee of the House of Commons inquiring into the question of food prices?

Mr. Gray: I am not yet in a position to give further information to the Leader of the Opposition on this matter.

An hon. Member: What a sense of urgency!

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Baldwin: You had better plan for another contingency.

[Later:]

INCIDENCE OF TAXATION AS ELEMENT IN INFLATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I should like to direct to the Minister of Finance. In light of the information propounded in the questions of the Leader of the Opposition and the fact that the government does not appear to have taken much notice of the studies referred to by my leader, will he take into account in his budget presentation the principle enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition and supported by the Economic Council of Canada, that the very high incidence of taxation in this country is an important element in inflation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I always take very seriously what the Leader of the Opposition says because of the high position he occupies in this House.

Mr. Muir: You will soon have that same position, John.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

POLLUTION

OIL SPILL, ALERT BAY, B.C.—STEPS TO COPE WITH SITUATION

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising out of what is reported to be the largest oil spill yet on the coast of British Columbia, at Haddington Reef, near Alert Bay, involving the bulk carrier Irish Stardust. Would the minister tell us what is the extent of the pollution threat, and inform us of what steps his department is taking to cope with an emergency which appears to be one of disastrous proportions?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): The accident to which the hon. member has referred is, indeed, truly a serious one, though I am not sure that it is the most serious one to date. We do not yet have all the facts at our disposal; we learned about the occurrence yesterday afternoon at approximately 1.45, if my memory is correct. The Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment are both presently looking into it. The hon. member knows that the ship is now in harbour, in fact, in drydock. The damage has already been done but it is not increasing at the moment. I am waiting for a comprehensive report so I can tell the House exactly what happened and to what extent property and beaches have been damaged.

Mr. Barnett: May I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he can inform us which elements of the forces at his disposal are assisting officials of the Department of Transport to cope with this situation?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the department is assisting. We have been fully informed of the oil spill but I cannot give the details of the exact number of personnel or the equipment being used.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question relating to the same matter. May I ask either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of the Environment whether they can inform the House as to what measures are being taken to contain this spill, clean up the damage and compensate those who have suffered, and what action is being taken against the offending ship?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it would be a long list. A number of experts from several departments are in the area giving advice. Equipment is on its way or already operating on the beaches around Alert Bay. It is a serious accident and is being treated as such.

MANPOWER

LOCAL INITIATIVES PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY OF ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Since the funds the Department of Manpower and Immigration has been provided with for the implementation of the Local Initiatives Program seem almost depleted, would the minister tell the House if he is willing to make additional credits available to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration so that he could be in a position to accept a larger number of projects in order to alleviate the unemployment problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Once again, I am under the impression that this question has been asked almost every day this week. However, if the minister is willing to answer it, I will recognize him.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Bellechasse is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because the problem is most serious that this matter is so often brought back for consideration. I am very serious when I ask this question and I think the Minister of Finance is quite willing to answer even if it is only to give us a little hope.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair gave the Minister of Finance leave to answer that question a while ago. I do not object to the minister answering it but he himself has not deemed proper to do it. If he is willing to do so now he may have the floor.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am always ready to answer questions asked by my friend the hon. member for Bellechasse and as always I shall very seriously consider his representations.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN WHOLESALE PRICE INDEX—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA ON CHANGING MONEY SUPPLY

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister tell the House whether, in light of the recent statistics indicating an increase in the wholesale price index, he has had any conversations with the governor of the Bank of Canada with regard to changing the money supply?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): No, Sir.

Mr. Gillies: Does the minister intend to have such conversations?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I meet the governor once a week.

Mr. Gillies: Is it the position of the government that the rate of increase in the money supply has an effect on the rate of inflation in this country?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the rate of increase in the money supply in the early part of the year, as the hon. gentleman knows, was quite high. The recent rate of increase will bring the rate for the year 1972 somewhere between 12 and 14 per cent.

SOCIAL SECURITY

OLD AGE PENSIONS—ASSURANCE RESPECTING INCREASE

Mr. Claude Wagner (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can he give the House, as did his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the assurance that a substantial increase will be announced shortly in respect of old age pensions?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I always support my colleagues.

Mr. Wagner: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe will recognize that the question has already been asked. The Chair objected to it yesterday or the day before because the question anticipates a bill to be presented to the House in due course. In that sense the question is out of order. If the hon. member wishes to put a supplementary, he may do so.

Mr. Wagner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Minister of Finance aware of rumours reported this morning by Mr. Claude Lemelin in the newspaper Le Devoir that there is dissension in the preparation of his budget?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows he cannot ask a minister whether he is aware of a report that may have been published in a newspaper. In those terms the question is out of order.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VIET NAM—CEASE-FIRE AGREEMENT—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two questions for the Secretary of State for External Affairs having to do with the dispatch of Canadian personnel as part of the international control and supervisory commission under the Viet Nam peace agreement. In view of the fact that Article 18 of the main agreement specifically states that the international commission of control and supervision shall be composed of representatives of four countries and then names them—Canada, Hungary, Indonesia and Poland—and in view of the fact it is rather hard to imagine that those countries would be named in the agreement without their consent, I would ask the minister whether Canada was approached for its consent and, if so, by whom, and was consent given to Canada being named in the main agreement as one of the four countries to participate in the commission?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have explained to the House previously, it was intimated to us that we might be called upon to be a member of the commission. We did not at that time give our agreement. We have taken the attitude, which I have explained many times in the House, that whether we were participants would depend upon the terms of the agreement and upon the terms of the protocol under which the supervisory commission would operate. We have received invitations from all four parties to the cease-fire agreement to participate. We have notified each of them of the announcement I made in the House of Commons and of the terms upon which we are prepared to participate.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, there are one or two brief supplementary questions I should like to ask. Do I understand from the minister that Canada did not agree at the time it had an intimation and that despite Canada's failure to agree the parties to the agreement stated categorically that the commission shall consist of representatives of certain countries, including Canada? Is the minister telling us that the parties to the agreement included Canada despite Canada's failure to agree?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is the situation. The parties to the agreement did include Canada notwithstanding the reservations I had expressed on behalf of the government. All four parties, not just the United States, are apparently very anxious that Canada should be a member. They knew of our reservations and conditions, and I have expressed them in this House and elsewhere and conveyed them to all the parties. Notwithstanding that, Canada was included. We have made a decision subsequently, of course, that if the agreements are signed in their present form we will participate for an initial period of 60 days.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I have one more supplementary question which follows clearly on what the minister has just said. The minister has informed the House on a number of occasions that Canada's agreement to be a member of the commission now is for a trial period of 60 days. May I ask him how that can be consonant with the provision in the agreement for the international control and supervisory commission that a member of the international commission may withdraw by giving three months' notice by means of a note to the four parties and I take that from Article 17 of the Agreement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that that is argument or debate.

An hon. Member: Oh, no!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may disagree, but this is my opinion. The hon. member wants the minister to explain how one situation can be reconciled with another, how one is consonant with another. That is not seeking information; that is debate.

Mr. Lewis: I appreciate your comment, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I might be permitted to rephrase my question? In view of the provision in Article 17 of the protocol dealing with the international commission that a member of the commission can withdraw only by giving three months' notice, has the government an assurance from the parties to the agreement in Viet Nam that they accept our 60 day notice rather than three month's notice?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have had no intimation from any of the parties to the agreement or any of the other proposed members of the commission that we would be unacceptable for a period of 60 days. To be quite clear about this, as soon as the agreements are signed in Paris I shall be sending a note confirming this in writing so that there is no possibility of any confusion.

CYPRUS—REPORTED POSSIBILITY OF CIVIL WAR—INSTRUCTIONS TO COMMANDER OF CANADIAN ELEMENT IN PEACEKEEPING FORCE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. In view of the AP dispatch from Cyprus to the effect that a civil war may break out on that island momentarily, and as Canada has a peacekeeping force on that island of some 600 men, would the minister advise the House what reports he has received from the commander of the Canadian force in Cyprus on that matter and what instructions he has given his commander to be followed in case civil war does actually break out?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, we have had reports of some disturbances in Cyprus, but our information is that they are of the order of student demonstrations and are perhaps related to the forthcoming general election. They are not disputes between the Turkish and Greek Cypriots. They are disputes between two factions of Greeks. Therefore it is really more a matter for the police in Cyprus and not part of our peacekeeping role.

VIET NAM--CONTINGENCY PLANS FOR CANADIAN ELEMENT IN SUPERVISORY COMMISSION IF CIVIL WAR BREAKS OUT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Has the Canadian government a contingency plan to be followed by the supervisory force which will be leaving shortly for Viet Nam in the eventuality of a civil war in that country breaking out after the cease-fire commences, particularly after American forces have been completely evacuated from Viet Nam? If so, would the minister advise the House what that contingency plan is?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have given very serious consideration to the safety of our personnel, and in the event of hostilities being renewed we have not one but more than one contingency plan which would enable us to evacuate all Canadian personnel from Viet Nam.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

NUMBER OF CONVICTED MURDERERS NOW IN JAIL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Earlier in the week I asked him about the commutation of sentences of people who were charged and convicted of the murder of police officers. I have a list of 12 commutations by order in council since January 4, 1968. I should like to ask the Solicitor General—this is a serious question which might affect the length of the debate on capital punishment—whether there is anyone now incarcerated in any institution in Canada for whom all the processes of law have been completed and who stands convicted of capital murder at the present time?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): There are two cases of people who have killed either a policeman or a prison guard and who have been convicted, but appeals are still open to them and they have not yet approached the Solicitor General or the cabinet for commutation.

• (1130)

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I think I know the answer to my question, but I want to make this clear. After all due processes of the law have been completed—when I say "due processes of law" I mean the trial, the court of appeal of the province, the Supreme Court of Canada, or any other proceedings whereby a man might get a new trial—is there anybody now incarcerated in an institution for whom all the procedures have been completed, and who is now subject to capital punishment, because this might affect the length of the debate itself?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member and to the minister that we are anticipating a debate. The hon. member has said that the answer to this question might have an effect on the length of the debate, but we have not yet reached that stage. I gather that there will be such a debate later today. The question might be asked when the minister has the floor later this morning, but having allowed him to reply to the first question perhaps he might reply to the supplementary.

Mr. Allmand: To the best of my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, there are no people in that category, but I will check it to make sure.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that since January 4, 1968, we have had complete abolition of capital punishment, de facto if not de jure, why is this bill now before the House of Commons and not some other bill affecting the economy of the country?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Kingston and The Islands.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

RIGHTS OF NORTHERN QUEBEC INDIANS—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT AT HEARINGS ON JAMES BAY HYDRO PROJECT

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the great concern of Canadians and the clearly defined constitutional responsibilities of the federal government, which bind the government to protecting the Indian people, can the Prime Minister tell the House when the government will present a statement to the interlocutory injunction hearings on the James Bay hydro project, outlining the government's position on the rights of Northern Quebec Indians?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this has been stated by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and I believe that the Minister of Justice has also indicated that we had representatives present at those hearings. I know of no statement to be made by the government.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Am I to understand then that it is the policy of the government not to declare any formal position with regard to the rights of the native people affected by the James Bay development project?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it would not be appropriate in any case for us in this House to comment at this point upon the proceedings which are occurring in a court.

Mr. Hees: What are you going to do?

Mr. Lang: We are, in fact, not involved directly in the proceedings. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has, of course, a very close working relationship with the people whose rights are involved, and they know where he stands on that issue.

Miss MacDonald (Kingston and The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Is the government aware of the resolution of the National Indian Brotherhood and its member organizations which supports the Indians of Quebec Association in their quest for a clear government statement and, if so, when will the minister be making such a statement in response?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer the hon. member to some of the very clear statements the Minister of Indian Affairs has made.

Mr. Stanfield: Come off it!

Mr. Lang: I will be glad, since some of them—

Mr. Hees: Name one.

Mr. Lang: —appear in Hansard and were made before the hon. member was elected to the House, to ask the department to send copies of some of them to her.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the right hon. Prime Minister.

Can he assure the House that he is giving full consideration to the importance of this project and that the province of Quebec may be assured of the government's taking into account its rights and its legal capacity to carry on with the project?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the substance of the statements to which the Minister of Justice has just referred is that we did not want to be paternalistic in that area. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has always assisted the Indians and has never attempted to dictate his own policy. That is still the attitude to which the minister referred. I shall add that our position is the same as concerns Quebec: we do not want to be paternalistic in our relations with this province.

[English]

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS—REQUEST FOR DECLARATION OF GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Since there has been no clearcut statement by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or anyone else in the government with respect to the aboriginal rights of the Indian people, and having in mind the urgency of the matter and the imminence of the Mackenzie Valley pipeline that has been referred by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, will the government come out now, on the threshold of possible future legal proceedings, and declare in favour of some aboriginal title and land rights for the Indian people of these areas?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I might disagree with the premise of the question, there has, of course, been a very clear statement by the government on the question of aboriginal rights. It was made in the House of Commons at the time of the publication of the policy paper on Indian affairs, and it was wholeheartedly supported by the spokesman for the Conservative party and the speaker on behalf of the NDP at the time.

Mr. Nielsen: Rubbish.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member looks it up in Hansard he will see that the rubbish is all in his own mind.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking to ask supplementaries but we will soon be running short of time. Unless we go to another subject we will again find ourselves covering only four or five subjects during the whole question period, and again those who suffer will be our hon. friends in the fourth and fifth rows to my left. I wish we could agree to give them a chance occasionally.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a very brief supplementary to the Minister of Transport. In view of the minister's responsibilities under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, can he tell us how many licences have been issued under that act for the construction of bridges and other projects in relation to the James Bay development?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that a question such as this one should be placed on the order paper.

JAMES BAY HYDRO DEVELOPMENT—COMPLIANCE BY QUEBEC WITH TERMS OF AGREEMENT TRANSFERRING TERRITORY TO PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question either to the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice which neither the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development nor any other minister has answered in previous sessions. Has the government of Canada asked the government of Quebec to comply with the terms of the agreement under which these territories were transferred to the jurisdiction of that province?

Mr. Len Marchand (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take that question as notice. I have been pulling a number of the ends together on this whole question in the last few days. I had a meeting with some of the Indian people from the James Bay area and members of the Quebec Indian Association a few days ago. I agree with the hon. member that is a very serious question. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, although he is now in hospital recuperating, is giving this matter his most serious attention.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS—NORTHERN PIPELINE PROJECT—INQUIRY RESPECTING ROUTE

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

May I ask the minister whether studies have been or are being made with a view to developing the natural gas deposits that were found last year on Melville and King Christian Islands, and also whether a survey has been made of the route to be followed by the pipeline to bring this natural gas down to the consumer market?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the companies concerned, Panarctic Oil and Tenneco, are now involved in a study on the viability of such a pipeline from northern to central Canada. At this stage, the government has not commissioned any studies on this matter, but we are looking forward to the results of the studies made by the companies involved.

TRANSPORT

TRANSFER BY VOLKSWAGEN TO HALIFAX FROM SAINT JOHN FOR IMPORTING OF CARS—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT SUBSIDY AND RAIL RATES

Mr. Tom Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport of which I gave him notice sometime ago. Has the minister had a chance to check into equalization of Canadian National rail rates at Halifax compared with Canadian Pacific rates at Saint John in connection with the recent car import contract? Can he say whether there is any government subsidy involved, and also can he say that the rates are compensatory?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as far as I can remember the hon. member talked to me or wrote to me about Volkswagen changing its location from Saint John to Halifax. I do not think this has anything to do with the freight rates. I think it has something to do with the space that can be offered to Volkswagen at Saint John. Apparently the National Harbours Board was not in a position to supply the land required by Volkswagen. They signed a two-year contract and I assume that after that they will reconsider their position if the land is available at Saint John.

• (1140)

Mr. Bell: I appreciate the detailed answer the minister gave. Will he assure the House that the National Harbours Board will continue to play a big part in the port of Saint John and not downgrade the port, because that may now happen in the opinion of many people?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is a representation.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

POSSIBILITY OF TRANSFER OF COLLEGE FROM CAPE BRETON TO OTTAWA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. May I ask the minister whether officials of his department have been negotiating or are at present negotiating for the purchase of property in Ottawa with the ultimate end in mind of transferring a portion or all of the Canadian Coastguard College operation from Cape Breton to Ottawa? If the minister does not have that information on hand at the moment, will he give the assurance that he will report back to the House as soon as possible in a full and comprehensive way as to the future of the Canadian Coastguard College?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire into this matter; I will report to the House.

Mr. Muir: Since, despite our great efforts, we were unable to get a definitive reply from the minister's predecessor, may I ask him to give this matter priority in order to allay fears that Cape Breton is to lose the Canadian Coastguard College, as so many other institutions have been taken by this government from that area?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, that is a representation to the minister.

WHEAT—FINAL PAYMENT FOR 1971-72 CROP YEAR

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Can the minister say whether there will be a final payment to farmers on wheat for the 1971-72 crop year? If so, when will this payment be made to the farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there will be a final payment. The Wheat Board has advised me that it expects the payment to be made in the near future.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

STEPS TO ENSURE ADEQUATE NUMBER OF PLANES AND VESSELS FOR ACCIDENTS OFF EAST COAST

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, notice of which has been given to him. May I ask the minister what steps he has taken to ensure adequate search and rescue capabilities off the east coast of Canada in view of the very serious incident that took place recently when it took ten hours to evacuate the crew of a stranded Canadian trawler only a very short distance from the coast of Newfoundland because there were no helicopters based there?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have been discussing search and rescue with my hon. friend and I know his interest in having a maximum presence of search and rescue forces in Newfoundland. This force, of course, is stationed at Sheerwater and Summerside. It is concentrated there for operational reasons and to reduce the cost of the search and rescue operations. We are, however, looking at the possibility of decentralizing it somewhat and increasing our capability in Newfoundland.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. May I ask the minister what he is doing in line with the undertaking he gave in Newfoundland to increase the capability of fisheries patrol vessels and to acquire new vessels to provide that kind of assistance in the event of accidents at sea?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, we are building new vessels. We are also exploring the possibility of contracting with fishermen who own vessels of the appropriate kind to help us in our protection activities.

ASSIGNING OF RESPONSIBILITY TO ONE DEPARTMENT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to which the Minister of National Defence or the Prime Minister might respond. Has any consideration been given by the government to assigning the total responsibility for search and rescue to either the Department of Transport or the Department of National Defence? I ask this question because of the difficulty referred to today and difficulties with respect to effective search and rescue operations during the past few years.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter was considered by the government and as a result we decided to establish a co-ordinating body which would ensure that these forces would work together. I understand that this is operating well.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY GAS PIPELINE—PORTION OF CAPACITY TO BE USED FOR CANADIAN NEEDS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and arises out of a statement he made during a panel discussion in Toronto recently to the effect that a national gas pipeline along the Mackenzie River Valley would be essential to meet Canadian needs rather than United States needs. In light of that statement, may I ask the minister what proportion of the initial pipeline capacity will be dedicated to Canadian needs?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think we will have to wait until there is an application from the companies to see that. The intention would be in the early stages to have a substantial portion of the capacity devoted probably to the transit of Alaskan gas through to the central American market. Of course, the reserves available in the Mackenzie Delta would not be available to Canadian markets without the construction of a pipeline. So at the initial stage no doubt Alaskan gas will form a large part of the throughput, but as Canadian demand rises, as we expect it will, to meet the level of the pipeline Canadian gas will form a larger portion. Without such a pipeline Canadian needs in the future cannot be met.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the statement by W. P. Wilder, chairman of Canadian Arctic Gas Study Company, at the same panel discussion that initially a substantial volume of the gas to be delivered must be dedicated to the American market and that only an excess of capacity would be dedicated to Canadian needs, may I ask the minister whether this means that the main volume of the initial pipeline will be dedicated to American needs and only if the pipeline is twinned will substantial quantities of gas be dedicated to Canadian needs?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the applicant may have whatever ambitions he wishes, but as far as the government is concerned the primary purpose of the pipeline will be to provide access to Mackenzie Delta resources for Canadian purposes. As I just said, it is expected that in the early years, since the throughput of the pipeline will exceed by about one billion cubic feet per day current demands of the Canadian market, it will be American gas that will be going through. The requirement will be, however—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Wellington.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

POSSIBILITY OF INCLUSION OF PRISONERS WHO HAVE DONE CONSTRUCTION WORK WHILE INCARCERATED

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Has he or any member of his department given approval, or have they considered giving approval, to prisoners who have worked on prison buildings or on similar construction being placed under the unemployment insurance scheme?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard about such a proposal but I will investigate it and report to the hon. member as soon as possible.

MINING

COAL—ACTION TO PREVENT SHUTDOWN OF OPERATIONS AT CANMORE, ALBERTA

Mr. Joe Clark (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Would the minister indicate what action the government is taking to help prevent the shutdown of coal mining operations at Canmore, Alberta, and the consequent unemployment of Alberta miners there?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his courtesy in indicating his intention to ask this question. We have sent by Telex today a message to the company requesting them to give us full details of their negotiations with their Japanese customer. This is the problem at the root here. We have also asked for indications of the employment implications of this action. I have also spoken to the Alberta Minister of Mines and Minerals and we have agreed on the necessity of an early meeting. Because of the situation of some of the other Rocky Mountain producers we are contemplating a meeting of the ministers affected and all the producers. We are very concerned about the attitude of the Japanese market toward these contracts.

An hon. Member: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member seeks a supplementary. We have reached the end of the question period. I was trying, before calling orders of the day, to give an opportunity to some hon. members in the fourth and fifth rows to ask questions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

JERICHO LAND, VANCOUVER—INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF TENDERS CONCERNING DISPOSAL

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question concerning what are known as the Jericho defence lands in Vancouver. Is it a fact that the government is preparing to call for tenders in connection with the disposal of the portion of these lands commonly referred to as the remaining 38 acres north of Fourth Avenue?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether this question can properly be asked at this time. However, if the minister can reply briefly he may do so, and I will then recognize the hon. member for Leeds.

Hon. James A. Richardson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this is a subject that has been before us for several years.

An hon. Member: Ten.

Mr. Richardson: There is an agreement in existence between the government and the city of Vancouver. My predecessor has indicated that if the city wishes to reopen this agreement we would certainly be prepared to do so and to listen to representations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS ON BEHALF OF RONALD PATRICK LIPPERT IMPRISONED IN CUBA

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In substance it is like a question I put down on the order paper a few weeks ago and which has remained unanswered. I believe it should be asked orally now since the matter was referred to in the course of a CBC television program last night. In view of the fact that Ronald Patrick Lippert, a Canadian citizen of Kitchener, Ontario, has now completed ten years of a 30-year sentence and is now eligible for parole under Cuban law, has the government made representations to Cuba on his behalf, is the minister aware of the state of Mr. Lippert's health, and can we be told when he was last seen by a Canadian government representative?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Department of External Affairs and our embassy in Havana are in touch regularly with Mr. Lippert, members of his family and other persons who are interested in him. An officer of our embassy in Havana visited Mr. Lippert early in December and found him well and in good spirits. Another visit was planned for the end of December, and I believe it has taken place.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

EFFECT OF COURT JUDGMENT ON RIGHT OF PROVINCES TO LEGISLATE—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and it arises from an answer he gave in the House last week concerning the government's intention not to seek a reference at this time to the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to jurisdiction over environmental matters. Could the minister inform us whether he has consulted with his provincial counterpart on this subject since last week? Could he also inform us specifically what steps will be taken to prevent a vacuum from developing in this very important field?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Justice): The discussion I had with the Attorney General for Ontario took place shortly before I last gave an answer to this question. He has the matter under consideration. I would expect that if he felt we ought to take any further action at this point we would hear from him again on the subject.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps that would be the easiest way out. I will allow the hon. member's supplementary and then call orders of the day. I had hoped to recognize a few more members, but the hon. member may ask a supplementary and I will then call orders of the day.

Mr. Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): My supplementary is to the Minister of the Environment. Can the minister inform us whether in his forthcoming meeting with his provincial counterpart in Ontario this subject will be among those on the agenda?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of the Environment): I am meeting with the minister of the environment of Ontario this afternoon in my office. If there is any vacuum to be filled, I hope he will have some suggestions as to how the province can fill it.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

REINSTATEMENT OF LAW RELATING TO CAPITAL PUNISHMENT THAT EXISTED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 30, 1972

Hon. Warren Allmand (Solicitor General) moved that Bill C-2, to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in 1966 and 1967 when I spoke and voted in this House for the five-year partial ban on capital punishment, I did not for one moment think that five years later I would have the responsibility of introducing the bill that would propose the continuation of that partial ban. I must say that five years ago I found this a most agonizing question, and that feeling has not changed today. It is agonizing because we so much want to protect the public from murder and violence; because we so much appreciate the feelings of those who cry out for a peaceful and just society and who abhor the violent crimes which have taken place. On the other hand, we find the practice of capital punishment just as abhorrent: the deliberate killing of a man by hanging him with a rope. If I could see how capital punishment could in any way give the public the protection it really wants, then I would certainly reconsider my present position. So far, however, I have seen no evidence or heard no argument to convince me of that position and I think we only delude ourselves if we believe we are doing something to protect the public by returning to capital punishment.

To participate in the governing of a country, Mr. Speaker, involves the exercise of human judgment to bring about desired change. All hon. members in this chamber are well aware of the need for prudence when such decisions are made. Even the smallest decision by government can ultimately impose either the greatest hardship or the greatest benefit on the citizens we serve. Therefore our deliberations are necessarily long and our differences sometimes profound. But in all things we share a unity of purpose. As members of parliament we hope to contribute to the development of society in such a way as to reinforce its virtues and diminish its injustices. However, that process is not as easy as it sounds since the calculation of virtue and vice in the short and long term without error defies human judgment. The natural consequence of human fallibility is experiment, designed to test new circumstances without wholeheartedly committing oneself to that novel direction. In that sense, Mr. Speaker, the past ten years have been experiments with respect to capital punishment. Indeed, we still find ourselves in the trial period which commenced when members of this House began to wonder whether the practice of capital punishment had any continued relevance in our society. We are a party to that debate which commenced when Canada's first recorded execution occurred in the late eighteenth century. At that time a sixteen-year-old girl was hanged for petty theft.

The very purpose of the criminal law stems from a desire to provide a means of protection for the public against the few who do not respect the rights of others. That still remains a fundamental purpose of the law to which this government and the Solicitor General's ministry remains committed. Fortunately, however, the intent of the law can now be fulfilled by diverse means not requiring the ruthless measures of earlier times when mutilation and torture seemed acceptable means of assuring the safety of the public. We have moved more and more from what I would call punitive deterrents to preventive deterrents.

In recent years we have witnessed several legislative and administrative acts which have contributed to the improving security of Canadians. Crime prevention has become as important a concept for modern police work as apprehension. The best deterrent to murder or any other crime is the certainty of detection and conviction. Consequently, effective police surveillance, pursuit and follow-through are paramount.

The RCMP, which is our responsibility, has led the way in prevention-oriented police activities. One of these concepts, called "Prevention-Oriented Policing Services" has been designed to facilitate the optimum distribution of manpower resources with a view to discouraging crime. It specifically recognizes the growing need of the public for a police presence on a constant, rather than a sporadic basis. Such a program accents the vital importance of such crucial police functions as police/community relations, regular police patrols, objective long-range planning and all other related elements generally regarded as being conducive to sound crime prevention strategies. These methods are increasingly effective when linked with improved research into the causes of crime in society.

The Solicitor General's ministry is taking a more active role in linking together the operational aspects of police work with basic research and broadly-based analysis. To this end, the security planning and research group in the Solicitor General's department has now broadened its responsibilities to include the analysis of criminal activities and criminal trends in Canadian society and has been renamed the "Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group". In recent years, the RCMP has also devoted considerable time and energies to improving communications with all other police forces in Canada, and has continued to contribute to the success of Interpol.

• (1200)

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the RCMP, through its constantly improving crime detection and crime prevention programs, has set standards for police work which seek for the public the protection it so rightly deserves. This House has passed a variety of legislation in recent years which has also provided the public with a great measure of personal security. The omnibus justice bill of 1968 provided for increased gun control, which according to the Police Chiefs Association of Canada rendered their work easier. New programs have come into effect since January 1 which will provide compensation to victims of violent crime. Two agreements have been signed by my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) with the provinces of British Columbia and New Brunswick to this end.

Furthermore, the Department of Justice has been active in negotiating legal aid schemes with the provinces which will help to assure that all citizens have access to legal assistance. Protection of the public, therefore, is a multidimensional concept involving police activities designed to deter and detect crime; analysis of new trends in crime; determination of the law's responsiveness to new forms of crime; assurance that the public can be compensated for injury as a result of criminal activity; and the availability of legal assistance when a citizen is confronted with legal proceedings.

I have referred to these matters because some have charged that our only concern is with the criminal. Some say we have no concern for the protection of the public or the victims of the crime. This is not so. As I have pointed out, our principal concern is with the protection of the public. That is the principal purpose of the criminal law. I also pointed out that we are continually improving the criminal law, our police forces, the prosecution of the law and we have programs to reimburse the victims of crime.

In recent years we have had three very distinct laws relating to the use of capital punishment. Prior to 1961, all murder was considered as capital, and the only penalty for that crime was capital punishment. During that period of time, many countries were re-assessing the usefulness and humanity of executions, and indeed there were many nations which were in the process of finally abolishing the death penalty. The same debate was taking place in Canada. Although the special committee of the House on capital punishment, which met between 1954 and 1956, did not recommend the abolition of the death penalty, the committee heard a wide variety of conflicting evidence which represented the divided opinion of the public and parliamentarians.

In 1961, the law was further amended to provide for capital and non-capital murder, and the punishment for non-capital murder was life in prison. This legislation provided that murder was to be considered capital if it was planned and deliberate on the part of the murderer and was committed by the murderer's own act. Additionally, the murder of a police or prison official was also considered a capital offence, and the penalty was death.

As a result of further debate in the country and in parliament in 1966 and 1967, a five-year period was established during which capital murder was limited to cases involving the death of police and prison officials. This trial period, which expired on December 29, 1972, was, in effect, an experiment which was agreed to by the House. It was hoped at that time that adequate materials could be gathered during the five-year period to assist in some final resolution with respect to the use of capital punishment.

Bill C-2, which is now before the House, most closely resembles the 1967 bill in that the death penalty is still only applicable in cases where a police or prison official is murdered. However, the terms "capital" and "non-capital" murder have been dropped, and new terms, "murder punishable by death" and "murder punishable by life in prison," have replaced them. This change has been made for purposes of clarity and precision. The proposed duration of this bill is five years. I shall return to a specific argument in favour of this bill in a short while, but first I would like to address my remarks to several issues which are in some way related to the House's deliberations.

In some quarters we have heard that a plebiscite or a referendum should be held on the issue of capital punishment so as to ascertain the public's feelings on the subject. Often the example of California is cited, where a referendum did take place and the public indicated that capital punishment should be returned. To argue in favour of a plebiscite or a referendum on the basis of the United States practice is to ignore the fundamental differences between our forms of government. Referendums such as those used in the United States have the force of law because they are a constitutional feature of several states. No such provision exists in Canada. Although there have been plebiscites in jurisdictions under the British parliamentary system, they have not had the force of law but simply represent the popular expression on simple, clear-cut issues.

I think all members of the House appreciate that the complexities of the capital punishment question should be dealt with by the House of Commons. We have been sent to this House to deliberate, to weigh the force of argument. When we perform this function we stand ready to be held responsible for our votes in subsequent elections. If we were to accept a plebiscite on the issue of capital punishment we would open the way for plebiscites on all controversial legislation of a similar nature presented to the House.

This does not mean that we do not have a duty to consult with and listen to our constituents. We do have that duty and we should take it seriously. But this means that we listen openly and honestly to their arguments, the reasons for their opinions, and if they are convincing we adopt them. It does not mean that we should be swayed by protests, volume of voice, shrillness, or mere numbers. Under the British parliamentary system the constituency votes are counted on election day. When we are sent to the House of Commons we are supposed to study the merits of each issue as it affects the public interest, and in doing this we listen to people.

We are not blind, however, to the unique moral questions which are contained in any bill relating to the imposition of the death penalty. A free vote was held in 1967 when the last legislation was passed; the same free vote will prevail for this bill. I am certain that such a free vote will be exercised by all members of the House on the basis of cogent arguments and not on the basis of irrational prejudices.

The purpose of the original trial period in 1967 was to allow for a period during which those crimes punishable by death would be severely restricted. This five-year experiment would be a time of intense study and analysis, the results of which were to guide the House's deliberations after December 29, 1972. We are beyond the termination date of that five-year period but, unfortunately, we do not have the full data for the entire five years on which to base studies and, hence, legislative recommendations. Statistics are some two years behind, and therefore at the moment we are only in possession of full data covering the first three years of the trial period.

We are just receiving the statistics for 1971. It seems to me that we must see the process, commenced in 1967, through to its logical conclusion. That further necessitates making no substantial change in the law until such time as we are in a position to fully understand the impact of the partial abolition. Bill C-2 will allow us to complete this evaluation. If the House agrees to the provisions of Bill C-2 we will be able to compare three periods of approximately six years when three distinct and different laws concerning the death penalty prevailed. If we are properly to acquit ourselves of our responsibilities to the public, Mr. Speaker, we must be prepared to grant the time necessary to study the effects of the three laws so that decisions can be made on sound ground.

• (1210)

In conjunction with the discussion of this bill, it appears necessary to dispel some erroneous information with respect to two other matters, that is commutation and parole. Contrary to some suggestions, there has been no policy of routine commutation exercised by the government since 1968.

Mr. Woolliams: That is rubbish. You can't believe that; you are joking. Whoever wrote that speech does not know the situation.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, since 1968 there were four convictions for capital murder and each of these four cases resulted in commutation. On each occasion these cases were the subject of long and detailed examination by the cabinet. The procedure for reviewing capital cases by the governor in council is premised on the need for the fullest particulars in respect of the case at hand. Transcripts of trial proceedings are gathered along with detailed police reports and additional information relating to the condemned person's character and mental state. Representations from the defence counsel are made to the Solicitor General who then takes the question of commutation to his cabinet colleagues, each of whom has been supplied with a copy of all the relevant material.

At this point the case is discussed exhaustively and when a decision is taken an order in council is issued either commuting sentence or instructing that the execution should be carried out. Particular attention is given to any recommendation of mercy from the judge or the jury, and of the four cases since 1968 there were recommendations for mercy in three.

[Mr. Allmand.]

Notwithstanding the fact that no execution has taken place since 1968—

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I know that the minister is a gentleman and I do not think he has done this deliberately. Somebody within the department has supplied this material. My question of privilege is this. I can count them up; I received this information from the department, there have been 12 commutations since January 4, 1962, yet the minister is dealing with a figure of four.

An hon. Member: He said since 1968.

Mr. Woolliams: I am sorry, January 4, 1968.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a question of privilege. Perhaps the hon. member is asking a question of the minister, but that cannot be considered a question of privilege.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member mention 12 cases during the question period and I was somewhat surprised, because I was given statistics indicating there were four cases of commutation since the new law went into effect at the beginning of 1968.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There were four in Alberta alone.

Mr. Allmand: I rechecked that after I heard the hon. member put the question, and the information I have here is that there were four cases, but I will check it again.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Oh, gracious!

An hon. Member: He said 1962.

Mr. Allmand: The information I have is that there were four cases since 1968.

Notwithstanding the fact that no execution has taken place since 1968, and I want to emphasize again that there has been no automatic commutation, that each case has indeed been examined in detail before a decision has been made, I should think that some hon. members on the other side who were members of the Cabinet before 1963 know that serious consideration is given to these matters.

There are some misunderstandings concerning parole regulations governing the release of individuals who have been sentenced to life imprisonment. The regulations stipulate that such a person shall serve the entire term of the sentence in prison unless, and upon recommendation of the parole board, the Governor in Council directs otherwise. However, the parole board may not recommend parole in such a case until at least 10 years of the term of life imprisonment has been served. I think it important to note that there are significant safeguards to ensure that such persons do not return to society unless the Governor in Council so provides. Furthermore, the National Parole Board must be convinced that rehabilitation has taken place before it would recommend such a release. Since 1867 only one person convicted of murder and sentenced to life imprisonment has killed a second time while on parole.

I am very concerned about the problem relating to parole and temporary absence, not only for murderers but for all persons sentenced to penitentiary. For this reason, the government announced in the throne speech that we would reform the penal and parole systems. Last year my predecessor established a task force, under Justice James K. Hugessen of Montreal, to review our parole and temporary absence systems. That report was received just before Christmas and an examination of it is now underway. I expect to make some comment on it later in the session. In the meanwhile, we have taken certain administrative steps to correct deficiencies in the parole and temporary absence systems, to improve rehabilitation and to better protect the public.

It is my conviction that Bill C-2 represents the most prudent course open to us, not simply for the arguments I have already advanced concerning the need for a complete study of data. The alternatives to this bill would appear at this time to be impossible or undesirable for one important reason or another.

In a survey commissioned by the Solicitor General's department, which included questions designed to provide a profile of public attitudes in respect of the death penalty, it was shown that those in favour of capital punishment in all instances and those opposed to capital punishment in all instances balanced each other off with 19.1 per cent and 20.9 per cent respectively. Fifty-nine per cent favoured the retention of capital punishment in limited cases. While those limitations are not set out in detail, this legislation represents this kind of limited approach. Although the House may otherwise direct, it would appear that to move to either extreme; to move either toward total abolition or toward total retention at this time is neither possible nor desirable under prevailing circumstances.

My views on capital punishment are on the record. I have, in the course of my career in the House, been an abolitionist. In 1966 and 1967, I voted for complete abolition of capital punishment. However, I am now here as a member of cabinet and the legislation which we are examining is the result of the collective consideration of that body. Although, I personally, remain opposed to capital punishment, I believe that this bill represents the best possible proposal at this time. Because a free vote will ultimately decide the final form of Bill C-2, and because there may be amendments offered by hon. members, I would be most concerned if there were any tendency toward a more punitive law. Consequently, I would like to offer a brief argument against those who would want to expand the categories for which the death penalty is applicable.

My moral objections to capital punishment have not changed since 1966 when I argued that it is wrong to kill and wrong to take a human life whether it is taken by the individual or by the state. Execution does not erase the crime of murder, it simply repeats it, and in repeating that act it runs contrary to the Judeo-Christian moral principle "Thou shalt not kill". I cannot see how states are exempt from that clear statement that declares the sanctity of human life.

Killing is certainly reprehensible at all times, Mr. Speaker, but when the state sets out on a most deliberate path to destroy human life, then perhaps that is one of the most heinous acts of all. When the state indulges in murder, the result is a weakening of the moral fabric of that society. By such a low-minded act of cruelty and revenge, the state contributes to the brutalization of society as a whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: If the state demands that its citizens act with moderation and tolerance, it cannot sanction the deliberate destruction of life. The state must set the example, the clear example of respect for human life, through the tolerant and patient application of law which looks to other more effective means of protecting society and discouraging crime, even murder. It is my belief that we are only justified in taking another life when it is the last resort in self-defence. It is clear that capital punishment is not the last resort in self-defence.

• (1220)

Each time the state-society executes a man, it admits failure—a failure of its family life, a failure of its education system, a failure of its social and economic environment, a failure of its moral and religious institutions, and, above all, a failure to cope humanely and optimistically with anti-social behaviours. An execution is an act of despair toward the value of the human person.

Mr. Speaker, I would point to the positions taken by several of the churches, including the United Church, the Anglican Church, the Unitarian Church and others. In the December issue of the United Church Observer there appeared an editorial supporting the abolition of capital punishment on the grounds that capital punishment is:

> . . . unChristian, immoral and as a deterrent or protection of society, ineffective.

It appears to me that capital punishment does not fall within the acceptable limits of any of the moral or religious codes that exist now or have existed in our country.

During the last five years, the Solicitor General's department has been watching very closely the statistics related to the incidence of murder in Canada. In 1971, the then solicitor general authorized a research project to be conducted by Dr. Ezzar A. Fattah, Associate Professor of Criminology at the University of Montreal which would:

> . . . provide a critical analysis of research that has been done, and of factual data that exists in connection with the death penalty as a judicial punishment, with special reference to the deterrent effect and discrimination.

I want to underline the terms of reference for Professor Fattah's research in view of the fact that there have been suggestions made that Professor Fattah's assignment was to prove a predisposition of the Solicitor General's ministry. The department felt that it was important to get an impartial evaluation of the statistics available before the House of Commons considered the matter again. The basic data of the Fattah study only included three years of official Statistics Canada material and one year of data compiled by Professor Fattah himself. In addition to the Fattah report, another document was prepared which contained updated material relating to capital punishment, covering the period 1965-1972. I hope that all members take the opportunity to read these important contributions to the study of capital punishment during the course of this debate.

While the Fattah study does not have the benefit of the full statistics for the five year period, it does represent the definitive study of the deterrent effect of capital punishment within the context of the Canadian experience. When the study focuses on the deterrent effects of capital punishment, it cuts to the vital centre of the retentionist argument, for if murder is not deterred by the impending threat of execution, then the value of the rope disappears completely.

The burden of proof has always resided with those who argue that capital punishment is a deterrent to murder, for if we are going to kill, we must establish beyond all doubt the justification for the killing. Now that we are in possession of Professor Fattah's study, the onus of proof is heavier than ever, for while many people use raw data to show that the absolute number of incidents of murder may or may not have occurred, they must successfully demonstrate that an increase in the number of murders is related to a lack of the death penalty.

Professor Fattah concluded that:

> ... homicide rates ... are conditioned by factors other than the death penalty. They suggest that the cause of homicide and murder cannot be found in any single factor but in a total social situation in which a special law or a particular punishment can have little or no effect.

He goes on to say that:

> Nothing emerges from the study of trends of violent crimes in Canada that would support or even suggest the proposition that the suspension of capital punishment has caused an increase in the homicide rate. Although the data shows that there has been a slight increase in the homicide rate in recent years, it indicates at the same time that this increase cannot be attributed to any one cause. In fact, on the basis of the data and, for reasons explained above, it can be safely claimed that the suspension is unlikely to have played a part in this increase.

Professor Fattah offers a much more complete set of conclusions which I believe should be part of the record of this debate. I shall, therefore, quote from them in part.

When the author of the report poses the question of whether the slight increase in homicide and murder over the eight years of studies can be attributed to the suspension of capital punishment, he answers "No". The arguments supporting his conclusion are as follows and I quote from his report:

> (1) If the increase in homicide were solely due to the suspension of capital punishment then it should be limited to this offence. Other offences of violence for which there has not been a change in punishment should show no increase or at least a lower increase than that in criminal homicide. Our data amply show that this is not true. Actually the increase in criminal homicide is the lowest among all crimes of violence studied, a fact which indicates that such increase can neither be attributed nor related to the suspension of capital punishment.

Another statement that he put on the record is that:

> If the increase in criminal homicide were due to the suspension of capital punishment then it should show a clear and consistent trend by starting to rise when the administrative suspension became known and by continuing to rise at a quicker pace when the legal suspension came into effect. Our data show that this is not true.

[Mr. Allmand.]

He also said:

> The years during which capital punishment was administratively suspended (with the exception of 1967) did not witness an increase in criminal homicide over 1962. Furthermore, in many Canadian provinces the first year of legal suspension did not mark an increase in criminal homicide rate over the previous year, it either marked a decline in the rate or at least the rate remained unchanged.
> In many provinces such as Nova Scotia (1968), Ontario (1968, 1969 and 1970) Saskatchewan (1968 and Alberta (1968, 1969) homicide rates actually declined after capital punishment was legally suspended. This speaks eloquently against a link between this suspension and the over-all increase in homicide ...
> If the suspension or the abolition of capital punishment leads to an increase in criminal homicide, this would necessarily have been reflected in the homicide rate in the most populated, most urbanized and most industrialized province in Canada: Ontario.

But, as I said, the homicide rate declined in Ontario in the three years following the abolition of capital punishment.

In this debate we should try to place the Canadian situation with respect to capital punishment into a global context and attempt to determine the relative experience of retentionist and abolitionist nations. That can be accomplished in many ways. Let us first examine the respective use of capital punishment in two similar jurisdictions operating under differing laws. The adjacent jurisdictions of Maine and New Brunswick are similar geographic, economic and cultural entities. Maine has been an abolitionist state since 1887 while New Brunswick, as part of Canada, was retentionist until 1967. While the deterrent argument would insist that Maine should have a higher murder rate than New Brunswick, this is not the case. The murder rates are, for all intents and purposes, the same. Within the United States there are other comparisons to be made between contiguous, abolitionist and retentionist states.

• (1230)

When examined with respect to murder, aggravated assault and major crimes of violence, Oregon, an abolitionist state, and Washington, a retentionist state have had remarkably similar rates of crime in all three categories. Minnesota, an abolitionist state, has had a lower incidence of murder than neighbouring retentionist South Dakota. The same can be said in the case of West Virginia over Virginia and Iowa over Nebraska. Certainly, there are cases where the reverse is true also, that is where a state retaining capital punishment had a lower rate of murder than a nearby abolitionist state. But the very point is that there does not seem to be any direct cause and effect relationship between the existence of the death penalty and a lower rate of murder.

One must therefore pose the question, "If there is no consistent demonstrable relationship between executions and deterrence, what is the use of retaining such a penalty which has so many other inherent shortcomings"? Those arguing for the general use of the death penalty must answer that question. From the eleventh century when William the Conqueror first abolished in part the use of capital punishment, there has been a world-wide trend towards the ultimate banishing of this kind of punishment.

Mr. Hees: You can go further back than that.

Mr. Allmand: Probably I could.

Mr. Hees: Tell us about how Caesar handled it?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the western European states which have led the way in ceasing to use the death penalty as a punitive feature of their legal systems, witness fewer executions each year. At the moment only France, Spain and Éire continue to execute those found guilty of murder. France uses the guillotine and Spain the garrot. All other western European nations have either de jure or de facto abolition. What is perhaps most interesting to note is that the murder rates in those countries are uniformly low, while France continues to suffer from a high rate of murder. Clearly, in the case of France, even a death so horrible as the use of the guillotine has not acted as an effective deterrent to the potential murderer.

The conclusions which must be drawn from the western European experience are inescapable. In the first place the absence of capital punishment has not meant that the abolitionist states of Europe have become overrun with murderers. Quite the contrary is true; murder rates there are amongst the lowest in the world. Secondly, it is obvious that these nations have found other methods of deterring murder, such as stricter gun control, better police forces to assure detection of crimes, and generally a citizenry that is content and law-abiding. Surely, we should share similar goals.

The criminologist is not the only professional acquainted with crime and punishment who disputes the effectiveness of the death penalty as a deterrent. Lewis E. Hawes, a former warden of Sing Sing penitentiary in the United States, has recounted his conversations with condemned men awaiting execution, in his book Meet the Murderer.

Before Morris Wasser's execution, when I told him that the governor had refused him a last minute respite, he said bitterly: 'All right, warden, it doesn't make much difference what I say now about this here system of burning a guy, but I want to set you straight on something'.

'What's that' I asked.

'Well, this electrocution business is the bunk. It don't do no good, I tell you, and I know, because I never thought of the chair when I plugged that old guy, and I'd probably do it again if he had me on the wrong end of the rod'

'You mean, I said, 'that you don't feel you've done wrong in taking another man's life'?

'No, warden, it ain't that', he said, impatiently. 'I mean that you just don't think of the hot seat when you plug a guy. Somethin' inside you just makes you kill, 'cause you know if you don't shut him it's curtains for you'.

'I see. Then you never even thought of what would happen to you at the time'.

'Hell, no. And lots of other guys in here, Harry and Brick and Luke, all says the same thing. I tell you the hot seat will never stop a guy from pullin' a trigger'. That was Wasser's theory, and I've heard it echoed many times since'.

There are many other reports of people, convicted and executed for murder, who said much the same thing.

Mr. Hees: You don't expect them to like it, do you?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, those who strongly argue that capital punishment is a deterrent probably presume that all others look on murder and capital punishment as they do. This is not the case. Capital punishment may very well be a deterrent for some people but these are ones who would probably not commit murder anyway. These are usually balanced, cautious, humane, law-abiding people. But those who commit murder are not. They are adventurers, desperate, suicidal, masochistic, martyr-prone, and even idealists in some situations, and so on.

Despite the suspension of capital punishment, many criminals risk death time and time again while carrying out crimes, yet they are not deterred. Since 1968 many criminals were shot by police or others while carrying out their crimes. This possibility is known to criminals, yet they carry on, nevertheless. There are many other examples where certain types of individuals will risk their lives, careless drivers, auto racers, skydivers, soldiers of fortune. We had many Canadians who volunteered to fight in Viet Nam. The risk of death does not deter these people. They have a psychology different from those people who feel that capital punishment is a deterrent.

The certainty of committing errors in executing those found guilty of murder is always a sobering thought to those who promote capital punishment. I use the word certainty because it is inevitable that the law will make mistakes and that the innocent will suffer. We accept that as a natural consequence of human law, but when that error cannot be corrected, as in the case of capital punishment, can anyone rest easily when they know that the state will sooner or later execute the wrong man?

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) has described to the House on another occasion how the very fallibility of the law did cost an innocent man his right to life. Both the British and the Americans have had their own spectacular cases in which the wrong individual was executed, and no one would suggest that Canadian law is any less capable of making mistakes. In a study of murders in the first 50 years of this century conducted by the University of Minnesota, researchers conclude that as many as 12 per cent of all those executed were eventually absolved of the crime for which they died.

Those who believe in deterrence often argue that if the death penalty deters one act of murder, then it is worthy of use. However, they must balance such an assertion against the certainty of eventually executing at least one innocent man. This is compounded by the inequality of legal defences available to the rich and the poor. Often a gangster involved in organized crime is able to hire the best lawyers available, while a poor man has to use whatever lawyer he can find, with the result that the rich man is often acquitted while the poor man often is executed. Maybe this is not as prevalent today, but it still applies in many types of criminal prosecution and leaves the way open for execution by mistake or error.

One must also recognize the statistical fact that murder is often the unique incident of criminality in a man's life. Most murders, according to a University of Toronto study on murder, are crimes of passion and not premeditation. Approximately two out of three murders are committed against family or acquaintances. The uniqueness of murder is further borne out by the facts that the recidivism rates are amongst the lowest for any form of criminal activity, and that in the history of Canada only one man has been convicted of murdering a second time. So what do we accomplish by capital punishment? We don't effectively deter. We don't help the victim. We risk killing innocent men. We escalate brutality and we betray our highest ideals.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a word or two to the discussion of the means of execution. There has been much debate over the years as to the "cleanest" and "quickest" method for the state to employ in killing a condemned person. It would appear that, as in all things, there is a margin for error in the conduct of executions. Time Magazine has written:

• (1240)

Even the cleanest execution, and an appalling number are not, is so revolting to see that witnesses commonly vomit and faint. Electrocution is relatively swift, though the victims flesh sometimes burns while his eyes strain out of their sockets. With cyanide and the rope, it sometimes takes five minutes for the dying man to fall totally unconscious, and usually fifteen minutes before he is pronounced dead.

Many people seek to avoid the terrible reality of an execution by concentrating on the supposed swiftness or painlessness of the process. I am very much afraid that the history of executions in Canada, as in all other countries, is filled with grisly tales of botched hangings which have led to decapitation, and a ghastly host of other suffering inflicted upon the condemned. One should not try to gloss over this fundamental reality, no matter how distasteful it is. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that one either believes in rehabilitation or one does not, and since that is a belief based on an assessment of one's fellow man, it is an inviolate principle. If, indeed, one has faith in the rehabilitative process, then execution is out of the question, since it precludes any chance of altering behaviour patterns. Rehabilitation is fortunately firmly embedded in our legal system and I believe that it should be.

Today we are at an important juncture in the development of our legal system and our society's morals. The relationship between what we decide when we vote on this bill and how our citizenry will live their lives is direct and immediate. This House has established a course which we should see to the end. When, in 1967 it was determined that there would be a trial ban on capital punishment, the Canadian people could see that it was the intention of their elected officials to finally resolve the issue on the rational grounds of trial and analysis. This process is not yet complete and I hope that hon. members of this House would see good reason to grant sufficient time to conduct the kinds of studies which are necessary to arrive at a final solution to the problem of capital punishment in Canada.

I will return, Mr. Speaker, to what I said at the beginning. We must deter murders; we must protect the public—but let us not delude ourselves into thinking that this can be done by a return to capital punishment. If we are serious about reducing violent crime, let us vigorously attack the causes and strengthen our preventive deterrents.

Mr. Horner (Crowfoot): Yes, send them to Spain on their honeymoon.

Mr. Allmand: Let us stop the murder from taking place instead of relying on an execution after the deed is done.

[Mr. Allmand.]

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Calgary North wishes to ask a question before the minister resumes his seat.

Mr. Woolliams: I listened carefully to the minister's arguments and, as I see it, he takes the position that capital punishment is immoral and wrong and that there should be no exceptions. That being so, let me ask a question about section 214 of the Criminal Code. If capital punishment is wrong basically, as the minister contended in his whole argument, why is that section still included in the code and why is that not wrong? Why is it not wrong to believe in capital punishment for those who murder policemen—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member. I must remind him that he ought to address the Chair.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister, through you, why that section is included in the code? Why is it not wrong to execute a man who is found guilty of killing a police officer? Why is the principle right in one case and wrong in another?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I trust I answered that question in my remarks. I said carefully, I think, that this is the best law we can devise at present, but I should like to move forward towards total abolition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: I should hate to move backwards. I feel that the present law at least maintains a partial ban.

If I may answer a question asked earlier, I now have some statistics. It seems that under the law which went into effect in 1967, there have been only four commutations. However, there were eight cases which were left over from the earlier period which were commuted as a matter of course because the law at that time changed. Those sentences were based on the law in effect between 1961 and 1967. Since the new law has come into effect four murderers have had their sentences commuted.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I think, if the minister checks the records and trends, he will see how many were convicted under the new law. I suggest since January 4, 1964, there have been 12 such cases. I think the situation is clear and I thank the minister for his answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members may ask questions of the minister only if the minister wishes to reply. The minister has to indicate that he is prepared to reply to an hon. member's question; otherwise we shall call on the next speaker.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister through you because, as we continue in this debate, it would be helpful if my point could be made clear. I understood the minister to say that no convicted murderer is subject to parole until after ten years of his sentence has been served. Can the minister advise the House what is the practice with regard to so-called weekend leaves. I am talking of leaves for a convicted murderer. Are they permitted before ten years of the sentence has been served?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, temporary absences are authorized under the Penitentiaries Act for three days. Section 26 of the Penitentiaries Act which authorizes temporary absences for humanitarian, medical or rehabilitation purposes permits absences for three days, and up to 15 days. Those absences may be with or without escort. Yes, they have been authorized prior to the conclusion of the ten-year period, but that matter is under review right now.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the government has now chosen to introduce capital punishment as a subject for debate. This is a matter of extreme importance for all Canadians. I feel, however, that its introduction at this point is not related to its importance but is, rather, related to the government's embarrassment over Bill C-125 which it hustled out of the way as soon as the NDP indicated that it would not support it. So, in the guise of seeming to be active and in the hope of prolonging its life, aided and abetted by those on my left—

Mr. Lewis: If the hon. member keeps on talking like that I will become a retentionist.

Mr. Nielsen: It seems to me the hon. member and his party are already the best retentionists in the business.

Mr. Baldwin: They are retaining the government in power.

Mr. Nielsen: The government's embarrassment is most evident. After the capital punishment debate with what other urgent matter has the government to deal? There is the bill on pilotage, yet we still have masses of unemployed, still have the highest inflation rate, the highest cost of living, and no old age pension bill has been brought forward. Nevertheless, the government has brought forward this matter for debate at this time. This is the time when this House should be dealing with urgent legislation, to get the country back to work. The government's concern ought to be directed to curing inflation and getting the economy going again.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right.

An hon. Member: The debate is on capital punishment.

Mr. Nielsen: If hon. members in the back rows wish to rise and make their comments, I will yield to them. They should not attempt to smuggle their remarks on to the record or retain the safety of obscurity in the back rows. It is my view that the government is playing politics with this bill.

• (1250)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: And this is not the kind of issue which should be the subject of a political game. Hon. members over there are going to debate this bill for a day or two. They have control over the business of the House. Then, they will take it out of circulation to bring in the pilotage legislation. Then, they will bring it back again, only to drop it after a while when they wish some other measure to be considered. So it will go on. The bill will be used as a means by the government to avoid any embarrassment or any impending defeat. In this, hon. members opposite obviously have the support of those who sit to my left.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I wish to say something about one point the minister specifically mentioned. He referred to the special planning and research group, and indicated there had been a change in name and indicated that the name of this group had been changed to "Police and Security Planning and Analysis Group". I believe this is the first time any mention has been made of such a change, either in this chamber or outside the House. I was surprised and, indeed, somewhat alarmed to hear the minister mention this change within his department, because when the special planning and research group was set up the House was assured that the group would have nothing to do with police work, that it would not be an operational group. This name change makes me highly suspicious that the group is now involved in police work and that it is entering into the sphere of RCMP responsibility. Obviously, it has gone beyond planning and research and become operational.

Mr. Allmand: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the hon. member and the House that the group is merely doing research and planning on criminal activities. It is not an operational group.

Mr. Nielsen: I must accept the minister's statement, but I shall certainly reserve my right to exercise my own judgment with respect to the functions of this group. My suspicion is that the functions of this group are not now what we were assured they would be when it was set up. The name change implies that the group is now operational. Otherwise, why would the word "Police" appear in the new name? Anyway, I can deal with that matter again at another time.

The minister mentioned the RCMP. The RCMP, he told us, were leading the way in crime prevention. Mr. Speaker, this is about the only area in the minister's speech with which I can agree. The RCMP is probably the most accomplished and the most sophisticated police force in the world.

An hon. Member: Was.

Mr. Nielsen: And it still is, not "was". The force is being hampered by many factors, some of which I shall discuss a little later. I can inform the minister that morale is not good. That is putting it mildly. Traditional symbols within the force are being eroded, symbols with tremendous traditions behind them. No further effort should be made to undermine the solid basis of tradition upon which the force has been built. There are other factors disturbing the morale of the force. There is the provision made for the temporary leave of absence of prisoners; there is the way in which parole is granted; there is the failure of the bail reform provisions which the government introduced. With respect to statistics—if I might have the attention of the Solicitor General (Mr. Allmand) for a moment—

An hon. Member: He is listening.

Mr. Nielsen: If I might have the attention of the minister for a moment—

May I call it one o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the suggestion of the hon. member that we call it one o'clock? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At 12.55 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, just before the luncheon adjournment I was dealing with the need for this bill to be before us at all at this time. Over the noon adjournment I went to my files in order to get a press release that was issued by the leader of the New Democratic Party, and I contrast that press release with the stand that that party is taking today. In their press release last November, they said the election had made it clear that Canadians want action without delay in a number of areas, and that parliament should meet as soon as possible to deal with them. Thereafter, they listed in order of priority the matter of jobs to cure unemployment, cost of living, fair taxes, and they called for an immediate substantial increase in the basic old age pension. They also raised the question of family farms, native peoples, Canadian independence and electoral reform.

Apparently all that has now gone by the board in this new marriage between the government and the NDP. I reiterate that, instead of having this matter before parliament at this time, we should be dealing with these more urgent requirements of the country. In my own personal view, it would be much more appropriate for this bill to be debated in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. But that is not going to be the course followed, by arrangement between my hon. friends to my left and government members.

Obviously, hon. gentlemen opposite were frightened when the NDP indicated that they were not going to support Bill C-125, and there had to be a change of approach. What has happened now has been that Bill C-125 has been withdrawn and the NDP and the government will be putting their heads together. The NDP will be telling the government what they want in Bill C-125, and then the bill will be brought back to the House. That, Mr. Speaker, is exactly what is going to happen. The tail to my left is going to wag this big brute of a dog that is opposite.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the hon. member want Bill C-125?

Mr. Nielsen: Certainly, and we want it as soon as possible. We should have it now, instead of this bill. When the bill is brought before us we will certainly make our position on it known. We want action taken on these pressing matters that the hon. member's party on November 15 declared in their press release were so important to them at that time, even though the importance now seems to have been lost in this marriage of convenience.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We made our position on Bill C-125 clear, which is more than you have done.

Mr. Nielsen: We shall do so. We say that it should be here now. But regardless whether or not the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) denies it, I know what is going to happen. There is going to be hanky-panky between the two parties. Those to my left are going to be telling the government what they require in the bill before it comes back to this House, and there is going to be a lot of haggling in the meantime.

If this bill were examined in committee, it could be studied in detail and expert witnesses could be summoned, if the committee so wished. This House could then proceed with other business in the interim. We should be debating these urgent matters to which I have referred. Debate in committee would let this emotion-charged issue have a thorough and objective examination.

In his opening remarks the minister dealt with the question of deterrence. The abolitionists say that the retentionists—and the minister put the onus on the retentionists—cannot produce any figures to show that the death penalty acts as a deterrent. I put it to the minister and hon. members that nobody can produce any statistics in this regard, for those who are deterred from committing crime do not volunteer that information to anyone. So to say that the death penalty is no deterrent is to say that men do not fear death, and I find that to be a rather incredible assertion.
